After the king had meditated, the Lord appeared in the great ocean as a golden fish measuring a million yojanas that had a single horn. Glad that he, like the Lord had told him before, could fasten the boat to the horn using the serpent for a rope, he praised the Killer of Madhu. The king said: 'Since time immemorial ignorance about the knowledge of the soul has been the root cause of the material bondage that is accompanied by so much suffering and hardship. By the grace of the process of devotional service [and Your devotee] You can be attained, oh Lord who are the supreme spiritual master [see 7.5: 23-24]. He who is born accepts in his desire to be happy unwisely different bodies as a result of his karma [see 4.29 and B.G. 4: 5, 6: 45 and 16: 20], but his profit minded plans bring him only grief. That karmic matter is cleared up by rendering service to Him, our guru in the core of the heart, by whom the hard knot of the impure mind is cut. Just like a piece of ore in touch with fire gets purified, a person by that service can get rid of all the impurity as a consequence of his ignorance so that he can revive his original identity [his mode of service or varna]. May He who is Inexhaustible in this respect be our Supreme Controller, the Guru of the Gurus. Neither the demigods, nor the gurus, nor other people individually or else group wise are able to offer but one ten-thousandth of Your grace. I therefore surrender to Him, the Lord, to You who are the shelter. The way the blind are led by the blind, ignorant people accept an unenlightened person as their guru. We desirous to know our destination, have accepted Your Lordship whose knowledge is like the [rising] sun, as our spiritual master, as the seer of all that can be seen. An ordinary person following the directions of an ordinary man is of surrender to impermanent matters as the goal of life and [thus] of an ignorance that cannot be overcome, but by Your eternal, pure knowledge a person very soon achieves his original position [of service]. You are the dearmost well-wisher, the controller, the original soul and spiritual master of all worlds. You are the spiritual knowledge, the fulfillment of all desires and the One situated in the heart who cannot be known by people who in the grip of lust have a foggy intelligence. May by my surrender to You, the Greatest of All who is worshiped by the gods, the Supreme Controller for understanding the real purpose of life, by my surrender to the light of Your meaningful words of instruction, the knots fixed in the heart be cut through, oh Supreme Lord. Please tell me about Your refuge [see also B.G. 4: 34].'

Shri Shuka said: 'The Supreme Lord, the Original Person who had assumed the form of a fish, thus being addressed explained the Absolute Truth to the king while they were moving through the great ocean. Through the analytical [sankhya, matter versus spirit] perspective of [bhakti]-yoga, practically applied in a collection of divine old stories, the holy king Satyavrata thus got acquainted with the mysteries of self-realisation in all its forms. Sitting in the boat with the sages, he free from doubt listened to the knowledge of self-realisation [atma-tattva] and the eternal absolute spirit [brahma] as explained by the Supreme Lord. When the last inundation had ended the Lord after [thus] having put an end to the darkness that was caused by Hayagriva, handed over all the Vedic records to Brahma when he woke up. King Satyavrata enlightened in the spiritual knowledge and its practical wisdom, by the mercy of Lord Vishnu became in this period the Manu called Vaivasvata.'

When someone hears this great story describing Satyavrata the saintly king and the Matsya incarnation with the one horn, he will be delivered from all reactions to sin. Anyone who daily glorifies the personal appearance of the Lord will have success in all his endeavors and will return home, back to Godhead. I offer my obeisances to Him, the Cause of All Causes, He who posing as a great fish explained to Satyavrata the Vedic knowledge and put an end to the darkness of the Daitya, He who returned the Vedic records that were stolen from the mouths of Lord Brahma who lay deep asleep in the waters of the flood.'

Thus the eighth BOOK of the Shrimad Bhagavatam ends named: Withdrawal of the Cosmic Creations.

BOOK 9: LIBERATION

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 1:

King Sudyumna Becomes a Woman

The king said: 'I have listened to your descriptions of all the periods of the Manus and the wonderful actions performed by the Lord of Unlimited Potency during those periods. - He who was known by the name of Satyavrata, the saintly king and ruler of Dravidades'a, received spiritual knowledge at the end of the previous day of Brahma, by rendering service to the Original Person [the Purusha]. I heard from you how he, as a son of Vivasvan [the sun god], thus became the Manu. You have spoken about his many sons: the kings headed by Ikshvaku [8.13: 1]. Oh brahmin, please describe to us always eager to listen to your stories, the dynasties of those kings and what characterised them oh greatly fortunate one. Please tell us about all those pious and celebrated souls who were there before us, who will be there after us and who live at present with us.'

Shri Suta said: "After Parikhit thus in the assembly of all the brahmin followers had requested this, the powerful Shuka, the one most learned in the dharma, gave a reply. Shri Shuka said: 'Oh subduer of the enemies, I will now tell you the most important about the dynasty of Manu, because not even a hundred years would be enough to do this extensively. When the Supersoul, who is the Original Transcendental Person of all higher and lower forms of life, found Himself at the end of the kalpa, outside of Him nothing of this universe or anything else existed. From His navel a golden lotus generated upon which, oh King, the selfborn one with his four heads appeared [Lord Brahma, see also 3.8]. Marici appeared from Brahma's mind and Kasyapa was there from him. He in his turn begot in Aditi, the daughter of Daksha, a son: Vivasvan [see also 6.6: 38-39]. 1-1 Vivasvan begot in Samjna, Manu Shradhdhadeva who with his wife Shradhdha from his sense control fathered ten sons whom he gave the names Ikshvaku, Nriga, Sharyati, Dishtha, Dhrishtha, Karushaka, Narishyanta, Prishadhra, Nabhaga and the mighty Kavi. He, the Manu, at first had no sons, but the great personality, the powerful Vasishthha, performed a sacrifice for the demigods Mitra and Varuna that would bring him sons. But Shradhdha, Manu's wife who as prescribed observed a payo vrata [vow of drinking only, see 8.16], approached with obeisances the performing priest during the sacrifice and begged him for a daughter. The ritvik in charge [the adhvaryu] told the priest performing the oblations [the hota] to engage with this in mind, whereupon the brahmin took the ghee and recited the mantra vashath [hunto the Living Being].

With that transgression of the performing priest a daughter was born named Ila ['the libation']. When Manu saw her he most dissatisfied said to his guru: 'Oh my lord, what is this? As a result of the actions of your transcendentalists, there is alas this painful deviation. This rebellion against the Absolute Truth never should have happened! How could you, versed in Vedic knowledge, connected and austere of whom all impurities were burned away, deviate from your decision? Since when are the demigods of false promises?'

Having heard what he said, the most powerful one, their great-grandfather Vasishthha who had understanding for the mistake the performing priest had made, spoke to [Manu] the son of the sun god. 'This unexpected result was the consequence of the wrong action of your priest. I will employ however my power to give you a nice son!'

With that decision, oh King, the renowned powerful master Vasishthha offered prayers to the Original Person with the wish that Ila turned into a man. Pleased by him the Supreme Controller Hari granted the desired benediction so that Ila became a nice man who was called Sudyumna. 3-2 One day Sudyumna was on a hunting trip in the forest, oh King and was accompanied by a couple of associates. While riding a horse from Sindhuprades'a he went north in pursuit of the game. For the occasion the hero was equipped with a beautiful bow with remarkable arrows and an armor. At the foot of mount Meru he happened to enter the Sukumara forest where the mighty Lord Shiva is enjoying with his wife Uma. Having entered there oh ruler of man, Sudyumna, the pre-eminent hero, saw himself changed into a woman and his horse into a mare [see also 5.17: 15]. All his companions were also changed into the opposite sex and seeing each other like this they got very depressed.'

The honourable king [Parikhit] said: 'How can that realm have this quality? How came this about, oh mighty one? This is what we very much would like to hear you deliberate on.'

Shri Shuka answered: 'Saints fixed in their vows dispelling the darkness in every direction, once came there to see the Lord of the Mountain, Shiva. Ambika [Durga] who sat naked on her husband's lap was most ashamed when she saw them. Quickly she got up and covered her breasts. The saints seeing the two enjoying sexual intercourse desisted from proceeding further and departed immediately for the ashrama of Nara-

Narayana. Because of this the mighty Lord wishing to please his sweetheart said: 'Anyone who enters this place will turn into a woman on the spot!' Ever since males in particular do not enter that forest whereabouts she [Sudyumna] in the company of her associates [now] wandered about from stretch to stretch. When she as a most exciting woman, thus surrounded by other women was loitering near his ashrama, the powerful Budha [the son of the moon and deity of Mercury] wished to enjoy her. She also longed to have him, the beautiful son of king Soma, for her husband and thus she from him gave birth to a son named Pururava. I've heard that Sudyumna who thus as a king born from Manu had achieved the female status, [then] remembered Vasishthha, the preceptor of the family. The merciful sage seeing him in that condition was very aggrieved. He desired the return of his maleness and began to pray to Lord Shankara [Shiva]. 8-3 Shiva being pleased with him, oh servant of the state, in order to keep his promise [to Uma] and to show the sage his love, said: 'This disciple of your line will one month be a female and the next month be a male. Sudyumna may with this arrangement [then] rule the world as he likes.' With this settlement he by the mercy of the acarya acquired the desired maleness and ruled over the entire world, even though the citizens were not quite happy with it. From Sudyumna three sons were born listening to the names of Utkala, Gaya and Vimala, oh King. They became kings over the southern realm and were very religious. Thereafter, when the time was ripe, the master of the kingdom who was so mighty, handed the world over to his son Pururava and left for the forest.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 2:

The Dynasties of Six of the Sons of Manu

Shri Shuka said: 'After Sudyumna, thus had disappeared, Vaivasvata Manu, his father desiring a(n)other son, executed austerities at the Yamuna for a hundred years. After for the purpose of offspring having worshipped the Godhead, Lord Hari, Manu begot ten sons who were like him and of whom the eldest was named Ikshvaku [see also 8.13: 2-3]. Prishadhra was among the sons of Manu by his guru ordered to herd cows. For that purpose he had taken the vow of vrasana ['to stand prepared with a sword'] to protect them at night [see also 4.6: 38]. One night when it was raining, a tiger entered the land of the cowshed. Out of fear all the cows lying down, got up and spread all around the field. - When the strong animal seised one of the cows it began to cry out of distress and fear. Prishadhra hearing the screaming took his sword and hastily followed the sound but because the clouds covered the stars that night, he mistook the cow for the tiger and by mistake cut off its head. The tiger also being hit by the sword had its ear cut off and most afraid fled leaving a blood trail. Prishadhra thinking that he had killed the tiger, to his dismay discovered the next morning that he being a hero, with his sword had killed the cow. The family preceptor [Vasishthha] cursed him for the unintended sinful deed saying: 'Having acted like a Shudra, you cannot belong to the kshatriyas. Because of that unholy deed it is your karma to become a Shudra.' The hero thus being cursed by his guru accepted the words with folded hands and took the vow of celibacy as wanted by the sages. 1-1 Exclusively devoted to Vasudeva, the Supreme Lord and Soul of all, the Transcendence and Purity in person, he was equal and kindhearted towards all living beings. Freed from attachments, peaceful within and self-controlled, he was, free from possessions, of a vision in which he could accept whatever that was available for his physical needs, the way it for the benefit of the soul was arranged by His grace. Always with his mind focussed on the Supreme Self within and thus fully absorbed being satisfied in spiritual realisation, he traveled all over the earth appearing to others as if he were deaf, dumb and blind. After thus being engaged he entered the forest and as a saint achieved the ultimate transcendental goal the moment he out there ran into a forest fire which he allowed to consume himself [see also B.G. 4: 9].

Another son, Kavi [or Vasuman], the youngest one, had no attachments to material pleasures. After giving up his father's kingdom along with his friends, he, still a young man, entered the forest and reached the transcendental world by always keeping the effulgent Supreme Person in his heart.

From the son of Manu Karusha [or Tarusha] there was a dynasty of kshatriyas called the Karushas who as kings of the northern realm were highly religious protectors of the brahminical culture.

From Dhrishtha [or Shrishtha] a caste of kshatriyas originated who in the world having achieved the position of brahmins, were named the Dharshthas. From Nriga there was the succession of first Sumati, Bhutajyoti and thereafter Vasu. From Vasu's son Pratika there was one named Oghavan ['the uninterrupted tradition'] who fathered another son named Oghavan who had a daughter who also carried that name: Oghavati. She married with Sudars'ana.

From Narishyanta there was Citrasena, Riksha was his son and he begot Midhvan. Midhvan's son was Purna and Indrasena was Purna's son. Because of Indrasena there was Vitihotra, from him there was Satyas'rava, Urus'rava was his son and Devadatta was his son. Devadatta's son became the most powerful Agnivesya who was Agni in person. He was a maharishi, a great saint, also known as Kanina and Jatukarnya. From Agnivesya a dynasty of brahmins came forth known as the Agnivesyayanas. Oh King, I have thus described the descendants of Narishyanta, let me now tell you about Dishtha's dynasty.

Dishtha's son was Nabhaga [not to confuse with his uncles Nabhaga or the Nabhaga who was also called Nriga]. He in contrast answered to the vocation of the vaisyas [a merchant, see 7.11: 23]. His son was Bhalandana and from him there was Vatsapriti. His son was named Pramshu and Pramati was his son. Khanitra is known as Pramati's successor. He in his turn was succeeded by Cakshusha and his son was Vivims'ati. Vivims'ati's son was Rambha and his son Khanintra was most religious. From him there was the scion Karandhama oh great King. Avikshit was his son and his son Marutta became emperor. The great mystic Samvarta, the son of Angira, engaged him in performing a yajna. The like of Marutta's sacrifice has never been observed since, because all that he used was made of gold and everything that he had was of the greatest beauty. Indra was delighted to drink the soma-rasa, the brahmins were generously compensated, the demigods [the Maruts] offered foodstuffs and all the gods of the universe were part of the assembly. Dama was Marutta's son and from him there was a son with the power to expand the kingdom: Rajyavardhana. From his son Sudhriti a son was born named Nara. Nara's son was called Kevala and he fathered Dhundhuman. Vegavan was there because of him and Vegavan's son Budha had Trinabindu for his son who was a great king. Alambusha accepted him as her husband. She was an adorable goddess, a girl from heaven and a reservoir of all good qualities who gave birth to a couple of sons and a daughter named Ilavila. Vis'rava, was a saint and master of yoga. He received transcendental knowledge from his father and begot Kuvera in Ilavila: he who brings wealth. Vis'ala, Shunyabandhu en Dhurmaketu were the sons of Trinabindu. Vis'ala built a city named Vais'ali and founded a dynasty. Hemacandra was his son who fathered one called Dhurmaksha. From his son Samyama there were [two sons called] Kris'as'va and Devaja. 5-3 From Kris'as'va there was a son named Somadatta. By worshipping the best one of all, the Lord of all Praises, the Original Person [Vishnu] in an as'vamedha sacrifice, he achieved the supreme destination where all the masters of yoga have their refuge. A son of Somadatta named Sumati thereupon begot a son called Janamejaya. All these kings of Vais'ali sustained the reputation of King Trinabindu.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 3:

The Marriage of Sukanya and Cyavana Muni

Shri Shuka said: 'The son of Manu king Sharyati was a highly developed brahmin who for that reason gave instructions on the functions to be performed on the second day in the arena of sacrifice of the descendants of Angira. He had a lotus-eyed daughter called Sukanya with whom he went to the forest to visit the ashrama of the sage Cyavana. While she in the company of her friends was collecting fruits and flowers from the trees, she saw in an anthill some kind of two shining lights [compare 7.3: 15-16]. As the young girl, ignorantly trying, poked in the light objects with a thorn, there oozed blood from them. The guards being startled stood nailed to the ground so that the king, who saw what had happened, had to address his surprised men. 'Alas, we have done something wrong in approaching the enlightened sage. We have, with this action of one of us, evidently violated his ashrama!'

Sukanya said afraid to her father: 'It was me who, unaware of what I was doing, with a thorn have pierced two shiny things.'

When king Sharyati heard his daughter say this, he was of the greatest concern to appease the sage who happened to reside quietly in the anthill. Understanding what was needed to set things right he, in order to leave, with the greatest trouble handed over his daughter to the muni and then returned home with his permission. Sukanya after having Cyavana for her husband, had understanding for him who remained very grumpy with her. She tried to please him by complying with him attentively. When some time had passed this way the two As'vins [the healers of heaven] reached the ashrama. Offering them his respects the sage said: 'Please give me youthfulness, oh masters! I know you cannot drink any soma, but I will offer you a pot full of soma-rasa when you give me the strength and beauty that is so desirable to young women.'

'So be it' the two great healers said confirming the scholar. 'Just dive into this lake. That will make you perfect.'

The aged man with his gray hair, loose skin and frail body the veins of which one could see, after thus being addressed was by the As'vins helped into the lake. When the three of them reappeared from the lake they were of the greatest beauty a woman could wish for: with lotus garlands, earrings, similar features and nice clothes. After the young beauty saw them, the chaste woman could not tell who of them was her husband for they were all equally beautiful, radiating like the sun and thus she resorted to the As'vins. Pleased with the strength of her faith they pointed out her husband and thereupon, taking leave of the sage, returned to the heavenly worlds in their celestial chariot. King Sharyati wishing to perform a yajna left for Cyavana's ashrama and thereupon saw a man at his daughter's side who radiated like the sun. But the king after she had paid her respect, gave his daughter not his blessings because he was not pleased at all with her: 'What do you think you are doing? Are you now cheating on your husband, the great sage honoured by all the people? Have you, because he's decrepit of age, oh unfaithful one, not deeming him very attractive, given up on him and taken this man, this street beggar, for a lover? Are you out of your mind? In keeping this lover you, as a daughter from the most respectable family, are a disgrace to the entire dynasty. You are shamelessly throwing your father and also your husband into the deepest darkness.'

She laughed and said with a smile to her father who was thus rebuking her: 'Oh father this one here is your son-in-law, the son of Bhrigu!'

She described to her father the entire story how his age had changed and he had acquired his beauty, whereupon he utterly pleased and surprised embraced his daughter. Cyavana Muni with his spiritual power enabled the great man to perform the soma sacrifice and delivered the As'vins the pot full of the soma-rasa they could not drink themselves. Indra full of indignation angrily took up his thunderbolt to kill him immediately, but the man of Bhrigu paralyzed the arm of Indra that held the thunderbolt. With the permission of all [the demigods] there was ever since a full cup of soma-rasa for the As'vins, who as physicians before this had happened were excluded from a share in the soma-yajna.

Uttanabarhi, Anarta and Bhurishena were the three sons begotten by Sharyati. Anarta thereupon fathered Revata. After in the ocean [on an island near the coast] having built a town called Kus'asthali [Dvaraka], he lived materially happy ruling regions like Anarta and others oh subduer of the enemies. A hundred fine sons were born because of him. Kakudmi was the eldest of them. Kakudmi took his daughter Revati to Brahma's abode beyond the modes, to ask the Almighty One for a husband for the girl. Because the original teacher of the universe was engaged in enjoying the music of the Gandharvas he had no time for him at all, but as soon as it was over Kakudmi, after offering his obeisances, could submit his desire to him. The all-powerful Lord had to laugh about what he heard and said to him: 'Alas, oh King, whosoever you had in mind [as a suitable husband for your daughter] has disappeared a long time ago! We do not hear anymore about them nor about their sons, grandsons, descendants or dynasties because [while you were waiting here] a period of three times nine maha-yugas has passed! Go therefore to Lord Baladeva. He constitutes a most powerful aspect of the God of Gods [Lord Vishnu]. Give Him, the Excellence of Man, your excellent daughter, oh King. The Supreme Lord, the Eternal Well-wisher who diminishes the burden of the world, the virtue of hearing and singing in person, has now descended together with this partial aspect of Him [see also 5.25].' The king, after paying the Unborn One his respects, returned with these directions to his residence that was abandoned by [the offspring of] his brothers. Afraid of ghosts they had spread in all directions. After handing his perfectly shaped daughter over to the most powerful one, Lord Baladeva, the king went to Badarikashrama, the place of Nara-Narayana, to perform austerities there.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 4:

Ambarisha Maharaja Offended by Durvasa Muni

Shri Shuka said: 'Nabhaga, the learned youngest son of Nabhaga [see 9.1: 11-12, not the uncle also called Nriga nor the Nabhaga of Dishtha, see 9.2: 23] returning from a celibate life received [as his share of the kingdom, the care for] his father because his elder brothers [already] had divided the property [among themselves].

'Oh, my brothers' [he said] 'What is the share you have reserved for me?'

'We allot you our father as your share.' [they answered].

[He then said to his father:] 'Oh father, my elder brothers have not given me my share!'

[The father thereupon replied:] 'My son, do not take heed of that! The so highly intelligent descendants of Angira [see 6.6: 19] are today performing a sacrifice, but on every sixth day they do this, oh learned one, they will fall in illusion with their fruitive actions. - You better recite for those great souls two Vedic hymns relating to the God of the Universe [Vais'adeva, the Supreme Lord] so that they, after resuming their own course, will hand the wealth over to you that they received from their sacrifice. Therefore go and see them.'

Doing what his father had told him they gave him the proceeds of the yajna before they returned to their heavenly places. As he was collecting his riches, some person with a black countenance who had arrived from the north said to him: 'All these riches remaining from the sacrifice belong to me!'

[He replied:] 'They are all mine, the sages have handed them over to me!'

[The black man said:] 'Let us concerning this matter head for the son of Manu, your father and ask him', and thus he inquired with his father as was proposed.

[Father Nabhaga said:] 'Everything that remains from the sacrifice is by the sages considered a share for Lord Shiva, so they have once decided [during the sacrifice of Daksha]. He is the demigod who deserves it all.'

Nabhaga offered him [Shiva] his obeisances and said: 'As my father said: everything from the sacrificial arena belongs to you, oh Lord [see 3.12: 6-14]. Oh saintly one, let me bow my head for you, I beg your pardon.'

[Lord Shiva said:] 'All that your father said is true and also is what you are saying the truth. Let me, the knower of the mantras, grant you the spiritual knowledge that is transcendental and eternal. Please take all the riches. I give you all that has been offered to me', and having spoken thus Rudra, the great lord and guardian of the dharma vanished. Anyone who in the morning and in the evening with great attention remembers this becomes a scholar: he will become a knower of the mantras and the supreme destination and thus be a self-realised soul. From Nabhaga the most exalted and highly celebrated devotee Ambarisha was born. A curse of a brahmin against him failed: it could never touch him.'

The king said: 'Oh lordship, I would like to hear about him, that king who was so intelligent that the most insurmountable power of a brahmin's measure could not affect him.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Ambarisha, the man of great fortune, after achieving an unlimited opulence on this earth consisting of the seven continents, meant that all that is so rarely obtained by many a ruler is as the riches one imagines in a dream: coming to one's senses it is all gone. It is the reason because of which a man falls in ignorance. Unto Vasudeva, the Supreme Personality, unto the devotees as also unto the saints he had achieved the reverence and devotion in the transcendence of which one takes this entire universe for something as insignificant as a piece of stone. 8-2 He was sure to fix his mind upon the lotus feet of Krishna, to use his words to describe the qualities of [the Lord of] Vaikunthha, to use his hands for matters as cleaning the Lord's temple and to engage his ears in listening to the transcendental talks about the Infallible One. He used his eyes to look at the deities, the temples and buildings of Mukunda, he used his body to be in touch with the bodies of the devotees, he used his nose to smell the fragrance of the tulsi leaves on the lotus flower formed by His feet and used his tongue to relish the food that is offered to Him. By using his legs to walk to the Lord's holy places, by using his head to bow down to the feet of Hrishikes'a and by engaging his senses more in being a servant of Him than a servant of his lusty desires, he was alike the ones who seek their refuge in being attached to the Lord Glorified in the Scriptures [like Prahlada e.g.]. Thus in his prescribed duties always being of sacrifice unto the Transcendence, the Original Enjoyer of the Sacrifice, the Supreme Lord Beyond the Senses, he exercised all the different forms of devotional service and ruled, under the guidance of His faithful scholars, this planet earth [see also 5.18: 12 and B.G. 5: 29]. With horse sacrifices executed by brahmins like Vasisththa, Asita and Gautama, he worshipped, in all places where the Sarasvati river flowed through the desert countries, the Lord of Sacrifice, the Supreme Controller, with great opulence and all the prescribed paraphernalia and remuneration. During the sacrificial ceremonies before the deities, the finely dressed members of the assembly, the priests and the other functionaries could be recognised as the ever vigilant demigods. A heavenly existence as cherished by the demigods, was not a thing desired by his citizens who were accustomed to hearing and chanting the glories of Uttamas'loka, the Lord hailed in the Verses. Persons accustomed to having Mukunda in their hearts rarely desire the perfections of the great ones because such aspirations go at the cost of the happiness of being in one's constitutional position of rendering service [see siddhis]. 6-2 He, the king who in bhakti-yoga being engaged in austerities, in his constitutional activities unto the Lord satisfied all sorts of desires, thus step by step gave it up to fix his mind upon temporal matters as having a home, a wife, children, friends and relatives, a good elephant, a nice chariot and fine horses and durable goods like having jewels, ornaments, a nice outfit and such and a never empty treasury. Pleased with his unalloyed devotional service the Lord gave him His cakra [disc weapon] that protects the devotees but is so fearful to the ones opposing Him [see also 7.9: 43 and B.G. 9: 31]. Aspiring to worship Krishna together with his equally qualified queen, the king observed the vow of dvadas'i [fasting on certain lunar days] for a whole year. At the end of that vow he in the month Kartika [Oct. - Nov.] for three nights observed a complete fast [with one meal during the day] whereupon he, after taking a bath in the Yamuna, worshipped Lord Krishna in Madhuvana [a part of the Vrindavana area].

He with all paraphernalia for doing puja, according to the rules bathed the deity and dressed it with nice clothing and ornaments, fragrant flower garlands and other means of service in his [mahabhisheka] worship of the greatly fortunate Lord Kes'ava and the brahmins that he performed with a mind filled with divine love and devotion. 3-3 After having donated to the brahmin sages, the scholars who had arrived at his place, sixty crores of nicely decorated, young and beautiful cows equipped with gold covered horns and silver plated hooves, full udders and with calves at their side, he firstly sumptuously fed them with the most heavenly, delicious food. When he to the full of their satisfaction and with their permission next ended his own fasting and was about to observe the concluding ceremony, they all of a sudden were confronted with an unexpected visit from the mighty sage Durvasa. Despite having appeared there uninvited, the king showed his respect by standing up and offering him a seat. Thereupon he asked him, with all regards having fallen at his feet, whether he would like to eat something. He gladly accepted that request and went, in order to perform the necessary rituals, to the Yamuna to dip into the auspicious water and meditate on the Supreme Brahman. That, with half a muhūrta [24 minutes] left before the end of the dvadas'i fast that was observed, made the king together with the brahmins wonder what would be the appropriate notion of dharma for the precarious situation he had run into: 9-4 'Both failing to respect the brahmin sage and not to break with the fast of dvadas'i at the right time is an offense. What now is the best thing to do? What would be irreligious and what not? So let me touch water only so that I correctly may conclude the vow, because, oh scholars, the act of drinking water is considered to be indeed both eating and not eating.'

The great king thus drank water and awaited, with his mind turned to the Infalible One, the return of the brahmin mystic, oh best of the Kurus. After Durvasa had finished the rituals at the bank of the Yamuna and returned, he was well received by the king, but he discovered by his insight what had taken place. Trembling with anger he with a tightened face frowning and also hungry, addressed the perpetrator who stood there with folded hands. 'Alas, this one here, this 'love of the people', has in his madness about his opulence, for everyone to see, violated the dharma! Not being a devotee of Vishnu at all, he thinks that he is the Lord Himself! I, unexpectedly arriving here, was invited by this man to be his guest, but now he has taken food without sharing it with me. I'll show you directly what the consequence is!'

Speaking thus he, red with anger, pulled a bunch of hair out of his head and created a demon for him resembling the fire at the end of time. As the demon came towards him with a trident blazing with fire in his hand and a footstep that made the earth tremble, the king, seeing him clearly, did not move an inch from the spot [compare 6.17: 28]. As it was arranged by the Original Person of the Supersoul for the protection of His devotees, the cakra [that Ambarisha had received, see verse 28] burned like a fire that angry serpent of a created demon to ashes [see also B.G. 18: 66]. Seeing that his attempt had failed and that the disc was coming after him, Durvasa started to run in great fear wherever he could go in order to save his life. When the muni saw the disc, that chariot wheel of the Lord, closely behind his back, he like a snake pursued by the flames of a highly blazing forest fire, quickly ran to mount Meru to enter a cave there. But in whatever direction Durvasa fled - of the sky, the earth's surface, in caves, in seas or to all the worlds up to heaven -, he saw the unbearable Sudars'ana cakra ['His immediate fearful presence']. Without the shelter of a protector he was everywhere with a constant fear in his heart, looking for someone who could offer him protection. At last he approached Lord Brahma [and prayed]: 'Oh my Lord, oh Selfborn One, save me from the invincible fire that was released at me.'

Lord Brahma said: 'At the end of my lifetime [a dviparardha, see 3.11: 33] when His pastimes have ended, the Lord of the End Time [Vishnu], the Self of Time, with a single movement of His eyebrows will destroy this universe including my heavenly abode. I, Lord Shiva, Daksha, Bhṛigu and the other sages, as also the rulers of man, the rulers of the living beings and the rulers of the demigods, all carry out His orders and together bow, for the salvation of all living beings, our heads in surrender to the principle regulating our lives.'

Durvasa who, scorched by Vishnu's cakra, was turned down by Lord Brahma, went for his shelter to him who always resides on Kailasa [Lord Shiva]. Shri Shankara [Shiva] said: 'My dear one, we have no power over the Supreme One, the Transcendence in Person with whom I, the other living beings and even Lord Brahma wander around within the countless universes that together with us at times arise and are destroyed again. 7-5 I, Sanat and the other Kumaras, Narada, the great Unborn Lord, Kapila, Vyasadeva, Devala [the great sage], Yamaraja, Asuri [the saint], Marici and other masters of perfect knowledge headed by him, have learned to know the limits of all there is to know, but none of us can fully comprehend His illusory energy [of maya] and that what is covered by it. The weapon of the Controller of the Universe [the cakra] is even for us difficult to handle and you should therefore seek your refuge with the Lord who will certainly bestow upon you His happiness and fortune.'

Durvasa thereafter went disappointed to the abode of the Supreme Lord known as Vaikunthha where He as Shrinivasa, the Master of the Abode, lives together with the goddess of fortune. Scorched by the fire of the invincible weapon he fell down at His lotus feet trembling all over and said: 'Oh Infalible and Unlimited One, oh Desire of the Sainly Ones, oh Master, offer me, this great offender, protection, oh Well-wisher of the Entire Universe! Not knowing about Your inconceivable prowess I have committed a great offense at the feet of someone dear to Your Lordship. Please be so kind to do whatever is needed to counteract an offense like this oh Vidhata, Lord of Regulation, by the pronunciation of whose name a person can even be delivered from hell.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'Precisely, oh brahmin, I am not self-willed, I am fully committed to My bhaktas. My heart is controlled by devotees free from material desires. Even a devotee of My devotee is dear to Me. I, their ultimate destination, take without My saintly devotees no interest in the blissful essence or the elevation of My opulences [see om purnam]. How could I give up on those who taking shelter with Me gave up their wife, house, children, relatives, their lives, wealth and promotion to a superior position? The way a chaste woman is of service to a gentle husband, I act as a servant to pure and equal minded pious souls [see also 7.9: 43] who in their hearts firmly being attached to Me engage in devotional service. Devoted to Me they do not hanker for the completeness [the purnam] of the four types of liberation they automatically achieve by simply being of service. Why would they care about other matters that are all lost over time? Pure devotees are always in My heart and I am always in their hearts. They know nothing outside of Me and I do not have the least interest outside of them [see also B.G. 9: 29]. Let Me now tell you how you can protect yourself in this matter. Oh scholar, listen attentively to what I have to tell you. With this action of yours you have violated yourself. Waste no time any longer and go forthwith to him [Ambarisha] because of whom all this took place. As you can see, the power applied against a devotee turns against the one doing so. Penance and knowledge bring the learned ones the greatest welfare, but practiced by an obstinate person they result in the opposite. Oh brahmin, I wish you all the happiness of the world, go therefore to the king, the son of Nabhaga, to satisfy that great personality. Then there will be peace.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 5:

Durvasa Saved: the Cakra-prayers of Ambarisha

Shri Shuka said: 'Durvasa [the difficulty of residing] who being harassed by the cakra thus was instructed by the Lord, approached Ambarisha and clasped sorrowfully his lotus feet. Seeing him thus engaged in touching his feet Ambarisha felt ashamed and therefore offered, most embarrassed as he was in his mercy, prayers to the [disc] weapon of the Lord [see also 6.8: 23]. Ambarisha said: 'You are the fire, the supreme power of the sun and the moon. You are the master of all the luminaries, the waters, the earth, the sky, the air and the senses and their objects. Oh direct presence and auspicious vision [or Sudars'ana], you with your thousands of spokes I offer my obeisances, oh love of the Infalible One. You are the defeat of all weapons, please be favorable unto this brahmin, oh ruler of the world. You are the dharma, the original nature and the religion, you are the reality and the truth, you are the sacrifice and the enjoyer of the sacrifice who maintains the worlds. You are the soul of all and the prowess of the Transcendental Supreme Personality. All my respects for you, the auspicious centre of spin, the measure for the complete of nature who are like a fire of destruction to the unenlightened ones who lack in pious conduct. You, the keeper of the three worlds with a wonderful effulgence, are of a supreme goodness and act as fast as the mind I try to voice. By your strength which carries all religiousness, the darkness is dissipated and all directions are illumined. Your glories are unsurpassable for the great personalities, oh master of speech, your manifestation comprises all things manifest and unmanifest, superior and lower. When you are sent to the fighters of the Daityas and Danavas by the Transcendental Personality, oh indefatigable one, you, staying on the battlefield, never tire to sever their arms and bellies, necks, thighs and legs. You, oh protector of the universe, are engaged by the all-powerful Wielder of the Mace [Lord Vishnu] to defeat the wicked ones. Please be so good and have mercy with this scholar and therewith also have mercy with us and our dynasty! If there is charity, if the worship of the deity and the duties are properly performed and if our dynasty is blessed by the scholars, may this brahmin then be free from having to burn [with you]? When the one Supreme Lord, the reservoir of all qualities is satisfied about us, may then from His love as the true self of all living beings, this twice-born soul be spared from the fire?'

Shri Shuka said: 'When the disc weapon of the Lord named Sudars'ana thus was being prayed to by the king, it because of his petitioning stopped to harass the scholar from all sides. Durvasa, being freed from the heat of the fire of the weapon, most contented then praised the king, that ruler of the earth, with the best wishes. Durvasa said: 'What a greatness I may witness today of the servants of the Eternal One. Despite the wrong I perpetrated, you, oh King, have prayed for my welfare! What indeed would be too difficult or impossible to forsake, for those saintly, great souls, who managed to achieve the leader Hari, the Supreme Lord of the Devotees? By simply hearing the holy name of Him whose lotus feet are the holy places [the temples etc.], a person becomes purified. What else would there remain for devotees to engage in? Oh King, by what you did in response to my offenses you, by being so very kind, have favored me very much and thus saved my life!'

The King had been fasting when Durvasa returned and, wishing to please him, approached his feet and fed him sumptuously. After having eaten from the different foodstuffs that, catering to every taste, were offered with the greatest care, he thus fully being satisfied said to the king: 'Please join and eat with me' and thus proved his respect. [He continued:] 'I'm very happy with your mercy. Seeing you, a pure devotee with his intelligence fixed upon the Lord and touching your feet, talking to you and enjoying your hospitality, I am much obliged. The purity of the things you've done will for ever be sung by the women of heaven; the world will never tire to sing the glory of your supreme virtue!'

Shri Shuka continued: 'Durvasa thus glorifying the king took, being satisfied in all respects, permission to leave that place. Ascending to heaven he reached the abode of Brahma where ulterior motives have no place. With the great muni not returning a whole year passed in which the king wishing to see him again, had restricted himself to drinking water only. Upon Durvasa's return Ambarisha offered him the best food that was available and would befit a brahmin. Upon seeing how the sage had been released from the sin, he understood that he also owed his strength to his devotion to the Supreme One [see also B.G. 6: 47]. Thus being blessed with all good qualities the king was of devotion to the Supersoul, the Supreme Spirit and to Vasudeva with the many duties he observed, actions from which [one realises that] the higher you climb the deeper you fall [compare 6.17: 28].'

Shri Shuka said: 'Ambarisha, as the wisest one, divided his kingdom among his equally qualified sons, entered the forest to fix his mind upon the True Self of Vasudeva and thus vanquished the waves [the gunas] of the ocean of matter. Either by praising and reading this pious story or by regularly meditating on it one becomes a devotee of the Supreme Personality of Godhead. By the mercy of Lord Vishnu everyone who hears about the character of this great soul Ambarisha will find liberation through his devotion.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 6:

The Downfall of Saubhari Muni

Shri Shuka said: 'The three sons of Ambarisha [see previous chapters] were Virupa, Ketuman and Shambhu. From Virupa there was Prishadas'va and from him there was a son called Rathitara. Rathitara had no sons and therefore [sage] Angira was requested to beget children with his [Rathitara's] wife. That led to the birth of [kshetra jata'-] sons with brahminical qualities. Being born from his wife these sons belonged to his family. They were remembered as the dynasty of Angira and were among the sons of Rathitara most prominent because they, being born under that circumstance, were considered double-born [brahmins of mixed caste]. When Manu once sneezed the son Ikshvaku was born from his nose [see also 8.13]. Vikukshi, Nimi and Dandaka were the most prominent among the hundred sons whom he begot. Twenty-five of them became kings in Aryavarta in the east [in the Himalaya and Vindhya mountains], oh King, as also [did twenty-five of them] in the west [of that region]. Three of them ruled in the middle region, while the rest of the sons ruled over other places. He, king Ikshvaku, once during ashtaka-s'raddha [offerings to the forefathers made in January, February and March] ordered his son: 'Oh Vikukshi, bring me pure flesh [as acquired by hunting]. Go for it right now without delay.'

Thus he went to the forest to kill animals suitable for the oblations, but when he was fatigued and hungry the hero forgetfully [about the fact that the flesh was meant for the sacrifices] ate a rabbit [*]. He offered what had remained to his father who in his turn asked their guru [Vasishthha] to purify it. He replied: 'All this is polluted and unfit for use.'

Thus being informed by the spiritual master the ruler understood what his son had done. Out of anger that he had violated the vidhi he consequently sent him out of the country. The king had a conversation with the scholar. In accordance with what he told him thereupon, living as a yogi, gave up his vehicle of time [his body] and thus achieved the supreme position. After the withdrawal of his father, Vikukshi returned to rule over this planet earth. He worshipped the Lord with different yajnas and became celebrated as Sas'ada [the rabbit-eater]. Puranjaya [the conqueror of the residence] was his son. He was also known as Indravaha [carried by Indra] and Kakutstha [sitting on the hump of a bull]. Hear now about what he has done to receive these names. There had been a devastating war, a fight between the gods and the demons, in which his supreme assistance as a hero was accepted by the godly ones who had been defeated by the Daityas. By the order of the God of Gods Lord Vishnu, the Supersoul and Master of the Entire Creation, Indra in the form of a great bull became engaged in his [Puranjaya's] service as his carrier. 5-1 He well-equipped with a first-class bow taking up the sharpest arrows, was praised [by the demigods], mounted it and sat on the hump prepared to fight. Favored by the power of Vishnu, the Original Person and Supersoul, he surrounded by the servants of heaven, then laid siege to the Daitya residence on the western side. A battle took place between him and the demons that was so aggressive that it made one's hair stand on end. All the Daityas who approached him in the fight he sent to Yamaraja with his arrows. Confronted with his shower of arrows that was as fierce as the fire at the end of time, the Daityas who were slaughtered and dispersed fled away to return to their places. Conquering over them he, the saintly king, turned all their wealth and wives over to the carrier of the thunderbolt [Indra]. That gave him his names.

From Puranjaya there was a son called Anena, his son was Prithu and the son that he begot was Vis'vagandhi who in his turn had a son called Candra whose son was called Yuvanas'va. Shrivasta was his son and he built a town called Shrivasti. By Shrivasta next Brihadasa'va was begotten and from him there was Kunalayas'va. He was of a great power. Together with the twenty-one thousand sons that surrounded him, he for the satisfaction of sage Utanka killed a demon named Dhundhu. 3-2 He was thus known as Dhundhumara [the killer of Dhundhu]. All but three of his sons had been burned by the fire from the mouth of Dhundhu. The only ones that remained alive were Dridhas'va, Kapilas'va and Bhadras'va, oh son of Bharata. Dridhas'va's son was Haryas'va and the renown Nikumbha was his son. Nikumbha's son was Bahulas'va and his son was Kris'as'va. Senajit succeeded him and from him Yuvanas'va was born. Yuvanas'va had no sons and retired [together with his wives] to the forest. Living together with his hundred wives he was depressed so that the sages, very merciful with him, with the greatest care began a [fertility] ceremony known as Indra-yajna. One night he being very thirsty entered the sacrificial arena. Seeing all the brahmins fast asleep, he drank from the sanctified water himself [instead of keeping it for his women]. After they [in the morning] all woke up and next found the water pot empty, oh prabhu, they inquired who was responsible for drinking the water that was meant for giving birth to a child. Understanding that it by providence was drunk by the king, they all prayed to the Supreme Lord saying: 'Alas, the power of God is what rules!' And so, lo and behold, after due course of time, the lower abdomen of king Yuvanas'va opened itself at the right side from which a son was born [with all the qualities characterizing] a good king. Who now would supply the child with milk? It was crying that much thirsting for it that king Indra said: 'Do not cry my child, just drink from me' and thereupon gave it his index-finger to suck. It was the mercy of the divine scholars that the father did not die because of the baby he gave birth to. Yuvanas'va later on achieved the perfection of life by doing tapas in that same place. 3-3 Dear King, Indra gave the child the name Trasaddasyu [the fear of the rogues]. Crooks like Ravana and such, were afraid of him. Yuvanas'va's son Mandhata by the power of the Infallible One thus could rule the surface of the earth with its seven continents as the one and only master. 5-3 He also in full awareness of the [Super]soul worshipped Yajna, the Lord of Sacrifices, the God and Supersoul of everyone elevated above the sensual plane. This happened in sacrificial ceremonies that were attended by all the godly people whom he rewarded with large donations. The ingredients, the mantras and the regulative principles, the worship and the worshiper as also the priests in their dharma of proceeding according to the time and place, all together contributed to assure that the interest of the true self was done justice. For all the places mentioned that stretch from where the sun rises above the horizon to everywhere it sets, one speaks about the field of action of Yuvanas'va's son, Mandhata.

The ruler [Mandhata] begot in the daughter Bindumati of a king called Shas'abindu [the sons] Purukutsa, Ambarisha and Mukundaka who was a great yogi. Their fifty sisters accepted sage Saubhari as their husband. 9-4 He [Saubhari] performing an uncommon austerity in being submerged in the depth of the Yamuna river, saw in his penance how a big fish was enjoying sexual matters. Thus being sexually awakened the scholar begged the king [Mandhata] for a single daughter. The king said: 'You may marry a daughter of mine oh brahmin, if that is what she chooses.'

He thought to himself: 'Women do not like me, I'm too old, I'm not attractive to them. I am wrinkled, have gray hair and a head tremor. I'll be rejected! Let me make it so that my body is desirable to the women of heaven, not to mention the daughters of the worldly kings!' Thus was the resolve of the mystic. The sage being announced by an envoy was admitted into the quarters of the princesses that were opulent in every respect. There he was accepted by all the fifty princesses as their single husband. A great quarrel rose among them when they, being attracted to him, gave up their friendship by saying things like: 'This man is the right person for me, not for you.' 5-4 He, as a result of his austerity knowing many a mantra, enjoyed with his wives an unlimited opulence with everything that one could wish for: all kinds of finely furnished houses and quarters, parks, the clearest water in ponds amidst fragrant gardens, costly bedding and furniture, clothing and ornaments. There were bathing places, palatable dishes, there was sandalwood paste and a dress up with garlands and decorations of all men and women who in constant glee were accompanied by the song of birds, bumblebees and professional singers. The ruler over the seven continents [Mandhata] was struck with wonder when he saw Saubhari's family life because of which he no longer could pride himself on being the emperor of the world blessed with all opulence. Saubhari though, who was always engaged in the happiness and diversity of the material affairs of his household, could not find satisfaction in his enjoyment, just like a fire cannot that is fueled with fat. One day sitting down and wondering how his straying away from the true self could have taken place, the expert in many mantras saw that it had been caused by a couple of copulating fish: 'Alas, see how I, who was such a great ascetic, fell down. I, so observant and strict to the vow, was distracted from the spiritual life that I practiced for so long. Just because of the thing aquatic do under water! He who seeks liberation must give it up to associate with those who are loose in their sexual morals. He should in every respect avoid it to give free reign to his external senses. He should live alone in a secluded place and fix his mind on the lotus feet of the Unlimited Lord. And if he seeks [intimate] association, he should associate with like-minded souls of detachment. As a renunciate I was all alone under water associating with fish (!) and acquired fifty wives, not mentioning the five thousand [grand]children I begot. I see no end to all my duties here and in the hereafter that are occupying my mind, for I, under the influence of the modes of matter being motivated for my own interest, lost my intelligence in the material enjoyment.'

Thus [regretfully] living at home he in due course of time became detached and situated in the renounced order of life. He went to the forest and was followed by all his wives, for he was their object of worship. In his penance there being of the severest austerity conducive to self-realisation, he conversant now with the fires of the personal self, engaged himself with the Supreme Self. Oh Maharaja, the wives who saw their husband progressing spiritually, managed under that influence to follow him, just like the flames do with a fire that extinguishes [compare B.G. 9: 32].

*: To this there is a quote from the Brahma-vaivarta Purana so said Shri Caitanya Mahaprabhu:
as'vamedham gavambham
sannyasam pala-patirikam devarena sutopatim
kalau panca vivarjayet

"In this age of Kali, five acts are forbidden: the offering of a horse in sacrifice, the offering of a cow in sacrifice, the acceptance of the order of sannyasa, the offering of oblations of flesh to the forefathers, and a man's begetting children in his brother's wife."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 7:

The Descendants of King Mandhata

Shri Shuka said: 'The most prominent son of Mandhata named Ambarisha [after the Ambarisha of Nabhaga, see 9.4: 13], was arrested by his grandfather Yuvanas'va as his son and he had a son called Yauvanas'va who in his turn had a son named Harita. These [three descendants, Ambarisha, Yauvanas'va and Harita.] became the most prominent members of the Mandhata dynasty. Purukutsa [another son of Mandhata] was taken to the lower regions by his wife Narmada upon the order of the king of the serpents [Vasuki]. She had been given to him in marriage by her serpent brothers. He, empowered by Lord Vishnu, killed the Gandharvas there who deserved it to be punished [because of their enmity]. From the serpents he [therefore] received the benediction that they who remember this incident are protected against snakes.

The son of Purukutsa named Trasaddasyu [named after the other one 9.6: 32-34] was the father of Anaranya. His son carried the name Haryas'va [after 9.6: 23-24]. From him there was Praruna and Praruna's son was Tribandhana. - From Tribandhana there was a son named Satyavrata [after the Manu, see 8.24: 10], who, being cursed by his father [for kidnapping a brahmin daughter at her marriage], had acquired the status of an outcaste [candala] and thus was called Tris'anka [afraid of the heavens']. By the prowess of Kaus'ika [sage Vis'vamitra] he went to heaven [still present in his body] where he, having fallen down because of the demigods, [half way during his fall] by the sage's supreme power acquired a fixed position. In that position he today still can be seen hanging down with his head from the sky [in the form of a constellation]. Tris'anku's son was Haris'candra because of whom there existed a great quarrel between Vis'vamitra and Vasishthha in which the two for many years were [like two] birds [*]. He was very morose because he had no successor. On the advise of Narada he took shelter of Varuna whom he asked: 'Oh lord, may there be a son from my loins?'

Oh Maharaja, then he said: 'And if he turns out to be a hero, I will sacrifice him to you, if you desire'. Varuna accepted that offer and a son was born who was named Rohita [to the blood].

Varuna thus said to him: 'A son has been born. Will you offer him as a sacrifice to me?' Haris'candra then replied: 'An animal is sacrificed when ten days have passed [since its birth]. Then it is considered fit for being sacrificed.'

Ten days later he returned and said: 'Be now of sacrifice then!' Haris'candra said: 'When the teeth of an animal have appeared, it will be fit for being sacrificed.'

When the teeth had grown Varuna said: 'Sacrifice now!', whereupon Haris'candra replied: 'When he loses his [milk] teeth, then he will be fit.'

'The teeth of the animal have fallen out.' Varuna said, 'be of sacrifice now!' The reply was: 'Only when the teeth of the sacrificial animal have grown back it is pure!'

After they had grown back Varuna said: 'You offer now!' Haris'candra then said: 'When he can defend himself as a warrior with a shield, oh King, then this sacrificial animal will be pure.'

With his mind thus controlled by the affection for his son, he cheated the god with words about the time [that it would take] and made him wait. Rohita aware of what his father intended to do, trying to save his life, took his bow and arrows and left for the forest. When he heard that his father because of Varuna was plagued with dropsy and had grown a large belly, Rohita wanted to return to the capital, but Indra denied him to go there. Indra ordered him to travel around the world to visit holy places and sites of pilgrimage. Thereupon he lived in the forest for one year. Again and again for a second, a third, a fourth and a fifth year Indra in the form of an old brahmin appeared before him and told him the same. The sixth year that Rohita wandered in the forest, he went to the capital where he bought Ajigarta's second son Shunah's'epha to serve as the 'animal of sacrifice'. He offered him to his father while bringing his obeisances. After the [worldly life of the] man in the yajna [] was sacrificed to Varuna and the other demigods, Haris'candra was freed from the dropsy and became famous as one of the great persons of history. Vis'vamitra was during the sacrifice offering the oblations [the Hota], the self-realised Jamadagni led the recitations of the [Yajur Veda] mantras [as the Adhvaryu], Vasishthha was the leading brahmin [the Brahma] and Ayasya recited the [Sama Veda] hymns [as the udgata]. Indra was very pleased and gave him a golden chariot. I will give an account of the glories of Shunah's'epha when I describe the sons of Vis'vamitra.

It pleased Vis'vamitra very much to see truthfulness, solidity and forbearance in the ruler [Haris'candra] and his wife and therefore he gave them the imperishable knowledge. 5-2 [The ruler] subdued his ignorance through a specific process of meditation in which he gave up his material ambition. He merged his mind with the earth, the earth with the water, the water with the fire, the fire with the air and the air with the sky. Next he merged the sky with the cause of manifestation and this false ego [this ahankara] he merged with the totality of matter. Finally he merged that completeness [of the mahatattva] with the spiritual knowledge in all its branches. Thus completely freed from being bound materially he, through loving self-realisation and liberating transcendental bliss, remained with the Imperceptible and Inconceivable One.'

*: Prabhupada comments: 'Vis'vamitra and Vasishthha were always inimical. Formerly, Vis'vamitra was a kshatriya, and by undergoing severe austerities he wanted to become a brahmana, but Vasishthha would not agree to accept him. In this way there was always disagreement between the two. Later, however, Vasishthha accepted him because of Vis'vamitra's quality of forgiveness. Once Haris'candra performed a yajna to which Vis'vamitra was the priest, but Vis'vamitra, being angry with Haris'candra, took away all his possessions, claiming them as a contribution of dakshina. Vasishthha however, did not like this, and therefore a fight arose between Vasishthha and Vis'vamitra. The fighting became so severe that each of them cursed the other. One of them said, "May you become a bird," and the other said, "May you become a duck." Thus both of them became birds and continued fighting for many years because of Haris'candra.'

 : Sacrificing a human being has to be considered here as something nonviolent since the vidhi preaches compassion and non-violence with all living creatures (daya or ahimsa). The Bhagavatam certainly condemns the sacrifice of human lives by the story of Jada Bharata [see 5.9: 17]. The context here suggests, and from the later verse about this 9.16: 31-32 it appears to be so, that because Haris'candra had been the cause of a fight between the sages Vis'vamitra and Vasishthha, the sacrifice of a human being meant that some man had to give up his worldly existence to serve the sages in their reconciliation. The heir to the throne, the most likely candidate for the job, could not give up his worldly responsibility and thus another man was chartered to take that duty upon him.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 8:

The Sons of Sagara Meet Lord Kapiladeva

Shri Shuka said: 'Harita was the son of King Rohita [see previous chapter] and his son Campa built a city called Campapuri. After him there was Sudeva who also had a son called Vijaya. Bharuka was the son of Vijaya, he had one called Vrika and Vrika had Bahuka of whom all the land he owned was taken by his enemies so that the king had to enter the forest with his wife. When he died of old age his queen wanted to die with him but sage Aurva, understanding that she was pregnant with a son in her womb, forbade it. The co-wives who knew this gave her poison with her food, but with that poison Sagara [with poison] was born who became an emperor of great repute. His sons were responsible for [leading the Ganges to the] ocean [that was therefore called Sagara]. - He did not kill the antisocial elements [Talajanghas, or tree-people], nor the ones opposing [the Yavanas, also: invaders like the Muslims and the Europeans], the goddess ones [the Shakas], the ruffians [Haihayas] and the barbarians [Barbaras]. He instead, following the orders of the guru, allowed them to appear in odd dresses, shaved clean and wearing mustaches. Some [he accepted as appearing] with loose hair, being half shaven, without any underwear or not being clad at all. Following the words of Aurva he, being of yoga with the Supersoul, worshipped the Lord, the Original Self and Controller of all Vedic knowledge and all enlightened souls, with horse sacrifices. One day he discovered that the horse that was used for the sacrifice had been stolen by Purandara [Indra, see also 4.19: 17]. The proud sons born from Sumati [a wife of Sagara] then, to the instruction of their father, all together searched throughout the entire country for the horse. -1 In the northeastern direction they saw the horse near the ashrama of Kapila. They said: 'Now we know where that horse thief lives with his eyes closed. Kill him, kill him that sinner!' The sixty thousand men of Sagara thus raised their weapons and approached him. That very moment the muni opened his eyes. With their minds stolen [by Indra] and in offense with such a great personality [as Kapila, see also 3.25-33], their bodies self-ignited instantly and turned to ashes. It is not the viewpoint of the sages to say that the sons of the emperor burned to ashes on the spot because of the anger of the muni, for how could in the self of him [Him] who always resides in goodness and by whose grace the entire universe is purified, the mode of ignorance manifest itself so that anger could rise? How can earthly dust pollute the ether? How can with him who so thoroughly explained the world in analytical terms [see 3.25-33] and who is present in this world as a boat for the seeker to cross over the ocean of nescience that is so hard to overcome in one's mortal existence, there be a sense of distinction between friend and foe with such a learned person elevated in transcendence [for such a one is always jubilant: prasannatma]?

He who was born from Kes'ini [another wife of Sagara] was called Asamanjasa. This prince fathered a son known as Amshuman who always served his grandfather to the best of his ability. 5-1 In a former life Asamanjasa had been a yogi, so he could remember, who had fallen from the path of yoga because of bad association. In this life [not tolerating any association] he therefore personally proved himself in a most disturbing way. Once sporting with his relatives he acting most offensively had thrown all the boys into the river the Sarayu. He thus caused his family a lot of grief. Because of these deeds he was banned by his father who gave up his affection for him. By the power of his yoga he then showed the boys [to their parents] and went away. Oh King, all the inhabitants of Ayodhya were astounded to see their sons having returned again. The king was therefore truly sorry [that his son was gone].

The king ordered Amshuman [Asamanjasa's son] to search for the horse [that was stolen by Indra]. He went after it and followed the path his uncles purportedly had taken. Thus he found the horse near a pile of ashes. When the great yogi saw the Transcendental Lord, [the Vishnu avatara] known as Kapila, sitting there he, prostrating himself, offered attentively prayers with folded hands.

Amshuman said: 'No one among us, living beings, is able to envision You as the Transcendental Person. Up to the present day not even Lord Brahma is able to fathom You. And by whatever meditation or guesswork would others be able to do so, we creatures of the material world who, mistaking the body for the [real] self, are groping in the dark [see also B.G. 7: 27]? The consciousness of those people who under the influence of the three modes [the gunas, see also B.G. 14: 5] revere the body, is obscured by the deluding material energy. They see, also when they sleep, nothing but those modes. Those who only have eyes for the external world cannot know You who reside within the body. How can I, this fool of matter, keep You in mind who are full of spiritual knowledge, You who are heeded by Sanandana and other sages free from the contaminating and bewildering illusion of the material diversity that is caused by the gunas [see B.G. 14: 26 & 2: 45]? Oh Peaceful One, I offer You, the Original Person, my obeisances, You who, free from a specific name and form, are transcendental to both the manifest and non-manifest material energies but, in order to distribute the transcendental knowledge, have assumed a material body that is characterised by fruitive actions in relation to the modes of nature. Those whose minds are bewildered by lust, greed, envy and illusion wander around in this world and take their hearth and home, these products of Your material energy, for real. Oh Supreme Lord, by simply seeing You this hard and tight knot of our illusion today has been broken, this bewildered state because of which one in one's sensuality, oh Soul of all living beings, is ruled by lust and selfishness.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Oh master of man, the great sage and Supreme Lord Kapila this way having been glorified, with a mind filled with mercy told Amshuman the following. The Supreme Lord said: 'Take this horse, My son, it is the sacrificial animal of your grandfather, but for your forefathers who burned to ashes, there is no other way to be saved but by Ganges water.' After having circumambulated Him and having bowed down to His satisfaction, he brought the horse back to Sagara whereupon with that animal the ceremony was completed. After delivering his kingdom to Amshuman he [Sagara] being freed from his material bonds, attained the supreme destination by following the path delineated by Aurva.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 9:

The Dynasty of Amshuman

Shri Shuka said: 'Amshuman for a long time doing penance with a desire to bring down the Ganges, was unsuccessful and died in due course of time. His son Dilipa did just like his father not succeed and was also defeated by time. Thereafter Dilipa's son Bhagiratha performed severe austerities. The goddess [mother Ganga] appeared to him and said: 'I am very pleased with you and will answer your prayers.' With that being said seeing his purpose served [that the Ganges would wash away the ashes, see 9:8: 28] the king bowed down.

[Mother Ganga proceeded:] 'Who can sustain the force of my waves when I descend upon this earth? Oh master of men, not being sustained I will split her open and land in Rasatala [the lower worlds!] There is another reason I cannot move towards the earth. Please consider this, oh King: when I have to wash away the sins of the people who purify themselves with my water, to whom should I turn with those sins?'

Shri Bhagiratha said: 'The saintly forsakers of the world who are peaceful and expert in the regulative principles and purify all the world, will take away the sinfulness you thus accumulate because they, as they bathe in your water, carry within themselves the Vanquisher of all Sins, the Lord [see also 1.13: 10 and 6.1: 15]. The god of destruction, Rudra, will sustain your force, for he is of all the embodied beings the Self in which [or with which], like with the threads of a piece of cloth, the entire length and width of the universe is interwoven [*].'

After this was said, the ruler propitiated the godhead with his penances. This did not take very long. Very soon oh King, Lord Shiva became satisfied with him [with Bhagiratha ]. 'So be it', Lord Shiva said who is always auspicious to all. Having been addressed by the king he then with great attention took upon him the burden of the Ganges water that is pure because of Vishnu's feet [see also 5.17]. He Bhagiratha, the saintly king, brought her who could purify the entire universe to the place where the bodies of his forefathers were reduced to ashes. Leading the way in a chariot moving at the speed of the wind, he was followed by her. She thus blessed all the countries [they passed through] until she flowed over the burned sons of Sagara. Even though the sons of Sagara were condemned for having offended a brahmin, they by her water just touching their remains went to heaven. If Sagara's sons whose bodies burned to ashes went to heaven after they came in touch with [the Ganges], then what would her effect be upon those who determined in vows with faith and devotion worship that goddess? That what was described here is not such a great miracle because the water of the Ganges which originates from the feet of Anantadeva [the 'Eternal Godhead'] puts an end to a worldly existence. Saintly people who by their faith have minds that follow the path of goodness [Vishnu], find purification despite the difficulty to escape from the three modes of nature. They attain the divine Self immediately.

From the loins of Bhagiratha a son was born named Shruta, from him there was Nabha - different from the one I mentioned before [see 5.3] - and from Nabha Sindhudvipa was born from whom thereafter Ayutayu was born. His son Rituparna was a friend of Nala. He received from Nala knowledge about the art of training horses in exchange for gambling secrets. Rituparna had a son called Sarvakama. From him there was Sudasa whose son [Saudasa] ascended the throne as the husband of Damayanti. He was also known, so one says, as Mitrasaha and Kalmashapada. Because of his [bad] karma he had no children. One day he was cursed by Vasistha to become a man-eater [a Rakshasa].'

The king said: 'Please tell me, if it is not a secret, for what reason the spiritual master cursed this great soul Saudasa. That is what I would like to know.'

Shri Shuka said: 'In the past Saudasa one day wandered around and killed a Rakshasa, but he let his brother go. This brother wanted to avenge him. With evil intentions posing as the king's cook he presented his spiritual master [Vasistha], who came to dinner, the flesh of a human being that he had cooked. The mighty master checking his food, immediately found it unfit for consumption and most angrily cursed the king with: 'Because of this you will become a man-eater' 3-2 When the sage discovered that the Rakshasa was to blame, he for twelve years performed penance [for having unjustly cursed the king]. Saudasa had taken a palmful of water in order to curse his guru, but his wife Madayanti prevented it. He then spilled the water that was potent with the [s'apa] mantra over his legs whereupon the king saw that all directions, the sky and the surface of the earth were teeming with living beings. After he had developed the propensities of a Rakshasa he obtained a black spot on his leg [because of which he was known as Kalmashapada]. Living in the forest he [once] saw a brahmin couple having sexual intercourse. 6-2 Because he was hungry he seized the brahmin whereupon his wife said: 'You must be very unhappy, poor and hungry indeed, but a Rakshasa you are not! You are actually a great warrior from the Ikshvaku dynasty, the husband of Madayanti. Oh hero, it does not become you to act against the dharma. Please release my husband, this twice-born soul whose desire to get a son has not yet been fulfilled. Oh King, this human body is there to serve the completeness of the Supreme Being. Thus seen, the killing of him, oh hero, would equal the destruction of all that virtue! This man is a brahmana well versed in the Veda who austere, of good behavior and endowed with all good qualities wants to worship the Absolute Truth, the Supreme Personality who because of His attributes is known as the true Self in the heart of all living beings. How can he, this brahmin and best of all sages, deserve it to be killed by you with your knowledge of the dharma, by you who are the best of all saintly kings, oh master of the state? It is like a father killing his son! He is a saint free from sin, a speaker of the Absolute Truth. How can you who are appreciated in the highest circles have the heart to kill him? That is tantamount to killing an unborn child or a cow. I am mortified, I cannot live without him for a second. If you want to eat him, then eat me instead.'

While she was pleading and lamenting this pitifully as a woman missing her protector, he, Saudasa, condemned by the curse, devoured him like a tiger does its prey. The moment the wife of the brahmana, the chaste woman, saw that the man who was about to impregnate her was eaten by the Rakshasa, she cried loudly from the depth of her heart and pronounced angrily a curse against the king. 'Because you have devoured the husband of a woman aching for intercourse, you, oh sinner, will suffer the curse of also finding death when you try to impregnate a woman, you traitor of civilisation!'

After this way cursing Mitrasaha [indulgent toward friends' or Saudasa] she, being devoted to be with her husband, found her destination by stepping into the fire that burned the bones of her husband. When Saudasa twelve years later was released [from the curse of Vasistha] and tried to make love to his wife, he was checked by the queen who reminded him of the curse of the brahmani. Thus he henceforward had to forget about being physically happy with his wife and, as ordained by fate, therefore remained childless. Vasistha then got the permission to beget a child in Madayanti, his wife. She not delivering carried the child for seven years in her womb. [With Vasistha] striking her abdomen with a stone, a son was born who for that reason was called As'maka ['by a stone']. From As'maka Balika was born. This child was protected [against Lord Parashurama] by a human shield consisting of women and was named thereafter [Narikavaca]. When there were no rulers anymore [because Lord Parashurama had killed them all] he became known as Mulaka ['the root of'], the progenitor of the kshatriyas. From Balika there was a son named Das'aratha, his son was Aidavadi and from him there was king Vis'vasaha who fathered Khatvanga who became emperor. 2-4 On the request of the demigods he most fiercely killed the Daityas in battle after which he, coming home and knowing that he had only a second to live longer, fixed his mind by praying: 'Neither the earth, my kingdom nor my dearest wife, neither my sons and daughters nor my opulence or life are as worshipable to me as the members of the brahmin community who enjoy the respect of my family []. Not even as a child I was attracted or enjoying that what goes against the dharma, nor did I at any time consider anything [or anybody] else as more substantial than the Lord Hailed in the Scriptures, Uttamas'loka. The demigods granted me the boon that I could have whatever I wanted, but that claim over the three worlds I could not accept. All that I desire in this world is to be fully absorbed in the Supreme Lord [compare B.G. 9: 34]. The godly ones are with their senses and minds distracted [by the modes] and do not know the Dearthmost Eternal One of the Soul who always resides in their hearts. What then is to be expected of others [see B.G. 18: 55]? Let me therefore surrender myself to Him the One Soul who created the universe, and in loving service give up my attachment to matters brought about by the so very powerful material modes, matters that are like Ghandarva towns [or castles in the air].'

Thus determined by an intelligence firmly in the grip of Narayana, he gave up all his ignorant, on different matters founded, love and thus got situated in his original position of loving service [his so-called svarupa]. That what is known as the Supreme Brahman that defies all description, is not something impersonal or empty as one might think. It is the Supreme Lord Vasudeva about whom the devotees are singing [see also 1.2: 11].'

*: Shрила Prabhupada quotes: Lord Shiva is described in the Brahma-samhita 4:

kshiram yatha dadhi vikara-vis'esa-yogat sanjayate na hi tatha prithag asti hetoh yah Shambhutam api tatha samupaiti karyad govindam adi-purusham tam aham bhajami
"Milk changes into yogurt when mixed with a yogurt culture, but actually yogurt is constitutionally nothing but milk. Similarly, Govinda, the Supreme Personality of Godhead, assumes the form of Lord Shiva for the special purpose of material transactions. I offer my obeisances at Lord Govinda's lotus feet."

 : Lord Shiva is also called Ashutosh: quickly pleased.
: The Vaishnava daily expresses his respects for the brahminical culture in his offerings, by worshiping the Lord with this prayer:

namo brahmanya-devaya
go brahmana-hitaya ca
jagad-dhitaya krishnaya
govindaya namo namah
"I offer my respectful obeisances to the Supreme Absolute Truth, Krishna, who is the well-wisher of the cows and the brahmanas as well as the living entities in general. I offer my repeated obeisances to Govinda, who is the pleasure reservoir for all the senses."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 10:

The Pastimes of Lord Ramacandra

Shri Shuka said: 'From Khathvanga there was Dirghabahu, from him the renown and dexterous Raghu was born, from whose son Aja the great king Das'aratha was born. Upon the prayers of the God-conscious ones the Absolute Truth took birth from his loins in four forms: the Supreme Lord in person along with three of His expansions. They appearing as four sons were known as Rama, Lakshmana, Bharata and Shatrughna. Oh King, you heard again and again the descriptions by many seers and knowers of the truth of His transcendental exploits as the husband of Sita [*], compare B.G. 4: 34]. - Obedient to His father He left the kingdom behind and wandered together with His beloved [Sita] from forest to forest on His two lotus feet that were as tender as the palm of a hand. This He did in the company of Hanuman and Lakshmana who took away the pain of His path. He was separated from His sweetheart Sita [by Ravana] because He had disfigured Shurpanakha [the sister of Ravana]. Over the ocean, that was afraid of His eyebrows He raised in anger, a bridge was built [to Lanka, the residence of Ravana], after which He, the king of Ayodhya, like a forest fire destroyed the envious ones. May the mercy be upon us of Him who in sage Vis'vamitra's arena of sacrifice, in the presence of Lakshmana, killed the great chiefs of the Rakshasas, the wanderers of the dark that were headed by Marica.

- It was He who, among all the heroes in the world who were gathered in the hall where Sita would select her husband, took up the mighty bow of Shiva that had to be carried by three hundred men. Fastening the string, oh King, and bending it, He broke the bow in two the way a baby elephant breaks a stick of sugarcane. By that victory he won the divine girl named Sita who with her qualities, behavior, age and limbs was a perfect match for Him, she the Goddess of Fortune who had acquired a position on His chest. On His way home with her, He met and defeated, the deep-rooted pride of Bhrigupati [Parashurama] who three times [seven, thus twenty one times] had rid the earth of the seed of the [burden of unrighteous] rulers [see 9.16]. Bowing His head to the command of His father, who in his attachment had made a promise to his wife that He had to abandon the kingdom, residence, opulence, relatives and friends, He with his wife left to live in the forest like a liberated soul []. Living there He, as He wandered around, met with great difficulties. He maimed the body of the Rakshasa's sister [Ravana] because she had a [by lust] spoiled mind and then, with His invincible bow and arrows in His hands, had to kill the fourteen-thousand of her many friends headed by Khara, Tris'ira and Dushana.

Oh king, when the ten-headed Ravana heard the stories about Sita, it stirred his heart and made him lust to see her. [The demon] Marica then lured Rama away from their stay in the form of a golden deer that was killed by Him with a sharp arrow just as Shiva killed Daksha [with an ax, see 4.5: 22]. While He and His brother were in the forest, the unprotected daughter of the king of Videha [or Janaka] was kidnapped by the most wicked Rakshasa, like he was a tiger. Rama then wandering around like a man who, attracted to women, is in distress over being separated from his wife, thus gave an example [in this Shringara rasa] of where attachment all leads to. After having performed the funeral rites for him who had died for His sake [the eagle Jathayu], He killed Kabandha [a headless monster] and became friends with the leaders of the monkey hordes so that He, informed by them about Sita, could deliver her. He whose feet are worshiped by Brahma and Shiva, but appeared as a normal man, next killed Vali [a wicked brother of Hanuman]. Then He, accompanied by the monkey soldiers, proceeded to the shore of the ocean. The [god of the] ocean silent with fear because of His angry glance - from which all the crocodiles and sharks were agitated - carried, in assuming a personal form, on his head all that was needed to worship Him and said, upon reaching the lotus feet, the following: 'We, the dull-minded, are truly not capable, oh Supreme One, to know You as the one Original Person and Supreme Master of all Universes who resides in the core of the heart. For the God-conscious ones are the result of Your goodness, the controllers of the people have resulted from Your passion, while the rulers of the material elements sprang from Your mode of ignorance. But You oh Lord, are the Master over all these modes. You may cross [my waters] as You like! Just conquer that son of Vis'rava called Ravana who is like urine to the three worlds and thus regain Your wife, oh hero. Build a bridge here and Your fame will spread. In the future the great kings and heroes from all directions will glorify You for it.'

After the Master of the Raghu dynasty with all sorts of mountain peaks complete with trees and plants, that were transported by hand by the mighty monkeys, had constructed a bridge in the ocean [], He, helped by the directions of Vibhishana [a virtuous brother of Ravana], together with the soldiers led by Sugriva, Nila and Hanuman set foot on [the island of] Lanka that just before had been set afire [by Hanuman's tail]. There the houses of pleasure, granaries, treasuries, palace doors and city gates, assembly houses, turrets and [even the] pigeon houses were taken by force and dismantled by the Vanara [monkey] leaders who, just like an elephant herd, turned the squares and crossroads with all their flags and golden water pots on the rooftops, into one swirling river. When the master of the Rakshasas saw that, he summoned Nikumbha, Kumbha, Dhumraksha, Durmukha, Surantaka, Narantaka and others to fight, and also called for his son Indrajit, his followers Prahasta, Atikaya, Vikampana and finally for Kumbhakarna [his mighty brother, see 4.1: 37, 7.1: 44 and 7.10: 36]. All the Rakshasa soldiers with their hard to defeat swords, lances, bows, barbed missiles and spears, firebrands, javelins and scimitars [a curved sword], lined up in front of Him who was surrounded by Sugriva, Lakshmana, Hanuman, Gandhamada, Nila, Angada, Riksha, Panasa and others.

The commanders of the soldiers of the Ruler of the Raghu dynasty [Rama], together hurried forward to fight the enemy followers of Ravana moving on foot and seated on elephants, chariots and horses who, condemned by the anger of mother Sita, were out of luck in the battle. With trees, mountain peaks, clubs and arrows they were all killed by the [monkey] warriors led by Angada and others. The Rakshasa leader seeing that his forces were defeated, thereupon fuming with anger drove his vehicle towards the brilliantly radiating Rama who, seated on the shining chariot of Indra that Matali [the driver] had brought, struck him with the sharpest arrows. Rama said to him: 'You scum of the earth, since you oh criminal, like a dog have kidnapped My helpless wife, I, as Time itself, as someone not failing in His heroism, will personally punish you today for that shameful act, you abominable evildoer [see also B.G. 16: 6-18]'

Thus rebuking him He released the arrow He had fixed on His bow and that arrow pierced his heart like a thunderbolt. Vomiting blood from his ten mouths he fell down from his heavenly vehicle. His men then roared: 'Alas, what has happened to us?', just like pious people do when they fall down [see also B.G. 9: 21]. Thereafter the many thousands of wives of the demons, headed by Mandodari [Ravana's wife], came out of Lanka and lamented upon approaching [their dead husbands]. Embracing their beloved ones and their friends who were all killed by Lakshmana's arrows, they did beat their breasts and cried pitably, which [for the victors] was something pleasant to hear: 'Oh alas, now he has been killed who has protected us all! Oh Ravana, cause of our cries, to whom must the state of Lanka bereft of your good self turn for shelter, now it is defeated by the enemy? Oh greatest patron, under the spell of lusty desires you, not knowing the influence of mother Sita, have arrived at a situation like this. Because of what you did oh glory of the dynasty, we and the state of Lanka are now without a protector, your body is there as fodder for the vultures and your soul is destined for hell [compare B.G. 16: 19].'

Shri Shuka said: 'Vibhishana with the approval of the King of Kosala [Rama] performed for the family the funeral rites that for a deceased one have to be observed in order to save him from hell. The Supreme Lord thereupon found His sweetheart [Sita] back in an ashoka forest sitting in a small cottage at the foot of a Shims'apa [ashoka] tree. Sick from being separated from Him she was emaciated. Rama seeing the poor plight of His sweetheart was filled with compassion. When she saw her beloved, her lotus-like mouth was overwhelmed with a great joy. The Supreme Lord put Vibhishana in charge of the rule over Lanka's Rakshasas for the duration of a kalpa. He placed Sita on His vehicle and then ascended Himself together with Hanuman and the brothers [Lakshmana and Sugriva the commander] to return to His home town [Ayodhya] and conclude the period of the vow [that He would stay away for fourteen years]. To celebrate His uncommon activities He on His way was showered with a choice of fragrant flowers offered by the higher class and was joyfully praised by the seer of the Absolute Truth [Brahma] and the ones belonging to him. Lord Ramacandra, the One of Great Compassion, was very sorry to hear that His brother Bharata was lying down on a kus' mat, had matted locks, ate barley cooked in cow's urine and had covered Himself with tree bark. 5-3 Bharata hearing about His arrival took the two sandals on His head [that Rama had left behind on the throne to represent Him] and came, accompanied by all citizens, the ministers and the priests, to welcome His eldest brother. Departing from His camp Nandigram He was accompanied by songs, the sounds of musical instruments, the constant recitation of mantras performed by brahmins, by gold embroidered flags on golden chariots that were pulled by the most beautiful, with gold caparisoned horses and by soldiers in gold covered armor. Approaching in procession with nicely dressed courtesans and servants as also with soldiers on foot and everything else that would befit a royal reception, like the wealth of all kinds of jewelry, He fell down at the lotus feet with an ecstatic love that softened the core of His [ascetic] heart and filled His eyes with tears. 9-4 Placing the two slippers before His brother, He stood with folded hands and tears in His eyes. Then He was embraced by Rama who, bathing Him with the water from His eyes, held Him in His arms for a long time. Rama, Lakshmana and Sita together offered the scholars and the others worthy of worship personally their obeisances and also received these in return from all the citizens. Seeing their Lord returning after so many years the citizens of Kosala waved with their upper garments, offered Him garlands and began to dance in great jubilation. 2-4 The sandals were carried by Bharata, the whisk and luxurious fan were carried by Vibhishana and Sugriva, a white parasol was carried by the son of the wind god [Hanuman] and the bow and two quivers were carried by Shatrughna. Sita held the waterpot with water from the holy places, Angada held the sword made of gold and the King of the Rikshas [Jambavan, the leader of the bears who also participated in the war] held the shield, oh King. Sitting on Kuvera's heavenly chariot [the 'Pushpaka' captured from Ravana] He, the Supreme Lord devotedly being worshipped by the women and the reciters, oh King, appeared as brilliant as the moon risen among the planets.

After properly being welcomed by His brother He was festively received in the city of Ayodhya. Upon entering the royal palace He paid mother Kaikeyi, His other stepmothers and His own mother [Kaus'alya] His respects. The spiritual teachers, friends of their age and the youngsters were all of worship and their welcome was returned befittingly by Rama, the princess of the Videhas [Sita] and Lakshmana. The mothers reviving like bodies awakening from sleep, while keeping their sons on their lap, wetted them with a continuous flow of tears in letting go of their grief [over having been separated for so long]. According to the vidhi the matted locks were shaven off by the family priest [Vashishthha] and the elders of the family, after which, with the water of the four oceans and other paraphernalia, a bathing ceremony was performed like it was done for King Indra [see 6: 13]. Thus having been fully bathed, nicely dressed, decorated and garlanded, He shone brightly with His brothers and His wife. Pleased with the surrender [of His brother] He accepted the throne offered to Him, as also the citizens who, serving according to their nature with their status orientations [varnashrama identity, see B.G. 4: 13], all deserved His protection for that quality. Rama was therein just like a father and was by them therefore also accepted as their father.

Although this all happened in Treta-yuga, the period became like Satya-Yuga because of Rama's presence as the ruling king who with His full respect of dharma made all living beings happy [see also 12.3: 15]. The forests, the rivers, the hills and the mountains, the lands, the islands, the oceans and the seas offered all the living beings all they could wish for, oh best of the Bharatas. During the period that Rama, the Lord in the Beyond, was king, there was no suffering [due to oneself, others and nature], no disease, old age, bereavement, distress, lamentation, fear and exhaustion or dying against one's will. Having sworn that He would not take another woman [for reasons of principle He separated from Sita, see next chapter] He, as a saintly king pure in His character and dharma, by His personal dutifulness was an example, [in particular] for the householders. Sita in loving service of her husband was, because of her good character, always humble and submissive. Being chaste and afraid [to make mistakes], she bashfully with understanding for her husband's position captivated His mind.'

*: This and the next chapter are a summary of Valmiki's Ramayana, the original scripture describing the story of Rama.

 Prabhupada explains: 'Maharaja Das'aratha had three wives. One of them, Kaikeyi, served him very pleasingly, and he therefore wanted to give her a benediction. Kaikeyi, however, said that she would ask for the benediction when it was necessary. At the time of the coronation of Prince Ramacandra, Kaikeyi requested her husband to enthrone her son Bharata and send Ramacandra to the forest. Maharaja Das'aratha, being bound by his promise, ordered Ramacandra to go to the forest, according to the dictation of his beloved.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 11:

Lord Ramacandra Rules the World

Shri Shuka said: 'The Supreme Lord Ramacandra, the heart and soul of all the demigods, accepted an acarya and performed sacrifices with the greatest opulence. Thus He [factually] was worshipping Himself by Himself [see also 4.31: 14]. The hota priest [the one offering oblations] He gave the entire east, the Brahma priest [supervising the proceedings] received the southern side from His Lordship, the adhvaryu priest [who chants the Yajur mantras preparing the sacrifice] got the entire west and the northern side went to the udgata priest [singing the Sama Veda hymns]. Departing from the notion that the brahmins who are free from material desires deserve the complete of the earth, He gave the teacher of example, the acarya, the rest of whatever land there was in between the regions. What this way remained for Himself were His personal ornaments and garments, while for the queen, the daughter of the king of Videha, only her nose ring remained. But when the brahmins saw how much He cared for them as their Lord, their hearts melted, so that they, most pleased with Him, honoured Him with prayers. They returned everything they had received from Him and said: 'What did You not give us, oh Supreme Lord, oh Master of the universe? With You entering the core of our hearts You dissipate, with Your effulgence, the darkness of our ignorance. Our obeisances unto You Ramacandra, oh Lord of the transcendentalists, oh best of all persons of fame whose lotus feet are worshiped by those who are free from violence, oh You whose intelligence is never clouded by anxiety.'

Curious about the public opinion Rama one night walked unnoticed in disguise and heard someone speak who was referring to His wife [Sita]. 'I cannot maintain you any longer because you are an impure, unchaste woman going to another man's house. And I will not, like someone henpecked, accept you again as Rama did with Sita!' Apprehensive of folk who say anything that comes to mind, who do not know where to stop and have a poor fund of knowledge, she [Sita] was abandoned by her husband. Thereupon she went to the hermitage of Pracetas [Valmiki Muni]. She being pregnant [when she left Rama], delivered there after some time a twin, two boys who from the sage who performed the birth rituals received the names Kus'a and Lava [from the grass and 'what is cut off']. Also Lakshmana had two sons: Angada and Citraketu [named after 6.14-17]. Bharata, oh great ruler, had two sons who were named Taksha and Pushkala. 3-1 Subahu and Shrutasena were fathered by Shatrughna. Bharata who brought all directions under His control in His conquest had to kill millions of Gandharvas [or obstinate rebels] and offered all their riches to the king [Rama]. The Rakshasa listening to the name of Lavana, a son of Madhu, was killed by Shatrughna in the great forest of Madhavana where He established the great town known as Mathura. Sita, who being sent away by her husband kept meditating on Rama's feet, entrusted her sons to the sage and entered the earth. When Rama, the Supreme Lord, heard about this He, remembering her qualities in the different circumstances, could not check His grief, however much He tried to ban it in meditation. Such an attraction between husband and wife constitutes a universal source of anxiety. When this is even true for the great controllers, then what about the common man who is fixed upon a household existence? After she went to heaven the Lord observed strict celibacy and performed a ceremony, an Agnihotra [fire] sacrifice, that was continued for thirteen thousand years without interruption. Rama [concluding His earthly stay] placed His lotus feet that were pierced by the thorns of the Dandakaranya forest [the forest of His exile] in the hearts of those who remembered Him and then entered the [beyond of the] Light of the Soul [of the atma-jyoti, His heavenly abode Vaikunthha].

The Lord of the Raghu dynasty [Rama] who assumed a [spiritual] body for the purpose of His pastimes, had, with no one being greater or equal to Him, [personally] no need for all this honour of the prayers of the godly ones, the killing of the Rakshasas, building a bridge over the ocean and His bow and arrows, nor was He in need of the monkeys to assist Him in defeating the enemy [compare B.G. 3: 20-26]. Let me surrender myself to Him, that Master of the Raghu dynasty whose spotless fame to the present day is celebrated in royal assemblies and by the sages in all directions as good as the cloth that covers the elephant of victory, to Him whose lotus feet, which vanquish all sin, are worshiped by the helmets of earthly kings and the gods of heaven. He to whom the people of Kosala were looking up and who they wanted to touch, was by them all, whether they ate and slept with Him or respected Him as a servant, followed to the place for which He left and where all [bhakti]-yoga practitioners go [see also B.G. 4: 9]. Anyone who hears about the activities of Lord Rama and is filled with compassion towards others, oh King, will be liberated from the clutches of karma.'

The king asked: 'How did He, the Supreme Lord, Rama, relate to His brothers who were His personal expansions and how did they and also His people, His subjects, behave towards Him, their Controller?'

The son of Vyasadeva said: 'After accepting the throne He, the Lord of the universe, ordered His younger brothers to conquer the world [*] while He Himself gave audience to His people looking after the capital with other assistants. The streets were sprinkled with perfumed water and the musth of the elephants. It was the highest and greatest delight to see Him, their Master and Ruler, personally present. The palaces, the palace gates, the assembly houses, the platforms and the temples and such, were adorned with golden water pots and flags. [When He appeared] one turned it into a festival with reception gates, tapestries, garlands, betel nut, flowers and fruits, banana trees, colourful flags and mirrors. Wherever He passed the locals carrying their articles of worship approached Him to receive His blessings and said: 'Oh my Lord, please maintain this land that You have recovered like You did before [in the form of Lord Varaha]'. The men and women in the city thereafter, desirous to see their king, the Lord with the lotus eyes, returning after such a long time, left their homes to get on the rooftops of the greater mansions, satisfy their hungry eyes and shower Him with flowers. 1-3 He thereafter entered His family home that by His ancestors had been turned into an unfathomable treasury filled with the most costly goods. The doorposts were of coral, the pillars lining up on the polished marakata [emerald] floors were of vaidurya stone and there were dazzling marble walls. All sorts of flowers and flags could be seen as also draperies, pearls and the most valuable effulgent gems. With all the desirable beauty that increased everyone's joy and with the many bunches of flowers, fragrant incense and lamps, the men and women there whose physical beauty competed with their jewelry, appeared like demigods. The Supreme Lord Rama [lit.: 'joy'], the most excellent one delighting in devotion, to His full satisfaction personally enjoyed [His life] there with His dearest wife Sita. He with the people meditating on His lotus feet, for many years enjoyed all the pleasures of life on their proper time without running into trouble with the dhama.'

*: Shri Caitanya Mahaprabhu said to this Rama mission of conquering of the world: 'prithivite ache yata nagaradi grama sarvatra pracara haibe mora nama'; A pure devotee, therefore, must execute the order of the Lord and must not gratify his senses by remaining stagnant in one place, falsely proud, thinking that because he does not leave Vrindavana but chants in a solitary place he has become a great devotee. He also said: 'yare dekha, tare kaha 'krishna'-upadesa'; every devotee, therefore, should spread Krishna-consciousness by preaching, asking whomever he meets to accept the order of the Supreme Personality of Godhead [Cc. Madhya 7.128].

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 12:

The Dynasty of Kus'a, the Son of Lord Ramacandra

Shri Shuka said: 'From Kus'a [the son of Lord Rama] there was Atithi, and from him there was Nishadha. Nishadha's son was Nabha, Pundarika was fathered by him and Kshemadhanva became his son. Devanika was the son of Kshemadhanva, his son was Aniha who had a son called Pariyatra. Pariyatra's son was Balasthala who had a son called Vajranabha. Vajranabha was born from the effulgence of the sun god. - From Sagana [the son of Vajranabha] there was a son called Vidhriti from whose loins the son Hiranyanabha was born who became a teacher of yoga in the line of Jaimini. Yajnavalkya of Kos'ala as a disciple studied under his lead the spiritual practice [adhyatma yoga, see 6.15: 12-15]: the most elevated yoga of becoming a seer who can cut through the material knots in the heart. From Pushpa, the son of Hiranyanabha, Dhruvasandhi was born from whom there was Sudars'ana. Agnivarna was born from him, his son was named Shighra and Maru was his son. This person still exists in Kalapa-grama ['bundle of communities'] as a perfected soul of yoga [a siddha]. He remaining there, at the end of Kali-yuga will beget a [second] son in order to revive the lost dynasty of the sun god. The son that he had was Prasu'ruta who fathered Sandhi from whose loins there was a son called Amarshana. From Amarshana's son Mahasvan the person of Vis'vabahu took birth. From him there was Prasenajit from whom next Takshaka would take birth. From Takshaka there was Brihadbala, who was killed by your father in a fight.

All these kings of the Ikshvaku dynasty are dead and gone. Now listen to the kings to be born in the future. After Brihadbala there will be a son named Brihadrana. Brihadrana's son will be Urukriya, from him Vatsavridha will take birth, Prativyoma will be his son and he will beget Bhanu, whose son Divaka will be a great military commander. Sahadeva, who will be born from him, will beget a great hero: Brihadasa'va who will get the son Bhanuman. The son of Bhanuman will be Pratikas'va who will father the son Supratika. Marudeva will be born thereafter and his son will be called Sunakshatra. Next there will be Pushkara and his son Antariksha will have a son called Sutapa whose son will be Amitrajit. Brihadraja will father the son Barhi. Kritanjaya, who will be born from him, will have a son called Rananjaya and from him Sanjaya will take birth. From him Shakya will be born whose son will be the memorable Shuddhoda. He will be the father of Langala from whom Prasenajit will be born who in his turn will father Kshudraka. Ranaka will take birth from him, Suratha will be the next son, and the one of him named Sumitra will end the line of all these kings in the Brihadbala dynasty. With Sumitra as the last king to appear of all these descendants of Ikshvaku in the future, the dynasty will end in Kali-yuga.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 13:

The Story of Nimi and the Dynasty of his Son Mithila

Shri Shuka said: 'Nimi [see 9.6: 4], the son of Ikshvaku, planned a sacrifice and appointed Vasishthha to be the priest. But he said: 'I am already engaged by Lord Indra, oh Maharaja. When I have finished that sacrifice I will return. Wait till then'. Nimi remained silent and Vasishthha performed the sacrifice for Indra. When the guru did not return for a long time Nimi thought: 'Life is but short' and inaugurated the sacrifice with another self-realised soul as the officiating priest.

Having finished the ceremonies the guru upon his return discovered that his instructions were ignored and so he pronounced a curse: 'May the embodiment of Nimi who thinks he is such a great pundit, fall down!'

Nimi in his turn cursed the guru who had lost his way with: 'And may your embodiment, that with your greed is so poorly aware of the dhama, fall down too!'

Nimi, fully conversant with the spiritual knowledge as he was, thus had to give up his body. Vasishthha, the great-grandfather [died also but] took with [the seed of] Mitra and Varuna [again] birth from Urvas' [the heavenly courtesan, see also 6.18: 5-6]. Preserving Nimi's body in fragrant substances, the great sages in conclusion of the Satra sacrifice [a longstanding Soma sacrifice, see satra] addressed the gathering of demigods as follows: 'If you are content with us, then please, if you can, make the body of the king come alive!' After they had responded in confirmation Nimi said: 'Do not bind me to a physical frame! Afraid to be falsely united, sages do not wish to be in touch that way. [Being] absorbed in thoughts about the Lord, they are [to their opinion sufficiently] of devotional service at the lotus feet [see bhajan]. I do not wish to assume a material body that inevitably dies again, for such a body is everywhere - like it is with fish living in the water - the cause of distress, lamentation and fear [see also 1.13: 47 and B.G. 9: 3].'

The demigods said: 'Live as you like without a material body and be, with your presence in a spiritual body, in the eyes of the normally embodied human being then manifested or not manifested to your desire.'

Afraid that for the common man this would result in a state of chaos, the great seers churned the deceased body of Nimi and thus a son was born [compare: 4.14: 43 and 4.15: 1]. Because of his uncommon birth he was called Janaka, because he was born from Videha [from Nimi who was without a body] he became known as Vaideha [free from a body], because he was born from the churning he was called Mithila and because of this the city he founded was called Mithila. From him there was a son named Udvastu, from him Nandivardhana was born, he had a son named Suketu and Devarata was his son, oh great ruler. Devarata begot Brihadraha, Mahavirya was his son and he fathered Sudhriti who had a son named Dhrishthaketu. He got Haryas'va as his son who was succeeded by Maru. Maru's son was Pratipaka and Kritaratha was born from him. Devamidha was his son who had one called Vis'ruta who fathered Mahadhriti. Kritirata followed and from him there was the son Maharoma whose son Svarnaroma begot a son called Hrasvaroma. Shiradhva [also called Janaka] was born from him. He for the performance of sacrifices plowed the earth with the front part of his plow [or Shira] and thus the daughter Sitadevi was born [the wife of Rama, Sita means 'furrow']. That was why he was known as Shiradhva. Kus'adhva was Shiradhva's son and his son was king Dharmadhva who had two sons named Kritadhva and Mitadhva. 0-2 Kritadhva had a son named Kes'idhva and Mitadhva's son was Khandikya, oh King. Kritadhva's son was an expert in the science of transcendence and Khandikya was an expert in Vedic rituals. Khandikya fled because he feared Kes'idhvaja. From Bhanuman, Kes'idhvaja's son, there was the son Shatadyumna. Shuci was his son and from him the son Sanadvaja was born. Urjaketu, his son, fathered Aja who got a son called Purujit. He also had a son, Arishthanemi. From his son Shrutayu there was Supars'vaka who fathered Citraratha whose son Kshemadhi became the king of Mithila. His son named Samaratha had one named Satyaratha. He fathered Upaguru who begot Upagupta. Upagupta was a partial expansion of Agni [the god of fire]. His son Vasvanata had a son called Yuyudha. He had a son called Subhashana and his son was Shruta. He begot Jaya and Jaya fathered Vijaya. Vijaya's son was Rita. His son was Shunaka, then Vitahavya was born who had a son called Dhriti. Dhriti begot the son Bahulas'va and from him there was Kriti who had a son called Mahavas'i. Oh King, these kings are the descendants of Mithila who by the grace of the Lord of Yoga were all true knowers of the soul. They all found liberation from the worldly duality, even though they stayed at home.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 14:

King Pururava Enchanted by Urvas'i

Shri Shuka said: 'Hear now then, oh King [after the stories about the dynasty of the sun god] about the moon dynasty, for to listen to the sanctifying descriptions of the dynasty of kings headed by Aila [Pururava], is a glorious thing. Dhatu [the 'original element' or Lord Brahma] appeared on the lotus that was produced from the navel of Vishnu. He with the thousands of heads. Dhatu had a son called Atri who had the same qualities as his father. From Atri's tears of jubilation a son called Soma was born who was an embodiment of the nectar of immortality [see also 4.1: 15]. He was by Brahma appointed as the supreme authority over the scholars, the medicinal herbs and the luminaries [see also B.G. 10: 21 and 6.6: 23]. After he had conquered the three worlds, he performed a rajasuya sacrifice and kidnapped in his arrogance with force Tara, the wife of Brihaspati. Despite a repeated request of the spiritual master of the godly ones, he in his conceit did not release her, as a consequence of which a conflict arose between the Suras and the Danavas. Because of Shukra's [semen], the spiritual master of the Asuras enmity towards Brihaspati he together with the Asuras chose the side of the moon god. Shiva though took together with the host of ghosts following him out of affection for the side of [Brihaspati,] the son of the spiritual teacher [Angira, one of the seven sages]. The great Indra followed by all the different demigods, joined the spiritual master [Brihaspati]. The fight that ensued - just because of Tara [Brihaspati's wife] - brought great destruction over the Suras and Asuras. When the creator of the universe Lord Brahma, was fully informed about this by Angira, he severely chastised Soma and delivered Tara unto her husband. He discovered that she was pregnant.

[Brihaspati said to her:] 'You foolish woman, deliver now! Deliver immediately from that womb that was my domain. Despite having been impregnated by another man I shall not burn you, unfaithful as you are, to ashes because you were a woman in want of a child.'

Tara, deeply ashamed, delivered a child that had a golden effulgence. That made Brihaspati and Soma both desire the child. 'It is mine, not yours!' so they exclaimed fighting over the child. The sages and the gods asked Tara questions, but she in her embarrassment could not say a thing.

The child got angry and said to its mother: 'Why all this shame? Why are you not saying anything? Tell me immediately, oh unchaste lady, what you have done wrong!'

Lord Brahma took her separate, put her at ease and asked her about the details, upon which she admitted hesitantly: 'This child belongs to Soma'. Soma then immediately took charge of it. Oh King, when the child because of its profound intelligence received from Lord Brahma the name Budha, the god of the moon was in great jubilation that he had gotten such a son. 5-1 As I said before [in 9.1], from his [Budha's] loins Pururava was born from the womb of Ila. When Urvas'i [see also 9.13: 6] in Indra's court heard Narada speak about Pururava's beauty, qualities, magnanimity, behavior, wealth and power, the devi was struck by the arrows of Cupid and approached him. 7-1 Because of the curse of Mitra and Varuna the woman had descended to the human world. Seeing there that the best of all men was as beautiful as Cupid, she approached him self-controlled. As soon as he, the king, saw the divine woman, he with goose bumps addressed her enthused with sweet words and bright eyes. The honourable king said: 'Be welcome oh supreme beauty, please be seated, what can I do for you? Keep me company and share my bed for many, many years!'

Urvas'i said: 'What woman would not be attracted by the sight and thought of you, oh beautiful man, and desist from enjoying your chest in intimate love [see also 7.9: 45]? These two lambs, oh King, have fallen and need your protection, oh honourable host. In the company of a superior husband so one says, a woman may enjoy in love. Oh hero of mine, that what is prepared with ghee shall be my food and I do not want to see you naked at any other time than during intercourse.'

'That is settled then', so promised the great soul.

'Just look at your beauty and poise! No one on earth is as attractive as you are. Who can withstand a goddess like you who personally has descended among the human beings?'

He, the best among the human beings, enjoyed in the most exquisite places and pleasure gardens like Caitraratha, with her whatever there was to enjoy to his desire [see also 5.16: 13-14]. Making love with the goddess he enjoyed it for many nights and days to be with her and smell the stimulating lotus saffron fragrance of her face.

Indra not seeing Urvas'i [around] told the singers of heaven: 'Without Urvas'i my abode is not as beautiful'. Thus they in the dead of night assembled in the dark to steal away the two lambs that Urvas'i as a wife had entrusted to the king. When she heard the two [that she treated like her] sons, cry as they were led away, she said: 'My life is stolen away by this bad husband who considers himself a hero but is not a real man! Confiding in him who during the day appears to be a man but at night fearfully keeps himself silent as a woman, thieves have stolen away my two sons.'

Pierced by the arrows of her words he, like an elephant fired up, angrily in the dark took up a sword and went after them, without putting his clothes on. After they [the Gandharvas], gave up the lambs, they lit up the place with a light as bright as lightning. Urvas'i thus could see her husband returning naked with the two lambs in his hands... [and thus she left him]. Pururava not seeing his wife in bed any longer, got very sad. Being too much attached to her he got distraught and lamenting began to roam the earth [looking for her]. He spotted Urvas'i in Kurukshetra [a place of pilgrimage, see also B.G. 1: 1] at the Sarasvati together with five companions. Happy and smiling all over Pururava addressed her with sweet words: 'Ah my wife, do not leave, stay, oh cruel one! You should not have given up on me because I failed to make you happy thus far. Let us talk a little. This good body of mine, led far, far away from home by you, will drop dead on the spot, oh devi and the foxes and vultures will eat it, if it is not worthy of your grace!'

Urvas'i said: 'You are a man, do not adhere to death! Do not let these foxes of the senses eat you up. You cannot always count on the friendship of women. They can be like wolves in matters of the heart. Beware of them, women are merciless [when men forsake their duty, see B.G. 1: 40]. They are cunning, hard to handle, do whatever pleases them and put you as a faithful husband and brother down for the smallest reason, so one says. They establish false hopes in the ones unsuspecting, run away from their well-wishers, always desire for newer and newer things, are easily allured and are real captains of independence [if they have to]. At the end of every year your good self may count on one night only in order to make love with me my husband, so that you, one after the other, will have children in this world my dear [see also 6.18: 38-42].'

Seeing that Urvas'i was pregnant he returned to his palace. At the end of the year he then at that very spot [at Kurukshetra] saw Urvas'i again, who had become the mother of a hero. Obtaining her association he, delighting in her company, in great jubilation reunited with her. After the night had passed Urvas'i said to the poor-hearted fellow who was afflicted by the thought of being separated from her: 'Go and take shelter of the singers of heaven, the Gandharvas. When you satisfy them with prayers they will bring me to you.' His [agnisthal] fire pot oh King, then gave him the idea that Urvas'i was really walking with him through the forest. When he returned from the forest and had given up the fire pot, he at home began to meditate the entire night. During that time Treta-yuga was about to begin and before his mind's eye the three [trikanda principles of the Vedas] were revealed [of upasana: sacrifice, song and prayer; karma: fruitive labour and jnana: spiritual knowledge]. 4-4 Going to where he had left his fire pot he discovered that at that spot an Asvattha had sprouted from the inside of a Shami tree. He used the wood to make two sticks [for creating fire] whereupon he, the master of the kingdom, with mantras [*], in his desire to be with Urvas'i, meditated on her as the lower stick, himself as the upper one and that what was between them as the child he had begotten. From the friction a fire was born that, as the son of the king together with the three letter combination A, U and M [the Pranava], in its three forms stood for the complete of the Vedic practice [of being born from one's physical father, from one's spiritual master and from one's own practice of offering - which is represented by the three sacrificial fires called Ahavaniya, Garhapatya and Dakshinagni]. He who wanted to be with Urvas'i thus worshiped the Controller of the Sacrifices, the Supreme Personality of Godhead beyond the senses who is the Lord, the Reservoir of all Demigods [see also B.G. 3: 10]. Formerly [during Satya-yuga] all verbal [Vedic, atharva] expressions were covered with one mantra only, knowing the Pranava of omkara, Narayana was the only god, there was only one fire and there was only one varna [the class called hamsa ]. This is how with Pururava at the onset of Treta-yuga, the [before mentioned] threefold Vedic order [of being born by karma, upasana and jnana] came about, oh ruler of man. By simply generating the sacrificial fire as his son, the king achieved the heavenly abode of the Gandharvas.'

*: In this context are mentioned the mantras: 's'amigarbhad agnim mantha' 'from within the Shami the fire is churned' and hurvas'yam urasi pururava: 'by Urvas'i the best of Pururava.'

: In Satya-yuga, Lord Narayana was worshiped by meditation (krite yad dhyayato vishnum): everyone meditated and achieved success contemplating Lord Vishnu, Narayana. In the next yuga, Treta-yuga, the performance of yajna began (tretayam yajato mukhaih). In Dvapara-yuga the Lord is worshiped as a king, while in Kali-yuga the Lord is there as his own devotee [a covered or channa-avatara] to lead in devotion.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 15:

Parashurama, the Lord's Warrior Incarnation

The son of Vyasadeva said: 'From Urvas'i's womb six sons were born who were begotten by Pururava, oh ruler of man: Ayu, Shrutayu, Satyayu, Raya, Vijaya and Jaya. - Shrutayu had a son named Vasuman, Satyayu also had one called Shrutanjaya, from Raya there was a son called Eka and from Jaya there was a son called Amita. Bhima was the son of Vijaya after whom Kancana was born as his son. From Hotraka, Kancana's son, there was the son Jahnur who drank the water of the Ganges in one sip. Puru was begotten by Jahnur [see 1.12: 15 & 3.8: 1] and from him next Balaka and his son Ajaka appeared. Kus'a followed from whose loins the four sons Kus'ambu, Tanaya, Vasu and KUSHanabha were born who were succeeded by Gadhī, the son of Kus'ambu. - From Gadhī there was the daughter Satyavati who by the brahmin Ricika was asked to be his wife, but not considering him fit king Gadhī said to that son of Bhrigu: 'Please deliver me as a dowry for this daughter of the Kus'a dynasty that we belong to, one thousand horses as brilliant as the light of the moon with each one black ear.' With that being said the sage understood what he had in mind. He went to the abode of Varuna from where he brought and delivered the horses. Then he married the beautiful daughter. He as a seer was by his wife and his mother-in-law who each wanted a son, requested to cook a preparation which he with mantras offered to them [to his wife with a brahmana mantra and to his mother-in-law with a kshatriya mantra]. Then the muni went away for a bath. Meanwhile, Satyavati was by her mother asked to give the oblation that was meant for her, because she thought it was the better one of the two. She handed it over to her while she herself ate her mother's oblation.

Learning about this the sage said to his wife: 'You did something very wrong! Now your son will be a fierce, punitive personality while your brother will be a scholar in spiritual science!'

Satyavati beseeched him that it would not be so and thus the son of Bhrigu said: 'Then the son of your son will be that way!' Thereafter Jamadagni was born.

She [Satyavati] later became the great and sacred Kaus'iki [a river] that purifies the entire world. Jamadagni married Renuka, the daughter of Renu. She with the seer of Bhrigu gave birth to many sons of whom Vasuman was the eldest. The renown Parashurama [also known as Rama] was the youngest son. He [Parashurama] who twenty-one times acted as the annihilator of the Haihaya dynasty and thus freed the earth from all her kshatriyas, is called an [ams'a] incarnation of Vasudeva. The earth's burden of the arrogant governing class that, covered by passion and ignorance, lacked in respect for the brahminical rule, was removed by him. He killed them despite the fact that they had committed no great offense [see also 1.11: 34].

The honourable king said: 'What was, of those degraded nobles out of control, the offense committed unto the Supreme Lord because of which time and again the dynasty was annihilated?'

The son of Vyasa said: 'The king of the Haihayas, Kartaviryarjuna, the best of the kshatriyas, had developed a thousand arms in upholding the worship of Dattatreya who is a plenary portion of Narayana. He who was the fear of his enemies could not be defeated, was sharp-witted, most attractive, influential, powerful, renown and physically very strong. Because of his yogic control he had acquired qualities like the perfections of the anima-siddhi and such and he tirelessly traveled all over the world like a whirlwind. When he one day surrounded by beautiful women enjoyed the water of the Reva [the Narmada], he, overly proud of being decorated with the garland of victory, with his arms stopped the flow of the river. The conceited hero called Ten-head [Ravana] could not bear that influence because the water that moved upstream from his actions had inundated his camp. Ravana who insulted him [the king] in the presence of the women was without much difficulty arrested by him, held in custody in [their capital] Mahishmati and then released again as if it concerned a monkey.

Once during a hunt alone in the forest wandering aimlessly, he [Kartaviryarjuna] entered the ashrama of Jamadagni muni.

The sage on the basis of his austerity could, because of his cow of plenty [kamadhenu], offer to that god of man together with his soldiers, ministers and the rest of his retinue, everything that was needed. When the king saw what this wealth that exceeded his personal opulence all meant, he could not appreciate it really. He and his Haihayas then developed the desire to possess that cow of sacrifice. In his conceit he encouraged his men to take away the sage's cow of plenty and bring her together with her calf to Mahishmati while it was crying because of the violence. After the king was gone Parashurama, upon returning to the ashrama [of his father], heard about that nefarious act and got as angry as a snake that is trampled upon. Unable to tolerate what had happened he took up a ghastly chopper, a quiver, a bow and a shield and went after them like a lion attacking an elephant. As the king entered the capital he saw the best of the Bhrgus coming after him in fury carrying a bow, arrows and a chopper as his weapons. His skin was covered by a black deerskin, he had matted locks and radiated like sunshine. He sent seventeen akshauhinis [*] with elephants, chariots, horses and infantry, with swords, arrows, lances, slings and weapons of fire, but Parashurama, the Lord and Master, most fiercely killed them all by himself. He as the greatest expert in handling the chopper, killed as fast as the wind and as speedy as the mind the enemy troops from whom here and there the arms, legs and shoulders fell to the ground together with the drivers of the elephants and the horses that had been slain. Seeing his soldiers fallen by the axe and the arrows of Rama lying scattered with their shields, flags, bows and dead bodies in the mud and the blood on the field, Haihaya [Kartaviryarjuna] rushed over there in fury. Kartaviryarjuna then fixed with five hundred of his arms simultaneously as many arrows as as many bows in order to kill Rama, but he as the best fighter of all the ones armed, cut them all to pieces with his arrows using one bow only. The king attacked again with trees and rocks that he had uprooted with his hands, but, as he was rushing forwards on the battlefield, all his arms were by Parashurama's razor-sharp axe with great force cut off like they were the hoods of snakes. 5-3 After his arms had been cut off, the mountain peak that was his head was severed. As soon as their father was killed his ten thousand sons fled away in fear. Fetching the sacrificial cow and calf that had suffered badly, the Killer of All False Heroism returned to his father's hermitage and handed them over to him. Rama described to his father and brothers everything that he had done. After hearing that Jamadagni spoke as follows:

'Rama, oh Rama, mighty hero, you have committed a sin by unnecessarily killing that god of man who embodies all the demigods. We are brahmins my dear one, people who because of their forgiveness have achieved a position of respect. It is by this quality that the god who is the spiritual master of the universe [Lord Brahma] has achieved his position as the supreme authority. By forgiveness the splendor, happiness and success of the religious practice shines as brilliant as the sun. The Supreme Lord Hari, our Controller, becomes quickly pleased with those who are forgiving. To kill a king who is famous as an emperor is worse than killing a brahmin. Therefore wash away that sin my best one, by respecting the holy places in the consciousness of the Infallible One.'

*: The Mahabharata describes an akshauhini in the Adi parva, chapter two: "One chariot, one elephant, five infantry soldiers and three horses are called a patti by those who are learned in the science. The wise also know that a senamukha is three times what a patti is. Three senamukhas are known as one gulma, three gulmas are called a gana, and three ganas are called a vahini. Three vahinis have been referred to by the learned as a pranita, three pritanas equal one camu, and three camus equal one anikini. The wise refer to ten anikinis as one akshauhini. The chariots of an akshauhini have been calculated at 21.870 by those who know the science of such calculations, oh best of the twice-born, and the number of elephants is the same. The number of infantry soldiers is 109.350, and the number of horses is 65.610. This is called an akshauhini."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 16:

How Lord Parashurama Came to Destroy the Ruling Class Twenty-one Times

Shri Shuka said: 'Oh son of the Kuru dynasty, Parashurama thus by his father being advised said: 'So be it!', whereupon he for a year traveled to all the holy places. Then he returned to the ashrama. When Renuka [his mother] one day went to the bank of the Ganges, she saw the king of the Gandharvas [see also 9.14: 31]. He was garlanded with lotus flowers and sported with the girls of heaven, the Apsaras. She observed his affairs as she went to the river to fetch some water. Slightly drawn to Citraratha, she forgot the time of the fire sacrifice. Realizing that she had neglected the time, she upon returning was afraid to be cursed by the sage and stood with folded hands before him, having put the waterpot in front of him. The sage understood she had deviated from the rule and became angry with his wife. He said: 'Remove her my sons, she's full of sin', but the sons did not carry out his order. Rama who through his meditation and austerity was fully aware of the prowess of the sage [and confided perfectly in his authority], in response to the encouragement of his father immediately terminated his mother and all his brothers. When Jamadagni thus being pleased asked him what benediction he would like, he said: 'Give those whom we have lost their life back without them remembering their punishment!' Soon they all rose happily and alive like they had awakened from deep sleep, since Rama had executed the punishing of his kin in the full awareness of the power of his father's austerity.

The sons of Kartaviryarjuna [9.15: 17] oh King, [meanwhile] could not have peace with the remembrance of their father being defeated by the superior power of Parashurama. When Rama one day with his brothers was away from the ashrama in the forest, they, seeking revenge, took the opportunity to approach their residence. Finding the muni sitting at the fireplace fully absorbed in contemplating the Supreme One Praised in the Verses, they, determined to do evil, killed him. Being most cruel towards the poor and unprotected mother of Rama who begged for the life of her husband, they, those 'kshatriya' brothers, violently cut his head off and took it away. Renuka, the chaste wife down in tears grieving, stroke her body with her hands and cried loudly: 'Oh Rama, oh Rama, my dear son!' Hearing the sound of that most sad cry 'Oh Rama', they [Rama and his brothers despite being] far away, hastened back to the ashrama where they saw that their father had been murdered. Bewildered by the shock, they all lamented and angrily, depressed, sad and indignified cried: 'Oh father, oh saint, you who are such an example of dharma have now departed for heaven and left us behind!' Thus bewailing their father, Parashurama entrusted the body to his brothers and personally took up the ax, determined to put an end to the kshatriyas. Rama went to Mahishmati, [the capital] that was doomed because a brahmin had been killed. There he in the middle of the town made a great pile of the heads he severed from their bodies. 8-1 Their blood formed a terrible river that brought fear to all the rulers who defied the brahminical culture. Because the kshatriyas, the royal class, had killed his father, he acted to their detriment and twenty-one times over wiped them off the earth. He as a master of war thus at Samanta-pancaka created nine lakes filled with blood instead of water [see also B.G. 4: 7].

Joining his father's head with his body he kept him on kus'a grass and worshiped with sacrifices the Godhead, the True Self and inspiration of all the demigods. 1-2 The hota priest he gave the eastern direction, the Brahma priest he gave the southern direction, the adhvaryu he gave the western side and the udgata received the north [compare 9.11: 2]. The others and Kasyapa Muni he assigned the different corners and the middle Aryavarta portion [*] he gave to the upadrashtha priest who supervises the mantras. The assisting sadasya priests received whatever remained. When he thereafter took a bath, he, on the bank of the major stream that was the Sarasvati, was cleansed of all impurities [remaining from killing the kshatriyas] and radiated like a cloudless sun [see also B.G. 3: 9]. Because of Parashurama's worship, Jamadagni regained his body with all the symptoms of consciousness and became the seventh seer in the constellation of the seven sages [see 8.13: 5, linked to the saptarshi-mandala stars around the polestar]. Parashurama, the son of Jamadagni who is also the Supreme Lord with the lotus petal eyes, will be a propounder of Vedic knowledge in the next period of Manu, oh King [as one of the seven sages, see 8.13: 15-16]. He who in peace with the intelligence has given up the clout, still today can be found in the hills of Mahendra and is worshiped and revered for his character and activities by all the perfected ones, the singers of heaven and the venerable ones. This is how the Soul of the Universe, the Supreme Lord Hari, the Controller who appeared as an incarnation in the Bhrgu dynasty and killed the rulers of man many times, relieved the earth of its great burden.

From Gadh'i loins [see 9.15: 4-5] a most powerful personality [Vis'vamitra] was born. He as perfect as a fire, gave up the kshatriya position and achieved the quality of a brahmin by performing austerities [see 7.11: 35 and footnote at 9.7: 7]. Vis'vamitra also had sons: one hundred-and-one of them oh ruler. Because the middle one carried the name Madhucchanda they as a group were called the Madhucchandas. He accepted Shunah's'epha, the son of Ajigarta, who with the name of Devarata [saved by the demigods] appeared in the Bhrgu-dynasty, as his own son. He ordered his other sons to accept him as the eldest one. He was the one who was sold as the 'man-animal' for the yajna of king Haris'candra. After offering prayers to the demigods headed by Lord Brahma he was released from being bound like an animal [see 9.7: 20]. Stemming from the line of Bhrgu he was advanced in spirituality and was therefore protected by the godly ones involved in the sacrifice for the gods. Shunah's'epha was for that reason in the dynasty of Gadh'i also celebrated as Devarata. The [fifty] eldest Madhucchandas could not very well accept the fact [that he would be the eldest brother] and were all cursed by the muni who got angry. He said: 'May all of you bad sons become mlecchas []!' It was Madhucchanda who together with the rest of the fifty sons then said: 'We will conform to whatever would please you in this matter, oh father!' They accepted him [Devarata], a seer of mantras, as the eldest and said to him: 'We will all follow you.' Vis'vamitra told the sons: 'You sons will all have sons because you favored my honour as a father of [worthy] sons. He [Devarata] is a son of mine, just like you are, oh Kus'ika [], please obey him.' And there were many other sons: Ashthaka, Harita, Jaya, Kratuman and more. Thus it is clear what the branches of the dynasty of Kaus'ika are according to the different positions that were obtained by the sons of Vis'vamitra [the ones obedient, the ones disobedient and the ones adopted].'

*: The tract of land in India between the Himalaya Mountains and the Vindhya Hills is called Aryavarta.

: Mlecchas are people opposed to the Vedas, non-Aryans that are also known as the meat-eaters that Lord Kalki will slay at the end of Kali-yuga.

*: 'One of Kaus'ika' is another name for Vis'vamitra and his sons, see also 6.8: 38.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 17:

The Dynasties of the Sons of Pururava

- The son of Vyasa said: 'From one son of Pururava named Ayu [see 9.15: 1], there were the powerful sons Nahusha, Kshatravridha, Raji, Rabha and Anena. Oh royal ruler, hear now about the dynasty of Kshatravridha. From Kshatravridha's son Suhotra there were three sons: Kas'ya, Kus'a and Gritsamada. From Gritsamada there was Shunaka and from him Shaunaka appeared, a muni who excelled in the sacred [Rig Veda] verses. Kas' the son of Kas'ya begot Rashtra who in his turn fathered Dirghatama. From Dirghatama there was Dhanvantari who was an incarnation of Vasudeva, the Enjoyer of Sacrifices. He was the founder of Ayurvedic medicine. When one remembers him all disease can be overcome [see also 8.8]. From his son Ketuman a son took birth named Bhimaratha and from him there was Divodasa whose son Dyuman was also known as Pratardana. He was also known by the names Shatruij, Vatsa, Ritadhvaja and Kuvalaya'sva. From him there were Alarka and other sons. Oh King, no one but Alarka ruled the earth for sixty-six thousand years like a young man. From Alarka's loins Santati was born. From him Sunitha was born, his son was Niketana and Niketana's son was Dharmaketu who fathered Satyaketu. Dhristhaketu thereafter begot Sukumara who ruled the entire planet. Vitihotra was his son and Bharga who was born from him fathered a son named Bhargabhumi oh ruler of man.'

I have thus described all descendants born in the dynasty of Kas'i who belong to the line of Kshatravridha. From [Kshatravridha's brother] Rabha a son was born called Rabhasa. From him Gambhira appeared and Akriya was his son. The descendant who took birth from him was called Brahmavit. Now hear about the descendants of Anena. There was a son called Shuddha from whom Shuci was born who had a son called Citrakrit who was also known as Dharmasarithi. From him Shantaraja was born who performed all kinds of Vedic rituals. He was a self-realised soul [and the line ended with him]. From Raji there were five-hundred sons who were most powerful. Raji who on the request of the godly ones killed the demons, returned the heavenly kingdom back to Indra, the king of heaven. But Indra, afraid of the enmity of Prahlada and others, gave it back [to the demons] and clasped Raji's feet in surrender. When their father passed away the great Indra requested Raji's sons to return the heavenly kingdom. They did not do that and gave him a share of the offerings. The spiritual master [Brihaspati] offered oblations in the fire so that Indra could kill all of Raji's sons who had fallen from the path of righteousness. None of them remained alive. From Kus'a, Kshatravridha's grandson, Prati was born. His son called Sanjaya had a son named Jaya who fathered the son Krita from whose loins next king Haryabala was born. From Sahadeva, who was his son, Hina was born. His son Jayasena fathered Sankriti. Sankriti also had a son named Jaya who was a dutiful kshatriya and a mighty warrior. These were all the kings in the [Ayu] dynasty of Kshatravridha, now hear from me about the descendants of Nahusha.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 18:

King Yayati Regains his Youth

Shri Shuka said: 'Just like an embodied soul having six senses [with the mind as the sixth] there were from king Nahusha [another son of Pururava's son Ayu] six sons: Yati, Yayati, Samyati, Ayati, Viyati and Kriti. The eldest son Yati did not accept the kingdom offered by his father, for he knew what that entails. A person who enters such a position cannot seriously engage in self-realisation. When his father by the brahmins was forced to abdicate for having offended Indra's wife Shaci and he hence had degraded to the level of a python [a 'goat-swallower'], Yayati became the king. He allowed his four younger brothers to rule the different directions. Yayati thus ruling the world married with the daughters [Devayani] of Shukracarya and [S'armistha] of Vishvapara.'

The king said: 'The mighty seer Shukracarya was a brahmin while Yayati belonged to the kshatriya class. How could there, against the customs, be a [pratiloma] marriage of a brahmin [daughter] with a kshatriya? [anuloma, the other way around, was more common].

- Shri Shuka said: 'One day Vishvaparva's daughter named Sharmishthha, an innocent girl with a passionate character, was together with the daughter of the guru Devayani and with thousands of friends. They walked in the palace garden full of blossoming trees that had sand banks with lotus flowers buzzing with the sweet sounds of bumblebees. When the lotus-eyed girls arrived at the side of the lake situated there, they gave up their dresses on the bank and began sporting in the water by splashing one another. They [suddenly] saw Lord Shiva passing by seated on his bull together with the goddess [Parvati]. The young girls quickly got out of the water and full of shame covered themselves with their garments. Without noticing it Sharmishthha put on the clothes of the guru's daughter as if they were her own, whereupon Devayani irritated said this: 'Now look how she like a maid-servant acts without any manners. She just like a dog going for the ghee for a sacrifice has put on the garment that was meant for me! 2-1 Of us descendants of Bhrigu better than the rest by whose austerity this entire world was created, of us who are the face of the Personality of Transcendence and by whose piety the light of the right path is known, of us unto whom the masters of the world, the enlightened ones of control and even the Supreme Lord, the Purifying Supersoul and Husband of the Goddess, are offering prayers, she, whose demonic father is a disciple of our father, has put on what was meant to be worn by us. It is as if an unchaste Shudra tries to master the Vedas!'

Sharmishthha thus rebuked breathed heavily like a trampled serpent and said very angrily biting her lip to the guru's daughter: 'What a nonsense, you beggar! You do not know your place. Is not it you who waits outside our house [for food] like the crows do?'

With these unkind words rebuking her Sharmishthha angrily took the garments away from the virtuous daughter of the spiritual teacher and pushed her into a well. As she went home Yayati, who wandered around for a hunt, happened to arrive at the spot and, thirsting for water, discovered her in the well. Because she sat there completely naked, the king gave her his upper garment and most kindly put his hand into hers to pull her out. 0-2 The daughter of Ushana [or Shukracarya, see also B.G. 10: 37] with words full of love and kindness said to the hero: 'Oh King, with you taking my hand, oh conqueror of the cities of the enemy, you have accepted my hand! May it not be touched by anyone else but by you because the relationship between you and me that we have now, was arranged by providence, oh hero and not by man! Having landed in this well I learned about your goodness. [Please know that] no qualified brahmin can become my husband, oh strong-armed one, because Kaca, the son of Brihaspati whom I have cursed in the past, pronounced a curse against it [*].'

Yayati did not like what had been arranged by providence, but thinking for himself however he, attracted to her, agreed to her proposal. After the king had left she, having returned home, in tears wisely told everything to her father, recounting all that Sharmishthha had done and what had happened thereafter. The mighty thinker was most unhappy about it. He condemned the priesthood, praised the activity of collecting grains [uncha-vritti, see 7.11: 16 and 7.12: 17-19] and left his residence together with his daughter. King Vishvaparva understanding that his spiritual master acted in resistance, propitiated him by prostrating on the road with his head at his feet. The mighty son of Bhrigu, who could not be angry for longer than a minute, then said to his disciple: 'I cannot ignore her, please fulfill her desire, oh King!'

With his consent to settle matters [as demanded] Devayani expressed her desire: 'To whomever my father gives me away in marriage, she [Sharmishthha] must accompany me as my follower.'

Sharmishthha together with her friends by the father being given to Devayani understood the danger [of the acarya leaving] and also what the benefit was of his respectability, and therefore served her with the thousands of other women as a servant. When he gave his daughter [Devayani] to [Yayati] the descendant of Nahusha, Shukracarya said to him: 'Oh King, never ever allow Sharmishthha into your bed!'

Sharmishthha [however] who [later on] saw that Ushana's daughter had nice children, asked him at an opportune moment in a secluded place, whether he as the husband of her girlfriend would not like her as a faithful wife. Remembering what Shukra had said when he gave his advice for a situation like this, he who by the princess was requested to have children with her, then decided from his sense of duty and respect for the principles of religion, to give in to her [compare B.G. 7: 11]. Devayani gave birth to Yadu and Turvasu. Sharmishthha, the daughter of Vishvaparva, had Druhyu, Anu and Puru. When Devayani was informed that Sharmishthha was pregnant of her protector she boiling with anger proudly returned to her father's house. Following his sweetheart, his great desire, he tried to appease her with meaningful words and massaging her feet, but it was in vain.

Shukra said angrily to him: 'You womanizing, deceitful man. May you oh fool, be afflicted by the disfigurement of the human body because of age.'

Shri Yayati said: 'As yet my lust with your daughter has not been satisfied, oh brahmin!'

[Shukra replied:] 'For as long as you are lusty you may exchange your old age for the youth of someone willing to consent to that.'

He thus got the opportunity to change places with his eldest son. He asked him: 'Oh Yadu, beloved son, please give me your youth in exchange for this old age! I am not yet satisfied in my sensual needs, my dear son. When you take upon yourself the burden of old age that your grandfather [Shukra] wished me, I can enjoy life a few years more [see also 7.5: 30].'

Shri Yadu said: 'I am not happy to accept your old age while you remain youthful. A person [like me] will never become free from material desires without [having had] the experience of bodily happiness [see also 7.12: 9-11 and B.G. 4: 13]!'

The father requested Turvasu, Druhyu and Anu oh son of Bharata, but they refused to accept because they, not conversant with the true nature [of the soul], took their temporality for something permanent. He asked Puru who was younger but better qualified. He said to him: 'You my dear son, would not turn me down like your older brothers did, would you?'

Shri Puru said: 'Who, oh King, oh best one among the people, gets in this world the chance to repay his father for the body that he gave? It is by his mercy that one may enjoy a higher life. He who acts in respect of his father's wishes is the best one, he who acts on his command is but mediocre and low-class is he who acts irreverently but he who defies his father's words is like his stool.'

Puru was thus pleased to accept the burden of old age of his father while his father was pleased with the satisfaction of his youthful desires that he asked for, oh ruler of man. He [Yayati] as the master of the seven continents ruled like a father over his subjects and enjoyed to his heart's content the material happiness without any frustration of his senses. Devayani on top of that provided her beloved husband as his sweetheart in private twenty-four hours a day divine bliss with all of her body, mind and words and everything that belongs to it. With different rituals worshipping Hari, the Personality of Sacrifice, the Godhead and Reservoir of all Divinity and Object of all Vedic knowledge, Yayati was of an abundant charity. Then the complete of the in Himself created world appears - just like a mass of clouds in the sky - as a diversity of [life] forms and then again it is of no manifestation, like it concerned a creation of the mind as in a dream [see also B.G. 7: 24-25]. Placing only Him in his heart, Lord Vasudeva, the One Narayana who exists within each but is visible to no one, he free from desire worshiped the Supreme Master. Thus for a thousand years with his mind and his five senses being engaged in a notion of worldly happiness he, the master of the entire world, because of his devious senses nevertheless could not find satisfaction.'

*: Swami Prabhupada explains: 'Kaca, the son of the learned celestial priest Brihaspati, had been a student of Shukracarya, from whom he had learned the art of reviving a man who has died untimely. This art, called mrita-sanjivani, was especially used during wartime. When there was a war, soldiers would certainly die untimely, but if a soldier's body was intact, he could be brought to life again by this art of mrita-sanjivani. This art was known to Shukracarya and many others, and Kaca, the son of Brihaspati, became Shukracarya's student to learn it. Devayani desired to have Kaca as her husband, but Kaca, out of regard for Shukracarya, looked upon the guru's daughter as a respectable superior and therefore refused to marry her. Devayani angrily cursed Kaca by saying that although he had learned the art of mrita-sanjivani from her father, it would be useless. When cursed in this way, Kaca retaliated by cursing Devayani never to have a husband who was a brahmana.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 19:

King Yayati Achieves Liberation: the Goats of Lust
Shri Shuka said: 'He [Yayati] who being moved by lust thus was ruled by women, for the sake of his well-being acted against it with intelligence. In resignation he narrated the following story to his wife [Devayani].'

'Oh daughter of Shukra, please listen to this tale about someone behaving like me in this world, someone sticking to his class and because of whom the sober ones of the forest [they who retired] are repentant. There was a goat in the forest searching for some food for his cherished self. He happened to meet a she-goat that as a consequence of her own actions had fallen into a well. Motivated for lust the he-goat thought of a way to free her. With the tip of his horns he then engaged in digging into the earth around the well. - She thus got out of the well. The he-goat thought she had nice hips and she from her side fancied him as a sexual partner too, just as all the other she-goats did that were looking on. Stout, with a nice beard being a first class seed donor and master lover, that he-goat, the number one goat of them all, forgot himself completely like someone haunted. As the only male enjoying the great number of them, he was always overwhelmed by his lusts [compare 6.5: 6-20]. When the she-goat he had freed from the well saw him, her beloved, engaged in delighting with another one, she could not tolerate that. She considered him a lusty, cruel-hearted pretender, a friend to the occasion who is only interested in sensual matters. Aggrieved she gave him up to return to her former master. Controlled by her the he-goat in pain followed her miserably and tried to pacify her on the road with utterances that goats are used to practice, but he could not satisfy her. Some brahmin who was the master of the she-goat angrily cut off the he-goat's dangling testicles. Later on though the expert yogi reattached them out of self-interest.

Oh dearest wife, the he-goat with his testicles restored, for many, many years enjoyed the she-goat he had saved from the well, but up to the present day his lusty desires are not satisfied. I am a poor miser just like that. In the company of you with your beautiful eyebrows I am tied in love and I could as yet, bewildered as I am by your outer appearance, [therefore] not be of self-realisation [compare 3.30: 6-12, 4.25: 56, 4.28: 17, 5.4: 18, 7.14 and 8.16: 9]. The mind of someone who is a victim of lust cannot find satisfaction in all the food grains, barley, gold, animals and women of this world. The lust of the lusty will never ever be pacified by enjoyment, it will just like a fire that again and again is fed with butter only increase. When someone does not want to teach anybody a lesson, nor goes at the detriment of any living being, for such a person who is of an equal vision towards all, all directions will appear equally happy [see also B.G. 2: 56, 2: 71, & 4: 10]. The desire that is so difficult to forsake for ignorant people, that root cause of all tribulation that is not so quickly overcome, should be given up by the one who seeks happiness. One should not [even] be seated indiscriminately with one's mother, with one's sister or one's daughter, because the senses in combination are so very strong that they even will agitate the most learned one. Even though I for a thousand years without interruption enjoyed the gratification of my senses, that desire still develops constantly. I will therefore give up on these desires and fix my mind upon the Absolute Truth. Free from duality and without falsely identifying myself, I [thus] will wander with the [freedom of the] animals in nature. When one perceives [one's desires] and listens [to them] one should know them to be of a temporary nature. One should not give it any further thought or strive for it. He who is mindful of the fact that they lead to the prolongation of a worldly existence and to forgetfulness about the real self, is a self-realised soul [see also B.G. 2: 13].'

'After the son of Nahusha had said this to his wife, he being freed from desires accepted his old age and gave Puru his youth back [see 9.18: 45]. He made [of his other, faithful sons] Druhyu king over the southeastern direction, Yadu over the southern side, Turvasu over the western part and Anu over the north. The entire planet's riches and wealth he placed under the control of Puru as the most admirable one of all the citizens. He crowned him emperor over his elder brothers and thus having arranged his affairs he left for the forest. All those years he with the six of his ways of engagement [his senses and mind] without interruption had enjoyed life. That he all gave up in a single moment [see also 2.4: 18], just like a bird that leaves its nest when its wings have grown. Doing this he was instantly freed from all his attachments and was, now that he derived from his original self, free from [the influence of] the three modes [see also 1.2: 17]. Pure in his transcendence he achieved the Absolute Truth of Vasudeva that was his destination as a confident associate of the Supreme Lord. When Devayani heard the story [about the he-goat and his she-goats] that for a laugh was presented in the exchange of love between husband and wife, she saw that it referred to [her] self-realisation. 7-2 She understood that living with friends and relatives who are all subjected to the control of the rigid laws of nature [Time], is alike associating with travelers at a water place that [according to one's karma] was created by the Lord's illusory potency. The daughter of Shukracarya gave up all her attachments in this dreamlike world, fixed her mind fully on Lord Krishna and shook off the worries [of both the gross and the subtle nature; the linga] of her self. I offer You my obeisances, oh Supreme Lord Vasudeva, Creator of All who reside in all beings and abodes. My respects for You who in perfect peace are the Greatest of All!'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 20:

The Dynasty of Puru up to Bharata
The son of Vyasadeva said: 'I shall now describe the dynasty of Puru in which you were born, oh son of Bharata. From the saintly kings of that dynasty many brahmin dynasties originated. From Puru the son Janamejaya appeared, Pracinvan was his son and from him there was Pravira from whom next Manusyu appeared. He in his turn fathered Carupada. The son appearing from him was Sudyu who had a son named Bahugava. From Bahugava Samyati was born who had a son named Ahamyati. His son was called Raudras'va. - Just like the ten senses [of action and perception] originated from the primal force of the universal self, from an Apsara girl known as Ghrítaci ten sons were born: Riteyu, Kaksheyu, Sīhandleyu, Kriteyuka, Jaleyu, Sannateyu, Dharmeyu, Satyeyu, Vrateyu and Vaneyu who was the youngest. From Riteyu a son named Rantinava appeared and his three sons, oh ruler of man, were Sumati, Dhruva and Apratiratha. Kanva was Apratiratha's son. From him there was Medhatithi from whom there were Praskanna and others who were all twice-born souls [brahmins]. From Sumati there was Rebhi and his son was called Dushmanta.

- Dushmanta one day went hunting and arrived at the ashrama of Kanva. There he saw a woman sitting who radiated with a beauty like that of the goddess of fortune. Seeing her he immediately felt himself strongly drawn towards this manifestation of divine feminine beauty. In the company of some of his soldiers he then addressed that finest one of all ladies. Exhilarated by her presence he was relieved of the fatigue of his hunting excursion. Driven by lusty feelings, he smilingly asked with pleasing words: 'Who are you, oh lotus petal-eyed lady? Who do you belong to, oh beauty of my heart and what are your intentions, all by yourself being here in the forest? You appear to be of royal blood. You can count on it that I as a descendant of Puru oh raving beauty, never outside of the dharma think of enjoying whatever!'

Shri Shakuntala said: 'I was born from Vis'vamitra and was by Menaka [my mother] left behind in this forest. Kanva the mighty saint, knows everything about it! Oh my hero, what can I do for you? Please come and sit next to me, oh lotus eyed one, accept my humble service. Please eat from the nivara [of a virgin] rice that I have to offer and stay here if you want to.'

Shri Dushmanta answered: 'This, oh beautiful eyebrows, befits your position of being born in the family of Vis'vamitra. It is indeed so that the daughters of a royal family personally choose a suitable husband.'

The king well aware of what would befit the time and place, said yes and then married according to the rules of dharma with Shakuntala in the gandharva way [of mutual consent]. Unerring in his virility the saintly king deposited his semen in the queen and turned back to his residence in the morning. In due course of time she then gave birth to a son. Kanva Muni executed in the forest the prescribed ceremonies for the child. The boy later on became known for having captured with great force a lion and having played with it. [His mother Shakuntala,] the best of women, took him who as a partial expansion of the Lord was of an insurmountable strength, with her to her husband [Dushmanta]. When the king did not accept them as his wife and son, while they had done nothing wrong, for everyone to hear there was a loud sound from the sky. An incorporeal voice declared: 'The mother is like a bellows to the son of the father who begot him. He therefore belongs to the father. Just take care of your son, oh Dushmanta and do not offend Shakuntala! Oh King, the son saves him who discharged the semen from the punishment of Yamaraja [death]. Shakuntala who said that you are the one who fathered the child has spoken the truth.'

After his father had passed away, the son became an emperor of great fame and glory who was celebrated as a partial representation of the Lord on earth. He carried the mark of the cakra on his right hand and the mark of the lotus whorl on the soles of his feet. Because he was of worship with a grand ritualistic ceremony he received the position as the lord and master over the entire world. He used fifty-five horses for performing sacrifices from the mouth of the Ganges up to its source. For that purpose he appointed the son of Mamata as the priest. In the same way he proceeded at the bank of the Yamuna where he bound [the as'vamedha plate of honour to] seventy-eight horses of sacrifice. He who was called Bharata, the son of Dushmanta, established his fire of sacrifice in the best possible way, gave away a fortune in charity and divided a badva [13,084] cows among the brahmins present. The son of Dushmanta who astonished all the kings by bringing together for these yajnas three-thousand three-hundred horses, [thus] surpassed the opulence of the demigods and gained [the favor of] the spiritual master [the Lord]. During the sacrifice at Mashnara he in charity donated fourteen lakhs of fine black elephants with the whitest tusks, that were covered with golden ornaments. Just as one cannot seize the heavenly worlds by the strength of one's arms, it is impossible for any ruler in the past or the future to parallel the exalted activities of Bharata. When he conquered the directions he killed all the barbarian rulers who opposed the brahminical culture like the Kiratas [Africans], the Hunan [the Huns], the Yavanas [the Greek] the Paundras [the wild men of south Bihar and Bengal], the Kankas [the Scandinavians?], the Khas'as [the Mongolians] and the Shakas [the Tartars]. In the past, when the Asuras had conquered the demigods and they returned to the lower worlds [Rasatala], all the wives and daughters of the godly ones had been transported to the nether worlds, but he brought all of them and their associates back to their original places. Sending his troops and circulating his instructions in all directions, for twenty-seven thousand years heaven and earth provided whatever his subjects desired. He the emperor, the ruler over all rulers and places, who was impeccable with the achievements of his power, the realm and the order of state, [in the end considered] all of his life false and thus he ceased to enjoy them. He, oh master of man, had three wives, daughters of Vidarbha who were most pleasing and suitable. But afraid that they would be rejected by him because their sons were not as perfect as their father, they killed them. Thus being frustrated in generating offspring he performed a marutoma sacrifice to beget sons. The Maruts thereupon presented him Bharadvaja.

Brihaspati [the scholar and priest of the demigods who was his father, in the past] felt attracted to his brother's pregnant wife and wanted to make love to her, but when the son in the womb forbade him to engage that way he cursed him and discharged his semen anyway. For Mamata [the mother], who out of fear to be abandoned by her husband [Utathya] wanted to get rid of the child, was at its name-giving ceremony the following verse pronounced by the God-conscious ones: 'Oh foolish woman, take care of this child that has two fathers.' [She thereupon said:] 'Oh Brihaspati, maintain it yourself although it has another father!' With both the parents having turned away from the child by saying these words, the child was consequently called Bharadvaja [a burden for both]. Even though she by the God-conscious ones was encouraged to maintain the child, the mother still rejected it, for she thought that in the light of what had happened, it had no purpose in life. It was maintained by the Maruts who gave it [to Bharata] when the dynasty was unfulfilled.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 21:

The Dynasty of Bharata: the Story of Rantideva

The son of Vyasadeva said: 'From Manyu, the son of Vitatha [the name Bharadvaja carried because he was given to Bharata], there were the sons Brihatkshatra, Jaya, Mahavirya, Nara and Garga. Nara had a son called Sankriti. From Sankriti there were Guru and Rantideva, oh scion of Pandu. The glories of Rantideva are sung in this world and the next. - Subsisting on that what fate provided he [Rantideva] took pleasure in distributing to others whatever grain of food he had. Being very poor he with all his family members lived most soberly and had to suffer a lot. One morning when forty-eight days had passed and he even was deprived of drinking water, he happened to receive water and different foodstuffs prepared with ghee and milk. While the family was shaky because of the thirst and hunger they suffered, that very moment a brahmin guest arrived who also liked to eat. Rantideva conceived of the Lord as residing in each and everyone [see B.G. 5: 18] and thus he with great respect and faith gave him his share of the food. After the brahmin had eaten he departed. When he had divided the food for the family and was just about to eat, someone else arrived, a Shudra, whom he, thinking of the Lord, gave the food that was reserved for him, the king. After the Shudra had left yet another guest arrived who was surrounded by dogs. He said: 'Oh King, please provide me and my hungry dogs with food!'

He, the one in power, honoured them with his obeisances and with great respect gave all the food that was left over to the dogs and their master. Of the food only the drinking water remained and that too had to satisfy some outcaste who, arriving there when the king was about to drink, asked him: 'I am just lowborn, but please give me some water!'

Hearing the pitiable words of the exhausted man he, being deeply moved, compassionately spoke the following nectarean words: 'I do not desire to attain the greatness of the eight perfections of the Supreme Lord [siddhis] or the cessation of repeated births. I accept all hardship in my staying among all the embodied living beings so that they are freed from their unhappiness. Handing over my water to save this poor soul struggling for his life, I am freed from all the hunger, thirst, fatigue and shaking of my body, as also from all the poverty, distress, lamentation, depression and bewilderment!' Thus expressing himself that sober, kindhearted ruler gave the drinking water to the outcaste, even though he himself was on the verge of death because of his thirst. Then the controllers of the three worlds, the gods who grant those who desire the fruits all results, manifested themselves before him in their true identities because they [in their previous appearances in the form of the brahmin, the man with the dogs, the Shudra and the outcaste] all had been creations of the illusory energy of Vishnu. Being true to them as someone without material aspirations for any benefit or possessions [see B.G. 7: 20], he offered them his obeisances while he concentrated his mind upon Vasudeva, the Supreme Lord as the ultimate goal. Because he who had nothing in mind but being of service focussed his consciousness on the Supreme Controller, oh King, the illusory energy of the [three] material qualities meant nothing more to him than a dream [see also B.G. 7: 14 and 9: 34]. All the ones associated with his lead, all the followers of Rantideva, became first-class [bhakti] yogis fully devoted to Lord Narayana [see also B.G. 6: 47].

From Garga [see verse 1] there was Shini and his son was Gargya from whom despite his kshatriya birth an entire line of brahmins originated. From Mahavirya there was Duritakshaya whose sons were named Trayyaruni, Kavi and Pushkararuni. They all acquired in this line the position of brahmins. Brihatkshatra's son Hasti founded the city of Hastinapura [now Delhi]. Ajamidha, Dvimidha and Purumidha became the sons of Hasti. Ajamidha's descendants were headed by Priyamedha. They were all brahmins. From Ajamidha there was Brihadishu, his son was Brihadhanu, Brihatkaya succeeded him and he fathered a son called Jayadratha. His son was Vis'ada from whom Syenajit was born. Ruciras'va, Dridhananu, Kas'ya and Vatsa were the sons of Syenajit. Ruciras'va's son was Para and from him Prithusena and Nipa were born. Nipa generated hundred sons. He had Brahmadatta with his wife Kritvi, who was the daughter of Shuka [not the one speaking this Bhagavatam]. That son was a yogi who with his wife Sarasvati produced a son called Vishvaksena. By him [Vishvaksena] was according to the instruction of the rishi Jaigishyaya a description of yoga [a so-called tantra] compiled. He begot a son called Udaksena who became the father of Bhallatha. These descendants were called the Brihadishus. Yavinara the son of Dvimidha had a son called Kritiman. He fathered a memorable son called Satyadhriti whose son Dridhanemi was the father of Supars'va. 8-2 Supars'va had Sumati whose son Sannatiman had one called Kriti. He received from Lord Brahma the mystic power and taught six samhitas of Pracyasama verses [from the Sama Veda]. From him Nipa could take his birth who brought Udgrayudha into the world. Udgrayudha's son was called Kshemya and from him next Suvira appeared. Suvira then had the son Ripunjaya. His son was named Bahuratha. Purumidha [the younger brother of Dvimidha] was without a son. Ajamidha had with his wife Nalini the son Nila who in his turn begot Shanti. 1-3 Shanti's son Sus'anti had the son Puruja. Arka was his son and from him Bharmyas'va was born. He had five sons: Mudgala, the eldest one, Yavinara, Brihadvis'va, Kampilla and Sanjaya. He told them: 'My sons, since you all have the competence, please take care of the five states.' They thus received the name the Pancalas [after the five states]. From Mudgala there was a line consisting of brahmins that was known as Maudgalya. Mudgala, Bharmyas'va's son was the father of a non-identical twin, one male and one female. The boy was called Divodasa and the girl was named Ahalya. Shatananda was born from her marriage with Gautama [these are names that are also mentioned in the Ramayana]. From him there was a son called Satyadhriti, who was an expert in archery. Sharadvan, who was his son, gave life to a male and female child. Simply by seeing Urvasi his semen had fallen on a clump of Shara grass. The children were a great blessing. During a hunt wandering around king Shantanu saw the twin. Out of compassion he then took them home. The boy he called Kripa and the girl Kripa. She later became Dronacarya's wife.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 22:

The Descendants of Ajamidha: the Pandavas and Kauravas

Shri Shuka said: 'Mitrayu was born from Divodasa and his sons, oh protector of man, were Cyavana, Sudasa, Sahadeva and Somaka. Somaka next was the father of Jantu. From him there were a hundred sons and Prishata was the youngest of them. Prishata begot Drupada who was opulent in every way. Draupadi [the wife of the Pandavas] was fathered by Drupada. His sons were headed by Dhrishthadyumna who begot Dhrishthaketu. All these descendants of Bharmyas'va are known as the Pancalas.

- Riksha was another son begotten by Ajamidha. He fathered Samvarana who with his wife Tapati, the daughter of the sun god, gave birth to Kuru [see family-tree], the king of Kurukshetra. Parikshi, Sudhanu, Jahnu and Nishadha were the sons of Kuru. Sudhanu fathered Suhotra and he begot [another] Cyavana. Kriti was born from his loins. Uparicara Vasu was born because of Kriti. His sons who were headed by Brihadratha were Kus'amba, Matsya, Pratyagra, Cediya and others. They all ruled the state of Cedi. Brihadratha gave life to Kus'agra who begot Rishabha. He in his turn fathered Satyahita who had a son called Pushpavan whose son was Jahu. Brihadratha begot with a second wife he had a son in two halves who, because the mother rejected them, by Jara [the daughter of Time, see also 4.27: 19] playfully were united while she said: 'Come alive, come alive'. Thus a son called Jarasandha [Jara's hermaphrodite] was born [who later became a vital enemy of Lord Krishna]. He [Jarasandha] gave life to Sahadeva whose son Somapi fathered Shrutas'rava. Parikshi [another son of Kuru] had no children while Jahnu begot a son named Suratha. From him there was Viduratha who brought Sarvaubana into the world. He had Jayasena and his son Radhika gave life to Ayutayu. Ayutayu became the father of Akrodhana who had a son named Devatithi. He brought Riksha into the world who had a son called Dilipa and because of him the son Pratapa appeared. 2-1 From him the sons Devapi, Shantanu and Bahlika appeared. It was Devapi the eldest one, who rejected his father's realm and left for the forest so that Shantanu became the king. He in a previous life had been the celebrated Mahabhishta. Whomever was touched by him with his hands attained youth, however old that person would be. 4-1 Because one primarily by the touch of his hands was purified, he was known as Shantanu. When Indra, the king of heaven, for twelve years had not showered any rain in his kingdom, his brahmins told him: 'You are at fault for preceding your older brother [Devapi] in enjoying the kingdom [and are thus a so-called parivetta]. For the full development of your homestead and kingdom, immediately return the realm to him.'

Thus being advised by the brahmins he asked Devapi to take charge of the kingdom, but from what he replied became clear that he had given up on the Vedas. That had happened because the brahmins in the past, on the instigation of Shantanu's minister, had prompted him with words that went against the Vedic instructions. When that was said [and Shantanu finally accepted the realm] the demigod showered the rains. Devapi thereupon sought his refuge in the village of Kalapa where he took up the practice of yoga [in which he is still engaged today]. 8-1 After the Soma dynasty in Kali Yuga has disappeared, it will [by him] at the beginning of the next one, Satya Yuga, be reestablished. Bahlika [Santanu's brother] begot Somadatta and from him there were Bhuri, Bhuris'rava and Shala. Shantanu begot in his wife Ganga the self-realised great devotee and scholar Bhishma [see also 1.9], who is the best defender of the dharma. By him, the foremost of all warriors, even Parashurama - to his own satisfaction - was defeated in a fight [8*]. From the womb of [Satyavati] the daughter of Dasa [a fisherman ] Shantanu brought about the son Citrangada. 1-2 Citrangada was killed by a Gandharva carrying the same name. Vicitravirya was a younger brother of Citrangada. The sage Paras'ara gave with his mother [Satyavati, previous to her marriage to Shantanu] life to a direct expansion of the Lord, a great muni who protected the Vedas: Krishna Dvaipayana Vyasadeva [also called Badarayana], from whom I [Shukadeva] was born. With him I studied this [Bhagavatam] thoroughly. He, the [partial] incarnation of the Lord, rejected his pupils Paila and others. But me, his son who was far removed from sense gratification, he taught this supreme literature of confidential knowledge. Vicitravirya later on married the two daughters of Kas'iraja called Ambika and Ambalika who by force were brought from the arena of selection. But because he was too attached in his heart to the both of them he died of an infection with tuberculosis. With no offspring from the half-brother, Vyasadeva was instructed by [in devarena sutotpatti, see footnote 9.6] his mother [Satyavati] to father sons: Dhritarashtra, Pandu [with respectively Ambika and Ambalika] and also a son named Vidura [whom he begot with Vicitravirya's maidservant, see also 1: 13]. From Gandhari the wife of Dhritarashtra a hundred sons were born, oh protector of man. Duryodhana was the eldest. There was also a daughter called Duhs'ala.

Pandu had to restrain his sexual life because of a curse, and therefore the great [Pandava] heroes, the three sons [Bhima, Arjuna] headed by Yudhisht'hira were begotten with [his wife] Kunti by Dharma [the god of piety], Anila [the god of the wind] and Indra [not mentioning Karna who was brought forth by the sun god]. Nakula and Sahadeva were begotten by the two As'vins [Nasatya and Dasra] in the womb of Madri. From these five brothers [with Draupadi] five sons were born: your uncles. Yudhisht'hira had the son Prativindhya, Bhima had Shrutasena, from Arjuna came Shrutakirti and from Nakula Shatanika appeared. 0-3 Sahadeva, oh King, had Shrutakarma. Yudhisht'hira furthermore had the son Devaka with Pauravi and Bhima had Ghatotkaca with Hidimba and Sarvagata with Kali. Sahadeva fathered the son Suhotra with Vijaya, the daughter of the Himalayan king [Parvati]. Nakula had with Karenumatya a son named Naramitra and Arjuna begot the son Iravan together with Ulupi [a Naga daughter] and the son Babhravahana with the princess of Manipura. Even though he was Arjuna's son Abhravahana was adopted by the father-in-law [because of a condition he set for the marriage].

Your father Abhimanyu was born from Subhadra [Krishna's sister wed to Arjuna]. He was a great hero who defeated all Atirathas [those who can oppose a thousand charioters]. You have taken birth from Uttara because of him. With the annihilation of the Kuru dynasty Ashvatthama also tried to put you to death with the heat of the Brahmastra weapon, but by the mercy of Lord Krishna you were saved from ending that way [see 1.8]. Your sons my best one, with Janamejaya first and then Shrutasena, Bhisasena and Ugrasena, are all greatly powerful. When Janamejaya learns that you have died because of Takshaka, he in great anger will offer all snakes during a fire sacrifice. After having conquered each and every part of the world he will appoint Tura, the son of Kalasha, for his priest and be of sacrifice in as'vamedha offerings for which he will be celebrated as Turugamedhastha [performer of many horse-sacrifices]. Shatanika, his son, will under Yajnavalkya thoroughly study the three Vedas as also the way to put the spiritual knowledge into practice [with ceremonies]. He will realise the military art [from Kripacarya] and with Shaunaka he will arrive at the realisation of the transcendental truth. His son Sahasranika will have one carrying the name As'vamedhaja who will beget Asimakrishna who will have a son called Nemicakra. With Hastinapura flooded by the river [the Ganges], he [Nemicakra] from sheer necessity will live at Kaus'ambi, whereafter from his son called Citraratha there will be the son Shuciratha. From him there will also be a son, Vrishthiman, because of whom next Susheha will take his birth, an emperor. His son Sunitha will have one called Nricakshu and he will father Sukhinala. Pariplava will be his son and from Sunaya succeeding him Medhavi will appear. Nripanjaya will be his son and he will beget Durva from whose loins Timi will take birth. From Timi the son Brihadratha will appear from whose son Sudasa the son Shatanika will be given life. Shatanika will have a son called Durdamana and his son will be Mahinara. 4-4 Dandapani fathered by him, will give life to Nimi because of whom Kshemaka will take birth. With Kshemaka closing the row as the monarch this dynasty will end, this source of brahmins and ksatriyas that is respected by the seers and the godly ones in Kali Yuga. In the future there will be next the kings of Magadha. Let me tell you about them.

Sahadeva [the son of Jarasandha] will beget the son Marjari. Shrutas'rava will be his son, Yutayu will be his successor and his son Niramitra will father Sunakshatra. Sunakshatra will be the father of Brihatsena and his son Karmajit will have the son Sutanjaya from whose loins Vipra will be born who will give life to a son called Shuci. Kshema who is born thereafter will have the son Suvrata from whom Dharmasura will appear. His son Sama will beget Dyumatsena who is succeeded by Sumati from whose loins Subala will take birth. From Sunitha [Subala's son] Satyajit will be brought into the world and from his son Vis'vajit there will be a son called Ripunjaya. The line of Brihadratha in which all these kings are born will last a thousand years.'

(Picture: family tree from Kuru up to the Pandavas)

*: The fight between Parashurama and Bhishmadeva concerns three daughters of Kas'iraja - Ambika, Ambalika and Amba - who were forcibly abducted by Bhishmadeva on behalf of his brother Vicitravirya. Amba thought that Bhishmadeva would marry her and became attached to him, but Bhishmadeva refused to marry her for he had taken the vow of brahmacharya. Amba therefore approached Bhishmadeva's military spiritual master, Parashurama, who instructed Bhishma to marry her. Bhishmadeva refused and therefore Parashurama fought with him to force him to accept the marriage. But Parashurama was defeated and he was pleased with Bhishma.

 : Satyavati was actually the daughter of Uparicara Vasu from the womb of a fisherman known as Matsyagarbha. Later on Satyavati was raised by a fisherman.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 23:

The Dynasties of the Sons of Yayati: the Appearance of Lord Krishna

Shri Shuka said: 'From Anu [the fourth son of Yayati, see 9.17, 9.18 & 9.19] there were the three sons Sabhanara, Cakshu and Parashnu. From Sabhanara thereafter Kalanara was born and from him followed a son called Srinjaya. From Janamejaya [succeeding him] there was a son Mahas'ala who fathered Mahamana. Us'inara and Titikshu were the two sons of Mahamana. - Shibi, Vara, Krimi and Daksha were the four sons fathered by Us'inara. Vrishadarbha, Sudhira, Madra and the self-realised Kekaya were the four sons who took birth from the loins of Shibi. Titikshu had one called Rushadratha from whom Homa was born who begot Sutapa. Bali was Sutapa's son. Anga, Vanga, Kalinga, Suhma, Pundra and Odra were known as the sons who were born from the seed of Dirghatama impregnating the wife of the great conqueror Bali. It were their names that were given to the six states they created in the east [of India]. Anga gave life to Khalapana and from him thereafter Diviratha appeared. -1 From his son Dharmaratha, Citraratha was born who was celebrated as Romapada. Romapada had no children and thus his friend Das'aratha offered him Shanta, his own daughter [for adoption]. She then married with Rishyas'ringa [a hermit who lived in the forest, see also 8.13: 15-16]. Because the god [Indra] did not shower any rains Rishyas'ringa with the help of dancing and singing courtesans was drawn with music and bewildered with embraces and worship. On behalf of King Das'aratha who had no sons, he [Rishyas'ringa] held a maratun [son giving] sacrifice so that he would get children [as well as the rain, see B.G. 3: 14]. He who was without sons thus got offspring [four sons]. Romapada got the son Caturanga who gave life to Prithulaksha. Brihadratha, Brihatkarma and Brihadbhanu were his sons. From the eldest one [Brihadratha] Brihanmana appeared from whom there was a son named Jayadratha. His son Vijaya was born from the womb of Sambhuti. He next had the son Dhriti and from him Dhritavrata took his birth. Dhritavrata fathered Satkarma who gave life to the son Adhiratha. One day enjoying at the bank of the Ganges Adhiratha found a baby in a basket. It was abandoned by Kunti because it was born before she was married. Being sonless he adopted it as his son [Karna]. Oh master of the universe, Vrishasena was Karna's son. From Druhyu [Yayati's third son] there was a son called Babhru who next begot Setu. Arabdha who was fathered by him, had the son Gandhara who begot Dharma. He in his turn had the son Dhriti and from Dhriti there was the son Durmada who gave life to the son Praceta who had a hundred sons. Those kings [called the Pracetas] accepted the jurisdiction over the north, the uncivilised areas of Mecchades'aja [of the barbarians]. Turvasu [Yayati's second son] had the son Vahni and he fathered Bharga who begot the son Bhanuman. His son Tribhanu, also had one. He was the magnanimous Karandhama. His son was called Maruta. He had no sons and adopted a Paurava [Dushmanta, see also 9.20: 7] as his son. 8-1 Dushmanta turned back to his clan [the Purus] because he aspired the throne.

From Yayati's first son Yadu there was a dynasty, oh best of the humans, that I will now describe to you. Oh ruler of man, to hear about the Yadu dynasty is something highly pious that vanquishes all sin[-ful reactions] in human society. Anyone simply hearing this is freed from all [the consequences of his] sin. 0-2 The Supreme Lord [Krishna], the Supersoul, descended in this dynasty looking just like a human being [see also 1.2: 11]. Yadu fathered four sons who carried the names Sahasrajit, Kroshta, Nala and Ripu. Shatajit, the one first born, begot the sons Mahahaya, Renuhaya and Haihaya. Dharma was the son of Haihaya and his son Netra was the father of Kunti [not Kunti]. Sohanji was the son of Kunti and he begot Mahishman who had the son Bhadrasenaka. Durmada and Dhanaka were the sons begotten by Bhadrasena and Dhanaka gave life to the sons Kritavirya, Kritagni, Kritavarma and Kritauja. From Kritavirya there was Arjuna [Kartaviryarjuna] who became emperor over the seven continents. From Lord Dattatreya, an [ams'a-] incarnation of the Supreme Personality, he obtained all the great qualities [the eight siddhis] of yoga [see also 9.15, 10.73 & 12.3]. No one on earth could equal Kartavirya's qualities of sacrifice, charity, austerity, mystic potency, education, strength and mercy. [Under his rule] for eighty-five thousand years the six forms of pleasure [as derived from the senses and the mind] were enjoyed with an undiminished strength, continuous opulence and unending memory. In the fight [against Parashurama] only five of his thousands of sons remained alive: Jayadhvaja, Shurasena, Vrishabha, Madhu and Urjita. Jayadhvaja begot the son Talajangha who next gave life to a hundred sons. They formed a clan of ksatriyas known as the Talajanghas who were destroyed by the great power [that Maharaja Sagara] received from sage Auruva [see 9.8: 3-7]. Talajangha's eldest son Vitihotra, fathered the son Madhu who [also] had a hundred sons. From the well-known eldest one called Vrishni there was the dynasty [carrying that name].

Oh King, the Yadava, Madhava and Vrishni dynasties [of Lord Krishna's ancestors] received their names from their leading personalities. Yadu's son Kroshta begot a son called Vrijinavan. His son was Svahita who next gave life to the son Vishadgu who became the father of Citraratha. Citraratha gave life to Shas'abindu, a great yogi who became a highly fortunate personality who, undefeated as an emperor, enjoyed all the fourteen kinds of great riches [8*]. Shas'abindu had ten thousand wives and in them the greatly famous one begot ten thousand lakhs [8] of sons [and grandsons]. From them we but know six as the foremost. Prithus'rava [one of them] had a son with the name Dharma. Ushana, his son, performed a hundred as'vamedha sacrifices. Ushana's son Rucaka had five sons named Purujit, Rukma, Rukmeshu, Prithu and Jyamagha. Please hear now about them. 5-3 Jyamagha was issueless but he nevertheless was afraid to accept another wife because of his wife Shaiba. He [one day] took a sensual girl from the camp of an enemy clan home whereupon Shaiba, who saw the girl sitting on her seat on the chariot, very angrily said to her husband: 'Who is this you have allowed to sit upon my seat on the chariot, you cheater?'

'She's your daughter-in-law' he then told her. Thereupon she with a smile said to her husband:

'I am sterile and have no co-wife, how can she then be my daughter-in-law?'

'My Queen' [he replied,] 'This girl will be very suitable for the son you will give birth to!'

With the demigods and ancestors consenting to that [after being propitiated by Jyamagha], Shaiba got pregnant and in due course of time gave birth to a son. That son was the auspicious, well-known Vidharba who later married with the virtuous girl that was accepted as the daughter-in-law.'

*: In the Markandeya Purana the fourteen kinds of great jewels of an emperor are described as follows: an elephant, a horse, a chariot, a wife, arrows, a reservoir of wealth, a garland, valuable costumes, trees, a spear, a noose, jewels, an umbrella, and regulative principles.

 : One lakh is one hundred thousand.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 24:

The Yadu and Vrishni Dynasties, Pritha and the Glory of Lord Krishna

Shri Shuka said: 'Vidarbha [the son of the Yadu Jyamagha] begot in her [the girl brought by his father, see 9.23: 35-38] the two sons Kus'a and Kratha and a third one called Romapada [also, see 9.23: 7-10] who was the favorite of the Vidarbha dynasty. Romapada's son was Babhru, he gave life to Kriti who begot Us'ika who had the son Cedi [see also 9.22: 6] from whom Damaghosha [the father of Shishupala] and other protectors of man were born. - From Kratha, there was a son born called Kunti who begot Vrishni from whom next Nirvriti took his birth. From his loins the one named Das'arha was born. He fathered a son called Vyoma who begot Jimuta. Jimuta had the son Vikriti who had a son called Bhamaratha and his son Navaratha had the son Das'aratha. [Das'aratha's son] Shakuni fathered Karambhi who begot a son called Devarata. His son was Devakshatra and from him there was Madhu who had the son Kuruvasa who gave life to Anu. - From Puruhotra, the son of Anu, there was Ayu. Ayu fathered the son Satvata and he had seven sons called Bhajamana, Bhaji, Divya, Vrishni, Devavridha, Andhaka and Mahabhoja, oh worthy friend. From Bhajamana there were with one wife the sons Nimloci, Kinkana and Dhrishthi and with another wife there were also three sons: Shatajit, Sahasrajit and Ayutajit, oh master. From Devavridha there was the son Babhru and about the two of them two verses are recited by the elder generation. 'We heard from others and also saw with our own eyes the following: 0-1 Babhru was the best among the human beings and Devavridha equalled the demigods.' and 'Because of Babhru and Devavridha all the fourteen thousand sixty-five persons [who appeared after them] have achieved immortality.' In the dynasty of Mahabhoja who was a most pious soul, there were the rulers called the Bhoja kings.

From Vrishni [the son of Satvata] the sons Sumitra and Yudhajit appeared oh subduer of the enemies. Shini and Anamitra then took birth [from Yudhajit] and from Anamitra the son Nighna appeared. Nighna fathered the sons Satrajit and Prasena. Anamitra had another son who was also called Shini and Satyaka was his son. Yuuyudhana was fathered by Satyaka. His son was Jaya and from him there was Kuni whose son was Yugandhara. Another son of Anamitra was Vrishni. Shvaphalka and Citraratha were the sons of Vrishni. Akrura was by Shvaphalka begotten in Gandini. He was the eldest of twelve other most celebrated sons: 6-1 Asanga, Sarameya, Mridura, Mriduvit, Giri, Dharmavridha, Sukarma, Kshetropeksha, Arimardana; Shatrughna, Gandhamada and Pratiabahu. Next to these twelve sons there was also a daughter called Sucara. From Akrura there were two sons named Devavan and Upadeva. Citraratha had many sons beginning with Prithu and Viduratha, who are known as the sons of Vrishni.

Kukura, Bhajamana, Shuci and Kambalarbhisha [were the sons of Andhaka, see 6-8]. Kukura had a son called Vahni from whom Viloma was born. His son Kapotaroma had the son Anu who had a friend called Tumburu [a famous Gandharva, a musician]. From Andhaka [Anu's son] there was Dundubhi who gave life to Avidyota who fathered a son called Punarvasu. 1-2 From him there were Ahuka and Ahuki, a son and a daughter. From Ahuka there were the sons Devaka and Ugrasena. Devaka had four sons: Devavan, Upadeva, Sudeva and Devavardhana. There were also seven daughters, oh protector of man: Shantideva, Upadeva, Shrideva, Devarakshita, Sahadeva, Devaki and Dhratideva who was the eldest. Vasudeva [Krishna's father] married them. Kamsa, Sunama, Nyagrodha, Kanka, Shanku, Suhu, Rashthrapala, Dhrishthi and Tushtiman were the sons of Ugrasena. Ugrasena's daughters Kamsa, Kamsavati, Kanka, Shurabhu and Rashthrapalika became the wives of the younger brothers of Vasudeva.

Viduratha [the son of Citraratha] begot Shura who had a son called Bhajamana from whose loins Shini was born. Shini fathered the son called Bhoja and his son is also known as Hridika. His sons were called Devamidha, Shatadhanu and Kritavarman. From Devamidha there was [another son called] Shura who had a wife named Marisha. 8-3 With her he begot ten perfect sons: Vasudeva, Devabhaga, Deva'srava, Anaka, Srinjaya, Shyamaka, Kanka, Shamika, Vatsaka and Vrika. When Vasudeva took his birth he was welcomed by the godly ones with the sounds of kettledrums. He is also called Anakadundubhi [*kettle drum beaten] because he provided the Lord's [Lord Krishna, Vasudeva] place of birth. Shura's daughters Pritha [the mother of Arjuna who was Krishna's nephew and friend] Shrutadeva, Shrutakirti, Shrutasa'rava and Rajadhidevi were Vasudeva's five sisters. Father Shura gave Pritha to a childless friend called Kunti. [Therefore she is also known as Kunti].

She received from Durvasa, whom she had pleased, the knowledge to call for any demigod. Just to examine that potency she, the pious one, summoned the sun god. When she saw the godhead appearing before her, she was very surprised and said: 'Forgive me oh godhead, please return, I only engaged this way to check out what it would do!'

[The sun god answered:] 'In order not to be fruitless in your encounter with a godhead, I shall give you a son in your womb and arrange it so, oh my beauty, that you will not be defiled.'

With this promise the sun god made her pregnant and returned to his heavenly abode. Directly thereafter a child was born that looked like a second sun god. Afraid of what the people might think she greatly sorry gave up that child [Karna: 'into the ear'] by letting it go in the water of the river [in a basket, see also 9.23: 13]. Pandu, your pious and chivalrous great-grandfather, was the one who [later on] married her.

From the marriage of Shrutadeva [Kunti's sister] with Vridhdha'sarma, the king of Karusha, the son Dantavakra was born. Dantavakra was [the incarnation of the] one who became a son of Diti [called Hiranyaksha], after having been cursed by the sages [by the Kumaras, see Jaya and Vijaya]. Dhrishthaketu, the king of Kekaya, married [Kunti's sister] Shrutakirti with whom he had five sons of whom Santardana was the eldest. Rajadhivevi married Jayasena and gave birth to two sons [named Vinda and Anuvinda]. Shrutasa'rava married Damaghosha, the king of Cedi. Shishupala was her son. His birth I already described to you [7.1: 46; 7.10: 38]. Devabhaga [one of Vasudeva's brothers] had with the wife Kamsa [the sons] Citraketu and Brihadbala. Deva'srava fathered with Kamsavati the sons Suvira and Ishuman. Kanka together with his wife Kanka gave life to the sons Baka, Satyajit and Purujit. Srinjaya had together with Rashthrapalika sons of whom Vrisha and Durmarshana were the eldest. Shyamaka gave together with Shurabhumi life to the sons Harikes'a and Hiranyaksha. Vatsaka fathered Vrika and other sons together with his wife Mis'rakes'i, a girl of heaven. Vrika with his wife Durvakshi had sons that were headed by Taksha, Pushkara and Shala. Shamika together with Sudamani gave life to sons who were headed by Sumitra and Arjunapala. Anaka together with his wife Karnika brought two sons into the world who were called Ritadhama and Jaya.

The wives of Anakadundubhi [Vasudeva, see also 21-23] were first of all Devaki and then Pauravi, Rohini, Bhadra, Madira, Rocana and Ila. The sons who were begotten by Vasudeva in Rohini were Krita, the eldest son and Bala, Gada, Sarana, Durmada, Vipula, Dhruva and others. 7-4 Bhuta the eldest son, Subhadra, Bhadrabahu, Durmada and Bhadra belonged to the twelve sons Pauravi gave birth to. Nanda, Upananda, Kritaka, Shura and others were the sons of Madira, while Kaus'alya [Bhadra] gave birth to only one son named Kes'i. Vasudeva begot in Rocana the sons Hasta, Hemangada and others. In Ila he begot the sons with Uruvalka as the eldest one who were the leading personalities of the Yadu dynasty. Anakadundubhi begot in Dhratideva one son: Viprishttha, while Pras'ama, Prasita and others were the sons he had with Shantideva, oh King. With Upadeva there were ten sons headed by Rajanya, Kalpa and Varsha. Vasu, Hamsa and Suvams'a and others were the six sons [Vasudeva had] with Shrideva. With his wife Devarakshita he also gave life to nine sons of whom Gada was the first one. With Sahadeva Vasudeva fathered eight sons. 3-5 These sons headed by Shruta and Pravara [or Pauvara], were of the same dharma as the Vasus [they were their incarnations]. Vasudeva begot in Devaki eight highly qualified sons: Kirtiman, Sushena, Bhadrasena, Riju, Samardana, Bhadra and [Bhagavan] Sankarshana, the serpent controller [the ruler of the ego, see 3.26: 25]. The eighth one to appear from them was the Lord in person [Lord Krishna]. Subhadra [His sister], as you know, is your so greatly fortunate grandmother, oh King.

Whenever and wherever there is a decline in dharma and an increase of sinful activities, then, at that time, the Supreme Lord, the Supreme Master Hari, will manifest Himself [see B.G. 4: 7]. The Lord's compassion with the fallen souls is the only reason for Him to take birth and engage in action, oh great leader. He is the Original Master in the Beyond, the Witness who is the Supreme Self [see also B.G. 8: 4]. He mercifully endeavors to put an end to the deluding influence of material existence, to the maya of the [repeated] birth, maintenance and death of the living entities, so that they can attain their true self [so that they can return home, back to Godhead, see B.G. 15: 7 and 13: 20-24]. He strives to remove all the great military forces from this world by making the demonic rulers who call themselves kings march against each other [see also 1.11: 35, 3.3 and 7.9: 43]. The activities that the Supreme Lord, the killer of Madhu, performed together with Sankarshana [Balarama], are beyond the comprehension of even the minds of the greatest controllers of enlightenment [Brahma and Shiva]. He displayed His pious activities just to show the devotees His mercy and dispel the darkness of the misery and lamentation of those who are born in this age of Kali. He whose ears are only once gladdened by the truth of hearing with folded hands about His glories - that are the best of all the holy places - , is liberated from his strong desire for karmic activities. 3-6 He who always endeavored with the assistance of the praiseworthy Kurus, Srinjayas, Pandavas, Bhojas, Vrishnis, Andhakas, Madhus, Shurasenas and Das'arhas, pleased human society with His affectionate smiles, His instructions, His magnanimous, heroic pastimes and His personal form that is so attractive in every respect. All men and women [of Vrindavana] who could never get enough of the sight of His face and forehead that are so brilliantly decorated with the shark-shaped earrings in His beautiful ears, they who imbibed His smiles of enjoyment that are a never ending festival to the eye, all got angry with their own eyes when they but blinked [see also B.G. 7: 3]! After taking birth He left His father's house and brought prosperity to Vraja [and Vrindavana]. He killed many demons there. He accepted thousands of fine women as His wives and fathered hundreds of sons. He, the Supreme Personality, was of worship with many sacrificial ceremonies and expanded with that respect for the Vedic rituals His glory among the people [the householders, see also B.G. 4: 8]. On the battlefield [of Kurukshetra] He put an end to the great burden on this earth of Kuru personalities by arranging a quarrel among them. Under His supervision all the profit-minded rulers were destroyed to the occasion of which He declared [to Arjuna] what in life would be the victory of conquering [of being devoted, see Gita]. Finally, after giving transcendental instructions to Uddhava [see 3.2, 3.4: 29, eleventh BOOK], He returned to His heavenly abode.'

BOOK 10: SUMMUM BONUM

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 1:

The Advent of Lord Krishna: Introduction

The honourable king said: 'Your Lordship extensively described both the dynasties of the kings of the sun god and the moon god as also the most wonderful deeds of their members [*]. Please describe to us the heroic acts of Lord Vishnu who [together with His plenary expansion Sankarshana in the form of Baladeva] appeared as an incarnation in [two] different parts in the line of the most dharmic and virtuous Yadus whom you also described to us oh best of the munis. Be so kind to tell us all about the actions of the Supreme Lord, the Soul of the Universe, the Cause of the Manifestation, after He descended in the Yadu dynasty. [By the disciplic succession or the parampara] listening to the pleasing vibrations of the glorification of the Lord Praised in the Verses, constitutes the proper medicine for the mind to be released from the material disease of its desires. Unless he is a killer of animals, a person by listening to and voicing such descriptions can become free [from the falsehood. See also B.G. 2: 44]. - My grandfathers [the Pandavas] in the past, when they on the battlefield were fighting with imperishable warriors like Devavrata [Bhishma] and other great commanders who were like timingilas [shark-eaters], crossed in the boat that He is as easily the so very difficult to overcome ocean of Kaurava soldiers as one steps over a calf's hoof print. This body of mine, the only seed left of the Kurus and Pandavas, was scorched by Ashvathama's weapon when I resided in the womb of my mother, but was by Him holding the cakra in His hand protected because she sought His protection [1.8: 11 and 1.12: 7]. Oh man of learning, please describe the glories of the Lord who by His own potency appeared as a normal human being, of the Giver of Death and Eternal Life so one says, He who is manifesting in physical forms bound to Time, of Him the Original Person who is present both inside and outside of all the embodied beings. We know from you about Balarama, who is Sankarshana, that He is the son of Rohini. How could He without assuming another body be connected with the womb of Devaki? Why did Mukunda, the Supreme Lord move from the house of His father to [the house of Nanda in] Vraja and where did He, the Master of the devotees, live with His relatives? What did He do when He lived in Vraja and when He resided in the city of Mathura? Why did He, the killer of Kes'i, kill His uncle Kamsa, His mother's brother? Was that not something contrary to the scriptures? For how many years did He who assumed a human body, live with the Vrishnis and how long did He live in the city of the Yadus [Dvaraka]? How many wives did the Master have? Oh sage, you know everything. You are the one to tell us about Lord Krishna's activities. Please describe this all in detail to me so full of faith and surrender, and everything there is more to say. Now that I drink the nectar of the talks about the Lord that emanate from your lotus mouth, it is not even difficult to bear the hunger [of my fasting] or my forsaking of water.'

Suta [see 1.1] said: 'Oh son of Bhrigu [Shaunaka], after the mighty son of Vyas, the purest of all devotees, had heard his pious questions, the devotee of Vishnu paid his respects and began to describe the topics of Krishna that put an end to the darkness of Kali-yuga [compare 1.7: 2-8]. Shri Shuka said: 'Oh best of the wise kings, because of your lasting attraction for the stories about Vasudeva [Krishna as the son of Vasudeva], your intelligence has developed a firm determination. The way the world is purified by the [Ganges] water that flows from His toes [5.17: 1], the three persons of the speaker, the inquirer and the one attending are purified by questions concerning the stories about Vasudeva. When mother earth was overcome by an unbearable burden of countless numbers of conceited Daitya military forces [9.24: 67] and their so-called nobles, she [one day] went to Lord Brahma to take shelter. Assuming the form of a cow she greatly distressed weeping piteously appeared before the Almighty One [see also 1.16: 18] and submitted her complaints. Lord Brahma with understanding for her predicament thereupon together with her, the godly ones and the Three-Eyed One [Lord Shiva] approached the shore of the milk ocean [wherein Vishnu resides, see also 8.7: 41]. Reaching there they fully attentive with the help of the [Purusha-sukta] hymns worshiped the Original Person, the Supreme Personality, the God of Gods and Master of the Universe who takes care of all.

The lord of the Veda [Brahma] heard in his trance a vibration of words in the sky [see also 1.1: 1]. He said to the servants of the three worlds, the demigods: 'Hear further from me about the order of the Original Person, oh immortal souls. Execute these instructions immediately, do not delay. Before we came here the Personality of Godhead knew already about the distress of mother earth. He will expand Himself in the family of the Yadus by means of your good selves taking birth as His parts. Thus you should live on earth for as long as He, the Lord of Lords, needs to diminish the burden of the planet through His own potency of Time. The Supreme Lord, the original transcendental person, will personally appear in the house of Vasudeva and also wants all the wives of the demigods to take birth to please Him. Before Lord Vasudeva appears first the part of Hari known as the fully independent Ananta with the thousands of hoods [Sankarshana, see also 5.25] will appear [as Baladeva] with the desire to please [Him]. By the Master being ordered to appear and to manage His affairs [the grace of Vishnu known as the female incarnation of His potency called] Vishnu-maya will also appear together with all her different potencies, she who is as good as the Supreme Lord Himself and who captivates all the worlds [see also B.G. 9: 12 & 13].'

Shri Shuka said: 'After thus having pacified mother earth with sweet words and having informed the immortals, the supreme master of the founding fathers returned to his supreme abode. In the past Shurasena the king of the Yadus [see 9.23: 27] lived in the city of Mathura from where he ruled the different districts Mathura and Shurasena. Mathura, the city intimately connected to the Supreme Lord Hari, from that time on was the capital for all the kings of Yadu [see also the bhajan Savarana Shri Gaura Mahima]. It was in that place that one day the divine character of Vasudeva, after having married Devaki, together with his bride mounted a chariot to return home. Kamsa, the son of Ugrasena held, in order to please his sister for the occasion, the reins of the horses in the midst of thousands of golden chariots. 1-3 When she left home king Devaka, who was fond of his daughter, had given a dowry of four hundred elephants with golden garlands, ten thousand horses together with eighteen hundred chariots and a hundred young and attractive maidservants complete with jewelry. My dearest King, when they departed conch shells, bugles, drums and kettledrums vibrated in concert to wish the bride and bridegroom all the best. Being on their way, a voice from beyond addressed Kamsa who held the reins: 'The eighth child of this girl you are carrying with you, oh fool, will put an end to your life!'

Thus being addressed he, who mischievous and sinful in the past had degraded the Bhoja family, took up a sword against his sister and grabbed her by her hair with the intention to kill her. In order to pacify him who was ready to commit such a heinous and shameless crime, Vasudeva, that greatly fortunate soul addressed him. Shri Vasudeva said: 'A man of so many praiseworthy qualities, such a brilliant star among the heroic Bhojas like you, how can you kill your own sister, a woman, especially at the time of her marriage [see also 1.7: 53-54]? Death is included with the body that was born. Whether one dies today or in a hundred years, ultimately every living being is sure to die [see also B.G. 2: 27-28]. When the body has to return to the five elements the indweller automatically according to his own karma receives a new body upon abandoning the old one. The way a person as he walks changes from one foot to the other and the way a caterpillar on a plant [moves from one leaf to another], a living being likewise has to experience the consequences of his karma [see also B.G. 2: 22 and 2: 13]. Just as one in a dream, being endowed with the qualities of a material body, is subjected to that what the mind is thinking and one's consciousness is fully absorbed by that what one hears and sees, one is the same way forgetful in one's present body [about the body and karma acquired in a previous life, see also 4.29: 60-79 and 5.26]. The mind, impelled by fate and deliberation moves from one position to the next so that the embodied soul, after the demise of its physical frame, obtains a birth and arrives at a [new] body in accordance with the material quality [and the evolution] he was experiencing [B.G. 13: 22, 14: 14-15 and 6: 34-35]. The way the reflection of the luminaries, as one may observe them in water or other liquids that are moved by the wind, offers distortions in different shapes, the person, the living entity, likewise in the situation that was created by his own imaginative power in association with the gunas [the world with its changing qualities], gets bewildered depending his attachments [to different bodies or distortions of his form. See also 5.5: 4 and B.G. 9: 12-13, 12:

5]. Therefore everyone to the interest of his own welfare [and good rebirth] should not harm anybody, for the evil-doer has to live in fear for others himself [the 'golden rule']. This innocent woman, your younger sister, completely depends on you like she was your own daughter - do not kill her. She means good to you and she deserves your care and compassion!'

Shri Shuka said: 'He without pity, could by these attempts of good advise not be stopped or pacified oh son of Kuru, for he followed the course of the man-eaters [the Rakshasas]. Seeing his determination Vasudeva thought deeply about how he, with this immediate threat of death, could hold him back and thus he came up with the following alternative. [He thought:] 'An intelligent person should, as long as he is in control of his mental and physical faculties, ward off death, but when someone is faced with the inevitability of death, this rule does not apply. 9-5 If I promise to deliver my sons to this man of doom, I might set my innocent Devaki free. Perhaps I don't get any sons or maybe he will die beforehand. That might happen or the contrary. Who knows what fate has in store for us? That is difficult to say. Even though the threat remains hereafter, I, at least for the moment, may avert her death. When a piece of wood for some reason escapes from a fire, that is decided by providence and nothing else. Even so one cannot determine why a living being assumes or abandons a [particular] body.' After contemplating this way to the best of his ability, the God-fearing man paid the sinner his obeisances and submitted the proposal to him with the greatest attention. With a big lotus-like smile on his face but with anxiety and sorrow in his heart he then spoke to the cruel hearted, shameless man. Shri Vasudeva said: 'You have, according to what the voice from heaven vibrated, nothing to fear from Devaki indeed. Her sons gave rise to your anxiety and I'll deliver them therefore all to you.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Kamsa understanding the essence of what he said was for the time being stopped from killing his sister. With him more at ease, Vasudeva then was happy to come home [unharmed]. Thereafter in due course of time Devaki, the mother of all divinity [see 4.31: 14 and B.G. 10: 2], year after year gave birth to indeed [as said in 9.24: 53-55] eight sons and a daughter. Most afraid to break his promise Anakadundubhi [or Vasudeva, see 9.24: 28-31] with great pain handed his first born baby, Kirtiman, over to Kamsa. What would be too painful for a saint, on what would a sage depend, what would be forbidden to a bad person and what would for someone holding on to the soul be too hard to forsake? Oh King, when Kamsa saw that Vasudeva was equanimous, truthful and certain of himself, he satisfied about that with a grin on his face said: 'You can take this child back, my fear does not concern him, my death was predicted from the eighth pregnancy you have with your wife.'

'Very well' Anakadundubhi said, took his son back and left without attaching too much value to the words of that untruthful character lacking in self-control. 2-6 Oh scion of Bharata, beginning with Nanda [Krishna's foster father] all the inhabitants of Vraja, all the cowherds and their wives as also all the Vrishnis beginning with Vasudeva and Devaki and the Yadu women, in truth were gods from heaven indeed. And also the relatives, friends and well-wishers following Kamsa were of that nature [see also verse 22 and B.G. 6: 41-42]. This was all communicated to Kamsa by the all-powerful Narada [] who paid him a visit in order to tell him that all the Daityas who burdened the earth were going to be killed [see verse 17 and also 9.24: 56]. 5-6 After the rishi had left Kamsa thought that all the Yadus were divine and that therefore any child born from Devaki could be Vishnu. He thus in fear of his own death arrested Vasudeva and Devaki, confined them at home in shackles and killed one after the other each of their newborn sons not knowing whether it would be the 'Never-born' Lord or not []. Kings like him who on this earth are driven by animalistic pleasures and greed, usually put to death mothers, fathers, brothers, friends or anyone else. He had understood [from Narada] that he in a previous life as the great Asura Kalanemi personally had been killed by Vishnu [see 8.10: 56]. Therefore he, born again in this world, became an enemy of the Yadu dynasty [that carried the blessings of Vishnu]. He, the almighty ruler subdued [and imprisoned] his own father Ugrasena, the king of the Yadus, Bhojas and Andhakas, so that he could enjoy the states of Shurasena all by himself.'

*. To recall what was described in the previous chapters: Lord Rama appeared in the surya-vams'a of Ikshvaku or sun dynasty and Lord Krishna appeared in the candra-vams'a or moon dynasty.

 An additional verse in this chapter of Shrimad Bhagavatam is accepted by the Madhvacharya-sampradaya, represented by Vijayadhvaja Tirtha. The verse is as follows:

atha kamsam upagamya
narado brahma-nandanah ekantam upasangamya
vakyam etad uvaca ha
Word-for-word:

atha: in this way; kamsam: unto Kamsa; upagamya: after going; naradah: the great sage Narada; brahma-nandanah:

who is the son of Brahma; ekantam upasangamya: after going to a very solitary place; vakyam: the following instruction; etat: this; uvaca: said; ha: in the past.

Translation:

"Thereafter, Narada, the mental son of Lord Brahma, approached Kamsa and, in a very solitary place, informed him of the following news."

: Svami Prabhupada comments: 'Formerly an Asura named Kalanemi had six sons, named Hamsa, Suvikrama, Kratha, Damana, Ripurmardana and Krodhahanta. They were known as the Shad-garbhās, or six Garbhās, and they were all equally powerful and expert in military affairs. These Shad-garbhās gave up the association of Hiranyakas'ipu, their grandfather, and underwent great austerities to satisfy Lord Brahma, who, upon being satisfied, agreed to give them whatever benediction they might desire. When asked by Lord Brahma to state what they wanted, the Shad-garbhās replied: "Dear Lord Brahma, if you want to give us a benediction, give us the blessing that we will not be killed by any demigod, Maha-roga, Yaksha, Gandharva-pati, Siddha, Carana or human being, nor by great sages who are perfect in their penances and austerities." Brahma understood their purpose and fulfilled their desire. But when Hiranyakas'ipu came to know of these events, he was very angry at his grandsons. "You have given up my association and have gone to worship Lord Brahma" he said, "and therefore I no longer have any affection for you. You have tried to save yourselves from the hands of the demigods, but I curse you in this way: Your father will take birth as Kamsa and kill all of you because you will take birth as sons of Devaki." Because of this curse, the grandsons of Hiranyakas'ipu had to take birth from the womb of Devaki and be killed by Kamsa, although he was previously their father. This description is mentioned in the Hari-vams'a, Vishnu-parva, Second Chapter. According to the comments of the Vaishnava-toshani, the son of Devaki known as Kirtiman was the third incarnation. In his first incarnation he was known as Smara and was the son of Marici, and later he became the son of Kalanemi. This is mentioned in the histories.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 2:

Prayers by the Demigods for Lord Krishna in the Womb
- Shri Shuka said: under the protection of the mighty king of Maghada, Jarasandha [see 9.22: 8], there was with the assistance of characters like Pralamba, Baka, Canura, Trinavarta, Aghasura, Mushtika, Arishtha, Divida, Putana, Kes'i, Dhenuka and Asura kings like Bana, Bhaumasura and more of those, a systematic persecution of the kings of Yadu. Being harassed they sought shelter in the countries of the Kurus, the Pancalas, the Kekayas, the Shalvas, the Vidharbas, the Nishadhas, the Videhas and the Kos'alas. - Some of their relatives though followed the policy of the son of Ugrasena [Kamsa]. When Kamsa had killed six of the children born from Devaki, the seventh one, a plenary expansion of Vishnu who was celebrated with the name Ananta, therefore as an embryo in the womb of Devaki gave rise to both pleasure and sorrow. When the Supreme Lord who is also the Supersoul of each living being [see also B.G. 10: 11], learned about the fear for Kamsa of the Yadus who had accepted Him as their refuge, He instructed His spiritual potency [Yoga-maya] as follows: 'Oh Devi so good for all living beings, please go to Vraja, that beautiful place with her cowherds and cows, where Rohini and the other wives of Vasudeva in seclusion, out of fear for Kamsa, are living in the cowherd community [the gokula] of Nanda. In the womb of Devaki there is the embryo known as [Ananta-'S'esha who is a plenary expansion of Me. Take care of a smooth transition from her womb to the womb of Rohini [*]. At that time I with all My different parts [with My full potency] will become Devaki's son oh all-auspicious one. Meanwhile you will appear as the daughter of Yashoda, the wife of Nanda. The people [the Shaktas as opposed to the Vaishnavas] will worship you with incense in different forms of sacrifice as being the best Goddess for all desires, for you with bestowing your blessings fulfill every wish. 1-1 Depending on the place on earth [] you will be celebrated with different names like Durga, Bhadrakali, Vijaya, Vaishnavi, Kumuda, Candika, Krishna, Madhavi, Kanyaka [or Kanya-kumari], Maya, Narayani, Is'ani, Sharada and Ambika []. Because He changes wombs [from Devaki to the womb of Rohini] the people of the world will address Him with the name Sankarshana, because He brings pleasure to the people [of Gokula] He will be called Rama and because of His great physical strength He will be named Balabhadra.'

Thus being instructed by the Supreme Lord she accepted His words with the mantra 'Om'. After next circumambulating Him she went away to execute exactly what was told [compare B.G. 16: 24]. When Devaki's embryo owing to the slumber of yoga [raised by Yoga-maya, see B.G. 2: 69] was transferred to Rohini, everyone lamented: 'Alas, the baby is lost' [thinking it was a miscarriage]. The Supreme Lord, the Soul of All who always puts an end to the fear of His devotees, then with His full potency entered the mind of Vasudeva [see also 3.2: 15]. Carrying [within] the effulgent shelter of the Original Personality, Vasudeva shone like the sun and thus for everyone became difficult to behold or approach. He, the Blessing of the Complete Universe who is Infallible in All His Parts, was thereafter by the son of Shurasena [Vasudeva] in full transferred from mind to mind to his devi [Devaki] so that she, preserving the Supreme Soul and Cause of all Causes, bloomed of happiness like the eastern sky. Devaki with in her womb the Sustainer of All the Universes, could, being confined in the Bhoja house like the flames of a covered fire or like the knowledge of a man unable to express himself, not freely radiate her light [*]. But Kamsa saw how she, radiating with the beauty of having the Invincible One within her womb, cleared the entire atmosphere with her brilliant smiles. He said to himself: 'The one who now has entered the womb of Devaki must be the Lord who is going to kill me. She never before looked like this! What should I do now, not to neglect my self interest? I assume that the Example of Virtue will not give up His ways. The killing of a woman, my sister, especially when she is pregnant, will for ever tarnish my fame and opulence and will shorten my life span. That person is dead being alive who lives his life with much cruelty. When the body is finished everyone will condemn him. He with his physical concept of life [see also 7.5: 30 and 5.5: 5 and B.G. 16: 18-21] certainly will enter the deepest darkness [Andhatama, see also 3.20: 18 and 5.26: 9].'

Thus contemplating the ghastly idea of killing [the mother] he refrained from it and kept himself under control. Persisting in enmity he awaited the moment that the Lord would take birth. Whether he sat or lay down, wherever he was, he ate, he walked or went, he [filled with hatred] thought about Hrishikes'a, the Lord of the Senses. He meant the entire world to him. But Lord Brahma and Lord Shiva assembled there together with the sages, Narada and other divine personalities and their followers in order to please Him, the Strongest Man of All, with prayers: 'You are the truth of the vow [see 9.24: 56 and B.G. 9: 22], the truth of the Supreme and the truth of the threefoldness [of e.g. the past, present and future]. You are the source of all truth who pervades all truths, You are the truth of everything that is held true, the original truth of each truth that meets the eye and the truth of all that pertains to the Supreme Soul of You whom we offer our full surrender. The original tree [of this universe, our body], in which one finds two birds [the soul and the Supersoul], is one in its dependence [on matter], is two in its fruits [of happiness and grief], is three in its roots [the three modes], is four in its tastes [the purusharthas, the civil virtues], is five in its knowing [by the senses], is six in its conditions [of lamentation, illusion, old age, death, hunger and thirst], is seven in its layers [the bark' or the koshas, the different bodies], is eight in its branches [the elements, mind, intelligence and ego], is nine in its apertures and is ten in its foliage [for the ten airs, see 7.15: 42]. You as the One and All are the Original Source of this visible universe [this tree]. You are the mercy [the conservation] when we are thrown in despair [meet destruction]. Those whose intelligence is covered by Your maya and miss the vision of the devotees and scholars, cannot see You behind the diversity. For the sake of every living being, moving or not moving, You watch over the soul and beatitude in assuming all sorts of forms consisting of pure goodness that bring transcendental happiness to the virtuous ones and time and again put an end to those who are wicked. Fully engaged in a constant meditation upon You as the abode of the complete consciousness, oh Lotus-eyed Lord, by that one-pointedness as practiced by the greatest one gets on board of the boat of Your lotus feet that reduces the great ocean of nescience to [the size of] a calf's hoof print [compare 10.1: 5-7]. Once they personally have crossed the so difficult to pass ocean of darkness oh Light of the World, they [the experienced devotees] who because of Your mercy for the truth loving ones are full of goodwill [to help], leave behind the boat [the method] of Your lotus feet in this world [see also B.G. 6: 44]. All others who neglect Your feet, oh Lotus-eyed One, are caught in an illusion of being liberated and have bereft of You an impure intelligence. Even though they are successful in severe practices [of penance and such] they from their elevated position fall down again back into the material world [see also B.G. 8: 15-16 and 5.6: 11]. They who follow You in devotion, oh Madhava, unlike the non-devotees do not fall away from the path. Because they are fully attached to You they are protected by You and move without fear over the heads of those who march against them., oh Master [see also 1.5: 17 and B.G. 18: 78]. For the purpose of maintaining [Your rule] Your Lordship existing beyond the modes, assumes a form for the benefit and welfare of all embodied souls, so that human society in accordance with the Veda, by [bhakti-yoga and penance being absorbed in Your worship, may be of sacrifice [see also B.G. 3: 9 & 18: 3]. How could we have arrived at Your wisdom that drives away the ignorance, if the purity of existence, oh Source of the World, would not be this constancy of You [being present]? The ignorance is completely vanquished when that quality of Yours is awakened by Your Lordship manifesting Yourself and for that there is no alternative. Oh Lord on the path of the words and assumptions of those who look after the mind only [the impersonal intellect] Your name, form, qualities and actions cannot be ascertained. You are only realised when one [actually] puts Your name and form into practice [with ceremony and song; see also 1.3: 37-38, 4.18: 5, 7.15: 58 and B.G. 6: 24 & 18: 55]. Constantly hearing, reciting, remembering and contemplating Your auspicious names [see 7.5: 23-24] and forms, he who is of an undivided attention in service at Your lotus feet no longer is capable of losing himself in the material world [see also 6.17: 28-31]. In having this planet earth as the place of Your feet, oh Lord, it is our fortune to see the Asura burden removed by You. Due to the causeless mercy of Your manifestation as the Controller of All, we may enjoy the fortune of witnessing both in heaven and on earth the marks of Your transcendently decorated lotus feet [the conch, the lotus, the club and the disc]. For You who directs our lives there exists [actually] no such thing as being born [or dying]. However, it suffers no doubt that the cause of one's being born cannot exist without the pleasure [of Your liberating pastimes]. You after all are with the being born, maintaining and dying of us normal souls - which is arranged by the external energy - our safe haven against all fear. In the form of a fish, a horse, a tortoise, a lion, a boar, a swan [or self-realised sage], a king and as a man of learning among the God-fearing ones [like Lord Vamana] Your Lordship has appeared as avatars. Now please save us and the three worlds, oh Controller, diminish the earth's burden, oh best of the Yadus, we dedicate all our prayers to You [see also 1.3]. [and towards Devaki they prayed:] To our fortune, oh mother, the Supreme Personality with all His energies can now be seen in your womb. The Supreme Lord is full of mercy for everyone. Fear therefore never the master of the Bhojas [Kamsa] who wishes to be killed by Him, the protector of the Yadu dynasty who will become Your son.'

Shri Shuka said: 'After thus having offered their prayers unto the Original Personality whose form is Transcendental, all the demigods lead by Brahma and Shiva returned to their abodes.'

*: Svami Prabhupada comments: 'Symbolically, mother Devaki's constant fear of Kamsa was purifying her. A pure devotee should always fear material association, and in this way all the Asuras of material association will be killed, as the Shad-garbhasuras were killed by Kamsa. It is said that from the mind, Marici appears. In other words, Marici is an incarnation of the mind. Marici has six sons: Kama, Krodha, Lobha, Moha, Mada and Matsarya (lust, anger, greed, illusion, madness and envy). The Supreme Personality of Godhead appears in pure devotional service. This is confirmed in the Vedas: bhaktir evainam dars'ayati. Only bhakti can bring one in contact with the Supreme Personality of Godhead. The Supreme Personality of Godhead appeared from the womb of Devaki, and therefore Devaki symbolically represents bhakti, and Kamsa symbolically represents material fear. When a pure devotee always fears material association, his real position of bhakti is manifested, and he naturally becomes uninterested in material enjoyment. When the six sons of Marici are killed by such fear and one is freed from material contamination, within the womb of bhakti the Supreme Personality of Godhead appears. Thus the seventh pregnancy of Devaki signifies the appearance of the Supreme Personality of Godhead. After the six sons Kama, Krodha, Lobha, Moha, Mada and Matsarya are killed, the Shesha incarnation creates a suitable situation for the appearance of the Supreme Personality of Godhead. In other words, when one awakens his natural Krishna consciousness, Lord Krishna appears. This is the explanation given by Shрила Vis'vanatha Cakravarti Thhakura.'

 : The names by which Mayadevi is known in different places have been listed by Vallabhaçarya as follows. In Varanasi she is known as Durga, in Avanti she is known as Bhadrakali, in Orissa she is known as Vijaya, and in Kulahapura she is known as Vaishnavi or MahaLakshmi (the representatives of MahaLakshmi and Ambika are present in Bombay). In the country known as Kamarupa she is known as Candika, in Northern India as Sharada, and in Cape Comorin as Kanyaka. Thus she is distributed according to various names in various places.

: Shрила Vijayadhvaja Tirthapada, in his Pada-ratnavali-tika, has explained the meanings of the different representations. Maya is known as Durga because she is approached with great difficulty, as Bhadra because she is auspicious, and as Kali because she is deep blue. Because she is the most powerful energy, she is known as Vijaya; because she is one of the different energies of Vishnu, she is known as Vaishnavi; and because she enjoys in this material world and gives facilities for material enjoyment, she is known as Kumuda. Because she is very severe to her enemies, the Asuras, she is known as Candika, and because she gives all sorts of material facilities, she is called Krishna. In this way the material energy is differently named and situated in different places on the surface of the globe.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 3:

The Birth of Lord Krishna

- Shri Shuka said: 'Then there was the supremely auspicious hour that, with the constellation of Rohini rising, was endowed with all qualities. All the stars and planets stood in a favorable position. There was peace all around, all the stars twinkled in the sky and the cities, towns, pasturing grounds and mines were at their best. With the rivers crystal clear and the lakes beautiful with lotuses, with the flocks of birds and the swarms of bees sweetly singing their praise in the blooming forests, the breezes fragrant and free from dust blew with a gentle touch while the fires of the brahmins burned steadily and undisturbed. The minds of the virtuous ones who were oppressed by the Asura [Kamsa and his men], cleared up when in that situation the kettledrums resounded together to celebrate the birth of the Unborn One. The Kinnaras and Gandharvas [de excellent ones and the singers of heaven] sang, the Siddhas and Caranas [the perfected ones and the demigods] offered prayers and the Vidyadhara women [the wives of the scientists] danced in great jubilation together with the Apsaras [the dancing girls of heaven]. - The sages and the demigods joyously showered the finest flowers and the clouds rumbled silently like the ocean waves when at the darkest hour of the night Janardana, the World's Well-wisher, appeared from the divine form of Devaki. Lord Vishnu, the One residing in the heart of everyone manifested Himself in full, like the full moon rising in the east. -1 That wonderful child with His lotus-like eyes and His four arms that held different weapons [and other attributes like] a conch, a club and so on, was decorated with the Shrivatsa mark, with the shining Kaustubha jewel around His neck, with yellow garments and with a beautiful hue like that of rain clouds. Vasudeva saw Him beautifully decorated sparkling with a with vaidurya (tiger's eye) studded helmet, with rings in His ears, with luxuriant scattered locks of hair, with an exquisite belt around His waist and with armlets and bracelets on His arms. Anakadundubhi was amazed to see the beautiful appearance of the Lord as his son. Overwhelmed by great jubilation he lost himself in dreams of holding a festival to the occasion of the descent of Krishna, a festivity where he would donate ten thousand cows to the brahmins.

Oh son of Bharata, understanding that the child definitely was the Original Personality, he lost all his fears. Having arrived at that conclusion he enraptured by His majesty fell down with folded hands to offer prayers to the child that illumined His birth place in every direction. Vasudeva said: 'You my Lordship, are the Original Person Himself transcendental to material nature, You are the absolute understanding and blissfulness [sat-cit-ananda] in its true form, the intelligence that watches over each. You for sure we know as He who, after in the beginning by His personal energy having created this world consisting of the three modes [see B.G. 7: 4-6], next seems to have entered [as avatars] but in reality You did not [see also 7.12: 15 and B.G. 9: 11]. 5-1 It is like the notion of the material elements [earth, water, air, fire and ether] that have not changed at all, even though they are caught in many combinations of different separated energies [or molecules] that together form the complete of the universe. After in their association having appeared it seems that the primal elements have entered creation later on, but that entering of this world never took place since they existed there before. The same way, oh my Lord, reasoning from true intelligence and such attributes You, despite being in touch with the objects of the senses and the modes of nature, are not determined by those material qualities at all. You after all [being the complete], are not covered by them. Because You are the root of everyone and everything there is no such thing as a within and a without to You, the Supersoul of all existence [see also 7.12: 15 and B.G. 9: 4-6]. Anyone who in the position of being recognizable as a material body continues to act as if he would have an existence for himself separate from the original self or soul, is a fool. He is a person who in his false identification will be rejected as stupid for lacking in proper analysis and missing the full consideration of 'that' [or tat. See also B.G. 18: 16, B.G. 7: 4-5 and *]. Oh Almighty Lord, the birth, the maintaining and the ending of this all is there, so conclude the scholars, because of You who are free from inclinations, free from changes and free from the modes. This is not contradictory because You, who are both the Lord and the Supreme Brahman, constitute the solid foundation for the modes of nature [see B.G. 9: 10]. You thus [as that basis, as that transcendence] assume, in order to maintain the three worlds with Your energy, a white form from the Soul [in goodness and knowledge], the colour red belonging to the passion of creation [the movement] as also the form of darkness [of ignorance] for the purpose of the ultimate destruction. You now here present, oh Mighty One, have appeared in my home as the Completeness of Control with the wish to protect this planet and punish all the demonic men and their armies, who unenlightened by the millions all over the world pose as kings and statesmen [see also B.G. 4: 8]. But he who is so godless [Kamsa] and who, after hearing about Your taking birth in our home, has killed all the brothers who were born before You, oh Lord of the God-fearing souls, will be informed by his lieutenants about Your appearance and undoubtedly immediately take up his arms.'

Shuka said: 'After having seen that their son was endowed with all the characteristics of the Supreme Personality, Devaki, who had been afraid of Kamsa but now was most [happily] surprised [about the arrival of Krishna], offered Him prayers. Shri Devaki said: 'Being the 'tat' form [or the substance of our oneness in diversity], You are sometimes called the imperceptible one, the original one or Brahman, the light, the freedom above the modes, the changeless one and pure existence [the measure of goodness and perfection]. You are the undivided one free from material motives who is directly Lord Vishnu, the light of the Supersoul [compare B.G. 14: 27]. When after millions and millions of years the cosmos runs at its end and the primary elements merge with their primal forms and everything that manifested by the force of Time turns into the unmanifest, You, oh Lord with the Many Names, are the only one to remain. This so powerful Time factor by which, from the smallest measure of time up to the measure of a year, this entire creation works, is said to be Your action, the movement of You, the secure abode, the Supreme Controller whom I offer my surrender. The mortals afraid of the serpent of death flee in all directions but cannot shake off the fear. Only when they are happy having obtained Your lotus feet they sleep undisturbed with death running away from them. Oh Lordship can You, in Your form as the One dispelling the fears of Your servants, protect us against the terrible son of Ugrasena we fear so much? And please can You, as this Original Personality we attend to in meditation, make it so that You are not directly visible to those who consider You a physical form [compare B.G. 11: 8]? Oh Madhusudana, off balance because of Kamsa I am plagued by fear with Your appearance. May Your taking birth from my womb escape the attention of that great sinner. Please oh All-pervading One, withdraw this supernatural four-armed form that is equipped with the attributes of the conch, lotus, disc and club. The entire creation with everything that belongs to it is by You, oh Lord, the transcendental Original Personality, easily sheltered and kept within Your body at the time of devastation. But to see You now having entered my body is something unimaginable in the human world, oh Godhead!'

The Supreme Lord replied: 'In a previous age you became known as Pris'ni, oh chaste lady, and he [Vasudeva] at the time was a Prajapati called Sutapa, an impeccable person. When Lord Brahma told you both to create offspring, you were thereafter of severe austerities to keep your senses under control. 4-3 Enduring the rain, the wind, the blistering sun and the severe cold and heat of the seasonal changes, you by practicing restraint freed your mind from contaminations. Eating fallen leaves and air only you became pure and peaceful, performed My worship in serenity and prayed for a boon from Me. While you, with your mind fixed on Me, thus in severe penance practiced the most difficult austerities, twelve thousand celestial years passed. 7-3 By this determination of heart and constant, faithful service and penance oh sinless ones, I, proclaimed to be the most favorable bestower of boons, very satisfied with the both of you then appeared in this form. Eager to fulfill your desires I told you to think about a boon for yourselves whereupon you asked for a son just like Me. You, who as a man and wife without a son and dissatisfied in your sensual concerns were so strongly attracted to My divine energy, never asked Me for being liberated from this world [see also 4.9: 30-35]. After you received the benediction and I had left, you enjoyed sexual intercourse whereupon the two of you achieved the desired result of having a son like Me. Because I did not find anyone else in this world with your noble character and qualities, I became your son and am thus known as Pris'nigarbha [see also 11.5: 26]. Through Kasyapa and Aditi I again appeared from the two of you with the name Upendra and was also called Vamana because I was a dwarf [see 8.17-22]. True to my word for the third time appearing in this manner in a form like this, I again took My birth from the two of you, oh chaste lady. I showed you this [four-handed] form to remind you of My previous appearances. The spiritual understanding of My identity would otherwise not arise [in you] with the transient form. When you treat Me with love and affection the two of you, in your constant awareness of Me as being both your son and the Absolute Truth, will thus attain My transcendental abode.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Thus having spoken the Personality of Godhead, the Supreme Lord, was silent and directly from His inner potency assumed the form of an ordinary human child before the eyes of His parents. When thereafter the son of Shurasena as instructed by the Supreme Lord carefully wanted to carry his son away from the place of delivery, precisely at that time Yogamaya [see 10.2: 6-12], the one [of transcendence who factually is] never born, took her birth from the wife of Nanda. 8-4 By her influence the guards and the rest of the people being fast asleep had lost consciousness of all their senses. As soon as Vasudeva carrying Krishna approached, all the heavy doors and gates sealed with bolts and chains opened wide out of their own, like darkness dissipated by the sun. The slightly rumbling clouds showered rain but Shesha Naga followed them and stopped the rains with His spread out hoods. The surface of the deep waters of Yamaraja's younger sister, the Yamuna, was foaming because of Indra's constant showers. The waters whirled agitated, but the waves of the forceful, fierce stream gave way just like the ocean did before the Husband of Sita [Lord Rama, see 9.10: 13-15]. The son of Shurasena reached the cow-village of Nanda and found all the cowherds there fast asleep. While they slept he put his son on Yashoda's bed, took up her daughter and then returned home. There he placed the little girl on Devaki's bed and put the shackles back on his feet so that he remained bound as before. Yashoda, Nanda's wife, delivering her child had no idea what it precisely looked like because being overwhelmed by sleep from the hard labour, she lay unconscious.'

*: Svami Prabhupada comments: 'If we regard this world as false, we fall into the category of Asuras, who say that this world is unreal, with no foundation and no God in control (asatyam apratishtham te jagad ahur anis'varam). As described in the Sixteenth Chapter of Bhagavad Gita, this is the conclusion of demons.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 4:

The Atrocities of King Kamsa

Shri Shuka said: 'With all the outer and inner doors of the building closed as before, the guards of the prison woke up when they heard the newborn child cry. They hurried to report it to the king of Bhoja who fearfully awaited the time that Devaki would deliver. He quickly got out of bed and said: 'The Time has arrived' and went perturbed, with his hair on his head disheveled, immediately to the place of birth.

The chaste Devaki miserably and full of pity said to Kamsa, her brother: 'All good fortune to you, this girl will be your daughter-in-law. You should not kill a woman. Following the voice from above you have killed many children brilliant as fire my brother. Please allow me this one daughter. I am still your poor younger and childless sister, is it not? Oh master, dear brother, hold back, you owe me this last child.'

Shri Shuka said: 'In tears clasping her baby she pleaded most piteously, but he most cruelly with a growl tore it away from her hands. Having abandoned all his familial affection he took the newborn child of his sister by the legs and wanted to smash the daughter against the stone floor. But it slipped midair out of his hands and appeared that very instant in the sky as Devi [Durga] the younger sister of Vishnu with her eight mighty arms complete with weapons [see also 8.12: 40]. 0-1 Adorned with sandalwood pulp, flower garlands, valuable jewels and being nicely dressed she held a bow, a lance, arrows, a shield, a sword, a conch, a lotus and a disc. With different presentations being worshipped by the Siddhas [the perfected ones], the Caranas [the venerable ones], the Gandharvas [the singers of heaven], the Apsaras [the dancing girls], the Kinnaras [the ones specially talented] and the Uragas [the 'divine snakes'] she said the following: 'What's the use of killing me oh fool! He, your former enemy [see 1.68] who will kill you, has already been born [and is now] somewhere else. Stop the unnecessary killing of poor little babies.'

After the Goddess of the immense power of maya thus had spoken to him, she [disappeared and] became known in different places on earth under diverse names [such as Annapurna, Durga, Kali and Bhadra, see 10.2: 10 & 11]. When Kamsa heard the words she spoke he was struck with wonder and forthwith released Devaki and Vasudeva saying humbly: 'My dear sister and brother-in-law, I, because of my sins behaving like a cannibal eating his own kids, have alas killed your many sons. I am really such a one who mercilessly cruel denies his relatives and friends their life. What kind of world is someone who engages like a brahmin-killer, heading for here or in the hereafter? Not just human beings, but also heaven can speak a lie. Just because I believed the prophecy I most sinfully killed all my sister's children! Oh blessed souls, do not lament over your sons, for all who are born are bowed down by their own deeds [in a previous life, see footnote 3 ch. 1]. Living beings have to abide by their fate and cannot always live in the same place. Everything on earth and is produced from earth [like pots] appears and disappears again. This physical body similarly undergoes change, but the soul, just like the earth element itself, does not [compare 10.3: 15-17]. When one without knowledge of this difference [between body and soul] does not properly identify with the self and one thus falsely being united with the body is of separation [in one's heart and society], one cannot break through the repetition of one's conditioned life [viz. one can only unite in consciousness]. Because everyone unwillingly has to face the consequences of his own actions, you, my dear sister, should not lament over your sons who found their death because of me. As long as one does not know oneself [as a soul] and one with a mistaken notion thinks of oneself as someone who kills or gets killed [thus as being a body], one is an ignoramus running into the pains of material distress [see also B.G. 3: 9 & 18: 17 and nitya-mukta]. Please forgive me my atrocities, you are both saintly, humble and loving souls! Saying this he clasped the feet of his sister and brother-in-law with tears rolling down his cheeks.

Trusting in the words of Durga he released Vasudeva and Devaki from their shackles and thus proved his heart for the family. Because he showed remorse Devaki was relieved of her anger with her brother and Vasudeva also gave up his anger. He said to him with a smile: 'What you said about embodied souls in the grip of ignorance is correct, oh man of great fortune, one thus makes a difference between one's own interest and that of others. When people consider everything as existing separately, they go at each other's cost and are filled with lamentation, lust, fear, hate, greed, illusion and madness. Discriminating like that one does not see one's continuity [the 'thread', the soul, one's connectedness].'

Shri Shuka said: 'Kamsa thus free from impurities being answered by the appeased Devaki and Vasudeva, took leave and entered his palace. After the night had passed Kamsa called for his ministers and informed them about everything that the 'Slumber of Yoga', Durga [or Yoga-maya], had said. Upon hearing what their master had to say the Daitya opponents of the demigods, who resented them and were not that skilled, replied [see also B.G. 9: 12]: 'Well in that case, oh King of Bhoja, let us right now kill all the children about ten days old or younger in every town, village and pasturing ground. What can the demigods do in their fear to fight? They are always so nervous to hear the sound of your bowstring! Facing your many devoted arrows hitting them from all sides they fled away from the fighting to save their lives. Some of those inhabitants of heaven, with their hair and clothing in disarray and bereft of their weapons, folded miserably their hands before you and said: 'You have made us so afraid! And you killed none of them when they were scared to death, had lost their chariots, did not know how to use their weapons anymore, wanted other things than fighting or when their bows were broken and they could not respond any longer. What to say about the position taken by the so very powerful gods? Away from the fighting they can boast! And what of Lord Hari? He is hiding in the heart! Should we fear Lord Shiva then? He is living in the forest! And Indra then? He is not much of a hero either! And Brahma? He always meditates! Still we think that the demigods because of their enmity should not be overlooked. Engage us, your faithful followers, therefore to uproot them! Just like a disease of the body that once neglected in its acute stage by men cannot be treated anymore and senses that being disregarded [later on cannot be controlled], similarly a great enemy that became too strong cannot be removed. Lord Vishnu is the foundation of the demigods. He lies at the bottom of the traditional religious duties and the brahminical order with its cows, its scholars, its penances and the sacrifices that need to be paid [see also 7.5: 31]. We therefore by all means, oh King, will endeavor to put an end to the brahmins and their brahminical talk, those repenters so busy with their sacrifices and cows that deliver the ghee! The scholars, the cows and the Vedas; the austerity, the truthfulness and the sense control; the equanimity, the faith, the mercy, the tolerance as also the ceremonies, are all part of Hari. He is the leader of all the Suras and the enemy of the Asuras. He is in all hearts. At His feet all the demigods, including their controller [Shiva] and the four-faced one [Brahma], are found. Really, the only way to prevent Him is to persecute all His sages, devotees and saints.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Thus rather ignorantly deliberating with his evil counselors, Kamsa, who as a demon was ruled by the Lord of Death, thought that the best thing he could do was to persecute the brahmins [and their followers]. After he gave the Danavas, those adherents of violence and destruction who could assume any form, permission to fight all the repenters in the world, the demons spread in all directions. Kamsa then returned to his quarters. Filled with a passion of the deepest darkness they bewildered, with the shadow of death hanging over them, engaged in the persecution of the virtuous souls. The benedictions of a long life, beauty, fame, religion, talents and a place in heaven of a person trespassing against great personalities, are all destroyed.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 5:

Krishna's Birth Ceremony and the Meeting of Nanda Maharaja and Vasudeva

- Shri Shuka said: 'Nanda was a man of great devotion. Overjoyed that a son had been born, he invited the scholars conversant with the Veda, cleansed himself with a bath and dressed himself up. In order to celebrate the birth [with a jatakarma ceremony*] as was prescribed he took care that the mantras were chanted and also arranged for the worship of the forefathers and demigods. To the brahmins he donated countless fully decorated milk cows and seven mountains of sesame seed, masses of jewels and gold-embroidered cloth. Material things are purified by time, by washing and bathing, by rituals, by penance, by worship, by charity and by contentment, but the soul is purified by self-realisation. The scholars, the storytellers, the reciters and the singers uttered words that purified everyone and everything, while the bheris and dundubhis [drums] sounded constantly. All of Vraja was swept, the doorsteps, the courtyards and the interiors were sprinkled with water and a variety of festoons and flags decorated gates that were made with garlands, pieces of cloth and mango leaves. The cows, bulls and calves were smeared with turmeric oil and decorated with a variety of mineral colours, peacock feathers, cloth, golden ornaments and flowers. Oh King, the cowherds [the gopas] gathering there carried all kinds of gifts and were dressed in the most precious garments with costly ornaments, coats and turbans. The cowherd wives [the gopis] were also glad to hear that mother Yashoda had given birth to a boy and personally gave their best by appearing in festive dresses with eye make-up and wearing jewelry and such. With their lotus like faces most beautifully decorated with saffron and fresh kunkuma, they while offerings in their hands hurried hither with swaying bosoms and hips. The gopis wore brilliantly polished jeweled earrings, strings of golden coins around their necks and colourfully embroidered clothes. It was a feast to the eye to see them with their swinging bangles, earrings, breasts and garlands thus being dressed going to Nanda's house while a shower of flowers fell from their hair. They all for a long time pronounced blessings for the newborn one like 'pahi' [be protected] and sprinkled the Unborn Lord with turmeric oil while saying prayers. With Krishna, the Unlimited Controller of the Entire Universe, arriving in Nanda's cow community, many different musical instruments vibrated in a great festival. The gopas rejoicing threw curds, milk and buttermilk at each other and smeared with butter. 5-1 In order to offer his child the best prospects and to satisfy Lord Vishnu, Nanda, that noble soul, warm-heartedly honoured the gopas, the storytellers, the reciters, the singers and all those who found their livelihood by their education, with whatever they could wish for and could use as for clothes, ornaments and cows [see also 7.14: 17]. The greatly fortunate Rohini [the mother of Baladeva, see 10.2: 7] was congratulated by Nanda and Yashoda and she also, beautifully dressed and adorned with a garland and a necklace, moved around busily [being engaged in receiving guests]. Oh King, from that time on the cow lands of Nanda became opulent with all riches, for they, now being the residence of the Lord, were by His transcendental qualities transformed into a place for the pastimes of Rama [the Goddess of Fortune, see 8.8: 8].

Nanda thereafter entrusted the protection of Gokula [the cow village] to his cowherd men and went to Mathura to pay Kamsa the yearly taxes over his profit, oh best of the Kuru dynasty. Vasudeva who heard that his [younger step-]brother Nanda [] had arrived [in the city] - as it turned out to pay his tribute to the king - thereupon went to his camp. When Nanda all of a sudden saw him before his eyes, he very pleased rose to his feet as if his body had found a new life. Overwhelmed by love and affection he embraced his dear friend. Welcoming him with all regards, he assigned him a seat and informed about his health. Vasudeva, attached as he was, then asked about his two sons, saying the following, oh ruler over the world. 'Dear brother Nanda, advanced in age and having no son, you were desperately longing for one. What a great fortune now to have gotten a son! What a great fortune also to see you here today, it is like a rebirth. Despite being around in this world of birth and death, it is so very hard to meet again your loved ones! Like things that afloat in a river are carried away by the force of the waves, we, intimately living together, do not stay [together] in one place because our karmic ways are diverging. Is everything alright with your cow business? Is there enough water, grass, plants and such in the great forest where you are living now with your friends? Oh brother, does my son who with His mother lives in your house, consider you His father and is He a sweet boy under your loving care? A person's three goals of life as described in the Vedic literatures [the regulation of one's lusts, income and rituals], find their consequence and belief when one is together. But that is not so when that togetherness has become difficult, then they lose their meaning.'

Shri Nanda said: 'Kamsa killed, alas, the many sons you had with Devaki and also the one remaining child, the youngest, a daughter went to heaven. Fate determines the end of all things, providence is elevated above every living being and the unseen is the ultimate truth of all souls. He who knows this will never get bewildered.'

Shri Vasudeva said: 'Now that you have paid the king his yearly taxes and we have met, the both of us should not spend more days in this place. Something might have happened in Gokula!' Shri Shuka said: 'After that advise of Vasudeva Nanda and the gopas excused themselves, yoked their oxen to their bullock carts and then left for Gokula.'

*: The jatakarma birth ceremony, which can take place when the umbilical cord, connecting the child and the placenta, is cut, entails the touching of the tongue of the newborn trice with ghee preceded by introductory prayers. The birth ceremony for Krishna is also called Nandotsava. The day of yearly celebrating His birth is called Janmashthami [the eight day of the month of Bhadra or Shravana (August-September)].

: The parampara elucidates: 'Vasudeva and Nanda Maharaja were so intimately connected that they lived like brothers. Furthermore, it is learned from the notes of Shripada Madhvacarya that Vasudeva and Nanda Maharaja were stepbrothers. Vasudeva's father, Shurasena, married a vais'ya girl, and from her Nanda Maharaja was born. Later, Nanda Maharaja himself married a vais'ya girl, Yashoda. Therefore his family is celebrated as a vais'ya family, and Krishna, identifying Himself as their son, took charge of vais'ya activities (krishi-go-rakshya-vanijyam, B.G. 18: 4).'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 6:

The Killing of the Demon Putana

Shri Shuka said: 'Nanda on his way [home] thought that the words of the son of Shura [Vasudeva] were not said unjustly and therefore he, apprehensive of difficulties ahead, took shelter of the Lord. Kamsa [see 10.4: 43] had sent a ghastly murderess who roamed the cities, towns and villages to kill babies. Wherever one is used to listen and all of that [in bhakti] and one performs one's duty, there, because of the Protector of the Devotees, cannot be any question of murderous ogres and bad elements. She who was called Putana and could move through the air, one day flew to the village of Nanda. There she converted herself by her mystic power into a beautiful woman and, moving about at will, penetrated wherever she wanted. - With her hair arranged with mallika [jasmine] flowers, with her very big breasts and hips that outweighed her slim waist, with her nice clothes and the earrings she wore, with the brilliance and great attraction of her face that was surrounded by her black hair and with the appealing glances she threw at everyone, she as a beauty attracted the attention of everyone in Gokula. In the eyes of the gopis she, so ravishing with a lotus in her hand, seemed to be the goddess of beauty who had arrived to see her Husband. The baby murderess unchecked in the house of Nanda looked for children and saw there the Child that Puts an End to All Untruth lying in bed. Its unlimited power was covered, just like a fire that lies hidden under ashes. Understanding that she was bent on killing babies He, the Unlimited Soul of All That Lives and Not Lives, closed His eyes when she unaware, like someone who takes a sleeping snake for a rope, placed Him, her own death, on her lap. With an evil mind acting most pleasantly she was like a sharp sword in a nice scabbard. The mothers [Yashoda and Rohini] though who saw her in the room were so impressed by the conspicuous, beautiful woman that they stood rooted to the spot. The terrible woman placed Him on her lap and on the spot pushed her breast into His mouth. The breast was smeared with a strong poison, but the Supreme Lord in response squeezed her painfully hard with both His hands and vehemently sucked both the poison and the life out of her. She completely being exhausted from the core of her being cried 'stop, stop, enough!' and severely perspiring opened her eyes wide and violently struggled, beating over and over with her arms and legs. The very deep and powerful sound she produced made the earth with its mountains and outer space with all its stars above and the worlds below tremble in all directions. People who felt the vibrations feared to be hit by lightning and fell flat to the ground. Thus squirming being tormented at her breasts, she, with her mouth wide open and all of her arms, legs and hair spread out, gave up her life. Thereupon she expanded to her original demonic form and collapsed on the pasturing grounds, oh King, just as when Vritrasura was killed by Indra's bolt [see 6.12]. As her body fell down it smashed all trees twelve miles around, oh King, for it was wonderfully gigantic.'

The gopas and gopis, who in their hearts, ears and heads were already shocked by the loud yelling, were terrified to see that massive body. The mouth had fearful teeth as high as a plow, the nostrils were as big as mountain caves, the breasts were like huge boulders, the scattered hair looked like copper, the deep eye sockets were like overgrown wells, the thighs were like river banks, the limbs resembled dams and the abdomen looked like a dried up lake. And on top of it the child was fearlessly playing. It was quickly picked up by the approaching gopis who all were greatly excited. Together with Yashoda and Rohini they waved a cow's tail around the child in order to assure it of full protection against all dangers. The child was thoroughly washed with cow's urine and further covered with dust thrown up by cows. Next for the protection of the child the Holy Name was applied with cow dung in twelve places [*]. The gopis took a sip of water [acamana] and after placing the letters of the [following ] mantra on their bodies and two hands, they proceeded with the child: 2-2 'May Aja protect Your legs, may Maniman protect Your knees, may Yajna protect Your thighs, may Acyuta protect You above the waist, may Hayagriva protect Your abdomen, may Kes'ava protect Your heart, may Is'a protect Your chest, may Surya protect Your neck, may Vishnu protect Your arms, may Urukrama protect Your mouth and may Is'vara protect Your head. May Cakri protect You from the front, may the Supreme Personality of Gadadhari, the carrier of the club, protect You from the back and may the killer of Madhu and Ajana, the carrier of the bow and the sword protect You two sides. May Lord Urugaya, the carrier of the conch shell, protect You from all corners, may Upendra protect You from above, may [the One riding] Garuda protect You on the ground and may the Supreme Person of Haladhara protect You on all sides. May Your senses be protected by Hrishikes'a and Your life air by Narayana, may the Master of Shvetadvipa protect Your memory and may Your mind be guarded by Yoges'vara. 5-2 May Pris'nigarbha protect Your intelligence, may Your soul be protected by Bhagavan, may Govinda protect You when You play and may Madhava protect You in Your sleep. May the Lord of Vaikunthha protect You when You walk, may the Husband of the Goddess of Fortune protect You when You sit down and may Lord Yajnabhuk, the fear of all evil planets, protect You when You enjoy life. 7-2 The demonic women, devils and haters of children that are like bad stars, the evil spirits, hobgoblins, ghosts and spooks, the ogres, monsters and witches like Kothara, Revati, Jyeshthha, Matrika and Putana who drive people mad, are the ones who bewilder the memory and hinder one's body, life air and vitality. May those nightmarish beings who cause so much trouble for both old and young people, all be vanquished, may they all be scared away by the chanting of Lord Vishnu's names.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Bound by their maternal affection the elderly gopis thus took all measures to ward off evil. His mother thereupon nursed Him and put her son in bed. The gopas headed by Nanda in the meantime had returned from Mathura and when they saw Putana's body in Vraja they were all struck with great wonder [and said]: 'Oh friends, Anakadundubhi appears to have grown into a great master of yoga. Otherwise, how could he have predicted the kind of situation we see now?' The inhabitants of Vraja cut the mass of the body into pieces with the help of axes. Then it was thrown away in a distant place, covered with wood and burned to ashes. When they cremated the body, the smoke produced turned out to be as serenely fragrant as aguru incense. Being sucked by Krishna that body had been instantly freed from all contaminations [see also 1.2: 17]. 5-3 If Putana, that child murderess and she-devil hankering for blood, despite her lust to destroy, could attain the supreme destination after offering her breast to the Lord, then what to say of those with faith and devotion who, just like His affectionate mothers, offered the one most dear. Krishna, the Supreme Personality, what [He needed]? 7-3 The Supreme Lord embraced her breast and trod her body with His lotus feet, that the devotees always have in their hearts and are held in devotion by the ones praised everywhere [like Brahma and Shiva]. When she, by assuming the position of a mother, went to heaven even though she was a murderess, then what would that mean for the motherly cows that by Krishna were sucked for enjoying the milk? 9-4 Oh King, for all women from whose love for the child the milk was flowing that He, the Supreme Lord, the bestower of Oneness, Giver of Liberation and son of Devaki, drank to His satisfaction, for all the ones who constantly made Krishna their maternal concern [the gopis], it can never be so that they return to the material ocean where one lusts in ignorance [see also B.G. 4: 9].

Smelling the fragrance of the smoke that emanated, all the inhabitants of Vrajabhumi wondered: 'Where does it come from?' Thus talking to each other they reached the cow village. Getting there they were greatly surprised to hear what the gopas all had to say about the havoc Putana had created, how she had died and everything that was done for the sake of the baby. The gentle-minded Nanda took his son on his lap as if He had returned from death, smelled His head and achieved the highest peace, oh best of the Kurus. Any mortal who with faith and devotion listens to this wonderful Krishna childhood pastime about the salvation of Putana, will grow fond of Govinda [the Protector of the Cows].'

*: Waving a cow's tail around a child is an occult rite in which the tail of a cow is regarded the seat of Lakshmi, the Goddess of Fortune. This is also true for the urine, dust, the milk and dung of the cows that with their products are held sacred. The urine has antiseptic qualities, the dung serves as fuel and the milk brings all health and wealth.

: With the mantra [anga-nyasa and kara-nyasa] one assigns the first letter or seed-letter of the names of the Lord mentioned in the next verse, followed by anusvara and the word namah.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 7:

Krishna Kicks the Cart, Defeats Trinavarta and Shows Yashoda the Universe

- The honourable king said: 'The different pastimes of the avatars of the Supreme Lord that offer us the image of the Lord, our Controller, are most pleasing to our ears and inspiring to our minds, oh master. Whoever hears about them will find his existence very soon purified from the propensity for dissatisfaction and, as a person who is devoted to the Lord, also find friendship with His people [Vaishnavas]. If you like, please speak to us about everything pertaining to Him. Tell us more about the wonderful pastimes of Krishna who, imitating the human way, in the form of a child assumed His position on this earth.' [†]

Shri Shuka said: 'At the time the moon stood in the constellation of Rohini [after three months] He could turn Himself on His back in His crib. To celebrate this the mothers organised a celebration with a washing ritual. They gathered with music and song and while mother Yashoda performed the bathing ceremony hymns were chanted by the brahmins. After Nanda's wife and the other members of the household had finished the bathing, the brahmins, who performed their auspicious mantras, were respectfully honoured with food, garments, garlands and cows. Seeing that the child had become sleepy, it was laid aside for the time being. While busily engaged for the utthana [or 'turning upward'] ceremony she, providing the guests from all over Vraja to their liking, did not hear any of the cries of her child who, wailing to be fed, angrily kicked around its legs. The cart underneath He was put was hit by His delicate feet that were as tender as a new leaf. It turned over so that all the bowls, plates and the sweetness they contained fell to the ground, the wheels and axle got dislocated and the pole was broken []. All the men and women of Vraja who being invited by Yashoda and Nanda had assembled for the utthana ceremony witnessed that wondrous event and wondered how the cart out of its own could have been damaged so badly. The children told the dumbfounded gopas and gopis that it suffered no doubt that, as soon as the child started to cry, it with one leg had dashed it apart. They, unaware of the inconceivable power of that small baby, could not believe it. The gopas thought that all that they had heard was but child prattle. Mother Yashoda, picked up her crying son and offered Him her breast. Thinking it had been an unfavorable planet, she called for the brahmins to perform a ceremony with Vedic hymns. After a couple of strong gopas had reassembled the cart and had placed the pots and everything back on it, the priests with curds, rice, kus'a grass and water performed the rituals for the fire sacrifice. 3-1 The blessings of those who endowed with the perfect truth are free from discontent, untruth, false pride, envy, violence and self-conceit, never go in vain [see also B.G. 18: 42]. With this in mind Nanda took care of the child by asking those fine brahmins to sing auspicious hymns and purify it according to the Sama, Rig and Yajur Veda with the help of water mixed with herbs. When the child had been bathed he, the leading cowherd, held a fire sacrifice and devoutly served the souls of rebirth a most excellent meal. To assure his son of all of the best, he - to the blessing they also gave him - donated in charity the best quality milk cows that were nicely decorated with flowers and golden chains. The scholars being joined with whatever they pronounce, bring one, as experts in the mantras, all the blessings because the valid words they use never at any time will be fruitless.

One day [with Him about a year old] when Yashoda fondled Him as He sat on her lap, she could no longer bear the child's weight because He became as heavy as a mountain peak. Astonished about the pressing weight the gopi put the child on the floor. Next she turned to Narayana and engaged herself in her worldly duties. The child sitting there was swept away [though] by a demon named Trinavarta, a servant sent by Kamsa who had assumed the form of a whirlwind. Producing a tremendous noise it massively roaring covered all of Gokula with dust that penetrated every nook and corner so that everything was hidden from sight. For an hour or so all of the cow land was plunged in darkness by the heavy dust. Yashoda could not find her son on the spot where she had put Him down. The people could not see themselves or each other anymore because of the sands blown up and were disturbed and confused. The woman helpless because of the dust clouds of the strong whirlwind saw nothing and thus she in fear about her son lamented pitifully and fell to the ground like a cow that has lost her calf. After the fierce dust storm of the whirlwind had ceased and she could not find Nanda's son, the other gopis with their faces full of tears all in sympathy wailed along with her crying. After Trinavarta had assumed the form of the whirlwind and thus had swept away Krishna, he, reaching the top of the atmosphere, could not get higher with Him getting heavier and mightier and so he lost his strength. Taking Him who strangled his neck for an incredibly heavy rock that exceeded his power he could not get rid of this wonderful child. Grasped by the throat he was powerless. His eyes popped out while he choked and lifeless together with the child fell down to the ground in Vraja. The gathered sobbing gopis all together saw him fallen out of the sky upon a slab of stone with all his limbs broken, like Tripura pierced by the arrows of Shiva [see 7.10]. They were totally surprised to find Krishna in good health sitting on the chest of the man-eater who had transported Him through the sky. All the gopis and gopas rejoiced most happily that He was saved from the mouth of death and that they had gotten Him back. [They said:] 'How greatly wonderful this baby that, being seized by the ogre, left us but has returned unscathed! Now that this nasty and violent demon has been killed because of his sins, the innocent, even-minded people are relieved of their fears. Of what austerity have we been, what was our worship for the One in the Beyond and what was the pious work, the public service, the charity, or any other benevolent activity for our fellow man that we performed, as a result of which the child, that was practically lost, is present here again to the fortune and pleasure of all His folk?' Having witnessed all these different wonderful events in the great forest, the herdsman Nanda over and over stood amazed how true the words of Vasudeva had been [see also 10.6: 32].

One day the mother pulled the little boy on her lap to nurse Him from her breast, from which because of her great affection the milk was oozing. 5-3 Oh King, when He was done and mother Yashoda, patting softly to help Him, looked the satisfied and smiling child in the face, she had, when He yawned, the following vision: she saw the sky, the planets and the earth, the luminaries in all directions, the sun and the moon. She saw fire, the air and the seas with the continents, the mountains, their daughters the rivers, the forests and all creatures moving and not moving [see also B.G. 11]. Thus all of a sudden seeing the entire universe, oh King, she in great amazement stifled with deer-like eyes and started to tremble all over.'

*: At the beginning of this chapter, two extra verses sometimes appear:

evam bahuni karmani
gopanam Sham sa-yoshitam nandasya gehe vavridhe
kurvan vishnu-janardana

"In this way, to chastise and kill the demons, the child Krishna demonstrated many activities in the house of Nanda Maharaja, and the inhabitants of Vraja enjoyed these incidents."

evam sa vavridhe vishnur nanda-gehe janardana kurvann anis'am anandam
gopalanam sa-yoshitam

"To increase the transcendental pleasure of the gopas and the gopis, Krishna, the killer of all demons, was thus raised by His father and mother, Nanda and Yashoda."

Shripada Vijayadvaja Tirtha also adds another verse after the third verse in this chapter:

vistarena karunyat
sarva-papa-pranas'anam vaktum arhasi dharmajna
dayalutvam iti prabho

"Parikhit Maharaja then requested Shukadeva Gosvami to continue speaking such narrations about the pastimes of Krishna, so that the King could enjoy from them transcendental bliss."

 : Svami Prabhupada comments: 'Krishna had been placed underneath a household handcart, but this handcart was actually another form of the Shakathasura, a demon who had come there to kill the child. Now, on the plea of demanding to suck His mother's breast, Krishna took this opportunity to kill the demon. Thus He kicked Shakathasura just to expose him. Although Krishna's mother was engaged in receiving guests, Lord Krishna wanted to draw her attention by killing the Shakathasura, and therefore He kicked that cart-shaped demon.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 8:

The Name Ceremony, His Pranks and Again the Universe Within His Mouth

Shri Shuka said: 'Garga the family priest of the Yadus, a man of great penance, oh King, on the request of Vasudeva went to Nanda's cow community. Nanda very pleased to see him stood up to welcome him with folded hands. Knowing him to be someone elevated above the senses [adhokshaja], he out of respect prostrated to offer his obeisances. With the greatest hospitality and the sweetest words he offered the sage a seat and said, after thus having pleased him: 'Oh brahmin complete in your self-realisation, what can I do for you? When great souls [like you] move towards simple-minded householders, one must never think that such a thing would happen for any other reason than their best interest. You are the author of a book concerning the transcendental knowledge of the movement of the luminaries, [an astrology book] from which any one directly may learn about the reason and consequences of his fate. You are the best of all the knowers of Brahman, a brahmin who by his birth [*] is a spiritual master for all society. With you having arrived at my home, please, perform the sacred ceremony [the samskara] for these two boys [Krishna and Balarama].'

Shri Garga said: 'Everyone knows that I am the teacher of example of the Yadus. In this world I always perform the purification rite for every son [of that family]. If I perform this ceremony for you, your sons would be considered the sons of Devaki. - Kamsa, that great sinner, knows about your friendship with Vasudeva. He also knows that the eighth child of Devaki cannot be a girl, while he took notice of Devaki having a daughter [Durga 10.4: 12]. He thus might consider to kill these children and therefore it is not wise for us to do this.'

Shri Nanda said: 'Then please perform, without him or even my own relatives knowing about it, right here in this remote place, in the cow shed, the purificatory rites for a second birth by reciting the benedictory words.'

Shri Shuka said: 'The man of learning thus urgently requested in secret seclusion performed the name-giving ceremony for the two boys for which he had come. Shri Garga said: 'He, this son of Yashoda] has according to the yuga transcendental qualities be the pleasure of all his folk. Therefore He will be called Rama. Because of His extraordinary strength He will also be known as Bala and because of not existing separately from the Yadus [see also 10.2: 8] He will further be known as Sankarshana [the unifier]. And this one [the son of Yashoda] has according to the yuga accepted forms with a white, a red or a yellow colour. Now He is Krishna [of a dark complexion, see ]. This child previously was born somewhere else as the son of Vasudeva and therefore the ones who know this will speak about this child of yours as the glorious Vasudeva. There are many names and forms according to the qualities and activities of His appearances. These are known to me, but the common people do not know them. Being a Nanda-Gokula cowherd this child will always act to what is most beneficial to all of you. With His support you will easily overcome all dangers [*3]. Oh King of Vraja, in the past, when there was a faulty regime, He has protected pious souls who were disturbed by rogues so that they, with those bad elements defeated, could flourish [see also 1.3: 28]. Just like the ones faithful to Vishnu have nothing to fear from the Asuras, those who are as fortunate to associate with this child in love and affection, will not be overcome by enemies. Therefore, oh Nanda, take the greatest care raising this child. As for His qualities, opulences, name and fame this son of yours is as good as Narayana!'

Shri Shuka said: 'After Garga thus fully had informed them about the Supreme Soul [the way He had manifested in the form of the two boys] and had left for his place, Nanda, being blessed with all good fortune, considered himself most happy. Shortly thereafter Rama and Kes'ava [Krishna] were crawling around in Gokula on their hands and knees enjoying their childhood. Crawling like snakes through the mud of the cow place while dragging their feet behind them, they produced a sweet sound with their ankle bells, but when they, charmed by those sounds, enthusiastically followed [the ankle bells of] other people, they became afraid and quickly returned to their mothers. When their mothers closed their, by the mud charmingly coloured, bodies in their arms, they allowed them to drink from the milk which, because of the great love for each of their sons, flowed from their breasts. And when they, while they were sucking, looked into their mouths they were delighted with the greatest ecstasy to discover that their teeth were growing. From within their houses watching the children play outside in Vraja, they laughed and forgot their household being amused to see how the two boys caught the ends of the calves' tails and were dragged around by them. When the mothers during their household duties could not find a way to check Them being engaged in Their tireless play with the cows, with fire, with sharp-toothed animal beaks [of dogs and monkeys], with swords, water, birds and thorns, they were unsettled. Rama and Krishna very soon without the help of their knees oh King, with ease began to walk around on their legs alone in Gokula. The Supreme Lord together with Balarama playing with the other kids in Vraja then awakened a heavenly bliss in the ladies of Vraja. The gopis who with their eyes on Krishna were eager just to hear time and again about His childish pranks, assembled in the presence of His mother and said: 'Once He untimely released the calves and smiled about the anger that gave rise to. Some or another way He stole the palatable curd, milk and butter from the pots, ate from it and also gave each monkey a share. When they refuse to eat [having enough], He breaks the pot and when He cannot find any [food to feed the monkeys], He gets angry at the people of the house and goes around pinching the babies. [With the pots] hung out of reach He devises a way by piling up things or turning over a mortar and then finds His way to the contents by making a hole in the hanging pot. Awaiting the time that the gopis are busy with their household affairs, He with the necessary light from the radiating jewels on His body manages to find His way in a dark room! He is so naughty that He sometimes freely urinates in a clean spot in our houses and that cunning, resourceful thief now sits there like a nice boy!' The gopis present there discussed all these matters, but when they saw Him sitting in front of them, looking afraid with His beautiful face, the gopis were happy to see Him. They with their complaints against Him truly could not be angry with Him and having a good time had to smile only. One day, when He was a little older, Balarama and the other kids of the neighbourhood came to tell His mother: 'Krishna has eaten dirt!'

Yashoda, anxious about His well-being, chided Krishna, took Him by the hand and looked worried into His mouth to inspect Him. She said: 'Why, You unruly boy, did You secretly eat dirt? What are Your older brother and all Your playmates saying?"

'Not true at all mommy, I did not eat any dirt. If you think it is true, then look right here into My mouth!'

'Is that so? Then open wide!' she told Him and He, the Supreme Personality, the Lord whose opulences are unlimited, in His pastime of acting like a human child opened His mouth. 7-3 Within His mouth she [for the second time, see 10.7: 35-37] saw the entire universe with all beings moving and not moving, the sky in all directions, the mountains, the continents, the oceans, the surface of the earth, the blowing wind, the fire, the moon and the stars. She saw the planetary systems, the waters, the light, the firmament with all of outer space and all [divinities] bound to change, the senses, the mind and the three modes. Seeing that diversity along with the time of living of each soul, the natural instincts, the karma, all that is desired, the different subtle bodies as also Vraja and herself within in the wide open mouth of her son's body, she was struck with disbelief: 'Is this all a dream, a divine phantasmagoria or maybe a delusion of my own intelligence, or would that what I so see differently be some yogic phenomenon natural to my child? Let me therefore surrender at the feet of Him beyond my range of vision whom I may not understand, who escapes my consciousness, mind, action and words and under whose control I live and may return [home, back to Godhead]. With the notion of myself as being the wife of this spouse having that son, as being the queen of Vraja owning all the wealth with authority over all the gopas and gopis with their cows and calves, I have it all wrong since only He is my purpose in life [see 5.5: 8, 7.9: 19 and B.G. 5: 29]. After mother Yashoda thus had received this understanding of His reality, He, the master of illusion, the mighty Vishnu, manifested for her again the magic of the affection for her son. With the memory [of the vision] instantly faded, the gopi placed her son on her lap with a heart filled with the same intense affection for her son as before. The Lord is glorified in all His greatness with the help of the three [Vedas], with philosophical exercises [the Upanishads], with yogic analysis [sankhya-yoga] and with other devoted literatures, but she simply thought about Him as being her son.'

The honourable king said: 'Oh brahmin, what were the pious activities [see B.G. 7: 16] performed by Nanda and Yashoda from whose breast the Lord drank His milk? How did they achieve the highest perfection of such a blessing? Not even His own father and mother could enjoy the magnanimous activities of the young Krishna who eradicates the impurities of the world, actions that even today are glorified by the transcendentalists!'

Shri Shuka said: 'Drona, the best of the demigods [the Vasus], determined to carry out the orders of Lord Brahma, together with his wife Dhara said the following to him: 'May we being born on this earth be devoted to the Supreme Godhead, the Master of the Entire Universe, the Lord who is the ultimate goal under whose care one can easily avoid a miserable life. 'So be it' was the answer [given by Brahma]. Drona thereupon took his birth in Vraja and became the Great One [the Bhagavan to Bhagavan], the highly distinguished and celebrated Nanda and she, Dhara, appeared as Yashoda [compare 10.3: 32-45 and see *4]. Oh son of Bharata, for that reason there was from both the parents and all the gopas and gopis, the constant [love of the] devotional service unto Him who had appeared as their son, the Lord our well-wisher. To substantiate the words of Brahma Krishna then together with the almighty [Bala-]Rama resided in Vraja to perform His pastimes [His 'lila'] to the delight of all.'

*: The Sanskrit says here 'by birth', but the parampara stresses the second birth or initiation. Svami Prabhupada comments: 'No one is born a brahmana; everyone is born a Shudra. But by the guidance of a brahmana and by samskara, one can become dvija, twice-born, and then gradually become a brahmana. Brahmanism is not a system meant to create a monopoly for a particular class of men. Everyone should be educated so as to become a brahmana. At least there must be an opportunity to allow everyone to attain the destination of life.' Next to this second birth there is also the third birth one has from one's sacrificial activities: independence is achieved with the internalisation of the guru (see also 4.31: 10, 7.11: 3).

 : The word 'krishna' means more than just 'dark'. Svami Prabhupada comments: 'If we analyze the nirukti, or semantic derivation, of the word "Krishna," we find that na signifies that He stops the repetition of birth and death, and krish means satartha, or "existence." (Krishna is the whole of existence.) Also, krish means "attraction," and na means ananda, or "bliss." His colours are discussed later on in BOOK eleven under: 11.5: 21, 24, 27 en 34.

*3: One of the mantras the Vaishnavas use to offer their food to Krishna is:

namo brahmanya-devaya
go-brahmana-hitaya ca
jagad-dhitaya krishnaya
govindaya namo namah

'My obeisances unto the godhead of the brahmins always concerned about the cows, the brahmins and the entire universe; unto Krishna, Govinda, my respects.'

*4: Concerning this difference between the privilege of being the actual parents Vasudeva and Devaki and being His foster parents Nanda and Yashoda, Prabhupada explains that there are two types of siddhas, the perfected ones or liberated souls: nitya siddhas and sadhana siddhas: those who are eternally liberated like Nanda and Yashoda who are eternally Krishna's associates or expansions of Krishna's personal body, and those ordinary human beings who acquire a special position by enduring sadhana, the spiritual practice of executing pious activities and following the regulative principles of devotional service.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 9:

Mother Yashoda Binds Lord Krishna

- Shri Shuka said: 'One day, when the maidservants were otherwise engaged, mother Yashoda, Nanda's queen, was churning and making her curd. During the time she was churning the butter she sang songs about everything she could remember her son had done. Being dressed in linen that was held by a belt around her shaking hips, her breasts, which at the nipples were wet because of her affection for her son, moved as she was churning and with that movement the bangles on her wrists and her earrings moved along in harmony. The perspiration because of the labour of pulling the churning rope meanwhile ran down her face and fell down together with the jasmine flowers from her hair. The Lord desirous to drink milk approached her as she was churning and getting affectionate with His mother, He stopped the churning rod by taking hold of it. She sweetly allowed Him on her lap to drink from her overflowing, loving breasts and watched with a smile how happy He was. When she saw how a pan of milk was boiling over she had to put Him aside quickly and leave, but He was not yet satisfied. Having gotten angry He, biting His full red lips and with false tears, with a stone broke the pot in which the butter was churned and, hidden from sight in an adjacent room, He began to eat from everything that was churned. The gopi rescued the boiling hot milk from the stove and returned to her workplace where she discovered that the churning pot was broken. Not seeing her child she with a smile concluded that it had been His work. Standing on top of a mortar He had turned over, He, anxiously looking around, from a hanging [storage] pot to His pleasure handed a share of the milk goodies out to a monkey. From behind watching these activities, she very slowly approached her son. Seeing her approaching with a stick in her hand He quickly climbed down and fled away, like He was afraid, with the gopi after Him - He who could not even be reached by the greatest yogis of penance who try to get access in their meditation [see also B.G. 18: 55]. Even though the quickly chasing mother with the flowers falling from her hair and with her heavy breasts to her thin waist, had to slow down, she nevertheless finally managed to capture Him. Seeing the little scoundrel remorsefully crying and rubbing the collyrium of His eyes all over His face with His hands, she caught Him with His fearful eyes by the hand with a threatening pose. With a good heart for her son understanding His fear she threw away the stick though and decided to bind Him with a rope. But she did not know what kind of power she was dealing with.

He to whom there is neither an inside nor an outside, neither a beginning nor an end, is both the beginning and the end, both the inside and the outside of the universe. He constitutes the complete of the universe. And He, the One Unmanifest, the One Unseen present in the form of a mortal being, was by the gopi taken for her son and bound to a mortar like one does with a normal child. When the rope she used to bind her naughty child fell short with a length of an inch, the gopi tied another rope to it. When even that one fell short she tried another one that, joining and joining, would not suffice either to bind Him staying short with [again] an inch. Yashoda proceeded with all the ropes in the household and thus failing she, being struck with wonder, had to laugh together with all the gopis taking part in the fun. Seeing His mother sweating and getting tired and all the flowers falling down from her loosened hair, Krishna was so gracious to allow her to bind Him. My best one, the Lord factually thus exhibited how He, Krishna, despite being the controller of the entire universe with all its demigods, is controlled by the servant [who is ruled] by His wishes [His devotees. Compare 7.3: 14-21]. Neither Lord Brahma, Lord Shiva, nor the Goddess of Fortune albeit residing at His side, received from the Giver of Final Liberation the mercy the gopi obtained. They who adhere to the physical concept of life [the karmis] as also the jnanis [the book people, the transcendentalists] and they who go for the soul only [the escapists, the impersonalists] cannot win as easily the Supreme Lord, the Son of the Gopi, as those can who are convinced of bhakti [of devotional service] in this world [see also B.G. 11: 54 and 18: 16].

While His mother was very busily engaged in her household, the Lord observed two arjuna trees outside who had been demigods [Guhyakas]. They once were the sons of the bestower of riches [Kuvera]. They were known then as the very prosperous Nalakuvara and Manigriva, but because of their conceit they had been cursed by Narada to become trees.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 10:

The Deliverance of the Sons of Kuvera

The king said: 'Oh powerful one, can you please describe the abominable act because of which the devarishi got angry and the two [sons of Kuvera] were cursed?'

- Shri Shuka said: 'Very proud of being elevated to the association of Rudra the ones born from the Keeper of Wealth, [one day] walked around in a beautiful park at the Mandakini river [upper-Ganges] near Kailasa [Shiva's mountain]. In that garden full of flowers they most bewildered, with their eyes rolling because of being intoxicated from drinking varuni, were together with women who sang songs to them. Because they wanted to enjoy themselves they in the company of the young girls entered the Ganges full of lotus beds, like two male elephants with their she-elephants. It so happened that Narada, the almighty devarishi, got to see them, oh son of Kuru, and from the demigods' maddened eyes could understand what state they were in. Seeing him their adherents [the girls] were ashamed and, afraid of being cursed, quickly covered their naked bodies with their garments. But the two guardians of Kuvera's treasures [the Shiva guhyakas], who were also naked did not. Seeing the two being drunk and blind with their prestige and wealth, he in order to teach the two sons of the light a lesson, pronounced a curse against them saying the following. Narada said: 'For the one who in the mode of passion enjoys the things of the world there is nothing as perplexing to the intelligence as the arrogance of wealth, a good birth, [a nice body, learning, riches] etc., in which one feels attracted to women, wine and gambling. In that position killing animals, merciless people out of control with themselves think that this body, which is doomed to perish, would not age and would not die [see also 7.15: 7, B.G. 9: 26]. The body, however deemed to be divine, after death serves the worms and turns into stool and ashes. Does someone with such a selfish attitude towards other living beings know what hell he is heading for [see also 5.26: 17]? Does this body belong to the one providing the food, to oneself, to one's father, to one's mother, or does it belong to one's father-in-law, to a state authority, to a buyer, to the fire or even to the scavengers? The question is: who would thus that knower actually be [that proprietor] of the body that manifested from the unmanifest nature and vanishes again? Who else but a fool would take the body for the real self and kill [other] living beings [see also 4.11: 10]? For fools blinded by pride about their wealth, poverty is the best ointment for their eyes. A poor man is better capable of seeing others as equal to himself [*]. Someone who is pricked by a pin does not wish anybody with a likewise body to experience such a pain, but not so a person who was never pricked by a pin. A poor man is free from all conceit associated with the falsehood of the self. The great difficulty [of poverty] that one by providence may encounter in this world, is for him the best austerity. Always being hungry the senses of the slim body of a poor person eager for food [], become less and less dominant and also the violence [that is the counterpart of the lust to eat] ceases. [As opposed to the rich] the poor can [easily] associate with the saints [who keep to the vow of poverty and are] equal minded towards all. The [mental] cause of their suffering as also their [physical] hankering is reduced by meeting such honest people so that purification is quickly achieved as a consequence [see also 10.8: 4]. Why would one avoid the equanimous renouncers of the world [the sadhus] who want to serve Mukunda and desire the association of materialists who proud of their wealth seek their refuge in that what is untrue [see also B.G. 7: 15]. I will therefore take away this ignorant conceit of these womanizing drunkards who because of the sweet liquor varuni, arrogant and blinded with the opulence have lost control of themselves. 0-2 Since these two sons of Kuvera being absorbed in darkness, in their pride indifferent towards others did not care to dress their bodies, they deserve it to become immobile [as two trees]. This in order to prevent that they repeat this. It is furthermore my mercy that their self-remembrance may continue and also my special favor that they, after a hundred years of the gods [a year is a day], may obtain the personal association of Vasudeva. With their bhakti revived they then may resume their celestial lives.'

Shri Shuka said: 'The devarishi thus having spoken went away to Narayana-ashrama [his abode], leaving Nalakuvara and Manigriva behind to become a pair of arjuna [] trees. To be true to the words of the seer, His topmost devotee, the Lord [who was bound to the mortar] very slowly [now] moved to the spot where the two arjuna trees were standing. [He thought:] 'The devarishi is most dear to Me. Even though these two were born from the loins of Kuvera [a rich man], I will perform according to the words stated by the great soul.' Thus having decided Krishna moved in between the arjuna and that way got the big mortar stuck across. The boy dragging the wooden mortar that was tied to His belly behind Him, with great force pulled over the two trees. They shook heavily because of His supreme power and came down with trunk, branches, leaves and roots up making a tremendous noise [4]. On the spot from the two trees two persons appeared, resplendently beautiful, like fire rising up and illuminating all directions. They offered Krishna head down with folded hands their obeisances. Being freed from passion and ignorance they said the following to the Lord of the Entire World: 'Krishna, oh Krishna, oh Supreme Master of Yoga! You are the root cause and the Original Person in the beyond of this world, of this creation of gross and subtle matter that by the brahmins is known as Your form. 0-3 You are the One for all living beings, You are the master of the life force, of the body, of the soul and the senses. You are the Time, the Supreme Lord Vishnu, the Imperishable Controller. You as the Greatest One who are both the cosmic creation and the subtle reality, You consisting of passion, goodness and slowness, are the Original Personality, Overseer and the Knower of the restless mind in all fields of action. Who, being locked up in a body with a mind that is agitated by the modes of nature, is capable of knowing You? Who now is worthy of You who are not confined to a body, You who existed before the creation and who, now being covered by the modes of nature, is present here before us? Therefore we offer You, Vasudeva, the Supreme Personality, the Origin of Creation, You whose light is covered by the might of Your natural modes, You the Brahman [both inside and outside], our respectful obeisances. 4-3 You who are not material but are known by the different embodiments of the avatars, thus demonstrates an incomparable, unlimited might in activities that cannot be performed by normally embodied persons. You, that same Goodness and Master of all blessings, have now appeared for the liberation and elevation of everyone, with all Your potencies and expansions! Our respects for You, oh Highest Virtue, oh Supreme Auspiciousness! For You, oh Vasudeva, oh Peaceful One and Master of the Yadus, our reverence. Oh Unlimited One, do we, the servants who could meet You, oh Supreme Lord because of the mercy of Your follower, the sage [Narada], have Your permission now [to leave]? May our words always concern Your pastimes, may our ears hear the talks about You, may our limbs be working for You and may our minds always remember Your lotus feet. May our heads bow to You, the All-pervading One, and may our sight be engaged in seeing the truthful ones [the saints, the Vaishnavas especially] who are Your partial embodiments.'

Shri Shuka said: 'This way being glorified by the two Guhyakas, the Supreme Lord, the Master of Gokula who with ropes was bound to the mortar, smiled and spoke to them. The Supreme Lord said: 'Everything of this incident with the most kind Narada that happened in the past is known to Me. What a great favor he did in cursing you to fall down for being blind in your madness about the wealth. Just as the eyes of a person who faces the sun [are freed from darkness] one is simply freed from all bondage by the presence of devotees who are equal towards all, by associating with persons dedicated to Me. Now that you, oh reeds [5] of Kuvera, are saturated with love towards Me, please return home with Me as the Supreme Destination, I who constitute the Supreme of your desire and from whom one never returns [to a worldly existence. See also B.G. 5: 17].'

Shri Shuka said: 'Thus being addressed by Him, the two circumambulated Him who was bound to the mortar. They offered their repeated obeisances, took leave and then left in the northern direction [where Kailasa is found].'

*: Prabhupada comments to this: 'There is an instructive story called punar mushiko bhava, "Again Become a Mouse". A mouse was very much harassed by a cat, and therefore the mouse approached a saintly person to request to become a cat. When the mouse became a cat, he was harassed by a dog, and then when he became a dog, he was harassed by a tiger. But when he became a tiger, he stared at the saintly person, and when that saintly person asked him, "What do you want?" the tiger said, "I want to eat you". Then the saintly person cursed him, saying, "May you again become a mouse".'

: Systematic hunger or regular fasting is in fact a standard procedure for devotees who regularly fast for a day like with ekadas': each eleventh day after the new and full moon the Vaishnava fasts from cereal and beans and then chants. Modern medicine confirms that a regular fast, or systematic hunger prolongs one's life. See also 8.16: payo vrata, fasting from solid food as the best of all sacrifices.

: Arjuna trees are still found in many forests. The bark is used by cardiologists to prepare medicine against heart trouble.

*4: It is because of this damodara-lila that Lord Krishna as a toddler is sometimes called Damodara: tied to the belly [see also the bhajan Damodarashthaka].

*5: 'reeds' is an expression referring to the hollowness of being surrendered.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 11:

A New Residence, the Fruit Vendor and Vatsasura and Bakasura Defeated

Shri Shuka said: 'The cowherd men led by Nanda heard the tumult of the falling trees and, afraid that it had been the thunder, went to the spot, oh best of the Kurus. Discovering that the two arjuna had fallen to the ground they, flabbergasted, had no idea what the cause of this apparent crash would be. Who could have done this? The child, dragging the wooden mortar that He was bound to by the rope? How could this wondrous thing have happened? They were perplexed. The other children said: 'He has done it, with the mortar getting across. He dragged it in between the trees! And there were also two personalities. We saw it with our own eyes! They could not believe what they said. 'That is not possible! How could such a small child have uprooted the trees?' But some of them had doubts [and deemed it very well possible]. When Nanda saw that his son with a rope being tied to a big mortar was dragging around with it, he had to smile and released Him.

The Supreme Lord encouraged by the gopis, sometimes danced or sang for them, as if He was a simple, ordinary child they could control like a wooden doll. Sometimes He on request carried a wooden seat, a measuring jug or a pair of shoes, to which He made fun with His relatives by striking His arms [as if He would be a strong adult]. By acting like a child to the pleasure of everyone, the Supreme Lord in Vraja showed the world to what extent He submits to His devotees.

Krishna [one day] heard a fruit vendor calling: 'Oh people, come and get your fruits! And so the Infalible One, the Bestower of all Fruits who wanted some fruits, quickly grabbed some paddy and came to buy fruit. What He had to offer had slipped from the palms of His hands [on the way], but the fruit lady filled them [nevertheless] with fruits. Thereupon the entire basket of fruits filled with gold and jewels!'

After the incident with the arjuna Rohini Devi once called for Krishna and Rama who were absorbed in their playing with the other children at the riverside. When the boys immersed in their games upon being called did not show up, Rohini sent mother Yashoda to take care of the sons. As she was calling for her son Krishna and for the other boys whom He so late still was playing with, because of her love the milk flowed from her breasts. 'Krishna, oh Krishna my lotus-eyed one, oh darling, stop playing and drink some milk. You must be tired and hungry my son! Oh Rama, please come right now together with Your younger brother, oh love of the family. You enjoyed Your breakfast this morning and You now must be needing some more! Oh scion of Das'arha [worthy of service], the Yadus], the king of Vraja wants to eat and is waiting for You. Come here, be nice and let the other boys go home. You are covered with dirt my son, come and take a bath. Today is the day of Your birth star, be clean and then we'll give cows to the brahmins! Just see how the boys of Your age, being washed by their mothers, are all dressed up. You too with a bath, having eaten and being decorated should enjoy now.' Mother Yashoda thus in her intense love considering the Highest of them All to be her son, oh ruler of man, took Krishna and Rama by the hand and brought them home to get them presentable.'

Shri Shuka said: 'The elderly gopas who witnessed the great disturbances in the Big Forest came together with Nanda to discuss what was happening in Vraja. Upananda [Nanda's elder brother], the oldest and wisest one with the greatest experience, said in that meeting what, according to the time and circumstances, to the interest of Rama and Krishna would be the best thing to do: 'We who wish the best for our Gokula, should leave this place all together. Great disturbances are occurring here with the evil intent to kill the boys. The reason for this is that, somehow or other with the grace of the Lord, He, this boy, was delivered from the hands of the Rakshasi [Putana] who came here to kill the children and because of the fact that the falling handcart almost hit Him. And then the Lord of the Suras had to save Him from the demon in the form of a whirlwind who transported Him into the sky and so dangerously collapsed on the rocky ground. Being protected by the infalible One the child and the other children also escaped from dying because of the two [falling] trees He got stuck in between. As long as that devil [behind these attacks] is harassing us, we cannot stay in this cow place. To the interest of the boys we all together have to move to another place, before it is too late. There is [another] forest named Vrindavana [the 'clustered forest' *] with lots of fresh greenery and serene rock formations that with its variety of plants and wealth of grasses is a very suitable place for gopa, gopi and cow [go]. Let us therefore immediately go there today and not waste any time. We get all carts ready and be on our way with the cows, our wealth, in front - if you all agree.'

Hearing that, the gopas said unanimously: 'That is the right way, the correct approach', and began to assemble the cows and load their belongings. 1-3 Putting the elders, the children and women on the bullock carts and next their belongings, the gopas with the greatest care took their bows and arrows and departed together with the priests, oh King, thereby keeping the cows in front and loudly vibrating their horns and bugles all around. The gopis, nicely dressed with their gold around their necks and their bodies decorated with fresh kunkum, sang during the ride on the carts with great pleasure about Krishna's pastimes. Yashoda and Rohini, beautifully together with Krishna and Balarama being seated on one cart, were very happy to hear the stories being sung. Reaching Vrindavana, a place most agreeable throughout all seasons, they settled for a cow compound by placing their carts in a semi-circle like the form of the moon. Oh ruler of man, when Rama and Madhava saw Vrindavana with Govardhana hill and the banks of the Yamuna, they were very happy. The two boys with Their children's games and broken language thus delighted the inhabitants of the cow community [the new Vraja]. In due course of time They were old enough to take care of the calves. Sporting in different ways with all kinds of games, They together with the other cowherd boys, tended the calves close to the lands of Vraja. 9-4 Sometimes blowing their flutes, sometimes hurling with a sling [for the fruits], sometimes moving their feet for the tinkling [of their ankle bells], sometimes playing cow and bull while bellowing loudly imitating the animals that fought with each other and sometimes imitating the sounds of other animals, They wandered around just like two normal children.

One day on the bank of the Yamuna tending their calves with their playmates, a demon [Vatsasura] appeared on the scene with the intent to kill Krishna and Balarama. Assuming the form of a calf he had mixed with the other calves. But the Lord spotted him and, gesturing to Baladeva, pointed him out while He inconspicuously slowly moved in his direction. Acyuta caught him by the hind legs and his tail, whirled him heavily around and next threw him lifeless on top of a kapittha tree []. There the body of the demon assumed a giant size whereupon he together with the tree, fell to the ground. The boys who all had witnessed this incident, were greatly amazed and praised Him, exclaiming: 'Well done, very good!', and the gods being pleased showered flowers. This couple, the Sole Protectors of All the Worlds who had turned into protectors of calves, that morning finished their breakfast and next wandered around tending the young animals.

With each of them being responsible for his own group of calves, they one day wishing to quench their thirst arrived at a reservoir where they drenched the animals and thereupon themselves also drank from the water. There the boys saw a gigantic body looking like a mountain peak broken off by a thunderbolt and fallen down, that frightened them. It belonged to a big demon called Bakasura, who had assumed the body of a gigantic heron [a baka ]. All of a sudden most powerfully rising up he with his sharp beak swallowed Krishna. Seeing Krishna being devoured by the heron all the boys headed by Rama were flabbergasted and stood completely overwhelmed and stared, nailed to the ground. He, the son of a cowherd, the Master of the Lord of the Universe [Brahma], started deep in its throat to burn like fire and was instantly angrily released without a scratch. The heron thereupon immediately tried to kill Him again with its sharp beak. With Bakasura attacking again, He with His arms caught the beak of that friend of Kamsa, after which He, as the Master of the Truthful Ones and to the pleasure of the denizens of heaven, before the eyes of the boys, tore it apart as easily as one splits a blade of grass. At that moment the gods of all places accompanied by drums, conches and prayers, showered jasmine and other flowers from Indra's paradise [Nandana-kanana] and congratulated the enemy of Bakasura. Seeing this, the cowherd sons were struck with wonder. The way the senses return to life [when one regains consciousness], the boys headed by Balarama returned to life when He was released from the beak of the heron. Freed from the danger they embraced Him, assembled their calves and returned to Vraja. There they loudly declared [that Krishna had defeated another demon]. The gopas and the gopis were astounded when they heard all the stories. Eagerly staring at them as if they had returned from death, they filled with admiration most delighted could not turn their eyes away from the boys. [They said to themselves:] What a miracle that this boy, having faced so many life threats, is still around, while all those who gave rise to fear themselves had to experience the hatefulness they gave in to. Even though they had approached with the intent to kill this boy, none of the evil planners who appeared so grotesque in their malice, managed to succeed. Besieging Him they all died like flies in the fire. That is how it is: the words of the knowers of Brahman never ever prove false. That what by the supreme master [Garga] was predicted has happened exactly so [see 10.8: 8-9]! This way Nanda's gopas delighted in the pleasure to talk about the stories about Krishna and Balarama without ever running into the pains of the world [see also 1.7: 6]. The two boys thus passed their childhood in the cow-community with different children's games like playing hide and seek, building dams and jumping around like they were monkeys.'

*: Vrindavana is situated between Nandes'vara and Mahavana.

 : The kapittha is sometimes called kshatbelpala. The pulp of this fruit is very palatable. It is sour-sweet and liked by each and everyone.

 : The heron is regarded a bird of great cunning, deceit and deliberation and so it stands for the hypocrite, the cheat, the rogue.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 12:

The Killing of the Demon Aghasura

Shri Shuka said: 'One day the Lord decided to have a picnic in the forest. Rising early He blew His horn nicely to wake up His comrades and the calves. Then they departed from Vraja driving their groups of calves in front of them. It offered a most attractive sight to see them all happy and beautifully together as they walked out in His company with their prods, horns, flutes and the many calves each of them had. All together they numbered over a thousand. With Krishna's personal calves added to them they could not be counted anymore. Immersed in their children's games, the boys had a good time in different places [in the forest].

Even though they were already adorned with gems, shells, gold and pearls, they also used fruits, green leaves, bunches of beautiful flowers, peacock feathers and coloured minerals to decorate themselves. They snatched away each other's belongings and threw them at a distance when it was discovered. Others threw them further away, but then again they were returned with a laugh. When Krishna walked away to admire the beauty of the forest, they enjoyed it to say 'me first, me first' while they touched Him. -1 Some blew their flutes, some vibrated their horns, some hummed along with the bumblebees and others imitated the cuckoos. Some ran after the shadows of the birds, some walked elegantly with the swans or sat with the ducks just as silent or danced with the peacocks. They searched for young monkeys and hopped along with them between the trees as they were skipping from tree to tree. They jumped together with the frogs, getting wet in the water, they laughed at their shadows and mocked their own echoes. This way they enjoyed the merit of their previous lives in friendship with Him who is the Supreme Divinity for those who are entangled in maya, He who is the spiritual happiness for those transcendentalists who accept it to be of service [as a consequence thereof. See * and 1.1: 2, 1.7: 6 and 2.1: 6]. Yogis skilled in self-control do not even after many lives of doing penance achieve the dust of His lotus feet. How fortunate then are the inhabitants of Vraja for whom He became the object of their vision by personally being present?

And then the one named Agha ['the evil one'] appeared on the scene, a great demon who could not tolerate the sight of their happy pastimes. His life's end was awaited by all the immortal souls, in spite of the nectar they drank. When Aghasura, who was sent by Kamsa and who was the younger brother of Baki [Putana] and Bakasura, saw the boys who were led by Krishna, he thought: 'This must be the killer of the two who together with me took birth from the same mother. Let me therefore now for their sake, kill Him and His boys! When these boys have become the sesame and water for the funeral rites of my brother and sister, when the strength of the life of the inhabitants of Vraja [their children] has disappeared, when these living beings whom they consider the very embodiment of their love and breath have left them, they all will be as good as dead.' Thus having decided he assumed the wondrous form of a very, very large python that extended for miles. Therewith he occupied, as high as a mountain and with a mouth spread wide open like a mountain cave, that moment most wickedly the road in order to swallow the picnickers. Keeping his mouth wide open, his lower lip rested on the earth and his upper lip touched the sky. His teeth were like mountain peaks, the inside was pitch dark, his tongue resembled a broad road, his breath was like a warm wind and his fiery look was like a fire. Seeing him in that position they all considered it Vrindavana at its best. It was for them a known game [to act] as if they were looking at the form of a python's mouth: 'Look dear friends! A dead python there before us, ready to swallow us all with its snake mouth spread open, is it not? It is obvious, really, that cloud up there is the upper lip and below, that big sand bank with that reddish glow, is his lower lip... On the left and right, those caves, look just like the corners of the mouth and those peaks there, are exactly like the animal's teeth. The length and breadth of the broad path, is like the tongue and the darkness, in between the mountains, looks like the inside of its mouth. Just notice how that hot wind blowing from a forest fire is like its breath, and the bad smell of the flesh of the burned corpses, stinks like the flesh within its belly. Would this animal be here to devour all who dare to enter? With that being so, he will, just like the heron, be immediately vanquished by Krishna!' so they said, looking at the gleaming face of Him, Baka's enemy, while they loudly laughing and clapping their hands entered its mouth.

Krishna heard them talking this and that way besides the truth. They did not realise what they were dealing with. He knew that the Rakshasa was very real and was deceiving them and so He arrived at the conclusion that He, the Supreme Lord, the Complete Whole of All Living Beings who is situated in the heart, should stop His comrades. Meanwhile, all the boys and their calves had entered the belly of the demon, but they were not devoured. The Rakshasa who was thinking of his dead relatives, waited for Baka's enemy to enter. Krishna, who for each and everyone is the source of fearlessness, was amazed to witness that and compassionately felt sorry about this twist of fate. They who had no one but Him now helplessly had moved away from His control to burn as straws in the fire of the belly of Aghasura, death personified. What to do now? This rogue should not exist, nor should the innocent and faithful ones find their end. How could He achieve both ends at the same time? Gathering His thoughts the Lord, the Unlimited Seer, knew what to do and entered the mouth. That very moment all the gods exclaimed from behind the clouds in fear 'Alas, alas!' and Kamsa and the other bloodthirsty friends of Aghasura rejoiced. When He heard that, Krishna, the Supreme Lord who is never vanquished, immediately expanded Himself [see siddhi] within the throat of the demon who tried to crush the boys and the calves in his belly. With that action the airways were blocked and the eyes of the squirming and wrestling giant popped out. The life air was arrested within the internally completely obstructed body and then broke out through the top of the skull. After all life air had left the body and Krishna saw that the boys and calves lay dead, He, Mukunda, the Supreme Lord, brought them back to life whereupon He reappeared from the mouth in their company. From the body a most wonderful bright light issued that all by itself illumined the ten directions. It remained in the sky waiting until the Supreme Personality appeared and then, before the eyes of the demigods, it entered His body [sayujya-mukti]. Everyone most pleased thereupon performed his specific service of worship [see also 1.2: 13]: flowers were showered, the singers of heaven sang, the heavenly girls danced, the demigods played their specific instruments and the brahmins offered prayers. The Unborn One [Lord Brahma] who nearby in his abode heard the wondrous sounds of those for everyone so very auspicious prayers, sweet sounds, songs and different celebrations, came immediately and stood amazed to see the glory of the Supreme Master.

Oh King, after the skin of the python had dried, it became a place of interest for the inhabitants of Vrindavana that for a long, long time afterwards was used as a cave. This incident - of the snake's death and deliverance and the liberation of Him and His associates - that took place when the Lord was five years old [kaumara] - was by the boys in Vraja disclosed one year later [pauganda] as if it had happened that very day. However unthinkable it might be for an impure soul, it is not that astonishing that even Aghasura was liberated from all contamination and [with the light of his soul] could merge with the Supersoul. All he had to do was to associate but for a moment with the Supreme Creator of a higher and lower existence, when He assumed the form of a human child. This destination He even grants those who [like Aghasura] but once got innerly connected to His form because of a certain state of mind in relation to His divinity [thus even being connected in hatred]. What then would that mean for those in whom He is ever present as the remover of illusion, as the One who always grants each and every soul the realisation of transcendental happiness? "

Shri Suta [see 1: 12-15] said: "He [Parikshit] who was protected by the God of the Yadus [Yadavadeva or Krishna] and who this way, oh twice-born one, heard about the so very wonderful activities of his savior [see 1.8], thus being fixed in his consciousness asked the son of Vyasa for more about these meritorious deeds. The honourable king said: 'Oh brahmin how could what happened in the past, be described as having happened in the present? How can that be possible? How could what the Lord did at the age of five years by the boys be described as having occurred at His sixth? Oh great yogi, I am burning with curiosity. Please, explain this incident to me, oh guru, I am certain that it was caused by nothing but the deluding potency of the Lord [yoga-maya]. In this world oh teacher, we as a mundane ruler are most blessed with the opportunity to always drink from the nectar of your sacred talks about Krishna.' "

Shri Suta said: "When the man of penance this way was questioned by him, he had completely lost contact with his senses the very moment that he was reminded of the Infinite One. After with difficulty slowly having regained his external vision, he answered the Lord's most outstanding, finest adherent."

* : Shрила Prabhupada comments: 'The secret of success is unknown to people in general, and therefore Shрила Vyasadeva, being compassionate toward the poor souls in this material world, especially in this age of Kali, has given us the Shrimad Bhagavatam. Shrimad Bhagavatam puranam amalamb yad vaishnavanam priyam (S.B. 12.13: 1. For Vaishnavas who are somewhat advanced, or who are fully aware of the glories and potencies of the Lord, Shrimad Bhagavatam is a beloved Vedic literature. After all, we have to change this body (tatha dehantara-prapthi). If we do not care about Bhagavad Gita and Shrimad Bhagavatam, we do not know what the next body will be. But if one adheres to these two books - Bhagavad Gita and Shrimad Bhagavatam - one is sure to obtain the association of Krishna in the next life (tyaktva deham punar janma naiti mam eti so 'rjuna [B.G. 4: 9]). Therefore, distribution of Shrimad Bhagavatam all over the world is a great welfare activity for theologians, philosophers, transcendentalists and yogis (yoginam api sarvesham [B.G. 6: 47]), as well as for people in general'.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 13:

Lord Brahma Steals the Boys and Calves

Shri Shuka said: 'Asking such very good questions you are a most fortunate soul oh best of the devotees, because you with your wish to hear the stories about the Lord again and again, lend them new charm. This is what sets apart the truthful ones who accepted the essence of life: that what is their life's purpose, the aim of their understanding and what comes first to their mind, appears to be new every time they properly discuss matters in relation to the Infallible One, despite the repetition, just like every woman seems to be new to a womanizer. Please listen carefully, oh King, I will relate it to you... even though it is a confidential subject. For gurus describe even hidden matters to a loving disciple.

After He had saved the boys and calves from the mouth of that deadly Agha, the Supreme Lord brought them to the river bank and spoke the following words: 'Oh, how beautiful this river bank is My dear friends! It offers all opportunity to play, with its soft and clean sands, the aroma of the blooming lotuses that attract the bumblebees and the sounds of the chirping birds everywhere in the many trees! Let us eat here. It is late now and we are weak from hunger. After the calves drank from the water, they at ease can eat from the nearby grasses.' They consented, let the calves drink from the water and took them to the tender grasses. Then they opened their lunch bags and happily enjoyed their meal together with the Supreme Lord. In a wide circle happily facing inward, the boys of Vraja grouped in rows around Krishna. Thus sitting down in the forest they looked as beautiful as the petals and leaves that make up the whorl of a lotus flower. Some of them used flower petals as a plate while others used bunches of leaves, twigs, fruits, [the material of] their packets, the bark of trees or a slab of rock. All of them allowed the others a taste of their own favorite food and thus they with the Lord had a good time taking their lunch while laughing and making others laugh. With His flute tucked away in His belt and with the horn and the prod at His left side, He took the yogurt rice and pieces of fruit between His fingers. Keeping Himself in the middle of the circle of His comrades He made them laugh telling His jokes. The denizens of heaven thus witnessed how the Enjoyer of all Sacrifices was enjoying His childhood pastimes. Oh scion of Bharata, while the Infallible One this way in harmony was eating together with the cowherds, the calves looking for grass had wandered deep into the forest. Noticing that, Krishna, the Terror of Fear, said to the worried boys: 'Oh friends, stay where you are, I will bring the calves back to this spot!' Krishna, the Supreme Lord, after saying this, went away with a bit of food in His hand to look everywhere in the mountains, the caves, the bushes and the bowers for the calves of His friends.

He who was born from the lotus and who resides in the beyond [Lord Brahma], was very charmed by the way the Lord had enchanted the boys. Just to see more of it he led the boys and their calves away to hide them elsewhere, oh man of the Kuru bond. This authority from heaven who before had witnessed the deliverance of Aghasura, had become very astonished about the Almighty Personality [see footnote*]. When Krishna nowhere could find the calves nor the cowherd boys after He had returned to the river bank, He searched the entire forest for the both of them. Neither finding the calves nor their caretakers anywhere in the forest, Krishna, well aware of everything going on in the universe, understood immediately that this was the work of Vidhi [Lord Brahma]. In order to please the mothers of the boys and also him [Brahma], Krishna, the Controller managing the entire universe, thereupon expanded Himself to both the forms [of cowherd boy and calf]. With a perfect likeness of the cowherd boys and their tender calves, having the same size of legs and hands and the same bugles, flutes, sticks and bags and such; with the same ornaments and dresses in all respects, with exactly their character, habits, features, attributes and traits and playing the same games and such, Krishna, the Unborn One, manifested Himself in expansions of Vishnu with the same voices and bodies they had. Personally thus in different ways enjoying the company that He offered Himself in the form of the calves and the cowherd boys, He, the Soul of All, thereupon entered Vraja. He brought Himself in the form of the different calves to the different cowsheds and next entered the different houses with the different persons He had become oh King. As soon as their mothers heard the sound of their flutes, they immediately abandoned what they were doing and lifted them as feathers up in their arms. They hugged them and allowed them, being wet from their love, to drink from their nectarean breast milk. In that spirit feeding their sons [they were thus of respect for] the Supreme Divinity [the Supreme Lord]. Every time Madhava thereupon in the evening came home oh ruler of man, having finished what He had to do, they happily took care of Him with their actions of massaging, bathing, smearing and decorating Him, chanting mantras for His protection, marking Him with tilaka and sumptuously feeding [all the boys He was]. Thereafter the cows, that had arrived in their sheds, immediately loudly mooing called for their calves. These followed them, were time and again licked by them and fed with the milk that flowed from their udders. From cow and gopi there was in this matter the motherly affection as there was before, be it that since this love now was derived from the Lord [in the form of the calves and boys], it was free from the bewilderment of 'this is my child' [free from 'I' and 'mine']. Now that the children of the inhabitants of Vraja, unlike before, were all like Krishna for the time of a year, the creeper of affection for them [and Him] gradually, day by day, increased without a limit. Thus for the period of a year tending Himself in the form of the calves by means of Himself in the form of the cowherd boys, He, the Supersoul, wished to play His game [His lila] in the community and the forest.

One day, five or six days before a whole year had passed, the Unborn Lord, together with Balarama taking care of the calves, entered the forest. In the vicinity of Vraja looking for grass for their calves, they at a distance were spotted by the mother cows that were pasturing on top of Govardhana hill. As soon as they saw them they, urged by their love, forgot about the herd. Despite the difficult path, they broke away from their caretakers and loudly mooing galloped fast [downhill] with their necks raised to their humps, their heads and tails upwards and dripping milk from their udders. The cows united with their calves at the foot of the hill and, despite having calved again, fed them with their flow of milk and anxiously licked their limbs as if they wanted to swallow them. The gopas being frustrated in their efforts to keep them from the difficult and dangerous path, felt greatly ashamed for having gotten angry with them, for when they got there, they found their sons together with the cows and calves. Their minds were steeped in a mood of utter, transcendental love and with that great attraction their anger melted away like snow before the sun. Lifting their boys up in their arms to embrace them, they smelled their heads and experienced the highest pleasure. Thereafter the elderly gopas, overjoyed with the embraces, could only with difficulty tear themselves loose from them and had tears in their eyes upon the memory. When Balarama saw the abundance of love and the constant attachment of all the inhabitants of Vraja, however long ago their children and the calves had left behind their mother's breast, He could not understand the reason for this and wondered: 'What kind of miracle is happening here? The divine love [prema] of Me and everyone here in Vraja for the children and for Vasudeva, the Soul of the Complete Whole, has never been so big! Who would be behind all this? What has caused it? Is it a divine being, is it a woman or a she-devi? In any case it must be the special grace [Maya-devi] of My Sustainer. Who else could bewilder Me like this?' Pondering thus He through His mind's eye saw that all the calves along with their companions were [manifestations of] the Lord of Vaikuntha. [Balarama said to Krishna:] 'These boys are no [incarnated] masters of enlightenment, nor are these calves great sages. You oh Supreme Controller, only You are the One who manifests Himself in all the diversity of existence. How can You be everything that exists at the same time? Tell Me, what exactly is Your word to this?' By saying these words Baladeva then with His Lordship arrived at an understanding of the situation [].

The selfborn one [Brahma] returning after such a long time, saw that, even though it was but a moment later to his own notion [see kalpa], one year later the Lord was playing together with His expansions like He did before. [He said to himself:] 'Because the many boys in Gokula together with their calves, fast asleep are situated on the bed of my deluding power, it cannot be so that they today would have risen again. I therefore wonder where these boys here came from. They are different from the ones bewildered by my power of illusion. Yet the same number of them is for an entire year playing together with Vishnu!' For a long time thus contemplating what the difference between the two would be, he, the selfborn one, by no means could determine who of them were the real ones and who not. And thus even he, the unseen one, was factually bewildered by his own mystic power, he who wanted to mystify Vishnu, the One who Himself being elevated above all misconception, mystifies the entire universe. As meaningless as the obscurity of a fog is during the night and the light of a glowworm is during the day, a person of a lesser mystic potency will realise nothing but his own destruction when he tries to use this power against a great personality. And even as the selfborn one was looking on, he saw the herders of the calves appearing with the complexion of a rain cloud and in clothes of yellow silk. 7-4 They had four arms and held a conch, a disc, a club and a lotus in Their hands. They wore helmets, earrings, necklaces and garlands of forest flowers. They were marked with the Shrivatsa, carried the [Kaushtubha] jewel about Their conch-striped necks and had bracelets around Their wrists. They had ornaments at Their feet and bangles on Their ankles. With Their belts around Their waists and Their rings around Their fingers They were most beautiful to behold. From head to toe all Their limbs were covered by strings of fresh, soft tulsī [basil] that had been offered by those [devotees] who are of great merit [see also 10.12: 7-11]. With Their smiles as bright as moonlight and the clear glances of Their reddish eyes, They, being just like [the natural modes of white] goodness and [reddish] passion, were the creators and protectors of the desires of Their devotees [compare 10.3: 20]. The Praiseworthy Primal Being [of Vishnu thus] was by all beings moving and not moving, from the first being [of Brahma] down to the smallest clump of grass, worshiped in different ways, with [for instance] dance and song. The glory of the perfections [siddhis, being like the smallest etc.], the mystic potencies headed by Aja [] and the twenty-four elements of creation headed by the complete of them [the mahat-tattva] were standing around Them [in a personal appearance]. They were worshiped by the time factor [kala], the individual nature [svabhava], the reform by purification [samskara], desire [kama], fruitive action [karma], the modes [guna] and other powers the glory of whose appearances was defeated by His greatness [see also B.G. 13: 22]. They were embodiments of the complete, one essence full of knowledge, bliss, truth and eternity. In Their glory They were of a greatness beyond the reach of even the seers of philosophy [see also 1.2: 12 and *4]. The selfborn Brahma thus saw Them all instantly as expansions of the Supreme Absolute Truth [para-brahman] by whose effulgence this entire creation, moving or not moving, is manifested. By Their radiance being caught in bliss and shaken in all his eleven senses, the selfborn one thereupon fell silent, just like the doll of a child [is nullified] by the presence of a locally worshiped deity.

The One Never Born [Krishna] understood that the lord of Ira [Brahma's consort Sarasvatī] thus was mystified. Because by [the presence of] Him who is known by the Vedas [as the Supreme Brahman] everything else is nullified, because that self-manifested [multiple] blissfulness above the material energy superseded Brahma's glory and he therefore could not fathom what he was dealing with, the Lord all at once tore away the veil of His yogamaya [see also 7.7: 23]. Then, with his external consciousness revived, he like a dead man with difficulty stood up and opened his eyes to behold this [universe] including himself. That moment looking in all directions he saw Vrindavana situated in front of him with its many trees, a place sustaining and pleasing its inhabitants during all seasons. Man and beast who are inimical by nature, live together like friends in that residence of the Invincible One from which all anger, thirst and all of that has fled away. There the one residing in the beyond [Brahma], saw Him, the Absolute Truth Without a Second, the Supreme Unlimited One of Unfathomable Knowledge who had assumed the role of a child in a cowherd family. He saw Him the way He was before: all alone and searching everywhere for His calves and boys with a morsel of food in His hand [*5]. When he saw that, he quickly came down from his carrier [the swan] and fell with his body flat to the ground like a golden rod. With the tips of his four crowns he therewith touched His feet and bowing down performed a bathing ceremony with the pure water of his tears of joy. Over and over thinking about what he previously had seen, he rose and fell for a long time again and again at the feet of Krishna, the greatness present there. Gradually getting up again he, looking up at Mukunda, wiped his eyes and with his head bent over, a trembling body and a faltering voice extolled Him humbly with folded hands and a concentrated mind.'

*: Shрила Prabhupada comments: 'Anyone materially born is subject to bewilderment. This pastime is therefore called brahma-vimohana-lila, the pastime of bewildering Brahma. Mohitam nabhijanati mam ebhyaḥ param avayam (B.G. 7: 1. Materially born persons cannot fully understand Krishna. Even the demigods cannot understand Him (muhyaṅti yat surayah). Tene Brahma hrida ya adi-kavaye (S.B. 1.1: . Everyone, from Brahma down to the small insect, must take lessons from Krishna.'

 : Shрила Prabhupada comments: 'We should be careful to note that although the supreme source is one, the emanations from this source should be separately regarded as inferior and superior [meaning unconscious and conscious - ed.]. The difference between the Mayavada and Vaishnava philosophies is that the Vaishnava philosophy recognises this fact. Shri Caitanya Mahaprabhu's philosophy, therefore, is called acintya-bhedabhedā - simultaneous oneness and difference.' [see also the dual position taken by Krishna in the Bhagavad Gita 7: 3-6].

: Ajah means unborn but Aja, the she-goat, is a nickname of His deluding power by Maya-devi or Durga. According to Prabhupada [the parampara] namely the word aja means maya, or mystic power: everything mysterious is in full existence in Vishnu. Aja Taulvali is, according to the Cologne lexicon, the name of a Muni who lived on the milk of a she-goat [an aja]. The term aja [the he-goat] itself refers to the leader of the flock, the driver, mover, instigator, and is used for indicating Indra, Rudra, one of the Maruts, Agni, the sun, Brahma, Vishnu and Shiva.

*4: Shрила Prabhupada comments: 'Yet although Krishna cannot be seen through the Upanishads, in some places it is said that Krishna can in fact be known in this way. Aupanishadam purusham: "He is known by the Upanishads." This means that when one is purified by Vedic knowledge, one is then allowed to enter into devotional understanding (madbhaktim labhate param [B.G. 18: 54]).'

*5: Shрила Prabhupada comments: 'A similar incident occurred when Brahma went to see Krishna in Dvaraka. When Krishna's doorman informed Lord Krishna that Lord Brahma had arrived, Krishna responded, "Which Brahma? Ask him which Brahma." The doorman relayed this question, and Brahma was astonished. "Is there another Brahma besides me?" he thought. When the doorman informed Lord Krishna, "It is four-headed Brahma," Lord Krishna said, "Oh, four-headed. Call others. Show him".'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 14:

Brahma's Prayers to Lord Krishna

Shri Brahma said: 'My praise for You, oh Son of the Cowherd King, oh worshipable Lord whose beauty is characterised by a resplendent face, soft feet, a body as dark as a raincloud, clothes as bright as lightning, gunja [seed] ornaments [on Your ears], peacock feathers, a garland of forest flowers, a morsel of food [see 10.13: 14], a rod, a bugle and a flute. Oh Godhead so full of mercy for me, even with this body of Yours before me, that to the desire of Your devotees has manifested but at the other hand is not a material product at all, I, Brahma, with my inward mind cannot directly fathom Your greatness, not to mention the happiness You experience within Yourself. Even though You are Invincible in the three worlds, You surrender to the will of those persons who, in maintaining their material positions, regularly exercise their body, words and mind and [are prepared to] listen to the stories about You the way they are described by the devotees - by those truthful souls who, living simply, offer their obeisances and no longer try to be of any intellectual achievement [apart from You]. The so highly beneficial path of bhakti oh Almighty Lord, is rejected by those who struggle exclusively for the achievement of knowledge [enlightenment]. Their efforts though mean nothing but trouble to them, just as empty husks are nothing but a hindrance to the ones threshing. A long time ago, oh Almighty One, there was in this world many a yoga adept who, dedicating all his actions to You, acquired insight by doing his duty. It is indeed so that by performing devotional service someone with the presentation [the chanting and reading] of Your stories easily can achieve Your Supreme Destination, oh Infallible One [see also 7.5: 23-24]! Nevertheless, oh Completeness of Existence, only he is able to understand the potency of You as being without material qualities [nirguna], who is of a pure engagement with a mind and senses that are free from agitations. A person is truly free from attachments to this or that form only when he follows Your love without another instruction for himself, and not otherwise. Great scientists in the long run might succeed in counting all the particles present in the universe of the earth, the sky, the snow and the light of the stars. But who would be able to count all the qualities of You, the Self of All Qualities [gunatma], who descended for the benefit of all living beings [compare 8.5: 6]? Someone who earnestly hopes for Your compassion, endures the consequences of his own actions and offers You his obeisances with his heart, words and body, will lead a life directed at the position of liberation, because he then will be the heir of Your service [see also 1.5: 17, 1.19: 32, 2.1: 12, 3.33: 6, 4.20: 11, 4.29: 38 etc.]. Just see, oh Lord, how I, just to test Your potency, by expanding my illusory power, have behaved myself in an uncivilised manner towards even You, the Deluder of All Deluders, the Unlimited, Original Supersoul. What is my will compared to Yours? But a spark relative to a fire! Therefore oh Infallible One, I offer You my excuses, I, born from passion, who as the unborn one thought himself to be independent from You. My eyes were blinded by the darkness of ignorance. Does someone like me, who accepts You as his master, not deserve Your mercy? What am I with my material nature, with those seven vitasī [± 63 inches] of this body, with this totality of matter, false ego, ether, air, fire, water and earth that surrounds me like a pot? What am I compared to the unlimited universes that like atomic dust move away from the openings and pores of Your body, Your greatness [see also 1.3: 3 and 3: 11]? Oh Lord from the Beyond, does the mother count it as an offense when a child kicks its legs within the womb? What, being labeled with designations as 'existent' or 'nonexistent', would there actually be outside of Your abdomen? Have I, the 'selfborn' Brahma [aja *5] not originated from You? Are the words untrue that state that when the three worlds ended and You Narayana laid down in the waters of devastation, I have appeared on the lotus of the stem that grew from Your abdomen [see 3: 8]? Are You not Narayana the Soul of all living beings? You are the Teacher Within the Heart, the Witness of All Worlds, the Nara-ayana: the lead of man and the source from which the waters originated. That is what You truly are and not so much your deluding material energy [maya]. If that real transcendental body of Yours that shelters the entire universe is situated upon the water, why then did I not see it oh Supreme Lord [when I was looking for You]? And why did You, when I could not see you clearly in the heart, on the other hand then suddenly become visible again [see 3.8: 22]? In this incarnation, oh Dispeller of Maya, You [by opening Your mouth] have demonstrated to Your mother the illusory nature of this externally visible manifested universe that is also in its entirety present inside of You [see 10.7: 35-36 & 10.8: 37-39]. The way all of this including Yourself is visible within You, it is also fully present outside. This is only possible because of Your inconceivable potency! Did You not just today show me how this all, except for Yourself, is based upon Your bewildering potency? First You were there all alone and then You became all of Vraja's boys and calves. Next You even became a same number of four-handed forms who were served by all [the powers] including me and then You became an equal number of universes [10.13: 53]. Then You again became the One Infinite Absolute Truth without a second... For those who unaware of Your position understand You the material way, You, by expanding Your maya, appear as Me for the matters of creation, as Yourself for the purpose of maintenance and as the Three-eyed One [Lord Shiva] in the end. You, who are [actually] unborn, oh Lord, take Your birth among the enlightened souls and the seers, as well as among the human beings, the animals and the aquatics, oh Master and Creator, to subdue the false pride of the non-devotees and to be of mercy for the devotees [see also B.G. 4: 8]. Who, oh Greatest Supreme Lord, oh Supersoul and Master of Yoga, knows where and how, to what degree or when in the three worlds Your pastimes occur, You expand the play of Your spiritual energy [yoga-maya]? For that reason this complete whole, which is untrue [sat, temporary] in its form, is just like a dream wherein one's awareness is covered by all kinds of distress. While one inside of You finds Your unlimited forms of consciousness, eternity and happiness [sat, permanent, see also B.G. 2: 16 and ], that what seems to be true [outside] on the other hand originated from the material energy. You are the One Soul, the Original Personality, the Oldest One, the Truth, the Light from Within without a beginning and an end, the eternally unchangeable, unimpeded happiness free from impurities, the Complete Whole Without a Second that is everlasting and defies all description. They who from the sunlike spiritual master received the perfect vision of the confidential philosophy, can see You, the very Soul, the Supersoul of all souls, being described as such. They are the ones who easily cross over the ocean of an untrue worldly existence. For those who do not understand You as being the Supreme Soul, for that reason alone a totally material life unfolds that disappears again with spiritual knowledge, just as with a rope [in illusion the image of] a snake may appear and disappear again. Designations of being bound to matter or being liberated, rise from ignorance. When one realises that the two have no separate existence, one is situated in the true knowledge and unhindered consciousness [as-it-is, free from maya] of the supreme transcendental self. [They at that time lose their meaning,] just as day and night are matters doubtful to the sun itself. Oh, how ignorant the foolishness is of persons who think of You, the Original Soul, as being something else and about the Self as something to be looked for [as someone present] in the outside world [see B.G. 18: 16]! The realised devotees [the sages], who reject everything that is not 'that' [see neti neti 7.7: 23], look for You within themselves, oh Unlimited One. How can such a person of discrimination, appreciate the true nature of the 'rope' he sees before him without rejecting the [therewith associated] illusion of seeing a 'snake' [see also 10.6: 8, and B.G. 18: 37]? It is therefore so my Lord, that someone who is blessed with but a trace of Your lotus feet, can understand the truth of the glory of Your Supreme Personality, while that is not possible for someone else, however long he might speculate. May it therefore be so, oh Lord, that in this birth, a next one or even another type of birth, there will be that greatest fortune in which I, by becoming one of Your devotees, am fully of service at the lotus buds of Your feet? How fortunate are the cows and the gopis of Vraja from whom You, to Your full satisfaction in the form of the calves and boys, have been drinking the nectarine breast milk. Oh Almighty Lord, that satisfaction of You could as yet by no Vedic sacrifice be equaled! What a happiness, oh what a fortune it is for Nanda, the gopas and the other inhabitants of Vraja, to have You as their friend, You the Complete, Absolute and Eternal Truth of Transcendental Happiness. However great the good fortune and glory of these people might be oh Infallible One, we, the eleven [presiding deities of the senses ], Lord Shiva and the other leading demigods, are very happy to drink, again and again, from the cups of the senses of these devotees, the nectarean beverage of Your sweet lotus feet. Whatever birth I would take here in this forest [even as this or that animal or plant], would bring me the greatest happiness, just because I then would bathe in the dust of the feet of any of them [out here] whose life is completely devoted to the Supreme Lord Mukunda, the dust of whose feet even today is sought in the Vedic mantras [the Shrutis]. What but Yourself, the source of all benedictions, oh Godhead, would You grant as a reward to these members of the cowherd community? All of their homes, wealth, friends, dear ones, bodies, children, life-air and minds are dedicated to You. When our mind thinks of anything else it falls in illusion. For did You not even arrange it indubitably so that Putana - who dressed up as a devotee - and also her family members [Baka and Agha] could reach You, oh divine personality? As long as the people are not Yours, oh Krishna, their attachments and such are all thieves, their home is a prison and their infatuation is as a pair of shackles to their feet. Despite being completely transcendental You on this earth imitate [and deride] the material ways oh Master, just to increase the amount of happiness of the people of surrender. Let the people [who claim to know] of Your unlimited potency think what they like - why all these words? That is not my way oh Master. Your magnificence is not within the range of my mind, body and words [see B.G. 2: 42-44]! Permit me to leave, oh Krishna. You know everything, You see all, You alone are the master of all universes, I put this universe at Your disposal. Shri Krishna, oh bestower of pleasure of the lotus of the Vrishni dynasty. You are the cause of the development of the seas of this earth, of the demigods, the brahmins and the animals. When there are unsound doctrines You dispel the darkness. You are the opponent of the ogres on earth. For as long as the sun shines, till the end of time, I, oh worshipable Supreme Lord, will offer You my obeisances.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Thus having extolled the Wealth of the World, the creator of the universe, after circumambulating Him three times and bowing down to His feet, returned to his abode. The Supreme Lord granted the one who had originated from Him permission to leave and then brought the calves back to the riverbank where they had been. There, just as it was before, all His friends were present. Although one year had passed and they, without the Lord of their lives, had been covered by Krishna's maya, it was to the conception of the boys but half a moment ago, oh King. What do persons whose minds are under the spell of maya not forget out here? Because of illusion the entire world is perpetually bewildered and forgetful about itself [its soul, its identity]. The friends said to Krishna: 'You have returned quickly, we did not even eat a single bite more, please come here and take Your meal as should.' Smiling at them, the Lord of the Senses thereupon took His meal with the cowherd boys whom He, when they returned from the forest to Vraja, showed the skin of the python Aghasura [see 10.12]. He whose body was decorated with a peacock feather, with flowers and colours from the forest, loudly played the bamboo flute. He called for the calves while the horns sounded and the boys sang about His purifying glories. Thus with His comrades entering the pasture grounds [near Vrindavana] He was a pleasure to the eyes of the gopis. In Vraja the boys sang: 'Today we have been saved by the son of Yashoda and Nanda who killed a great serpent!'

The king said: 'Please, oh brahmin, explain how there could be such an unprecedented amount of love for the child of someone else that Krishna was, a love that even exceeded the love [the gopas and gopis had] for their own offspring?'

Shri Shuka said: 'One's own self is most dear to every living being, oh ruler of man. All the love for others, children, wealth and so on is based upon that. Oh best of kings, the love of embodied beings for their own individual self is therefore not equal to the love they have for that what belongs to them like sons, wealth, homes and so forth. Persons who speak of the body as being their self [see also ahankara], oh best of kings, therefore [also] hold their body as most dear and certainly do not attach an equal value to that what [or the other person] they are associated with [see also B.G. 2: 71]. If one considers the body as something that one possesses [though], it consequently will not be as dear as the soul [the true self]. After all, when it grows old the desire to stay alive remains equally strong. [The self of] one's own soul is therefore most dear to all embodied beings. It constitutes in fact the purpose of existence of all the moving and not moving living entities in the universe. In this you should know Krishna as the Soul of all souls [or the Supersoul]. It is He [that Self] who by His own art appearing as a human being, is present on this planet for the benefit of the entire universe. They who in this world know Krishna as He really is, understand that the moving and not moving living entities [including inorganic matter] are two different manifestations of the Supreme Lord. He is the Complete Whole, the essence outside of which nothing exists out here [compare B.G. 7: 26]. He is even the cause of the transformation [of the unmanifested matter of pradhana] that establishes the manifestation of everything in material nature. Is there anything that can exist apart from Krishna, the Supreme Lord? His lotus feet, that are like a boat, the feet that for the entire universe [even for the greatest gods] constitute the refuge of virtue and merit of Him who is so famous as the enemy of Mura [the demon], constitute for those who seek shelter with them the Supreme Abode. In this place [named Vaikuntha] none of the material miseries are found. With each step taken with them the ocean of material existence is [not more than the water in] a calf's hoof-print [compare 10.1: 5-7 and 10.2: 30].

Everything you have been asking for concerning that what the Lord did at His fifth year and was declared at His sixth, I have now described to you. The person who hears or sings about these pastimes of Lord Murari annihilating Agha, how He with His friends was taking lunch in an open spot in the forest and about the other-worldly [multiple Vishnu] form that He assumed with the selfborn one who so elaborately offers his prayers, will achieve all the [spiritual] ends he desired.' *4

*: Based upon this verse Shрила Prabhupada in the Caitanya-Caritamrita, Adi-lila, chapter two, text 30 states that Krishna is considered the real source of all other expansions of the Vishnu forms and other demigods originating from them: 'Lord Krishna is Narayana, the father of Brahma, because Lord Krishna's plenary expansion Garbhodakas'ayi Vishnu, after placing Himself on the Garbha Ocean, created Brahma from His own body. Maha-Vishnu in the Causal Ocean and Kshirodakas'ayi Vishnu, the Supersoul in everyone's heart, are also transcendental expansions of the Supreme Truth.'

 : In his commentary on the Vedanta-sutra, Shрила Madhvacarya quotes the following statement from the Vedic Shruti-mantras: 'satyam hy evadam vis'vam asrijata'. 'This universe, created by the Lord, is real.'

: The 'eleven' pertains to the demigods ruling over the senses of action and perception plus the mind: the Digdevatas rule audition, the Vayus rule the tactile sense, Surya rules sight, Varuna rules taste, the As'vini-kumaras rule the olfactory sense, Agni rules speech, Indra rules the hands, Upendra rules the feet, Mitra rules the defecation, Prajapati rules the organ of generation and Candra rules the mind. Shiva is the god presiding over ahankara, false ego.

*4: There is a last verse to this chapter identical to the last one of chapter eleven: verse 10.11: 59.

The two boys thus passed their childhood in the cow-community with different children's games like playing hide and seek, building dams and jumping around like they were monkeys.'

[translated by the pupils of Prabhupada as]: In this way the boys spent their childhood in the land of Vrindavana playing hide-and-go-seek, building play bridges, jumping about like monkeys and engaging in many other such games.

This verse present in the original Sanskrit probably does not belong here. It must have accidentally been transferred from chapter 11 in the process of manual copying through the ages.

*5: Brahma is in this chapter just like Krishna called the unborn one or aja; not to get confused it is here translated with 'selfborn', svayam-bhu, another name for Brahma as the one directly born from Narayana, while Krishna, contrary to what it seems in His descending in a material form, factually is the never born primeval source [see also footnote  to the previous chapter].

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 15:

The Killing of Dhenuka, the Ass Demon and Poison in the River

Shri Shuka said: 'When They [Rama and Krishna] in Vraja attained the age of boyhood [six to ten years old], the two who rendered Vrindavana most pleasurable with Their footprints, were old enough to be cowherds. Together with Their friends they thereupon were commissioned to tend the cows [*]. Madhava [the Sweet Lord], eager to play, surrounded by the gopas who were chanting His fame, sounding His flute and keeping the animals together with Balarama in front of Him, entered the forest that had many flowers and a lot of nourishment for the cows. The most enchanting forest was filled with the sounds of bees, animals and birds. There was a lake with water as clear as the minds of the great [sages] and it had a fragrance originating from hundred-petalled lotuses that was carried by the wind. When the Supreme Lord saw this He decided to play there. The moment the Original Personality saw the beauty everywhere of the stately trees that with the tips of their branches touched His feet with their heavy load of fruits, flowers and reddish buds, He joyfully, almost laughing, spoke to His elder brother. The Supreme Lord said: 'Oh Best of the Gods, these trees at Your lotus feet that are worshiped by the demigods, with their heads bowing down are presenting offerings of flowers and fruits to put an end to the ignorance because of which they were born in their form. Oh Original Personality, these bees following You, as the most intimate great sages among Your devotees, do - despite Your hiding in the forest - not abandon You as their personal deity oh Sinless One while singing their worship of You, the place of pilgrimage for all the worlds! These peacocks, oh Worshipable One, are dancing with joy. These doe are pleasing You with their glances as if they were the gopis and the cuckoos do Vedic prayers. They as residents of the forest being blessed with such a saintly nature, are all as fortunate as to see You who now arrives at their place. Blessed is now this earth, her grasses and bushes that receive the touch of Your feet. Blessed are the trees and creepers struck by Your fingernails. The rivers, mountains, birds and animals are blessed with the mercy of Your glances and blessed are the gopis in Your arms that are constantly craved by the Goddess of Fortune.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Lord Krishna this way being satisfied by all of Vrindavana's beauty, took delight in pasturing together with His companions the animals on the river banks at the foot of the mountain [Govardhana]. 0-1 Sometimes, when His companions together with Balarama on their way sang about His glories, He sang along with the humming bees that were blind under His influence. He sometimes imitated the chattering broken speech of the parrots and then cuckooed with the charming cuckooing of the cuckoos. Sometimes He cooed along with the swans and sometimes He danced hilariously in front of a peacock. With a voice [rumbling] like the clouds He sometimes affectionately called the animals that wandered off by their names and spoke endearingly with the cows and their protectors. He cried out in imitation of the cakora birds, the curlews, the ruddy geese, the skylarks and the peacocks and then again acted with the smaller creatures as if He [also] was afraid of the tigers and lions. Sometimes when His elder brother being tired of playing used the lap of a gopa for a pillow, He would personally relieve Him by massaging His feet and performing other services. When the cowherd boys so now and then danced, sang, moved about and wrestled, They stood hand in hand laughing and praised them. At times when He was tired of the wrestling He sought His refuge at the foot of a tree to lie on a bed of twigs and leaves and use the lap of a gopa for a pillow. Some of them, who were all great souls, massaged His feet while others, free from all sin, fanned Him nicely with fans. Others befitting the occasion oh Great King, would sing [songs] reflecting the spirit of the Great Soul while their hearts slowly melted of love. He in His activities pretending to be a cowherd, concealed His personal opulence with the help of His mystic potency. He whose tender feet are served by the Goddess of Fortune, enjoyed like a villager with the villagers, even though He with His heroic deeds had proven Himself to be the Master and Controller.

The gopa Shridama, a friend of Rama and Kes'ava, together with others like Subala and Stokakrishna [one day] lovingly said the following: 'Rama, oh Rama, oh Mighty-armed One, oh Krishna, Destroyer of the Wicked Ones, not far away from here there is a very great forest full of palm trees [called Talavana]. Many fruits there have fallen from the trees, but they are checked by Dhenuka, the evil one. Oh Rama, oh Krishna, he is a very powerful demon who has assumed the form of an ass and he is surrounded by other companions that are as strong as he is. He has killed human beings, everyone is afraid to go there, oh Killer of the Enemies. All kinds of animals and flocks of birds have abandoned it. There are fragrant fruits that we have never tasted. The aroma they spread is noticed everywhere. Please oh Krishna give them to us whose hearts are craving because of the fragrance. The desire is so strong oh Rama, let us go there if You consider it a good idea.'

Having heard these words from Their friends, the two masters laughed and went, wishing to please Their comrades, surrounded by the gopas [compare 3.28: 31-33] to the Talavana forest. Balarama having arrived there, employed His great strength and shook with His two arms the trees to all sides like a mad elephant so that the fruits fell down. When he heard the fruits falling the donkey demon ran hither with a heavy gallop that made the earth and the trees tremble. Meeting Him the powerful demon struck Balarama's chest quickly with his two hind legs and then ran about producing an ugly ass bray. The furious, screaming beast approached Him again and angrily hurled with his back turned forward, his two legs at Balarama, oh King. [But] He seized him by the hooves, whirled him around with one hand and threw him, [being dashed against a palmyra] with his life spun out of him, in the top of a palm tree. The big palm tree shook heavily with its large crown because of that blow and next broke down along with another one that started to shake next to it. That tree on its turn took down another one and so it went further. Balarama with His game of donkey corpse throwing made all the palm trees [of the forest] shake and hit each other as if they were blown about by a hurricane. This feat of war of the Fortunate One is not that surprising at all, for He is the Unlimited, One Controller of the Universe in whom the length and width of the world[s] is [woven] like the threads of [the warp and wool] of a piece of cloth. Then, enraged about the death of their friend, all the asses that were Dhenuka's intimates attacked Krishna and Rama. But attacking Krishna and Rama, oh King, one after the other was easily seized by the hind legs and dashed against the stately palm trees. The earth being covered with heaps of fruits, palm treetops and lifeless daitya bodies, offered a view as radiating as the sky decorated with clouds. When the demigods and other transcendentalists heard about that immense triumph of the Two, they showered a rain of flowers, played music and offered prayers. With Dhenuka being killed the fruits of the palm trees could be eaten by the people who were no longer afraid and the animals could graze in the forest.

Krishna the Lord with the lotus petal eyes about whom it is so auspicious to hear and chant, returned with His elder brother to Vraja, glorified by the gopas who followed Them. All the gopis with eyes hungry to see Him came to meet Him who still had the dust in His hair that was thrown up by the cows, He with His peacock feather, forest flowers, charming eyes and beautiful smile who played His flute and whose glories were sung by the gopas. Entering the cowherd village He heartily welcomed the ladies of Vraja who in their veneration being bashful, humble and laughing, like bees searching for honey, with sidelong glances were drinking in the face of Mukunda, He who constituted their liberation. And therewith they gave up the grief they had suffered during the day because they had been separated from Him. Mother Yashoda and Rohini most lovingly catered to the desires of their two sons by presenting Them at the right time the finest offerings. The weariness of the road vanished with a bath and a massage and such, after which They were dressed with a charming cloth around Their waist and were decorated with divine garlands and fragrances. With the delicious preparations offered to Them they ate Their fill and thus being pampered by Their mothers They fell happily asleep in Their fine beds in Vraja.

Oh King, Krishna, the Supreme Lord who thus operated in Vrindavana, went one day, without Balarama and in the company of His friends, to the Kalindi [the Yamuna, see also ]. The cows who together with the gopas suffered from the glaring summer sun, tormented by thirst drank from the water of the river, but it was polluted, it was spoiled by poison. 9-5 Because they got in touch with that poisoned water they lost their consciousness and all fell lifeless down at the waterside, oh best of the Kurus. Lord Krishna, the Master of all Masters of Yoga who saw them in that state, thereupon brought them back to life by casting His glance - which is as a shower of nectar - on them who had accepted Him as their master. Regaining their senses [their 'memory'], they got up at the waterside and all stood most surprised looking at each other. They came to the conclusion that they, after having drunk the poison and had fallen dead, oh King, by the grace of Govinda's merciful glance had risen again.'

shuklashthami karttike tu smrita gopashthami budhah tad-dinad vasudevo 'bhud
gopah purvam tu vatsapah

"The eighth lunar day of the bright fortnight of the month of Karttika is known by authorities as Gopashthami. From that day, Lord Vasudeva served as a cowherd, whereas previously He had tended the calves."

 : The Kalinda is the name of the mountain from which the river Yamuna rises.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 16:

Krishna Chastises the Serpent Kaliya

Shri Shuka said: 'The Black Lord [Krishna], the Almighty One, seeing the black waters contaminated by the black snake, wanted to purge the river of the serpent living there.'

The king said: 'How did the Supreme Lord subdue the serpent in that dangerous water and how could it reside there for so many ages, oh learned one? Please explain. Oh brahmin, you can get enough of sharing the nectar of the magnanimous pastimes of Him, the Supreme Unlimited Lord who as a cowherd boy acted to His own bidding?'

Shri Shuka said: 'In the Kalindi there was a certain pool where Kaliya [as the serpent was called] resided and its water boiled because of the fire of his poison. Birds flying over it would fall [dead] into its waters. All plant and animal life on the shore died because it came into contact with the poisonous vapor that by the wind was carried from the waves. Krishna had descended to subdue the wicked ones. Seeing how severely the river was contaminated by the terribly effective, powerful poison, He climbed in a Kadamba tree, slapped His arms, tightened His belt and jumped into the poisoned water. The water of the serpent's lake in turmoil from the poison that the snake was vomiting, started because of the force of the fall of the Essential Person to overflow on all sides so that its fearsome waves washed over the shore for a hundred bow lengths. What an immeasurable strength that was! My best one, when the snake heard the sound that Krishna produced while He, playing like a big elephant, with His mighty arms was engaged in whirling the waters around, he rushed forward, unable to tolerate the violation of his territory. And while He, so attractive in His yellow garments and as delicate as a glowing white cloud, with the Shrivatsa, His smiling beautiful face and with His feet which resembled the inside of a lotus, thus fearlessly was playing, He was angrily bitten in the chest by him and enveloped in his coils. Seeing Him in the grip of the snake's coils being immobilised, His dear friends, the tenders of the animals, were greatly disturbed. With their intelligence bewildered, in pain and full of remorse and fear, they fell to the ground, for they had dedicated everything, themselves, their relations, their wealth, their wives and objects of desire to Krishna. The cows, the bulls and the she-cows with their eyes fixed on Krishna, cried out loudly in great distress while they fearfully lamented in shock.

Thereupon most fearsome, ominous disturbances arose in Vraja. Three kinds of signs, to be observed in the sky, upon the earth and in the living beings, heralded imminent danger. 3-1 The cowherds headed by Nanda who saw these signs were beset with fear. They knew that Krishna herding the cows had left without Balarama. Not knowing His prowess, they were overwhelmed by pain, grief and fear. Because of those bad omens they thought that something bad had happened and could only think of Him who was their very life breath. The children, the elderly ones and the ladies my best one, all felt as wretched as a cow missing her calf and anxiously set out to look for Krishna. Balarama the Sweet Supreme Lord seeing them that distressed, gently smiled and did not speak a word, knowing well the power of His younger brother. Searching for their dear most Krishna they followed the trail marked by the footprints of the Lord. They led to the bank of the Yamuna. Quickly they followed the marks of the lotus, the barleycorn, the elephant goad, the thunderbolt and the flag of the Master of their community my best one, that they here and there, dispersed between other footprints saw on the cow path. When they at a distance saw Krishna motionless within the lake enveloped by the coils of the snake body and the cowherd boys lying unconscious in the flooded water with all the animals crying around them, they in their distress were delivered to the greatest despair. Now that their sweetheart was seized by the serpent, the gopis who in their hearts were so attached to Him, the Supreme, Unlimited Personality, while remembering His loving smiles, glances and words were tormented by the greatest agony. Being deprived of their darling, they experienced the three worlds as being completely empty [see also Shikshashthaka verse seven]. Holding back Krishna's mother, they with their eyes fixed upon her son, equally pained shed a flow of tears. Standing there like corpses they stared at Krishna's face and one by one recounted the stories about the Darling of Vraja. Nanda and his men seeing Krishna, their life and soul, were by the All-powerful Lord Balarama who knew well the might of Krishna, withheld to enter the lake. When He, the only one they had, for some time was caught in that position and saw how His cowherd folk on His behalf was standing there in utter despair together with the women and children, He put an end to His imitation of the mortal way [the illusion of His mortality] and rose up from the coils of the serpent. By expanding His body the serpent was forced to let Him go because of the pain. Kaliya thereupon furiously raised his hoods high, breathed heavily through his nostrils that were like two vessels of boiling poison and stared the Lord in the face with eyes like firebrands. Kaliya, moving his double-pointed tongue to and fro between his two lips and with his terrible look full of poisonous fire eagerly spying for an opportunity to strike, was by Him playfully approached from all sides by moving around him like He was the king of the birds [Garuda]. Thus turning around him He exhausted him and forced him to bend down his highly raised shoulders. Krishna thereupon climbed on top of the broad heads and then, as the Original One, the First Spiritual Master of All the Arts, started to dance. His lotus feet in touch [with the snake] therewith turned red from [the light of] the many jewels on the heads. That very moment His servants arrived together with their wives: the heavenly singers and perfected souls, the sages and the venerable ones. Taking notice of Him being engaged in His dancing, they all were greatly pleased [and expressed their joy] with playing two-sided clay drums, smaller drums and large drums, and with songs, flowers and other forms of praise. Whichever of Kaliya's one hundred-and-one heads would not bow down my best one, were immediately trampled down by Krishna. The Lord who with His kicking feet punishes the evil ones, made the serpent that still moved but the life of which ran at its end, spit horrible [poisonous] blood from its mouth and nostrils while it experienced the greatest anguish. Poison oozed from his eyes and whichever vomiting head that he breathing heavily in his anger would rise, Krishna, while dancing, with His foot forced down into submission. Every time that happened He with flowers was worshiped for being the Original Person. Profusely vomiting blood, with his numerous hoods broken and with his body defeated by His amazing dancing oh ruler of man, Kaliya remembered the oldest person, Lord Narayana, the spiritual master of all moving and nonmoving entities. Within his mind he turned to Him for shelter. Seeing that the serpent got tired of the heavy weight of the heels of Lord Krishna in whose abdomen the entire universe is found and that his umbrella-like hoods were shattered by His trampling, his wives in distress approached the Original Lord with their clothing, ornaments and locks of hair in disarray. Innerly totally upset approaching for shelter, they laid their bodies and children on the ground before Him, the Lord and Refuge of All Creatures. They bowed down, saintly joined their hands and solicited the liberation of their sinful husband.

The wives of the serpent said: 'The punishment for this person who acted against the rules is deserved. With an equal vision towards sons and foes, You descended in this world to subdue the wicked ones and punish for the sake of a positive result. This punishment of the falsehood administered by You is actually a form of mercy because by dispelling the contamination, as You did with his appearance as a serpent, You even being angry are of grace in accepting the ones embodied. Of what kind of properly performed penance has he been in his former lives, with which he, free from pride and thinking of others, religiously or otherwise being of compassion with everybody, has satisfied You, the Good Self of all living beings? We don't know what [of his actions] led to this result, oh Lord. To be qualified to touch the dust of Your lotus feet is something for which the Goddess of Fortune, the best of all women, has performed austerities, has given up all desires by keeping to her vow for a long time. They who attained the dust of Your lotus feet neither desire heaven nor rulership over all, neither want to be the topmost creator nor the master of the world and neither wish the perfections of yoga nor freedom from rebirth [see also Shikshashthaka verse 4]. Even though he, the king of the serpents being born in the mode of ignorance, oh Lord, was under the sway of anger, he has achieved that what is so difficult for others to achieve. For those who filled with desires are covered by a physical body and wander through the cycles of material existence [through different lives], all opulence will manifest itself before their eyes because of that [dust]. We offer You, the Supreme Lord, the Original Person and the Greater Soul, You, the Shelter of All that Exists, the Supreme Primordial Cause and the Supreme One in the Beyond, our obeisances. For You, the Ocean of Spiritual Knowledge and Wisdom, for You, the Absolute Truth of an unlimited potency, for You who are free from the modes and free from all changes of form, for You, the Prime Mover, there is our reverence. We pray for You as the Time, for You as the Certainty with the Time and for You as the Witness of all Time measures. Our prayers are there for You in the Form of the Universe, for You as the One Supervising it All, for You as the Creator and for You who are the Final Cause of the Universe. 2-4 Our obeisances for You who are the Soul and refuge for the intelligence, the spirit, the life breath and the senses, for You who constitutes the subtle basis for the perception and the material elements, for You from whom [turned away] one falsely identifies with the three modes so that one's self-awareness is covered. We pray to You, the Unlimited One, the Transcendental One who are the centre to the multitude, You who are the omniscient one and He who accepts the different doctrines [philosophies or dars'anas] and constitutes the power of the expression of ideas and words. Again and again we prove our respects for the foundation of all authoritative proof, for the author of the revealed scriptures and for the source of the Vedic texts that both restrict [nivritti] and incite [pravritti]. We bow before Lord Krishna and Lord Rama [Sankarshana], the sons of Vasudeva, as also before Pradyumna and Aniruddha [Krishna's son and grandson, see 4.24: 35-36]. Our obeisances to the Master of the Satvatas [the devotees of Krishna, Satvata]. Our salutations are there for Him who manifests the various qualities, He who disguises Himself by the modes but also because of the functioning of the modes can be acknowledged, He, who by His devotees is known as the [independent] witness of the modes. Oh Controller of the Senses, let there be our reverence for You who are so inscrutable in Your unmanifest state and so perfect in the state of all Your manifest forms, for You who acts so silently with the silent ones. We worship Him, the Knower of the Higher and Lower Destinations, the Regulator of All Things, You who stands apart from the universe and [yet] are the universe itself, You who are the Overseer of That and the Root Cause of this all. You are the Almighty Lord of the Creation, Maintenance and Destruction of this universe who, beginningless and without acting with the modes, with the potency of Time endeavors [to promote the balance] in relation to the modes. While impeccably playing Your game, You by Your glance awaken the distinctive dormant characteristics of each of these [modes]. The ones of peace, the restless ones and those born in slowness are Your material embodiments [of the modes] in the three worlds. Wishing to maintain the dharma You [therewith being embodied Yourself] are present in this world in order to protect the saintly and the peace-loving ones dear to You. The master for one should tolerate the offense that was committed by his own subject. You, oh Peace Personified, should forgive it this foolish one [our husband] who failed to understand You. Oh Supreme Lord have mercy, the serpent is breathing his last. Since we women are pitied by the saints, our husband should be granted his life. Please tell us, Your maidservants, what we should do. By the faithful execution of Your command one will surely be released from all fear.'

Shri Shuka said: 'He, the Supreme Lord, thus extensively praised by the wives of the stupefied snake, thereupon released him whose heads were defeated by His trampling feet. Slowly he with difficulty regained his senses and vital force. Breathing normally again and miserable, Kaliya spoke submissively to Krishna. Kaliya said: 'We [snakes] so vicious and ignorant by birth, are of a constant anger. For normal living beings it is difficult to give up the propensities by which they hold on to that what is untrue [their physicality], oh Lord! Oh Creator, oh Lord of the Time and the Seasons, You are the one who generated this universe filled with the appearances of the natural modes endowed with different personal propensities in varieties of talents and physical capabilities, wombs and seeds, with different mentalities and forms. And we present here in this world, oh Supreme Lord, are because of the serpent species bound to anger. How can we in our bewilderment of our own accord get rid of Your insuperable Maya? Let there be from Your good self as the cause in this matter, as the Knower of this All, as the Master of this Universe, for us be the arrangement You think fit, whether it concerns Your mercy or Your punishment.'

Shri Shuka said: 'The Supreme Lord, in the role of a human being thus hearing the words then said: 'You, oh serpent, must not stay here any longer. Go directly to the ocean with your folk, your children and women. May the wealth of the river be enjoyed by the human beings and the cows. Any mortal being who remembers this command of Mine to you and recites it at the beginning and the end of the day, will not become afraid of you. He who at the place of this pastime of Mine bathes and gratifies the gods and others with the water, will, when he remembers Me, is of worship and fasts, be freed from all sins. Afraid of Garuda you abandoned the island Ramanaka and took shelter of this pool, but now that you are marked by My feet he will not devour you.'

The honourable sage said: 'Freed by Krishna, the Supreme Personality whose actions are so wonderful, oh King, the serpent together with his wives worshiped Him with pleasure and reverence. 5-6 Worshiping and satisfying the Lord of the Universe with the finest clothing, strings of flowers and most valuable jewels as also with ornaments, heavenly scents, ointments and with a wreath of lotuses, he was by Him who carries Garuda in His flag permitted to leave, contented as He was by the circumambulating and reverence accomplished by him and his wives, children and friends. Immediately after his departure to the island in the ocean, the nectarean water of the Yamuna became free from poison by the grace of the Supreme Lord who for His pastimes had assumed a human form.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 17:

The History of Kaliya and Krishna Swallows a Forest Fire

The king said: 'Why did Kaliya give up Ramanaka, the abode of the serpents, and what caused the enmity of Garuda especially towards him?'

Shri Shuka said: 'The snake people of sacrifice here [in Nagalaya] were in the past urged to pay tribute to the serpents every month at the base of a tree, oh mighty-armed one. In order to secure their protection the serpents every new moon each presented their portion to Garuda, the great power over them. Kaliya, the son of Kadru conceited under the influence of his venom and strength, in defiance of Garuda ate those offerings himself. Hearing about it oh King, that mighty and beloved devotee of the Supreme Lord with great speed rushed forward to kill Kaliya. Garuda swiftly attacking fell upon him who, armed with poison and full size raised with his many hoods, looked most fearsome with his tongues and terrible eyes. The snake then bit him with the help of his weapons, the fangs. The carrier of Madhusudana, the son of Tarkshya [see 6.6: 21-22] with his formidable prowess full of anger swiftly moving warded off Kaliya, the son of Kadru and struck him with his left wing that glowed like gold. Beaten by Garuda's wing Kaliya utterly distraught entered a lake of the Kalindi where it was difficult for Garuda to go.

Saubhari Muni [mediating under water] once had denied Garuda the right to desire any of its water creatures, his normal sustenance [see 9.6], but because he was hungry he resisted him and took one. Seeing the fish who lived there in a state of misery, most unhappy because the king of the fish had been killed [by Garuda], Saubhari, in order to set things right, out of compassion for the sake of their welfare said: 'I swear, if Garuda enters this lake to eat the fish, he will immediately lose his life!' Kaliya was the only one who knew this, no other serpent, and therefore hiding in fear of Garuda he dwelled there, the very place from where he was expelled by Krishna.

The moment the cowherds saw Lord Krishna rising up from the lake, divinely clad, with a garland and scented, covered by many fine jewels and decorated with gold, all their senses sprung back to life. Filled with joy they embraced Him affectionately. When Yashoda, Rohini and Nanda, the gopis and the gopas, oh son of Kuru, rejoined with Krishna they regained all their functions and that even happened with the dried up trees. Rama and Acyuta, the Infallible One, embraced each other laughing, well aware of Their potency. Out of love Balarama raised Him on His lap and admired Him from all sides. Thus They together with the cows, the bulls and she-calves experienced the highest pleasure. The learned and respectable personalities along with their wives all came to Nanda and said: 'Your son having been seized by Kaliya has now by divine ordinance been freed. For the sake of Krishna's safety please make donations to the brahmins', and Nanda, happy minded oh King, gave them cows and gold. The chaste Yashoda who had lost and retrieved her son, the One of Great Fortune, raised Him on her lap, hugged Him and allowed her tears to flow freely.

That night oh best of the kings, the cows and the people of Vraja, weakened as they were because of thirst, hunger and fatigue, remained there at the shore of the Kalindi. Then, because of the summer heat, in the middle of the night from all sides a forest fire arose that closed in the sleeping Vrajasis and began to scorch them. The people of Vraja thereupon woke up. In distress because they would burn they turned to Krishna for shelter, He the Master, who by the power of His spiritual potency had appeared like a human being [compare 10.8: 16]. 'Krishna, Krishna, oh Greatest of Fortune! Oh Rama of Unlimited Power, this most terrible fire is about to devour us who belong to You! Please protect us, Your people, Your friends, against this insurmountable [deadly] fire of Time. Oh Master, we at Your benevolent, blessed feet that drive away all fear, are incapable [to escape from here]!' The Lord of the Universe, the Unlimited One who possesses endless potencies, this way seeing the desperation of His people, thereupon swallowed that terrible fire.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 18:

Lord Balarama Slays the Demon Pralamba

Shri Shuka said: 'Surrounded by His happy-natured folk singing His glories Krishna thereafter [after the forest fire] entered Vraja that was so beautiful with its herds of cows. While the two [Lords Balarama and Krishna] thus were sporting in Vraja in the disguise of a cowherd, the summer season approached that is not so pleasant for the living beings. Nonetheless because of the special qualities of Vrindavana this place, were the Supreme Lord Kes'ava together with Rama personally was staying, manifested characteristics similar to those of spring. The constant noise of the waterfalls drowned out the sound of the crickets there while the groups of trees embellishing the area were moistened by their spray. From the waves of the lakes and the currents of the rivers cool breezes transported the pollen of the kahlara, kanja and utpala lotuses. Because of them there was for the people living in the forest not the tormenting heat of the sun or the forest fires that belong to the summer season, but instead an abundance of grass. The water of the very deep rivers drenched the shores, which caused muddy banks on all sides. The fierce sun radiating its venomous rays there could not drive away the moist from the earth and the greenery. In the forest that was beautifully filled with flowers, all sorts of animals made their noises, birds were singing, peacocks [cried], bees [hummed] and cuckoos and cranes were cooing. While sounding His flute Krishna, the Supreme Lord intent on playing there, entered the forest area in the company of Balarama, the gopas and the cows. Being decorated with fresh leaves, peacock feathers, bunches of small flowers, garlands and colourful minerals, the gopas headed by Krishna and Rama were singing, dancing and romping about. While Krishna danced, some of them sang, some played on flutes, cymbals and horns while others offered praise. The demigods disguised as cowherd folk oh King, worshiped [see 10.1: 22] Krishna and Rama in their form of cow protectors, just like professional dancers do when they encourage another dancer. Whirling in circles, jumping distances, throwing with things, slapping their arms and pulling with ropes they played and sometimes they held, when they wrestled, each other by the locks of their hair. When so now and then the others danced They were the ones who played the instruments, who sang and who were of praise, oh King by saying: 'How good, how good this is!' At times they played with bilva fruits and then again with kumbha fruits or with palmfuls of amalaka fruits [myrobalan]. They played tag [aspris'ya] or blind man's buff [netra-bandha] and such games and sometimes they mimicked the animals and birds. Then they jumped like frogs, told all kinds of jokes and then again they were playing on the swings or acted like kings. The two this way being engaged in common human play, roamed the forests, mountains, rivers and valleys, bowers, lakes and surrounding groves.

[One day,] while Rama and Krishna together with the gopas were herding the animals in that forest the demon Pralamba arrived there in the form of a gopa who wanted to kidnap Them. Since He who stemmed from the house of Das'arha was the omniscient Supreme Lord, He saw what he was up to. Thinking of killing him, He accepted to be friends with him. Krishna, the knower of all games thereupon called together the gopas and said: 'Oh gopas, let us play and divide us in two equal teams.' For that purpose the gopas appointed Rama and Janardana as their leaders so that some belonged to Krishna's group while others joined the group of Rama. They engaged in several games of 'carrier and carried' [harinakridanam] that were defined by the rule that the winners would climb on the back of the defeated ones who then had to carry them. While carrying and being carried they tended the cows. Led by Krishna, they went to a banyan tree named Bhandiraka [*]. After Rama's party consisting of Shridama, Vrishabha and others had won the contest, each of them was carried by Krishna and the members of His party, oh King. Because Krishna, the Supreme Lord, was defeated He carried Shridama, Bhadrasona carried Vrishabha and Pralamba [the Asura] carried the son of Rohini [Balarama]. Considering Krishna invincible that foremost demon in great haste set off to carry [his passenger Rama] beyond the finish line where one should dismount. Holding Him high the demon lost his momentum though because Rama became as heavy as the king of the earth and the planets [mount Meru]. As a consequence he resumed his original body that was covered by golden ornaments. He shone like a cloud flashing with lightening that carried the moon. Seeing that body moving fast through the sky with blazing eyes, frowned eyebrows, rows of terrible teeth, wild hair, with armlets, with a crown and with earrings, the Carrier of the Plow being amazed about the effulgence, was a bit put off. Balarama being carried away from His company like He was being kidnapped, regained His wits and fearlessly hit His enemy angrily hard with His fist on the head. That happened as vehemently as the king of the gods hitting a mountain with his thunderbolt. The head of the demon being struck split immediately in two so that he unconscious and lifeless, spitting blood from his mouth, fell to the ground with a loud noise that sounded like a mountain being hit by Indra's weapon. When the gopas saw how Pralamba was killed by the force of Balarama's display of power, they were most astonished and exclaimed: 'Very good, well done!' ['sadhu, sadhu'] Pronouncing benedictions they praised Him for His deserving action. With their hearts overwhelmed by love they closed Him in their arms as if He had returned from death. After the sinful Pralamba had been killed, the demigods, utterly satisfied, heaped flower garlands upon Him and offered prayers exclaiming: 'Bravo, excellent!'

*: Shрила Sanatana Gosvami quotes the following verses from Shri Hariavams'a (Vishnu-parva 11.18 - 2, which describe the banyan tree:

dadars'a vipulodagra-

"They saw that best of all trees that had many long branches. With its dense covering of leaves it resembled a cloud sitting on the earth. Indeed, its form was so large that it appeared like a mountain covering half the sky. Many birds with charming blue wings frequented that great tree whose dense fruits and leaves made it seem like a cloud accompanied by a rainbow or like a house decorated with creepers and flowers. It spread its broad roots downward and carried upon itself the sanctified clouds. That banyan tree was like the lordly master of all other trees in that vicinity, as it performed the all-auspicious functions of warding off the rain and the heat of the sun. Such was the appearance of that nyagrodha tree known as Bhandira, which appeared just like the peak of a great mountain."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 19:

Krishna Swallows Again a Forest Fire

Shri Shuka said: 'With the gopas being absorbed in their games, their cows wandered far off. Grazing on their own they hungry for grass entered the thickets. The goats, cows and buffalo going from one part of the forest to the other entered a cane forest where they, thirsty because of the heat, complained loudly. The gopas led by Krishna and Rama not seeing the animals, regretted it not to have kept an eye on the cows and started searching for their trail. Anxious about the loss of their livelihood they all followed the hoofprints of the cows on the path that was marked by the blades of grass that were broken by the hooves and the teeth of the cows. Their cows and the other animals who had lost their way, they found back in the Munja forest, tired crying because of thirst. Thereupon they all turned back. When they heard the sound of their names being shouted by the Supreme Lord with a voice as loud as the rumbling clouds, they answered most joyfully.

All of a sudden, from all sides a huge and terrible conflagration appeared that with its tongues of fire threatened all moving and non-moving beings in the forest with a gruesome storm of sparks that was driven by their charioteer, the wind. From all sides being caught by the forest fire the gopas and the cows looked about in fear. Just like anyone else who troubled by the fear of death seeks the Supreme Personality, they thereupon in their distress addressed Krishna and His Strength, Balarama. 'Krishna, oh Krishna, oh Greatest Hero! Oh Rama of a never failing power, please save us surrendered souls from being scorched by the forest fire. We, Your friends, oh Krishna, with You, the perfect knower of all dharma, as our Lord we are devoted to, for sure can never deserve it to suffer destruction!'

Shri Shuka said: 'The Supreme Lord Hari, thus hearing the pitiable words of His friends, said: 'Do not be afraid, just close your eyes.' 'All right', they said and having closed their eyes the Supreme Lord, the Controller of Yoga, delivered them from the danger by swallowing the terrible fire. When they thereupon opened their eyes again, they stood amazed. Together with the cows they had been saved and transported to Bhandira [the banyan tree, see 10.18: 22, ten miles away, so they say]. Having witnessed their deliverance from the burning forest by dint of the yogic power of Krishna's internal control over the deluding material energy, they considered Him an immortal divine being. Together with Rama and the cows returning late that afternoon to the cowherd village, Krishna on the road sounded His flute while He was praised by the gopas. The young cowherd girls were excited to the greatest degree of bliss to see Govinda present again. For them it seemed to take a hundred ages to be without Him but for a moment.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 20:

The Rainy Season and Autumn in Vrindavana*

Shri Shuka said: 'The cowherd boys described to the ladies [of Gokula] the amazing actions of the two who had delivered them from the forest fire and had killed Pralamba. The elder gopas and gopis were surprised to hear about this and considered Krishna and Rama messengers of God who had come to Vraja.

Then with flashes of lightening at the horizon and rumbling skies, the rains began to fall that bring life to all living beings. The sky being covered with dense, dark clouds accompanied by lightening and thunder was, with its diffuse light, like the spirit soul that manifests along with its material qualities. For eight months in a row the sun with its rays drank the wealth of the earth that consists of water and now the time had arrived for its release. Massive clouds full of lightening and agitated by the fierce winds released their grace, just as persons of mercy give their life in this world. The earth that dried up because of the heat, being sprinkled by the divine water, was fully replenished just like the sensually motivated body of a repentant person restores after obtaining the fruits of that practice. Because of the darkness the glowworm in the evening twilight could shine its light, but that was not true for the luminaries, just like in Kali-yuga because of the sins the heresies are shining and certainly not the Vedas. The frogs at first sitting silently, hearing the sounds of the rain clouds thereupon emitted their sounds, just like the followers of Brahma do [their recitations] after completing their [silent] morning duties [see niyama]. After first having been insignificant streams, the rivers that had dried up strayed from their courses, just like it happens with the body size, the property and the means of a person who is controlled by his senses. Emerald green from the newly grown grass, reddish from the indragopa insects and affording the mushrooms shelter, the earth manifested herself like a person who [suddenly] became rich. The fields rich with grains brought joy to the farmers, but made others, the wealthy ones who were too proud for that type of work, feel sorry not to live by that grace of God. The creatures of the land and water, all reborn from the water they honoured, took on attractive forms, just like people do when they honour the Lord. Where the rivers whirling met the ocean, waves were created that were blown up by the wind, just like the mind of a by desire driven, beginning yogi is agitated who is still bound to material passions. The mountains besieged by clouds filled with rain stood undaunted under their attack, just like the minds of the ones dedicated to the Lord in the Beyond do when they face trouble. The roads no longer used faded away being overgrown by grass, just like written texts do that, not being studied by the brahmins, wither away under the influence of time. The lightening in the clouds that are the friends of all the world, fickle in its friendship, could not keep its position, just like a lusty woman cannot [even] stay with men of merit. When the [rain-]bow of the great Indra unstrung but clearly defined appeared in the sky, it was as if the Supreme Personality Free from the Modes had appeared within the manifest nature that is ruled by the modes. The moon did not shine because its light was covered by the clouds that radiated thereof, the same way the false ego of the living being shines because of its luster. Because of the arrival of the clouds the peacocks cried joyously in celebration, the same way people who are troubled in their household existence are glad when the devotees of Acyuta arrive. The trees that drank the water through their feet, manifested various physical features [like blossoms, leaves and sprouts], just like [the flourishing that happens] when one, after being emaciated and fatigued because of austerities, [finally] may delight in the object of one's desire. The cranes kept staying at the muddy banks of the lakes my best one, just like the citizens do who with vain hope restlessly engage themselves in their homes. When Indra showers his rains the irrigation dikes break because of the floodwater, just as the paths of the Vedas are broken up by the false theories of the heretics in Kali-yuga. The clouds driven by the winds released their nectarean water over all living beings, just like kings, encouraged by the brahmins, from time to time give their donations in charity.

The Lord and Balarama surrounded by the cows and boys thus for their enjoyment entered that most resplendent forest with its ripe dates and jambu fruits. The cows moved slowly because of their big and heavy udders, but being called by the Lord they came quickly with their udders wet out of affection. He saw the joyful girls who lived in the forest, He saw its trees dripping sweet sap and the waterfalls of the mountain that resounded from the nearby caves. Sometimes when it rained the Supreme Lord entered a hollow tree or a cave to play and eat roots and fruits. The yogurt-rice brought from home He in the company of Sankarshana ate together with the boys, sharing the meal on a stone near the water.

The bulls sat ruminating on a patch of grass, satisfied with their eyes closed, together with the calves and the cows that were tired because of the weight of their udders. It always pleased the Supreme Lord to see the riches of the rainy season that were promoted by His internal potency. That made Him offer His respects.

With Rama and Kes'ava residing this way in Vraja, the fall season manifested itself in full with a cloudless sky, the clearest water and a gentle wind. In autumn the lotuses regenerated and the bodies of water regained their original state [of purity], just as the minds of the fallen are restored by the practice of devotional service. Autumn put an end to the clouds in the sky, cleared the turbid water, dried the muddy condition of the earth and stopped the increase of animals, the way devotion for Lord Krishna puts an end to the troubles of all the spiritual departments [the status groups or ashramas]. The clouds that had given all they had, shone with an effulgence as pure as the effulgence of the sages who, having forsaken desires, freed from sins found peace. At one moment the mountains released their pure water while at another moment they did not, just as the nectar of spiritual knowledge only at times is bestowed by the jnanis [the spiritual philosophers]. The ones moving in shallow waters [the fish] could not appreciate that the water became less and less [after the rains], just like foolish people in a family setting do not appreciate the every day further diminishing of their life span. Moving in shallow water they because of the autumn sun experienced hardship, just as a destitute man occupied by his family life feels miserable when he has no control over his senses. Gradually the land had to give up its mud and the plants had to give up their unripe condition [of bearing no fruits], just like the sober ones have to give up the egotism and possessiveness of being focussed on the non-spiritual nature of the material body and what belongs to it. With the arrival of fall the waters became motionless and the ocean became quiet, just as a fully renounced sage desists from actions and [further] acquiring knowledge [see also avadhuta and 7.13]. The farmers contained the water of the rice fields with strong irrigation banks, the same way yogis stop the stream of consciousness that through the senses reaches outside. The moon removed the suffering of all living beings that was generated by the rays of the autumn sun, just like wisdom removes the suffering based on self-conceit with the body and the way Mukunda [returning home] puts an end to the misery of the ladies of Vraja. The cloudless sky of fall shone brilliantly clear full of stars, just like a mind moved by goodness radiates in the direct experience of the purport of the Vedas. The moon and the stars shone unlimited forth in the sphere of the sky, just like the master of the Yadus, Krishna, did when He walked the earth surrounded by the circle of the Vrishnis [see family-tree]. By embracing the wind that was not too cold and not too hot blowing from the flower-filled forest, the people could forget their hardship, but not so the gopis whose hearts were stolen by Krishna. The cows, the doe, the she-birds and the women were receptive in autumn, just like deeds in service of the Supreme Lord are followed by their respective mates, the good results. Oh King, the lotuses, except for the night-blooming kumut lotus, bloomed abundantly at sunrise, just as the populace, except for the thieves, blossoms with a [righteous] king whom they do not fear. During all the harvest rituals, other mundane celebrations and great festivals in the towns and villages, the fertile earth rich with grains and especially with the two [of Krishna and Balarama], shone beautifully as an expansion of the Supreme Lord. The kings, the merchants, the renunciates and the initiated householders who were checked by the rains, now could venture to achieve their goals, just like those who attain the perfection of life find their ultimate form [svarupa or form of service] when the time has come.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 21:

The Gopis Glorify the Song of Krishna's Flute

Shri Shuka said: 'Acyuta thus entered with the cows and gopas the place that was cooled by the breezes sweet because of the fragrance of the lotus filled lakes with their pellucid, autumnal waters. The Sweet Lord who between the groups of trees filled with the sounds of maddened bees and flocks of birds was tending the animals in the company of Balarama and the cowherd boys, passed lakes, rivers and hills while playing His flute. When the ladies of Vraja heard the song of the flute that brought to mind the flourishing [of all existence], each of them revealed to her intimate companions her appreciation for Krishna not being visible before their eyes. But once they started that description they, remembering Krishna's deeds and getting excited in rapt attention, could no longer continue, oh ruler of man. [Before their mind's eye] His glories were sung by the group of cowherds and the holes of His flute were filled by the nectar of His lips as He entered the forest of Vrindavana that was so enchanting because of His footprints. [They pictured Him] with a peacock feather on His head, a body like that of the best dancers, a blue karnikara lotus behind His ears, golden, yellow coloured garments and the vajrayanti garland around His neck [the garland 'of victory' with flowers of five different colours]. Oh King, when the women of Vraja heard the sound of the flute that captivates the minds of all living beings, they in their praise all embraced [Him in their mind].

The gopis said: 'Oh friends, we who have eyes know no greater achievement than this: to imbibe the loving glances radiating from the faces of the two sons of the king of Vraja while they play on their flutes and with their companions drive the cows from one forest to another. With the mango sprouts, peacock feathers, garlands of flower buds, lotuses and lilies next to Their colourful garments and Their occasional singing, the two of Them magnificently shine forth in the midst of the cowherd boys, just like two expert dancers on a stage. Oh gopis, how meritorious must the deeds have been of this [bamboo] flute of Krishna to be entitled to enjoy all alone the taste that is left behind by the nectar of His lips that [actually] belongs to the gopis? His forefathers, the bamboo trees, are shedding tears of happiness and also the river [where they grew] is full of shivers of joy. Vrindavana having received the treasure of the lotus feet of the son of Devaki oh friends, adds to the glories of the earth. The sound of Govinda's flute makes the peacocks dance madly and stuns all the other creatures looking down from the hillsides. How fortunate are the doe who, however ignorant they were born, in hearing the sound of the flute of the so very nicely dressed son of Nanda, with their affectionate glances performed worship in the company of their black husbands. It is for the women a festival to listen to the clear song of Krishna's flute and observe His beauty and personality. Of the wives of the gods of heaven flying around in their heavenly vehicles slip, agitated and bewildered as they are by the thought of Him, the flowers tied in their hair and slacken their belts. The cows raise their ears high to catch with those cups the nectar of the sounds emitted by Krishna holding the flute to His mouth. The calves, with mouths full of the milk that exuded from the udders, stand silently with in their eyes and hearts Govinda who moves them and fills their eyes with tears. Dear sisters, the birds in the forest rising to the branches of the trees beautiful with creepers and twigs, sit there like great sages in their eagerness to see Krishna. With their eyes closed they listen to the sweet vibrations produced by His flute that silences other voices. Hearing that song of Krishna the rivers, with their currents broken in whirlpools because of their minds steeped in love, seize and firmly hold the two feet of Murari, while carrying offerings of lotus flowers in the embrace of their wavy arms. While the Lord was herding Vraja's animals together with Rama and the gopas, a cloud seeing Him continually loudly playing His flute in the heat of the sun, out of love expanded itself high above its friend to create with its body a parasol carrying a great number of [cool droplets that descended like] flowers. The aboriginal women of Vraja, the Pulindas, are tormented to see the grass being marked by the red, transcendental kunkuma powder stemming from the lotus feet of this Cupid. But smearing on their breasts and faces that powder that once decorated the breasts of the girlfriends of the widely celebrated Lord, they are fully satisfied and forget that pain. And oh, this [Govardhana] hill my friends, is the Lord His best servant because it, from being touched by the lotus feet of Krishna and Rama, jubilantly proves its respect with offerings of drinking water, tender grass and edible roots for the cows, the calves and the cowherds. The two of Them, who can be recognised by the ropes [*] They have for binding the rear legs of the cows, accompanied in all freedom together with the cowherd boys the cows to every place in the forest. With the vibrations of the sweet tones of Their flutes, oh friends, They therewith wondrously stunned the living entities that can move while They moved the otherwise immobile trees to ecstasy.'

The gopis picturing for each other the pastimes of the Supreme Lord the way He wandered around in Vrindavana, thus being engaged became fully absorbed in Him.'

*: Shri Vis'vanatha Cakravarti Thhakura explains that the ropes of Krishna and Balarama are made of yellow cloth and have clusters of pearls at both ends. Sometimes They wear these ropes around Their turbans, and the ropes thus become wonderful decorations.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 22:

Krishna Steals the Garments of the Unmarried Gopis

Shri Shuka said: 'During the first month of the winter season [hemanta: Nov./Jan.] the unmarried girls of Nanda's Vraja subsisting on unsipped khichri [a mix of rice and lentils] observed a vow of worshipping the goddess Katyayani. - Rising at dawn they took a bath in the water of the Yamuna and made from clay a deity of the goddess. Opulently as well as simple oh ruler of men, they were of worship with sandalwood pulp, fragrant garlands, gifts [of food, clothes etc.], incense and lamps as also with presentations of fresh leaves, fruits and betel nuts. The young girls performed worship repeating a mantra with the words: 'Oh Katyayani, our obeisances unto you, oh great power, greatest yogini, oh supreme control, please make the son of Nanda the gopa my husband!' [*] The girls thus for an entire month executed their vow to be of proper worship before Bhadrakali with: 'May He, Nanda's son become my husband.' Every day at dawn they called each other's names, held their hands and loudly singing their respect for Krishna went to the Kalindi to bathe there. One day arriving at the river singing about Krishna, they left their clothes on the shore as usual and enjoyed sporting in the water.

Krishna, the Supreme Lord, who as the Master of all yoga masters approved this, surrounded by His companions went to that spot to make their actions a success. He stole their clothes away and quickly climbed in a Kadamba tree. Laughing together with the boys He made fun by saying: 'Come here oh girls if you like, and take each your own garment. I am serious, it is not a joke, since you must be tired because of the vow. All these boys know that I have never stated something untrue. Therefore oh slender girls, come [out of the water] one by one or all together to cover yourselves.'

With that prank of Him He saw how the gopis, steeped in love for Him, looked at each other and had to laugh, but being embarrassed they did not come out of the water. Govinda thus having spoken, had with His joking caught the minds of those who, up to their necks shivering in the cold water, said to Him: 'Oh You, do not be unfair, we beg You, behave like the beloved son of the gopa Nanda we know, as the one renowned throughout Vraja, oh dearest one. Please give us our garments, we are cold! Oh Shyamasundara [beautiful dark one] we, Your maidservants will do whatever You say, please give us our clothes back, oh Knower of the Dharma, or else we will tell the king about it!'

The Supreme Lord said: 'If you are My servants, must you then not do what I told you and with your innocent smiles come out of the water to pick out your garments? I will not give them if you do not do so, and with the king being angry, what can he do about it?' Thereupon all the girls, pained by the cold, came shivering out of the water, covering their pubic area with their hands. The Supreme Lord seeing them defeated, put satisfied about the purity of their love their garments over His shoulder and said with a loving smile: 'Because you during the observance of a vow were bathing naked in the water, you have offended Varuna and the other gods. To atone for that sin you must pay your obeisances with your palms joined together over your heads and then take your garments back.'

With this being pointed out by the Infallible Lord, the Vraja girls considered their skinny-dipping a fall from their vow. Intent on successfully completing that vow, they therefore offered their obeisances to the Purifier of All Sins, He who was the directly visible result of their actions as also countless other [pious] activities. The Supreme Lord, the son of Devaki satisfied to see them bowing down, thereupon mercifully gave them back the garments. Despite seriously having been cheated, not being acknowledged in their shame, being laughed at and made to act like puppets on a string with their clothes being stolen, they felt no enmity towards Him, for they were happy to associate with their beloved one. Having put on their garments they, smitten by the association with their beloved, with their minds being captivated, were completely incapable of moving and full of shyness glanced at Him. The Supreme Lord understood from them that they were determined to live up to their vow and that they wanted to touch His feet. Damodara said to the girls: 'Oh pious ones, I understand your motivation to worship Me. That pleases Me and so it must come true. The desire of those whose consciousness is fully absorbed in Me does not lead to material lust, just as roasted and cooked grains as a rule are not capable of causing new growth [see also e.g. 1.6: 35, 3.15: 20, 7.7: 51-52]. Dear girls, go now to Vraja. Having achieved the supreme state of fulfillment, you one of these nights will enjoy with Me together. That was what you had in mind with the vow to be pure in your worship of the Goddess.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Thus being instructed by the Supreme Lord, the young girls, with their desire fulfilled meditating upon His lotus feet, could only with great difficulty [bring themselves to] return to the cowherd village. The son of Devaki some time later surrounded by the gopas went at a distance from Vrindavana to herd the cows together with His brother. Seeing how the trees in the fiercely hot sun of the season with their shade served Him as parasols, He said to the boys: 1-3 'Oh Stoka Krishna and Amslu, Shridama, Subala and Arjuna, Vis'ala, Vrishabha and Ojasvi, Devaprastha and Varuthapa, just look at these fortunate trees protecting us against rain, wind, heat and snow. Their life is exclusively there for the benefit of others! Oh how superior the birth is of these trees that offer support to all living entities, like great souls do. No one in need of them will ever go away disappointed. With their leaves, flowers and fruits, shade and roots, bark and wood, their fragrance, sap, ashes, pulp and shoots they offer everything you desire. To perform with one's life, wealth, intelligence and words always for the sake of the welfare of all embodied beings, to be in this world of such a kind of birth, is the perfection of life for every living being [see also the Vaishnava Pranama].'

Thus speaking among the trees bowing down with their abundance of leaves, clusters of fruit, flowers and twigs, He arrived at the Yamuna. There the gopas drenched the cows in the crystal clear, fresh and cool, wholesome water, oh ruler, and also themselves drank their fill of the sweet tasting water. In a grove along the Yamuna where they allowed the animals to roam freely, oh ruler of the people, they [the gopas] plagued by hunger approached Rama and Krishna and said the following.'

*: The distinction between the internal of yoga-maya and the external, or illusory, potency of the Lord of maha-maya is described in the Narada-pancaratra, in the conversation between Shruti and Vidya:

janaty ekapara kantam
saiva durga tad-atmika ya para parama Shaktir
maha-vishnu-svarupini
yasya vijnana-matrena paranam paramatmanah mahurtat deva-devasya praptir bhavati nanyatha ekeyam prema-sarvasva svabhava gokules'vari anaya su-labho jneya adi-devo 'khiles'varah asya avarika-s'aktipir maha-mayakhiles'vari
yaya mudgam jagat sarvam
sarve debhahimanih

"The Lord's inferior potency, known as Durga, is dedicated to His loving service. Being the Lord's potency, this inferior energy is nondifferent from Him. There is another, superior potency, whose form is on the same spiritual level as that of God Himself. Simply by scientifically understanding this supreme potency, one can immediately achieve the Supreme Soul of all souls, who is the Lord of all lords. There is no other process to achieve Him. That supreme potency of the Lord is known as Gokules'vari, the goddess of Gokula. Her nature is to be completely absorbed in love of God, and through Her one can easily obtain the primeval God, the Lord of all that be. This internal potency of the Lord has a covering potency, known as Maha-maya, who rules the material world. In fact she bewilders the entire universe, and thus everyone within the universe falsely identifies himself with the material body." See also 8.12: 40 for Durga.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 23:

The Brahmin Wives Blessed

The gopas said: 'Rama, oh Rama, oh mighty-armed one, oh Krishna, destroyer of the wicked ones, we are troubled by hunger, please do something against it.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Krishna wanted to please some brahmin wives devoted to Him. Thus being informed by the gopas, the Supreme Lord, the son of Devaki said the following: 'Please go to the sacrificial arena of the brahmins who, striving for a place in heaven, in accord with the Vedic injunctions at the moment are performing a sacrifice named Angirasa. Going there dear gopas, ask them for some food and tell them that you have been sent by Bhagavan [Balarama] My elder brother and Me.'

With this order of the Supreme Lord going there, they asked as was told. Petitioning with folded hands, they before the brahmins fell down to the ground like sticks: 'Oh earthly gods, we wish you all the best. Please listen. Know that we cowherd boys, were sent by Rama and have arrived here with a mission from Krishna. Rama and Acyuta graze their cows not far from here and being hungry they want to ask you if you could supply Them with some food oh twice-born ones. So, if you have faith, then please donate, oh finest knowers of the religion. From the beginning of a sacrifice until the end of sacrificing the animal, oh lovers of the truth, it is, except for when it is a [Sautramani] sacrifice to Indra [*], not even for an initiate an offense to enjoy [or hand out] food.'

Thus hearing about the Supreme Lord's request they nevertheless took no heed. In the trivial pursuit of their ritualistic engagement they, being elder, most childishly thought to know it better. 0-1 Even though the place and time, the items used, the hymns, the rituals, the priests and the fire, the officiating God-conscious ones, the performer of the sacrifice, that what was sacrificed and the dharmic result are all part of the directly visible reality of His Absolute Truth, of Him, the Supreme Lord Beyond the Senses, they with their borrowed intelligence considered Him arrogantly just an ordinary person. The gopas discouraged with them not even giving them a yes or no, oh chastiser of the enemies, thereupon turned back to inform Krishna and Rama about it. Hearing that, the Supreme Lord, the Controller of the Universe, laughed and again addressed the cowerd boys in order to show them the ways of the world: 'Communicate to the wives that I together with Sankarshana have arrived. They will give you all the food needed, for they, with their intelligence residing in Me, are full of affection for Me.'

Next going to the house of the wives they saw them sitting there nicely ornamented. The gopas bowed with reverence before the chaste women of the twice-born ones and said humbly: 'Our obeisances oh wives of the brahmins, please listen to what we have to say: not far from here we are roaming with Krishna who has sent us here. Tending the cows with the gopas and with Rama He came a long way. He with His companions is hungry and should be given some food.'

When they heard that Krishna was nearby whom they, with their minds enchanted by His stories, always had wanted to see, they got very excited. Like rivers flowing towards the ocean the four types of food [to be chewed, sucked, licked and drunk] in the form of all kinds of dishes were brought together and in vessels transported to the One they all loved. 0-2 Even though their husbands, brothers, sons and other relatives tried to stop them, they who for such a long time had heard about Him and longed for Him, headed for the Supreme Lord Praised in the Scriptures. The ladies found Him wandering with the gopas and His elder brother in a grove near the Yamuna full of blooming ashokas. With His dark complexion, golden coloured garment and garland of forest flowers, with His peacock feather, coloured minerals and sprigs of buds, He was dressed like a dancer on a stage. His hand rested on a friend's shoulder and with the other hand He twirled a lotus. His lotus face was smiling, His hair fell over His cheeks and He had lilies behind His ears. Over and over having heard about the glories of their most beloved [Krishna], the gem to their ears in whom their minds were submerged, they embraced Him, now brought within their view, for a long time [within their hearts] and gave up the inner distress, oh sovereign of the people, that had resulted from their identifying with their bodies. With understanding for the state of these women who out of their desire for Him had abandoned all material desires, He who knows each his point of view, with a smile upon His face addressed them. 'You are most welcome, oh finest graceful ladies, please sit down. What can I do for you? How becoming of you to come here to see Me! People of discrimination who are well aware of what is good for them, keep themselves directly focused on Me, their dear most Self. They are then constantly of devotional service, a service that is as it should be when delivered without any ulterior motive. What other object [or who else] would be more attractive than this Self connected to which one's life force, intelligence, mind, relatives, body, wife, children, wealth etc. became so very dear? Go therefore to the sacrificial arena so that your brahmin husbands, as householders together with you, can complete their sacrifices.'

The wives answered: 'Do not speak so harshly with us, oh Almighty One, please be true to Your [scriptural] promise that someone who has attained the basis of Your lotus feet and turned away from all his relations, may carry upon his hair the tulsi garland that was dismissed by Your feet. Our husbands, fathers, sons and brothers, other relatives and friends will not take us back! And how would other people respond then? Would You please therefore grant that us, whose bodies have fallen at Your feet and for who there is no other destination oh Chastiser of the Enemies?'

The Supreme Lord said: 'Your husbands will not be angry out of jealousy nor will your fathers, brothers, sons or other people. Even the demigods will, on My word, regard you favorably. Physical association does not make the people in the world more happy or loving. When you [in stead thereof] then fix your minds upon Me, you will very quickly be with Me. Hearing, attending [to the deity or the gathering of devotees], meditating and singing about Me, you are of love for Me, not so much with being physically close to Me. Therefore return to your homes.'

Shri Shuka said: 'After this was said to the wives of the brahmins they went back to the place of the sacrifice. Having arrived there their husbands were not spiteful and together with them completed the ceremony. One of them was held back with force by her husband. Hearing from the others about the Supreme Lord, she embraced Him in her heart and gave up the material body that is the source of karmic bondage. The Supreme Lord, who is also known as Govinda, with those four types of food [that were brought by the women] fed the gopas, after which He, the Almighty One, also took a share. He thus in His pastimes delighted to imitate with His transcendental appearance the human ways and please the cows, the gopas and the gopis with His beauty, words and actions. The brahmins afterwards came to their senses and felt great remorse about having been so offensive in their conceit with the humble request of the Lords of the Universe who appeared like human beings. Seeing the high flight of the devotion of their wives for Krishna as the Supreme Personality, a devotion they completely lacked, they condemned themselves lamenting: 'To hell with our threefold births [biological, brahminical and ritual], our vows, our extensive spiritual knowledge, our lineage and our expertise in the rituals, when we are inimical towards the Lord Beyond the Senses. The Supreme Lord's maya, the illusory potency that even deludes the greatest yogis, has been the cause that we, the twice-born ones, the spiritual teachers of society, were bewildered about our true interest. Just see that unlimited devotion of the women for Krishna, the spiritual teacher of the universe, a devotion that even has broken the bonds of death [of their attachment] to family life. 3-4 They never underwent purification rites of rebirth, they did not stay with the guru, did not practice austerities, nor were they of philosophical inquiry into the true nature of the self or of any special cleanliness or pious actions. Nevertheless they, contrary to us so full of all that purification, are firm in their devotional service for Krishna, the Lord Praised in the Verses and the Master of all Masters of Yoga. Oh, how much has He through the words of His cowerd boys not reminded us of the ultimate destination of all transcendentalists, has He helped us who in our bewilderment about our household interests indeed were inattentive! Why else would He, the Master of Liberation and of all other benedictions who is satisfied in every respect, be of this disguise [in the form of a gopa] with us, the ones resorting under His control? The Goddess of Fortune refrains from all others and constantly worships only Him in the hope of touching His feet and putting an end to the faults [of pride and fickleness e.g.] in her own being. His request [for food] really perplexes everyone. 8-4 He constitutes the place and time, the items used, the hymns, the rituals, the priests and the fire, the officiating God-conscious ones, the performer of the sacrifice, the performance and its dharmic result [see verse 10-11]. He, the Supreme Lord Vishnu, the Master of all Yoga Masters, has directly visible taken birth among the Yadus, but despite having heard about this we foolishly failed to understand that. The Supreme Lord Krishna who is of an unlimited intelligence and because of whose illusory power we with bewildered minds are wandering along the paths of fruitive action, we offer our obeisances. He, our Original Lord and Supreme Personality of Godhead whose influence cannot be fathomed by our minds that are bewildered because of His maya, should forgive us our offense.'

Thus thinking about their offense of having disregarded Krishna, they wished to meet Him, but afraid of [drawing the attention of] Kamsa, they decided not to go to Vraja.'

*: It is said that every one consecrated by the Sautramani sacrifice for Lord Indra enters among the gods and is born sarva-tanuh, that is, with his entire body.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 24:

Krishna Defies Indra in Favor of the Brahmins, the Cows and Govardhana Hill

Shri Shuka said: 'The Supreme Lord staying there [in Vraja] in the company of Baladeva, saw how the gopas were busily engaged in arranging a sacrifice for Lord Indra. Even though the Supreme Lord, the Omniscient Soul of Everyone, knew everything about it [see B.G. 9: 23]. He bowed down humbly and inquired with the elderly ones who were headed by Nanda [His stepfather]: 'Tell Me dear father, what is all this goings-on of you about? Where does it lead to, for whom is it done and what are the means by which this sacrifice is accomplished? Please tell Me about it. I have this great desire to hear about it, oh father. Surely it cannot be so that the activities of saintly men who are equal towards everyone in this world, indifferent about mine and thine, and neutral towards friends and foes, are something to be secretive about, is it? A stranger one may avoid like he is an enemy, but a friend one should treat like oneself so they say. When common people do something in the world they sometimes engage with knowledge and sometimes they engage without. Engaging with expertise one achieves an optimal result and with ignorant actions that is not the case. With that being said I ask you whether this combined effort of yours is something that is prescribed [in the scriptures] or just a custom. That you should explain clearly to Me.'

Shri Nanda said: 'Indra is the great lord of the rain and the clouds are his personal representatives. They provide the rain for all living beings. Rain is the gratifying life force, just like milk. Because of the liquid discharged by this lord and master of the clouds my dear son, we and also other people worship him with fire sacrifices and various paraphernalia. With the remnants of those sacrifices people sustain their lives in three different ways [religiously, economically and sensually]. He is the superhuman being who brings the fruits to those who with their human actions are motivated for a certain yield [like farmers]. Anyone who rejects this dharma [of sacrificing to Indra] that was handed down by tradition, is a person who because of lust, enmity, fear and greed cannot find happiness in life [see B.G. 10: 36].'

Shri Shuka said: 'After having heard Nanda's words and also what the other residents of Vraja had to say, Lord Kesava spoke to His father in a way that made Lord Indra very angry. The Supreme Lord said: 'It is because of karma that a living entity takes birth and it is by [the force of] his karma alone that he meets his demise. Happiness or unhappiness, security and fear are all the result of one's karma. If there would be some controller giving shape to the fruit of the activities performed by others, then that ruler still depends on someone who engages in action. He can after all not be the master of someone who does nothing! Living beings have to face the consequences of their own actions, what have they to do with Indra who is incapable of altering that what is ordained by anyone's personal nature? A person is controlled by his nature - he follows his nature. This entire world with its gods, demons and common men exists on the basis of everyone's personal nature. Living beings as a consequence of their actions obtain and forsake higher and lower evolved bodies. Karma alone is their enemy, friend and impartial judge, their Lord and their teacher [see also B.G. 8: 15 & 16, 4.29: 26-27 and 7.7: 46-47]. One should therefore, keeping to one's duties, exercise respect for the karma of one's own nature [see varnashrama]. One lives rightly by that karma, it is no doubt someone's worshipable deity. The way an unfaithful woman with her lover does not gain any real benefit from resorting to another living being, it is also not to someone's advantage to prefer a thing [or deity] different from the one that is one's livelihood. The brahmanas maintain their life [by teaching and explaining] the Vedas, the kshatriyas by protecting the land, the vaishyas by trading and the Shudras by serving the twice-born ones [the former three, see also 7.11: 21-24]. The fourfold occupational duty of the vaishya consists of farming, trading, cow protection and banking as the fourth. Among these the constant care for the cows is the duty we are engaged in. [The natural qualities of] goodness, passion and ignorance are the cause of the maintenance, creation and destruction [in the world. See guna]. From the mode of passion this universe is generated and from its mutual [sexual] action we find the [biological] diversity of this world. The clouds impelled by that passion pour down their water everywhere and by that water they factually maintain the population. So what would Indra then do? The cities, the cultivated lands and the villages are not the places where we are at home. We are the forest people dear father, we always live in the forests and the hills. Let us therefore begin with a sacrifice for the cows, the brahmins and the hill [Govardhana] and use for this worship the paraphernalia of Indra's sacrifice [see also footnote 10.8*3]! Let us cook all sorts of preparations and soups, beginning with sweet rice, porridge, buns and cakes and let us use all kinds of dairy products. Let there be properly prayed before the fires by brahmins versed in the Vedas whom you should feed with well prepared dishes and reward with cows and other gifts. To act appropriately in respect of everyone, also should be thought of others: fallen souls like dogs and outcasts. After next having given grass to the cows the offerings should be presented to the mountain. After having eaten our fill, we in our best clothes, being smeared with sandalwood pulp and nicely adorned, should circumambulate the cows, the brahmins, the fires and the hill [always kept to the right]. This is my view, oh father, may it be done if you please. This will not only be dear to the brahmins, the cows and the hill, but also to Me.'

Shri Shuka said: 'When Nanda and the elders heard these words being spoken by the Supreme Lord, by the Time in person in order to break the pride of Indra, they accepted them as excellent. 2-3 And so they executed everything Madhusudana had spoken about: they arranged for the auspicious recitations, they all together respectfully paid tribute to the hill and the brahmins with the paraphernalia mentioned, they offered grass to the cows, the bulls and the calves and next they circumambulated the hill with the animals in front of them. The cowerd women nicely ornamented and riding wagons that were yoked with oxen, sang the glories of Shri Krishna while the twice-born ones chanted their benedictions. To instill faith in the gopas, Krishna thereupon assumed another form. Saying 'I am the hill' He devoured the abundance of offerings with the immensity of His body [see yapu and footnote *]. Together with the people of Vraja He by means of Himself offered His obeisances to Himself: 'Oh, just see, how this hill, by assuming its form, has bestowed His mercy upon us!'

*: Shрила Prabhupada writes to this (Krishnabook ch. 2: "The identity of Krishna and Govardhana Hill is still honoured, and great devotees take rocks from Govardhana Hill and worship them exactly as they worship the Deity of Krishna in the temples. Devotees therefore collect small rocks or pebbles from Govardhana Hill and worship them at home, because this worship is as good as Deity worship."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 25:

Lord Krishna Lifts Govardhana Hill*

Shri Shuka said: 'Indra who realised that the worship of his person had been rejected, oh King, thereupon got angry with the gopas headed by Nanda who had accepted Krishna as their Lord. In order to put an end to it all, clouds were sent forth by Indra that carried the name Samvartaka. Deeming himself the supreme controller he enraged spoke the words: 'Just see how enormously bewildered about their wealth these forest dwelling cowherds are. Having taken shelter of a mortal being like Krishna, they have committed an offense against the gods! They abandoned the spiritual knowledge and try to cross over the ocean of material existence by performing ritual sacrifices that profit oriented are inadequate to pass as boats [for that ocean]. By taking shelter of Krishna, this prattling, arrogant child, ignorantly thinking Himself to be the wisest, the gopas have acted to my displeasure. Bring [oh clouds] destruction to their animals and put an end to their arrogance, because they, proud and foolish because of Krishna and their wealth, are full of conceit. I also will, riding my elephant Airavata, come along to Vraja. Accompanied by the wind gods I will, moving hither with great power, wipe out Nanda's cowherd community [see e.g. also 6.11 & 12].'

Shri Shuka said: 'The clouds thus on the command of Indra being released from their positions, with all their power tormented Nanda's cowherd village with a massive downpour of rain. Propelled by the wind gods they, illumined by lightning bolts and roaring with thunder, showered down hailstones. With the rain incessantly pouring down from the clouds in curtains, the higher and lower parts of the earth submerged by the flood of water, could no longer be discerned. The gopas and gopis plagued by the abundance of rain and excessive wind, went shivering from the cold together with their cattle to Govinda for shelter. Covering their heads and protecting their children with their bodies they, tormented by the rains, quivering approached the basis of the lotus feet of the Supreme Personality of Godhead: Krishna, oh Krishna, oh Greatest Fortune. You are Your own master, oh Lord, please protect the cow community against the godhead [Indra] who is angry with us, oh Protector of the Devotees! [see also 10.8: 16]'

The Supreme Lord Hari seeing them witness under the attack of the hail, the rain and the extreme winds, considered the anger of Indra responsible for this: [He thought:] 'Because I rejected Krishna's sacrifice he, bent on destruction, is flooding us now with these unusual out-of-season fierce rains and great winds full of hailstones. To counteract that properly I shall by the power of My yoga arrange for the defeat of the pride with the wealth and the ignorance of those who are as foolish to falsely consider themselves Lord and Master over the world. When I eradicate the impurity of the conceitedness of those who consider themselves the controller, it is certainly not meant for countering enlightened beings who are endowed with goodness. I do that for their pacification [see also B.G. 14: 14]. The cowherd community that has taken shelter of Me as their master is My family. Therefore I will protect them with My mystic power. This is the vow I have taken [see also B.G. 9: 22].'

Having said this [to Himself this incarnation of] Vishnu took with one hand [His left one] Govardhana hill and held it up as easily as a child holding a mushroom. The Supreme Lord then said to the gopas: 'Oh mother, oh father, oh residents of Vraja, please enter if you want, together with your cows, the free space below this hill. You should not be afraid that, because of the wind and the rain, the mountain would fall from My hand. You have feared enough and in order to deliver you therefrom I have provided [this solution] for you.'

With their minds thus being pacified by Krishna, they entered the space underneath the mountain where they found ample room for their cows, wagons and everyone belonging to them. Putting aside pain, hunger and thirst and all considerations of personal comfort, He before the eyes of the residents of Vraja held up the mountain for seven days without moving from His place. When Indra saw the result of Krishna's mystic power He most surprised, bereft of his pride and broken in his determination, called back his clouds. With the sky free from clouds and the sun visible again now that the fierce wind and rain had ended, the Lifter of Govardhana Hill said to the cowherds: 'Please go together with your property, women and children away from here. Give up your fear dear gopas, the wind and rain have ceased and the water in the rivers is low again.'

The gopas each took their own cows and left, with their belongings loaded on the wagons and the women, children and old people slowly following. And while all the living beings were looking on, the Supreme Almighty Lord with ease put down the hill back where it stood before. The residents of Vraja overwhelmed by the pure love they felt for Him came forward with embraces and so on, each reflecting their personal relationship. The gopis joyfully with great affection showered their fine blessings and respected Him with presentations of yogurt, whole grains and water. Yashoda, Rohini, Nanda and Balarama, the Greatest of the Strongest Ones, embraced Krishna and full of affection eagerly offered Him all their blessings. In heaven all the demigods - the perfected ones, the saints, the heavenly singers and the venerable souls - sang the Lord's praises and showered satisfied a rain of flowers, oh earthly ruler. They sounded conch shells and played kettledrums in their abode while the leading Gandharvas headed by Tumburu sang, oh ruler of men. Oh King, Krishna together with Balarama surrounded by the loving animal tenders, thereupon left for the place where they were grazing their animals. The gopis also went away singing about the glories of His heroic deeds, happy as they were with Him who had touched their hearts.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 26:

Nanda Recapitulates the Words of Garga Before the Puzzled Gopas

Shri Shuka said: 'The gopas witnessing this kind of activities of Krishna [lifting the hill], had no idea how He could have done this and most astonished approached Nanda saying to him: 'How could the boy, considering His extraordinary activities, deserve a birth among simple countryfolk, that for Himself is contemptible? How can a boy of seven years old, playfully with one hand hold up the best of all hills, just like a mighty elephant holds up a lotus flower? As a young child with hardly His eyes open, He sucked [the poisoned milk] from the breast of the greatly powerful Putana, in the process also sucking away her life air, just like the force of time sucks away the youth from a body [see 10.6]. When He, a few months old lying beneath a cart was crying, He with His legs [kicking] upwards turned over the cart that was struck by the tip of His foot [see 10.7]. At the age of one sitting outside He was transported into the sky by the demon Trinavarta. He seized him by his neck, made him suffer and killed him [see 10.7]. One day His mother tied Him to a large mortar because He had stolen butter. He [crawling with the mortar] on His hands moved between the two arjuna trees and caused their crash [see 10.10]. He together with Balarama and the boys grazing the calves in the forest, with His two arms tore apart the beak of the enemy Baka who wanted to kill Him [see 10.11]. Vatsa, [another demon] desirous to kill Him, in the form of a calf hid among the other calves. Krishna killed him and sportively [throwing the corpse in a tree] made kapittha fruits fall down with him [see 10.11]. Together with Balarama killing the jackass demon [Dhenuka] and his jackass companions, He secured the safety of the Talavana forest that was full of ripe fruits [see 10.15]. After arranging that the terrible Pralamba would be killed by the most powerful Balarama, He released Vraja's gopas and their animals from a forest fire [see 10.18 & 19]. Subduing the most venomous chief of the snakes [Kaliya] by climbing on top of him, He managed to defeat his pride and with force send him away from the lake of the Yamuna, the water of which thus was freed from its poison [10. 16 & 17]. Dear Nanda, how can it be that all of us inhabitants of Vraja cannot give up our feelings of love for your son, who on His part is just as natural towards us? The fact that He as a boy of seven years old has lifted the big hill, has with us, oh master of Vraja, raised questions about your son.'

Nanda said: 'Please listen to my words dear gopas. Let go of your doubt concerning the boy. This is what Garga in the past has told me referring to this child [see also 10.8: 12-19 for the same verses]: 'And this one [the son of Yashoda] has according to the yuga accepted forms with a white, a red or a yellow colour. Now He is Krishna [of a dark complexion, see ]. This child previously was born somewhere else as the son of Vasudeva and therefore the ones who know this will speak about this child of yours as the glorious Vasudeva. There are many names and forms according to the qualities and activities of His appearances. These are known to me, but the common people do not know them. Being a Nanda-Gokula cowherd this child will always act to what is most beneficial to all of you. With His support you will easily overcome all dangers [*3] Oh King of Vraja, in the past, when there was a faulty regime, He has protected pious souls who were disturbed by rogues so that they, with those bad elements defeated, could flourish [see also 1.3: 28]. Just like the ones faithful to Vishnu have nothing to fear from the Asuras, those who are as fortunate to associate with this child in love and affection, will not be overcome by enemies. Therefore, oh Nanda, take the greatest care raising this child. As for His qualities, opulences, name and fame this son of yours is as good as Narayana!' After Garga had pointed this out to me, he went home. [Ever since] I consider Krishna, who frees us from all obstacles, an expansion of Narayana.'

Having heard Nanda's words about what Garga had said, the residents of Vraja, enlivened by him and with their perplexity gone, worshiped Lord Krishna. The demigod [Indra] who caused the rain, made in his anger about the loss of his sacrifice, the cowherds, animals and women suffer by engaging lightning bolts, hail and winds. Krishna considering Himself their only shelter smiled out of compassion and in order to protect the cowherd community picked up the hill with one hand the way a small child picks up a mushroom. May He, the Lord of the Cows, the destroyer of the conceit of the great king of the sky, be satisfied with us!

*: These colours will later in the eleventh BOOK in verses 11.5: 21, 24, 27 and 34 of the Bhagavatam be explained [see also another site about it].

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 27:

Lord Indra and Mother Surabhi Offer Prayers

Shri Shuka said: 'After He had upheld the hill Govardhana to protect Vraja against the rains, from the world of the cows mother Surabhi [the celestial cow] came to Krishna. And so did Lord Indra. Indra ashamed of having been offensive approached Him in a secluded place [*] and touched His feet with his helmet that shone like the sun. Having heard about and having witnessed the power of Lord Krishna, whose immeasurable potency had put an end to his arrogance of being the lord of the three worlds, he with folded hands spoke as follows.

Indra said: 'Your majesty, oh You abode of pure goodness, being of peace and the illumination of penance, You destroyed the passion and ignorance that was born from illusion. This continuous stream of the material qualities to which one is bound in one's attachment, is not present in You. How, oh Lord, can in You [as I supposed, see 10.25: 3] the causes be hidden of being entangled - the greed and such matters - that symptomize an ignorant person? Are You not the Supreme Lord who in defense of the dharma exercises Your authority to chastise the wicked ones? You are the father and the guru of the entire universe, the Original Lord and the insurmountable Time who, when You by Your own decision assume Your transcendental forms, strives to be the authority to eradicate the self-conceit of the ones who think they are the Lord of the Universe. Ignorant souls like me who think they are the master of the universe do, the moment they see You fearless at the time [of confrontation], quickly abandon their arrogance. This happens when they, no longer being conceited because of Your lesson for the wicked ones, in full have taken to the path of gentlemen. Therefore please forgive me, oh Master who has assumed this form. Unaware of Your influence I because of my rulership bathed in arrogance. Being offensive my intelligence got bewildered. Please let my consciousness never again be that foul my Lord. Your descent into this world, oh Lord of the Beyond, happened for the sake of the existence of those who serve Your lotus feet oh Godhead, and for the non-existence of warlords who - with the many disturbances they create - constitute a great burden. I offer You my obeisances, the Supreme Lord and Original Personality, the great Soul Shri Krishna, the son of Vasudeva. My respects for the Master of the Servants of the Absolute Truth. My obeisances for Him who assumes physical forms in response to the desires of His devotees, for Him whose form is pure spiritual knowledge, who is the seed of all and everything and the indwelling Soul of all living beings. Oh Lord when the sacrifice was frustrated I was fiercely arrogant and angry and wanted to destroy the cowherd community by means of rain and wind oh Supreme Lord. You, oh Controller, showing Your mercy have shattered my rigidity and rendered my attempts fruitless. I came to You, the True Self and spiritual master, to seek Your shelter.'

Shri Shuka said: 'With Krishna this way being glorified by the munificent Indra, the Supreme Lord smiled and spoke, as grave as the clouds, the following words to him. The Supreme Lord said: 'I have engaged in the arrest of your sacrifice to show you My mercy and to ensure that you, as the king of heaven who was so greatly intoxicated by the opulence, would remember Me forever. He, who blinded by the intoxication of power and opulence, does not see Me standing with the rod in My hand, I, in the wish to promote him, will prepare a fall from his affluent position [see also B.G. 9: 22]. Oh Indra, you may go now, I wish you all good fortune. Executing My order you may, free from false pride, remain engaged in your responsibilities.'

Then mother Surabhi spoke to Krishna. Peaceful of mind offering her respects she together with her cows begged for the attention of the Supreme Lord who had appeared as a cowherd boy. Mother Surabhi said: 'Krishna, oh Krishna, oh Greatest Mystic! Oh Soul and Origin of the Universe, with You as the director of the world, we have found our master, oh Infallible One. You are our Supreme Godhead. Oh Lord of the Universe, can You, for the welfare of the cows, the brahmins and those who are godly and saintly, please be there as our Indra? For You to be our Indra, we shall perform a bathing ceremony to the directions of Lord Brahma, oh Soul of the Universe who descended to relieve the burden of the earth.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Lord Krishna was after this request by Surabhi bathed with her own milk. On the order of the mothers of the demigods [the daughters of Aditi] He was thereupon by Indra bathed with the heavenly Ganges water carried in Airavata's trunk. He, the descendant of Das'arha, thus in the company of the enlightened souls and the seers received the name Govinda [he who finds the cows]. Tumburu, Narada and the others, the singers of heaven, the scholars, the perfected ones and the venerable ones came to that place and sang the glories of the Lord that eradicate the impurity of the world. The wives of the demigods danced together filled with joy. He as the emblem of all the gods was praised and covered with wonderful showers of flowers. Everyone in the three worlds experienced a supreme satisfaction and the cows saturated the earth with their milk. The rivers flooded with all kinds of liquids, the trees provided honey, the plants developed fully without being cultivated and the mountains produced jewels. Oh [Parikhit,] beloved one of the Kuru dynasty, when Lord Krishna had been bathed all living beings, even the ones that are vicious by nature [predators, false people], became free from enmity. After Govinda, the master of the cows and the cowherd community, thus had been bathed by him, Indra took leave and returned to heaven surrounded by the gods and the others.'

*: The specific "solitary place" where Indra approached Shri Krishna is mentioned by the sage Shri Vais'ampayana in the Hari-vams'a (Vishnu-parva 19: sa dadars'opavishtham vai govardhana-s'ila-tale. "He saw Him [Krishna] sitting at the base of Govardhana Hill").

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 28:

Krishna Rescues Nanda Maharaja from the Abode of Varuna

The son of Vyasa said: 'After having fasted the eleventh day [of a lunar fortnight, ekadas'i] and having worshiped the Maintainer of All [Janardana], Nanda entered the water of the Yamuna for a bath on the twelfth day. An obscure servant of Varuna seized him and led him to his master for he had neglected that it was an unfavorable time to enter the water at night. Oh King, the gopas not seeing him cried loudly: 'Oh Krishna, oh Rama!', upon which the Supreme Lord who makes His people fearless, found out that His [step]father had been arrested by Varuna. He went to Varuna's place. As soon as he saw that the Lord of the Senses had arrived, the presiding godhead of that region [of the waters], elaborately honoured Him, being greatly pleased to have Him present.

Shri Varuna said: 'Today I may experience the true wealth of the success of my physical existence, oh Lord, for it is so that those who earned the privilege to serve Your lotus feet, have achieved the transcendence of their material life. I offer You my obeisances, oh Supreme Personality of Godhead, You who are the Absolute Truth and the Supreme Soul free from the influence of the deluding material energy of maya that makes up the material universe. That ignorant servant of mine was a fool who did not know his duty [*] when he brought this man who is Your father to me. I beg Your pardon Your goodness. Towards me, oh Krishna, Govinda, oh You who sees everything, please be of mercy. This person who is Your father decidedly should be with You who care so much about Your parents.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Krishna, the Supreme Lord and Controller of all Controllers, thus being satisfied, took His father with Him and went back to His relatives whom He brought great joy. Nanda who never before had met with the great opulence of the lord of the realm [of the waters] or had witnessed the obeisances they [Varuna and his followers] offered Krishna, spoke most amazed to his friends and relatives. They, the gopas, with Him as their Controller eagerly listening oh King, thought: 'Maybe the Supreme Master is going to bestow upon us His subtle all-pervading spirit, His destination!'

He, the Supreme Lord who sees and understands everything of His devotees, concerning the fulfillment of their desire full of compassion thought: 'The people in this world who ignorantly are engaged in desirous activities, wander between higher and lower purposes without being aware of their actual destination.'

With this consideration the Supreme Lord Hari in His great compassion showed the gopas His abode beyond the darkness of matter: the true, unlimited, spiritual knowing that is the light of the eternal absolute the way it is seen by the sages when they in trance are removed from the material qualities. They were by Krishna brought to the lake of the One Spirit [brahma-brada] and submerged in it. Lifted out again they saw the abode of the Absolute Truth the way Akrua has seen it [3.1: 32, 10.38 & 10.40]. Nanda and the others were overwhelmed by supreme bliss with that vision and were most surprised to see Krishna Himself present there extensively being praised with Vedic hymns.'

*: Prabhupada's pupils comment to the precise execution of ekadas'i fasting matters and auspicious times of bathing: 'Of course, Varuna's servant should have been aware of these technical details, which are meant for strict followers of the Vedic rituals.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 29:

The Rasa Play: Krishna Meets and Escapes the Gopis at Night

The son of Vyasa said: 'Even though Krishna was the Supreme Lord, He, resorting to His inner potency [see yoga-maya], decided to enjoy those nights in autumn when He saw the jasmine flowers blossoming. The king of the stars [the moon] at the time painted with his action the face of the east red, thus giving comfort to all who longed for him, just like a lover approaching his beloved ends her grief when he after a long time shows up again. Krishna saw how the kumuda lotuses opened to the full disc of the moon that glowed as red as the fresh kunkuma on the face of the goddess of fortune. He saw how the forest was reddened by the gentle rays of that light and sweetly played His flute that enchanted the minds of the [gopis with their] beautiful eyes. That song being heard by the women of Vraja awakened Cupid in their hearts so that each of them, unknown to the others, with her mind seized by Krishna and with earrings swinging in the haste, went to the place where He, her boyfriend, was situated. Some left behind the cows while they were milking them, some abandoned in their eagerness the milk they had on the stove, while others went away without taking the cake out of the oven. - Some put aside the children they were feeding milk and dressed up without thinking of the service they would render to their husbands. Some left during their meals, some while they were oiling themselves, were smearing their bodies or were making up their eyes. Others went to Krishna with their clothes and ornaments in disarray. They were checked by their husbands, fathers, brothers and other relatives but, enchanted by Govinda they, with their hearts stolen, did not turn around [to their duties]. Some gopis who did not manage to get away, stayed at home and closed their eyes to meditate on being [transcendentally] connected in love with Him [see footnote* and 10.1: 62-63]. 0-1 The intolerable, intense agony of being separated from their Beloved One drove away all bad-mindedness. At the same time their material virtue was also reduced to zero because of the joy they obtained from meditating upon Acyuta's embrace. Despite the fact that He was the Supreme Soul they thought of Him as their paramour. Getting His direct association though their karmic bonds were counteracted so that they immediately gave up their physical interest that is ruled by the natural modes.'

Shri Parikhit said: 'They only knew Krishna as their beloved one and not as the Absolute Truth, oh sage. How could there for them being so mindful of the material affair, be an end to the mighty current of the gunas?'

Shri Shuka said: 'I spoke to you about this before [in 3.2: 19 and in 7.1: 16-33]. When the king of Cedi [S'ishupala] could attain perfection even by hating the Lord of the Senses, what then would that mean for those who are dear to the Lord in the Beyond? The personal appearance of the Supreme, Imperishable and Inscrutable Lord who, free from the modes, is the controller of the modes, is there to lead humanity to the perfection of life, oh King. They who towards Him are constantly of lust, anger, fear, affection, unity or friendship will surely achieve absorption in Him. You should not be surprised about this [fact] concerning the Unborn Supreme Personality, the master of all masters of yoga, Krishna, by whose grace this world finds liberation. When the Supreme Lord saw the girls of Vraja coming to Him, He, the best of all speakers, did not use any charming words that would confuse them. The Supreme Lord said: 'All of you, be welcome, oh fortunate ladies. What can I do to please you? Please tell Me whether Vraja is all right and for what reason you came here. This night is full of fearsome looking creatures, so please return to Vraja oh slender girls. You women should not hang around here. Your mothers, fathers, sons, brothers and husbands undoubtedly are looking for you and unable to find you. Do not make your families afraid. 1-2 You have seen Raka [the goddess of the full moon day] resplendent with her moonlight. You have seen the forest full of flowers that is even more pleasurable by the breeze that coming from the Yamuna plays through the leaves of the trees. Go therefore, without delay, back to the cowherd village. You must serve your husbands, oh chaste ladies, the calves and the children are crying for you to give them milk. Or else, if you have come with your hearts overtaken by your love for Me, that is indeed laudable of you since all living beings have affection for Me. For women it indeed is the highest dharma to be diligently of service to her husband, to be simple and honest towards the relatives and to take good care of her family. Unless he fell down [from his belief or being unfaithful] a husband, even being bad-tempered, unfortunate, old, decrepit, sickly and poor, must not be rejected by women who want to go to heaven [see also 9.14: 37 and B.G. 1: 40]. For a well-educated woman to go astray dishonourably in adultery, is in all cases a contemptible weakness that creates fear and harms the reputation. By listening, being in My presence [with the deity and the devotees], by meditation and by narrating [proclaiming and publishing], one is of love for Me, not so much with physical proximity. Therefore, please return to your homes [see also 10.23: 33].'

Shri Shuka said: 'The gopis thus hearing the not so pleasant words of Govinda, being dejected because they were disappointed in their strong desires, felt an anxiety that was hard to overcome. Saddened letting their faces hang down and their bimba-red lips dry up, they sighed while scratching the ground with their feet. With their tears spoiling their make-up and washing away the kunkum on their breasts, they silently carried the burden of their great distress. Their Beloved One, not so loving at all, had addressed them contrarily, while they for His sake had desisted from all their material desires. They wiped their tears and stopped their crying and then, with their voices choked up in the attachment, in agony said something back to Him. The beautiful gopis said: 'You, oh Mighty One, oh Goodness should not speak so harshly. Please reciprocate with our devotion at Your feet for which we have denounced everything else, do not play so hard-to-get rejecting us. Be just like the Godhead, the Original Personality who reciprocates with those who desire liberation. Oh dearest one, You as the Knower of the Dharma thus spoke of the duty of women that would consist of her faithfulness to her husband, children and relatives. So be it, but it is not so that You, oh Lord, You the Godhead, the most appreciated one who as the Soul for all embodied beings is the closest relative, are the real object of this instruction? The experts are constantly of service to You, who always endear them as their very own Self. So, what do our husbands, children and relatives mean to us who give us trouble? Have mercy with us oh Supreme Controller, do not cut down the by us for so long entertained hopes for You oh Lotus-eyed One! You easily stole our minds that were absorbed in our households, as also our hands that were engaged in household duties. Our feet will not move one step away from Your feet. How can we go back to Vraja, what should we do instead? Please oh Dearest One, pour the flood of the nectar of Your smiling glances and melodious songs that [by the flute] escape from Your lips, over the fire in our hearts. Otherwise we will place our bodies in the fire that burns of separation and by meditation on Your feet attain Your abode oh Friend. Oh You with Your lotus eyes, for the goddess of fortune it is a festival whenever she resides at the base of Your feet, the feet that now are held dear by [us] the people dwelling in the forest. Touching them we, being filled by Your joy, from that moment on will never be able to stand in the direct presence of any other man! The goddess of fortune, who together with Tulasi-devi has achieved a position on Your chest, is served by servants and the other gods try to acquire her look of approval. But the same way as even she desires the dust of Your lotus feet, we also have sought the shelter of the dust of Your feet. Therefore be of mercy with us oh Vanquisher of all Distress. Renouncing our homes we have approached Your feet in the hope to worship You. Please allow us to serve You oh gem of all people, oh You with Your beautiful smiles and glances for which our hearts have burned with an intense desire. Seeing Your face encircled by Your hair, the beauty of Your earrings at Your cheeks, the nectar of Your smiling lips, the glances that make one fearless, Your two mighty arms and with seeing Your chest, the only source of pleasure for the goddess, we are delivered as Your servants. Which woman within the three worlds, oh dearest, would, completely being bewildered by the melody lines of the songs You draw from Your flute, not deviate in her civil conduct after seeing this grace of the three worlds, this beautiful form because of which [even] the cows, the birds, the trees and the deer experience a shiver of joy? You clearly have taken birth as the Godhead, the remover of the fear and distress of the people of Vraja, as no one else but the Original Personality who protects all the gods and worlds. Therefore, oh Friend of the Distressed, kindly place Your lotus like hand on the burning breasts and heads of Your maidservants.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Having heard the gopis' despondent words, the Lord of all the Lords of Yoga full of mercy smiled, He who had been satisfied despite His ever being satisfied within. Being together with all of them He was as splendid as the - like the spotted deer - blemished moon surrounded by the stars. He as the Infallible Lord who is so magnanimous in His glances and proofs of affection, made their faces blossom with His broad smiles that beamed His jasmine-like teeth. Being sung and singing Himself as the commander of hundreds of women, He wore the five-coloured [Vajrayanti] garland with which He increased the beauty of the forest where He moved about. 5-4 Together with the gopis He arrived at the riverbank that, served by the waves, was cool with its [wet] sand and was pleasant with the fragrance of the lotuses that was carried by the wind. Together with the Vraja beauties awakening Cupid, He took pleasure in throwing His arms around them in embraces. That way touching their hair, belts, thighs and breasts with His hands, He, challenging striking them with His fingernails, glanced at them and played and laughed with them. This way receiving from Krishna, the Supreme Personality of Godhead, the special attention of the Greater Soul, they, getting proud, considered themselves the best of all women on earth. Observing that they due to their fortune were caught in an intoxicated state of self-conceit,

Lord Kes'ava, as a form of grace, disappeared from the spot in order to abate it.'

*: The different types of gopis suggested here are also mentioned in the Padma Purana:

gopyas tu Shrutayo jneya rishi-ja gopa-kanyakah deva-kanyas' ca rajendra na manushyah kathancana

'It is understood that some of the gopis are personified Vedic literatures (s'ruti-cari), while others are reborn sages (rishi-cari), daughters of cowherds (gopa-kanyas), or demigod maidens (deva-kanyas). But by no means, my dear King, are any of them ordinary humans.' There is also mention of sadhana-siddhas and nitya-siddhas: those perfect of spiritual discipline and those born that way.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 30:

The Gopis Search for Krishna Who Disappeared with Radha

Shri Shuka said: 'When the Supreme Lord thus suddenly had disappeared, the young ladies of Vraja were as sorry not to see Him as she-elephants who miss their bull. The women who in their hearts were overwhelmed by the movements, affectionate smiles, playful glances, charming talks and other graceful gestures of the husband of Rama, absorbed in Him thereupon enacted each of those wonderful activities. The dear ones lost themselves in imitating the movements, smiles, beholding, talking and so on of their Beloved One, who factually thus was expressing Himself through their bodies. Under the influence of Krishna's ways they confided to each other: 'He is completely in me!' Together they sang loudly about Him and searched like mad everywhere in the forest, asking the trees for the Original Personality who, like the ether, is both present inside and outside: 'Oh as'vattha [holy fig tree], oh plaksha [waved-leaf fig tree], oh nyagrodha [banyan], have you seen the son of Nanda who has disappeared after He with His loving smiles and glances stole our hearts? Oh kurabaka [red amaranth], ashoka, naga, punnaga and campaka, have you seen passing the younger brother of Balarama who with His smile vanquishes the pride of every girl who is too haughty? Oh sweet tulasi have you who loves Govinda's feet so very much, seen our dearest Acyuta who carries you with swarms of bees around His neck? Oh malati, jati, yuthika and mallika jimsine, have you seen Madhava pass by who with His touch gives you pleasure? Oh cuta [mango creeper], priyala, panasa and asana [jackfruit trees]; oh kovidara [mountain ebony], jambu [rose-apple], arka, bilva [bel fruit], bakula [mimosas] and amra [mango tree]; oh kadamba and nipa and who else of you who for the sake of others live here near the bank of the Yamuna, please be so kind to tell us whose minds were stolen, the path that Krishna took. Oh [mother] earth, what austerity did you perform to have been touched by Kes'ava's feet with a joy that made your bodily hair [her grasses and such] stand on end? Or do you maybe owe your beauty to being trodden by the feet of Vamanadeva [see 8.18-22] or maybe because you were embraced by the body of Varaha [3.13]? Oh wife of the deer, oh friend, did you encounter Acyuta and His beloved one here, He who with all His limbs is a festival to your eyes? There is the fragrance in the air of the garland of the Master of the Gopis that in touch with the breasts of His girlfriend was coloured by the kunkum. Oh trees, when Rama's younger brother passed by, with His arm placed on the shoulder of His sweetheart, with in His hand a lotus and with the tulasi flowers [around His neck] followed by a swarm of bees blind of intoxication, did He with His loving glances acknowledge that you were bowing down? Let us ask these creepers. Despite embracing the arms of their master tree, they must have noticed the touch of His fingernails. Just see how their skins erupt with joy!'

The gopis thus speaking madly, being distraught in their search for Krishna, got fully immersed in Him when each of them began to act out a certain pastime of the Fortunate One. One of them drank as Krishna with another one acting as Putana like an infant from her breast, while yet another one acting for the cart was kicked over by the foot of another gopi who was crying [see chapters 10.6 and 7]. One gopi acting as Krishna was carried away by another gopi imitating a Daitya [Trinavarta, see 10.7] while yet another one crawling about was tinkling with her ankle bells while dragging her feet behind her. Two behaved like Krishna and Rama with some who acted like the gopas and killed one who played for Vatsasura while yet another couple enacted what happened with Bakasura [see 10.11]. Just like Krishna calling for the cows far away, one gopi, who played like Him and acted like she was vibrating a flute, was praised by the others who said: 'Well done!' One of them walked about with her arm placed over a [friend's] shoulder and declared: 'Look at my gracious movements, I am Krishna!' and was thus keeping her mind fixed on Him. 'Do not be afraid of the wind and rain, your deliverance has been arranged by Me', one of them said while she with one hand managed to lift up her shawl [like it was Govardhana Hill, see 10.25]. Oh master of men, one gopi climbing on top of another one declared with her foot on her head: 'Oh you wicked snake, go away, I have taken birth as the one to chastise the mischievous ones!' [see 10.16] One of them said: 'Oh gopas, look at this fierce forest fire, quickly close your eyes, I will without any problem arrange for your protection.' One slender gopi was tied up with a flower garland by another gopi who said: 'There You are, I bind You to the mortar, You pot breaker and buttherthief!' and with that being said the other one covered her face and beautiful eyes, pretending to be afraid.

This way being engaged and asking the trees and creepers everywhere in Vrindavana where He was, they at one spot in the forest saw the footprints of the Supreme Soul: 'These are clearly the footprints of the son of Nanda. You can tell by [looking at the marks of] the flag, the lotus, the thunderbolt, the barleycorn and the elephant goad [see *]. The girls who led by the various footprints followed His trail, noticed to their dismay that they all the way were accompanied by the footprints of one of them. They thereupon said: 'Whose footprints are these next to the ones of the son of Nanda? Over whose shoulder has He, as a bull with a she-elephant, placed His arm? He must have been perfectly honoured by her [aradhita, see Radha] as being the Supreme, One Lord and Controller, for Govinda, thus being pleased, has turned us down and taken her separate. Oh girls, how sacred are the particles of dust of Govinda's lotus feet that by Lord Brahma, Lord Shiva and Shri Ramadevi [Lakshmi] are taken on their heads to dispel the [reactions upon the] sins? For us these footprints of her are more unsettling, because, whom of us gopis was taken aside to enjoy Acyuta's lips in seclusion? Look, here we don't see her feet anymore. The blades of grass and sprouts must have hurt the soles of her tender feet so that her love has lifted up His sweetheart. Carrying His sweetheart the footprints pressed much deeper... Just see, oh gopis, how, burdened by the weight, our so intelligent object of desire Krishna has placed His girlfriend down to pick some flowers. And see these half footprints over here. To gather flowers for His sweetheart the One Beloved made this imprint by standing on His toes. Furthermore, in order to arrange the design of her hair the love-stricken friend with His loving girl sat down precisely here in order to make for His sweetheart a crown from the flowers.'

[Shri Shuka said:] 'Even though Krishna was perfectly contented, satisfied and undivided within Himself, He enjoyed with her and thus demonstrated the covetousness and selfhood of man and women who are motivated by lust. 5-3 Krishna in this matter showed for the sake of which gopi He had abandoned the other women, the other gopis who completely bewildered wandered around in the forest. She in her turn then thought of herself: 'He has accepted me, the best of all women, as His beloved and has turned down the gopis who were led by lust!'

Thereupon going to that spot in the forest, she got proud and said to Krishna: 'I cannot move on, please carry me wherever You want to go.'

Thus being addressed Krishna said to His sweetheart: 'Climb on My back.' and then He disappeared. She felt very sorry.

'Oh Master, oh Lover, oh Dearest, where are You, where are You? Oh mighty armed One, please my friend, show Yourself to me, Your wretched maidservant!'

Shri Shuka said: 'The gopis not far away following the trail of the Supreme Lord discovered their unhappy friend in a state of being bewildered about her separation from her Beloved. To their utter amazement they heard her saying that she had received Madhava's respect but that He also had let her down because of her bad behavior. As far as the light of the moon permitted they thereupon entered the forest [to look for Him], but finding themselves in the dark, the women desisted. Absorbed in Him, discussing Him, imitating Him and filled with His presence they, simply singing about His qualities, no longer thought about their homes [see also 7.5: 23-24]. Turning back to the bank of the Yamuna they meditated on Krishna, sang together and eagerly awaited His arrival.'

*: In the Skanda Purana is found an explanation of these [in total nineteen] marks: 'At the base of the large toe on His right foot, the unborn Lord carries the mark of a disc, which cuts down the six [mental] enemies of His devotees. At the bottom of the middle toe of that same foot Lord Acyuta has a lotus flower, which increases the greed for Him in the minds of the beelike devotees who meditate on His feet. At the base of His small toe is a thunderbolt, which smashes the mountains of His devotees' reactions to past sins, and in the middle of His heel is the mark of an elephant goad, which brings the elephants of His devotees' minds under control. The joint of His right large toe bears the mark of a barleycorn, representing all kinds of enjoyable opulences. A thunderbolt is found on the right side of His right foot, and an elephant goad below that.' See the Vedabase of 10.30: 25 for further info.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 31:

The Songs of the Gopis in Separation

The gopis said: 'Because of Your birth the land of Vraja is more and more glorious and the goddess of fortune resides there perpetually. Show Yourself oh dear beloved, You for whom the devotees who search for You everywhere sustain their life breath. Not being here, oh Finest of Grace, You with the beauty of Your glance - which excels the exquisite beauty of the heart of the lotus that so perfectly grew in the pond of autumn - put an end to the life of us, the maidservants who gave themselves to You without expecting anything in return, oh Lord of Love. Is that not murder? Time and again, oh Greatest Personality, we have been protected by You against all that is fearsome: perishing by the water [of Kaliya, 10.16], by the demon [Agha, 10.12], by the rains, the storm and thunderbolts [of Indra, 10.25] and by the bull and the son of Maya [the incidents with Arishthasura and Vyomasura which Shuka discusses later]. Oh Friend, You who appeared in the dynasty of the devotees [the Satvatas] are actually not the son of the gopi [Yashoda]. Your Lordship is the seer, the inner consciousness of all embodied beings, oh You who appeared on the request of Brahma who was praying for the protection of the universe [see also 3.8: 16 and 10.14]. You who took the hand of the goddess, oh best of the Vrishnis, made the ones fearless who in the fear about their material existence approached Your feet. Please, oh Lover, place as an answer to our desires Your lotus like hand on our heads. Oh You who put an end to the suffering of the inhabitants of Vraja, oh Hero of the women who with His smile defeats the false smiles of the people, please oh Friend, accept us, Your eternal maidservants. Please show us Your beautiful lotus face. Your lotus feet that remove the sins of the embodied souls surrendered to You, that follow the cows grazing grass, that are the abode of the goddess and that stood on the hoods of the serpent, please put them on our breasts and dispel the lust in our hearts. Oh You with Your lotus eyes, because of Your sweet charming voice and words that are so attractive to the intelligent ones, these maidservants, oh Hero, are getting bewildered. Please restore us to life with the nectar of Your lips. The nectar of Your talks as described by the great thinkers drive away the sins of the individual souls who suffer [in this material world]. Charged with spiritual power they are a blessing for everyone who hears them. Oh how beneficent are the persons who with song spread those talks all over the world[*].'

We are happy to meditate on Your affectionate smiles full of divine love, Your glances and Your pastimes, but the intimate conversations, which go straight to our hearts oh deceiver, agitate our minds! When You leave Vraja to herd the animals oh Master, we are pained. We feel uncomfortable within, oh Lover, when we think of the husks, grasses and sprouting plants that are sharp to Your feet, oh Master, those feet that are more beautiful than a lotus. When You at the end of the day show again Your bluish black locks and Your lotus face thickly covered with dust, You time and again bring Cupid to our minds, oh Hero. Your lotus feet grant the highest satisfaction in fulfilling the desires of those who bow down to them and in being worshipped by the one born on the lotus [Brahma]. They are the ornament of the earth and the proper object to meditate upon in times of distress. Therefore please oh Lover, oh Remover of the Anxiety, place Your feet upon our breasts. Grief is destroyed and the happiness of love increases by the vibrations of the flute that so perfectly handled [by You] makes us forget the attachments to other persons. So please, oh hero, grant us the nectar of Your lips! When You go to the forest during the day, a single moment becomes like an eon for those who do not see Your curling locks of hair and Your beautiful face. How foolish is he [Brahma] who created the eyelids of the ones who are looking forward to see You! Completely neglecting our husbands, children, ancestors, brothers and other relatives we sought Your presence, oh Acyuta, oh You who know the reasons of our movements. Oh cheater, how could You in the dead of night abandon the women who were bewildered by the clear sound of Your flute? By intimately chatting with You finding the lust rising in our hearts, by seeing Your smiling face, loving glances and Your broad chest that is the abode of the goddess, our minds full of craving, time and again got bewildered. For those living in the forests of Vraja Your so very, for each and all, auspicious appearance constitutes the destruction of their distress oh dearest. Please grant us a bit of that medicine that counteracts the disease in the hearts of Your devotees hankering for You. Your so tender lotus feet we, oh beloved, place gently on our breasts, afraid that the forest You roam might be too rough for them. We who consider Your Lordship our very life, with restless minds are concerned that they do not suffer any harm from small pebbles and so on [see further the Shikshashthaka].'

*: The pupils of Prabhupada here refer to the following story: 'King Prataparudra recited this verse to Shri Caitanya Mahaprabhu during Lord Jagannatha's Ratha-yatra festival. While the Lord was resting in a garden, king Prataparudra humbly entered and began massaging His legs and lotus feet. Then the king recited the thirty-first chapter of the tenth BOOK of the Shrimad Bhagavatam, the songs of the gopis. The Caitanya-caritamrita relates that when Lord Caitanya heard this verse, beginning tava kathamritam, He immediately arose in ecstatic love and embraced king Prataparudra. The incident is described in detail in the Caitanya-caritamrita (Madhya 14.4 - 1, and in his edition Shri Prabhupada has given an extensive commentary.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 32:

Krishna Returns to the Gopis

Shri Shuka said: 'The gopis oh King, thus went on singing and speaking deliriously, endearingly weeping loudly and hankering for the audience of Krishna. The son of Vasudeva [for Shauri, 'the Son of the Hero'], the Bewilderer of [Cupid] the bewilderer of the mind, thereupon appeared directly before them, smiling with His lotus like face and wearing a yellow garment and a garland. When they saw that He, their dearest one, had returned to them, the girls full of affection opened their eyes wide and stood all simultaneously up as if life itself had returned to their bodies. One of them joyfully seized the hand of Shauri with her folded palms while another one put His arm, adorned with sandalwood paste, around her shoulder. A slender gopi took the remnants of the betel He had chewed in her joined hands and another one took His lotus feet and placed them on her burning breasts. Another one with frowning eyebrows biting her lips threw, beside herself in her love, agitated, sidelong looks at Him as if she wanted to harm Him. Another one [said to be Radha] staring at Him relished His lotus face but could, despite the full taste, not get enough, just like saints cannot get enough of His feet. One of them placed Him, through the openings of her eyes, in her heart and kept embracing Him there with her eyes closed, while her hairs stood on end being drowned in ecstasy, as if she was a yogi [*]. All of them experienced a supreme jubilation at the sight of Kes'ava and gave up the distress of their separation, just like normal people do when they meet a spiritually enlightened person. My dear King, in the midst of those who were relieved of their sorrow, Acyuta, the Supreme Lord, appeared even more brilliant, as the Original Person complete with all His spiritual potencies. 1-1 The Almighty One took them with Him and arrived at the banks of the Yamuna. There the auspicious river with the hands of her waves had collected soft sands. The kunda and mandara flowers fragrantly bloomed with bees [attracted] by the autumnal breeze, while the moon, plentifully shining, with its rays dispelled the darkness of the night. The pain of the desires in their heart was dispelled by the ecstasy of seeing Him. By arranging a seat for their dear friend with their shawls that were smeared with the kunkuma from their breasts, the gopis attained the ultimate fulfillment of their souls as [described in] the scriptures [see also 10.87: 23]. The Supreme Lord and Controller for whom the masters of yoga arrange a seat in their hearts, present in the assembly of the gopis was seated there resplendently. Thus exhibiting His personal form He was worshiped as the exclusive reservoir of all beauty and opulence in the three worlds. He who awakens Cupid, was honoured with smiles, with playful glances, with sporting their eyebrows, with massaging His feet and hands upon their laps and was thus offered praise, but still being somewhat incensed they addressed Him. The fine gopis said: 'Some follow the example of those who respect them, some show respect without being respected themselves and some have no love for anyone. Oh dear one, can You explain that to us?'

The Supreme Lord said: 'Friends who exclusively to their self-interest reciprocate with respect, are no real friends that way because they in desiring their benefit do not follow the principle. They who are respectful and kind without being respected themselves, like parents e.g., are faultless in their sense of duty and of real friendship, oh slender girls. As for those who have no respect, nor even answer the love they receive from others, one may speak of either [spiritually] self-satisfied souls, people whose material desires were fulfilled, ungrateful, dissatisfied human beings or else persons inimical towards venerable personalities [like spiritual masters and superiors]. But I My friends, despite the respect I receive from other living beings, do not reciprocate that propensity [for pure love] in order to let it increase. Someone will entertain no thought of anything else then, just like a poor man who collected some wealth and is afraid to lose it again [see also B.G. 4: 11 and 10.29: 27]. Because of your for My sake defying of what the people, the scriptures and your relatives all say and because of [My desire to increase] your propensity to love Me, I have answered by disappearing from your sight My dear girls []. So do not be displeased with your Beloved, oh dear ones. I will, not even living as long as a god in heaven, be able to repay you for your unadulterated worship of Me. May your own pious activities constitute the answer [be the reward] for that cutting with the so difficult to overcome chains of your household lives.'

*: Shri Vis'vanatha Cakravarti Thakura states that the seven gopis mentioned thus far in this chapter are the first seven of the eight principal gopis of which the Shri Vaishnava-toshani in a verse gives the names as being Candravali, Shyamala, Shaibya, Padma, Shri Radha, Lalita and Vis'akha. The eighth one is understood to be Bhadra. The Skanda Purana declares these eight gopis to be the principal ones among the three billion gopis and Radha is, as confirmed in the Padma Purana, Brihad-gautamiya-tantra and the Rig-paris'ishtha, the Lord's most beloved one.

 : Intermittent reinforcement as practiced by Krishna so evanescently here, in fact creates the strongest bond, so confirms modern behavioral science. Thus with all His religions everywhere in the world there are days of materially motivated work where we do not see Him as He vanishes into the background, and days of prayer where we do meet Him by His representatives.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 33:

The Rasa Dance

Shri Shuka said: 'When the gopis heard these most charming words of the Supreme Lord, they gave up their lamentation about having been deserted. The touch of His limbs had fulfilled all their desires. Govinda on the spot thereupon engaged in a dance [a rasa, or sport] in which the faithful jewels among women all satisfied joined with their arms linked together.

- The festival of the dance commenced with the gopis positioned in a circle. Krishna, the Controller of the Mystic Union, always keeping Himself situated between two of them, held His arms around the necks of the women next to Him. At that moment the sky was crowded by hundreds of celestial carriers belonging to the denizens of heaven with their wives whose minds were carried away by curiosity. Thereupon kettledrums resounded and a rain of flowers came down, while the chief singers of heaven together with their wives sang about His immaculate glories. In the circle of the dance there was a great rumor of the bracelets, ankle bells and waist bells of the women who were together with their Beloved. The Supreme Lord, the son of Devaki, being together with them appeared as handsomely splendid as an exquisite [blue] sapphire in the midst of golden ornaments. The way they placed their feet, by the gestures of their hands, their smiles, playful eyebrows and their bending waists, by their breasts moving beneath their clothes, their earrings at their necks and their perspiring faces, with the braids of their hair, their tightly tied belts and their singing about Him, they, in the role of Krishna's consorts, shone as streaks of lightning amidst the clouds. They by whose song the entire universe is pervaded, sang loudly with their coloured throats, danced joyfully and were happy in their dedication to be touched by Krishna. One gopi who together with Krishna raised [her voice relative to His] in pure tones of close harmony, was praised by Him who pleased exclaimed: 'excellent, excellent!' And another gopi who vibrated along with them with a special metre, He also showed His great appreciation. A certain gopi [Radha probably] whose bracelets and flowers were slipping, stood fatigued because of the dancing at the side of the Master of the Ceremony [He who holds the club] and grasped His shoulder with her arm. Somewhere else there was one who placed Krishna's arm that was as fragrant as a blue lotus, over her shoulder and kissed it while she smelled the sandalwood with her hair standing on end. Another one, looking beautiful with the glittering of her earrings that were shaking because of the dancing, placed her cheek next to His and received from Him the betel nut He had chewed. One of them who with Acyuta at her side was dancing and singing with tinkling ankle bells and waist bells, feeling tired placed His auspicious lotus hand on her breasts. Now that the gopis had achieved the Infallible Lord, the Exclusive Lover of the Goddess of Fortune, as their lover, they enjoyed it, with His arms around their necks, to sing about Him. With the lotus flowers behind their ears and the wreaths in their hair falling to the ground, with the locks of their hair decorating their cheeks and their beautiful faces perspiring, with the reverberation of the harmonious sounds of their armlets and bells and the bees buzzing around them, the gopis danced together with the Supreme Lord in the arena of the dance. The Master of the Goddess of Fortune, thus with His embraces, the touches of His hands, His affectionate glances and His broad playful smiles, enjoyed it to be together with the young women of Vraja, just like a boy does who plays with His own reflection. From the bodily contact with Him being overwhelmed in their senses, it was for the ladies of Vraja not easy to keep their hair, their dresses and the cloths that covered their breasts sufficiently tidy. Their flower garlands and ornaments were in disarray, oh best of the Kurus. Seeing Krishna thus playing, the goddesses moving through the sky were seized by desires of love and the moon and his followers [the stars] got amazed. Expanding Himself to as many [appearances] as there were cowherd women, He, despite being the Supreme Lord satisfied within, enjoyed the pastime He had with them. In loving compassion He with His most soothing hand wiped the faces of the gopis when they felt tired from the pleasure of the romance, my best one. The gopis greatly pleased by the touch of His fingernails, sang about the exploits of their Hero, honouring Him with the beauty of their smiles, glances and cheeks that was heightened by the effulgence of their shining locks of hair and golden earrings.

Being tired, He, with His garland crushed and smeared by the kunkuma of their breasts, quickly being followed by the bees, as the leader of the Gandharvas, entered together with them the water [of the Yamuna] in order to dispel the fatigue, just as a bull elephant does when he with his wives has broken the irrigation dikes [in their case: the normal rules of conduct]. In the water He was splashed from all sides by the girls who looked at Him with love and laughter my best one. Thereto being worshiped from the heavenly carriers [of the gods] with a rain of flowers He, who is personally always satisfied within, in that place reveled in playing [with the gopis] like He was the king of the elephants [see also 8.3]. Just like an elephant that is dripping rut with his wives, He then, surrounded by the swarm of His bees and women, passed through a grove nearby the Yamuna that everywhere was filled with the - by the wind carried - fragrance of the flowers in the water and on the land. He, the Truth of all Desires, thus with His many adoring girlfriends spent the night that was so bright because of the moonlight. He thereby controlled within Himself [during that one night] the romantic feelings that He wished to honour during all autumn nights, the nights that so very much inspire for poetic descriptions of spiritual moods [or rasas].'

7-2 Shri Parikhit said: 'In order to establish the dharma and to subdue the defiant souls, He, the Supreme Lord, the Controller of the Universe descended with His plenary portion [Balarama]. How could He, the original speaker, executor and protector of the codes of moral conduct, behave so to the contrary, oh brahmin, by touching the wives of other men? What did He, being satisfied within, have in mind with this no doubt contemptible performance, oh best of the vowed ones? Please dispel our doubt about this.'

Shri Shuka said: 'The transgression of dharma and the boldness that we [sometimes] see of mighty authorities, does not mean they are at fault. They are like an all-consuming fire [that is not affected by what it consumes]. Someone not in control [of himself] must not even think of ever doing a thing like this. Being as foolish to act in such a way, means one's demise, one is not a Rudra who can drink the poison of the ocean [see 8.7]. It are the words of the authorities that are true, their acts should only occasionally be taken as an example. What they do should intelligently be followed only in case they are in agreement with their words [see also B.G. e.g. 3: 6-7, 3: 42, 5: 7]. Just as they who act egolessly do not benefit from the good acts they perform, they neither will suffer any disadvantage when they act contrary to the virtue. How can we in relation to the Controller(s) of those who are controlled - all the created beings, animals, human beings and denizens of heaven - speak in terms of right or wrong? The sages [His representatives] whose karmic bondage has all been washed away by serving the dust of the lotus feet, are satisfied by the power of yoga and act freely, they never get entangled because of Him. In what sense could one speak of a state of bondage with those who act according to the wishes of Him who assumed His wonderful bodies [for their sake, see vapu]? He who within the gopis and their husbands, indeed within all embodied beings lives as the Supreme Witness, assumes a form in this world in order to engage in His pastimes. In order to show His mercy to His devotees, He with assuming a humanlike body engages in [amorous] pastimes, hearing about which one becomes devoted to Him [see also 1.7: 10]. The cowerd men of Vraja who were bewildered by the power of His maya, were not jealous of Krishna. They all thought that their wives had stayed at their side. Even though the gopis did not want to, the sweethearts of the Supreme Lord, on Krishna's advise went home after that [endless] night of Brahma had passed. Anyone who with faith listens to or gives an account of this pastime of Lord Vishnu with the cowerd girls of Vraja, will achieve the transcendental devotional service of the Supreme Lord. He will quickly become sober and forthwith drive away the disease of lust in the heart.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 34:

Sudars'ana Delivered and Shankhacudha Killed

Shri Shuka said: 'The gopas one day eager for God with bullock carts went on a trip into the Ambika forest. There they took a bath in the Sarasvati and worshiped with paraphernalia devotedly the mighty demigod Pashupati [Shiva as the lord of the animals] and the goddess Ambika [*], oh King. Respectfully donating cows, gold, clothing and sweet grains to all the brahmins, they prayed: 'devo nah priyatam [may God be pleased with us]. Following strict vows only drinking water [see 8.16] the highly blessed Nanda, Sunanda [Nanda's younger brother] and the others stayed that night on the bank of the Sarasvati. Some giant snake that was very hungry happened to live in that forest and slithering on his belly began to swallow the sleeping Nanda. Seised by the python he shouted: 'Krishna, oh Krishna my dear boy, save this surrendered soul. This huge serpent is devouring me!' Hearing his cries the gopas rose immediately and seeing what happened they perplexed took up firebrands to attack the snake. The snake, despite being burned by the torches, did not release Nanda. But the Supreme Lord, the Master of the Devotees came and touched him with His foot. The divine touch of the Supreme Lord's foot put an end to his badness. He gave up his snake body and next assumed a form that was worshiped by the Vidyadharas [he was their leader]. The Lord of the Senses then questioned the personality who, offering his obeisances and with his body adorned with a golden necklace, brilliantly shining stood before Him. 'Who might you be who, shining so beautifully, are wonderful to behold? Tell Me what led to this terrible fate of having been forced to assume such a ghastly form [7.13: 11]?'

The [erstwhile] serpent said: 'I am Sudars'ana, a certain Vidyadhara well-known for his opulence and appearance. I used to wander all the directions in my celestial carrier. Because I, conceited about my appearance, ridiculed the sages who descended from Angira I, for my sin of deriding them, was made to assume this ugly form. They, in their compassionate nature, with pronouncing their imprecation included the favor that all my viciousness would be destroyed after having been touched by the foot of the Master of All Worlds. I beg You, that same person who for the surrendered souls are the remover of the fear of a material existence, oh You who by the touch of Your foot freed me from the curse, for Your permission [to return to my world], oh Destroyer of All Distress. I am surrendered to You, oh Greatest of All Yogis, oh Supreme Personality, oh Master of the Truthful Ones. Please command me, oh Lord, oh Controller of all the Controllers of the Universe. Seeing You I was immediately freed from the punishment of the brahmins oh Acyuta, oh You whose name being sung instantly purifies all those who may hear it as also the singer himself. How much more then, would it mean to be touched by Your foot?'

Thus circumambulating Him and offering his obeisances, Sudars'ana took leave. He returned to heaven and Nanda was delivered from his awkward position. The men of Vraja witnessing Krishna's personal display of power stood amazed. Thereupon they on the spot finished their duties [unto Shiva] and returned to the cowherd village, oh King, [on their way] with reverence recounting what had happened.

Some day thereafter [at Gaura-purnima so one says] Govinda and Rama, whose deeds are so wonderful, in the middle of the night were playing in the forest with the girls of Vraja. Their glories were charmingly sung by the group of women bound in affection to Them, whose limbs were finely decorated and smeared, next to the garlands and the impeccable clothes they wore. The two of Them [together with them] honoured the nightfall with the appearance of the moon and the stars, the jasmine buds that with their fragrance intoxicated the enjoying bees and the breeze that transported the fragrance of the lotuses. They both, for the mind and ears of all living beings, sang about the fortune, together from high to low producing the entire scale of notes that was available. The gopis who listened to Their singing, in their fascination did not notice oh ruler of man, that their dresses slipped and their hair and flowers got disheveled. While the two thus were amusing Themselves to their heart's content, singing to the point of ecstasy, a servant of Kuvera arrived on the scene carrying the name Shankhacudha ['wealthy-crest']. Right before their eyes, oh King, he shamelessly drove the group of women away in the northern direction, while they were crying out to the Two they had chosen as their Lords. Seeing that they who belonged to Them were seized by a thief like a couple of cows and were crying out 'Oh Krishna, oh Rama, help us!', the two brothers ran after them. Calling 'Do not be afraid!' They comforted them with Their words. They moved quickly with Shala logs in Their hands and soon caught up with that worst specimen of all Yakshas who was speeding away with great haste. When he saw the two approaching like Time and Death personified, he became afraid. In his confusion he left the women behind and ran for his life. Govinda pursued him wherever he fled in order to rob him of his crest jewel, while Balarama stayed behind to protect the women. Overtaking him like it was nothing the Almighty Lord with His fist knocked off the crest jewel of the villain together with his head. After thus having killed Shankhacudha He brought the shining jewel to His elder brother and handed it satisfied over to Him while the gopis were watching.'

*: Ambika means mother, good woman, a name scripturally associated with the femininity of Uma and Parvati in relation to Skanda, Shiva or Rudra, as a term of respect. Ambikavana is found in the Gujarat province, near the city of Siddhapura. Shrla Vis'vanatha Cakravarti Thakura quotes authorities here who claim that Ambikavana is situated at the bank of the Sarasvati river [that does not exist any longer] and is found northwest of Mathura. Ambikavana is notable for its deities of Shri Shiva and his wife, the goddess Uma.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 35:

The Gopis Sing about Krishna as He Wanders in the Forest
Shri Shuka said: 'When Krishna had left for the forest, the gopis, unhappy chasing Him in their mind, passed their days singing loudly about Krishna's pastimes.

- The gopis said [in double verses]: 'With His left cheek put to His left arm He, oh gopis, with His eyebrows moving, places the flute at His lips, while stopping the holes with His tender fingers. Where Mukunda thus sounds His flute the women travel the sky together with the Siddhas. Embarrassed about the desires pursued by their minds, they listen in amazement and forget the sadness they felt, as also their girdles. - Oh girls, listen how wonderfully Nanda's son, the giver of joy to people in trouble, He with His brilliant smile and fixed streak of lightning [the Shrivatsa or the goddess] on His chest, sounds His flute. Groups of bulls kept in the pasture, deer and cows, with their ears pricked up at a distance, with their mouths fluted, stop chewing and, transfixed by His play, dreaming, stand frozen as if it concerned a drawn picture. - When Mukunda dear gopis, looking like a wrestler with an arrangement of [peacock] feathers, [mineral] colours and leaves, together with Balarama and the gopas, calls for the cows, the flow of the rivers is interrupted. They, just like us lacking in piety, trembling out of love with their arms of water stand perplexed, while hankering for the dust of His lotus feet that is transported by the wind. - When He moving around in the forest and on the hillsides, as the Original Person with His flute calls for the cows and He for His prowess and inexhaustible opulences by His company extensively is praised in every way, the creepers and the trees, heavy with flowers and fruits, bend over all by themselves. As if they wanted to reveal Vishnu present within them, they in their love rain down torrents of sweet sap, while the growths on their bodies stand on end in ecstatic love. 0-1 The very moment He as the most attractive one to see raises His flute, with respect for the desirable song of the strongly humming swarm of bees around His divine garland intoxicated by the honey sweet [subtle] fragrance of the tulsi flowers, oh then, the cranes, swans and other birds in the lake with their minds seized by the charm of the song come forward to pay Him homage with their eyes closed, keeping silent with their minds under control. 2-1 Oh Vraja devis, when He, being together with Balarama, for fun wears a garland on His head, at the mountain side gives happiness vibrating on His flute and makes the whole world delightfully enjoy, the deck of clouds then, afraid to offend such a great personality, in return most gentle minded, thundering and raining flowers upon his Friend, offers its shade as a parasol. 4-1 Oh pious lady [Yashoda], when your son, who is an expert in different cowherd matters and a genius in the different styles of playing, places His flute to His bimba-red lips to produce the harmonious sounds of His music, the masters of spiritual authority like Indra, Shiva and Brahma who hear that tonal variety, with their minds confounded bow their heads because they cannot ascertain its essence. 6-1 When He plays His famous flute and, moving with the grace of an elephant, with His flower petal lotus feet marks the soil of Vraja with the different symbols of the flag, thunderbolt, lotus and elephant goad, He with His body relieves the earth from the distress caused by the hooves [of the cows]. As He walks [by] and bestows His playful glances, we get excited in our amorous feelings and stand transfixed like trees, in our bewilderment not knowing anymore [what the condition would be of] our dresses and braids.

At times, when He, with the garland around His neck smelling of the by Him favored tulsi, counts the cows on a string of coloured beads and then, throwing His arm over the shoulder of a loving companion, sings, the wives of the black deer, the doe - just like the gopis who gave up their civil aspirations -, approach that ocean of transcendental qualities to sit at His side with their hearts stolen by the sound produced by Krishna's flute. 0-2 Oh sinless lady, your darling child, the son of Nanda, is now, with His attire ornamented with a garland of jasmine flowers and surrounded by the gopas and the cows, having fun playing with His companions along the Yamuna. The wind gently blowing in His favor, honours Him there with a touch of sandalwood scent, while the lesser divinities [the Upadevas] surrounding Him present Him gifts and offer praise with instrumental music and songs. 2-2 Taking care of the cows of Vraja and at His feet being worshiped as the lifter of the mountain [see 10.25] He, at the end of the day collected the herd of cows. Playing His flute with His companions, He on His way was everywhere worshiped by all adults [and demigods]. This moon, born from the womb of Devaki, who came with a desire to fulfill the desires of His friends, was, even when He was tired and His garland was coloured by the dust raised by the hooves, a feast for the eyes. 4-2 He greets His well-wishing friends while slightly rolling His eyes as if He is intoxicated. With His garland of forest flowers, with His face paled like a jubube plum [a badara], with the soft line of His cheeks and with the beauty of the golden earrings adorning Him, He is the Lord of the Yadus, the Lord sporting just like the lord of the elephants. His joyful face is like the moon, the lord of the night, who at the end of the day drives away the infinite sorrow of the cows [and the gopis] of Vraja after the heat of the daytime.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Oh King, the women of Vraja with their hearts and minds absorbed in Him, thus enjoyed their days, highly spirited singing about Krishna's pastimes.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 36:

The Bull Arishthasura Defeated and Akura Sent by Kamsa
The son of Vyasa said: 'Some time later the bull demon named Arishtha who had a huge hump, came to the cowherd village. Ripping open the soil with his hooves the earth trembled because of his body. Bellowing very loudly and scraping the ground with his hooves, he with his tail upward, with the tips of his horns tearing up the mud walls and throwing up clouds, with glaring eyes was releasing little bits of urine and stool. - The frightening sight of his sharp horns and his hump, that looked like a mountain with amassing clouds, terrified the gopas and gopis so much my best one, that the women and the cows in their fear untimely lost their fetuses in miscarriages. The animals panicked and ran away from the pasture, oh King, while all the people crying 'Krishna, Krishna', sought Govinda to take shelter. The Supreme Lord, seeing the entire cow-community distraught fleeing in fear, pacified them with the words 'do not fear' and called out to the bull demon: 'You dull-witted, bad creature, how dare you in the presence of Me, the chastiser of foul miscreants like you, to frighten these gopas and their animals?'

Acyuta, the Lord, thus speaking slapped His arms to anger Arishtha with the sound of His palms and assumed a posture thereto in which He threw His serpentine arm over a friend's shoulder. He indeed managed that way to enrage Arishtha who furiously scratched the earth with his hoof and [then] with his tail raised to the clouds attacked Krishna. Bloodthirsty staring from the corners of his eyes he pointed his horns straight ahead and ran full speed toward Acyuta like he was a thunderbolt released by Indra. The Supreme Lord though, seized him by the horns and threw him like a rival elephant eighteen feet back. Warded off he quickly restored to charge again in blind anger, to which he sweating all over breathed heavily. Attacking Him he was [by the Lord] seized by his horns and made to trip by His foot, so that he slapped down to the ground like a wet garment. The Lord thereupon struck him with his [broken off] horn until he fell flat. Vomiting blood, excreting a mass of urine and stool and throwing his legs about, he in pain rolling with his eyes left for the abode of Death. The demigods thereupon scattered flowers upon the Lord in worship. After thus having killed the demon with the big hump He, that feast for the eyes of the gopis, together with Balarama entered the cowherd village while being praised by the twice-born ones.

With the demon Arishtha being killed by the Worker of Miracles, Krishna, the powerful sage Narada who has the vision of God said to Kamsa: [see 1.6: 25-29] 'Devaki's daughter actually was Yashoda's girl, Balarama was the son of Rohini and Krishna was also born from Devaki. Vasudeva out of fear placed them in charge of his friend Nanda, They [Krishna and Balarama] were the two who killed your men.'

The lord of Bhoja hearing that, raging with anger took up a sharp sword to kill Vasudeva. Narada withheld Kamsa [by saying] that Vasudeva's two sons would bring about his death. With that in mind he then chained him and his wife with iron shackles [see also 10.1: 64-69]. After the deva-rishi had left, Kamsa spoke with the demon Kes'i and told him: 'You are the one to kill Rama and Kes'ava.'

Then he called together Mushtika, Canura, Shala, Tos'ala and others as also his ministers and his elephant keepers. The king of Bhoja said to them: 2-2 'Mushtika and Canura, dear mates, please listen to what I have to say, oh heroes. The two sons of Anakadundubhi are living in the cowherd village of Nanda. It was foretold that Krishna and Balarama would cause my death. If we manage to get Them here for the sake of a wrestling match you can kill Them. Build a ring with various stages around it. Let all subjects from inside and outside the city witness an open competition. Dear elephant-keeper, you my good man, should take the elephant Kuvalayapida to the entrance of the arena and destroy there my enemies. It has to commence on the fourteenth [Caturdas'i] of the month with the bow-sacrifice performed according to the injunctions. For the Lord of the Spirits [Shiva], the graceful one, the proper kind of animals should be offered in sacrifice.'

Thus having issued his orders he, well versed in the art of securing one's personal interest, called for Akura [the one not cruel], the most eminent Yadu. He took his hand into his own and then said: 'Dear master of charity please do me a favor. With all respect, there is no one among the Bhojas and Vrishnis to be found who is as merciful as you are. The way Indra, the mighty king of heaven achieved his goals by taking shelter of Lord Vishnu, I have taken shelter of you, oh kind one, for you always carry out your duties respectfully. Go to Nanda's cowherd village where the two sons of Anakadundubhi live and bring Them without delay here on this chariot. These two have been sent by the gods under the protection of Vishnu for the sake of my death. Bring Them together with the gopas headed by Nanda over here and tell them to take along gifts of tribute. When you have brought Them here I will have Them killed by the elephant that is as mighty as the time itself. And if They manage to escape that, my wrestlers who are as strong as lightning will put an end to Them. After the two of Them are dead I will next kill the pained relatives whose leader is Vasudeva: the Vrishnis, Bhojas and the Das'arhas [see again 10.1: 67]. And my old father Ugrasena so greedy for the kingdom I will give the same treatment, as also his brother Devaka and my other opponents. The thorns of this earth, oh friend, will thus be destroyed. Together with my elder relative [my father-in-law] Jarasandha and my dear friend Dvidiva, as also with determined comrades like Shambara, Naraka and Bana, I will enjoy this earth, killing all those kings who side with the demigods. And now, with this knowledge, bring me quickly the young boys Rama and Krishna to attend the bow-sacrifice here and to respect the glory of the Yadu capital [of Mathura].'

Shri Akrua said: 'Oh King, there is nothing wrong with your approach to free yourself from unwanted elements. One should act irrespective failure or success, destiny after all determines the end result. Even though providence foils his plans, the common man fervently acts to his desires and is unwillingly confronted with happiness and distress. Nonetheless I will execute your order.'

Shri Shuka said: 'After Kamsa thus had instructed Akrua and dismissed his ministers, he entered his quarters and Akrua returned home.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 37:

Kes'i and Vyoma Killed and Narada Eulogizes Krishna's Future

- Shri Shuka said: 'Then there was Kes'i being sent by Kamsa [in 10.36: 20]. He as a huge horse with his hooves ripped open the earth and with the speed of mind scattered the clouds as also the celestial carriers of the gods. With his manes and neighing he frightened everyone. The Supreme Lord in response to the stir of the clouds created by his tail and his whinnying that terrified His cowherd village, thereupon stepped forward to fight. He called for Kes'i who roaring like a lion was searching Him. The moment he who was hard to conquer and approach and most aggressively with a wide open mouth was swallowing the sky, saw Him before him, he rushed furiously forward to attack the lotus eyed Lord with his legs. The Lord of the Beyond alert to that dodged that attack and seised him with His arms by the legs. He whirled him around indifferently and threw him at a distance of a hundred bow lengths, standing there just like the son of Tarkshya [Garuda] throwing a snake. Regaining his consciousness he stood up in bitter rage and ran, [with his mouth] wide open, full speed at the Lord. With a smile He then put His left arm in Kes'i's mouth, like it was a snake in a hole. As Kes'i's teeth came in touch with the Lord's arm they fell out as if they had come in contact with a red-hot iron. Thereupon the arm of the Supreme Soul swelled within his body so that his belly expanded like a diseased belly does after being neglected. Because Krishna's arm thus expanded his breathing was arrested. Kicking with his legs, perspiring all over, rolling with his eyes and excreting feces, he thereupon fell lifeless to the ground. After the Mighty-armed One had retracted His arm from the dead body that looked like a cucumber [karkathika], He, unassuming as He was in His effortlessly having killed His enemy, was honoured from above by the gods with a rain of flowers.'

The devarishi [Narada], the most exalted devotee of the Lord, oh King, approached Krishna in private and said the following to Him who is so effortless in His actions: 0-1 'Krishna, oh Krishna, oh Vasudeva, immeasurable Soul, oh Lord of Yoga, oh Controller of the Universe, oh shelter of each, oh You master and very best of the Yadus! You alone are the Soul of all living beings who, like fire hidden in firewood, resides within the heart as the Witness, the Lord, the Supreme Personality. You as the refuge of the spiritual soul first of all, through Your energy, produced the modes of nature. Unfailing in Your purpose You through these modes create, destroy and maintain this universe. You, this one [creator] Himself, have descended for the protection of the virtuous ones and for the destruction of the demons [Daityas], the savages [Rakshasas] and tormentors [Pramathas] who have the world of the living beings in their grip. To our great fortune You in person have sportively killed this demon who had assumed the form of a horse and because of whose neighing being terrified the vigilant gods abandoned heaven. 5-2 The day after tomorrow, I will see that Canura, Mushthika and other wrestlers as also the elephant [Kuvalayapida] and Kamsa are killed by You oh Almighty One. Thereafter [the demons] Shankha, [Kala]-jyavana, Mura and Naraka will follow, You will steal the parijata flower and defeat Indra. I will see You marry the daughters of the heroes [the kings] as a reward for Your valor. In Dvaraka You will deliver King Nriga from his curse, oh Master of the Universe and capture the jewel named Syamantaka together with a wife. You will retrieve the deceased son of a brahmin [Sandipani Muni] from Your abode [of death] and then You will kill Paundraka, burn down the city of Kas'i [Benares] and see to the demise of Dantavakra. Thereafter You will kill the king of Cedi [S'ishupala] at the great sacrifice [see also 3.2: 19, 7.1: 14-15]. The poets on this earth will be singing about these and other great feats that I will see You perform during Your stay in Dvaraka. Then I will see You as the charioteer of Arjuna assume the form of Time in bringing about the destruction of the armed forces of this world. Let us approach [You who are] this Supreme Lord, full of the purest wisdom, who is completely fulfilled in His original identity, whose will in none of His exploits can be thwarted and who by the power of His potency always desists from [identifying with] the flow of things happening with the modes of the illusory, material energy. For You I am bowed down, You the Greatest of the Yadus, Vrishnis and Satvatas, the self-contained Controller who by Your creative potency has arranged for an endless number of specific situations in which You immediately could act and You have taken upon Yourself [the burden of] humanity being divided [in warfare].'

Shri Shuka said: 'The most eminent sage among the devotees thus respectfully having honoured Krishna, the leading Yadu, received permission to leave and went away most delighted about having seen Him. Govinda, the Supreme Lord who in a fight had killed Kes'i, still tended the animals together with the cowherd boys who were most pleased with the happiness He brought to Vraja. One day, when the gopas were grazing the animals, they at the hillside engaged in the game 'stealing and hiding', playing the roles of thieves and protectors. Some of them were the thieves, some were the shepherds, while a couple of them, oh King, played for the unsuspecting sheep. A son of the demon Maya named Vyoma [the sky], a powerful magician, disguised himself as a gopa and then, engaging as one of the many thieves, led away almost all the boys who acted as the sheep. The great demon threw them one by one in a mountain cave the entrance of which he blocked with a boulder so that only four or five of them remained. Krishna, He who offers shelter to all pious souls, finding out what he was doing, seised the gopa carrier as forcefully as a lion would seize a wolf. The demon resumed his original form that was as big as a mountain. By all means he tried to free himself, but held tightly in His grip he, being debilitated, failed. Controlling Him with His arms Acyuta forced him to the ground and while the gods in heaven were watching He killed him like he was a sacrificial animal. He broke through the blocked entrance of the cave and led the gopas out of their awkward position. Praised by the gopas and the gods, He thereupon returned to His cowherd village.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 38:

Akrua's Musing and Reception in Gokula

Shri Shuka said: 'The high-minded soul Akrua spent the night in the city of Mathura [after 10.36: 40] and then mounted his chariot to go to Nanda's cowherd village. On his way he experienced an exceptional amount of devotion for the greatly fortunate lotus-eyed Personality of Godhead and thus he thought as follows: 'What good works have I done, what severe penance did I suffer or else of what worship have I been or what charity have I given, that I today may see Kes'ava? My attainment of the presence of the One Praised in the Verses is, I think, for someone with a worldly mind as difficult to achieve as the chanting of the Vedas is for someone of the lowest class. But enough of that, even for a fallen soul like me there is a chance to acquire the audience of Acyuta. Some time someone pulled along by the river of time may reach the other shore! Today my impurity will be uprooted and my birth will bear fruit, for it are the lotus feet of the Supreme Lord whereupon the yogis meditate, that I am going to respect. Kamsa sending me here did me a great service indeed by obliging me to look for the feet of the Lord who descended into this world. It is by the effulgence of His rounded toenails that in the past many a soul succeeded in freeing himself from the hard to overcome darkness of a material existence. With these [feet] that, marked by the red kunkum from the breasts of the gopis, are worshiped by Brahma, Shiva and the other demigods, by Shri the goddess of fortune, the sages and the devotees, He with His companions moves about in the forest while tending the cows. The deer are passing me on my right side [an auspicious sign]! I certainly will behold Mukunda's beautiful cheeks and nose, His smiles, the glances of His reddish lotus eyes and the hair curling around His face. Today I no doubt will enjoy the direct sight of Vishnu. I unfailingly will directly behold that paragon of beauty, who of His own accord assumed the form of a human being to diminish the burden of this earth. Even though He is a witness [just like me] to the true and untrue, He is free from [false] ego. By that personal potency of Him He has dispelled the darkness and bewilderment of an existence in separation [see also 2.5: 14, 2.10: 8-9, 3.27: 18-30 and 10.3: 18]. Working from the inside out, He, by the created beings that manifested after He cast His glance upon the material energy of His creation, can [only indirectly] be approached through the vital airs, senses and intelligence of their bodies [see also 2.2: 35]. His auspicious words, in combination with the qualities, activities and the incarnations [of Him and His expansions], put an end to all sins in the world and bring life, beauty and purity to the entire universe, while words devoid of these are considered as [useful as] things that beautify a corpse. And now He who maintains the codes of conduct has descended in His own dynasty of faithful souls [Satvatas]. He who as the leader of the immortals brings joy and happiness by spreading His fame with His presence in Vraja as the Controller whose all-auspicious nature is glorified by the godly ones. Today I will certainly see Him, the destination and spiritual master of all the great souls in the three worlds, He the real beauty and great feast for everyone endowed with eyes, He who exhibits the form that is the desire of the goddess, He who is my safe haven, the One because of whom all my dawns became [a sign of] His auspicious presence. The moment I alight from my chariot to respect the feet of the two Lords, the Principal Personalities upon whom even the yogis fix their intelligence in their self-realisation, I will certainly bow down to Them as also to the friends [and the others] who live with Them in the forest. And when I have fallen at the base of His feet, the Almighty One will place upon my head His lotus hand that dispels the fear for the serpent of time, the snake because of whose swift force the people terrified seek shelter. By placing in that hand an offering, Purandara [see 8.13: 4] and also Bali [see 8.19] acquired rulership [the position of Indra] over the three worlds. It is the same hand that, fragrant like an aromatic flower, during the pastime with the ladies of Vraja by its touch wiped away their fatigue [see 10.33]. Even though I am a messenger sent by Kamsa, Acyuta will not adopt an attitude of enmity towards me. He, the Knower of the Field [of the body, see B.G. 13: 3], witnessing everything that takes place inside and outside of the heart, sees with a perfect vision. Smiling affectionately He will look upon me, with my joined palms being fixed at the basis of His feet. With the immediate eradication of all my contamination by His glance, I will thus be freed from doubt and achieve intense happiness. With me [standing before Him] as His best friend and as a family member who is exclusively devoted to Him, He will close me in His two large arms. As a result my body will instantly become sanctified and my karma-dependent bonds will slacken. When I, with my head down and palms joined, have achieved physical contact with Him, Urus'rava [the renown Lord] will address me with words like 'Oh Akrua, dear relative...' Because of the Greatest of All Persons my life will thus be a success. How pitiable is the birth of the one who was not honoured by Him this way! No one is His favorite or best friend, nor is anyone disliked by Him, hated or held in contempt by Him [see B.G. 9: 29]. Nevertheless He reciprocates with His devotees [see also 10.32: 17-22] according to their actions, just like a [desire] tree from heaven that upon approach brings whatever one desired [see vaishnava pranama]. In addition His elder brother, the most excellent Yadu [Balarama], smiling at me who stands there with a head bowed down, will embrace me, take hold of my hands and take me into His house to receive me with all respects and then inquire how Kamsa fares together with the members of His family.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Thus on his way with his chariot pondering over Krishna, the son of Shvaphalka [see 9.24: 15] reached the village of Gokula as the sun was setting behind the mountain, oh King. The imprints of His feet, of which the rulers of all worlds hold the pure dust on their crowns, he saw in the earth of the pasture: a wonderful decoration showing the shapes of the lotus, the barleycorn, the elephant goad and so on [see also 10.16: 18 and 10.30: 25*]. The ecstasy of seeing them exited him greatly, made his hair stand on end and filled his eyes with tears. Getting down from his chariot he rolled himself in the footprints exclaiming: 'Oh this is the dust from my master's feet!' This is what for all embodied beings is the goal of life: to give up one's pride, fear and sorrow when one is faced with and hears about and such, the message of the signs of the Lord [see 7.5: 23-24].

In Vraja he saw Krishna and Rama, who, wearing yellow and blue garments and with eyes that looked like autumnal lotuses, were going to the place where the cows were milked. The two boys who are the shelter of the goddess were, bluish-dark and fair skinned, most beautiful to behold with their mighty arms, attractive faces and a gait like that of a young elephant. With Their feet marked by the flag, bolt, goad and lotus, and with Their smiles and glances full of compassion the two great souls increased the beauty of the cow pasture. They whose pastimes were so magnanimous and attractive, were freshly bathed, impeccably dressed, wore flower garlands and jeweled necklaces and had smeared Their limbs with auspicious, fragrant substances. The two original, most excellent persons, who are the Cause and the Masters of the universe [see also 5.25], had for the welfare of that universe descended in Their distinct forms of Balarama and Kes'ava. Oh King, with their effulgence they, as a mountain of emerald and a mountain of silver both decorated with gold, dispelled the darkness in all directions. Quickly climbing down from his chariot Akrua, overwhelmed with affection, prostrated himself at the feet of Rama and Krishna. Seeing the Supreme Personality he, because of the tears of joy overflowing his eyes and the eruptions [of ecstasy] marking his limbs, in his eagerness could not announce himself, oh King. The Supreme Lord, the Caretaker of the Surrendered Souls, recognised him, drew him near with His hand that is marked with a chariot wheel [the cakra] and happily embraced him. 7-3 Thereupon the magnanimous Sankarshana [Rama] embraced him who stood there with his head bowed down. With His hand taking hold of his two hands He took him together with His younger brother into the house. There He inquired whether he had enjoyed a pleasant journey. He offered him an excellent seat and washed his feet with sweetened milk, as was prescribed as a form of reverential respect. Donating a cow in charity and respectfully giving the tired guest a massage, the Almighty One faithfully served him pure food of different tastes [fit for a sacrifice]. After having eaten Rama, the Supreme Knower of the Dharma, with love further arranged for herbs to serve the tongue and for fragrances and flower garlands for the highest satisfaction.

After thus having honoured him Nanda asked: 'Oh descendant of Das'arha, how are you faring with the merciless Kamsa alive, that boss who is [treating his subjects] just like a butcher [deals] with sheep? If he being cruel and self-indulgent killed the babies of his own sister to her great distress, what then would that mean for the wellbeing of his subjects, for you?'

Thus being properly respected by Nanda with true and pleasing words, Akura shook off the fatigue of his journey.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 39:

Krishna and Balarama Leave for Mathura

Shri Shuka said: 'After comfortably seated on a couch thus having been honoured that much by Rama and Krishna, he [Akura] saw that everything had taken place what he on his way had pictured in his mind. What would be unattainable when the Supreme Lord, the shelter of Shri, is satisfied? Still, the ones devoted to Him, oh King, do not desire anything. After having enjoyed supper the Supreme Lord, the son of Devaki, asked about the activities of Kamsa towards His friends and relatives, as also what his plans were. The Supreme Lord said: 'Oh gentle one, have you recovered from your trip? I wish you all the best! Are your friends, relatives and other associates all hale and hearty? But why, My dear one, would I ask about the well-being of us, our relatives and the citizens, as long as Kamsa, that disease of the family, who only in name is our maternal uncle, is prospering? Ah! Because of Me there was great suffering for My noble parents: their sons were killed and they were imprisoned. Fortunately, today My wish has been fulfilled to see you, My close relative, oh gentle one. Please uncle, explain the reason why you came here.'

Shri Shuka said: 'On the request of the Supreme Lord the descendant of Madhu [Akura, see 9.23: 29] described everything of the inimical attitude [of Kamsa] towards the Yadus and his murderous intentions in relation to Vasudeva. He disclosed what the message was he was sent for as an envoy and what Narada had told him [Kamsa] about Krishna being born as a son of Anakadundubhi. When Krishna and Balarama, the destroyer of all boldness in opposition, heard what Akura had to say, they laughed and told Nanda, their [foster] father, what the king had ordered. 1-1 Nanda then issued the following official announcement to the gopas and the other people of Gokula: 'Gather all dairy products, take gifts and yoke the wagons. Tomorrow we together with all the people under my care will go to Mathura to offer the king our products and have a great festival.'

When the cowherd girls heard that Akura had come to Vraja to take Rama and Krishna along to the city, they got totally upset. That created in the hearts of some of them such a great pain, that their beautiful faces turned pale because of their sighing, while the knots in the hair, the bracelets and dresses of other girls slipped away. Of other gopis fixed in meditation on Him, all the sensory functions ceased so that they took no notion of this world anymore, just like it happens with those who attained the realm of self-realisation. Others fainted, thinking of how Shauri had touched their hearts by sending His loving smiles and expressing Himself in wonderful phrases. 7-1 Thinking about Mukunda's charming movements, His activities, affectionate smiles, His glances that removed all unhappiness, His jesting words and mighty deeds, they joined in fear of the separation, greatly distressed, in groups to speak with tears on their faces, deeply absorbed, about Acyuta. The fine gopis said: 'Oh Providence, where is your mercy to bring together the embodied souls in love and friendship? Separating you you leave us unfulfilled in our purposes. How uselessly you just like a child toy with us! Having shown to us the face of Mukunda framed in black locks, His fine cheeks and straight nose and the beauty of His modest smile dispelling the misery, you are not doing any good by [now] making this invisible to us. By the name of Akura [not-cruel] you certainly are cruel, in your, like a fool, alas, taking away the Perfection of All Creation in one form, the enemy of Madhu, you formerly allowed our eyes to see. The son of Nanda breaks in a moment with His friendship. He has taken up a new love and has, alas, no eyes for us [anymore], we who under His influence were made to give up our homes, relatives, children and husbands and directly serve Him. How happy the dawn is after this night, when unflinching the hopes have been fulfilled of the women of the city [of Mathura]! For then they imbibe the face of the master of Vraja arriving there with the nectarean smile that can be seen in the corners of His eyes. However subservient and intelligent Mukunda may be, once His mind is seized by their honey-sweet words, oh girls, what chance is there for us? Would He, spellbound by the enchantments of their bashful smiles, still return to us rustics? Today there certainly will be a great festival before the eyes of the Das'arhas, Bhojas, Andhakas, Vrishnis and Satvatatas and all others out there, when they on the road see the Darling of the Goddess, the reservoir of all transcendental qualities who is the son of Devaki. Such an unkind person, a person as extremely cruel as he, should not be called 'a-krura' because he, without the least excuse, removes from the presence of us people [of Vraja] full of sorrow, the one dearer to us than the dearest. He who so coldly has mounted the chariot [Krishna], is by these foolish gopas followed in their bullock carts. And the elders don't even say a word. Today providence is not working in our favor! Let us go to Him now and stop Him! He cannot do this to us, the family, the elders and our relatives, we who not even for half a second can miss the association of Mukunda. Separated by that fate our hearts will be broken! For us, who by the charm of His loving affection, attractive smiles, intimate discussions, playful glances and embraces, were drawn to the assembly of the rasa dance [10.33], the night passed in a single moment! How, oh gopis, can we without Him ever defeat the insurmountable darkness? How can we ever exist without Him, that Friend of Ananta [Rama] who at the end of the day, surrounded by the gopas entered Vraja with His hair and garland smeared with the dust of the hoofs, He who, playing His flute and smiling from the corners of His eyes, stole our minds with His glances?'

Shri Shuka said: 'Thus speaking in pain about the separation, the ladies of Vraja, in attachment thinking of Krishna, forgot all their shame and cried out loudly: 'Oh Govinda, oh Damodara, oh Madhava!'

While the women were lamenting thus, Akura at sunrise, after having performed his morning duties, set out with his chariot. The gopas who led by Nanda followed Him in their wagons, took along an abundance of offerings and clay pots filled with dairy products. Also the gopis followed their beloved Krishna [for some time] and [then] stood waiting, hoping for some pleasing words from the Lord. The Greatest among the Yadus saw them lamenting at His departure and consoled them lovingly with the message: 'I will do My best!' Sending their minds after Him for as long as the flag and the dust of the chariot were visible, they stood there like painted figures. Without the hope of ever seeing Him back, they returned and free from sorrow spent their days and nights singing about the activities of their Beloved.

With the chariot moving as swiftly as the wind, the Supreme Lord together with Rama and Akura, oh King, arrived at the Yamuna, the river removing all sin. After touching the water there with His hand and drinking the sweet liquid that was as effulgent as jewels, He went behind the chariot to a grove and then climbed [back] on it together with Balarama. Akura asked Them to stay behind on the chariot and went to a pool in the Yamuna to perform a bath in accord with the injunctions. Immersing himself in that water and reciting perennial mantras, Akura saw before him the likeness of Rama and Krishna. 2-4 He thought: 'How can the two sons of Anakadundubhi positioned on the chariot be present here? Let me see whether They are still there...', and rising from the water he saw Them sitting where he had left Them. Again alone entering the water he wondered: 'Was my vision of Them in the water a hallucination maybe?' 4-4 And again he saw in that same place the Lord of the Serpents [Ananta or Balarama], the Godhead with the thousands of heads, hoods and helmets, who by the perfected ones, the venerable ones, the singers of heaven and the ones of darkness was praised with bowed heads. Clad in blue and [with a complexion] as white as the filaments of a lotus stem, He was situated there like He was mount Kailasa with its white peaks. 6-4 On His lap there was situated peacefully, like a dark cloud, the Original Personality with the four arms clad in yellow silk. He had reddish eyes like the petals of a lotus, an attractive cheerful face with a charming, smiling glance, fine eyebrows, ears and a straight nose, beautiful cheeks and red lips. He had high shoulders and a broad chest home to the Goddess, stout, long arms and a conch shell-like neck, a deep navel and a belly with lines like those of a [banyan] leaf. 9-5 He had firm buttocks and hips, two thighs like an elephant's trunk, shapely knees and an attractive pair of shanks. His ankles were high, reddish were the rays emanating from His toenails and the soft toes of His lotus feet surrounding His two big toes glowed like flower petals. 1-5 Adorned with a helmet bedecked with large and precious gems, wearing bracelets, armlets, a belt, a sacred thread, necklaces, ankle bells and earrings, He carried an effulgent lotus, a conch shell, a disc and a club in His hands next to the Shrivatsa mark on His chest, His brilliant Kaustubha jewel and a flower garland. 3-5

He was accompanied by attendants headed by Nanda and Sunanda and was, according to each his different type of loving attitude, praised in sanctified words by Sanaka and the others [the Kumaras], by the leading demigods headed by Brahma and Shiva, by the foremost twice-born ones [headed by Marici] and by the most exalted devotees led by Prahlada, Narada and Vasu. He was served by His [feminine] internal potencies of fortune [Shri], development [Pushthi or also strength], speech [Gir or knowledge], beauty [Kanti], renown [Kirti], contentment [Tushthi or renunciation - these first ones are His six opulences]; comfort [Ila, bhu-s'akti, the earth-element or sandhini] and power [Urja, expanding as Tulasi] as also by His potencies of knowing and ignorance [vidya and avidya, leading to liberation and bondage], His internal pleasure potency [S'akti or hladini], [His marginal potency, jiva-s'akti] and His creative potency [Maya].

Witnessing this to his great pleasure, he [Akura], stood enthused with supreme devotion, with the hairs of his body standing on end and with his eyes and body getting wet because of his loving ecstasy. Getting himself together the great devotee with a choked voice offered his respects with his head bowed down. Joining his hands he attentively prayed slowly.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 40: Akura's Prayers

Shri Akura said: 'I bow down to You, oh Lord Narayana, Cause of All Causes, oh Original Inexhaustible Person, oh You from whose navel the lotus sprouted on the whorl of which Lord Brahma appeared who generated this world. Earth, water, fire, air, ether and its source [the false ego]; the totality of matter [see footnote 10.13: ] and its origin [the Purusha]; the mind, the senses, the objects of all the senses and the demigods [belonging to them], together constitute the [secondary] causes of the universe that have generated from Your [transcendental] body. They, under the [outer] direction of the material realm, have because of that lifelessness no knowledge about the true identity of the Supreme Self, Your Soul. Also the unborn one [Brahma] being bound to the modes of material nature, cannot know Your form transcendental to these modes [see also 10.13: 40-56]. It is to the honour of You that the yogis perform sacrifice, You the Supreme Personality and Controller within each, within the material elements and within the ruling gods and saints. Some brahmins worship You, with respect for the three sacred [agni-traya] fires, by means of the mantras of the three Vedas elaborately with various rituals for deities of different names and forms. Some who strive for spiritual knowledge, attain peace by renouncing all fruitive actions and worship the embodiment of knowledge [the guru, the Lord] by means of sacrifices in the field of spiritual knowledge [see e.g. B.G. 4: 28, 17: 11-13, 18: 70]. Others, whose intelligence is purified by the principles [the vidhi] included by You, worship You, absorbed in You, as the one form assuming many forms. Still others worship You, the Supreme Lord, in the form of Lord Shiva, by treading the path described by Lord Shiva that in different ways is presented by many teachers. Even though they as devotees of other divinities are of a different attention, they all worship You who as the Controller comprises all the gods [see B.G. 9: 23]. Just like the rivers that, filled by the rain and springing from the mountains from all sides, enter the ocean, oh master, similarly all these paths [of the demigods] finally lead to You [see B.G. 2: 70, 9: 23-25, 10: 24 and 11: 28]. All the conditioned living beings, from the nonmoving ones up to Lord Brahma, are caught in the qualities [gunas] of goodness [sattva], passion [rajas] and ignorance [tamas] of Your material nature [see B.G. 14]. I offer You, the Soul of All Souls my obeisances who, with a detached vision are present as the witness and the consciousness of everyone, as He who, with this stream of the material modes that was created by Your lower energy, deals with the souls who identify themselves therewith as gods, human beings and animals. 3-1 One considers fire as Your face, earth as Your feet, the sun as Your eye, the sky as Your navel and the directions as Your sense of hearing. Heaven is Your head, the ruling demigods are Your arms, the ocean is Your abdomen and the wind is Your vital air and physical strength. The trees and the plants are the hairs on Your body, the clouds are the hair on Your head and the mountains are the bones and nails of Your Supreme Being. Day and night are the blinking of Your eye, the founding father is Your genitals and the rain is regarded as Your semen [see e.g. also 2.6: 1-11]. Just like the aquatics that move about in the water or the small insects in an udumbara fig, in You all the worlds - including their rulers and the many souls that crowd them -, found their origin, in You, their Inexhaustible, One Personality comprising all mind and senses.

For the sake of Your pastimes You in this world manifest various forms, with which the people, to be purified from their unhappiness, full of joy sing Your glories. 7-1 My respects for You, the Original Cause who in the form of Matsya [the fish, see 8.24] moved about in the ocean of dissolution and for Hayagriva [the Lord with the horsehead, see 5.18: 6]. My obeisances unto You, the slayer of Madhu and Kaithaba, unto the huge master tortoise [Kurma, see 8.7 & 8] who held the mountain Mandara and all glory to You in the form of the boar [Varaha, see 3.13] whose pleasure it was to lift the earth out of the ocean. My obeisances to You, the amazing lion [Nrisimha, see 7.8 & 9] who removes the fear of every righteous soul, and to You who as the dwarf [Vamana, see 8.18-21] covered the three worlds in one step. All glories to You, the Lord of the descendants of Bhrigu [Parashurama, see 9.15 & 16] who cut down the forest of conceited nobles, and my obeisances to You, the best one of the Raghu dynasty [Lord Rama, see 9.10 & 11] who put an end to Ravana. My obeisances to You, oh Lord of the Satvatas, oh You who are Lord Vasudeva [of His consciousness], Lord Sankarshana [of His ego], Lord Pradyumna [of His intelligence] and Lord Aniruddha [of His mind, see further 4.24: 35 & 36]. My obeisances to Lord Buddha [He as the awakened One], the Pure One, the bewilderer of the demonic descendants of Diti and Danu. My respects for You in the form of Lord Kalki [the Lord descending 'for the wicked ones'], the annihilator of the meat-eaters [the mlechhas] who pose as kings [see also 2.7].

Oh Supreme Lord, the individual souls in this world are bewildered by Your deluding material energy [maya] and are, because of the false conceptions of 'I' and 'mine' [asmita], made to wander along the paths of fruitive activities [karma]. As for my own body, children, home, wife, wealth, followers and so on, I too am deluded in foolishly thinking that they would be true, oh Mighty One, while they are more like dream images [that come and go]. Thus groping in the dark with a mentality of wishing to enjoy a world of opposites, I, in not being of the true self or what is eternal and taking misery for the contrary [of happiness], fail to know You who are my dearest self and soul. Like a fool overlooking water that is covered by plants or like someone running after a mirage, I have turned away from You. With a pitiable intelligence because of material desires and actions, I could not find the strength to check my disturbed mind that by the so very powerful, willfull senses was diverted from one thing to another [see B.G. 13: 1-4 & 5.11: 10].

In this condition, I now approach Your feet that for any impure person, I think, are impossible to attain without Your mercy. Only by serving the truthful [of Your devotees, nature and culture, sat] a person can develop Your [Krishna] consciousness and put an end to the cycle of rebirth in this material world, oh Lord with the lotus navel. I offer my obeisances to You, the Embodiment of Wisdom and the Source of All Forms of Knowledge, You, the Absolute Truth of unlimited potencies who rules over the forces in control of the [conditioned] person. My reverence is there for You, the son of Vasudeva, in whom all living beings reside. You I prove my respect oh Lord of the Senses, please protect me in my surrender oh Master.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 41:

The Lords' Arrival in Mathura

Shri Shuka said: 'While he [Akrura] was praying, Krishna, the Supreme Lord, having shown His personal form in the water, withdrew Himself the way an actor winds up his performance. When he saw that the image had disappeared, he emerged from the water, quickly finished his different ritual duties and surprised went to the chariot. Hrishikes'a asked him: 'Have you seen something miraculous on the earth, in the heavens or in the water? We gather you did!'

Shri Akrura said: 'Whatever wonderful things there may be out here on earth, in the sky or in the water, are all situated in You who comprise everything; what would I, seeing You, not have seen? Beholding You, the One Person in whom all wonders of the earth, the sky and the waters are found, oh Absolute of the Truth, what else that I see in this world would amaze me?'

With those words the son of Gandini [Akrura] drove the chariot forward to take Rama and Krishna to Mathura [where they arrived] at the end of the day. The people of the villages who here and there on the road approached Them, were pleased to see the sons of Vasudeva oh King, and could not take their eyes off Them. In the meantime, Nanda, the gopas and the rest of the inhabitants of Vraja had arrived there and stayed in a park outside the city to wait for Them. Catching up with them the Supreme Lord, the Master of the Universe, said to the humbly smiling Akrura while taking his hand into His own: 'You go ahead of Us to the city with the chariot and go home. We will rest here and then see the city.'

Shri Akrura said: 'How can I enter Mathura without the two of You oh Master? Do not let me down, oh Lord, oh Caretaker of the Devotees, I am Your devotee! Please, oh supreme well-wisher, come together with Your elder brother, the gopas and Your friends to our house so that it is graced with its Master, oh Lord of the Beyond. I am a householder of sacrifice, please bless our home with the dust of Your feet so that my forefathers, the sacrificial fires and the demigods will be satisfied. The great king Bali by bathing Your two feet became glorious [see 8.19] and achieved unequalled power as also the destination reserved for unalloyed devotees. The pure water washing from Your feet and received by Lord Shiva on his head [9.9], has sanctified the three worlds so that the sons of king Sagara [9.8] attained heaven. [9.9] Oh God of the Gods, oh Master of the Universe about whom one piously hears and chants, oh Best of the Yadus, oh Lord Praised in the Verses, oh Lord Narayana, let there be the obeisance unto You.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'I will come to your house accompanied by My elder brother. After killing My enemy in the midst of the Yadus [Kamsa], I will grant My well-wishers the satisfaction.'

Shri Shuka said: 'After thus being addressed by the Supreme Lord, Akrura somewhat disheartened entered the city. He informed Kamsa on his efforts and thereupon went home. Later in the afternoon Krishna together with Sankarshana [Rama] and the gopas entered Mathura to take a look around. 0-2 There He saw the high gates and doorways of crystal, front doors and immense archways of gold, storehouses of copper and brass and inviolable moats, [everywhere] beautified by public gardens and attractive parks. The intersections decorated with gold, the mansions with their pleasure gardens, the assembly halls of the guilds and the houses with their columned balconies as also the ornate paneled rafters, were bedecked with vaidurya gems, diamonds, quartz crystals, sapphires, coral, pearls and emeralds. Sounds vibrated of the pet doves and peacocks that sat in the openings of the lattice windows and on the gem-studded floors. The avenues, streets and courtyards were sprinkled with water and [for a welcome] were strewn with garlands, new sprouts, parched grains and rice. The doorways of the houses were nicely decorated with pots filled with yogurt smeared with sandalwood paste, ribbons and flower petals, rows of lamps, leaves, bunches of flowers, trunks of banana trees and betel nut trees and flags. As the sons of Vasudeva entered there surrounded by Their friends oh King, the women of the city, eager for a look, all hurried to stand along the main road and climb on top of the houses. Some had put on their clothes backwards and forgotten one of their pair of ornaments, putting on only one earring or one set of ankle bells. Other ladies made up one eye but not the other one. Some in their excitement had abandoned the meals they were taking or did not finish their massage. They left their bathing or, hearing the commotion, got up not finishing their nap. Others as mothers put aside the infant they were feeding milk. Walking like a bull elephant in rut, He boldly stole their minds with the glances of His lotus eyes and the game of His smiles. With His body, that source of pleasure to the Goddess of Fortune, He afforded their eyes a festival. Seeing Him whom they repeatedly had heard about, their hearts melted. Receiving the honour of being sprinkled by the nectar of His glances and broad smiles, they, with goose pimples, through their eyes innerly embraced their idol, this embodiment of ecstasy, and gave up their endless distress [of missing Him], oh subduer of the enemies. Having climbed the rooftops of their mansions, the playful women, with faces blooming like lotuses because of their love, showered Balarama and Kes'ava with flowers. With yogurt, barleycorns and pots filled with water, fragrant substances and other items of worship the Two were joyfully worshiped at every step by the brahmins. The women of the city said: 'Oh what great austerity the gopis must have performed to may constantly witness these Two, who for human society are the greatest source of pleasure.'

Krishna, the elder brother of Gada [see 9.24: 46] approached a certain washerman engaged in dyeing and asked him for first class, clean garments. 'Please, oh best man, give the two of Us some suitable clothes. When you donate them to Us, who deserve it, that will bring You the highest benefit, that suffers no doubt!'

Requested by the Supreme Lord who is complete and perfect in every way, he most falsely proud as a servant of the king, indignantly said full of anger: 'Is it no impudence of You who roam the mountains and the forests, to desire to wear garments like these belonging to the king? Get lost You fools, do not beg like this if You want to live! I swear, people as bold as You, are arrested, looted and killed by the king's men!'

Thus humiliating Them he raised the anger of the son of Devaki who with the side of one hand hit his head from his body. When his assistants fled in all directions, they left behind bundles of clothes. Acyuta took the garments. Krishna and Balarama dressed Themselves with a set of clothes to Their liking, threw several of them on the ground and gave the rest to the gopas. Thereupon a weaver came who full of love for Them befittingly ornamented Their clothes with pieces of cloth of different colours. Krishna and Rama with each His own specific high quality outfit and nice decorations, looked as resplendent as a pair of young elephants, one light and one dark, adorned for a festival. The Supreme Lord being pleased with the weaver, granted him sarupya, in this world to be liberated with the same supreme opulence, physical strength, influence, memory and sense control [the grace of His characteristics, see also mukti].

They both next went to the house of Sudama ['well-giving'], the garland-maker. Seeing Them he stood up and bowed down putting his head to the ground. He brought seats for Them, water to wash Their feet and hands, presents and such and honoured Them and Their companions with garlands, betel nut and sandalwood paste. He said: 'Our birth has been worthwhile and the family has been purified, oh Master. Together with me, my forefathers, the gods and the seers are satisfied that You came here. You two, who constitute the Ultimate Cause of the Universe, have with Your plenary portions descended to this world for its protection and happiness. Even though You reciprocate with those who are of worship, with You there is no bias in Your vision. You as the Soul of the Universe, are as well-wishing friends equal to all living beings. You Two should order me, Your servant, what I should do for You. For this is for anyone the greatest blessing: to be appointed by You.'

Shuka said: 'Thus understanding what to do oh best of kings, Sudama, steeped in love, presented garlands made of fresh and fragrant flowers. Beautifully adorned with them the two benefactors Krishna and Rama, who together with Their companions were most satisfied, granted the surrendered soul who bowed down, every benediction that he wished for. He chose for an unshakable devotion unto Him alone, the Supreme soul of the Complete Whole, for friendship with all living beings and for the blessing of transcendence. Thus blessing him with prosperity, a thriving family, strength, a long life, renown and beauty, He left together with His elder brother.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 42:

The Breaking of the Sacrificial Bow

Shri Shuka said: 'Walking the king's road, Krishna saw a woman carrying a tray with ointments for the body. She was hunchbacked [*], was young and had an attractive face. The Bestower of the Essence with a smile asked where she was going. 'Who are you with your nice thighs? Ah dear woman, look at those ointments! Please tell Us honestly for whom this all is meant. Offer, if you want, the two of Us that ointment for the body, then there will soon be the supreme benefit for you.'

The maidservant said: 'Oh handsome One, I am a servant of Kamsa known as Trivakra ['three-bend'] respected indeed for my work with ointments. Prepared by me they are very dear to the chief of the Bhojas. But okay, who else but the two of You would deserve them?'

With her mind overwhelmed by the beauty, charm and sweetness of Their talks, smiles and glances, she gave Them plenty of ointment. Adorning Their bodies with the colours that contrasted with Their complexions, the ointments proved to be of the highest quality. Thus being anointed They appeared beautifully. To deliver proof of the benefit of meeting Him, the satisfied Supreme Lord decided to straighten the crooked back of Trivakra who had such an attractive face. With both His feet pressing down on her toes, Acyuta with both His hands took hold of her chin and raised her up with two fingers pointing upwards. Thereupon all of a sudden straight by Mukunda's touch, she had become a most perfect woman with evenly proportioned limbs, large hips and breasts. Thus endowed with beauty, quality and good feelings she was roused to the notion of sleeping with Him. With a smile she addressed Kes'ava while pulling at the end of His upper garment. 'Come oh hero, let us go to my house. I cannot bear to leave You here, please have mercy, oh Best of All Men, with me whose head is reeling.'

With this request of the woman Krishna glanced at Balarama who watched what happened and then at the gopas. He laughed and said to her: 'Oh you with your beautiful eyebrows, I will visit your home, where men may find relieve of their anxieties, when I have accomplished what I came for. That will do us, travelers far from home, good. For you are the best one might wish for.'

After leaving her behind with these sweet words, He, walking down the road with His brother, was by the merchants honoured with various offerings of betel nut, garlands and fragrant substances. With Him before their eyes the women could not think straight any longer. Agitated by Cupid, they stood nailed to the ground with their clothes, bangles and hair in disorder. After asking the residents for the place of the sacrificial bow, Acyuta entered there. It was a bow as magnificent as a rainbow, the bow of Indra. The bow was guarded by many men and worshiped with the greatest wealth. Krishna forced His way past the guards who blocked Him and picked it up. Before the eyes of the guards He lifted it easily with His left hand and pulled the string in a second. Lord Urukrama ['giant-step'] broke it in two like He was an elephant eager for a piece of sugar cane. The sound of the breaking bow penetrated all directions of the sky and the earth and made Kamsa who heard it, tremble with fear. Trying to get hold of Him, He and His comrades were surrounded by the guards who enraged had taken up their weapons and shouted: 'Grab Him, kill Him!' Seeing their evil intentions Balarama and Kes'ava each took up a piece of the bow and vehemently struck them down.

After They had also slain an armed force that was sent by Kamsa, the Two walked out of the gate of the arena, happy to observe the exciting riches of the city. The citizens who had witnessed Their amazing heroic act deemed Them, because of their strength, boldness and beauty, the finest among the gods. Freely wandering around, the sun began to set and Krishna and Rama accompanied by the gopas returned to the place outside the city where they had left their wagons. The [predictions of] benedictions in Mathura, spoken by the gopis that were tormented by feelings of separation when Mukunda left, [10.39: 23-25], all came true for those who had the full vision of the body of this paragon of male beauty, of Him, the shelter so much desired by the Goddess of Fortune that she forgot about the others worshipping her. After the both of Them had washed Their feet and eaten boiled rice with milk, They, fully aware of Kamsa's scheme, spent the night there quite comfortably. 6-2 But Kamsa stayed awake a long time having heard of the game Govinda and Rama had played in breaking the bow and killing his small army of guards. In his fear he saw with his bad mind, in his sleep as also being awake, many bad omens and messengers of death. 8-3 In the mirror he could not see the reflection of his own head and for no reason he saw a double image of the heavenly bodies. In his shadow he saw a hole and he could not hear the sound of his breath. He saw a golden hue over the trees and could not spot his own footprints. In his sleep he was embraced by ghosts, he rode a donkey and swallowed poison. He saw someone going about naked being smeared with oil and wearing a garland of nalada flowers [indian spikenards, a Valerian type]. In his sleep as also awake seeing these and similar omens, he was mortally afraid and could not sleep anymore.

When the night had passed, oh descendant of Kuru and the sun rose above the water, Kamsa had the great wrestling festival he organised. The king's men ceremoniously vibrated musical instruments and drums in the arena and decorated the galleries with garlands, flags, ribbons and arches. The citizens and the people from elsewhere, headed by the state officials and the brahmins, were comfortably seated upon them, while the royalty received special seats. Kamsa surrounded by his ministers sat on the royal dais, but positioned there in the midst of his governors, his heart trembled. As the musical instruments played in rhythms appropriate for the wrestling, the richly ornamented wrestlers proudly entered together with their instructors and sat down. Canura, Mushthika, Kutha, Shala and Tos'ala, being enthused by the pleasing music, took their place on the wrestling mat. The gopa Nanda and the cowherds he led were called forward by the king of Bhoja [Kamsa] to present their offerings and next sat down in one of the galleries.'

*: The pupils of Prabhavarta elucidate: 'According to Shri Vis'vanatha Cakravarti Thhakura, the young hunchbacked girl was actually a partial expansion of the Lord's wife Satyabhama. Satyabhama is the Lord's internal energy known as Bhu-s'akti [see 10.39: 53-55], and this expansion of hers, known as Prithivi, represents the earth, which was bent down by the great burden of countless wicked rulers. Lord Krishna descended to remove these wicked rulers, and thus His pastime of straightening the hunchback Trivakra, as explained in these verses, represents His rectifying the burdened condition of the earth.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 43:

Krishna Kills the Elephant Kuvalayapida

Shri Shuka said: 'After Krishna and Rama had washed themselves, oh chastiser of the enemies, they heard the vibrations of kettledrums for the wrestling match and went hither to take a look. When Krishna reached the gate of the arena He saw the elephant Kuvalayapida standing there, directed by his keeper. Tightening His clothes and tying together His curly locks, He spoke to the elephant keeper with words as grave as the rumbling clouds: 'Elephant keeper, oh elephant keeper, let Us pass, move aside right now or else I will send you, together with your elephant, today to the abode of Yama [the lord of death].'

Thus being threatened the elephant keeper got angry and goaded the furious elephant that was like Yama, Time and death, in the direction of Krishna. The master elephant ran toward Krishna and violently seised Him with his trunk, but Krishna dealing him a blow, escaped from the grip and disappeared between his legs. Angry for not seeing Him anymore, he spotted Him by his sense of smell and grabbed Him with the end of his long nose, but Krishna used force and freed Himself once more. Krishna seised him by the tail and dragged him, that mountain of power, for twenty-five bow-lengths with the ease with which Garuda plays with a snake. Acyuta moving him to the left and the right was also moved about by him, just like a calf does with a young boy [at its tail. See also 10.8: 24]. The moment they came standing face to face, He slapped the elephant with His hand and then quickly moved away again. Thus He hit him at every step and then made him trip. Running away He pretended to fall to the ground, but then He suddenly got up so that the elephant angrily came to strike the earth with his tusks. With his prowess foiled that lord of the elephants was driven into a frenzy and urged on by his keepers, he furiously attacked Krishna again. The Supreme Lord, the killer of Madhu, confronting him in his attack, seised him by his trunk and made him fall to the ground. With the ease of a lion jumping on the fallen giant, the Lord yanked out a tusk and killed the elephant and his keepers with it.

Leaving aside the dead elephant He, being sprinkled with drops of the elephant's blood and sweat, took the tusk on His shoulder and entered [the arena] with His lotus face shining with the fine drops that had appeared by His own perspiring. Oh King, Baladeva and Janardana surrounded by several cowherd boys, thus appeared before the audience with the elephant's tusks as their chosen weapons. For the wrestlers He was lightning, for the men He was the best and for the women He was Cupid incarnate. For the cowherds He was a relative, for the impious rulers He was a chastiser and for His parents He was a child. For the king of Bhoja He was death, for the unintelligent ones He was merely a material form, for the yogis He was the Supreme Reality and for the Vrishnis He was the most worshipable deity. In these ways being regarded differently, He entered the arena together with His brother [see * and rasa]. When Kamsa saw that Kuvalayapida had been killed and that the two of Them were invincible, his mind was overtaken by a very great anxiety, oh ruler of man. The two mighty-armed Lords, the way They were dressed in each His own garments, with ornaments and garlands, looked in Their excellent costumes like two actors and radiated, being present in the arena, with an effluence that overwhelmed the minds of all onlookers. The people sitting in the galleries, the citizens and the people from outside, oh King, seeing the two Supreme Personalities, in sheer delight opened their eyes and mouths wide and drank in the vision of Their faces, never getting enough of Them. 1-2 As if they were drinking Them through their eyes, licking Them up with their tongues, smelling Them through their nostrils and embracing Them with their arms, they spoke with each other commemorating the beauty, qualities, charm and bravery they had seen and heard from Them: 'These two who descended to this world in the home of Vasudeva, are no doubt the direct expansions of Hari, the Supreme Personality. This one here was born from Devaki and brought to Gokula where He, growing up in the house of Nanda, lived in secret all the time. He put an end to Putana and the whirlwind-demon and also ended the lives of others like the Arjuna trees, Shankhacuda, Kes'i and Dhenuka. 6-2 He saved the cows and their tenders from the forest fire, He subdued the serpent Kaliya and sobered up Indra by delivering all the residents of Gokula from rain, wind and hail when He for seven days with one hand held up the best of all mountains. The gopis seeing His always cheerful, smiling face and glance that are free from fatigue, could transcend all sorts of distress and live happily. They say that because of Him this Yadu dynasty will become very famous and, being protected in every way, will achieve all riches, power and glory. And this brother of His, the lotus-eyed Rama, He is of all opulence and killed Pralamba, [and we think... ] Vatsasura, Bakasura and others.'

With the people thus speaking and the musical instruments resounding, Canura addressed Krishna and Balarama and spoke the following words: 'Oh son of Nanda, oh Rama, You two heroes are well respected and skillful at wrestling; the King hearing of it wanted to see that and called for You. When citizens in mind, deeds and words perform to the pleasure of the King, they will acquire good fortune, but not acting so they achieve the opposite. The gopas evidently are always very happy to tend their calves and play and horse around in the forests while grazing the cows. Let us together with the two of You therefore act to the pleasure of the King. Everybody will be pleased with us, for the King embodies the interest of all living beings.'

When Krishna heard this He, welcoming the fight and [thus] considering it desirable, spoke words befitting the time and place [see also 4.8: 54]: 'Even though we wander in the forest, we are also subjects of the Bhoja King. Therefore we must always do whatever pleases him, for that will bring us the supreme benefit. We young boys should, befittingly, contest with those equal in strength. The wrestling match should take place in such a manner that the assembled audience in this arena will not fall from its belief.'

Canura said: 'You and Balarama are no boys or youngsters, You are the strongest of the strong who sported to kill the elephant that had the strength of a thousand elephants! Therefore the two of You should fight with those who are strong. There surely is no injustice in that, it is Your prowess against mine oh descendant of Vrishni, and let Balarama take it up with Mushthika.'

*: Aldus spreken men van tien rasa's, houdingen of gemoedsgesteldheden in relatie tot Krishna: strijdlust [zoals waargenomen door de worstelaars], bewondering [door de mannen], geslachtelijke aantrekkings [de vrouwen], lachen [de koeherders], ridderlijkheid [de koningen], genade [Zijn ouders], schrik [Kamsa], afschuw [de dommen], vredige neutraliteit [de yogi's] en liefdevolle toewijding [de Vrishni's].

 : Vatsasura, Bakasura werden in feite door Krishna gedood.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 44:

The Wrestling Match and the Killing of Kamsa

Shri Shuka said: 'The Supreme Lord Madhusudana thus firmly determined positioned Himself opposite to Canura and so did the son of Rohini with Mushthika. Locking their hands with their hands and their legs with their legs, they pulled and pushed each other with force to attain the victory. With their elbows against their elbows, their knees against their knees, their head against their head and their chest against their chest they dealt one another their blows. Wheeling, shoving, crushing and throwing down, releasing, running in front and running behind, they offered each other resistance. Desiring the victory they harmed themselves, lifted each other up and carried each other, pushed each other away and held each other fast.

Compassionate about that fight between the weak and the strong, the women assembled in groups oh King, and said: 'Alas, what an enormous lack of responsibility on the part of the people present in the king's assembly. Together with the king they wish to see a fight between the strong and the weak! On one side we see the appearances of these two mountains of master wrestlers with limbs as strong as lightning, while on the other side there are these two youths with tender limbs who have not reached maturity yet! This association violates the rules of dharma. There where unrighteousness rises, one should not remain a moment longer! A wise person should not attend an assembly where the members are bent on improprieties. When a human being in silent consent with false pretenses subscribes to wrong assumptions, he incurs sin. Just see how wet Krishna's lotus like face is from the effort of dancing around his opponent. He looks like the whorl of a lotus flower with drops of water. Look how Balarama's face is even more beautiful the way He laughing and with eyes like copper in His anger is focussing on Mushthika. How meritorious indeed are the tracts of Vraja where the Original Personality in this disguise of human traits, with a wonderful variety of forest flower garlands, together with Balarama vibrates His flute, moves about in different pastimes and herds the cows, while His feet are worshiped by the lord on the mountain [Shiva] and the goddess of fortune. What would the austerities have been that the gopis have performed to be allowed to drink in through their eyes the form of such an essence of unequaled, unsurpassed loveliness perfect in itself, ever new and difficult to attain as the only abode of fame, beauty and opulence? The fortunate ladies of Vraja with their milking, threshing, churning, smearing [with the dung], swinging on swings, with their crying babies, their sprinkling, cleaning and so on, sing with their minds attached and choked up with tears about Him and thus find their way thanks to their consciousness of Urukrama. The women who hear Him playing the flute, while He together with the cows early in the morning leaves and late in the evening returns to Vraja, hurry outside to meet, in utter piety, Him on the road with His smiling, merciful face and glances.'

While they were speaking thus, the Supreme Lord, the Controller of Mystic Power, decided to kill His enemy, oh hero of the Bharatas. When their parents [in prison] heard about the women's words of concern about their sons, they, full of remorse, burned in their love being overwhelmed with sorrow, for they did not know how strong their sons were. As Acyuta and His opponent fought each other with all the different wrestling techniques, Balarama and Mushthika did the same. Due to the crushing, lightning hard blows dealt by the hands and feet of the Supreme Lord, Canura felt more and more pained and exhausted and was physically completely broken. Clenching both his hands into fists he with the speed of a hawk fell upon the Supreme Lord Vasudeva and enraged struck Him on His chest. 2-2 No more being moved by his blows than an elephant hit with a flower garland, the Lord seised Canura by his arms, whirled him several times around and threw him with great force to the ground. Crashing like a massive festival column he, with his clothes, hair and garland all scattered, lost his life. 4-2 Likewise did also Mushthika, after striking the powerful Lord Balabhadra with his fist, receive a violent blow from His palm so that he trembling, giving up blood from his mouth, right where he stood fell lifeless to the ground, like a tree struck down by the wind. Then Kutha stepped forward. Nonchalantly he oh King, with great ease was killed by the fist of Rama, the best of all fighters. Thereupon Shala was struck in the head by the toes of Krishna and Tos'ala was torn apart by Him, so that they both fell. After Canura, Mushthika, Kutha, Shala and Tos'ala had been killed, the remaining wrestlers all fled away hoping to save their lives. Krishna and Rama joining with Their young cowherd friends sported together with them, played musical instruments and danced about tinkling with Their ankle bells. Except for Kamsa all the people rejoiced in the accomplishment of Rama and Krishna, while the leading brahmins and sadhus exclaimed: 'Excellent, excellent!'

Seeing the best of his wrestlers killed or fled away, the Bhoja king silenced his instrumental music and spoke the words: 'Expel the two sons of Vasudeva who behaved so badly from the city, seize the gopas' wealth and tie up that fool Nanda! And Vasudeva who is so ignorant, that darn dullard and my father Ugrasena and his followers, should all, for their siding with the enemy, be killed right away.'

While Kamsa thus most angrily was raving, the Imperishable Lord with ease jumped up and quickly climbed up to the high royal dais. Seeing Him, his own death, approaching, Kamsa, smart as he was, immediately stood up from his seat and took up his sword and shield. Kamsa, sword in hand moved about from the left to the right as quick as a hawk in the sky, but he was seized by the force of the Lord's irresistible and fearsome strength, like a snake by the son of Tarkshya [Garuda]. Grabbing him by the hair, the crown slipped from his head. The Lord with the Lotus Navel then hurled him from the high platform down into the wrestling arena, whereupon He, the Independent Support of the Entire Universe, threw Himself on top of him. Like a lion with an elephant, He dragged him dead along the ground before the eyes of all the people, from whom then loudly arose an 'Ooo..h, ooooo' sound, oh King of the humans. Since he, constantly being filled with anxiety, had seen Him, the Controller with the cakra in His hand, before his mind's eye whenever he drank or ate, walked, slept or breathed, he [being liberated] thus obtained that very same so most difficult to acquire form [see also sarupya 10.41: 42 and 10.29: 13]. His eight younger brothers Kanka, Nyagrodhaka and the rest, then infuriated attacked to avenge their brother. Thus rushing forward ready to strike they were beaten down by Balarama who wielded His club like the lion king ruling the animals. Kettledrums resounded in the sky and Brahma, Shiva, the other gods and expansions of the Lord, being pleased chanted praises and showered flowers upon Him while their wives were dancing.

The wives [of Kamsa and his brothers], oh Emperor, grieving over the death of their well-wishers, approached the spot with tears in their eyes and beating their heads. Embracing their husbands lying on the hero's bed, the women lamented loudly, shedding a river of tears: "Alas oh master, my dearest, oh defender of the holy duty, oh kindness, oh you so full of compassion for the ones unprotected! The very moment that you found your death we, your household and offspring, have found our death. This city bereft of you, its master, does, just like us, oh most heroic of men, not appear as beautiful now that its festivity and bliss has all ended. The terrible violence you have committed against innocent living beings, has brought you in this condition, oh dearest. How can he who causes harm to other living beings end well? He who is neglectful of Him, the One who for certain is the origin, maintenance and disappearance of all living beings in this world, can never prosper in happiness.'

Shri Shuka said: 'The Supreme Lord, the Maintainer of All the Worlds, consoled the wives of the king [and his brothers], and arranged as prescribed the funeral rites for the ones deceased. Krishna and Rama thereupon freed Their father and mother from their fetters and proved Their respect for them by touching their feet with Their heads. Devaki and Vasudeva offered, in recognition of [Them as being] the Controllers of the Universe, their obeisances with joined palms and - apprehensively - did not embrace their sons.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 45:

Krishna Rescues His Teacher's Son

Shri Shuka said: 'Knowing that His parents had arrived at the notion that He would be the Supreme Personality, He said to Himself: 'This should not be so'. And thus He expanded His personal illusory potency [His yogamaya] that bewilders the people. Approaching them together with His elder brother, the Greatest Devotee of All [the Satvatas], with humility bowed down to His parents in order to satisfy them and respectfully said: 'Dear father and mother! Oh father, because of Us you were always afraid and have never seen anything of the toddler age, the boyhood and youth of your two sons [*]. As ordained by fate We, being deprived of living in your presence, could not experience the joy of the happiness of children who live at home with their parents. A mortal person may never, not even for a lifespan of a hundred years, be able to repay the debt to his parents. He took his birth from them and by them he is maintained. They are the source of the body that is suitable for all goals of life [all purusharthas, compare 10.32: 22]. A son who, even though capable, with his resources and wealth does not provide for their sustenance, will after his death be forced to eat his own flesh [see also 5.26]. When one is capable of, but not maintains one's mother and father, the elderly, one's chaste wife, one's very young child, one's spiritual master, a [depending] brahmin or anyone seeking one's protection, one is a person who is dead even though he breathes [see B.G. 11: 33]. Because of Kamsa who always disturbed Our minds, We could not honour you and have spent Our days [of youth] without having been of any use to you. Please oh father and mother, forgive Us the fact that, falling under the control of others, We from Our part could not serve you so that the hardhearted one [Kamsa] could give you such a great pain.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Thus bewildered by the words of Him, the Lord and Soul of the Universe who through His maya appeared as a human being, they raised Them upon their laps to experience the joy of closing Them in their arms. Bound by the rope of affection crying a river they, with their throats full of tears being overwhelmed, could not say a word, oh King. The Supreme Lord, the son of Devaki, who thus comforted His parents, then made His maternal grandfather Ugrasena, King over the Yadus. He told him: 'Please, oh great King, with Us as your subjects, take command, for because of the curse of Yayati [see 9.18: 42] one being born as a Yadu should not sit on the throne. When I am there as a servant to attend to you, the demigods and such will bow down before you to offer you tribute. Then what to speak of the other rulers of men?'

All His close relatives and other relations, the Yadus, Vrishnis, Andhakas, Madhus, Das'arhas, Kukuras and other clans, who disturbed in their fear of Kamsa had fled in all directions, were honoured and consoled, for living in foreign regions had made them weary. He, the Maker of the Universe, brought them back to their homes and satisfied them with valuable gifts. 7-1 Protected by the arms of Krishna and Sankarshana they in their homes enjoyed the complete fulfillment of their desires because, now that they day after day saw the loving, always cheerful, beautiful lotus face and merciful, smiling glances of Mukunda, with Krishna and Balarama the fever [of a material existence] had ended. Even the eldest ones were youthful and full of strength and vitality, now that they there [in Mathura] time and again through their eyes could imbibe the nectar of Mukunda's lotus face. Thereupon the Supreme Lord, the son of Devaki, and Sankarshana approached Nanda oh great King. They, embracing him, said: 'Oh father, with the great affection and the fondling of the two of you, you have cared for Us in a great way. The love the parents have for their children is truly greater than even the love they have for each other. Those persons are father and mother who nourish, like they were their own sons, the children who were abandoned by relatives unable to maintain and protect them. Please return all together to Vraja dear father, We will come to see you relatives unhappy in your love, after having made Our friends [out here] happy.' The Supreme Lord, the Infallible One thus appealing Nanda and the people from Vraja, thereupon respectfully honoured them with clothing, jewelry and pots and such.

Thus being addressed by the two of Them, Nanda engulfed by affection, embraced Them with tears filling his eyes and went together with the gopas to Vraja. The son of Shurasena [Vasudeva], oh King, then arranged for a priest and brahmins to properly perform the second-birth initiation of his sons. For their remuneration he donated in worship fully decorated cows with golden chains and ornaments, complete with calves and linen wreaths. Magnanimously he gave them in charity the cows that were stolen away by Kamsa, the same cows he previously had donated within his mind the very day that Krishna and Rama were born [see 3.10: 11-12]. After having been initiated into the twice-born status, They, of proper vows, took the vow of celibacy [to be a student] from Garga, the preceptor of the Yadus [see also gayatri and brahmacharya]. 0-3 The Lords of the Universe who are the source of any form of knowledge, concealed in Their human activities the perfection of Their omniscience that is not founded on any knowledge from the outside. They [nevertheless] then desired to reside in the school of the guru and approached a native of Kasi [Benares] called Sandipani, who dwelt in the city of Avanti [Ujjain]. Thus obtaining [the company of] these self-controlled souls, he was by Them respected as if he was the Lord Himself. Doing this They in Their devotion formed an irreproachable example of service to the teacher. That best of the twice-born souls as Their guru, taught Them, contented as he was with Their pure love and submissive acts, all the Vedas with their corollary literatures and philosophical treatises [Upanishads], [] the Dhanur-veda [military science, archery] along with all its secrets [the mantras], the dharma [the codes of human conduct, the laws] and the nyaya [the methods of logic] as also the anvikshikim [the knowledge of philosophical debate or tarka] and the six aspects of the raja-nitim [political science, see ], 5-3 As the best of all first class persons and as the promulgators of all knowledge They, oh ruler of man, fixed in concentration, fully assimilated with simply having heard it only once, the complete of the sixty-four arts in as many days and nights [*4] and satisfied Their preceptor, oh King, by offering him compensation [gurudakshina]. Oh King, the brahmin in consideration of the amazing greatness of Their superhuman intelligence, after consulting with his wife, arrived at the wish to see his child again that had perished in the ocean at Prabhasa [see also 1.15: 49, 3.1: 20, 3.3: 25]. 'So be it' the two great warlords of unlimited prowess said and next mounted a chariot to head for Prabhasa. Having arrived there, they walked up to the shore and sat down for a moment. The [god of the] ocean recognised Them and offered Them tribute [compare 9.3: 13]. The Supreme Lord said to him: 'Present Us at once the son of Our guru, a young boy you have seized here with a mighty wave.'

The person of the ocean said: 'It was not I who took him away, oh Lord, it was a powerful Daitya named Pancajana, oh Krishna, a demon who moves through the water in the form of a conch. He who lives here indeed has kidnapped him.' Hearing that the Master quickly entered the water and killed him, but He could not find the boy in his belly. 2-4 Taking the conch shell that had grown as a part of the demon, He returned to the chariot and went to the beloved city of Yamaraja [the lord of death] known as Samyamani [*5]. [Arriving there,] Janardana together with the Lord who has a plow for His weapon [Balarama] blew loudly on His conch shell [see also B.G. 1: 15] so that Yamaraja, he who restrains the living beings, could hear the sound. Overflowing with devotion Yamaraja worshiped Them elaborately and humbly bowing down said to Krishna who dwells in each his heart: 'What can I do for the two of You, oh Vishnu who, for Your pastime, has appeared in the form of [two] human beings?'

The Supreme Lord said: 'Please bring Me the son of My guru who was brought here because of his karmic bondage, oh great King. It is My command that should be given priority.'

'So be it' he said and brought forward the preceptor's son. The Best of the Yadus gave him back to Their guru whom They then said: 'Please make my wish.'

The honourable guru said: 'My dear Boys, I am completely fulfilled by the remuneration for the guru the two of You have offered. What else would there be left for the spiritual master to desire from Persons like You? Please go home, oh heroes, may Your fame purify [the entire world] and may the mantras [Your appearance and delight] ever be fresh in this life and in the next [see also 10.13: 2]'

Thus by Their guru permitted to leave, They, on Their chariot as fast as the wind and thundering like a cloud, reached Their city. The citizens who had not seen Balarama and Janardana for many days, all rejoiced to see Them again, like having regained a lost treasure.'

*: Shri La Vis'vanatha Cakravarti points out: 'The kaumara stage lasts until the age of five, pauganda up to age ten and kais'ora to age fifteen. From then on, one is known as yauvana.' According to this statement, the kais'ora period ends at the age of fifteen. Krishna was only eleven years old when He killed Kamsa, according to Uddhava's words: ekadas'a-samas tatra gudharchi sa-balo 'vasat. 'Like a covered flame, Lord Krishna remained there incognito with Balarama for eleven years' (S.B. 3.2: 2. The three years and four months that Lord Krishna stayed in Mahavana were the equivalent of five years for an ordinary child, and thus in that period He completed His kaumara stage of childhood. The period from then to the age of six years and eight months, during which He lived in Vrindavana, constitutes His pauganda stage. And the period from the age of six years and eight months through His tenth year, during which time He lived in Nandis'vara [Nandagrama], constitutes His kais'ora stage. Then, at the age of ten years and seven months, on the eleventh lunar day of the dark fortnight of the month of Caitra, He went to Mathura, and on the fourteenth day thereafter He killed Kamsa. Thus He completed His kais'ora period at age ten, and He eternally remains at that age. In other words, we should understand that from this point on the Lord remains forever a kis'ora.'

 : These are the so-called angas and Upanishads. The six angas are: Shiksha (phonetics), chanda, (prosody), vyakarana (grammar), jyotisha (astronomy), kalpa (content and rules for the rituals) and nirukta (etymology).

: The six aspects of political science are: sandhi, making peace; vighraha, war; yana, marching or expedition; asana, sitting tight or encampment; dvaidha, dividing one's forces or separating one's allies; and sams'aya, depending on allies or seeking the protection of a more powerful ruler.

*5: Samyama means self-control, restraint, holding together, the integration of concentration [dharana], meditation [dhyana], and absorption [samadhi] in yoga.

Uddhava Spends the Night in Gokula Talking with Nanda
 Shri Shuka said: 'The best adviser of the Vrishnis was Krishna's beloved friend Uddhava [see also 3.2], a direct disciple of Brihaspati and a man of the finest intelligence. One day the Supreme Lord Hari, who removes the distress of the surrendered souls, grabbed his hand and spoke to him, His dearest and most faithful devotee. 'Please Uddhava, oh gentle one, go for the satisfaction of My parents to Vraja and relieve through My message the gopis from the mental pain of being separated from Me. With their minds fixed on Me, they, absorbed in Me, have made Me the purpose of their lives and abandoned all their material ties [with their husband, home and children, see 10.29: 4]. Understanding the ones who for My sake left behind this world and its moral obligations, I sustain those who have only Me as their beloved and dearest Self. When My best one, the women of Gokula remember Me, their dearest object of love being far away, they become stunned being overwhelmed by the anxiety of separation [see also B.G. 2: 62-64]. With My promises to return, the cowherd women who are fully dedicated to Me, with great difficulty manage to hold on and in some way keep their lives somewhat going.'

Shri Shuka said: 'After having said this oh King, Uddhava respectfully accepted the message of his Maintainer, mounted his chariot and set off for the cowherd village of Nanda. Just as the sun was setting, the fortunate soul reached Nanda's pastures, passing there unnoticed because of the dust of the hooves of the animals coming home. -1 With the sounds of the bulls in rut fighting each other for the fertile cows, with the cows with filled udders running after their calves, with the beauty of the white calves capering here and there and with the milking and the loud reverberation of flutes, the finely ornamented gopis and gopas, auspiciously singing about the deeds of Balarama and Krishna, were resplendent to behold. It was all most attractive with the homes of the gopas filled with incense, lamps and flower garlands for the worship of the fire, the sun, the guests, the cows, the brahmins, the forefathers and the gods [see also 10.24: 25]. The forest flowering on all sides echoed with the swarms of bees, singing birds, the karandava ducks and the swans crowding around the adorning bowers of lotuses. After having arrived there Nanda approached the dear follower of Krishna and embraced him, happy to be reverential with Lord Vasudeva in mind. He fed him with the finest food, had him comfortably seated on a nice sofa to be relieved of the fatigue and had his feet massaged and so on. Then he inquired: 'Oh dear and most fortunate one, does our friend the son of Shura [Vasudeva] who is so devoted to his well-wishers, fare well now that he is released and was reunited with his children? What a luck that the wicked Kamsa, who constantly hated the always righteous and saintly Yadus, together with his followers has been killed because of his sins! Is Krishna still thinking of us, His mother, His well-wishers and friends, the gopas of Vraja of whom He is the master, the cows, Vrindavana forest and the mountain [see 10.24: 25]? Is Govinda coming back to see His relatives once again, so that we may glance upon His face, His beautiful nose, His nice smile and eyes? Krishna, that so very great Soul, has protected us against insurmountable mortal dangers like a forest fire, the wind and rain, as also against a bull and a serpent. The memory of Krishna's valorous deeds, playful sidelong glances, smiles and words, my dear, made all of us forget our material actions. In Him the mind of those who see the locations where He played, the rivers, the hills and the different parts of the forest that were decorated by His feet, finds its total absorption. I think that Krishna and Rama who arrived here for a great and divine cause of the gods, as confirmed by Garga [see 10.8: 12], are the two most elevated ones among the demigods. Kamsa, who had the strength of ten thousand elephants, the wrestlers and the king of the elephants, after all have been playfully killed by the both of Them, as easy as animals are by the lion king. A solid bow as long as three talas [three lengths] was by Him, regal as an elephant, broken like a stick and for seven days He with one hand held up a mountain! Pralamba, Dhenuka, Arishtha, Trinavarta, Baka and other demons who had conquered both Sura and Asura, were by Them killed out here with ease.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Nanda fully immersed in Krishna thus over and over remembering Him, became extremely anxious and fell silent, overcome by the force of love. Also mother Yashoda overhearing the descriptions of her son's activities in her love gave way to her tears with her breasts moistened. When Uddhava saw the two of them in their love for the Supreme Lord in this condition of supreme attraction, he filled with joy spoke to Nanda. Shri Uddhava said: 'Having developed a mentality like this for Narayana, the spiritual master of all, the two of you are for certain the most praiseworthy of all embodied beings on the planet oh respectful souls. The two of Mukunda and Balarama are the seed and womb of the universe, They are the Original Male Principle [purusha] and His Creative Primeval Energy [pradhana] who with knowledge and control guide the living beings in their confused state. 2-3 The person who, giving up his life, but for a moment immerses his impure mind [in Him], that very instant will immediately eradicate all traces of his karma and find himself heading for the supreme destination in a spiritual form with the luster of the sun. With you good souls giving Him, Narayana, the Soul and Cause of All, the purest and most exceptional love, what other good deeds would there for you remain to perform? Before long Acyuta, [as] the Lord Supreme, the Master and Protector of the Devotees, will satisfy His parents and return to Vraja. In the [wrestling] arena having killed Kamsa, the enemy of all Yadus, Krishna will be true to His word that He would return to you. Please do not falter, oh most fortunate souls, you will see Krishna in the near future. He is present within the hearts of all living beings like fire in firewood. No one is dear or not dear to Him, nor does He, who is free from false pride, regard anyone superior or inferior. He is of an equal respect for everyone [compare Shri Shri Shikshashthaka and B.G. 9: 29]. For Him there is no father and mother, no wife, no children and so forth. No one is related to Him, nor is anyone strange to Him and with Him there is neither a question of a [material] body or birth [compare B.G. 10: 3]. For Him there is no karma in this world obliging Him to appear in wombs of a pure, impure or mixed nature. Yet He for the sake of His pastimes manifests to redeem His saintly devotees [see B.G. 3: 22; 4: 7; 13: 22]. Even though He is transcendental beyond the modes called goodness, passion and ignorance, He accepts it to play by the modes. He, the Unborn One, is thus of creation, maintenance and destruction. Just as for someone when he whirls around, the ground seems to be whirling, so too it appears that - when one thinks to be one's body - oneself is the doer, while it is the mind that is acting [*, compare B.G. 3: 27]. He is not just the son of the two of you, He is the Supreme Lord Hari, the Lord of Control who is the Son, the Soul, the Father and the Mother of everyone. That what is seen or heard, what is in the past, the present or in the future, that what is stationary, mobile, large or small, can in no way be assigned a status separate from Acyuta. He, the Supersoul, is the reality and welfare of all and everything.'

While Nanda and Krishna's messenger were speaking this way, the night came to an end oh King, and the gopis who had risen, lighted the lamps in the house for the worship and began to churn the butter. As the women were moving their hips and breasts while pulling the ropes, they radiated in the light of the lamps, with the rows of bangles on their arms, with their jewels, with their faces red of the kunkum and glowing from their earrings and necklaces. All inauspiciousness was dispelled in every direction with the loud singing of the lotus eyed women of Vraja whose reverberating sound, mixed with the sounds of churning butter, filled the air. When the almighty sun rose, the residents of Gokula saw the golden chariot outside the house of Nanda and wondered: 'Whose chariot is this? Maybe Akura has come, that servant of Kamsa's desires who took our lotus-eyed Krishna to the city of Mathura. Would he, with his master satisfied, be here now to perform the funeral rites with us?' And while the women were speaking thus, Uddhava came walking who had finished his morning duties.'

*: Srila Visvanatha Cakravarti gives a parallel idea: Although our happiness and distress are caused by our own interaction with the material qualities, we perceive the Lord to be their cause.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 47:

The Gopi Reveals Her Emotions: The Song of the Bee
 - Shri Shuka said: 'When the women of Vraja saw him, the servant of Krishna, with his long arms, with his lotus eyes, wearing a yellow garment and a lotus garland, with his effulgent lotus like countenance and polished earrings, they were quite astonished and wondered where this handsome, young man came from and to whom he belonged who wore clothes and ornaments like those of Krishna. Talking like this they all eagerly crowded around him who enjoyed the protection of the lotus feet of Uttamas'loka [the Lord Praised in the Scriptures]. With due respect bowing down before him in humility and shyly smiling with their glances, sweet words and such, they asked it him, after first having taken him separate and offered him a seat, for they had understood that he was an envoy of the Husband of the Goddess of Fortune. 'We know that you arrived here as the personal associate of the chief of the Yadus who, as your Master, has sent you here to satisfy His parents. We really would not know why else He should have thought of this cow place. Even for a sage the bonds of affection with one's relatives are difficult to relinquish. The interest in others manifested out of self-interest proves itself as friendship for as long as it takes; it is a pretense as good as the interest of bees for flowers or of men for women. Prostitutes abandon a penniless man, citizens deny an incompetent king, graduates leave behind their teacher and priests leave [their attendants] after being compensated. Birds abandon a tree rid of its fruits and guests leave the house where they ate. Animals leave the forest that burned down and a lover likewise leaves the woman he enjoyed to unite with.'

-1 Now that Uddhava, the messenger of Krishna, had arrived in their midst, the gopis who thus with their words, bodies and minds were focussed on Krishna, put aside their worldly concerns. Without restraint they sang and cried in the constant remembrance of the youth and childhood activities of their Sweetheart. One gopi [noted as Radha, see also *] seeing a honeybee as she meditated on the association with Krishna, imagined it to be a messenger sent by her Beloved and spoke as follows. The gopi said: 'Oh honeybee, you friend of a cheater, do not touch my feet with your whiskers still carrying the kunkum from His garland, the powder that rubbed off from the breasts of a rival lover. One who sends a messenger like you is derided in the assembly of the Yadus. Let the Lord of Madhu [Himself] be of mercy with the women [instead] [prajalpa ]! One time He made us drink the nectar of His bewildering lips and then suddenly abandoned us like we were some flowers. I wonder why the goddess of fortune [Padma] serves His lotus feet just like you [oh bee]. That must be so because her mind, alas, has been stolen by Krishna's chitchat [parjalpa ]. Oh mister sixlegs, dear bee, why are you singing so busily about the Master of the Yadus in front of us who are old friends of this Friend of Vijaya [Arjuna] who left behind their homes? You better sing of His topics before His [new] girlfriends, the pain of whose breasts He [now has] relieved. His sweethearts will provide you the charity you seek [vijalpa *4]. Which women in heaven, on earth and below would not be available to Him who, so unattainable, can deceive you with His charming smiles and arching eyebrows? When the wife of the Fortunate One is of worship in the dust of His feet, what then would be our value? Luckily for those feeling bad about it, there is the sound vibration [to be chanted of] huttamas'loka' [ujjalpa *5]. Keep your little head away from my feet! I know you, you expert who as a messenger from Mukunda learned the diplomacy of flatter! Why should I make amends with Him who, so ungrateful, has abandoned us, we who for His sake in this life have left behind their children, husbands and everything else [sanjalpa *6]? Against all rules He [as Rama, see 9.10 & 11] as cruel as a hunter shot the king of the monkeys [Vali], was conquered by a woman [Sita], disfigured a woman driven by lust [Shurpanakha, the sister of Ravana] and, after consuming His tribute, [as Vamana] bound up Bali like a crow [see 8.21]. Therefore enough of all friendliness with that Black Boy who impossibly can be given up when we keep talking about His stories [avajalpa *7]. Those ears are freed from all sins, who just once enjoyed but a drop of the nectar of the pastimes that He constantly performed. Such a one is completely liberated from the duality, wherefrom any [personal, material] sense of duty is instantly ruined. For that reason many people here [in Vrindavana], by therewith rejecting their miserable homes and families, end up wretched and, just like birds, practice the livelihood of begging [abhijalpa *8]. We, taking His deceptive words for true, just like the black deer's foolish doe wives who trust the hunter's song, repeatedly experienced this sharp pain of lust that was caused by the touch of His fingernails. Oh messenger, I beg you, talk of something else [ajalpa *9]! My sweet little friend, have you been sent back here by my Beloved? Please ask me what you want, you are to be honoured by me my dearest. Why are you here raising in us these [amorous] feelings for Him that are so impossible to relinquish? For is, oh gentle one, His consort the goddess of fortune Shri, not always present with Him on His chest [pratijalpa *10]? What a pity that the son of Nanda resides in Mathura now. Does He think so now and then of the household affairs of His father, His friends and the cowherd boys, oh great soul? Or else, does He still talk about us, His maidservants? When will He lay His aguru-scented hand on our heads [sujalpa *11]?"

Shri Shuka said: huddhava, having heard how the cowherd girls were longing to see Krishna, in order to pacify them thereupon related to them the message of their Sweetheart. Shri Uddhava said: 'You have dedicated your minds unto the Supreme Lord Vasudeva and are thus honourable to all people because you, good selves, therewith fulfilled your life's purpose [of modeling the emotions of relating to Him]. By means of donations, vows [of poverty, celibacy and fasting], sacrifices, using prayer beads [japa], studying and by turning inward, concentrating and meditating, as also by other kinds of auspicious practices [see also yama, niyama, vidhi and bhagavata dharma], the bhakti, the devotional service is realised unto Krishna. The unexcelled [standard of] devotion unto the Supreme Lord Uttama'sloka, that by you good people fortunately has been established, is even hard to attain for the sages. To your great fortune you have chosen to leave your sons, husbands, physical comforts, relatives and homes for the sake of that superior, male personality called Krishna. By the wholehearted love that ruled you because of your separation from Adhokshaja [the Transcendental Lord] oh glorious ones, you have done me [the Lord and everyone] a great favor. Please, good ladies, listen to the message that I as a faithful servant of my master came bringing to you from your Beloved for the sake of your happiness.

The Supreme Lord has said: 'You women are actually never separated from Me ever being present as the Soul of All. Just as all the elements, the ether, the fire, the air, the water and the earth are part of all beings, I am there as the union of all the elements of the mind, the life air, the senses and the natural modes. By means of Myself I create, destroy and sustain Myself in Myself, through the power of My deluding potency consisting of the material elements, the senses and the modes of nature. The soul full of pure spiritual knowledge, that separately exists free from the association of the modes, is perceived [as the constant witness] in the operations of deep sleep, dream sleep and waking consciousness. The mind by which one meditates upon the objects of the senses constitutes a mirage, just as a dream constitutes an illusion when one wakes up. Staying alert one should bring that what [in the mind] gathers from the input of the senses under control [compare B.G. 2: 68 and 6: 35-36]. Just as the ocean is the end station for all the rivers, this [insight] is the end conclusion of all Vedic literatures, analysis and yoga, of all intelligent people, renunciation, penance, sense control and truthfulness [compare B.G. 2: 70]. The fact then that I, so dear to your eyes, am situated so far away from you, is according to My wish that your mind - that is subjected to attraction - meditates upon Me. The mind of a woman remains absorbed more when her lover is far away than when she has him present before her eyes. Because in the constant remembrance of Me your minds are totally absorbed in Me and free from all restlessness, you will see Me appear soon. Those remaining here in Vraja while I was sporting at night in the forest [see 10.29: 9] and for that reason did not experience the rasa dance, were as fortunate to achieve Me by thinking of My luster.'

Shri Shuka said: 'The women of Vraja hearing the instructions thus imparted by their Beloved, pleased as they were to have their memories revived by the message, thereupon addressed Uddhava. The gopis said: 'The cause of the suffering, Kamsa, the enemy of the Yadus, has fortunately together with his followers been killed. What a blessing that Acyuta at present lives happily with His well-wishers who [therewith] achieved everything they desired. Oh gentle one, maybe the elder brother of Gada [Krishna, see 9.24: 46] gives the women of the city the love that belongs to us, we who affectionately revere Him bashfully with inviting smiles and glances. How will our Darling, so versed in all the matters of love, not become bound by the bewildering gestures and words of the city women, who are also [just as we] constantly of worship? And... does Krishna, oh pious one, remember us; does He ever mention us, village girls, when He freely talks in the company of the city women? Does He recall those nights in which He enjoyed in Vrindavana, that place so enchanting because of the lotus, the jasmine and the moon? He at the time with tinkling ankle bells danced with us, His beloved girlfriends, who glorified Him for His attractive stories. Will that descendant of Das'arha return to this place and with His touch bring us back to life who are tormented by the sorrow He gave rise to Himself? Will He do that just as Indra with his clouds would [replenish] a forest? But why would Krishna come here now that He, surrounded by all His well-wishers, is happy having attained a kingdom, having killed His enemies and having married the daughters of kings? What purpose would there, for us forest-dwellers or for other women, be to fulfill unto Him, the great Soul and husband of the goddess of fortune, whose every desire is already fulfilled? He is complete in Himself! The greatest happiness is found in non-expectancy, so even the unchaste Pingala stated [a courtesan, see 11.8]. Yet, for us focused on Krishna who very well know this, it is most difficult not to cherish any hope. Who is capable of forgetting the intimate talks with Uttama'sloka, He from whose body the goddess never moves away despite Him not desiring her? In the company of Sankarshana, oh prabhu, Krishna with the cows and the sounds of the flute passed through the different places in the forest, by the rivers and the hills. Ah, time and again those places carrying the glory of His footprints, remind us of the son of Nanda we can never forget. Oh, how can we ever forget Him with our hearts being stolen by His lovely gait, His playful glances, His generous smiles and nectarean words? Oh Master, Master of the Goddess and Master of Vraja; oh Destroyer of the Suffering, oh Govinda, lift Gokula out of the ocean of misery it is submerged in!'

Shri Shuka said: 'With their fever of separation removed by Krishna's messages, they thereupon worshiped him, Uddhava, recognizing him as Adhokshaja Himself. Remaining there for some months he, singing about the topics of Krishna's pastimes, gave joy to Gokula by dispelling the sorrow of the gopis. All the days that Uddhava dwelled in Nanda's cowherd village, passed for the residents of Vraja in a single moment, because they were filled with discussions about Krishna. Seeing the rivers, forests, mountains, valleys and flowering trees, the servant of the Lord took pleasure in reminding the people of Vraja of Krishna. Noticing how confused and such the gopis were in their absorption in Krishna, Uddhava was extremely pleased and offered them all respect while singing the following: 'On this earth these young cowherd women are the only ones of [real success] in acquiring a body, for they achieved the perfection of an exclusive love for Govinda, the Soul of All - a love that is desired by sages, by ourselves and by those afraid of a material existence. Of what use would the [three] brahminical births be [of deriving an existence from one's parents, one's guru and one's sacrifices] for someone who has a taste for the topics of the Unlimited Lord? What is one compared to these women who, impure in their conduct towards Krishna, wander in the forests? What is one's position compared to this stage of perfect love for the Supreme Soul? For the one who is of constant worship, even when he is not very learned, most certainly the Lord directly bestows the highest good, the good that imbibed works like the king of all medicines [that is: irrespective of the person]. The blessing the Vraja ladies found in the embrace of Uttama'sloka in the rasa dance, was not bestowed on the goddess on His chest who is so intimately associated with Him, was not His mercy for the heavenly damsels with their lotus flower scent and luster, nor was it granted to any other kind of woman [10.33]. Oh, let me be devoted to the dust of the lotus feet of the gopis in Vrindavana! Let me be any of the bushes, creepers or herbs there [in relation] to them, to those women who in worship of the feet of Mukunda, whom one seeks with the help of the Vedas, abandoned the path of civil correctitude and left behind the family members that are so difficult to give up. The feet of the Supreme Lord where the goddess, Lord Brahma and the other gods with all their desires fulfilled, just like accomplished masters of yoga, can only dream of, were by Krishna in the gathering of the rasa dance placed on their breasts, so that they by embracing them could overcome their anguish. I offer my obeisances again and again to the dust of the feet of the women of Nanda's cowherd village, whose loud chanting of Krishna's glories purifies the three worlds.'

Shri Shuka said: '[Uddhava,] the descendant of Das'arha thereupon took leave of Yashoda, Nanda, the gopas and the gopis, mounted his chariot and was about to leave. But when he left, Nanda and the others approached him with various items of worship in their hands and said affectionately and with tears in their eyes: 'May our mental activities be founded on Krishna's lotus feet, may our words be an expression of His names and may our bodies when they bow down and such, do so for His sake. May there, wherever we for our work have to wander to the Lord's will, may there, with whatever we do and give away in charity, be the attachment to Krishna our Lord.'

After the gopas thus had honoured him with Krishna bhakti, oh first among men, Uddhava returned to Mathura, the city that [now] enjoyed the protection of Krishna. After bringing Krishna his obeisances, he told Him about the intense devotion of the residents of Vraja and next gave Vasudeva, Balarama and the king [Ugrasena] the gifts sent along for them.'

*: To substantiate the claim that this concerns Radha, quotes Shri Jiva Gosvami the following verses from the Agni Purana: "At dawn the gopis inquired from Krishna's servant, Uddhava, about the Lord's pastimes and recreation. Only Shrimati Radharani, immersed in thought of Krishna, withdrew Her interest in the talks. Then Radha, who is worshiped by the residents of Her Vrindavana village, spoke up in the midst of Her girlfriends. Her words were full of pure transcendental knowledge and expressed the ultimate portion of the Vedas."

: Shri Rupa Vis'vanatha Cakravarti points out that this and the following nine verses exemplify ten kinds of impulsive speech [citra-jalpa or strange chatter] spoken by a lover as expressions of godconscious folly or divine madness [divyonmada]. Shri Rupa Gosvami in the Ujjvala-nilamani 4.18 says to this expression: "Prajalpa is speech that denigrates the tactlessness of one's lover with expressions of disrespect. It is spoken in a mood of envy, jealousy and pride."

: Ujjvala-nilamani 4.18: 'Parijalpa is that speech which, through various devices, shows one's own cleverness by exposing the mercilessness, duplicity, unreliability and so on of one's Lord.'

*4: Ujjvala-nilamani 4.18: "According to learned authorities, vijalpa is sarcastic speech that is addressed to the killer of Agha and that openly expresses jealousy while at the same time hinting at one's angry pride."

*5: Ujjvala-nilamani 4.18: "The declaration of Lord Hari's duplicitous nature in a mood of spite born of pride, together with jealously spoken insults directed against Him, has been termed ujjalpa by the wise."

*6: Ujjvala-nilamani 4.19: "The learned describe sanjalpa as that speech which decies with deep irony and insulting gestures the beloved's ungratefulness and so on."

*7: Ujjvala-nilamani 4.19: "Saintly persons have concluded that when a lover, impelled by jealousy and fear, declares that Lord Hari is unworthy of her attachment because of His harshness, lustiness and dishonesty, such speech is called avajalpa."

*8: Ujjvala-nilamani 4.19: "When a lover indirectly states with remorse that her beloved is fit to be given up, such speech, uttered like the plaintive crying of a bird, is called abhijalpa."

*9: Ujjvala-nilamani 4.19: "A statement spoken in disgust, describing how the male lover is deceitful and brings one misery, and also implying that He gives happiness to others, is known as ajalpa."

*10: Ujjvala-nilamani 4.19: "When the lover humbly states that although she is unworthy of attaining her beloved she cannot give up hoping for a conjugal relationship with Him, such words, spoken with respect for her beloved's message, are called pratijalpa."

Shri Rupa Vis'vanatha Cakravarti explains that the goddess of fortune, Shri, has the power to assume many different forms. Thus when Krishna enjoys other women, she stays on His chest in the form of a golden line. When He is not consorting with other women, she puts aside this form and gives Him pleasure in Her naturally beautiful form of a young woman.

*11: Ujjvala-nilamani 4.20: "When, out of honest sincerity, a lover questions Shri Hari with gravity, humility, unsteadiness and eagerness, such speech is known as sujalpa."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 48:

Krishna Pleases His Devotees

Shri Shuka said: 'The Supreme Lord, the Soul of All who Sees Everything, with understanding [for Uddhava's report of desirous women] wished to please the serving girl [Trivakra, as He had promised 10.42: 12] and went to the house of the woman who was troubled by lust [see 10.42: 10]. It was richly endowed with expensive furnishings, replete with sensual articles and was beautified with strings of pearls and banners, canopies, beds and seats as also fragrant incense, oil lamps, flower garlands and sandalwood. Seeing Him arriving at her house, she immediately rose to her feet and together with her female companions hurried to receive Acyuta properly, who respectfully was welcomed with an excellent seat and so on. The saintly Uddhava was also worshiped, but he touched his seat and sat on the floor. Krishna, faithful to the ways of human society, then laid Himself without delay upon a luxurious bed [in the inner chambers]. She prepared her body by bathing, anointing, dressing up with ornaments, garlands and perfume, betel nut and drinking fragrant fluids and such, and then shyly and with playful smiles approached Madhava with tempting glances. Calling forward the lovely woman, who was shy in fear of the novel contact, He took hold of her two with bangles ornamented hands and placed the beauty on the bed to enjoy together with her, she whose only proof of piety consisted of having offered ointment. Smelling the feet of the Unlimited Lord and embracing within her arms, between her breasts, her Lover, the Personification of All Ecstasy, wiped away the pain that because of Cupid burned in her breasts, chest and eyes. Thus she succeeded in letting go of her so very long standing distress. Because she had offered body ointment to Him, the Master of Enlightenment, she had obtained the Lord who is so hard to obtain. But unfortunately [compare 4.9: 31] she begged the following: 'Please Beloved, stay here for a few days together with me! Enjoy, for I cannot bear to give up Your association, oh Lotus flower-eyes.'

He who is of Respect for Others, considerate with her, granted her the boon she desired [in the form of a promise], whereupon the Lord of All together with Uddhava returned to His own supremely opulent residence. The one who, in full worship of Vishnu, the Controller of All Controllers who is so difficult to honour [other than by pure devotion], choses for a benediction that is spiritually too easy, is with that superficiality not engaged very intelligently [see also 7.15: 36].

Krishna, the Master, also desired to please Akrua and engage him in some business as well, and thus He went together with Uddhava and Balarama to his house. 3-1 When he saw Them coming, the greatest of all illustrious personalities who were his relatives, he joyfully rose to his feet to embrace Them for a welcome. Bowed down to Krishna and Rama he was greeted by Them whereupon he, after They had taken their seats, worshiped Them as was prescribed. 5-1 The water he had used to wash Their feet he sprinkled all over his head, oh King, after which he presented gifts, the finest clothing, sandalwood, garlands and excellent ornaments. With his head bowed down he in worship placed His feet on his lap to massage them, and addressed with humility, facing down, Krishna and Rama as follows: 'To our good fortune the two of You have killed the sinful Kamsa as also his brothers and followers. Thus delivering Your dynasty from endless troubles You have made it prosperous. You two are the pradhana and purusha [material and efficient] causes of the universe that are one with the universe and apart from whom not a single cause or effect [para-apara] can be found. This universe You created from Your energies, You have subsequently entered. Thus You can be perceived in the many [forms], oh Absolute Truth, that we know about from listening to the scriptures and by direct experience. Just as the earth element and the other elements differently manifest themselves in various species of living mobile and immobile beings, You, the Single One Self-reliant Self, the Supersoul, manifest in a multitude [of souls] within those different life forms. You create, maintain and then again destroy the universe, but You are, with the qualities of Your potencies: [respectively] the passion, the goodness and the ignorance [the gunas], not bound to those actions or their modes. For what could for You now, who are the Soul of All Knowledge, constitute a cause of bondage? Because it has never been proven that You are determined by physical matters and such, there is with You no question of a literal birth or of material opposites. For that reason there exists for You in fact no bondage or any liberation [compare 10.14: 26]. And if that happens to be so according to Your sweet will [see e.g. 10.11: 7], it is the consequence of our mistaken notion about You [like in 10.23: 10-11]. For the benefit of this universe You proclaim the classical path of the Veda and assume forms in the mode of goodness the very moment the path is obstructed by wicked persons adhering to godlessness. You as that very same person, oh Master, have now descended in the home of Vasudeva together with Your plenary portion [Balarama]. This You have done in order to spread the fame of the [Yadu] dynasty and to remove from this earth the burden of the hundreds of armies present there by killing their kings [see also 1.11: 34], kings who are expansions of the adversaries of the god-fearing souls [see e.g. 7.1: 40-46]. Today oh Lord, our residence has been most blessed by the arrival of You, Adhokshaja, the Spiritual Master of the Universe who are the embodiment of all the gods, forefathers, living beings and humans, You from whose feet the water [of the Ganges, see 5.17] washes that purifies the three worlds. What other scholar would there be for us? To whom else should we turn for shelter but to You, the well-wisher whose loving words for His devotees are always faithful? For grateful to the supporters who worship You, You give all that they desire, even Yourself with whom there is never any diminution or increase [see also B.G. 2: 40]. We to our fortune have, with us here, before our eyes You who even for the masters of yoga and the most prominent among the enlightened ones are a goal hard to attain. Please swiftly cut through the ties of our delusional existence that result from Your material energy: our children, wife, wealth, honourable friends, our home, body and so on.'

Thus extensively being worshiped by His devotee, Krishna the Supreme Lord smiled at Akrua and spoke with words that practically swept him of his feet. The Supreme Lord said: 'You, Our paternal uncle and praiseworthy friend, are Our spiritual master. We are always the ones depending on you and [like your sons] need to be protected, maintained and graced by you. Someone like you belongs to the most elevated among the honourable ones and deserves it to be served by anyone desiring the saintliest and highest good. Demigods are always after their own interests, but pure devotees are not. Not to decry the sacred places that consist of water [rivers] or the deities that are made of clay and stone: they purify in the course of time, but the saints [themselves] bring purification after just once having met them. You certainly are the very best of all Our well-wishers. I would like you to go for Us to the city named after the elephant [Hastinapura] and find out what it is that for the sake of the welfare of the Pandavas needs to be done. When their father died, they as young boys together with their mother were in great distress. They were by the king [Dhritrashtra] taken to his capital, where they are residing since, so I have heard. The King, the son of Ambika [see 9.22: 25], was blind and was, under the control of his wicked sons [one hundred of them led by Duryodhana,

9.22: 26], weak-minded so that the sons of his brother [Pandur] certainly were not treated equally by him. Go and find out whether his actions are good or bad at present, so that we with that knowledge can make arrangements for the benefit of Our dear friends.'

After Akrua fully having instructed with these words, the Fortunate One, Lord Hari, returned to His residence with Uddhava and Sankarshana.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 49:

Akrura's Mission in Hastinapura

- Shri Shuka said: 'He [Akrua] went to Hastinapura, the city marked by the glory of the kings of the Puru dynasty [see family-tree], and saw there the son of Ambika [Dhritrashtra, see 9.22: 25] together with Bhishma, Vidura and Pritha [Kunti], as also Bahlika and his son [Somadatta], Dronacarya and Kripacarya, Karn, Duryodhana, the son of Drona [Ashvatthama], the Pandavas and other friends. After the son of Gandini [Akrua, see 9.24: 15] appropriately had greeted his relatives and friends, they inquired with him for news about their kin whereupon he in his turn asked how they were faring. He stayed there for a couple of months in order to find out what the king, who could not raise his voice against his wicked sons, was doing in following the advise of mischievous persons [like Karn]. - Both Vidura and Kunti told him everything about the unbecoming acts - like the administering of poison - that the sons of Dhritrashtra had perpetrated in their intolerance for the influence, skill, strength, bravery, humility and so on of the sons of Pritha, whose excellent qualities were loved by the citizens. Now that Pritha saw her [Vrishi]-brother Akrua before her, she, remembering her place of birth [Mathura], addressed him and said with tears in her eyes: 'Oh gentle one, do our parents and brothers, my sisters, nephews and the women of the family as also my [old girlhood] friends still remember us? Do the son of my brother, Krishna, the Supreme Lord, the shelter full of care for the devotees and Balarama with His lotus petal eyes, still think of the sons of His father's sister? And... will He come to console me with His words, I who with young boys deprived of their father in the midst of enemies am lamenting like a doe between the wolves? Krishna, oh Krishna, oh Greatest Yogi, oh Soul and Protector of the Universe, please watch over this surrendered soul who together with her children is drowning in distress oh Govinda! [see also 1.8: 17-43] For mankind in fear of death and rebirth, I see no other shelter than Your lotus feet, oh Master and Controller granting liberation. My obeisances unto Krishna, the pure Absolute Truth and Supersoul, the Lord of Yoga and Unifier of Consciousness, unto You whom I approach for shelter.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Oh King, Your own great-grandmother thus remembering her relatives and Krishna, the Controller of the Universe, began to cry loudly over her misfortune. Akrua, equanimous in distress and happiness, and the illustrious Vidura consoled Kunti by reminding her of those [the gods] who fathered her sons [see family-tree]. When it was about time to leave he approached the king amidst his supporters, who was fully determined by his sons [and his foster sons] whom he treated unequally. He wanted to relate to him what in friendship was communicated by his well-wishing relatives [Krishna and Rama]. Akrua said: 'Oh dear, beloved son of Vicitravirya [9.22: 21-25], to the greater glory of the Kurus you, after the demise of your brother Pandu, have now assumed the throne. Dutifully protecting the earth and the citizens, delighting the people with your good character and treating your relatives equally, you will achieve perfection and renown! Acting to the contrary however, you will be condemned in this world and land in darkness. Therefore always be equal toward both the Pandavas and your own sons. No one in this world, oh King, is given an enduring association with whomever. Not even with one's own body the association endures. So what to say about a wife, children and so on? A living being is born alone and dies alone. Alone one enjoys the good consequences [of one's actions] and also has to face the bad consequences. The wealth that lacking in dharma was acquired by an unintelligent person, is stolen by others disguised as dependents [like relatives], just like the water of a fish [will be occupied by its own offspring]. Those lacking in wisdom maintain their life, wealth and children in disrespect of dharmic matters and think 'I am the owner', but frustrated in their purposes they end up destitute and abandoned [see 4.31 6.15: 21-23 and 7.15]. Left to his own devices [by his relatives] carrying his load [all alone], not conversant with the purpose of life and with his goals unfulfilled, he blind to his own dharmic duties enters the deepest darkness [see also 3.30; 5: 26; 6.1: 40]. Therefore, seeing this world, oh King, as a dream, as something magical, as a thing of the mind, bring that mind under control with intelligence and thus find your balance and peace, prabhu.'

Dhritrashtra said: 'I can never get enough of the auspicious words you are speaking, oh master of charity, they are for a mortal like me, as the nectar of immortality! But however pleasing they might be, oh gentle one, they are, just like lightening in a cloud, not fixed in my wavering heart, because I am partial in my attachment to my sons. What person can defy what is ordained by the Lord, who has descended in the Yadu family to diminish the burden of the earth? [see B.G. 9: 8] He whose path is inconceivable, creates this universe by His own creative energy, distributes the modes and enters them. My obeisances unto Him whose actions are inscrutable, the Supreme Lord with whom we find liberation from the cycle of birth and death.'

Shri Shuka said: 'The descendant of Yadu [Akrua] thus being apprised of the mentality of the king, took leave of his well-wishers and returned to the capital of the Yadus. According to the purpose for which he was sent, he reported to Rama and Krishna what position Dhritrashtra had taken toward the Pandavas, oh descendant of Kuru.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 50:

Krishna Uses Jarasandha and Establishes the City of Dvaraka

Shri Shuka said: 'Asti and Prapti, the two queens of Kamsa, oh hero of the Bharatas, were unhappy that their husband had been killed and distressed went to their father's house. They told their father, the king of Magadha named Jarasandha [see also 1.15: 9, 9.22: 8, 10.2: 1-2, 10.36: 36], everything about the cause of their widowhood. Hearing those bad tidings, oh King, he full of sorrow and indignation embarked upon the extreme endeavor of ridding the earth of the Yadavas. With twenty-three akshauhini he amassed around Mathura to besiege the royal capital of the Yadus on all sides. - When Krishna, the Supreme Lord Hari, saw how his army, like an ocean that overflowed its boundaries, besieged His city and filled His subjects with fear, He as the Ultimate Cause in a Human Form, considered what, to the purpose of His descent into this world, would be the best course of action considering the time and place: - 'I will surely annihilate his army, this burden of the earth gathered by the king of Magadha, in which he brought together all who subservient to him have assumed leadership and now can be counted in akshauhini of infantry, cavalry, chariotry and elephantry. Jarasandha however, I should spare so that he again will try to assemble an army. For this purpose I have descended: to remove the burden of this earth, to protect the virtuous ones and put an end to the rest [that is bad]. As soon as after a certain period of time injustice predominates, I also assume other bodies in order to protect the dharma [see also 2.7 and B.G. 4: 7].'

While he was thinking this way that very instant two chariots [from Vaikunthha] approached from the sky as effulgent as the sun, complete with drivers and equipment. Also the Lord's ancient and divine weapons appeared of their own accord. Seeing them the Lord of the Senses said to Sankarshana: 3-1 'Oh Respected One, please take notice of this imminent danger for the Yadus who are protected by You Prabhu. This is Your chariot that arrived with Your favorite weapons. We indeed were born for this purpose: to act oh Lord, for the benefit of the saintly souls. So please remove now from this earth the burden of these twenty-three armies.'

After thus having invited Him, the two descendants of Das'arha in armor, resplendent with Their weapons, left the city in Their chariots accompanied by a very small contingent. Appearing [from the city], the Supreme Personality with Daruka at the reins, blew His conch shell so that the hearts of the enemy soldiers trembled with terror. Jarasandha looked at the two of Them and said: 'Krishna You worst of all persons, I do not desire to contest with You. It is shameful to fight with someone who is but a boy, a fool like You hiding away. Get lost You murderer of Your relatives! And Rama, if You dare to fight, then muster courage. You either cut by my arrows drop Your body and go to heaven or You kill me!'

The Supreme Lord said: 'Truly, heroes don't have to vaunt, they simply show their prowess. How oh King, can We take serious the words of a man who facing his death is delirious?'

Shri Shuka said: 'The son of Jara, then marched with his gigantic number of mighty forces toward the two descendants of Madhu who thereupon were surrounded by the soldiers, chariots, flags, horses and charioteers, just like the wind covers the sun with clouds or a fire with dust. When the two chariot banners of Hari and Rama, that were marked by the palm tree and by Garuda, could not be seen anymore in the fray, the women of the city who were positioned on the watchtowers, the palaces and gateways, swooned, being stricken by grief. The Lord witnessing how His army was harassed by the most fearsome clouds of arrows that the enemy forces repeatedly rained upon them, then twanged His most excellent bow the Sharnga, that is worshiped by Sura and Asura. From His quiver He fixed, pulled back and released floods of sharp arrows with which He, whirling around like a burning torch, relentlessly stroked the chariots, elephants, horses and foot soldiers. Elephants fell down with their foreheads split open, many a horse had its neck severed, chariots including their horses and flags were destroyed and the arms, legs and shoulders of the charioteers, their masters and the foot soldiers were cut by the arrows. 5-2 From the cut off limbs of the two-legged ones, the elephants and the horses the blood flowed in hundreds of streams that were filled with arms that looked like snakes, people's heads that looked like turtles, dead elephants that resembled islands and dead horses that resembled crocodiles. Hands and thighs appeared like fish, human hair like water weeds, bows like waves and weapons like separate bushes. The rushing streams frightening to the timid and inspiring to the intelligent, were crowded with chariot wheels that were like frightening whirlpools and full of precious gems and fine jewelry that looked like stones and gravel. Sankarshana, with His unbounded potency stroke with His plow His furious enemies down one after the other. The military force dear King, that was supervised by the king of Magadha for destruction and that was as unfathomable, frightening and unsurpassable as the limitless ocean, was for the Lords of the Universe, the two sons of Vasudeva, but a plaything. Despite the fact that one describes Him [in response to philosophers who proclaim His being unconcerned] as playing His game in imitation of the human ways, it is not at all surprising that He, who with His Unlimited Qualities effects the maintenance, creation and annihilation of the three worlds, subdues an opposing party. The so very strong Jarasandha whose army had been destroyed and who, deprived of his chariot, was left with only his breath, was seised by Balarama as forcibly as one lion seizing another lion. But, as He who had killed so many adversaries was tying him up with the ropes of Varuna [compare 5.24: 23] and of normal man, He was checked by Govinda, for He needed Jarasandha for another purpose.

He, honoured by heroes, was ashamed to be released by the two Lords of the Universe and considered to perform penances, but he was on that path checked by the rest of the nobles who explained to him in clear terms, with meaningful words and practical arguments: 'Your being defeated by the Yadus occurred as a consequence of your karmic bondage.' The son of Brihadraatha all of whose soldiers had been killed and who had been left alone by the Supreme Lord, then dispirited returned to Magadha.

Mukunda who had overcome the ocean of enemy forces without losing His army, was showered with flowers by the servants of the three worlds who praised Him. Then He met the citizens of Mathura who, with their fever allayed felt great joy, and His glory was sung by bards, heralds and panegyrist. As He entered the city with its sprinkled roads, many banners and festively decorated gateways, conch shells and kettledrums, drums and horns together with vinas, flutes and mridangas [two-sided devotional drums] resounded while the elated citizens loudly recited Vedic verses. The women gazed at Him affectionately with wide open eyes full of love and covered Him with flower garlands, yogurt, parched rice and sprouts. The countless valuables consisting of the ornaments of the heroes fallen on the battlefield, were by the Lord all presented to the king of the Yadus [Ugrasena]. And so it happened that the king of Magadha thus with his akshauhini seventeen times fought against the Yadus who were protected by Krishna's military strength. The Vrishnis with the help of Krishna's power entirely destroyed the forces of the king. And every time his soldiers lay dead, he was abandoned and then went away. Just as the eighteenth battle was about to take place, a foreign fighter [Kalayavana] appeared who was sent by Narada. Having heard about the Vrishnis he arrived with three crores of barbarians [mecchas] and besieged Mathura, for among the human beings he had found no one who could match him. Seeing him, Krishna together with Sankarshana [Balarama] thought: 'Ah, [an attack] from two sides. A great problem has risen for the Yadus! This Yavana who opposes Us today is of the same great strength as Jarasandha, who will also get here either today, tomorrow or the day after tomorrow. While the two of Us are fighting with him the son of Jara, when he comes, will kill our relatives or else move them to his own stronghold. Let us therefore today kill the barbarians and build a fortress to house our intimates, that is impenetrable to human beings.'

After deliberating on the matter, the Supreme Lord arranged for a fortress [with a circumference] of twelve yojanas within the sea, where He had a city built [called Dvaraka or 'many-gated', see also 1: 11] that had all kinds of wonderful facilities. 0-5 The science of the architecture of Tvashta [Vis'vakarma] could be admired there, who with his expertise constructed the main avenues, courtyards and service roads to the plots of land. It contained splendid gardens and parks with the trees and creepers of the gods and gateways made of quartz with upper levels that with their turrets of gold touched the sky. The service buildings fitted with silver and brass were decorated with pots of gold and had jeweled rooftops. It had houses with floors with precious emeralds that were occupied by people from the four varnas, it had watchtowers and temples housing the presiding deities and radiated with the palaces of the Lord of the Yadus. Lord Indra delivered to the Lord the parijata [coral-tree] as also the Sudharma-hall ['good law'] situated in which a mortal is not affected by the laws of mortality. Varuna delivered horses as swift as the wind that had a white and exclusively dark-grey colour. The treasurer of the gods [Kuvera] delivered the eight mystic treasures [see nidhi] and the local rulers contributed with each their own wealth. Whatever powers of control the Supreme Lord had delegated to them as their own perfections, were all offered back to Krishna, now that He had come to earth. After Krishna by the power of His yoga had transported all His subjects to that place [*], He consulted with Balarama, the protector of the citizens, and then went out of the city gate unarmed, wearing a garland of lotus flowers.'

*. Shрила Vis'vanatha Cakravarti quotes the following verses here from the Shri Padma Purana, Uttara-khanda: "In the middle of the night, as the citizens of Mathura slept, Lord Janardana suddenly removed them from that city and placed them in Dvaraka. When the men awoke, they were all amazed to find themselves, their children and their wives sitting inside palaces made of gold."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 51:

The Deliverance of Mucukunda

- Shri Shuka said: 'Seeing Him coming out [of the city see 50: 57] like the rising moon, most beautiful to behold, with a dark complexion, a yellow silk garment, the Shrivatsa on His chest, the brilliant Kaustubha gem decorating His neck, His mighty, long four arms and eyes as pink as newly grown lotuses, His always effulgent, clean, joyful smile to His beautiful cheeks, His lotus like face and the display of His shark-shaped earrings, he [Kalayavana] thought: 'This person indeed with the Shrivatsa, the four arms, the lotus eyes, wearing forest-flowers and with a great beauty, must be Vasudeva. Considering the marks as mentioned by Narada He, going there without weapons on foot, can be no one else. I'll fight Him without weapons!' The Yavana in pursuit thus decided to catch up with Him who had turned His face and fled away, He, who is unattainable even to the mystic yogis. With every step He seemed to be within the reach of his hands, but after thus being taken a great distance by the Lord, the leader of the Yavanas was led to a mountain cave. In his pursuit he insulted Him with words like 'Fleeing does not behave someone like You born in the Yadu dynasty!' Yet he, whose mischief had not found its end, could not get hold of Him. Despite being insulted thus way, the Supreme Lord entered the mountain cave. The Yavana followed Him, but saw another man lying there. 'And now, bringing me this long distance, He is lying down here like a saint!' Thus erroneously thinking that the man was Acyuta, he struck him full force with his foot. The man woke up after a long period of sleep and slowly opened his eyes. Looking around in every direction, he saw him standing at his side. Oh descendant of Bharata, by the glance the angered man cast on him, he was instantly burned to ashes by a fire that was generated from within his own body [*].'

The honourable king [Parikshit] said: 'Who precisely was that person, oh brahmin, of which family was he and of what powers? Why had he retreated into the cave to sleep and from whose seed was that destroyer of the Yavana born?'

Shri Shuka said: 'He is known as Mucukunda. He was born in the Ikshvaku dynasty as a son of Mandhata [see 9.6: 38 and 9.7]. He is a great personality devoted to the brahminical order and someone true to his vow in battle. On the request for help of the gods headed by Indra who were terrified because of the Asuras, he for a long time was of service to assure them their protection. After having secured Guha ['from the cave'; Skanda or Kartikeya] as their guardian of heaven, they said to Mucukunda: 'Oh King, please desist from the difficult task to protect us. Forgetting all your personal desires, you oh hero, with the abandoning of a kingdom in the world of man, have removed those [asura] thorns for our protection. Your children, your queens and your other relatives, ministers, advisors and subjects do not live anymore. Time has swept them away. The Supreme, Inexhaustible Lord of Control is the Time itself, more powerful than the most powerful ones, who, playing a game of herdsman and flock, sets the mortal beings in motion. We wish you all good fortune, please choose today any benediction from us, except for the boon of liberation that can only be conferred by the Supreme Inexhaustible Lord Shri Vishnu.'

He who for his great fame thus was addressed by the demigods, respectfully saluted them and entered a cave to enjoy the sleep the gods had granted him []. After the barbarian was burned to ashes, the Supreme Lord, the great hero of the Satvatas, revealed Himself to sage Mucukunda. 3-2 He as dark as a cloud, was clad in a yellow, silken garment, carried the Shrivatsa on His chest and the brilliant Kaustubha gem that radiated. With His four arms and the beautifying Vaijayanti garland, with His attractive, calm face and glittering shark-shaped earrings, with His affectionate smile appealing to all mankind and His glance, with His youthful handsome form, His noble gait and His fire that was like that of a lion, He formed an appearance of an overwhelming effulgence. Facing this unassailable splendor he who was highly intelligent, filled with awe hesitantly posed a question. Shri Mucukunda said: 'Who are You to join with me in the wilderness in a mountain cave, while You with Your feet, that are like the petals of a lotus, walk the thorny ground? Maybe You are the Supreme Lord, the origin of all empowered beings, or else the god of fire, the sun god, the moon god, the king of heaven or perhaps a ruler from another planet. I think You are the leading godhead [Vishnu] among the three principal demigod personalities [Brahma, Shiva and Vishnu], the Greatest One, for You dispel the darkness of this cave [the 'heart'] like a lamp with its light. Oh Most Eminent Among All Men, if You like, please describe truthfully for us eager to hear, Your birth, activities and lineage. We from our side, oh tiger among men, are descendants of Ikshvaku, a family of kshatriyas. And I was born from the son of Yuvanas'va and am called Mucukunda, oh Lord. Because I remained awake for a long time and my fatigued senses were overwhelmed by sleep, I for my comfort lay down in this solitary place. Then I was awakened by someone. That person because of his sinful mentality turned to ashes. Immediately thereafter I then saw Your good Self so glorious, oh Chastiser of the Enemies. Because of Your unbearable effulgence we, being diminished in our faculties, cannot behold You, oh most Gracious One, You deserve it to be honoured by all embodied beings!'

Thus being addressed by the king, the Supreme Lord and Origin of the Entire Creation replied with a broad smile using words rumbling as deep as the clouds. The Supreme Lord said: 'There are thousands of My births, activities and names My dear one, limitless as they are, they cannot even be enumerated by Me! Some time, after many lives, one may succeed in counting all the dust particles of the earth, but that will never be accomplished with My qualities, activities, names and births. Not even the greatest sages enumerating My births and activities that take place in respect of the three aspects of time [past, present, future], oh King, can reach the end [compare 8.5: 6 and 8.23: 29]. 9-4 Nonetheless oh friend, just listen to what I have to tell you about My current birth. In the past I was beseeched by Lord Brahma [see 3.9 and also 10.14] to secure the dharma and destroy the demons who constituted a burden to the earth. Thus I descended into the Yadu dynasty in the home of Vasudeva and because of that fact the people call Me Vasudeva, the son of Vasudeva. I killed Kalanemi [see 10.8: 56] as also Kamsa [10.44], Pralamba [10.18] and others who were hateful with the virtuous souls. This Yavana, oh King, was burned by your scorching glance. I, the one person caring for the devotees, approached this cave for the sake of favoring you, for in the past you have often prayed for it. Tell Me what blessing you want from Me, oh saintly King. I will fulfill all your wishes. Any person who has satisfied Me, will never again need to lament.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Thus being addressed Mucukunda bowed down to Him and spoke. Knowing He was Narayana, the [original] Godhead, he filled with joy remembered the words of Garga []. Shri Mucukunda said: 'Man being cheated by Your bewildering potency maya oh Lord, is not of worship for You. Not understanding the true purpose of life he - whether he is male or female - seeking his happiness gets entangled in household affairs that make him unhappy. The person who somehow or other in this world attains the rarely obtained, highly evolved human form of life and not an idle [animal] form oh sinless one, will, with an impure mind, not be of worship and like an animal be fallen in the blind well of his home. Oh Unconquerable One, I thus have wasted my time with building a kingdom and acquiring opulence, which now is all gone. Intoxicated like an earthly ruler who mistakes his mortal frame for himself, I suffered endless anxieties because of having gotten attached to children, wives, riches and land. Minding this body, which is a confinement like a pot or a wall, I thus thought myself to be a god among man. Surrounded by chariots, elephants, horses, infantry and generals I traveled around on this earth, but, in my great pride, I never seriously regarded You. Forgetful about what needs to be done, hankering for sense objects and endlessly ruminating with an ever growing greed, one is suddenly placed before You, who are as attentive as a hungry snake licking its fangs to kill a mouse. The same vehicle of time, the body that first was called 'the king' riding in chariots furnished with gold or on fierce elephants, is unavoidably in the course of time named 'feces', 'worms' and 'ashes' [see also 16.4: 2-6]. Full circle having conquered the directions, without further conflicts, being seated on a throne and praised by rulers alike, the person in his home is led about like a pet animal while deriving his happiness from intercourse with women oh Lord. Reaching in that situation for more than another possesses he, by strictly avoiding pleasures, performs his duties with penance, but thinking of himself as 'I am mightier, I am my own master' he, whose urges are so pronounced, cannot attain happiness. When the wandering person reaches the end of his material existence, he, oh Infalible One, will find the association of those who are good and honest [the sat-sanga]. Thereupon the devotion for Him will come about. He who, as the Lord of the Higher [cause] and Lower [effects], is the only object for the pious souls. Oh Lord, I think that with the spontaneous disappearance of my attachment to my kingdom, You have shown me Your mercy. For that is what the saintly rulers of endless stretches of land pray for when they enter the forest in want of their solitude. I do not desire anything else but to be of service at Your feet, for they are to those not desiring a material life the object of desire, the boon that is sought, oh Almighty One. Which faithful man of worship for

You, the Bestower of the Path of Emancipation, oh Lord, would choose as a boon for that which causes his bondage? Therefore oh Lord, entirely putting aside the worldly blessings because of which one is entangled in the modes of passion, ignorance and goodness, I approach You, the Original Person of Pure Knowledge, who free from mundane designations and duality, is transcendental to the modes. Tormented by disturbances I, for a long time, was full of sorrow being distressed in the world. With my six enemies [the senses and the mind] never being satisfied there was no way to find peace oh Bestower of the Shelter. Please oh Lord, protect me who, facing these dangers oh Supreme Soul, has approached Your lotus feet, the truth that is free from sorrow and fear.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'Oh great King, emperor of all, you have a pure and capable mind, for, even though you were tempted to ask for benedictions, you were not spoiled by desires. Please know that I tempted you with benedictions to ascertain whether you are free from bewilderment. The exclusively [to Me devoted] intelligence of the bhaktas is never diverted by material blessings. Those not devoted to Me who occupy themselves with breathing exercises and such, did not diminish their material desires [the vāsanas], oh King, so that one sees that their minds again assert themselves [materially]. Wander this earth at will and may there, with your mind fixed on Me, for you thus always be an uninterrupted devotion unto Me. Following the dharma of the ruling class you have killed living beings when you were hunting and with other actions. That sin you should now uproot completely by fully immersing yourself in penances with Me as your shelter. In your birth following this one oh King, you, becoming a supreme well-wisher to all living beings, will be a fine brahmin and attain Me for certain [see also B.G. 5:29].'

*: Mucukunda, the man asleep, as stated hereafter fought for a long time on behalf of the demigods and finally took as his benediction the right to sleep undisturbed. The parampara by Shriḷa Viś'vanātha Cakravartī quotes the Hari-vams'a that explains he secured the further benediction of being able to destroy anyone who disturbed his sleep. He further elucidates that Mucukunda made this rather morbid request to scare Lord Indra, who, so Mucukunda thought, might otherwise wake him up repeatedly to request his help in fighting Indra's cosmic enemies. Indra's consent to Mucukunda's request is described in the Shri Vishnu Purana as follows: "The demigods declared, 'Whoever awakens you from sleep will suddenly be burnt to ashes by a fire generated from his own body.'"

.: Shriḷa Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī Thākura gives the following lines from an alternate reading of this chapter. These lines are to be inserted between the two halves of this verse:

nidram eva tato vavre sa raja Shrama-karshitah yah kas'cin mama nidraya bhangam kuryad surottamah sa hi bhasmi-bhaved ashu tathoktas' ca surais tada svapam yatam yo madhye tu bodhayet tvam acetanah sa tvaya drishtha-matras tu bhasmi-bhavatu tat-kshanaḥ

"The King, exhausted by his labour, then chose sleep as his benediction. He further stated, 'Oh best of the demigods, may whoever disturbs my sleep immediately be burned to ashes.' The demigods replied, 'So be it,' and told him, 'That insensitive person who wakes you in the middle of your sleep will immediately turn to ashes simply by your seeing him.'"

.: The parampara states: 'Shriḷa Shridhara Svami informs us that Mucukunda was aware of the prediction of the ancient sage Garga that in the twenty-eighth millennium the Supreme Lord would descend. According to Acarya Viś'vanātha, Garga Muni further informed Mucukunda that he would personally see the Lord. Now it was all happening.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 52:

The Lords Leap from a Mountain and Rukmini's Message to Lord Krishna

Shri Shuka said: 'Thus being blessed by Krishna, the descendant of Ikshvaku [Mucukunda] circumambulating Him bowed down and left through the mouth of the cave. Noticing that the human beings, the animals, plants and trees were all in a poor condition [were small], he concluded that the Age [the yuga] of Kali had arrived and went in the northern direction [compare 1.15: 44]. He had faith in the process of penance, was of self-control and free from attachments and doubts. With his mind thus absorbed in Krishna he entered the realm of the mountain Gandhamadana [the nice smell]. Reaching Badarikashrama [see e.g. 3.4: 4, 4.12: 16, 5.4: 5, 7.11: 6], the residence of Nara-Narayana, he who conquering all duality had found peace in his austerity, worshiped the Lord.

The Supreme Lord returned to His city Mathura that was surrounded by the Yavanas, killed the barbarian army and brought their riches to Dvaraka. As Acyuta was engaged in taking the wealth with oxen and men, Jarasandha arrived on the scene leading twenty-three armies. Seeing the mighty waves of soldiers of the enemy armies, the two Madhavas adopting a human course, quickly ran away, oh King. Abandoning the load of riches They, appearing afraid but factually being free from fear, on Their lotus petal feet covered many yojanas. Seeing the Two escape, the mighty ruler of Magadha loudly laughed and pursued the Lords with charioteers and soldiers, not being quite aware of Their special nature. Exhausted from full speed having run a long distance, They climbed a very high mountain known as Pravarsana [the rainy one] where the mighty Lord [Indra] is always showering rains. Knowing that They were hiding on the mountain, but not exactly where, oh King, he [Jarasandha], with firewood set ablaze the mountain on all sides. Quickly leaping down from the eleven yojanas high, everywhere burning mountain, They fell to the ground. Not being seen by Their opponent or his helpers, the two finest Yadus returned to Their city that had the ocean as its moat, oh King. The king of the Magadhas mistakenly thought that Balarama and Keś'ava had burned in the fire, pulled back his huge force and returned to Magadha. As previously stated, the opulent sovereign of Anarta, named Raivata, on the order of Brahma gave Balarama his daughter Raivati in marriage [9.3: 33-36]. 6-1 The Supreme Lord Govinda, oh hero among the Kurus, married with Vaidarbhi [Rukmini] the daughter of Bhisḷmaka, on her own request. She was a plenary portion of the Goddess of Fortune. With force overruling Shalva and the other kings in support of Shishupala, He accomplished this [by stealing her away] before the eyes of all the people, just like the son of Tarkḷsya [Garuda, stole] the nectar from heaven.'

The honourable king said: 'In the manner of a Rakḷshasa [by kidnapping thus], so I heard, the Supreme Lord thus married Rukmini, the daughter of Bhisḷmaka with the charming face. Oh lord, I would like to hear how Krishna, He with His immeasurable potency, stole away His bride and [therewith] defeated such kings as Jarasandha and Shalva. Which intelligent person oh brahmin, can ever get enough of listening to the righteous, enchanting and always new stories [see 10.45: 48] we hear about Krishna which remove the worldly contamination?'

The son of Vyasa said: 'There was a king named Bhisḷmaka, the great ruler of Vidarbha, who had five sons and one daughter with an exceptionally pretty face. Rukmi was the first born son, followed by Rukmaratha, Rukmabahu, Rukḷmaka's and Rukḷmamali. Rukmini was their chaste sister [rukḷma means: 'what is bright or radiant']. Hearing Mukunda's beauty, prowess, character and opulences being sung by those who came to her family home, she deemed Him a suitable husband. Krishna knowing her to be a repository of intelligence, auspicious marks, magnanimity, beauty, good behavior and other qualities, likewise considered her a suitable wife and decided to marry her. But Rukmi, who hated Krishna, prevented this, even though his family wanted to give his sister to Krishna, oh King. He preferred Shishupala. The princess of Vidarbha with her dark eyes, was unhappy with that knowledge. She pained her mind and quickly sent a certain dependable brahmin to Krishna. After arriving in Dvaraka he was ushered in by the gatekeepers and saw the Original Personality sitting on a golden throne. The moment the Lord who is good to the brahmins, saw him, He came down from His throne, seated him and performed worship the same way the residents of heaven worship Him. With him having eaten and rested, He who is the goal of the devotees approached him to personally massage his feet. Patiently He asked him: 'Oh My best one, are the religious activities supported by your first-class, twice-born seniors, proceeding without too much difficulty and are you always happy within? When a brahmin remains satisfied with whatever [comes his way] and does not fail in his religious duty, that will bring him all he desires. Dissatisfied he, even as a master of the enlightened ones, will keep moving from world to world, while he satisfied, even when he possesses nothing, will sleep well with all his limbs [and mind] free from distress. I bow My head again and again to those brahmins who are satisfied with what they get, for they, peaceful and free from false ego, are the best well-wishers of all living beings [see also B.G. 2: 71, 12: 13-14]. Are you faring well as a subject to your king? He in whose kingdom one being protected leads a happy life, is very dear to Me. Where have you come from crossing the [ocean of] troubles and for what purpose have you come here? Please tell Us everything if it is not a secret. What is it that We may do for you?'

After the Supreme One who for the sake of His pastimes assumes His bodies, thus had asked these questions, the brahmin related everything to Him. 'Shri Rukmini told me: 'Oh Most Beautiful One of all the Worlds, I heard about Your qualities. For all who listen and whom You have entered through the openings of their ears, You thus remove the distress of their bodies. To those who have eyes, the sight of Your beauty constitutes the complete fulfillment of their life's purpose. Therefore I have without any shame devoted my mind to You Acyuta! Who oh Mukunda, compares to Your greatness, Your lineage, character, beauty, knowledge, youth, property and influence? Which sober and marriageable girl of a noble birth would, coming of age, not choose You for her husband, oh lion among men, oh You who fills the mind of every member of society with joy? I thus have chosen Your good Self, oh dear Lord, for my husband. I offer myself hereby to You as Your wife Oh Omnipotent One. Please accept me! May the king of Cedi [Shishupala], who like a jackal wants to steal away the portion belonging to the king of the animals, never touch what is allotted to the [real] hero. When I sufficiently have worshiped the Supreme Personality of Godhead, the Lord, by the performance of pious works, with sacrifices, charity, observances and vows, by honouring the gods, the gurus and the brahmins and with other activities, may [Krishna] the elder brother of Gada [9.24: 46] then [please] come and take my hand and not the son of Damaghosa or others like him? Come tomorrow when the marriage takes place, unseen to Vidarbha, oh Invincible One. Fight surrounded by Your officers then to crush the armed resistance of the kings of Caidya and Magadha and next, as the reward for Your valor, marry me in the rakḷshasa style [by taking me with You]. You may wonder how, with me moving within my quarters, You can carry me away without killing my relatives. Let me tell You how: the day before there is a large ceremonial procession outside [the palace] for the presiding deity of the family. In that ceremony the new bride approaches the goddess Gīrijā [Ambika in her temple]. Great souls like [Shiva] the husband of Uma, in order to overcome their own ignorance, long to bathe in the dust of Your lotus feet. When I, oh Lotus-eyed One, cannot obtain Your mercy, I should, being weakened by vows, give up my life to attain You [only] after hundreds of births.' The brahmin ended with: 'This is the confidential message I bring you, oh Lord of the Yadus, please consider what needs to be done right now in this matter.'

Krishna Kidnaps Rukmini

Shri Shuka said: 'When [Krishna] the descendant of Yadu heard the confidential message of the princes of Vidarbha, He took the hand of the messenger into His own and addressed him with a smile. The Supreme Lord said: 'I am in My mind also fixed on her and cannot sleep at night. I know that Rukmi in his enmity is against My marriage with her. I will bring her, that indisputable beauty who deems Me the best, over here and crush in battle that half-breed royalty, the way one ignites a fire from firewood!'

Shri Shuka said: 'Knowing the exact [astronomical] time of Rukmini's marriage, Madhusudana told His charioteer: 'Daruka, get the chariot immediately ready.' He brought the chariot yoked with the horses Shaibya, Sugriva, Meghapuḷsa and Balahaka [*] and stood with folded palms before Him. Shauri mounted His chariot together with the brahmin and [Rukmi] obeyed his control, was about to give his daughter away to Shishupala and saw to it that the required duties were performed. - The city was thoroughly cleansed and its avenues, streets and intersections were abundantly sprinkled with water. It was decorated with banners on flagpoles and with archways. The women and men of the city in their opulent homes aromatic with aguru, arrayed in spotless clothing, wore their jewels, smeared their bodies with fragrant substances and decorated themselves with flowers and other ornaments. He [Bhisḷmaka] saw to it that the forefathers, the demigods and the brahmins were worshiped according to the rules oh King, that they were properly fed and that the auspicious mantras were recited. The bride properly bathed, cleaned her teeth, put on her auspicious marriage necklace as also a brand-new set of clothes and adorned herself with the most excellent jewels. For the protection of the bride, the best among the brahmins recited mantras from the Sama, Rig and Yajur Veda and the priests expert in the Atharva mantras poured oblations of ghee to pacify the ruling planets. The king, very well versed in the vidhi, donated gold, silver, clothing and sesame seeds mixed with raw sugar to the brahmins. King Damaghosa, the lord of Cedi, the same way arranged that the knowers of the mantras for his son [the bridegroom] performed everything that was conducive to his prosperity. He traveled to Kundina [Bhisḷmaka's capital] accompanied by hordes of elephants dripping with mada, golden chariots decorated with garlands and many regiments infantry and cavalry. The master of Vidarbha met him half way to prove his respects and with pleasure settled him in a specially constructed residence. Shalva, Jarasandha, Dantavakra and Viduratha who sided with Shishupala, came together with Paundraḷka and thousands of others. 8-1 Those who were inimical towards Krishna and Rama had decided on the following: 'When Krishna together with Rama and the other Yadus comes to steal Shishupala's bride we, in order to secure her, together will join to fight Him.' All the kings thus had arrived with a complete contingent of troops and vehicles.

When Lord Balarama heard about these preparations of the hostile kings and that Krishna had set off alone to steal the bride, He, fearing a fight, filled with love for His brother swiftly went to Kundina together with a mighty force of elephants, horses, chariots and soldiers on foot. The daughter of Bhismaka with her lovely hips who awaited the arrival of Krishna, did not see the brahmin return and then wondered: 'Alas only three yamas [nine hours] remain before I will marry. How unlucky I am, the Lotus-eyed One does not come and I do not know why, nor has as yet the brahmin carrying my message returned. Perhaps the One Faultless in Mind and Body, in His initial willingness saw something contemptible in me, so that He does not come to take my hand. What a misfortune! The creator is not favorably disposed towards me, nor is the great Lord Shiva... or maybe Devi, his consort [known as] Gauri, Rudrani, Girija or Sati, has turned against me.'

Ruminating this way the young girl, whose mind had been stolen by Krishna, closed her eyes brimming with tears, aware of the time [that was left]. While the bride thus was waiting for Govinda's arrival, oh King, her left thigh, arm and eye twitched, foretelling something desirable. That very moment that purest one among the brahmins following the command of Krishna, saw the divine princes who stayed in the inner chambers of the palace. Noticing his joyful face and the relaxed movements of his body she, as an expert in telling signs, inquired with a pure smile. He told her about the arrival of Yadunandana [the 'Child of the Yadus'] and related the words He had said to assure her that He would marry with her. Realizing that He had come, the mind of Vaidarbhi cleared whereupon she gladdened knew no better answer than to bow down to the dear brahmin. [The king] hearing that Rama and Krishna had arrived eager to witness his daughter's marriage, accompanied by the sounds of instruments came to welcome Them with abundant offerings. He as was prescribed performed worship with desirables like honey-milk [madhuparka] and brought new clothes. Generously arranging for an opulent place to stay he afforded Them, Their soldiers and associates, proper hospitality. Thus he with all that was wanted, according to each his power, age, strength and wealth, was of respect for the kings who had assembled. The residents of Vidarbha-pura hearing that Krishna had arrived, all came to drink in His lotus face with the cupped palms of their eyes [and said]: 'He who has also such a perfect body is the only one who deserves Rukmini as a wife. He is the most suitable husband for princes Bhaismi! May Acyuta the Cause of the Three Worlds, be pleased with whichever of our good deeds and be as merciful to accept the hand of Rukmini.' This is what the citizens bound to their increasing pure love said.

The bride protected by guards left the inner palace and went to the temple of Ambika [see also 10.52: 42]. 0-4 Going there on foot to see the lotus petal feet of Bhavani, she, totally absorbed in meditating on Krishna's lotus feet, kept silent in the midst of her mothers and female companions. She was guarded by the valiant, armed soldiers of the king, and while they stood prepared with their weapons raised, cymbals and mridangas, conch shells, horns and other wind instruments were played. 2-4 The bride was accompanied by the well ornamented wives of the brahmins, thousands of prominent courtesans carrying various items of worship and presents, flowergarlands, fragrances, clothing and jewelry, as also by singers who sang and offered prayers, by musicians and bards and by chroniclers and heralds. Reaching the temple of the goddess she washed her feet and lotus like hands, sipped water for purification and entered, sanctified and peaceful, the place where Ambika resided. The so very young girl was by the elderly wives of the brahmins, who were well acquainted with the injunctions, accompanied in offering her respects to Bhavani who was there together with her consort Lord Bhava [Shiva]. [She prayed:] 'Again and again oh Ambika, I offer you and also your children [Ganes'a and Kartikeya] my obeisances. Please allow Krishna, the Supreme Lord, to be my husband.'

With different offerings of water, fragrant substances, whole grains and incense, gifts of clothing, garlands, necklaces and ornaments and an array of lamps she offered worship, as also did the wives of the brahmins with savories, cakes, prepared betel nut, sacred threads, fruits and sugar cane. The women gave her what remained of the offering as also their blessings, whereupon the bride bowed down to them and to the deity and ate some of the food that was sacrificed. Then she ended her vow of silence and left the temple of Ambika, while she with her hand, beautified by a jeweled ring, held on to a maidservant. 1-5 With her well-formed waist, the earrings that decorated her face, her pure beauty, the gem-studded belt on her hips and her budding breasts, she was just like the illusory potency of the Lord that bewilders even the sober ones [Mayadevi, see also 8.12: 38-40; 10.2]. Seeing her pure smile, her bimba red lips reflected in her jasmine-bud teeth, her gait like a royal swan as she walked her feet that were tinkling and beautified by the effulgence of her finely crafted ankle bells, the assembled and respectable heroes were bewildered and distressed by the lust she generated. With her, on the pretext of the procession, offering her beauty to Lord Krishna, the minds of the kings who saw her broad smiles and shy glances, were stolen and their weapons dropped to the ground as they fainted and fell from their horses, elephants and the chariots on which they were seated. Slowly walking, she put the two whorls of her lotus flower feet one before the other, meanwhile eagerly expecting the arrival of the Supreme Personality. Throwing aside her hair with the nails of her hand she, coyly looking at the kings present, from the corners of her eyes that very moment spotted Acyuta. Right before the eyes of His enemies Krishna then seized the king's daughter who stood prepared to mount His chariot. He lifted her onto His chariot that was marked with [the flag of] Garuda, drove back the circle of kings and slowly left the place with Balarama in front, just like a lion would do removing his prey from the midst of jackals. The adversaries headed by Jarasandha, could in their conceit, with their honour ruined, not bear the defeat: 'We archers are damned with those cowards like a bunch of puny animals stealing the honour of us, the lions!'

*: Shрила Vis'vanatha Cakravarti quotes the following text of the Padma Purana describing Lord Krishna's chariot horses: "Saihya was green like a parrot's wings, Sugriva yellow-gold, Meghapuspa the colour of a cloud, and Balahaka whitish."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 54:

Rukmi's Defeat and Krishna Married

Shri Shuka said: 'And so they all [realizing that they had been robbed], most angrily and in armor, mounted their vehicles and with each surrounded by his own troops, holding their bows, went after Them. When the Yadava army noticed that they were being followed, the officers stopped to face them, oh King and twanged their bows. From the backs of their horses, the shoulders of their elephants and the seats of their chariots, the [enemy] masters of arms released a rain of arrows the way the clouds release their water over the mountains. The moment the slender-waisted girl saw the army of her Lord being covered by heavy rains of arrows, she embarrassed looked at His face with eyes full of fear. The Supreme Lord laughed and said: 'Do not be afraid, oh you with your beautiful eyes, your troops will destroy this enemy force right now.' The heroes Gada [Krishna's younger half-brother], Sankarshana and the others could not tolerate the display of power of the enemy forces and thus they struck their horses, elephants and chariots down with arrows of iron. The heads of those riding the chariots, the horses and the elephants, fell by the thousands to the ground, complete with earrings, helmets and turbans. One could see the heads of horses, donkeys, mules, elephants and camels as also [loose] heads of humans, clubs and bows, hands with swords, hands without fingers, thighs and legs. The kings headed by Jarasandha who eager for the victory saw that their armies were annihilated by the Vrishnis, lost their courage and left. They approached and addressed Shishupala who, with the wife of his choice being stolen away, was dispirited and perturbed with a dried up face that had lost all its colour. [Jarasandha said:] 'Oh Sir, tiger among men, please give up your gloom, for the embodied beings there is no permanence of desirable or undesirable matters. The way a woman that is made of wood dances to the desire of a puppeteer, this world, which is concerned with joy and sorrow, is controlled by the Lord. I myself with twenty-three armies have lost seventeen battles with Shauri [Krishna]. Only one I have won. Nevertheless I never lament or rejoice, for I know that the world is driven by Time and fate combined. Also now we all, leaders of the commanders of heroes, have been defeated by Yadus with a meager entourage who were protected by Krishna. Our enemies, with the time in their favor, have won now, but then again, when our time has come, we will win.'

Shri Shuka said: 'S'ishupala thus persuaded by his friends, went back to his city with his company and so too each of the surviving kings returned to his own place. The mighty Rukmi however, who hated Krishna and could not bear the fact that his sister got married in the rakshasa style, pursued Krishna surrounded by an entire akshauhini. 9-2 Rukmi, mighty armed with his bow and armor, most angrily full of resentment swore to all the kings listening: 'Let me tell you this: I truly will not return to Kundina without having killed Krishna in battle and having retrieved Rukmini.' After having said this he climbed on his chariot and told his charioteer: 'Quickly, drive the horses to the place where Krishna is, there must be a fight between Him and me. Today I, with my sharp arrows, will break the pride of that evil-minded Cowherd who so violently abducted my sister!'

Thus vaunting foolishly he, not realizing what the Lord was all capable of, thereupon with a single chariot came forward and shouted at Krishna: 'Stand still, stop!' Drawing his bow he most firmly struck Krishna with three arrows and said: 'Wait a minute, You corrupter of the Yadu dynasty! Where do You think You are going, having stolen my sister like a crow stealing the sacrificial butter? Today I will put an end to Your false pride, You foolish cheater, You deviant fighter! If You do not want my arrows to kill You, lay off and release the girl!'. But Krishna smiled and struck Rukmi with six arrows that broke his bow. After Krishna had fired eight arrows at his four horses, two at his charioteer and three at his lagpole, he took up another bow and struck Krishna with five arrows. Even though He was struck by all these arrows

Krishna broke his bow again, and when Rukmi picked up yet another one, Acyuta also broke that one. The spiked bludgeon, the trident, the lance, the shield and sword, the pike, the javelin or whatever weapon he took up were all broken by Him, the Lord. He then leaped from his chariot and ran, sword in hand and as furious as a bird in the wind, forward with the intent to kill Krishna. With His arrows Krishna broke the sword and shield of His attacker to pieces and next, ready to kill Rukmi, took up His own sharp sword. When the saintly Rukmini saw that He wanted to kill her brother, she, beset with fear, fell at the feet of her husband and spoke piteously.

Shri Rukmini said: 'Oh Lord of Yoga, oh Inscrutable Soul, oh God of Gods, oh Master of the Universe, oh Auspicious One, please don't kill my brother, oh Mighty-armed One.'

Shri Shuka said: 'As she, with her limbs trembling with fear, her mouth dry of sorrow, her throat choked and her golden necklace disheveled in her agitation, was holding His feet, He desisted out of compassion. He tied him up with a piece of cloth and shaved him, making a mess of him with only little bits of his hair and mustache remaining. Meanwhile the amazing army of the Yadu heroes crushed their opponents the way elephants crush a lotus flower [compare 1.7]. When the Yadu soldiers approached Krishna they found Rukmi in a sorry condition, as good as dead. The almighty Supreme Lord Sankarshana, feeling pity, thereupon released him from his ties and said to Krishna: 'Oh Krishna, what a terribly bad shaving job You have done with his mustache and hair! Disfiguring a family member like this equals to killing him!'

[To Rukmini:] 'Oh saintly lady, please do not be angry with Us for making such a mess of your brother. To the matter of the one who brings happiness and grief no one else can be held accountable but the person in question. A human being after all has to face the consequences of his own actions.'

[And to Krishna again:] 'Even though a relative because of his wrongdoing deserves to be killed, he should not be killed by a relative but rather be banned [from the family]. Why should he who because of his evil deeds ended his own [honourable] life, be killed a second time?'

[To Rukmini:] 'The code of conduct for warriors as established by the founding father [Brahma] is that a brother must not even hesitate to kill his own brother. And that indeed is something most dreadful.'

[Back to Krishna again:] 'Blinded as they are in their infatuation about the wealth, those who are proud of a kingdom, land, riches, women, honour, power or something else [other than the soul], do therefore commit offenses.'

[And to Rukmini again:] 'In this attitude of you toward all living beings, of always wishing evil to foes and wishing good to friends [and family], you are just as partial as an ignorant person. Because of the Lord's illusory power the people are bewildered about the Real Self [the soul]. [In maya] taking the body for their self, they speak in terms of having a friend, an enemy or someone neutral. Being bewildered one perceives the One and Only Supreme Soul of Every Inanimate and Animate Being as many, just like seeing different luminaries [in stead of one radiating fire] or considering the air [as different in case of an enclosed space, see also B.G. 18: 20-21 and 1.2: 32]. The physical body having a beginning and an end is composed of the physical elements, the senses and the modes of nature. In a state of ignorance it is something [that through conditioning is] imposed upon the soul and produces [the experience of] the cycle of birth and death. For the soul [who knows though] there is no oneness with or separation from anything material in the manifest world, oh chaste one, since matter is caused and arranged by the soul. It is like the witnessing and the form witnessed with the sun [that cannot separate from or unite with the manifest world]. Being born and such are but transformations of the body and not of the soul, just as the lunar phases do not imply that the moon has died on the day of a new moon [see B.G. 2: 20]. An unintelligent person undergoes his material existence the way a sleeping person for the purpose of the unreality [of a dream] experiences himself, the objects of his senses and the results of his actions [see also 6.16: 55-56]. Oh you with the pristine smile, please be therefore yourself again [as the goddess of fortune] and dispel, with the knowledge of the essence, the sadness born from ignorance that drained and confused you.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Slender-waisted Rukmini thus being enlightened by the Supreme Lord Balarama, gave up her resignation and with intelligence regained her composure. Left with only his life air, expelled by his enemies and deprived of his strength and luster, he [Rukmi] had to think constantly of the way he had been mishapen. Frustrated in his personal desires he then built a residence, a city named Bhojakatha [having experienced the vow']. Because he had said: 'I will not return to Kundina without having killed the evil-minded Krishna and having brought back my sister', he in his anger resided at that very spot [where he was humiliated]. The Supreme Lord, thus defeating the earthly rulers, took the daughter of Bhismaka to His capital and married her according to the vidhi oh protector of the Kurus. To that occasion there was a great rejoicing among the citizens in each and every home of the Yadu city, oh King, where no one else but Krishna, the leader of the Yadus, was the great love. The men and women filled with joy, with shining jewels and earrings, respectfully presented wedding gifts to the celebrated couple that was exquisitely dressed. The city of the Vrishnis appeared beautifully with the festive columns that were erected, the variety of flower garlands, the banners, the gems, the arches and at every doorway an arrangement of auspicious items as pots full of water, aguru incense and lamps. Its streets were sprinkled and the entrances were beautified with plantain and betel nut stems that were placed by elephants dripping with mada belonging to the popular personalities who were invited. The members of the Kuru, Srinjaya, Kaikeya, Vidarbha, Yadu and Kunti families enjoyed the occasion of being together in the midst of the people who excitedly ran about. When they heard about the kidnapping of Rukmini that was being sung all around, the kings and their daughters were greatly impressed. Oh King, all the citizens in Dvaraka were overjoyed to see Krishna, the Master of All Opulence joined in marriage with Rukmini, the goddess of fortune.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 55:

The History of Pradyumna

Shri Shuka said: 'Cupid [Kamadeva], an expansion of Vasudeva who previously got burned by the anger of Rudra, had returned to Him in order to obtain a body again [see also 3.1: 28 and 8.10: 32-34 and B.G. 10: 28]. Born from the seed of Krishna in the daughter of the king of Vidarbha [Rukmini] He was thus known as Pradyumna [the prominently mighty one', see also vyuha]. He was in no respect inferior to His Father. Shambara [the juggler' see 7.2: 4-5, 10.36: 36], who could assume any form he wanted, stole the child away that was not even ten days old yet. Recognizing Him as his enemy, he threw Him in the ocean and returned home. Pradyumna was swallowed by a mighty fish that, together with others being trapped in a huge net, was seized by fishermen. The fishermen presented it to Shambara who sent the gift to the cooks who with a knife cut it open in the kitchen. The child they found in its belly was given to Mayavati who was astonished. From Narada she heard the facts about the child's birth and how it had ended up in the belly of the fish. - She was by Shambara appointed to prepare rice and vegetables, but she in fact was Cupid's famous wife named Rati. She [after pleading with Lord Shiva and being directed to Shambara] was waiting for her burned husband to obtain a new body. Understanding that the infant was Kamadeva, she developed love for the child. He, the son of Krishna, soon attained full youth and became very enchanting to the women who saw Him. o) Dear King, full of love she with a bashful smile, raised eyebrows, glances and gestures of conjugal attraction approached Him, her husband, the most beautiful one in society with His long arms and eyes the size of a lotus petal. The Lord in the form of Krishna's own son said to her: 'Oh mother, you in your attitude acting differently like a girlfriend, therewith overstep the [standards for the] mood of motherly affection.'

Rati replied: 'You are the son of Narayana in Shambara stolen from Your home and I am Your legitimate wife Rati, oh Cupid my master! Not yet being ten days old You were by that demon Shambara thrown into the ocean, where a fish devoured You from the belly of which we received You here, oh master! Please put an end to that hard to approach and difficult to conquer enemy of Yours who knows hundreds of magic spells. This You can realise with the help of bewildering magic and such! Your mother with her son gone is distressed like a cow missing her calf. Overwhelmed with love for her child she is pitifully crying like an osprey.'

Speaking thus Mayavati gave the great soul Pradyumna the mystic knowledge called Mahamaya [the great bewildering potency] that puts an end to all magic spells. Thereupon He approached Shambara to call him to battle. He reviled him with intolerable insults and thus provoked a fight. Offended by the harsh words he, with eyes red as copper, infuriated like a snake being struck by a foot, came forward holding a mace. Whirling his club swiftly, he threw it at the Great Soul Pradyumna, producing a sound as sharp as a stroke of lightning. The weapon was in its flight by Lord Pradyumna knocked away with His club oh King. Gotten angry He thereupon hurled His club at the enemy. The demon resorted to the daitya magic he had learned from Maya Danava and released, moving through the sky, a downpour of weapons over the son of Krishna [compare 3.19: 20]. Harassed by the rain of weapons the powerful warrior, the son of Rukmini, implemented the great charm that, rooting in goodness, supersedes all magic. The demon then used hundreds of weapons belonging to Kuvera's guardians [Guhyakas], the heavenly singers [Gandharvas], the ogres [Pis'acas], the celestial snakes [Uragas] and the man-eaters [Rakshasas], but the son of Krishna stroke them all down. Drawing His sharp-edged sword He with one violent blow severed Shambara's head, complete with helmet, earrings and his red mustache, from his body. As the gods full of praise from above rained flowers upon Him, He was by His wife who traveled the sky, through the air brought to the city [of Dvaraka]. Together with His wife He, like a cloud with lightning, from the sky entered the inner spaces of the most exquisite palace, oh King, that was crowded with hundreds of women. 7-2 When they saw Him, dark as a cloud, dressed in yellow silk, with long arms, reddish eyes, a pleasing smile, His charming countenance, His nicely decorated lotus like face and His bluish-black curling locks, the women, who thought He was Krishna, bashfully hid themselves here and there. Gradually the ladies noticed slight differences in His appearance, whereupon they delighted and most surprised approached Him and [Rati,] that jewel among women. When the sweet-voiced and dark-eyed Rukmini saw Him, she remembered her lost son and her breasts got wet out of affection.

[She thought:] 'Who would this gem among men be, whose son is He, what lotus-eyed woman has carried Him in her womb and what is more, who is this woman won by Him? If the son I lost who was taken from the maternity room were alive somewhere, He would be of the same age and appearance! How can He have the same physical appearance, have the same gait, limbs, voice, smile and glance as the Wielder of the Sharnga [Krishna's bow]? Considering my great affection for Him and the trembling in my left arm, He no doubt for sure is - He must be - the child I carried in my womb!'

While the daughter of the king of Vaidarbha thus was conjecturing, the Lord Haired in the Scriptures arrived there together with Devaki and Anakadundubhi. Even though the Supreme Lord knew all about the matter He, Janardana, remained silent. It was Narada who told the whole story, beginning with the kidnapping by Shambara. When the women of Krishna's residence heard about that great miracle they cheered in ecstasy to welcome Him who had been lost for so many years, as if someone had returned from death. Devaki, Vasudeva, Krishna, Balarama and also the women [of the palace] and Rukmini embraced the couple and rejoiced. Hearing that Pradyumna who had been lost had returned, the residents of Dvaraka declared: 'Oh, by providence the child we thought dead has come back!'

It was not that surprising that they, who constantly thought of the resemblance with His father their master, in the full of their attraction as His mothers backed off out of respect for Him. When they acted that way when He appeared before their eyes as the spitting image of the form of the Shelter of the Goddess of Fortune, as Cupid the God of Love in person, what would one expect then of [the feelings of] other women?'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 56:

How the Syamantaka jewel Brought Krishna Jambavati and Satyabhama

Shri Shuka said: 'Satrajit [always victorious', see 9.24: 13] who had offended Lord Krishna, did his best for Him and gave Him his daughter and the jewel Syamantaka.'

The honourable king said: 'What offense committed Satrajit against Krishna, oh brahmin? Where did the Syamantaka come from and why gave he his daughter to the Lord?'

Shri Shuka said: 'Satrajit was a devotee of the sun god. The godhead was very satisfied with him and gave him, his best friend, out of affection the jewel called Syamantaka. He, who wore the jewel that shone as brilliant as the sun around his neck, was upon his arrival in Dvaraka, because of its effulgence not recognised, oh King. The people blinded by the glare thought, when they saw him from a distance, that he was Surya and reported that to the Supreme Lord who was engaged in a game of dice. 'Oh Narayana, our obeisances unto You oh Holder of the Conch, Disc and Club, oh Damodara, oh Lotus-eyed One, oh Govinda, oh son of the Yadus! Savita [the radiant one]', he who with the intense radiation of his glowing disc robe the people of their vision, has arrived to see You, oh Lord of the Universe. Knowing that You at the moment are hiding among the Yadus, the leaders of the demigods in the three worlds are eagerly looking for You. And now the one unborn [Surya], has come to see You, oh Master.'

Shri Shuka said: 'When He with the lotus-eyes heard these innocent words He said with a smile: 'This person is not Ravidave, it is Satrajit who glows because of his jewel.'

Arriving at his opulent home Satrajit festively executed auspicious rituals in the temple room where he with the help of scholars installed the jewel. Day after day that brought him eight bharas [of about 9.7 kg] of gold, oh prabhu, and nothing inauspicious like food scarcity, a premature death, catastrophes, snakebites, mental and physical disorders and cheaters, occurred there in the presence of the correctly worshiped gem. Once Shauri [Krishna] on behalf of the king of the Yadus [Ugrasena] asked for the gem, but Satrajit, greedy for the wealth, considered it no offense not to hand it over.

Prasena [Satrajit's brother] one day hung the intensely radiating jewel around his neck, mounted a horse and went hunting in the forest. A lion killed Prasena and his horse and took the jewel into a cave, where he in his turn was killed by Jambavan [he from the Jambu-trees' the king of the bears] who wanted the jewel. In the cave he gave the jewel to his offspring as a toy to play with. Satrajit meanwhile not seeing his brother, got deeply troubled. He said: 'My brother who disappeared in the forest wearing the jewel around his neck, is probably killed by Krishna.' The people hearing this whispered it in each other's ears. When the Supreme Lord heard about this He, in order to exonerate Himself from the imputation, together with some citizens followed the path that Prasena had taken. In the forest they discovered that he and his horse were killed by a lion and that, further up on a hillside, the lion in his turn had been killed by Riksha [Jambavan]. The Supreme Lord positioned His men outside the terrifying cave of the king of the rikshas [the bears] and then entered the pitch-dark place alone. When He saw that that most precious of all jewels was used as a child's toy, He decided to take it away and approached the child. Seeing the stranger the nurse cried in fear so that Jambavan, that strongest of the strong hearing it, infuriated came running. Not aware of whom he was dealing with, he took Him for a worldly person and angrily fought against Him, the Supreme Lord, his own Master [compare 5.6: 10-11 and B.G. 16: 18]. A most furious fight ensued between the two, who each tried to win with the help of stones, trees, their arms and with weapons, as if they were two hawks fighting over some meat. They continued the fight day and night without interruption for twenty-eight days, with fists against fists dealing blows as hard as lightning. Jambavan with the muscles of his huge body pummeled by the blows of Krishna's fists, perspired all over and exhausted addressed Him in great amazement: 'I know You, You are the life air, the physical and mental strength of all living beings, Lord Vishnu, the Primeval Personality, the All-powerful Supreme Controller. You are the Eternal Creator of All Creators and Created Ones of the Universe, the Subduer of the subduers, the Lord, the Supreme Soul of all Souls [compare 3.25: 41-42]. You are the One because of whose commanding glances, manifesting a slight anger, the crocodiles and whale-eaters [timgilas] became agitated and the ocean was directed to give way. You are the One to whose glory a bridge was built and by whose arrows the heads of the Rakshasha [Ravana] were severed and fell to the ground [see 9: 10].'

9-3 Oh King, Acyuta, the lotus-eyed Supreme Lord, the son of Devaki, then, from His great compassion for His devotees, addressed the king of the bears who had understood the truth. He touched him with the hand that bestows all blessings and said with a voice as deep as the [rumbling] clouds: 'Oh lord of the bears, We came here to this cave because of the jewel. I want to disprove the false accusation that is held against Me with this jewel.' Thus being addressed he [Jambavan] happily presented to Krishna, as a respectful offering, his maiden daughter Jambavati together with the jewel.

When His people did not see Shauri coming out who had entered the cave, they, after waiting for twelve days, most unhappily returned to their city. Devaki, Rukmini devi, Vasudeva and all His friends and relatives lamented after they heard that Krishna had not reappeared from the cave. The residents of Dvaraka full of sorrow cursed Satrajit and then worshiped Candrabhaga [the 'fortune of the moon'], Durga, in order to retrieve Krishna. After having worshiped the goddess she thereupon granted them the benediction. To their great jubilation the Lord who had achieved His purpose then directly appeared together with His [new] wife. Greatly aroused on finding out that Hrishikes'a had come with a wife and the jewel around His neck, they all rejoiced as if someone had risen from death. Satrajit, summoned by the Supreme Lord to the royal assembly, was in the presence of the king informed that the jewel had been recovered which then was presented to him. Most ashamed he with his head down, accepted the gem and went home, leaving full of remorse about his sinful behavior. 0-4 Pondering over his offense [of having kept it for himself and having accused Krishna] he, apprehensive about a conflict with the ones in power thought: 'How will I cleanse myself of the contamination and how can I satisfy Acyuta? What good should I do so that the people will not curse me for being narrow-minded, petty, befooled and avaricious after the wealth? I will give Krishna the [Syamantaka]-jewel and also my daughter, that jewel among women. That is the way to make it up with Him and nothing else!'

Thus intelligently having taken a decision Satrajit set himself to it and presented his fair daughter and the jewel to Krishna. Satyabhama, who was sought by many men for her qualities of a fine character, her beauty and the magnanimity she was blessed with, married the Lord according to the customs. The Supreme Lord said: 'We do not wish to have the jewel back, oh King. You are devoted to the godhead [Surya], let it be yours so that We may also be the enjoyers of its fruits.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 57:

Satrajit Murdered, the Jewel Stolen and Returned Again

The son of Vyasa said: 'When Krishna heard [the rumor] that the sons of Pandu and queen Kunti had burned to death [in the house of lac], He who exactly knew what had transpired, together with Balarama went to the Kuru kingdom for His family obligations. Meeting Bhisma, Kripa, Vidura, Gandhari and Drona They equally sorrowful said: 'Ah how painful this is!'

[Meanwhile in Krishna's absence in Dvaraka] Akrura and [the Bhoja] Kritavarma saw an opportunity and said to Shatadhanva [hundredbow, a bad character]: 'Why not take the jewel? He [Satrajit] promised us his gem of a daughter, but ignoring us he gave her to Krishna. Why then should Satrajit not follow his brother [in death, see 10.56: 13 and *]?' Thus influenced by the two that most wicked man, in his sinfulness shortening his lifespan, killed out of greed Satrajit while he was sleeping [compare 1.17: 39]. As the women [in Satrajit's residence] helplessly cried calling for help after he had killed him like a butcher kills animals, he took the jewel and disappeared.

When Satyabhama saw that her father had been killed, she thrown in grief lamented: 'Oh father, alas oh father, with you being killed I am killed!' and then she fainted. Putting the corpse in a large vessel of oil she went to Hastinapura to Krishna who [already] knew of the situation, and related sorrowfully the murder of her father. The Lords hearing that, oh King, imitating the human ways both lamented with eyes full of tears: 'Oh what a tragedy fell upon us!'

The Supreme Lord then went back to His capital with His wife and elder brother, prepared to kill Shatadhanva and take the jewel from him. When he heard about it, he in fear took action to save his life and asked Kritavarma for assistance. But he told him: 2-1 'I cannot commit such an offense against the Lords Rama and Krishna. How can anyone who causes Them trouble find happiness? Kamsa and his followers lost their wealth and lives because they hated Them and Jarasandha lost after seventeen battles [even] his chariot!'

Turned down by him, he next begged Akrura for help. But he said likewise: 'Who, knowing the strength of the Lordships, can oppose Them? 5-1 He who maintains, creates and destroys this universe as a pastime. He whose purpose is not even known to the secondary creators [headed by Brahma] who are bewildered by His invincible [māya] potency, He who playing as a child of seven years old uprooted a mountain that He held up with a single hand like a boy holds a mushroom [see 10.25], Him, Krishna the Supreme Lord to whose wondrous acts there is no end, I worship. I offer my obeisances to Him who, as the source of all existence, is the Supreme Soul, the immovable centre.'

Shatadhanva also being rejected by him, left the precious jewel with him, mounted a horse that could cover a hundred yojanas and took off. Krishna and Rama mounted the chariot with the emblem of Garuda and pursued the murderer of Their respected senior with the fastest horses, oh King. In a park in a suburb of Mithila Shatadhanva's horse collapsed. He abandoned it and continued on foot in terror, with a furious Krishna after him who also ran. With him on the run the Lord, on foot, severed with His sharp edged disc, his head from his body and then searched his upper and lower garments for the gem. Not finding the stone, Krishna went near His elder brother and said: 'Satadhanva was killed in vain, he did not carry the jewel.'

Balarama then said: 'Satadhanva must have left the rock with some person, therefore go [back] to the city [of Dvaraka] and search for him. I myself wish to pay a visit to the king of Videha [the later Janaka, see 9.10: 11] who is most dear to me.' Having said this the descendant of Yadu oh King, entered Mithila [the capital of Videha]. Seeing Him, the king of Mithila immediately, with a mind full of love, rose to his feet and honoured Him who was so worshipable with all available means, as was prescribed. He, the Mighty One, honoured by the affectionate great soul Janaka, lived there in Mithila for several years. During that time He taught Duryodhana to wield the club.

When Kes'ava the Almighty Lord arrived in Dvaraka, He, to comfort His beloved [the grieving Satyabhama], told her about the demise of Shatadhanva and the failure to get hold of the jewel. He, the Supreme Lord, together with all friends then saw to it that the necessary ritual duties for the funeral of the deceased relative [Satrajit] were performed. As soon as the ones responsible, Akrura and Kritavarma, heard that Shatadhanva had been killed, they out of fear went into exile, somewhere outside of Dvaraka. With Akrura in exile ill omens arose for the residents of Dvaraka. They continually experienced physical and mental troubles and had problems with other living beings and the higher powers [natural disasters included, compare 1.14: 1.17: 19 ]. Some citizens my dear, were thus lost in guesses, forgetting completely what traditionally was said about Him, the refuge of the sages. How can with Him being present any calamity arise? [They said:] 'When Indra withheld the rains, the king of Benares [Kasī], see also 9.17: 4] gave his daughter Gandini to Shvaphalka [Akrura's father, 9.24: 15] who visited him. Thereupon it indeed rained in Kasī. Wherever Akrura stays, his son who has his [father's] prowess, lord Indra will shower rains and no painful disturbances or untimely deaths will be seen.'

Hearing these words of the elders, Janardana, convinced that this [absence of Akrura] was not the only explanation for the omens happening [], ordered that Akrura should be brought back. 5-3 Greeting him with respect and honour and pleasantly discussing topics, He, fully aware of everything that went on in his heart, smiled and said: 'We of course, oh master of charity, are already familiar with the fact that you at present are in the possession of the opulent Syamantaka jewel that Shatadhanva entrusted to you. Since Satrajit had no sons it are his daughter's sons [she and her sons] who should receive his inheritance after having presented water, offerings and having cleared his remaining debts. 8-3 Nevertheless, the jewel should stay with you, because it is for others impossible to manage, oh trustworthy keeper of the vows. My brother however, does not fully believe Me concerning the gem. To bring peace to My relatives, please show it to Us now oh most fortunate soul who with your altars of gold uninterrupted continue with your sacrifices.' Thus won over by the conciliatory words, the son of Shvaphalka took the gem hidden in his garment and handed over the jewel that shone as brilliant as the sun. After showing the Syamantaka jewel to His relatives, [and thus] doing away with the emotions [of the accusations] against Him, the Lord returned it to him. Whoever recites, hears or remembers this narration full of the prowess of the Supreme Controller Vishnu that most auspiciously removes all distress, will attain peace and drive away his sins and bad reputation.'

*: Being pure devotees they could not actually be unhappy about this match, nor could they become jealous rivals of the Lord. Therefore they had an ulterior motive in behaving like His rivals. So there are speculations in the parampara about Akrura being cursed for his taking Krishna away from Gokula [see 10.39] or about Kritavarma being a member of Kamsa's family, or that the two might have been angry with the victim because he spoiled Krishna's good name by slandering that He would have killed his brother.

 : According to Shri Shridhara Svami, reasoning after verse 32 and 35-36, took Akrura the Syamantaka jewel and went to reside in the city of Benares, where he became known as Danapati, "the master of charity." There he executed elaborate fire sacrifices on gold altars with assemblies of qualified priests.

: Also concerning this there are speculations on why there could have been this trouble despite the Lord's gracious presence. Some suggest that Krishna would deliver the bad times because He was compromised by Akrura who took the jewel elsewhere in rivalry with His rule. At the other hand it is not that unusual that murder in a community to the rule of God and Krishna, delivers that community a bad time, as one often sees taking place after major wars as pointed out in the Bhagavatam with its description of the bad times when Krishna after the great Kuru-war Himself departed for His heavenly abode [1.14].

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 58:

Krishna also Weds Kalindi, Mitravinda, Satya, Lakshmana and Bhadra [*]

Shri Shuka said: 'One day the Supreme Personality, the Possessor of all Opulence, went to Indraprastha accompanied by Yuyudhana [Satyaki, His charioteer] and others to visit the sons of Pandu who had surfaced again [after the fire in the house of lac]. When they saw Him, Mukunda, the Lord of the Entire Universe arriving, the heroes all stood up at once, as if He, the master of their senses, their life air, had returned. The heroes who embraced Acyuta found all their sins annihilated by the contact with His body and experienced the joy of beholding His affectionately smiling face. After Krishna first had offered His obeisances at the feet of Yudhishtira and Bhima [because they were older] and firmly had embraced Phalgunā [for Arjuna who was only eight days older], He next respectfully greeted the twin brothers [Nakula and Sahadeva, who were younger], Krishna sitting on an elevated seat was slowly, step by step, shyly approached by the impeccable, newly [to the Pandavas] wed [Draupadi], to offer her obeisances. Satyaki was similarly welcomed, honoured and seated by the sons of Pritha as were also the others who found a seat around Him. He thereupon approached Queen Kunti [His aunt] to offer His obeisances and was by her embraced with eyes wet because of her intense affection [see also 1.8: 18-43]. Inquiring after the welfare of her and her daughter-in-law [Draupadi], she in her turn, as the sister of His father [Vasudeva], inquired in detail after His relatives. With tears in her eyes and with a throat choked up by emotion, she in her love for Him who shows Himself to dispel the distress, remembering the many trials and tribulations, said: 'We only fared better when You oh Krishna, remembering us, Your relatives, protected us by sending my brother [Akrura, see 10.49]. For You, the Well-wisher and Soul of the Universe, there is never the delusion of 'ours' and 'theirs'. Nonetheless do You, situated in the heart, put an end to the sufferings of those who remember [You] continuously [see also B.G. 9: 29].'

Yudhishtira said: 'I do not know what good deeds we, who have but a poor intelligence, have performed to [be allowed to] see You, oh Supreme Controller rarely seen by [even the] masters of yoga.'

Upon the request of the king to stay with them, the Almighty One happily was their guest during the months of the rainy season [see also 10.20] and thus for the eyes of the residents of Indraprastha constituted a source of joy. 3-1 One day [*] Arjuna, the killer of powerful enemies, in armor mounted his chariot with the monkey [or Hanuman] flag, holding his Gandiva [his bow] and taking his two inexhaustible quivers of arrows and entered together with Krishna a large forest filled with many beasts of prey to have a good time there [see also B.G. 1]. There he with his arrows pieced tigers, boars, wild buffalo, rurus [a kind of antelopes], Sharabhas [a kind of deer], gavayas [a kind of oxen], rhinoceroses, black deer, rabbits and porcupines [see also 4.28: 26 and 5.26: 13]. Servants carried the animals to the king [to Yudhishtira] to be sacrificed at a special occasion [otherwise the hunt would have been forbidden, see 9.6: 7-8]. Bibhatsa [the frightening one', Arjuna] fatigued was overcome by thirst and went to the Yamuna. As the two great chariot fighters took a bath and drank from the clear water, the two Krishnas [see B.G. 10: 37] spotted a maiden charming to behold walking there. Sent by his Friend, Phalguna approached the exquisite woman who had fine hips and teeth and an attractive face. He inquired: 'Who are you, to whom do you belong, oh slender-waisted girl, where do you come from and what are your plans? I think you are looking for a husband. Tell me all about it, oh beauty!'

Shri Kalindi said: 'I am the daughter of the demigod Savita [the sun god]. I want Vishnu, the most excellent granter of boons, to be my husband and am engaged in severe penances. I accept no other husband but Him, the Abode of Shri [the goddess]. May He, the Supreme Lord Mukunda, the shelter of the helpless, be satisfied with me. Until I meet Acyuta, I am living in a mansion built by my father in the Yamuna waters and am thus named Kalindi [see also bhajan verse 2 and 10.15: 47-52].' Gudakesa's [thick-haired' Arjuna] related this to Vasudeva who already knew this. He lifted her up on His chariot and drove back with her to king Dharma [Yudhishtira].

Krishna [in the past] at the request of the sons of Pritha, had ordered Vis'vakarma to build a most amazing colourful city for them [Indraprastha]. The Supreme Lord resided there for the pleasure of His devotees. [Before the city was built] He wanted to give the Khandava forest [at Kurukshetra] to Agni and for that purpose [of burning down the forest he] became Arjuna's charioteer. Pleased with that offer oh King, Agni gave to Arjuna a bow and a chariot with white horses, two inexhaustible quivers of arrows and an armor impenetrable to whatever armed opposition. Maya [the demon who was] delivered from the fire presented [out of gratitude] an assembly hall to his friend [Arjuna], in which Duryodhana mistook the water he saw for a solid floor [so that he fell into it, see 10.75]. After He [Krishna] from him [from Arjuna] and his well-wishers received permission to leave, He returned to Dvaraka accompanied by Satyaki and the rest of His entourage [see also 1: 10]. Then He who was so very meritorious married Kalindi on a day when the seasons, the stars and the other luminaries were most favorable for spreading the greatest happiness among His people.

Vindya and Anuvindya, two kings from Avanti [Ujjain] subservient to Duryodhana, forbade their sister [Mitravinda] who was attracted to Krishna, [to choose for Him] during her svayamvara [ceremony for selecting a husband]. Mitravinda, the daughter of Rajadhivehi, His father's sister [9.24: 28-31] oh King, was by Krishna with force abducted before the eyes of the kings [compare 10.53].

From Nagajit the most religious ruler of Kaus'alya [Ayodhya, see 9.10: 32] there was a divine daughter named Satya who was also called Nagajiti, oh King. None of the kings would marry her if he could not defeat seven uncontrollable, vicious bulls that with the sharpest horns could not tolerate the smell of warriors. When the Supreme Lord heard that she was available for the one who defeated the bulls, the Master of the Satvatas, surrounded by a large army went to the Kaus'alya capital. The lord of Kos'ala joyfully rose to his feet [upon His arrival] and seated Him with substantial offerings and such, and he was greeted in return. As soon as the daughter of the king saw that the suitor of her choice had arrived she expressed the wish: 'May He, the Husband of Rama, become my husband! When I have fulfilled my vows, let the fire [of sacrifice] then make my hopes come true. The Goddess of Fortune, the one on the lotus [Brahma] and the master of the mountain [Shiva] hold, together with the various rulers of the world, the dust of His lotus feet on their heads. How can He be pleased by me, that Supreme Lord, He who for His pastime assumes a body with the desire to protect the codes of dharma, the fixed rules that He Himself has instigated every time [He descended]?'

He [Nagnajit] said to the One worshipped further the following: 'Oh Narayana, oh Lord of the Universe, what may I, who am so insignificant, do for You who are filled with the happiness of the Soul?'

Shri Shuka said: 'Oh child of the Kurus, the Supreme Lord being pleased accepted a seat, with a smile spoke to him in a voice as deep as a [rumbling] cloud. The Supreme Lord said: 'Oh ruler of man, for a member of the royal order who follows his dharma, to beg for something is condemned by the learned ones. Nevertheless I beg you for your friendship. This with an eye for your daughter for whom We offer nothing in return though.'

The King said: 'Who else but You, oh Supreme Lordship, would in this world be a desirable groom for my daughter? You, on whose body the Goddess resides and whose side she never leaves, are the only One who possesses the qualities! But in order to secure a [suitable] husband for my daughter oh best of the Satvatas, previously a condition has been set by us to test the prowess of the suitors of my daughter. These seven wild bulls, oh hero, are untamable. A great number of princes broke their limbs being defeated by them. If You manage to subdue them oh descendant of Yadu, You have my permission as the bridegroom for my daughter, oh Husband of Shri.'

Hearing of this condition, the Lord tightened His clothes, divided Himself into seven and subdued the bulls as if it concerned a simple game. Shaurya tied them up with ropes and dragged them, broken in their pride and strength, behind Him like He was a boy playing with a wooden toy. The king was astonished and pleased gave Krishna his suitable daughter. The Supreme Lord, the Master, thereupon accepted her in accord with the Vedic injunctions. The queens [of king Nagnajiti] were exhilarated to attain Krishna as the dear husband of the princess and that led to great festivity. Conch shells, horns and drums resounded together with songs and instrumental music. The twice-born ones pronounced blessings and joyful men and women in their finest dresses adorned themselves with garlands. 0-5 The mighty king gave away ten thousand cows as a wedding gift, including three thousand excellently dressed maidens with golden ornaments around their necks, nine thousand elephants, a hundred times as many chariots with a hundred times as many horses completed by a hundred times as many men. The king of Kosala, placed the couple on a chariot and then, with his heart melting by affection, sent them off surrounded by a large army. The [rival] kings who heard about it could not accept the frustration. In their strength just as broken by the Yadus as they were before by the bulls, they blocked the road along which He was taking His bride. They released volleys of arrows at them, but were, like vermin, driven back by Arjuna, the wielder of the Gandiva who acted like a lion in his desire to please his Friend. The son of Devaki, the Supreme Lord and Chief of the Yadus, having obtained the dowry, arrived in Dvaraka and lived there happily with Satya.

Bhadra was a princess of Kaikeya. She was the daughter of Shrutakirti, a paternal aunt of the Lord. She was by her brothers headed by Santardana [see 9.24: 38] given in marriage to Krishna.

The Lord also married Lakshmana, the daughter of the king of Madra. She was endowed with all good qualities and was by Krishna single-handedly carried away at her svayamvara ceremony, just like the nectar of the demigods once was stolen by Garuda [see also 10.83: 17-39].

After Krishna had killed Bhaumasura [], thousands equally beautiful women who were taken captive by the demon, also became His wives.'

*: In sum Krishna wed 16008 wives: 1: Rukmini, 2 Jambavati, 3 Satyabhama, 4 Kalindi, 5 Mitravinda, 6 Satya (Nagnajiti), 7 Bhadra, 8 Lakshmana, as discussed in 10.83: 17 and the 16000 wives held captive by Bhaumasura.

 A date after the burning of the Khandava forest that is referred to later in verse 25.

Chapter 59: Mura and Bhauma Killed and the Prayers of Bhumi

The honourable king said: 'Please tell me about this adventure of the wielder of the Sharnga [Krishna]. How was Bhaumasura [the demon Naraka], who captured these women, killed by the Supreme Lord?'

Shri Shuka said: 'Bhauma had stolen lord Indra's Varuna parasol, the earrings of his relative [his mother Aditi, see 8.17] as also a certain location [called Mani-parvata] on the mountain of the gods [Mandara hall, see 8.6: 22-23]. Lord Indra then informed Him [Lord Krishna] about what Bhaumasura all had done. Together with His wife [Satyabhama see ] seated on Garuda He thereupon traveled to the city of Pragjyotisha [Bhauma's capital, now Tejpur of Assam], which lay protected surrounded by mountains and weapons, fire, water and wind. The place was fortified by a [mura-pasa] fence consisting of tens of thousands of tough and dreadful wires on all sides. With His club He broke through the rock fortifications, with His arrows He defeated the weapon systems, with His disc He forced a way through the fire, the water and wind defenses and with His sword He likewise got through the fence. Resounding His conch shell He broke the seals [of the fortress] as also the hearts of the brave warriors and with His heavy mace Gadadhara broke through the ramparts. Hearing the vibration of the Lord's Pancajanya that sounded like the thunder at the end of the universe, the five-headed demon Mura rose up who lay asleep in the water [of the moat]. With his trident raised and with an effulgence as terrible as the fire of the sun most difficult to behold, he, as if he with his five mouths would swallow the three worlds, launched his attack the way the son of Tarkshya [Garuda] would attack a snake. Whirling his trident he threw it with all his strength at Garuda with such a tumultuous roar from his five mouths, that the earth, the sky and the outer space in all directions of the egg like shell of the universe reverberated. Lord Krishna then with two arrows broke the trident flying at Garuda in three pieces and next with great force hit his faces with more arrows. The demon furiously hurled his club at Him. That club flying at Him on the battlefield was by Gadagraja [Krishna as the Elder Brother of Gada] broken into thousands of pieces [by His own club]. But when he next with his arms raised rushed forward at Him, the unconquerable One with ease sliced off his heads with His disc. Lifeless he with his heads severed fell into the water, as if Indra with his force had split off a mountain peak. His seven sons, feeling greatly distressed upon their father's death, thereupon angrily moved into action to retaliate.

Incited by Bhaumasura, Tamra, Antariksha, Shrivana, Vibhvasu, Vasu, Nabhasvan and the seventh son Aruna with their weapons stepped forward on the battlefield headed by their general Pithha. In their attack they furiously used swords, clubs, spears, lances and tridents against the Invincible One, but the Supreme Lord of Infallible Prowess with His arrows cut their complete mountain of weapons into tiny pieces. Cutting off their heads, thighs, arms, legs and armor, He sent the ones who were headed by Pithha all to the abode of Yamaraja. Bhauma, the son of mother earth, who saw that his army and leaders succumbed to the arrows and disc of Krishna, could not accept that and marched forward with elephants in rut that were born from the milk ocean. Seeing Lord Krishna with His wife sitting on Garuda like a cloud with lightning sitting above the sun, he released his Shataghni [spiked missile] at Him while at the same time all his soldiers attacked. The Supreme Lord, the Elder Brother of Gada, turned their bodies as also the bodies of the horses and elephants of Bhaumasura's army, with differently feathered sharp arrows into a collection of severed arms, thighs and necks. 7-1 Each of the sharp and shafted weapons that the warriors employed, oh hero of the Kurus, were by Krishna with three arrows at a time cut to pieces. Garuda who carried Him, stroke the elephants with his two large wings and thus defeated them. Harassed by his wings, beak and talons they moved back into the city while Naraka [hell or Bhauma] continued with the battle. Bhauma, annoyed to see his army forced in retreat because of Garuda, struck him with the spear that [once] withstood the thunderbolt [of Indra]. But he was not shaken more by it than an elephant being hit with a flower garland. Bhauma, frustrated in his endeavors, next took up his trident to kill Acyuta, the Infallible One, but before he could even release it, the Lord with the razor-sharp edge of His cakra cut off the head of Naraka as he was sitting on his elephant. That head, complete with its brilliant, shining decorations of earrings and a nice helmet, fell to the ground. [There were exclamations of] 'Alas, alas' and 'Bravo bravo!', while the sages and ruling demigods showered Lord Krishna with flower garlands.

Mother earth thereupon approached Krishna and presented golden earrings glowing with shining jewels and a Vijayanti garland of forest flowers. She gave Him the parasol of Varuna and the Great Gem [the peak of Mandara]. Oh King, the goddess with a mind full of devotion then folded her palms, bowed down and praised the Lord of the Universe who is worshiped by the best of the demigods. Bhumi said: 'I offer You my obeisances, oh God of Gods, oh Lord, oh holder of the conch, the disc and the club who to the desire of Your devotees have assumed Your forms, oh Supreme Soul. Let there be the praise unto You. I worship Him with the lotus-like depression in His belly, my reverence for the One with the garland of lotuses, my respects for He whose glance is as cool as a lotus, my praise unto You who have feet that are like lotuses [as in 1.8: 22]. My obeisances unto You, the Supreme Lord, Vasudeva, Vishnu, the Original Person, the Primeval Seed and the Complete of Knowledge, unto You my salutations. May there be the veneration for You, the Unborn Progenitor, the Unlimited Absolute, the Soul of the higher and lower energies, the Soul of the Creation, the Supersoul! Desiring to create, oh Master, You stand out as being the Unborn One [as Brahma], for the purpose of annihilation You adopt the mode of ignorance [as Shiva] and for the sake of maintenance You are [manifested as] the goodness [as the Vishnu-avatars] of the Universe. [Yet You are] not covered [by these modes], oh Lord of Jagat [the Living Being that is the Universe]. Being Kala [time], Pradhana [the unmanifested state of matter, the primal ether] and Purusha [the Original Person] You nevertheless exist independently thereof. This self of mine [the earth], the water, the fire, the air and the ether, the sense objects, the demigods, the mind, the senses and the doer, the total material energy - in sum everything that moves around or does not move around, constitutes the bewilderment of Supreme Lord [when one supposes that it would exist independently of You]. Everything after all resides within You, the One Without a Second [see also siddhanta]! This son of him [called Bhagadatta, son of Bhauma, Bhumi's grandson] has in his fear approached the lotus feet of You who removes the distress of those who take shelter. Please protect him and place on his head Your lotus hand that eradicates all sins.'

Shri Shuka said: 'The Supreme Lord, with these words being entreated by Bhumi with devotion and humility, took his fear away and entered the residence of Bhauma that was equipped with all conveniences. The Lord found there sixteen thousand [] maidens of the royal order who by Bhaumasura by force were taken away from the kings. When the women saw Him enter, the most excellent of all men, they enchanted chose for Him, who by fate was brought to them, as the husband of their desire. Absorbed in Krishna they thought: 'May providence make that He becomes my husband.' Thus contemplating they, one after the other, all installed Him in their heart. After they were properly washed and clad in spotless clothes, He sent them off in palanquins to Dvaraka together with the enormous treasure of chariots, horses and a great number of other valuables [that was captured]. Kesava also dispatched sixty-four swift white elephants with four tusks from the family of Airavata [Indra's elephant]. 8-3 Thereupon He went to the abode of the king of the gods and gave Aditi her earrings. Then He together with His beloved [Satyabhama] was worshiped by Indra, the head of the thirty [chief] demigods, and the great king's wife. Urged by His own wife He uprooted the [heavenly tree, the] parijata and placed it on Garuda. He defeated the demigods including Indra [who wanted to prevent that] and brought it to His city. All the way from heaven being followed by the bees that were greedy for its sweet fragrance and juice, the tree beautified the garden of Satyabhama's residence after being planted there. [Indra] that great soul among the demigods, had bowed down, touched His feet with the tips of his crown and begged Acyuta to fulfill his desire, but now that he had achieved his purpose [viz. the Lord], he nevertheless started to quarrel with Him [about the parijata]. To hell [those demigods] with their wealth, what an ignorance [see also: 3.3: 5]! The Supreme Lord then properly married with all those women, at the same time living in various residences with them and for that purpose the Imperishable One assumed as many forms [see 10.58: 45, 10.69: 19-45 and B.G. 9: 15; 13: 31]. Happily engaged with the women who were eager to please Him, He who performs the most inconceivable deeds, never left their unequalled and superior palaces. Even though He is perfectly satisfied within, He carried out His duties as a householder and enjoyed life like any other man [see also 1.11: 37-39]. The women shared in an ever-increasing pleasure the always fresh, loving attraction of associating with Him in smiles and glances, intimate talks and bashfulness. Thus having obtained the Husband of Rama they this way managed to attain Him in a manner that is not even available to Brahma and the other gods. Even though they had hundreds of maidservants, they were personally of service to the Lord by approaching Him to offer a seat, be of first-class worship and wash His feet as also to serve Him with betel nut, massages and fanning, fragrances, garlands and dressing His hair, arranging His bed, bathing and presenting gifts.'

*: The acaryas explain that Satyabhama would accompany Krishna to give permission to kill Bhauma despite the promise He once made to Bhumi, the earth-goddess, not to hurt her son Bhauma without her permission. She would also come along to procure the parijata flower tree Krishna had promised her after He brought Rukmini one such flower [see also 10.50: 54 and 3.3: 5]

 As to the number of Krishna's queens there is no absolute agreement. Here is written 16000. The Vishnu Purana V.19 - 9.31 mentions 16100 while even others speak of 16001. Not counting the verse 10.90: 29 which again mentions over 16100 of them, would, reasoning from the Bhagavatam stories only, there be 16008 queens [see also previous footnote *].

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 60:

Lord Krishna Teases Queen Rukmini

The son of Badarayana [of Vyasa] said: 'He, the Spiritual Master of the Universe one day comfortably being positioned on Rukmini's bed was served by her who together with her female companions was fanning Him, her Husband. He, the Unborn Lord, the Supreme Controller who sends forth, protects and devours the universe, now was born among the Yadus to play His game and defend His rule [*], see also 6.3: 19]. - That private part of the palace was brilliantly decorated with strings of pearls and resplendent with a canopy, with lamps made out of jewels and with jasmine flower garlands swarming with humming bees. The light of the spotless moon was filtered through the openings of the lattice windows, the wind carried the fragrance from the grove of parijata trees and thus transported the atmosphere from the garden and the exciting scent of aguru incense oh King was escaping through the window openings. There she served her Husband, the Controller of All Worlds, who was comfortably seated on an excellent pillow on the bed that shone white as milk foam. The goddess took a yak-hair fan with a jeweled handle from the hand of a maidservant and, performing worship, fanned her Master with it. Standing at Krishna's side making sounds with her jeweled ankle bells, she appeared beautifully with her rings, bangles and fan in her hand, with her garment that with its tip concealed her breasts red of the kunkum, with the glow of her necklace and with the priceless belt she wore around her hips. As she pleased smiled with her locks, earrings and jewels around her neck, her bright and happy face and sweet lips, He recognised her as an appearance of the goddess of fortune who, with no other purpose in life, for the sake of His pastime corresponds with bodies befitting the forms that He assumes []. The Lord then spoke.

The Supreme Lord said: 'Oh princess you were desired by kings, rulers of the world of beauty, strength and generosity who were abundantly endowed with great powers, influence and opulence. Rejecting suitors at your disposition like Shishupala and others who, mad because of Cupid were offered to you by your brother and father, I wonder why you have chosen for Us, so different from them. In fear of the kings oh lovely-browed one, and having moved to the ocean for shelter [to Dvaraka], We were of enmity with the ones in power and have well-nigh relinquished the throne. Oh beautiful eyebrows, women concerned with men whose behavior is uncertain, usually have to suffer. They follow a path that is not acceptable to normal society. We with no possessions are dear to those people who have nothing themselves and therefore we as a rule are not very popular among the rich who rarely pay Me any respect, oh fine-waisted lady. Marriage and friendship is there between two people equal in property, birth, influence, physique and prospects and never between a superior and an inferior [in this!]. Oh princess of Vidarbha, you could not foresee this, you did not know when you chose for Us who miss the good qualities, We who are praised by beggars out of their mind! Now, please accept for yourself a husband that is suitable, a first class noble capable of fulfilling all your wishes in this life and the next. Shishupala, Shalva, Jarasandha, Dantavakra and other kings all hate Me, oh you with your beautiful legs, and so does your elder brother Rukmi. I took you with Me oh good one, in order to dispel the pride and arrogance of those who are blinded by the intoxication of their power. We wanted to restrain the power of the wicked ones [see also B.G. 4: 7]. Indifferent about a home and a body We do not really care about wives, children and wealth; free from any endeavoring We remain completely satisfied within Ourselves, just like a light doing nothing more.'

Shri Shuka said: 'After the Supreme Lord had said this as the destroyer of the pride of she who as His beloved one thought herself inseparable, He stopped. From the Master of the Lords of the Three worlds, her own Beloved, she, the goddess, had never before heard such an unpleasant thing. With fear growing in her heart she, trembling with a terrible anxiety, then began to sob [see Shri Shri Shikshashthaka verse 6 & 7]. With her most delicate foot that glowed red of her nails, she scratched the earth and, while she with her tears smeared the makeup of her eyes and sprinkled the red kunkuma powder on her breasts, she froze, face downward, with her speech checked by her extreme sorrow. Because of her great grief, fear and anguish not thinking clearly anymore, her bangles slipped and her fan fell from her hand. With her mind disrupted she suddenly swooned. Her body fell to the ground with her hair scattered, like she was a plantain tree blown down by the wind [see rasa]. The moment He, not being understood by her, saw what the full import of His joking meant to the bond of divine love with His beloved, the Supreme Lord, merciful Krishna, felt sorry for her. He quickly got down from the bed and picked her up with His four arms. Gathering her hair, He wiped her face with His lotus hand. 7-2 Wiping her tear-filled eyes and smeared breasts, oh King, He put His arm around her who, chaste as she was, had no other object of desire. The Master, the Expert in Pacification, compassionately consoled her who so pitifully was confused by His clever joking. [Being motivated] for the Goal of All Pure Souls she did not deserve this. The Supreme Lord said: 'Oh Vaidarbhi, do not be unhappy with Me, I know you are fully dedicated to Me My dearest. I acted in jest to hear what you would say. This is how I wanted to see the face of love: with lips trembling in agitation, glances cast from the corners of reddish eyes and beautiful eyebrows knit together. To spend time joking with one's beloved is indeed for a mundane householder the greatest achievement in family life, oh timid one of temperament.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Vaidarbhi oh King, thus completely pacified by the Supreme Lord, understood that His words had been playful and gave up her fear of being rejected by her Beloved. Bashfully, with a charming smile looking the Supreme Lord in the face, she oh descendant of Bharata, with affectionate glances addressed the Best of All Men. Shri Rukmini said: 'Well, so be it, it is as You said oh Lotus-eyed One. I am different from You who are the Supreme Lord. Who am I compared to the Almighty One who takes pleasure in His own glory? Who am I compared to the Controller, the Supreme Lord of the Three [principal deities]. What now would be my position as someone whose feet are held by fools because of her material qualities? It is true, You, oh Urukrama [Lord of the Greater Order], laid Yourself down in the ocean as if You would be afraid of the modes. You always in the pure awareness of the Supreme Soul, battle against the badness of the material senses and, with Your servants, have rejected the position of a king because it means blind ignorance [see also Shri Shri Shadgosvami-ashtaka verse 4 and Shri Shri Shikshashthaka verse 4]. For sages who relish the honey of Your lotus like feet, Your path is not that apparent, while it is even impossible to comprehend for animals in a human form [materialists]. For, as uncommon as the activities of You, the Supreme Controller are, oh All-powerful One, just as unusual are the actions of those who follow You. You are without possessions, for beyond You there is nothing to be found. To You even enjoyers of offerings like Brahma and others carry offerings. Materially satisfied persons who are blinded by their status, do not know You as their death, but You are most dear to the great enjoyers, just as they are dear to You [see also 1.7: 10]. You are the ultimate goal comprising all the goals of human life, You are the very Self longing for whom intelligent persons discard everything. They are the ones who delight in Your association oh Omnipotent One, and not the man and woman who in their mutual attraction [their lust] experience pleasure and pain. You are the Supreme Soul of all the Worlds who gives Himself away and about whose prowess the sages speak who gave up their staff [for wandering around, becoming Paramahansas, see 5.1*]. You were for that reason chosen by me in rejection of those masters of heaven - the one born on the lotus [Brahma] and the one ruling existence [Shiva]. What would my interest be in others whose aspirations are destroyed by the force of Time that is generated by Your eyebrows? How foolish were the words You used saying that You have taken shelter in the ocean out of fear, oh Gadagraja, oh You who by twanging Your Sharna drove back the kings when You abducted me, Your deserved tribute, the way a lion snatches his share away from the animals [see also jalpa 10.47: 12-21]. The kings Anga [father of Vena, 4.13: 47], Vainya [Prithu, 4.23], Jayanta [Bharata, 6.7: 11], Nahusha [Yayati, 9.19], Gaya [15.15: 6-7] and others, for want of You have abandoned their crown, their absolute sovereignty over their kingdoms and entered the forest, oh Lotus-eyed One. Would they, being fixed on Your path, have suffered in this world [see text 13]? Which woman would take shelter of another man, once she has smelled the feet of the saints described aroma of Your lotus feet, the feet where Lakshmi resides and that for all people bestow liberation? Which mortal woman with the insight to ascertain what's best for her, would not take You seriously as the Abode of All Qualities, and would chose for someone who is always of great fear [because of his false ego]? I have chosen for Him, Yourself, the Ultimate Master and Supreme Soul of All Worlds, as the one suitable to fulfill my desires in this life and the next [see last verse Shri Shri Shikshashthaka]. May there for me, who wandered on different paths [or in births], be the shelter of Your feet that, when they approach their worshiper, award with liberation from all falsehood. Leave the kings You mentioned [in verse 10] oh Acyuta, to the mercy of those women in whose homes they are like asses, oxen, dogs, cats and slaves, because these women never put their ears close to the core that You as the plague of Your enemies are, oh You who are sung and discussed in the scholarly assemblies of Mrida ['the gracious one' or Shiva] and Virinca ['the pure one beyond passion' or Brahma]. The woman who is not smelling the honey of Your lotus feet, is of a totally bewildered notion. She worships as her partner a living corpse containing flesh, bones, blood, worms, stool, mucus, bile and air, that is covered by skin, whiskers, bodily hair, nails and head hair. Oh Lotus-eyed One, let there be my love for the feet of You who take more pleasure in the True Self than in me. The very moment You in order to expand this universe assume a predominance of passion and glance upon Me [as prakriti], You show us the greatest mercy [see also 10.53: 2]. I think Your words are not entirely untrue, oh Killer of Madhu, an unmarried girl once in a while may feel attracted [to another man], like it happened to Amba [daughter of the king of Kas' who was attracted to Shalva, see Mahabharata and note 9.22: 20*]. Even being married the mind of a promiscuous woman is attracted to yet another man. When one is intelligent one should not keep such an unfaithful woman, for when one stays attached to her, one will have fallen in both [this and the next life, see also 9.14: 36].'

The Supreme Lord said: 'All that you replied is correct. What I have said fooling you, oh princess, I did because I wanted to hear you speak about this, oh virtuous lady! Oh fair lady, you can always count on whatever benedictions you desire from Me in order to be freed from the lust, oh gracious one, oh You who are exclusively devoted to Me. Oh sinless one, I have understood your pure love and adherence to your husband in vows, for being disturbed by My words, your mind attached to Me, could not be diverted. They who with lust in their hearts fall for civil status and worship Me with penances and adherence to vows, are bewildered by the illusory energy of Me, the Controller of the Final Beatitude

[see also B.G. 2:42-44]. Oh sweetheart, unfortunate are they who having achieved Me, the Master of both Emancipation and Riches, only desire material benefits. These are even available for persons living in hell and therefore is for those who are obsessed with sense gratification, hell the most suitable place [see also 3.32, and 7.5: 32]. Fortunately, oh mistress of the house, you constantly rendered the faithful service to Me that grants liberation from material existence. That service is most difficult for mischievous characters, especially women with bad intentions, who only care for their own life breath and derive pleasure from breaking off [relations]. Oh respectful one, in my palaces I can find no wife as loving as you are, you who at the time of her marriage disregarded the kings who had arrived; you who, having heard the stories about My truth, sent a brahmin carrier to Me with a confidential message. When your brother who was defeated in battle and disfigured [10.54], on the day of the marriage ceremony [of Aniruddha, her grandson, see next chapter] got killed during a gambling match, you suffered unbearable grief, but afraid to be separated from Us, you did not say a word and that is how You conquered Us. When I did not show up after you sent a messenger with the most confidential bidding to obtain My person, you considered this world all empty and wanted to give up this body that would not be of anyone else's service [see 10.53: 22-25]. May you always be that way [of fortitude] and may We always rejoice in it.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Thus in intimate conversations following the course of the human world, the Supreme Lord and Ruler of the Universe, took pleasure in enjoying Himself with Rama. In the residences of the other queens He, the Almighty Lord and Spiritual Master of All the Worlds, behaved similarly like a householder and carried out the duties of a family man.'

*: The Sanskrit word used here is setu: it means bridge, dam, boundary limit, thus in this context His guidance, religion, rule and law.

 : Spoken by Shri Paras'ara in the Vishnu Purana there is, so Shri Shridhara Svami reminds us, a verse confirming this one:

devatve deva-deheyam
manushyatve ca manushi vishnor dehanurupam vai
karoty eshatmanas tanam

"When the Lord appears as a demigod, she [the goddess of fortune] takes the form of a demigoddess, and when He appears as a human being, she takes a humanlike form. Thus the body she assumes matches the one Lord Vishnu takes."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 61:

Lord Balarama Slays Rukmi at Aniruddha's Wedding
Shri Shuka said: 'Each of the wives of Krishna gave birth to ten sons not inferior in any respect to their Father's personal opulence. Never seeing Acyuta leave their palaces, every one of the princesses considered herself the dearest one. The women had no notion of His truth. Fully enchanted by the Supreme Lord's face that was as beautiful as the whorl of a lotus, His long arms, His eyes and loving glances, His witty approach and charming talks, the women with their appeal, could not conquer the mind of the Almighty One. Despite the romantic signs they beamed from their arched brows, their hidden looks and coy smiles that so charmingly displayed their intentions, the sixteen thousand wives were not capable of agitating His senses with their arrows of Cupid and other means. These women who obtained the Lord of Rama as their partner and thus achieved what not even Lord Brahma and the other gods can attain, first of all eagerly looked forward to enjoy His ever-fresh intimate association and exchanged with pleasure, incessantly and with an increasing loving attraction, smiles and glances with Him [as in 10.59: 44]. Even though they [as stated] had hundreds of maidservants, they personally approached Him to offer Him a seat, to be of first-class worship, wash His feet and serve Him betel nut. They gave massages, fanned Him, and served the Almighty Lord with fragrances, garlands, dressing His hair, arranging His bed, bathing and presenting gifts [as in 10.59: 45]. Among those [16008 *] wives of Krishna who each had ten sons, there were, as I previously stated, eight principal queens. I will sum up their sons beginning with Pradyumna.

- He was by the Lord begotten in Rukmini [see 10.54: 60] and was in no way inferior to Him, just as were Carudeshna, Sudeshna and the powerful Carudeha, Sucaru, Carugpta, Bhadracaru and another son called Carucandra as also Vicaru and Caru, the tenth son. 0-1 The ten sons of Satyabhama [10.56: 44] were Bhanu, Subhanu, Svarbhanu, Prabhanu, Bhanuman and Candrabhanu, as also Brihadbhanu and the eighth son Atibhanu followed by Shribhanu and Pratibhanu [bhanu means luster, splendor]. Samba, Sumitra, Purujit, Shatajit and Sahasrajit, Vijaya and Citraketu, Vasuman, Dravida and Kratu were the sons of Jambavati [10.56: 32]. These sons headed by Samba were the ones favored by their Father [see also 7.1: 2 & 12]. Vira, Candra and As'vasena, Citragu, Vegavan, Vrisha, Ama, Shanku, Vasu and the mighty Kunti were the sons of Nagajiti [or Satya, see 10.58: 55]. Shruta, Kavi, Vrisha, Vira, Subahu, the one called Bhadra, Shanti, Dars'a, Purnamasa and Somaka the youngest one, were the sons of Kalindi [10.58: 23]. Praghosha, Gatravan, Simha, Bala, Prabala, and Urdhaga were together with Mahas'akti, Saha, Oja and Aparajita the sons of Madra [see ]. Vrika, Harsha, Anila, Gridhra, Vardhana, Unnada, Mahamsa, Pavana, Vahni and Kshudhi were the sons of Mitravinda [10.58: 31]. The sons of Bhadra were Sangramajit, Brihatsena, Shura, Prabarana and Arijit, Jaya, Subhadra, Vama, Ayur and Satyaka [10.58: 56]. Diptiman, Tamratapta and others were the sons of Lord Krishna and Rohini []. Oh King, Pradyumna living in the city of Bhojakatha [Rukmi's domain] begot in Rukmavati, the daughter of Rukmi, the greatly powerful Aniruddha [see also 4.24: 35-36]. From these sons and grandsons of the sixteen thousand mothers, tens of millions descendants of Krishna took their birth, oh King.'

The king said: 'How could Rukmi give his daughter in marriage to the son of his Enemy? Defeated by Krishna in battle he waited for an opportunity to kill Him. Please, oh learned one, explain to me how this marriage between the two enemies could be arranged. Yogis [like you] are perfectly able to see the past, the present and what has not happened yet, as also things far away, things blocked by obstacles and matters beyond the senses.'

Shri Shuka said: 'At her svayamvara ceremony she [Rukmavati] choose the, for her manifest, Cupid [Pradyumna] who took her away after He with a single chariot in battle had defeated the assembled kings. In order to please his sister [Rukmini], Rukmi granted his daughter his nephew, even though he always thought of his enmity with Krishna who had insulted him [10.54: 35]. Oh King, the young large-eyed daughter of Rukmini, Carumati, married with the son of Kritavarma named Bali. Rukmi, despite being bound in enmity to the Lord, gave to Aniruddha - who was his daughter's son, his granddaughter named Rocana in marriage. Knowing that it was against the dharma [not to side with one's enemy], he, constrained by the ropes of affection, preferred to please his sister with that marriage. Oh King, on the occasion of that happy event, Rukmini, Balarama and Kes'ava [Krishna], Samba, Pradyumna and others came to the city of Bhojakatha.'

After the ceremony, some arrogant kings led by the ruler of Kalinga said to Rukmi: 'You should defeat Balarama in a game of dice. He, oh King, is really not that good at it but is nevertheless greatly fascinated by it.' Thus being addressed Rukmi invited Balarama to play a game of dice with him. In that match Balarama accepted a wager of first hundred, then thousand and then ten thousand [gold coins]. But it was Rukmi who won. The king of Kalinga thereupon loudly laughed at Balarama baring his teeth freely. The Carrier of the Plow could not tolerate this. When Rukmi next accepted a bet of a hundred thousand coins that was won by Balarama, Rukmi resorted to deceit and said: 'I have won!'

With a mind boiling like the ocean on the day of a full moon, the handsome Balarama whose naturally reddish eyes were burning with anger, accepted a wager of a hundred million coins. Balarama fairly also won that game, but Rukmi again resorted to deceit and said: 'It is won by me. May these witnesses confirm that!'

Then a voice spoke from the sky: 'It was Balarama who fairly won the wager, what Rukmi said is a lie!'

Discarding that voice the prince of Vidarbha, urged on by the wicked kings to head for his death, derided Sankarshana by saying: 'You cowherds roaming in the forest are no experts in playing dice. To play dice and shoot arrows is something for kings and not for the likes of you!'

Thus being insulted by Rukmi in the ceremonial assembly [of the marriage] and laughed at by the kings present, He angrily raised His club and struck him dead. Quickly He seized the fleeing king of Kalinga on his tenth step and in His rage knocked out the teeth he had bared while laughing at Him [see also 4.5: 21]. Tormented by Balarama's club the [other] kings fled in terror, drenched in blood with their arms, legs and heads broken. The fact that his brother-in-law, Rukmi, had been slain, oh King, was by the Lord neither welcomed nor protested out of fear to break the bond of affection with Rukmini and Balarama. The descendants of Das'arha whose purposes under the shelter of Madhusudana all had been fulfilled, thereupon placed the groom Aniruddha together with His bride on a chariot and led by Balarama left Bhojakatha to head for Kus'asthali [another name of Dvaraka].'

*: This one called Madra is the eighth principal wife of Krishna not mentioned before; she is the daughter of the ruler of Madra, called Brihatsena, and also known as Lakshmana. From the Bhagavatam knowing her story as told in 10.83: 17, it is clear that she belonged to the eight queens He married before. Thus there were the 16008 of them. Rohini [not to confuse with Balarama's mother who has the same name], not to be considered as a principal wife, seems to have been the one heading the sixteen thousand princesses. So taking Madra as the cause for speaking of 16001 wives in stead of 16000, do we in sum have: 1 Rukmini, 2 Jambavati, 3 Satyabhama, 4 Kalindi, 5 Mitravinda, 6 Satya (Nagnajiti), 7 Bhadra and 8

Madra (Lakshmana) and then the sixteen thousand headed by Rohini who came second [see also footnote 10.59 and the list of them in 10.83].

 : Srila Sridhara Svami explains that every queen of the Lord had one daughter.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 62:

Usha in Love and Aniruddha Apprehended

The honourable king said: 'Bana's daughter named Usha [dawn] married the best of the Yadus [Aniruddha]. Because of the marriage a great and terrible battle took place between the Lord and Shankara [Shiva as 'the auspicious one']. Oh great yogi, it is up to you to explain all this.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Bana [arrow], the eldest son of the one hundred sons born from the semen of Bali [gift] - the great soul who donated the earth to the Lord who had appeared in the form of Vamana [see 8.19-22] -, was respectable, magnanimous, intelligent and truthful in his vows and always fixed in his devotion for Lord Shiva. In the charming city known as Shonita [resin] he founded his kingdom, where the immortals served him like menial servants. They did that because Shambhu [the beneficent one] or Shiva in the past had been pleased by him as he, endowed with a thousands arms, had played musical instruments while Mrida [Shiva as 'the gracious one'] was dancing. He, the great lord and master of all created beings, the compassionate one offering shelter to his devotees, rewarded him with a benediction of his choice. Bana then chose for him [Shiva] as the protector of his city. Intoxicated by his strength, Bana one day being present at his side said to Giris'a [Shiva as the lord of the mountain] while touching his lotus feet with a helmet as bright as the sun: 'I bow down to you Mahadeva [great god], oh controller and spiritual master of the worlds, who, like a tree from heaven, fulfills all the wishes of the people who feel unfulfilled. The one thousand arms you gave me have become but a burden to me. Except for you I do not find an equal opponent in the three worlds. With my arms itching to pulverize mountains, I proceeded to fight the elephants of all directions, oh primeval one, but terrified of me they all ran away.'

Hearing that the great lord said infuriated: 'Your flag will be broken when, oh fool, your pride is vanquished in that battle of yours with someone like me.' Thus being addressed the foolish character went home full of delight, oh king, unintelligently waiting there for the demise of his heroism as was predicted by the lord of the mountain [compare 2.1: 4].

His virgin daughter named Usha, in a dream had an amorous encounter with the son of Pradyumna, a lover thus found whom she never before had seen or heard of [see *]. Not seeing him anymore in her dream, she - being among her girlfriends - rose up disturbed and was most embarrassed to hear herself say: 'Where are you my lover?' The daughter Citralekha [the fine sketch-artist] of a minister of Bana named Kumbhanda, thereupon as a friend of hers most curiously questioned her companion Usha. 'Who is it you are looking for, oh beautiful eyebrows, and what do you expect from him, for we as yet have not seen anyone winning your hand, oh princess.'

'In my dream I saw a certain man with a dark complexion, lotus like eyes, yellow garments and mighty arms - one of the kind that stirs a woman's heart. He is the one I am seeking. That lover made me drink the honey of his lips, went elsewhere and left me hankering for him, being thrown in an ocean of distress.'

Citrlekha said: 'I will take your distress away! If he can be found anywhere in the three worlds, I will bring him to you, that [future] husband, that thief who stole your heart. Please point him out to me.'

Thus having spoken she accurately drew for her the demigod and the heavenly singer, the one perfected, the venerable one and the lowlife serpent, the demon, the magician, the supernatural being and the human being. 8-1 Of the humans she drew Vrishnis like Shurasena, Vasudeva, Balarama and Krishna, but seeing Pradyumna Usha became bashful and with Aniruddha being drawn she bent down her head in embarrassment, oh great lord, and said smiling: 'That is Him, that one here!' Citralekha, the yogini, recognised Him as Krishna's grandson [Aniruddha], oh King, and then traveled by the higher spheres [the mystical way] to Dvaraka, the city under the protection of Krishna. Using her yogic power, she took Pradyumna's son who was sleeping on a fine bed, to Shonitapura and showed her girlfriend her Beloved. Seeing Him, that most beautiful man, her face lit up. Together with the son of Pradyumna she then enjoyed in her private quarters that men were not allowed to see. 3-2 She worshiped Him in faithful service with priceless garments, garlands, fragrances, lamps, sitting places and such, with beverages, liquid and solid food and with words. Thus continuously keeping Him hidden in the maiden quarters He, who because of Usha's greatly increasing affection was diverted in His senses, lost count of the days. 5-2 Thus enjoyed by the Yadu hero she, in breaking her vow [of chastity], could not conceal the symptoms of her extreme happiness. They were noticed by her governesses who reported [to Bana, her father]: 'Oh King, we have noticed that your daughter is of a conduct not respectable for an unmarried girl, she besmirches the family. She was well guarded by us within the palace and never left, oh master. We have no idea how she, hidden from the looks of men, could have been spoilt.'

When Bana heard that his daughter had been defiled, he most disturbed quickly headed for the maiden quarters. Arriving there he saw the most superior Yadu, 9-3 He stood perplexed to behold that son of Cupid sitting in front of her. That exclusive beauty of all the worlds, dark-skinned in yellow clothes, with His lotus eyes, mighty arms, earrings and locks, sat there with a face lit up by His glowing ornaments and smiling glances. He was playing dice with His all-auspicious sweetheart, the red kunkuma of whose breasts was found all over the, by her manufactured, springtime jasmine garland that hung between His arms. Seeing him entering surrounded by many armed guards, the Sweet Lord raised His club made of muru [a type of iron] and stood firm ready to strike, like death personified holding the rod of punishment. Closing in from all sides to apprehend Him, He attacked them like a dominant boar cornered by a pack of dogs, so that they all with their heads, arms and legs crushed, being hurt ran away to escape from the palace. But even as He was striking down the guards, the son of Bali himself furiously captured Him with the [mystical] snake-ropes [of Varuna, see also 8.21: 28]. Usha, utterly defeated and discouraged, was overwhelmed by sorrow upon seeing the arrest and cried bitter tears.'

*: Here Srila Vis'vanatha Cakravarti Thhakura quotes the following verses from the Vishnu Purana, which explain Usha's dream: 'Oh brahmana, when Usha, the daughter of Bana, happened to see Parvati playing with her husband, Lord Shambhu, Usha intensely desired to experience the same feelings. At that time Goddess Gauri [Parvati], who knows everyone's heart, told the sensitive young girl, 'don't be so disturbed! You will have a chance to enjoy with your own husband.' Hearing this, Usha thought to herself, 'But when? And who will my husband be?' In response, Parvati addressed her once more: 'The man who approaches you in your dream on the twelfth lunar day of the bright fortnight of the month Vais'akha will become your husband, Oh princess.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 63:

The Fever in Conflict and Bana Defeated

Shri Shuka said: 'Not seeing Aniruddha any longer, oh son of Bharata, His relatives passed the four months of the rainy season in sadness. Hearing from Narada the news of what He had done and that He had been captured, the Vrishnis, who had Krishna as their worshipable deity, went to Shonitapura. - The best of the Satvatas, knowing Pradyumna, Yuyudhana [Satyaki], Gada, Samba, and Sarana, Nanda, Upananda, Bhadra and others, being led by Balarama and Krishna assembled with twelve akshauhinis and besieged on all sides Bana's city completely. Seeing the city gardens, the city walls and watchtowers ravaged he, fuming with anger, came out to meet them with an army equally big. Bhagavan Shiva appeared together with his son [Kartikeya, his general] from the city on the back of Nandi, his bull, in order to fight, accompanied by the Pramathas [his different mystic attendants], at the side of Bana against Rama and Krishna. Oh King, a most tumultuous, astonishing and hair-raising fight took place of Krishna against Shankara and Pradyumna against Kartikeya. Balarama fought against Kumbhanda and Kupakarna, Samba fought against Bana's son and Satyaki fought against Bana himself. To be a witness, the leaders of the godly headed by Lord Brahma came in their celestial vehicles as also the sages, the perfected souls and the venerable ones, the singers and the dancing girls of heaven and the spirits. 0-1 Discharging sharp-pointed arrows from His bow, the Sharnaga, Shauri [Krishna] drove away the Bhutas [spirits of the dead], the Pramathas [mystic spirits], the Guhyakas [the wealth-keepers of Kuvera], the Dakinis [female imps of Kali] the Yatudhanas [practitioners of black magic], the Vetalas [vampires], the Vinayakas [demons of education, distractors, humiliators], the Pretas [ghosts, hobgoblins], the Matas [demonic mothers], the Pis'acas [child-demons], the Kushmandas [meditation-disturbers, disencing demons] and the Brahma-rakshasas [fallen brahmins as in 9.9: 25] who all followed Shankara. The holder of the trident [Pinaki or Shiva] using different types of weapons against the Wielder of the Sharnaga, saw them all neutralised with befitting counter weapons. They could not daunt the Carrier of the Sharnaga. He used a Brahmastra against a Brahmastra, a mountain weapon against a wind weapon, a rain weapon against a fire weapon and His narayanastra [His personal weapon] against Shiva's [personal] pashupatastra [the 'beast strap'-weapon]. After Shauri next had bewildered lord Shiva by making him yawn with a yawning weapon, He attacked Bana's army with His sword, club and arrows. Kartikeya distressed by Pradyumna's arrows that rained down from all sides, with blood streaming from his limbs fled from the battlefield on his pea cock carrier. Kumbhanda and Kupakarna tormented by the club [of Balarama] fell and their armies, whose leaders were killed, fled in all directions.'

Bana seeing his troops torn apart, left aside Satyaki whom he was fighting, crossed with his chariot the battlefield and most furiously attacked Krishna. Bana, in a frenzy because of the fighting, fixed two arrows on each of his bows and simultaneously pulled back all five hundred of them. These bows were by Bhagavan all split at the same time, and after He had hit the chariot, the horses and the charioteer, He blew His conch shell. [then] Hoping to save her son's life, his mother, named Kothara, positioned herself naked, with her hair loosened, in front of Krishna. When Lord Gadagraja thereupon turned His face away not to look at the naked woman, Bana, without his chariot and with his bow broken, took the opportunity to escape into the city. But after Shiva's followers had been driven away, Jvara, the [personification of Shiva's hot] fever with three heads and three feet, attacked the descendant of Das'arha like he wanted to set fire to the ten directions [see *]. Seeing him Lord Narayana thereupon released His own fever [of extreme cold] so that the two Jvaras of Mahes'vara and Vishnu came to fight each other. The one of Mahes'vara tormented by the force of Vishnu's fever cried out in pain. Not finding a safe refuge anywhere Mahes'vara's Jvara thirsting for protection thereupon with folded hands devout began to praise Hrishikes'a. The Jvara said: 'I bow down to You, the Supreme Lord Unlimited in His Potencies, the Soul of All of Pure Consciousness, the Cause of the totality of the creation, dissolution and maintenance of the universe, to You, the Absolute Truth of Perfect Peace to whom the Vedas indirectly refer. I approach You for being the negation of this maya, this material bewilderment of time, fate, karma, the individual propensities, the subtle elements, the field [that is the body], the life force [prana], the self, the transformations [the eleven senses] and the aggregate of all of this [in the form of the subtle body called the linga]. That illusory reality constitutes a never ending flow [like that] of seeds and sprouts. With various intentions you engage in divine missions [lilas] in order to maintain the pious ones, the sages, and the codes of conduct in the world and put an end to those who abandoned the path and turned to violence. This incarnation of Yours is there to remove the burden from this earth [see also B.G. 9: 29 and 4: 8]. I am tormented by this most terrible fever of Your power that is unbearably cold but, nevertheless, is burning, for indeed, as long as the embodied souls are caught in their desires and do not serve the soles of Your feet, they must suffer continually.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'Oh three-headed one, I am satisfied with you, may your fear that was raised by My fever leave you. For anyone who remembers our conversation there will be no reason to be afraid of you.'

Thus being addressed the fever weapon of Mahes'vara bowed down to Acyuta and went away, but Bana, riding his chariot, came forward with the intent to fight Janardana. Thereupon oh King, the demon with his thousand arms carrying numerous weapons, fuming with anger, released arrows at Him who Carries the Cakra. As he again and again was hurling weapons, the Supreme Lord with the razor-sharp edge of His disc cut off his arms like they were the branches of a tree. While Bana's arms were being severed, the great lord Bhava [- of existence, Shiva] approached out of compassion for his devotee and spoke to the Wielder of the Disc. Shri Rudra said: 'You alone are the Absolute Truth, the Light of the Supreme hidden in the language of the Absolute [of the Veda]. They whose hearts are spotless can see You being as pure as the blue sky. 5-3 The atmosphere is Your navel, the fire Your face, the water Your semen, heaven Your head and the directions are Your sense of hearing. The earth is Your foot, the moon Your mind and the sun Your sight. I am Your awareness of Self, the ocean is Your abdomen and Indra is Your arm. Your good self, with the plants as the hair on Your body, the clouds as the hair on Your head, with Virinca as Your intelligence, with the Prajapati as Your genitals and the religion as Your heart, are the Purusha from whom all the worlds originated. You, oh unbounded glory, are present in this descent to defend the dharma in favor of the Complete of the Living Being [the universe] and we [demigods] all manifest and develop, enlightened by You, the seven worlds [see dvipa]. You are the Original Supreme Person without a second, the Transcendental, Self-manifesting Cause without a prior cause, the Lord. Yet You, for the sake of the full manifestation of Your qualities, come here as an apparition of Your illusory potency [in different lifeforms, gods and avatars]. Just as the sun in its own shade [behind the clouds] is hidden from sight and illumines the visible forms, You, Almighty One, similarly self-luminous, are covered by the modes of nature [by false ego] and illumine the reality of the modes as also the beings who have these qualities. Those who, being fully entangled in their respect for their children, wife, a home and so on, in their intelligence are bewildered by maya, [like drowning persons first] rise to the surface [of the ocean of misery] and [then] sink [to the bottom. See B.G. 9: 21]. Pritiful is the person who, by the grace of God having attained this human world, has no control over his senses and is not willing to honour Your feet, for he is someone who fools himself. The mortal being who, opposing [politically e.g.] because of the sense-objects, rejects You, his True Self and dear most Guide, is eating the poison and avoiding the nectar. I, Brahma as also the demigods and the sages with a pure consciousness have surrendered themselves wholeheartedly to You, the Master, the dear most Self. Let us worship You, the Godhead, the cause of the rise, the maintenance and the demise of the Living Being that is the Universe [jagat], You who perfectly in peace equipped, are the unique, unequalled Friend, True Self and worshipable Lord of all the worlds and all the souls, the shelter to find liberation from one's material existence. This person [Bana] is my favorite, my dearest follower whom I awarded with fearlessness, oh Lord, please grant him therefore Your grace, the way You were also of mercy for the master of the Daityas [Prahlada].'

The Supreme Lord said: 'We shall do what you told us you would like oh great lord, I fully agree with your conclusion. This son of Virocana [Bali] will be spared by Me, for I granted Prahlada the benediction that his descendants would not be killed by Me [see 7.10: 21]. His arms were severed by Me in order to subdue his pride and I destroyed his huge military force because it had become a burden to the earth. The Asura left with four of his arms, will become your principal associate, he will not age and be immortal, he has nothing to fear on any account.'

The Asura thus attaining freedom from fear, bowed his head down to Krishna, brought the son of Pradyumna and His wife and placed them on a chariot. Putting Him and His wife, ornamented and with fine clothes, in front, He [Krishna] with the permission of Shiva left, being surrounded by an akshauhini [a military division]. When He entered His capital that was fully decorated with flags, arches of victory and with its streets and crossroads sprinkled, He was respectfully welcomed by the people of the city, His relatives and the twice-born souls, with the sounds of conch shells, side drums and kettledrums. For the person who rises at dawn and remembers this victory of Krishna in the battle with Shankara, there will be no defeat.'

*: Here Shрила Vis'vanatha Cakravarti Thhakura quotes the following description of the Shiva-jvara: "The terrible Shiva-jvara had three legs, three heads, six arms and nine eyes. Showering ashes, he resembled Yamaraja at the time of universal annihilation."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 64:

On Stealing from a Brahmin: King Nriga a Chameleon

The son of Vyasa said: 'One day [in their youth], oh King, the Yadu boys Samba, Pradyumna, Caru, Bhanu, Gada and others went to a park to play. Playing there for a long time they, being thirsty, looked for water and discovered an amazing creature in a dry well. They saw there a chameleon that was as big as a mountain and with a mind filled with wonder they, moved by compassion, tried to lift it up. With straps of leather and twisted ropes attached to it, the boys failed to lift the creature out of the well and so they reported it excitedly to Krishna. The lotus-eyed Supreme Lord, the Maintainer of the Universe, taking a look saw it and picked it easily up with His left hand. Being touched by the hand of Uttamas'loka, the chameleon form was immediately given up for the one of a beautiful heavenly being with a complexion of molten gold and wonderful ornaments, clothes and garlands. Even though He was very well aware of what had led to this situation, Mukunda asked, so that the common man (also) could know: 'Who are you, oh fortunate soul? Considering your excellent appearance I dare say you are an exalted demigod! What action has brought you oh good soul, in this condition that you certainly did not deserve? Please tell Us, eager to know, all about yourself - that is to say, if you deem this the proper place to speak about it.'

Shri Shuka said: 'The king thus being questioned by Krishna whose forms are unlimited, with his helmet as brilliant as the sun bowed down to Madhava and addressed Him. Nriga said: 'I, the ruler of man called Nriga [see 9.1: 11-12, 9.2: 17], am a [grand]-son of Ikshvaku, oh Master. Maybe You have heard that I am counted among the men of charity. What would be unknown to You oh Master, oh Witness of the Mind of all Beings whose vision is not impeded by time? Nevertheless I will speak as You wish. I have donated as many cows as there are grains of sand on earth, as there are stars in the sky or as there are raindrops in a shower of rain. I gave away dairy cows that were honestly acquired, that were young, sweet, of beauty, brown and fair and endowed with many other qualities, together with their calves, with gold on their horns, silver on their hooves and adorned with fine fabrics and garlands. 4-1 I, of pious works and performing worship with fire sacrifices, was of charity and gave ornaments to truth-loving, young and talented brahmins with families in need, who were known for their austerity and vast knowledge of the Vedas and who had good qualities and a good character. I donated cows, land, gold, houses, horses and elephants, marriageable girls with maidservants, sesame seeds, silver, bedding and clothing, jewels, furniture and chariots. Unknowingly I gave a cow owned by a certain first class dvija [a brahmin not accepting gifts anymore, see 7.11] away to another twice-born soul. Having wandered off, the cow had mingled with my herd. As the cow was led away she was spotted by her master who said: 'She is mine!' But he who had accepted the gift said thereupon: 'Nriga gave this one to me!'

The two learned ones arguing in defense of their own interest said to me: 'You sir, as a giver have been a thief!' Hearing this I was dumbstruck.

Thus being embarrassed in respect of my religious duty, I begged the two men of learning: 'Please give me this one cow and I will give you a hundred thousand of the best quality in return! Please you both, have mercy with your servant. I did not know what I was doing. Save me from the danger of falling down into a dirty hell!'

'I do not want that at all, oh King!' the owner said and went away.

'I am not interested in all those other cows', the other one said and left.

After this had happened I was by the messengers of Yamaraja taken to his abode and there oh God of Gods, oh Master of the Universe, questioned by the Lord of Death and Retribution [as follows, see also 5.26: 6, 6.1: 31 and 6.3]. 'Do you first want to face the consequences of your bad deeds oh King, or those of your good deeds? As for your unlimited deeds of charity, I see a splendid world.'

I thus said: 'Let me first experience my bad deeds, oh Godhead.' He then said: 'Then fall!' and as I was falling, oh Master, I saw myself as a chameleon! Being Your servant generous towards the brahmins and hankering for Your presence, oh Kes'ava, not even today the memory of You has left me [see also 5.8: 28]. Oh Almighty One, how can You now in person be visible to me, You, the Supreme Soul, upon whom the masters of yoga within their spotless hearts meditate through the eye of the scriptures? How, oh Adhoks'aja, can I, whose intelligence was blinded by severe troubles, now be able to perceive You? Is that not reserved for those whose material life in this world has ended? 7-2 Oh God of Gods, Master of the Universe, Lord of the Cows and Supreme Personality! Oh Path Laid out for Man, Master of the Senses, Grace of the Verses, oh You Infallible and Undiminishing One! Please permit me to leave for the world of the gods oh Krishna, oh Master, may, wherever I reside, my mind take to the shelter of Your feet! My obeisances unto You, the Source of All Beings, the Absolute of the Truth and the Possessor of Unlimited Potencies. I offer You, Krishna [*], the son of Vasudeva, the Lord of all forms of yoga, my respects.'

Thus having spoken and having circumambulated Him he, after touching Krishna's feet with his crown, received permission to leave and boarded, for all humans to see, a most excellent celestial chariot. Krishna, the Supreme Lord, the son of Devaki, the God and Soul of Dharma devoted to the brahmins, addressed His personal associates and was as follows of instruction for the royalty: 'If even for someone, who is of a greater potency than fire, the smallest amount of property that he consumes [steals or denies] of a brahmin, is difficult to enjoy, what then to say of kings who think they are the Lord Himself? The halahala poison [that was churned with Mandara] I do not consider real poison because there was a remedy for it [namely Shiva, see 8.7]. That what belongs to a brahmin though, I call real poison [when it is misappropriated], for that has no antidote in the world. Poison destroys the one who ingests it and fire is extinguished with water, but the fire that burns with the kindling wood of the belongings of a brahmin burns one's community down to the ground. When one enjoys a brahmin's property without his permission, that will destroy three of one's generations [in a family line see ], but when one enjoys it with force by means of an external power [as by governmental actions or by corporate interests], ten previous and ten subsequent generations will be affected [with a contamination of one's honour, see also 9.8]. Members of the royal class, do, blinded by royal opulence [see also B.G. 1: 44], not foresee their downfall into hell, when they childishly covet the property of a good natured brahmin. 7-3 Those kings and other members of the royal family who, failing in their control, usurped the share of a brahmin, will for as many years be cooked in the hell called Kumbhipaka [5.26: 13], as there were particles of dust touched by the teardrops of generous brahmins who, for the sake of their beloved ones, had to cry over the means of support that were stolen from them. He who deprives a brahmin of his livelihood, whether it was provided by oneself or someone else, will for sixty thousand years be born as a worm in feces. May I never acquire the wealth belonging to a brahmin. They who desire such a thing are short-lived and will be defeated. They will lose their kingdom and turn into horrifying snakes. Dear followers, do not be inimical towards a man of learning, not even when he has committed a sin. Whether he strikes you physically time and again or curses you, you should always honour him. The way I always take care to bow down to persons of learning, all of you should be of the same respect. He who acts otherwise, qualifies for being punished by Me. The property taken away from a brahmin leads to the downfall of the taker, even done unknowingly.

Just like we saw it happen to the person of Nriga with the brahmin's cow.'

After thus having exhorted the residents of Dvaraka, the Supreme Lord Mukunda, the Purifier of All Worlds, entered His palace.'

*: In the Mahabharata (Udyoga-parva 71., is stated to the name of Krishna: "The word krish is the attractive feature of the Lord's existence, and na means 'spiritual pleasure.' When the verb krish is added to na, it becomes krishna, which indicates the Absolute Truth."

 According to Shрила Shridhara Svami, does tri-purusha, the Sanskrit term used here, refer to oneself, one's sons and one's grandsons.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 65:

Lord Balarama in Vrindavana and the Stream Divided

Shri Shuka said: 'Oh best of the Kurus, the Supreme Lord Balarama mounted [one day] His chariot eager to see His friends and traveled to Nanda's cowherd village. Balarama was by the gopas and gopis, who for a long time indeed had missed Him, embraced. After offering His respects to His parents He was joyfully greeted with prayers: 'Oh descendant of Das'arha, Lord of the Universe, please always protect us together with Your younger brother [Krishna].' Having said this they pulled Him close on their laps and embraced Him, wetting Him with the water from their eyes. - In accordance with the scriptures He headed for the elder gopas following which He was welcomed by the younger ones. Next He approached the cowherds whom He, according to each his age, friendship and family relationship, greeted with smiles and taking their hands into His. After having offered Him a comfortable seat so that He could rest a while and such, they, who had dedicated their all and everything to the service of their lotus-eyed Krishna, gathered around Him and asked Him, with voices faltering because of their love, questions relating to the welfare of their loved ones [in Dvaraka]. 'Oh Balarama are all our relatives faring well? Are Your wives and children all remembering us still, oh Rama? To our great fortune the sinful Kamsa was killed and our relatives were freed! Luckily, they took shelter in a fortress [Dvaraka] and managed to kill and conquer our enemies!' Honoured to see Balarama in their midst, the gopis asked with a smile: 'Is Krishna, the darling of the city women, living happily? Is He still thinking of His people, His [foster] father and His mother? Will He ever come to see His mother personally and does He with the mighty arms remember our enduring service? 1-1 For His sake oh Lord, we have detached ourselves from those who are so difficult to give up: our mothers, fathers, brothers, husbands, children and sisters, oh descendant of Das'arha. Suddenly rejecting us and leaving us, He broke with the friendship, but which woman would not trust His words [that He would return]? How can those smart city women, who are attracted by His eloquence, nice smiles and the lust He raises in their hearts, put faith in the words of Him who so ungrateful has His heart easily elsewhere and breaks off contact? But why would we dilate about Him any longer, oh gopis? Let us talk about something else. If He wants to pass His time without us, we will do the same [and try to live without His presence. See also 10.47: 47].'

Thus speaking together the women remembered Shauri's laughing, conversations, attractive glances, gait and loving embrace and that made them cry. Sankarshana, the Supreme Lord, being an expert in different kinds of conciliation, consoled them with Krishna's confidential messages which touched their hearts. Rama resided there during the two months Madhu and Madhava [the first two of the vernal equinox] and also at night brought [amorous] delight to the gopis [see also 10.15: 8]. In a grove near the Yamuna [known as Shrirama-ghaththa] where the wind carried the fragrance of kumuda [night-blooming] lotuses and the full moon bathed the place in its light, He enjoyed it to be served in the company of the many women. From the hollow of a tree the divine [intoxicating liquor] Varuni flowed that was brought by Varuna and, with its aroma, made the entire forest even more fragrant. Balarama, smelling the fragrance of that honey flow carried by the wind, sought the place where it could be found and drank from it together with the women. As the singers of heaven sang His glory He, beautified by the circle of young women, enjoyed just like Indra's bull elephant with a herd of females. Kettledrums resounded in the sky, the Gandharvas joyfully rained down flowers and the sages praised Balarama for His heroic deeds. While His pastimes were sung by the women, Halayudha [Balarama as 'armed with the plow'], inebriated with His eyes heavy from the intoxication, wandered through the forest.

He with His flowers, with a single arrow, mad with joy, carrying His Vijayanti garland and with His smiling, lotus like face covered by beads of perspiration like it were snowflakes, then called for the Yamuna with the purpose to play in the water. But when the river thereupon ignored His drunken words and did not come, she was by Him angrily dragged with the tip of His plow. 'Being called by Me oh sinful one, you did not come. Because you, in disregard of Me, are moving about as you like, I will bring you here with the tip of My plow in a hundred little streams!'

The [goddess of the] Yamuna thus being chided, fell afraid at His feet, oh King and spoke trembling the following words to the Yadu descendant [*]: 'Rama, Balarama, oh mighty armed one, what do I know about Your prowess, oh Master of the Universe who with a single portion of Yourself [S'esh] holds up the earth? Please, Supreme Lord, let me go, I surrender myself to You. I was not aware of Your status as the Supreme Personality, oh Soul of the Universe taking care of the devotees!'

Balarama, the Supreme Lord, being entreated by the Yamuna then released her and together with the women entered the water, like He was the king of the elephants with his wives. After having played to His heart's content He came out of the water, whereupon Kanti [the female beauty, the brightness of the moon], a name of Lakshmi presented Him a set of blue garments, most valuable ornaments and a splendid necklace. He put on the blue clothes and hung the golden necklace around His neck. Excellently being ornamented and anointed, He looked as resplendent as the elephant of the great lord Indra. Oh King, even today the currents of the Yamuna, the way they were drawn by the unlimitedly powerful Balarama, are considered a proof of His prowess. This is how

*: The parampara comments: 'According to Shрила Jiva Gosvami, the goddess who appeared before Lord Balarama is an expansion of Shrimati Kalindi, one of Lord Krishna's queens in Dvaraka. Shрила Jiva Gosvami calls her a "shadow" of Kalindi, and Shрила Vis'vanatha Cakravarti confirms that she is an expansion of Kalindi, not Kalindi herself. Shрила Jiva Gosvami also gives evidence from Shri Hari-vams'a - in the statement pratyuvacarnava-vadhum - that Goddess Yamuna is the wife of the ocean. The Hari-vams'a therefore also refers to her as Sagarangana.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 66:

The False Vasudeva Paundraka and His Son Consumed by Their Own Fire

Shri Shuka said: 'After Balarama had left for Nanda's cowherd village oh King, the ruler of Karusha [called Paundraka] who foolishly thought 'I am Vasudeva', sent a messenger to Krishna. People childishly had suggested: 'You are Vasudeva, the Supreme Lord who has descended as the Master of the Universe!' and so he thought of himself as the Infallible One. Like a boy of little intelligence who by kids was appointed king, he being silly, sent a messenger to Krishna who resided in Dvaraka, to Him whose ways are inscrutable. The envoy arriving in Dvaraka, relayed in the royal assembly to Krishna Almighty with the Lotus petal Eyes, the message of his king: 'I am the one and only Vasudeva and no one else. I have descended to this world with the purpose of showing mercy to the living beings, You however, have to give up Your false claim on that title! Oh Satvata, give up my symbols that You carry out of ignorance. You better come to me for shelter! If You do not, then give me battle instead.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Hearing that boasting of the stupid Paundraka, the members of the assembly headed by Ugrasena laughed out loud. The Supreme Lord, after the joking was done, said to the messenger: 'I will hurl at you oh fool, the symbols you so boast about. You will be the shelter of dogs, you ignoramus, when you lie dead with that face of yours covered by flocking herons, vultures and vathas.'

Thus being addressed the messenger conveyed that insulting reply in full detail to his master. Krishna with His chariot rode to the vicinity of Kas'i [Varanasi]. As soon as the mighty warrior Paundraka noticed His preparations for battle, he appeared from the city joined by two akshauhinis. 2-1 He was followed by his friend the king of Kas'i who covered his back with three akshauhinis. Oh King, Krishna saw Paundraka complete with a conch, a disc, a sword and a club, a Sharnga bow, a Shrivatsa mark and other symbols, including a Kaustubha gem and the decoration of a garland of forest flowers. Wearing a pair of fine silken yellow garments and carrying Garuda in his banner, he wore a valuable crown and had ornamented himself with gleaming, shark-shaped earrings. The sight of him dressed up as His spitting image, like he was an actor on a stage, made the Lord laugh heartily. The enemies attacked the Lord with tridents, clubs and bludgeons, pikes, blades, barbed missiles, lances, swords, axes and arrows. Krishna however, with His club, sword, disc and arrows, fiercely tormented the military force of elephants, chariots, horses and infantry of Paundraka and the king of Kas'i, like He was the fire at the end of the age tormenting the different kinds of living beings. The battlefield, strewn with the chariots, horses, elephants, bipeds, mules and camels cut to pieces by His disc, shone like the horrible playground of the Lord of the Ghosts [Bhutapati, or Shiva], who pleases the wise therewith. Shauri then said to Paundraka: 'Those weapons you mentioned by mouth of your messenger, I will now release at you. I will force you to renounce My name and everything that you falsely assumed, oh fool! And today I will turn to you for shelter [as you wanted], when I do not wish to fight you.'

Thus deriding him, He drove Paundraka out of his chariot with His sharp arrows and with His disc lopped off his head, just like Indra with his thunderbolt splits a mountain top. So too He with His arrows severed the head of the king of Kas'i from his body, sending it flying into Kas'i-puri like the wind transporting the flower-cup of a lotus. Thus having killed both the envious Paundraka and his friend, the Lord entered Dvaraka where He was honoured by the Siddhas [the perfected souls] who recited His nectarean stories. By assuming the personal form of the Supreme Lord and [thus] constantly meditating upon Him oh King, he [Paundraka] had destroyed all his material ties and became fully immersed in Him [viz. Krishna conscious, also see sarupya]. Seeing the head with the earrings that had landed near the palace gate, the people wondered: 'Whose head would this be?' Recognizing it as the head of the king, the ruler of Kas'i, his queens, his sons, his other relatives and the citizens loudly cried: 'Alas master, oh master, oh King, we are killed!' 7-2 His son named Sudakshina executed the funeral rites for his father, reflected and said: 'In order to avenge my father I will kill my father's murderer'. And thus 'the excellence of charity', with great attention together with the priests prayed to Mahes'vara [Lord Shiva]. At [the holy place of] Avimukta the great lord, being satisfied, offered him the choice of a benediction. He asked the mighty demigod for the benediction of a means to slay the One who had killed his father. 0-3 [Shiva said:] 'Be together with the brahmins and the leading priest of service to the dakshina [southern] fire following an abhicara ['hurting'] ritual. It is a ritual used against an enemy of the brahmins. That ritual fire together with the Pramathas [Shiva's attendants, see also 10.63: 6] will fulfill your desire.' Thus being instructed he observed the vows in order to harm Krishna. 2-3 Thereupon from the fire of the altar pit rose an impressive most horrendous figure with a tuft of hair, beard and mustache red like molten copper, hot radiating cinders of eyes, terrible teeth and a harsh face with arched and furrowed eyebrows. With his tongue licking the corners of his mouth, he was naked waving with a blazing trident [see also 4.5: 3 and 6.9: 12]. With legs as big as palm trees shaking the earth he, accompanied by ghosts, ran to Dvaraka while setting fire to all the directions. Seeing the [creature risen from the] abhicara fire approaching, all the residents of Dvaraka were struck with fear, just like animals facing a forest fire. Frightened they upset ran to the Supreme Personality of Godhead who at the royal court was playing a game of dice [and said to Him]: 'Save us oh Lord of the Three Worlds, save us from the fire burning down the city!'

Hearing the despondency of the people and seeing how upset His own men were, Sharanya, the Protector, laughed loudly and said: 'Do not be afraid of this, I will protect you!'

The Almighty Lord, everyone's Witness within and without, understood that the creature came from Mahes'vara and then, in order to put an end to him, sent off the cakra that He always carries with Him. This weapon of Krishna, the Sudars'ana cakra, that like a million suns was blazing with an effulgence like the fire at the end of the universe, tormented with its heat both the sky, the heavens, the earth in its ten directions and the fire [of the demon; see also 9.4: 46]. Frustrated by the power of the weapon of Him with the Disc in His Hand, the fire that was created turned around oh King. In its deference it from all sides closed in on Varanasi and burned to death Sudakshina and all his priests. He [finally] was consumed by the abhicara[fire] that he had created himself. The cakra of Vishnu directly thereafter in pursuit entered Varanasi with its gateways and watchtowers and its many raised porches, assembly halls, market places, warehouses and the buildings housing the elephants, horses, chariots and grains. Having burned all of Varanasi to ashes, Vishnu's Sudars'ana disc returned to the side of Krishna, He whose actions are effortless. Any mortal being who in full attention recounts or hears this heroic pastime of the Supreme Lord Praised in the Verses will be released from all sins.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 67:

Balarama Slays the Ape Dvidiva

The honourable king said: 'I wish to hear more about Balarama, the Unlimited and Immeasurable Lord whose activities are so amazing. What else did He do?'

Shri Shuka said: 'There was a certain ape named Dvidiva ['the two-faced one'], a friend of Naraka [or Bhaumasura, see 10.59]. He was the mighty brother of Mainda and an advisor of Sugriva [the monkey-chief, see also 9.10: 32, *]. In order to avenge his friend [who was killed by Krishna] this ape wreaked havoc by setting fire to the cities, villages, mines and cowherd communities of the kingdom. Sometimes he tore loose rocks and devastated with them all regions, especially the province of Anarta where the Lord resided who had killed his friend. Then again he stood in the middle of the ocean and, with a force of ten thousand elephants, with his arms churned the ocean water, thus flooding the coastal regions. At the ashramas of the exalted seers he wickedly broke down the trees and fouled the sacrificial fires with urine and stool. In a mountain valley he, like a wasp hiding an insect, brutally threw men and women in caves that he sealed with large boulders. Thus ravaging the lands and [even] defiling women of standing he, [one day] heard very sweet singing originating from the mountain named Raivatata and went hither. -1 There he saw Balarama the Lord of the Yadus who, most attractive in all His limbs and wearing a lotus garland, was positioned in the midst of a bevy of women. Intoxicated from drinking varuni [see also 10.65: 19] He rolled with His eyes and was singing, while His body shone as magnificently as an elephant in rut. The mischievous tree-dweller climbed on a branch and presented himself by shaking the tree and crying out frantically. Seeing his impudence Baladeva's consorts laughed out loud. The women in for some fun at first thought little of it. The ape ridiculed them with odd gestures of his eyebrows and such and showed them while Rama was watching, his bare behind right in front of them. 4-1 Balarama, the best of all launchers, angrily threw a rock at him, but the rascal ape made fun of Him dodging it, seized the jar of liquor and further aggravated Him. Wickedly laughing he broke the jar and pulled at the ladies' clothes. Full of false pride about his power, he thus with his insults offended the Strong One. Faced with the rudeness and the ravage this terror created all around, He full of anger determined to kill the enemy took up His club and plow. The mighty Dvidiva did that also. He uprooted a Shala tree with one hand, ran towards Balarama and struck Him on the head with it. But as it descended on His head Sankarshana unperturbed like a mountain, with His great strength took hold of it and struck back with His Sunanda [His club]. 9-2 Hit on his skull by the club the ape, with the resulting downpour of blood, looked as nice as a mountain red of oxide. Ignoring the blow he next charged in his turn, again violently uprooting and stripping another tree, but Balarama now really getting angry smashed it into a hundred pieces, just as He did with yet another one that by the ape was taken up in great fury. Time and again being beaten by the Supreme Lord, he thus raging with everywhere uprooting the forest, stripped it of all its trees. Frustrated about it he thereupon released a hail of stones over Baladeva, but the Wielder of the Club pulverised them all with ease. With both his arms as big as palm trees, the champion of the apes clenching his fists, attacked the Son of Rohini and beat Him on the chest. The Great Lord of the Yadus thereupon threw aside His club and plow and hammered with His hands him furiously on the collarbone so that Dvidiva vomited blood and came down. Because of the fall he made, the mountain with all its cliffs and trees shook oh tiger among the Kurus, just like a boat tossed about in the water by the wind. 'Jaya!', 'All glories!' and 'Excellent!', the enlightened souls, the perfected ones and the great sages residing in heaven exclaimed and poured down a shower of flowers.

Thus having finished Dvidiva who wreaked havoc in the world, the Supreme Lord upon entering the city was glorified by the people singing hymns.'

*. According to Shri Jiva Gosvami, the Mainda and Dvidiva mentioned in this verse are empowered expansions of the same Ramayana deities, who as residents of Lord Ramacandra's Vaikuntha domain fell down because of an offense against Lakshmana. Shri Vis'vanatha Cakravarti compares the fall out of bad association with Naraka, made by Dvidiva and Mainda - whom he considers eternally liberated devotees - to that of Jaya and Vijaya.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 68:
The Marriage of Samba and the Kuru City Dragged Trembling of His Anger

Shri Shuka said: 'Oh King, the daughter of Duryodhana named Lakshmana was by Samba [with the mother'], the son of Jambavati who was always victorious in battle, abducted from her svayamvara. The Kauravas became angry and said: 'How ill-behaved this boy is, insulting us with his by force taking the maiden against her will. Arrest him who is so undisciplined. What can the Vrishnis do against it? By our grace they enjoy the land that we gave them! When the Vrishnis find out that their son has been captured, they will come here. Then we will break their pride so that they will find peace, just as the senses do when they are firmly controlled.'

Having said this Karna, Shala, Bhuri, Yajnaketu [or Bhuris'rava] and Duryodhana, with the permission of the eldest Kuru [Bhishma], set out to fight Samba. The moment the great warrior Samba saw the followers of Dhritarashtra rushing at him, he took up his splendid bow and singlehandedly stood his ground like a lion. Determined to capture him, they who were headed by Karna filled with anger said: 'You there stop, stand and fight!', upon which the bowmen, getting in front of him, showered him with arrows. He, the descendant of the Yadus, oh best of the Kurus, unjustly attacked by the Kurus [all against one], could, as the son of the Inconceivable One [Krishna], not accept that any more than a lion would tolerate an attack from lower animals. -1 Twanging his wonderful bow, the hero all by himself, in one move, pierced the six warriors of Karna in their chariots with as many arrows. Four arrows he employed for each team of four horses and one arrow for each its charioteer and warrior. For that feat of arms he thereupon was honoured by the great bowmen. But then four of them pierced his horses, one pierced his charioteer and one split his bow. Thus they drove him out of his chariot. Now that the Kurus in the fight had gotten the young boy out of his chariot, they tied him up with difficulty and returned, victoriously with their girl, to their city.

Hearing from Narada Muni about this oh King, [the Yadus] got very angry with the Kurus [see also 10.49: 27] and, on the command of Ugrasena, prepared for war. 4-1 But Balarama, He who purifies the Age of Quarrel [Kali-yuga], calmed down the Vrishni heroes who already had put on their armor, for he did not wish a quarrel between the Vrishnis and the Kurus. On His chariot that shone like the sun, going to Hastinapura, He, surrounded by the brahmins and the elders of the family, looked like the moon surrounded by the seven planets [then known, see also 5.22]. After reaching Hastinapura, Balarama remained outside in a park and sent Uddhava ahead to find out what Dhritarashtra had in mind. According to the rules offering his respects to the son of Ambika [Dhritarashtra], to Bhishma and Drona, Bahlika and Duryodhana, he informed them that Balarama had arrived. Extremely pleased to hear that He, Balarama, their Dearest Friend had arrived, they all, after duly having paid Uddhava their respects, went to meet Him with auspicious offerings in their hands. Meeting Balarama they, as was proper, presented cows and water to welcome Him. They who knew about His [true] power bowed down their heads to Him. Asking each other whether their relatives were hale and hearty, Balarama next straight from His heart spoke the words: 'After with undivided attention having taken notice of what Ugrasena our master, the ruler of the rulers of the earth, asks of you, you without delay should act accordingly. [He tells you:] As for now I have tolerated that you in defiance of the rules, with the many of you have defeated and tied up but a single man who did respect the codes [of war], for I wish to keep the unity among my relatives...'

Hearing the words of Baladeva that befitting His power were filled with potency, courage and strength, the Kauravas answered angrily: 'Look how wondrously inescapable Time moves on. That what is a shoe now wants to step on a head that is ornamented with a crown! These Vrishnis who are connected to us by marital ties, share with us our beds, seats and meals. We treated them as equals and gave them their thrones. Because we looked the other way, they could enjoy the yak-tail fan, the conch shell, the white sunshade, the crown, the throne and the royal bed [compare 10.60: 10-20]. The Yadus no longer should be allowed to carry the divine insignia of kings. Those symbols work as much to the disadvantage of the giver [that we are] as when one gives nectar to a snake! The Yadus now assuming the command could prosper through our grace. They have lost all shame! How would even Indra dare to appropriate what was not granted by Bhishma, Drona, Arjuna or the other Kurus? It is like a sheep claiming a lion's kill!'

The son of Vyasa said: 'Oh best of the Bharatas, the low men intoxicated by their birth, relations and the opulence that gave them their status, thus used these harsh words against Balarama and then entered their city. Faced with the bad character of the Kurus and hearing their unbecoming words, the Infallible Lord became angry and then said, while He repeatedly laughed and not bothered to present Himself nicely: 'Given the big mouth these impudent, dishonest people have to their various passions, they clearly do not aim at peace. They apparently need to be pacified by corporeal punishment, like animals that one has to beat with a stick! 2-3 Oh, looking for peace with these people, I have come here, after tactfully having calmed the Yadus who boiled with anger, as also Krishna who was mad. And those very same dull-headed people addicted to quarreling, now full of conceit, in their wickedness of not respecting Him - Me thus -, have the audacity to use harsh words! And Ugrasena would not be fit to command the Bhojas, Vrishnis and Andhakas, while Shakra [the powerful one' or Indra] and other rulers follow his orders?? And He [Krishna], sitting in Sudharma [the heavenly council-hall], thanks to whom the parijata tree is enjoyed that was brought down from the immortals [see 10.59: 38-39], not even He would deserve an elevated seat??? He, the Ruler of the Complete Whole, whose two feet are worshipped by the Goddess of Fortune herself, He, truly the Lord of Shri, would not even be worth the paraphernalia of a human king?!? He of whom all the exalted rulers of the world hold the dust of His lotus like feet on their helmet, the feet that constitute the place of worship of all holy places and of whom Brahma, Shiva and also I, next to the goddess, as portions of a portion, also constantly carry the dust with care... where would His royal throne stand????? The Vrishnis may enjoy whatever small piece of land granted to them by the Kurus and... We would be the so-called shoes, while the Kurus would be the head!!!!? Ah those proud madmen intoxicated by their would-be power of rule..., which man in command can tolerate their inconsistent, dismal drive! Today I will rid the earth of the Kauravas!', and speaking thus

He enraged took His plow and rose up as if He would set fire to the three worlds.

With the tip of His plow He infuriated pulled up the city of Hastinapura and dragged her along with the intention to throw her into the Ganges. 2-4 When the Kauravas saw how the city, about to fall in the Ganges, being dragged tumbled about like a raft, they got very agitated and, in order to save their lives, together with their families went to the Master for shelter. Led by Lakshmana and Samba they folded their hands: 'Rama, oh Balarama, oh Foundation of Everything [Akhiladhara], we the infatuated, who poor of understanding do not know Your Majesty, beg You to forgive us our offense. You alone are the unique, original cause of the generation, continuation and reuniting [of this universe]. Oh Lord, one says that the worlds are the playthings You play with. You oh Unlimited One, playfully carry on Your head the globe of the earth oh Thousand-headed One [see also 5.25] and when the creation ends, You, the One Without a Second, withdraw the universe into Your body, remain alone and lie down [see also 6.16: 29-64]. Your anger is meant for the instruction of everyone, oh Bhagavan, Sustainer of the Mode of Goodness. It is not there out of hatred or envy, but is there for the purpose of maintaining and protecting the living being. We bow down to you oh Soul of All Beings, oh Holder of [the symbols of] All Energies, oh Inexhaustible One and Maker of the Universe, our obeisances for You whom we sought for shelter.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Lord Bala being propitiated by the surrendered souls in distress because of their trembling place of refuge, thus being satisfied relieved them of their fear by the words: 'Do not be afraid.' 0-5 As a dowry for his daughter, Duryodhana as a loving father gave away twelve hundred sixty-year-old elephants and hundred and twenty thousand horses, sixty thousand golden chariots shining like the sun and a thousand maidservants with jeweled lockets around their necks. The Supreme Lord, the chief of the Satvatas, accepted all of that and then departed together with His son and daughter-in-law, being bid farewell by His well-wishers. After entering His city and having met the relatives who carried Him, the Wielder of the Plow, in their hearts, He in the midst of the assembly of the Yadu leaders related everything that had passed between Him and the Kurus. And truly, even today this city shows the signs of Balarama's prowess. It can be seen down by the Ganges where it is being prominently elevated to the south.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 69:

Narada Muni's Vision of Krishna in His Household Affairs

- Shri Shuka said: 'Hearing that Lord Krishna had killed Naraka [see 10.59] and that He alone had married so many women, Narada wanted to see that with his own eyes [and thought]: 'How wonderful it is that He with a single body is married to that many women, at the same time in sixteen thousand separate residences being alone with each of them.' Thus eager to take a look the sage of the gods came to Dvaraka, the place so flowery with its parks and pleasure gardens resounding with the noise of flocks of birds and swarms of bees. Blooming blue lotuses [indivaras], day-blooming ones [ambhojas], white esculent ones [kahlaras], moonlight-blooming lotuses [kumudas] and water lilies [utpalas] filled the lakes where the sounds were heard of swans and cranes. There were nine hundred thousand palatial mansions embellished with crystal glass, silver and great emeralds, that were splendidly furnished with gold and jewels. The city was systematically planned with many avenues, roads, intersections and squares, assembly houses and charming temples for the gods. Its paths and courtyards, shopping streets and patios were all sprinkled with water while the sun was warded off by banners that waved from the flagpoles. - In the city there was an opulent quarter honoured by all the local authorities. Tvashtha [the architect Vis'vakarma], had there for the Lord [who resided there], in full exhibited his talents by making the sixteen thousand residences for Shauri's wives as beautiful as he could. Narada entered one of the great palaces. -1 The building was supported by coral pillars that were excellently decorated with vaidurya ['cat-eye' gemstone]. The walls were covered with sapphires and the spotless floors shone everywhere. It was built with canopies that by Tvashtha were constructed with hangings of pearls and had seats and beds made of ivory that were decorated with the finest jewels. There were well-dressed, adorned maidservants with lockets around their necks and finely clad men with turbans and armor, jewels and earrings. Many gem-studded lamps dispelled with their light the darkness and on the carved eaves my best, the peacocks danced, crying loudly taking the aguru smoke they saw curling upwards from the latticed windows for a cloud. Inside, the man of learning saw the Lord of the Satvatas together with His wife who fanned Him with a yak-tail fan with a golden handle. She in her turn was every instant supported by a thousand maidservants equal to her in personal qualities, beauty, youth and fine dress. The Supreme Lord, the best defender of all dharma, noticing him, immediately rose from Shri's couch and offered him His own seat while bowing down with joined palms. Even though He was the Supreme Guru of the Living Being, He washed his feet and took that water on His head. He as the master of all saintly souls justly carries the transcendental name of 'the Well-wisher of the Brahmins' [Brahmanya deva] because one by dint of the holy shrine of His feet finds full purification [see also the stories of the Ganges flowing from His feet. 5.17 & 9.9]. Having been of full worship for the devarishi as was prescribed by the scriptures, He, the Greatest Sage, the Original Narayana, the friend of Nara, conversed with him in weighed words that were as sweet as nectar and asked: 'Oh Master, oh Fortunate One, what may We do for you?'

Shri Narada said: 'It is not that surprising that You show friendship for all people, oh Almighty Ruler of All the Worlds who subdues the envious ones. We very well know that You who are universally praised, out of Your own will have descended for the highest good of the continuation and the protection of the Living Being [*]. Having seen Your two feet, that for Your devotees are the path of liberation upon which Lord Brahma and the other gods of unfathomable intelligence meditate in the heart and which for those, who are fallen in the well of a material existence, are the shelter for deliverance, I ask for Your blessing to remember You so that I during my travels may constantly think of You.'

Narada my best, thereupon entered another residence of a wife of Krishna, with the wish to know the mystical power of illusion [yogamaya] of the Master of All Masters of Yoga. 0-2 And there he saw Him also. He was playing a game of dice with His beloved and Uddhava. He stood up for him, honoured him with transcendental devotion and seated him etc., asking him - as if He did not know: 'When has your good self arrived? How can those [householders] who are not so fulfilled like Us, do what should be done for those [sannyasis] who are fully satisfied [within]? Anyway, please tell Us oh brahmin, how We can make a success of this birth.' But Narada who was astonished, stood up, said nothing and went to another palace. And there he saw Govinda cuddling His small children. Next in another palace, he saw Him preparing for a bath. In one place he saw Him offering oblations, elsewhere he saw Him worshipping the five sacrificial fires [see maha-yajnas] with the obligatory rituals, then again He was feeding brahmins and in yet another place He was eating the remnants [of sacrifices]. Somewhere He was of sunset-worship while controlling His speech with reciting the mantra [for it, see Gayatri and japa] and elsewhere He moved about with His sword and shield in areas of practice. Here the Elder Brother of Gada rode horses, elephants and chariots and there He was lying on His sofa being praised by bards. This place He was consulting with advisers, Uddhava and others and that place He was engaged sporting in the water surrounded by dancing girls and other women. Somewhere He donated excellent, well ornamented cows to brahmins and elsewhere He listened to the auspicious classical stories [Puranas] and epic histories [Itihasas]. Laughing and joking with His beloved in this mansion, He elsewhere practiced the religion [dharma], the economy [artha] and the [regulation of] physical lusts [kama, see also purusharthas]. Sitting alone in one place to meditate on the Original Person Transcendental to Material Nature, He in another place rendered menial service to the elders, serving them attentively with things they liked. Planning for war with certain people here, and there again making peace, Kes'ava together with Balarama elsewhere minded the welfare of the pious souls. [He saw Him] arranging opulent weddings for daughters and sons in accordance with the vidhi, at the right time, with wives and husbands compatible to them. [He saw] the people astonished to witness the grand celebrations in which the Master of the Masters of Yoga sent away from home His children and welcomed in-laws in the family. With elaborate sacrifices in worship of all the gods being busy at one place, He was at another place of dharma in civil service arranging for wells, parks and monasteries and such. For a hunting expedition He somewhere was mounting a horse from Sindh while He elsewhere, surrounded by the most valorous Yadus, was killing the animals to be offered in sacrifice [see ]. At another place the Yoga master was moving about in disguise in the city and in other homes, eager to find out what the mentalities of the different people were. Narada almost laughed about that what of His yogamaya, of assuming the human role, had unfolded before his eyes and said to Hrishikes'a: 'From the service delivered at Your feet the knowledge could rise of Your mystical potencies, potencies that even for the great mystics are hard to envision, oh Lord of Yoga, oh Supreme Soul. Permit me to follow You in humility, oh Godhead, I will wander about the [fourteen] worlds that are flooded with Your glory and loudly sing about Your pastimes that purify all the worlds.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'Oh brahmin, I am the spokesman of the dharma and its performer. I am also the sanctioner of dharma as I teach it to the world. Do not be bewildered acknowledging it my son [when I set an example].'

Shri Shuka said: 'He [Narada] thus saw [as no one else could see ] Him present in one and the same form in all the palaces where He performed the spiritual principles of dharma that purify the householders. After repeatedly having witnessed Krishna's unlimited prowess in the elaborate manifestation of His yogamaya, the seer filled with wonder stood amazed. With [his witnessing of] the artha, kama and dharma [civil duties of household life, see also 7.14], thus by Lord Krishna's faithful heart thoroughly honoured, he satisfied went away with Him constantly in his mind. Narayana who for the welfare of everyone had manifested His potencies my dear, thus following the path of human existence, enjoyed the shy affectionate glances and satisfied laughter of His sixteen thousand most excellent women. Anyone, oh dear King, who chants, listens or appreciates [to read about] the unequalled activities performed by the Lord in this world, by Him who is the cause of the generation, continuation and dissolution of the universe, will become devoted to the Supreme Lord who constitutes the path of liberation.'

*. The parampara adds here: 'As pointed out by Shрила Vis'vanatha Cakravarti, all living beings are in fact servants of the Lord. The acarya quotes the following verse from the Padma Purana to elucidate:

a-karenocyate vishnuh
Shrir u-karena kathyate ma-karas tu tayor dasah
panca-vims'ah prakrititah

"[In the mantra AUM] the letter a signifies Lord Vishnu, the letter u signifies the goddess Shri, and the letter m refers to their servant, who is the twenty-fifth element." The twenty-fifth element is the jiva, the living being. Every living being is a servant of the Lord, and the Lord is the true friend of every living being. Thus even when the Lord chastises envious persons like Jarasandha, such punishment amounts to real friendship, since both the Lord's chastisement and His blessing are for the benefit of the living being.

 Even though this activity for the common people and the brahmins is forbidden by the vidhi rule of daya for the sake of being compassionate with all living beings, it is in certain cases allowed to kill animals in Vedic society. Shрила Prabhupada comments: "According to Vedic regulations, the kshatriyas were allowed to kill prescribed animals on certain occasions, either to maintain peace in the forests or to offer the animals in the sacrificial fire. Kshatriyas are allowed to practice this killing art because they have to kill their enemies mercilessly to maintain peace in society." [see also e.g. 4: 26, 7.15, 10.1: 4, 10.56: 13 and 10.58: 13-16].

. The parampara adds to this: 'As stated in text 2 of this chapter, all the Lord's activities in the many palaces were performed by the Lord's single spiritual form (ekena vapusha), which manifested in many places at once. This vision was revealed to Narada because of his desire to see it and the Lord's desire to show it to him. Shрила Vis'vanatha Cakravarti points out that the other residents of Dvaraka could see Krishna only in the particular part of the city they themselves occupied, and not anywhere else, even if they would sometimes go to another precinct on some business. Thus the Lord gave a special view of His pastimes to His beloved devotee Narada Muni.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 70:

Krishna's Routines, Troubles and Narada Pays Another Visit

Shri Shuka said: At the break of dawn the crowing roosters were cursed by the wives of the Sweet Lord who, with the arms of their husband [the One Yogamaya Lord in Many] around their neck, were disturbed over the [consequent] separation. The birds awakened from their sleep by the bees in the breeze of the parijata trees, woke up Krishna with their noisy singing like they were the poets at the court. But Vaidarbhi [Rukmini] did not like that most auspicious time of the day because she then would have to miss the embrace of her beloved [Krishna]. - Madhava rose during the brahmamuhurta [the hour before sunrise], touched water and cleared His mind to meditate upon the unequalled, exclusive, self-luminous Self beyond all dullness of matter. This True Self dispels, infallible as it is, by its [His] own nature perpetually the impurity and gives the joy of existence. It is known as the Brahman that, with its [His] energies, constitutes the cause of the creation and the destruction of this universe [see also 3.29: 31 & 36-37, B.G. 7: 5 & 6 and *]. After according to the vidhi having bathed in pure water, He, the most truthful One, first dressing in lower and upper garments, performed the entire sequence of the worship at dawn and such and then, after offering oblations in the fire, quietly controlling His speech, chanted the Vedic mantra [the Gayatri, see also ]. - He faithful to His own nature in worship of the rising sun propitiated His own expansions. With due respect for the gods, the sages and forefathers, His elders and the ones of learning, He donated day after day many, many good-natured cows with gold on their horns, silver on their hooves and pearl necklaces around their necks, cows that were rich with milk and had given birth to one calf only. Nicely caparisoned they were presented to the learned brahmins together with linen, deerskins, sesame seeds and ornaments [see also ]. Paying His respects to the cows, the men of learning, the godly souls, the elders, the spiritual teachers and to all living beings who were but expansions of Himself, He [giving darshan], laid His hand on all [persons and] auspicious matters. He, the very ornament of society, decorated Himself with the clothes, divine garlands, fragrant pastes and jewelry that befitted Him. He cared for both the ghee [used in the sacrifices] and the mirror and attended to the cows, the bulls, the twice-born souls, the gods and the objects of desire. He provided gifts to the satisfaction of all societal classes living in the city and in the palace and welcomed His ministers responding to all their needs in full. After first having distributed garlands, betel nut and sandalwood paste to the learned ones, [and then] to His friends, His ministers and His wives, He next would take His own share. His driver, who by then had brought His supremely wonderful chariot yoked with the horses Sugriva and so on [see 10.53: 5], stood bowing before Him. Holding the hand of the charioteer He then together with Satyaki and Uddhava mounted the chariot like He was the sun rising over the mountains in the east. With difficulty leaving the women behind in the palace who looked at Him with shy and loving glances, He departed, displaying a smile that seised their minds. Awaited by all the Vrishnis He entered the assembly hall named Sudharma [see also 10.50: 54] that for those who enter, fights the six waves [of material life], my dear [see shath-urmi]. The Almighty One, the Best of the Yadus seated there high on His throne in the midst of the Yadus who were the lions among men, illuminated all the quarters with His effulgence that shone like the moon in the sky surrounded by the stars. There were jesters, oh King, who served the Almighty One with various forms of amusement, professional entertainers [like magicians] and women who dancing energetically were of service. They danced to the sounds of vinas, mridangas and muraaja-drums, flutes, cymbals and conches, while the bards, storytellers and panegyrists sang and offered praise. Some brahmins sitting there continually recited Vedic mantras while others recounted stories about kings from the past famed for their piety.

Some day a person arrived, oh King, who was never seen there before. Announced by the doorkeepers he was given access to the Fortunate One. After his reverence before Krishna, the Supreme Lordship, he with joined palms submitted that [a certain number of] kings were suffering because they were being held captive by Jarasandha. During a conquest of all the directions by him, those kings had been captured who had not accepted him in complete subservience. They - about twenty thousand of them - were forcibly detained in the fortress of Girivraja. The kings had sent the message: 'Krishna, oh Krishna, oh immeasurable Soul, oh You who takes away the fear of the surrendered souls. We being so different in mentality, afraid as we are in our material existence, have come to You for shelter! The whole world delighting in misconduct is bewildered about the duties out here to be of one's own worship for You according to Your [varnashrama] command. May there be the obeisances unto You, the Ever Vigilant [hunbinking eye of Time] who all of a sudden [at the time of one's death] cuts off that headstrong hope for longevity in this life. You, the predominating authority of this universe, have descended together with Your expansion [Balarama] in order to protect the saintly and to subdue the wicked. We would not know oh Lord, how anyone transgressing Your law [like Jarasandha] or anyone else by his own creativity [like us] could achieve such a thing. With the burden of this mortal frame carried by us with a constant fear, our happiness is like the conditional happiness of kings, oh Lord, that is [as ephemeral] as a dream. When we reject the happiness of the soul that is obtained by selfless service unto You, we have to suffer the greatest misery with Your bewildering material reality of maya out here. Therefore, oh Goodness whose two feet remove the sorrow, please release us, the surrendered souls, from the fetters of karma formed by the king named Magadha. Like the king of the animals capturing sheep, he all by himself wielding the prowess of a ten thousand mad elephants, has imprisoned us in His palace. Eighteen times [facing him] You [seventeen times] raised Your cakra and crushed him. Only once he managed to defeat You in battle when You, confiding in Your unlimited power, were absorbed in human affairs [see 10.50: 41 & 10.52: 7]. And now he filled with pride torments us, Your subjects, oh Unconquerable One. Please rectify that!' The messenger said: 'Those who are held captive by Jarasandha thus hanker to see You in their surrender to the base of Your feet. Please bestow Your welfare on these poor souls!'

Shri Shuka said: 'After the envoy of the kings thus had spoken, the supreme rishi [Narada] appeared who with his yellowish mass of matted locks had an effulgence like that of the sun. As soon as the Supreme Lord Krishna, the Supreme Controller of the controllers of all the worlds, saw him, He together with His followers and the members of the assembly gladdened stood up and bowing His head proved His respects. After the muni had accepted a seat, He pleased him with worship according to the rules and spoke next the truthful, pleasing words: 'It is a fact that the three worlds today are completely freed from all fear, for that is the quality of you, the great and fortunate soul traveling the worlds. Within the three worlds created by the Lord there is nothing you do not know, let us therefore hear from you what the plans of the Pandavas are.'

Shri Narada said: 'I often witnessed [the different appearances of] Your inscrutable maya oh Almighty One, oh Bewilderer of [even] the Creator of the Universe [see 10.14]. It does not amaze me oh All-encompassing One, that You, being covered by Your own energies, are moving among the created beings like a fire with its light covered. Who is able to properly understand the purpose of You who by Your material energy creates and withdraws this universe [that for its beings is] manifested to exist in relation to You [to experience the essence]. My obeisances for You whose nature is inconceivable. For the individual soul in samsara, who knows no liberation from the trouble that the material body brings, He lights His torch of fame through the pastimes of His avatars. You, that Lord, I approach for shelter. I will nonetheless tell You, oh Highest Truth who imitates the human ways, what Your devotee the king [Yudhishtira], the son of Your father's sister, intends to do. The king, the son of Pandu desires the sovereignty and wants to perform for Your sake the greatest sacrifice that is called the Rajasuya. Can You please give Your blessing to this? Oh Lord, that best of all sacrifices will be attended by all the enlightened and likewise souls eager to see You, as also by all the kings of victory and glory. When the dregs of society find purification from just hearing about, chanting and meditating on You, the Full Manifestation of the Absolute, what may then be expected in case of those who [factually may] see and touch You? The spotless reputation of You that is expanding in all directions, is proclaimed in heaven, in the lower regions and on earth, oh Bringer of Good Fortune to All the Worlds. In the form of the water washing from Your feet that purifies the entire universe, that grace is called the [river] Mandakini in the divine spheres, the Bhogavati in the lower worlds and the Ganges here on earth.'

Shri Shuka said: 'When His supporters [the Yadus] did not agree with this proposition [for a Rajasuya] because they desired the defeat [of Jarasandha], Kes'ava with a smile and a charming use of words addressed His servant Uddhava. The Fortunate One said: 'You, as the apple of Our eye and Our well-wishing friend, from that position know perfectly well what expression would be of use in this regard. Please tell Us what should be done, We have full faith in you and will do what you say.'

With that request from his Maintainer who acted as if He, the all-knowing One, was puzzled, Uddhava humbly accepting the order on his head, gave a reply.'

*: Concerning the matter of Brahman relating to the person of Krishna the parampara adds: 'One who is favored by the Lord's internal potency can understand the nature of the Absolute Truth [or Brahman]; this understanding is called Krishna consciousness.'

 According to Shridhara Svami Lord Krishna, before sunrise first offering oblations and then doing the mantra, in this would follow the disciplic succession of Kanva Muni [mentioned in 9.20].

: With the M.W. dictionary confirming to the term badva used here the meaning of 'a great number' Shridhara Svami quotes several Vedic scriptures to show that in the context of the Vedic ritual, a badva here refers to 13,084 cows and further gives evidence that the usual practice for great saintly kings in previous ages was to give away 107 such badva, or groups of 13,084 cows. Thus the total number of cows given in this sacrifice, known as Mancara, could have amounted to 14 lakhs, or 1,400,000.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 71:

The Lord Travels to Indraprastha on the Advice of Uddhava

Shri Shuka said: 'The gifted Uddhava hearing what this was stated by the devarishi, spoke with understanding for the stance taken by Krishna and the royal assembly. Shri Uddhava said: 'Oh Lord, You should do what the rishi said and assist Your cousin who wants to perform the sacrifice. You should also protect those [kings] who seek their refuge. Since the Rajasuya sacrifice should be performed by someone who gained the upper hand in all directions, oh Almighty One, You to my opinion will serve both the purposes [of the sacrifice and the protection] when you triumph over the son of Jara. This way releasing the imprisoned kings, there will be a great advantage for us as also glory for You oh Govinda. He [Jarasandha] is a king as strong as a thousand elephants and cannot be defeated by other men in power, save for Bhima who is equally strong. He can only be defeated chariot-to-chariot, not when he is together with a hundred akshauhinis. Devoted as he is to the brahminical, he will also never refuse what the men of learning ask from him. Bhima visiting him wearing the dress of a brahmin, must beg for charity and without hesitation kill him in a one-to-one fight in Your presence. Hiranyagarbha [the one of the golden light' or Brahma] and Sharva [he who kills by the arrow, Shiva, see 7.10: 67] are but the instruments, in universal creation and annihilation, of the Supreme Lord of the Universe, of You in the form of formless Time. The godly wives of the [imprisoned] kings sing in their homes about Your spotless deeds. They sing about You killing their enemy and delivering them. They sing about You just as the gopis do [missing You, see 10.31] and the lord of the elephants [Gajendra did being captured see 8.3], just as the daughter of Janaka [Sita] did [for Ramacandra, see 9.10] and Your parents [prayed for Your grace being imprisoned by Kamsa, see 10.3], just as the sages do upon having obtained Your shelter [see e.g. 9.5] as also we now do singing about You. The killing of Jarasandha, oh Krishna, will surely bring us an immense advantage, namely the consequent excellence [of the kings] as also the sacrifice favored by You.'

Shri Shuka said: 'The words Uddhava thus spoke, in every way auspicious and infallible, oh King, were by the devarishi, the Yadu elders and also by Krishna praised in response. The Almighty Supreme Lord, the son of Devaki, took leave from the ones He owed respect [following the human ways] and next ordered His servants Daruka, Jaitra and others to prepare for His departure. He assembled His wives, sons and luggage, said goodbye to Sankarshana [Balarama] and the Yadu king [Ugrasena], oh killer of the enemies and then mounted His chariot brought by His driver, from which the flag of Garuda waved. Then, surrounded by His chiefs and fierce guard, chariots, elephants, infantry and cavalry - His personal army - He moved out, with from all sides the vibration of the sounds of mridangas, bheri horns, gomukha horns, kettledrums and conch shells. In golden palanquins carried by strong men, Acyuta's wives along with their children well guarded by soldiers with shields and swords in their hands, followed their Husband clad in fine clothes, ornamented and with perfumed oils and garlands. Next came the ornamented women of the household and the courtesans on human carriers, camels, bulls, buffalo, donkeys, mules, bullock carts and she-elephants that [further] were fully loaded with garts, blankets, clothing and more items like that. The huge army carrying a choice of long flagpoles, banners, luxurious sunshades, yak-tail fans, weapons, jewelry, helmets and armor, appeared that day glittering and shining in the rays of the sun. With the rumour of its sounds it sounded like an ocean restless with timingilas and waves. After having heard and approved His plan, the muni [Narada], being honoured by the Lord of the Yadus and feeling happy over his meeting with Mukunda, bowed down to Him, placed Him in his heart and then left through the sky. In order to please him with His word the messenger of the kings was told the following by the Supreme Lord: 'Do not fear oh envoy, I wish you [and your kings] all good fortune. I will see to it that the king of Magadha will be put to death.'

Thus being addressed the messenger departed and informed the kings in detail. And so they, eager for their liberation, awaited the moment they would meet Shauri. The Lord traveling through Anarta [the region of Dvaraka], Sauvira [eastern Gujarat], Marudes [the Rajasthan desert] and Vinas'ana [the district of Kurukshetra], on his way passed [many] hills, rivers, cities, villages, cow pastures and quarries. After first crossing the river Drishadvati, Mukunda next crossed the Sarasvati, then passed through the province of Pancala and Matsya and finally reached Indraprastha. Hearing that He had arrived whom one sees but rarely among human beings, the one whose enemy still had to be born [king Yudhishtira, in order to welcome Him], joyfully came out [of his city] surrounded by priests and relatives. With an abundance of sounds of songs and instrumental music and the vibration of hymns he headed for Hrishikes'a, as much filled with reverence as the senses are tuned to life. The heart of the Pandava seeing Lord Krishna after so long a time, melted with affection whereupon he embraced Him, his dearest friend, over and over. The ruler of man closing the body of Mukunda, the shining abode of Rama in his arms, found all his ill-fortune destroyed and achieved the highest bliss. In his exhilaration having tears in his eyes he forgot the illusory affair of being embodied in the material world. Bhima filled with joy embraced Him, his maternal nephew and laughed out of love with eyes brimming with tears. And also from the eyes of the twins [Nakula and Sahadeva] and of Kiriti [he with the helmet' or Arjuna] flowed profusely the tears as they with pleasure embraced Acyuta, their dearest friend. After being embraced by Arjuna and having received obeisances from the twins, He, according to the etiquette, bowed before the brahmins and the elders and honoured [the rest of] the honourable Kurus, Srinjayas and Kaikayas. The bards, the chroniclers, the singers of heaven, the eulogists and jesters with mridangas, conches, kettledrums, vinas, small drums and gomukha horns, all sang, danced and glorified with hymns the Lotus-eyed one, as also did the brahmins. The Supreme Lord, the Crest Jewel of all Souls of Pious Renown, thus being glorified by His well-wishers around Him, entered the decorated city. 1-3 In the city of the king of the Kurus He saw, on the roads sprinkled with water that were fragrant of the mada [the rut-liquid] of elephants, colourful flags, gateways decorated with golden pots full of water and young men and women all clad in new apparel who wore ornaments, flower garlands and had sandalwood on their bodies. In each home lamps were lit and offerings of tribute displayed. The smoke of incense drifted through the latticed windows and banners waved from the rooftops that were adorned with golden domes with large silver bases. Hearing of the arrival of Him who for the eyes of man is a reservoir to drink from, the young women in order to witness that, went onto the king's road. Thereby they immediately abandoned their households - or their husbands in bed -, with [sometimes] in their eagerness, the knots in their hair and their dresses loosened. On that road very crowded with elephants, horses, chariots and soldiers on foot, they caught the sight of Krishna with His wives. And while they embraced Him in their hearts, the women who [because of the commotion] had climbed onto the rooftops, scattered flowers and prepared Him a heartfelt welcome with broadly smiling glances. Seeing Mukunda's wives on the road like stars around the moon, the women exclaimed: 'What have they done that the Foremost of Men with but the small portion of His glances and playful smiles grants their eyes the [greatest] joy?' Citizens here and there approached Him with auspicious offerings in their hands and the masters of the guilds, who had banned their sins, performed worship for Krishna. As He entered the king's palace the members of the royal household all approached in a hurry to greet Mukunda filled with love and with blossoming eyes. The moment Pritha [queen Kunti] saw her brother's son, Krishna, the Controller of the Three Worlds, she with a heart full of love together with her daughter-in-law [Draupadi] rose from her couch in order to embrace Him. The king brought Govinda, the Supreme God of All Gods, to His quarters but, overwhelmed by his great joy, he forgot what all had to be done to honour Him with reverence. Krishna oh King, performed His obeisances in respect of His aunt and the elderly women, whereupon His sister [Subhadra] and Krishna [Draupadi] bowed down to Him. 1-4 Urged by her mother-in-law [Kunti] Krishna [Draupadi] honoured all Krishna's wives with clothing, flower garlands and jewelry and such: Rukmini, Satyabhama, Bhadra, Jambavati, Kalindi, Mitravinda the descendant of Shibi, the chaste Nagnajiti as also the others who had come. The king of dharma [Yudhishtira] comfortably accommodated Janardana, His army, His servants, ministers and His wives and saw to it that they suffered no lack at any given moment. 4-4 He stayed a couple of months because He wanted to please the king and went, sporting with Arjuna, surrounded by guards out riding in His chariot. Together with Arjuna He satisfied the fire-god by offering him the Khandava forest. Maya [Danava, a demon] whom He had saved, then built a celestial assembly hall for the king [in Hastinapura].'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 72:

Jarasandha Killed by Bhima and the Kings Freed

Shri Shuka said: 'Yudhishtira one day sat in his court surrounded by the sages, the nobles, the popular personalities, the business men and his brothers. With all the acaryas, the family, the elders, his blood relatives, in-laws and friends listening, he addressed Krishna saying the following. Shri Yudhishtira said: 'Oh Govinda, I wish to honour Your different heroic deeds with the purifying sacrifice that is the king of all fire sacrifices named Rajasuya. Please allow us to perform that sacrifice oh Master. They who constantly, in full service meditate upon and glorify Your slippers, which cause the destruction of all inauspicious things, find purification. They and not other persons, oh You whose navel is like a lotus, manage by their prayers to put an end to their material existence or else get, as far as they desire something, the things done they want. Therefore oh God of Gods, let the people see the power of serving Your lotus feet in this world. Please oh All-powerful One, show them both the status of the Kurus and the Srinjayas who are of worship and the status of the ones who are not of worship. In Your mind of Absolute Truth there can be no difference between 'mine en thine', for You are the Soul of All Beings who, equal in Your vision, experience the happiness within Yourself. Those who properly serve You, You, just like the desire tree, grant the desired results according to the service rendered. There is no contradiction in this [catering to desires].'

The Supreme Lord said: 'There is nothing wrong with your plan, oh King, following it all the world will witness your auspicious fame, oh tormentor of the enemies! For the sages, the forefathers, the gods and the friends, oh master of Us, as also for all living beings, [the performance of] this king of sacrifices [the literal meaning of Rajasuya] is desirable. Bring the earth under control by conquering all the kings, collect all the necessities [for the ceremony], and [next] perform the great sacrifice. These brothers of yours, oh King, were born as partial aspects of the demigods who rule the worlds [see family-tree], and I, who am unconquerable for those not in control with themselves, am conquered by you who are of self-control. No person, not even a demigod - not to mention an earthly ruler -, can by his strength, beauty, fame or riches in this world subdue someone who is devoted to Me.'

Shri Shuka said: 'The king with a face blossoming like a lotus, was pleased to hear the song [the Gita] of the Supreme Lord. Energised by the potency of Vishnu, he engaged his brothers in the conquest of all the directions. He sent Sahadeva with the Srinjayas to the south, Nakula with the Matsyas in the western direction, Arjuna with the Kekayas to the north and Bhima with the Madrakas to the east. The heroes, by their personal strength subduing many kings, brought him from everywhere an abundance of riches, because for him, intent upon performing the sacrifice, the enemy still had to be born, oh King. The king heard that Jarasandha was not defeated and thought about it. The Original Person, the Lord, then enlightened him on the means Uddhava had mentioned [in 10.71: 2-10]. And so Bhimasena, Arjuna and Krishna disguised as brahmins together went to Girivraja my dear, where the son of Brihadraatha [Jarasandha] resided. Going to his residence at the hour appointed for receiving [uninvited] guests, the nobles, appearing as brahmins, begged with the religious householder who was of respect for the brahminical culture: 'Oh King, know us as guests in need who have arrived from afar. We wish you all the best. Please grant us all that we desire. What would for a patient person be intolerable, what would for an impious person be impossible, what would by a generous person not be donated and who would exclude someone who has an equal vision towards all? He is reprehensible and pitiable who, while being very well capable, with the temporal body fails to acquire the lasting fame glorified by the saints. Many souls like Haris'candra, Rantideva, Unchavrittii Mudgala, Shibi, Bali, and the legendary pigeon with his hunter [see*], attained the eternal [Souly] through the [forsaking of that what is] impermanent.'

Shri Shuka said: 'However, from their voices, their physical stature and the bowstring marks on their arms even, he [Jarasandha] recognised them as nobles, as members of the family he had seen before. [he thought:] 'These relatives of the royal class wearing the insignia of brahmins, I should give whatever they demand, even something as difficult to forsake as my own body. 4-2 Is it not known of Bali that his spotless glory spread wide in all directions, even though he was brought down by Lord Vishnu [Vamana] who, appearing in the form of a twice-born soul of Vishnu, a brahmin, wanted to take away Indra's opulence? Knowingly the daitya king [Bali] gave away the entire earth, despite the advise against it, that he received [from his guru, see 8.19]. Of what use is it for someone from a kshatriya background, to be alive but, with his perishable body, not endeavor in favor of the greater glory of the brahmins?' With that mentality the generous soul said to Krishna, Arjuna and Vrikodara [wolf-belly' or Bhima]: 'Oh men of learning, I will give you whatever you want, even if you ask for my own head!'

The Supreme Lord said: 'Please, oh high and mighty King, accept the challenge to give us battle in a one-to-one fight, if you deem that fit. We, members of the royalty, have come here with the wish to fight and do not want anything else. That is Bhima the son of Pritha, the other one is his brother Arjuna and know Me to be Krishna, their maternal cousin, your enemy [see 10.50].'

Thus being invited the king of Magadha laughed loudly and said contemptuously: 'In that case, I will give you battle, you fools! But I will not fight with You. Cowardly You, lacking in strength in the battle, abandoned Your city Mathura and left for a safe place in the ocean. As for this one, Arjuna, he is not old enough nor very strong, he is no match for me and should not be my opponent. Bhima is the one equal in strength to me.'

Thus having spoken he gave Bhima a large club and went outside the city, himself taking up another one. Then opposing on the battle ground, the two heroes stroke each other with their lightning-bolt like clubs. The fight drove them to mad fury. Skillfully circling each other to the left and the right, the fight appeared as beautiful as of a couple of actors on a stage. The clash of their clubs swung against each other, oh King, resembled a crash of lightning or the clattering of elephant tusks. Infuriated vigorously fighting like a couple of elephants, their clubs, with the rapid force of their arms were powerfully swung against each other's shoulders, hips, feet, hands, thighs and collarbones, were in the contact smashed to pieces like they were some arka branches. With their clubs thus being ruined, the two great heroes among men angrily pummeled each other with their iron-like fists. [And also] the slapping of their hands sounded like elephants crashing into each other or as harsh claps of thunder. The fight of the two men striking each other who were equally trained, just as strong and of the same endurance, thus remained undecided and continued unabated, oh King []. Krishna who had knowledge about the birth and death of the enemy and how he by Jara was brought to life [see 9.22: 8 and ], then shared His own power of thought with the son of Pritha. He whose Vision is Infallible had determined the means to kill their enemy and demonstrated it to Bhima by tearing apart a twig for a sign. Understanding that, the immensely strong Bhima, the best of all fighters, seised his enemy by the feet and threw him to the ground. Standing with his foot on top of one leg, he with both hands took hold of the other one and tore, just like a great elephant with a tree branch, him apart from the anus upward. The king's subjects then saw him separated in two pieces with each one leg, one thigh, one testicle, one hip, one backside, one shoulder, one arm, one eye, one eyebrow and one ear. After the lord of Magadha had been killed a great cry of lamentation rose, while Arjuna and Acyuta both congratulated Bhima and embraced him. The Unfathomable One Supreme Lord and Sustainer of All Living Beings then freed the kings who were imprisoned by the king of Magadha and crowned his son Sahadeva as the lord and master of the Magadhas.'

*: The story goes that the pigeon and his mate gave their own flesh to a hunter to prove their hospitality, and thus they were taken to heaven in a celestial airplane. When the hunter understood their situation in the mode of goodness, he also became renounced, gave up hunting and went off to perform severe austerities. Because he was freed of all sins, was he, after his body burned to death in a forest fire, elevated to heaven.

: Some acaryas include the following two verses in the text of this chapter, and Shрила Prabhupada has also translated them in 'Krishna':

evam tayor maha-raja yudhyatoh sapta-vims'atih dinani niragams tatra suhrid-van nis'ti shthathoh ekada matauleyam vai praha rajau vrikodararh na Shakto 'ham jarasandham
nirjetum yudhi madhava

"Thus, oh King, they continued to fight for twenty-seven days. At the end of each day's fighting, both lived at night as friends in Jarasandha's palace. Then on the twenty-eighth day, oh King, Vrikodara [Bhima] told his maternal cousin, 'Madhava, I cannot defeat Jarasandha in battle.' "

: Shрила Prabhupada writes "Jarasandha was born in two different parts from two different mothers. When his father saw that the baby was useless, he threw the two parts in the forest, where they were later found by a black-hearted witch named Jara. She managed to join the two parts of the baby from top to bottom. Knowing this, Lord Krishna therefore also knew how to kill him."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 73:

Lord Krishna Blesses the Liberated Kings

- Shri Shuka said: 'The twenty thousand eight hundred [kings] who in battle were defeated [by Jarasandha] came out of the fortress of Giridroni [the capital] being filthy and with dirty clothes. Emaciated by hunger, with dried up faces and because of their imprisonment being greatly weakened, they drank Him in with their eyes and appeared to be licking Him up with their tongues, to be smelling Him with their nostrils and embracing Him with their arms. For Him, dark grey like a rain cloud, in yellow clothing, marked by the Shrivatsa, with His four arms, charming eyes pinkish as the whorl of a lotus, pleasant face and the gleaming makara [seamonster shaped] earrings; for Him with a lotus, a club, a conch shell and a disc in His hands, adorned with a helmet, necklace, golden bracelets, a belt and armlets and with the splendid, brilliant jewel and a forest flower garland around His neck; for Him they, whose sins were destroyed, bowed their heads down at His feet. And the same moment the kings with joined palms praised the Master of the Senses with their words, the weariness of their imprisonment was dispelled by the ecstasy of seeing Krishna.

The kings said: 'We offer You our obeisances oh God of the Gods, oh Lord of the Surrendered Souls and Remover of Distress. Oh Inexhaustible One, please oh Krishna, save us who take refuge in You in our dependency about this terrible material existence. Oh Madhusudana, we do not want to blame the ruler of Magadha, oh Master, for it is by Your grace, oh Almighty One, that the kingdoms of the rulers of man [who defy You] fall down. Intoxicated by his wealth and power of rule a king loses his self-restraint and does not obtain the real benefit, because he, deluded by Your maya, takes his temporary assets for permanent. The same way a child takes a mirage for a reservoir of water, those lacking in discrimination take the illusory affair that is subject to transformation, for substantial. 2-1 We who in the past, in our lusting about the wealth, were blinded and quarreled with each other about ruling this earth, have very mercilessly harassed our citizens, oh Master and have with [You in the form of] death standing before us, arrogantly disregarded You. We oh Krishna, have been forced to part with our opulence and were hurt in our pride by Your mercy in the form of the irresistible power of the Time that moves so mysteriously. We beg You to allow us to live in the remembrance of Your feet. We henceforth no longer hanker for a kingdom that, appearing like a mirage, must constantly be served by the material body that is subjected to demise and constitutes a source of disease. Nor do we, oh Almighty One, hanker for the fruits of pious work in an hereafter that is so attractive to our ears [compare B.G. 1: 32-35]. Please instruct us in the means by which we may remember Your lotus feet, despite the fact that we cannot stop returning over and over to this world [see B.G. 8: 14]. Again and again we offer our obeisances to Krishna the son of Vasudeva, the Lord and Supersoul of those who know to surrender, to Govinda, the Destroyer of the Distress.'

Shri Shuka said: 'The Supreme Lord, the Giver of Shelter, in this spirit being praised by the kings who were freed from their bondage dear King, mercifully spoke to them with kind words. The Supreme Lord said: 'Oh Kings, I assure you, as from now, as you wish, in you there will rise a very firm devotion to Me, the Self and Controller of All. Your resolve is a fortunate one oh rulers, for I see you truthfully speak about the impudent infatuation with the opulence and power that drives mankind to madness. Haihaya [or Kartaviryarjuna 9.15: 25], Nahusha [9.18: 1-3], Vena [see 4.14], Ravana [9.10], Naraka [or Bhauma 10.59: 2-3] and others fell from their positions as gods, demons and men, because they were intoxicated by the opulence. Understanding that this material body and such have a beginning and an end, you, with [Vedic] sacrifices being connected to Me in worship, have the duty to protect your citizens in accordance with the dharma. Engaged in begetting generations of progeny and encountering the facts of happiness and distress, birth and death, you should fix your minds in My worship. Neutral in respect of the body and everything to it and steadfast to the vows being satisfied within, you, fully focussing your minds upon Me, will finally reach Me, the Absolute of the Truth [compare B.G. 4: 9; 8: 7; 9: 28; 12: 3-4].'

Shri Shuka said: 'Krishna, the Supreme Lord and Controller of All the Worlds, who thus had instructed the kings, then engaged menservants and women to give them a bath. Oh descendant of Bharata, He took care that Sahadeva [Jarasandha's son] served them with the clothing, ornaments, garlands and sandalwood paste that befitted them. Properly bathed and well decorated they were fed with excellent food and bestowed with various pleasures worthy of kings, like betel nut etc. Honoured by Mukunda the kings freed from their distress shone splendidly with their gleaming earrings, like they were the planets at the end of the rainy season. After assigning chariots to them adorned with gold and jewels and pulled by fine horses He, gratifying them with pleasing words, sent them off to their kingdoms. They who thus by Krishna, the greatest of all personalities, were liberated from hardship, went away with in their minds nothing but the deeds of Him, the Lord of the Living Being that is the Universe. With their ministers and other associates they discussed what the Supreme Personality had done and then attentively carried out what the Lord had instructed. After having Jarasandha killed by Bhimasena, Kes'ava accepted worship from Sahadeva and departed accompanied by the two sons of Pritha. Arriving in Indraprastha they blew the conch shells that previously had made the enemies unhappy they defeated, but now brought delight to their well-wishers. The residents of Indraprastha were pleased in their hearts to hear that sound. They understood that Jarasandha was put to rest and that the king [Yudhishtthira] had achieved his purpose. Having offered the king their obeisances, Arjuna, Bhima and Janardana recounted everything they had done. The king of dharma could not utter a word when he heard that. In ecstasy over Krishna's mercy he shed tears out of love.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 74:

The Rajasuya: Krishna Number One and Shishupala Killed

Shri Shuka said: 'King Yudhishtthira, thus hearing about the death of Jarasandha and the display of power of the almighty Krishna, was pleased about it and addressed Him. Shri Yudhishtthira said: 'All the spiritual masters, inhabitants, and great rulers there are in the three worlds, carry the difficult to obtain command [of You] on their heads. That You Yourself, the Lotus-eyed Lord, take directions from by the day living people [like us] who consider themselves controllers, is oh All-pervading One, a great pretense [of you imitating our ways]. The way it is with the movements of the sun, the power of the One without a Second, the Absolute Truth, the Supersoul, does not increase nor diminish by [His] activities [see B.G. 2: 40]. Oh Madhava, the perverted animalistic mentality of making distinctions of 'I and mine' and 'you and yours', is truly not Yours, oh Unconquerable One, nor of Your bhaktas.'

Shri Shuka said: 'The son of Pritha thus having spoken, chose at a proper time for the sacrifice, with the permission of Krishna, the priests who were suitable, brahmins who were Vedic experts: - Dvaipayana [Vyasa], Bharadvaja, Sumantu, Gotama, Asita, Vasishthha, Cyavana, Kanva, Maitreya, Kavasha, Trita, Vis'vamitra, Vamadeva, Sumati, Jaimini, Kratu, Paila, Paras'ara, Garga, Vais'ampayana as also Atharva, Kasyapa, Dhaumya, Rama of the Bhargavas [Parashurama], Asuri, Vitihotra, Madhucchanda, Virasena and Akritavrana. 0-1 Also others were invited like Drona, Bhisma, Kripa, Dhritarashtra with his sons and the highly intelligent Vidura. Kings with their royal entourages, brahmins, kshatriyas, vais'yas and Shudras all came there eager to attend the sacrifice, oh King. The brahmins with golden plowshares then furrowed the place for worshipping the gods and inaugurated the king there according to the injunctions. 3-1 The utensils were golden like it had been in the past when Varuna was of sacrifice [compare 9.2: 27]. The rulers of the worlds headed by Indra, including Brahma and

Shiva, the perfected ones and the heavenly singers with their entourage, the scholars, the great serpents [v.i.p.s. egos], the sages, the wealth keepers and the wild men, the birds of heaven [see khaga], the mighty ones, the venerable souls and the earthly kings as also the wives of the kings who were invited, came from everywhere to the Rajasuya sacrifice which they, not surprised at all [about all the wealth], deemed quite appropriate for a devotee of Krishna. The priests who were as powerful as the gods, performed the Rajasuya sacrifice for the great king as was Vedicly prescribed, the way the demigods did it for Varuna. On the day set for extracting the soma juice, the king properly with great attention worshiped the sacrificers and the most exalted personalities of the assembly. The members of the assembly pondered over who of them should be honoured first, but could not arrive at a conclusion because there were many [members who qualified]. Then Sahadeva [the Pandava] spoke up: 'Acyuta deserves the supreme position, He is the Supreme Lord, the leader of the Satvatas. He stands for all the demigods as also the place, the time and the paraphernalia and such. 0-2 This universe as also the great sacrificial performances, the sacred fire, the oblations and the incantations are founded upon Him. The analytical perspective and the science of yoga are aiming at Him. He is the One and Only without a second upon whom the living being [the universe] is based., oh members of the assembly. He is the Unborn One relying on Himself only who creates, maintains and destroys. His grace brings about the various activities out here and because of His grace the entire world endeavors for the ideals characterised by religiosity and such [the purusharthas]. Therefore the greatest honour should be given to Krishna, the Supreme One. If we do that, we will be honouring all living beings, ourselves included. It should be awarded to Krishna, the Soul of all beings who considers no one as separate from Himself, to the Peaceful One Perfectly Complete who for anyone who wishes his love to be answered constitutes the Unlimited [of an Infinite Return].'

After Sahadeva well known with Krishna's dignity thus had spoken, he fell silent whereupon all the ones of excellence and truth who heard this, filled with happiness said: 'This is excellent, very fine!'

Hearing the twice-born souls say this, the king, pleased to know the heart of the assembly, overwhelmed by love worshiped Hrishikes'a in full. 7-2 He washed His feet and took the water that purifies the world on his head. Then he carried it joyfully to his wife, his brothers, his ministers and family. And as he with precious yellow silken garments and jewelry honoured Him, he could not look straight at Him because of the tears that filled his eyes. Seeing Him honoured this way all the people with joined palms exclaimed: 'Obeisances to You, all victory to You!' and saying this they bowed down to Him and showered Him with flowers.

The son of Damaghosha [S'ishupala, see 10.53] hearing this, aroused by the descriptions of Krishna's qualities, angrily rose from his seat waving with his arms and said, indignantly addressing the Fortunate One with harsh words, the following in the middle of the assembly: 'The Vedic word of truth that Time is the unavoidable controller, has by this been proven, for even the intelligence of the elders could be led astray by the words of a boy! You all know best who would be the most praiseworthy one! Please, oh leaders of the assembly, pay no attention to the statements of the boy that Krishna should be chosen to be honoured. 3-3 You overlook the leaders in the assembly who are the best among the wise, who are dedicated to the Absolute Truth and are worshiped by the rulers over the planet. They are men who by spiritual understanding, austerity, Vedic knowledge and vows eradicated their impurities. How can a cowherd who is a disgrace to His family, deserve it to be worshiped? He deserves it no more than a crow deserves the sacred rice cake! How can He who, engaging of His own accord, acts outside the bounds of all religious duties, devoid of kula [a proper upbringing] varna [vocational propriety] and ashrama [sense of duty according to one's age], thus missing the qualities, deserve it to be worshiped? With His [Yadu]-dynasty cursed by Yayati [see 9.18: 40-44], being ostracised by well-behaved persons [see 10.52: 9] and wantonly addicted to drinking [e.g. 10.67: 9-10], how can such a one deserve the worship? Abandoning the lands [of Mathura] graced by the brahmin sages, He with His associates took to a fortress in the sea [10.50: 49] where the brahminical order is not observed [10.57: 30] and where they as thieves cause the people a lot of trouble [e.g. 10.61].'

The Supreme Lord did not say a word to him who, using such and more harsh words, had lost all his chances. He kept silent like a lion to a jackal's cry. Hearing that intolerable criticism, the members of the assembly covered their ears and walked away while angrily cursing the king of Cedi. A person who does not leave the place where the Supreme Lord or His devotee is criticised, loses his pious credit and will fall down. Then the sons of Pandu as also the Matsyas, Kaikayas and Srinjays stood up infuriated with raised weapons, prepared to kill Shishupala. Shishupala oh scion of Bharata, thereupon undaunted took up his sword and shield and challenged with insults the kings in the assembly who were the proponents of Krishna. The Supreme Lord at that point stood up and stopped His devotees. Displeased He attacked His enemy with His sharp-edged disc and severed his head from his trunk. With Shishupala being killed a tumultuous uproar rose from the audience. The kings siding with him feared for their lives and fled away. Right before the eyes of everyone alive, from the body of Shishupala a light rose that entered Krishna like it was a meteor falling from the sky to the earth [see also 10.12: 33]. Throughout three lifetimes he had been obsessed with this mentality [of enmity] and thus meditating he [now finally] attained Oneness with Him [B.G. 4: 9, see also 10.12: 33]. It is indeed so that one's attitude is the cause of one's rebirth [see B.G. 8: 6 & Jaya and Vijaya]. The emperor rewarded the priests and the members of the assembly abundantly with gifts, respecting them all properly according to the scriptural injunctions and next performed the avabhritra ceremony [of washing himself and the utensils to conclude the sacrifice]. Krishna, the Master of all Yoga Masters, saw to it that the great sacrifice of the king was concluded and stayed, on the request of His well-wishers, a couple of months more [in Indraprastha]. The son of Devaki, Is'vara, then took leave from the king - who did not like that - and together with His wives and ministers went back to His city. The story of the two Vaikunthha residents who because of a curse of the sages [the Kumaras] had to take birth repeatedly, I have related to you in great detail [see 3.16]. When King Yudhishtthira bathed at the avabhritra of the Rajasuja, he in the midst of the brahmins and kshatriyas shone as brilliant as the king of the demigods. All the gods, human beings and travelers of the sky [the lesser gods, the Pramathas], being honoured by the king, happily returned to their domains, full of praise for Krishna and the sacrifice. [All were happy], except for the sinful Duryodhana who was the pest of the Kuru dynasty and the personification of the Age of Quarrel. To face the flourishing opulence of the Pandavas was something he could not tolerate.

He who recites these activities of Lord Vishnu, the deliverance of the kings, the [Rajasuya] sacrifice and the killing of the king of Cedi and such, is delivered from all sin.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 75:

Concluding the Rajasuya and Duryodhana Laughed at - The honourable king said: 'All the people of God, oh brahmin, who assembled at the Rajasuya sacrifice of Ajatas'atru [he whose enemy was never born, or Yudhishtthira], were delighted about the great festivity they saw: all the kings, the sages and enlightened souls, so I heard my lord, except for Duryodhana. Please tell us what the reason was.'

The son of Vyasa said: 'At the Rajasuya sacrifice of the great soul who is your grandfather, the family members who were bound in divine love, were engaged in humbly serving his cause. - Bhima was in charge of the kitchen, Duryodhana supervised the finances, Sahadeva managed the reception and Nakula procured the required items. Arjuna served the preceptors, Krishna washed the feet, the daughter of Drupada served the food and the magnanimous Karna handed out the gifts. Yuyudhana, Vikarna, Hardikiya, Vidura and others like the sons of Bahlika headed by Bhuris'rava and Santardana, were, eager to please the king, willing to engage in the different duties during the elaborate sacrifice, oh best of the kings. After the king of Cedi had entered the feet of the master of the Satvatas, the priests, the prominent officials, the highly learned and all the best well-wishers, being well honoured with pleasing words, auspicious offerings and gifts of gratitude, executed the avabhritra bathing ceremony in the heavenly river. During the avabhritra celebration the music sounded of a variety of gumukha horns, kettledrums, large drums, mridangas, smaller drums and conch shells. Female dancers danced and singers sang joyfully in groups as the loud sound of their vinas, flutes and hand cymbals reached the heavens. The kings wearing necklaces of gold took off together with foot soldiers, nice flags and banners of different colours and well ornamented majestic elephants, chariots and horses. The Yadus, Srinjays, Kambojas, Kurus, Kekayas and Kos'alas with their armies headed by [the king,] the performer of the sacrifice, made the earth tremble. The officials, the priests and the brahmins of excellence loudly vibrated Vedic mantras, while the demigods and sages, the forefathers and singers of heaven sang praises and rained down flowers. Men and women nicely adorned with sandalwood paste, garlands, jewelry and clothes, smeared and sprinkled each other playing with various liquids. The courtesans were by the men playfully smeared with oil, yogurt and perfumed water with plenty of turmeric and vermilion powder, and they smeared them in return []. The queens guarded by soldiers went out to witness this firsthand, just as did the wives of the gods in their celestial chariots in the sky. By their cousins and friends being sprinkled in their turn, they offered a beautiful sight with their blossoming faces and shy smiles. Squirting their brothers-in-law, their friends and so on with syringes, in their excitement, their arms, breasts, thighs and waists became visible because their dresses got drenched and loosened and the braids of small flowers in their hair slipped. With their charming play they thus agitated the ones who are impure of mind. The emperor mounted his chariot harnessed with the finest horses and shone, hung with gold, with his wives in all directions like he was the king of sacrifices, the Rajasuya with all its rituals, in person. After the priests had guided him through the patni-samyaja- [] and avabhritra ceremonies, they made him perform the acamana of sipping water for purification and bathe in the Ganges together with Draupadi. The kettledrums of the gods resounded together with those of the human beings, while the demigods, the sages, the forefathers and the humans released a downpour of flowers. Following this humans of all occupational and spiritual orders bathed in that place where even the greatest sinner can instantly be freed from all contamination. The king next put on a new set of silken garments and nicely ornamented honoured the priests, the officials and the brahmins with jewelry and clothing. The king, devoted to Narayana, in diverse ways went at lengths in proving his respects to the kings, his friends, well-wishers, direct family, more distant relatives as also to others. All the men with their jewels and earrings, flowers and turbans, jackets and silken garments as also with the most precious pearl necklaces, shone like the demigods. The women also radiated brilliantly with the beauty of their faces adorned with pairs of earrings and locks of hair and wearing golden belts. 5-2 Oh King, the highly qualified priests, the officials, the Vedic experts, the brahmins, the kshatriyas, vais'yas, Shudras and the kings who had come and together with their followers, the planetary rulers, the spirits, the forefathers and demigods had been worshiped, then with his permission all returned to their abodes. Like mortal men drinking amrita, they never had enough of glorifying the great celebration of the Rajasuya sacrifice performed by the wise king, the servant of the Lord. In his love for his family members, friends and relatives, king Yudhishtthira then stopped them. He was in pain about being separated from Krishna. My dear, in order to please him the Supreme Lord then stayed there. The Yadu heroes headed by Samba He sent off to Dvaraka. The king, the son of Dharma [of Yamaraja or Dharma, the lord of the duties] by Krishna being freed from his feverish condition [see also 10.63: 23] thus successfully managed to cross over the so difficult to overcome ocean of his great ambition.

When Duryodhana one day saw the opulence in the palace, he was troubled by the greatness of the Rajasuya and of him [Yudhishtthira] whose life and soul belonged to Acyuta. All the different opulences of the kings of men, the kings of the demons and the kings of the gods could be seen there. With that wealth that was provided by the cosmic architect [Maya Danava], the daughter of king Drupada served her husbands [the Pandavas]. The Kuru-prince lamented, for his heart was fixed on her. The thousands of queens of the Lord of Mathura were there also present at the time, most attractive with their waists and heavy hips moving around slowly on their feet that charmingly tinkled, wearing their pearl necklaces reddened by the kunkuma from their breasts and with their beautiful faces richly adorned with earrings and locks of hair. 4-3 In the assembly hall constructed by Maya it so happened that the son of Dharma, the emperor in person, in the company of his attendants, his family and also Krishna - who was his Very Eye - was seated on a throne of gold, being endowed with the opulences of supreme rulership and praised by court poets, like he was Indra. There oh King, then entered Duryodhana surrounded by his brothers. Proud as a peacock wearing a crown and necklace, he with a sword in his hand was ranting angrily [at the doorkeepers]. Bewildered by the magic of Maya taking the solid floor for water, he held the end of his garment high, but further up he fell into water that he mistook for a solid floor. Bhima seeing it laughed out loudly just as the women, the kings and the rest did, my dear. Even though they were checked by the king, it carried the approval of Krishna. He [Duryodhana], burning with anger, embarrassed with his face turned down, being hurt within left for Hastinapura whereupon from the saintly ones rose a very noisy 'Alas alas!' Ajatas'atru [the king] felt a little sad, while the Supreme Lord, from whose glance the bewilderment had risen, kept silent. He was prepared to remove the burden from the earth [see also 1.15: 25-26, 10.2: 38 and 10.63: 27].

Oh King, this is what I have to tell you concerning your question about the bad-heartedness of Duryodhana during the great Rajasuya sacrifice.'

*: Present day India knows the tradition of the Holi celebrations, the festival of colours once a year on the morning after the full moon in early March every year, where one plays this game. It celebrates the arrival of spring and the death of the demones Holika. Holika was the sister of Hiranyakas'ipu who fighting Prahlada could not succeed in killing him [see 7.5]. She, said to be fire resistant, sitting with him in a fire could not harm him. He remained unscathed, but she burned in the fire to ashes. Thus are with Holi the night before great bonfires lit to commemorate the story. Although Holi is observed all over the north, it's celebrated with special joy and zest at Mathura, Vrindavana, Nandgaon, and Barsana (the places where Lord Krishna and Shri Radha grew up). Lord Krishna, while growing up in Vraja, popularised the festival with His ingenious pranks. The gopis of Vraja responded with equal enthusiasm and the festivities have continued ever since. Role reversal with travesty, feminism etc. are accepted customs for the duration of the festival. Men and women of Vraja clash in a colourful display of a mock battle of the sexes. A naturally occurring orange-red dye, Kesudo, is used to drench all participants.

 : The patni-samyajya ritual is the ritual performed by the sponsor of the sacrifice and his wife, consisting of oblations to Soma, Tvashtha, the wives of certain demigods, and Agni.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 76:

The Battle Between Shalva and the Vrishnis

Shri Shuka said: 'Please, oh King, now listen how Krishna, in His body playing the human, in yet another wonderful deed killed the lord of Saubha. Shalva as he was called, was a friend of Shishupala. He came to Rukmini's wedding and was together with Jarasandha and others by the Yadus defeated in battle [see 10.54 and also 10.50]. Before all the kings listening he swore: 'Wait and see, I will, with all I can, rid the earth of the Yadavas!'

The foolish king this way vowed, only once a day ate a handful of dust while worshipping as his master the lord who protects the animalistic ones [Pashupati or Shiva *]. After a year had passed Ashutoshya [Shiva, as the one who is quickly pleased] offered the master of Uma, Shalva who had approached him for shelter, the choice of a benediction. He chose a vehicle terrifying to the Vrishnis with which he could travel at will and that could not be destroyed by the gods, the demons, the humans, the singers of heaven, the serpents or the wild men. Girisa [Shiva as the Lord of the mountain] said 'so be it' and ordered Maya Danava, who was there to conquer the cities of the enemies [see 7.10: 53], to build a [flying] fortress made of iron named Saubha and offer it to Shalva. The vehicle filled with darkness, moved as one liked and was unassailable. When Shalva obtained it he, remembering the enmity the Vrishnis had shown, went to Dvaraka with it. -1 Oh best of the Bharatas, Shalva besieged the city with a large army and destroyed the parks, the gardens and the towers, gateways, mansions, outer walls, outlook posts and recreational areas surrounding it. From his superior vimana torrents of weapons came down including stones and trees, thunderbolts, snakes and hailstones. A fierce whirlwind rose that covered all the directions with dust. The city of Krishna thus terribly being tormented by Saubha oh King, could not find peace, just as the earth could not with [the besieging by the threefold flying fortress of] Tripura [see 7.10: 56].

The Great Lord Pradyumna seeing how His subjects were being harassed then said to them: 'Do not fear!', after which the great hero, who was of an untold glory, mounted His chariot. 4-1 Eminent leaders among chariot heroes like Satyaki, Carudeshna, Samba, Akrua and his younger brothers, Hardikya, Bhanuvinda as also Gada, Shuka, Sarana and other bowmen, came forward [from the city] in armor, being protected by chariotry, elephantry, cavalry and infantry. Thereupon a hair-raising battle commenced between the Yadus and the followers of Shalva, that was as tumultuous as the battle between the demons and the demigods [see 8.10]. The way the warm rays of the sun dissipate the darkness of the night, by the son of Rukmini with His divinely empowered weapons in an instant the magical tricks were destroyed of the master of Saubha. 8-1 With twenty-five iron-tipped, in their joints perfectly smoothened arrows with golden shafts He struck Shalva's commander-in-chief [Dyuman]. With a hundred of them He pierced Shalva, with one shaft He pierced each of his soldiers, with ten shafts he pierced each of his charioteers and with three shafts he pierced each of his carriers [elephants, horses]. When they saw that amazing, mighty feat of Pradyumna, the great personality, He was honoured by all the soldiers of His side and the side of the enemy. The magical illusion created by Maya that then was seen in many forms, next seen in a single form and then again not seen at all, constituted an inconsistency that made it impossible for his opponent to locate him. Moving hither and thither like a whirling firebrand the airship of Saubha never stayed in one place; from one moment to the next it was seen on the earth, in the sky, on a mountain top or in the water. Wherever Shalva with his soldiers appeared with his Saubha ship, at that spot the arrows were aimed by the army commanders of the Yadus. Shalva lost his grip because of his enemy, for his army and fortress had to suffer from the arrows shot that, striking like fire and the sun, were as intolerable as snake poison. Even though the heroes of Vrishni, eager for the victory here and in the hereafter, were extremely pained by the floods of weapons launched by the commanders of Shalva, they did not leave their positions. Shalva's companion named Dyuman who was previously hurt by Pradyumna, then positioned himself before Him with a club of maura iron and struck Him with a powerful roar. Pradyumna, the subduer of the enemies, received a full blow in the chest. His chariot driver, the son of Daruka, knew what his duty was and removed Him from the battlefield.

The son of Krishna quickly regained His consciousness and said to His chariot driver: 'It is not right, oh driver, for Me to be removed from the battlefield! Except for Me, no one born in the house of Yadu has ever been known to have abandoned the battlefield. Now My reputation is stained because of a driver who thinks like a eunuch! What should I having fled from the battlefield say now when I meet My fathers Rama and Krishna? How should I excuse Myself being questioned concerning the matter? My sisters-in-law certainly will deride Me saying: 'Oh hero, how could Your enemies succeed in turning You into a coward in battle?'

The charioteer said: 'Oh Long-lived One, what I did I have done in full awareness of my prescribed duty oh Lord. A driver should protect the master who ran into danger, just as the master should protect the driver. With that in mind I removed You from the battlefield. Seeing you knocked unconscious by the enemy, I thought You were wounded!'

*: The Monier-Williams dictionary states: "According to one legend every deity acknowledged himself to be a mere pashu or animal when entreating Shiva to destroy the Asura Tri-pura."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 77: Shalva and the Saubha fortress Finished

Shri Shuka said: 'After touching water, fastening His armor and picking up His bow He [Pradyumna] said to His charioteer: 'Take Me to the warrior Dyuman.' Dyuman [in His absence] had decimated His troops, but now the son of Rukmini with a smile counterattacking struck back with eight naraca arrows [made of iron]. With four of them He struck the four horses, with one the driver, with two the bow and flag and with one his head. Gada, Satyaki, Samba and others killed the army of the master of Saubha. All occupants of Saubha fell into the ocean with their throats cut. For twenty-seven days and nights the tumultuous and fearsome fight between the Yadus and the followers of Shalva striking one another thus continued. - Krishna who was called away by [Yudhishtira.] the son of Dharma, stayed in Indraprastha [see 10.71] and noticed there, after the Rajasuya was completed and Shishupala had been killed, very bad omens. He took leave of the Kuru elders, the sages and Pritha and her sons and headed for Dvaraka. He said to Himself: 'With Me coming to this place accompanied by My honourable elder brother, the kings siding with Shishupala very well may be attacking My city.'

When He saw king Shalva's Saubha and the destruction going on of all that belonged to Him, Kes'ava arranged for the protection of the city and said to Daruka: 'Bring Me My chariot, oh driver, and quickly take Me near Shalva; and take care not to be outsmarted by this lord of Saubha, he is a great magician.'

With that command taking the reigns Daruka drove the chariot forward so that, with Him arriving there, all of His own men and the soldiers of the opposing party could see [the emblem of] Garuda [the younger brother of Aruna]. Shalva, who as the chief of a practically completely destroyed army, saw Lord Krishna on the battlefield, hurled his spear, that made a scary sound, at Krishna's charioteer. In its flight illumining all directions like it was a great meteor, it was by Krishna midair swiftly cut into a hundred pieces. Like being the sun with its rays in the sky, He pierced him with six arrows and struck the Saubha fortress that was moving about with torrents of them. But when Shalva struck Shauri's left arm, the arm with His bow, most amazingly, the Sharnga fell from the hand of Sharnghadhanva. From all the living beings witnessing it a great cry of dismay arose. The lord of Saubha roared loudly and said this to Janardana: 7-1 'Because You oh fool, right before our eyes stole away the bride of our brother and friend [Sishupala 10.53] and he unsuspecting by You within the assembly was killed [10.74], You Yourself, who are so convinced of Your invincibility, will today with my sharp arrows be sent to the land of no return, provided You have the guts to stand in front of me!'

The Supreme Lord said: 'You dullard, boast in vain not seeing your impending death. Heroes do not prattle, they rather demonstrate their prowess!'

Having spoken thus the Supreme Lord infuriated with a frightening power and speed struck Shalva with His club on the collarbone so that he reeled and had to vomit blood. But when He lifted His club again Shalva had disappeared and a moment later a man bowing his head appeared before Krishna who lamenting spoke the words: 'Mother Devaki has sent me! Krishna, oh Krishna, oh Mighty-armed One so full of love for Your parents, Your father has been captured and led away by Shalva like a domestic animal by a butcher being led to the slaughterhouse.'

Hearing these disturbing words Krishna, who had assumed the nature of a human being, spoke out of love disconsolate and with compassion, like He was a normal man: 'How could that petty Shalva abduct My father and defeat Balarama who is never confounded or defeated by Sura or Asura? Fate indeed is powerful!'

After Govinda had said this, the master of Saubha approached Krishna like he was leading Vasudeva before Him and then said the following: 'He here is the one who begot You and for whom You live in this world. I will kill him straight before Your eyes. Save him if You can, You ignoramus!'

The magician thus mocking Him cut off the head of the 'Anakadundubhi', took the head and climbed in the Saubha vehicle that hovered in the sky. In spite of His full knowledge and great powers of perception He, out of love for the ones dear to Him, for a moment remained absorbed in His normal humanity. But then it dawned on Him that Shalva had used a demonic, magic trick designed by Maya Danava. Alerted on the battlefield as if He awoke from a dream, He saw neither the messenger nor His father's body anywhere. Noticing His enemy sitting in his Saubha that moved about in the sky, Acyuta prepared to kill him. That is how some sages say it who do not reason correctly, oh seer among the kings. They most certainly then contradict the words they once spoke but have forgotten again [compare e.g. 10.3: 15-17; 10.11: 7; 10.12: 27; 10.31: *; 10.33: 37; 10.37: 23; 10.38: 10; 10.50: 29; 10.52: 7 and 10.60: 58]. In what way would the lamentation, bewilderment, affection or fear that are born from ignorance, belong to the Infinite One in whom one finds the undivided complete of wisdom, spiritual knowledge and opulence? Those who, encouraged by service in self-realisation at His feet, dispel the bodily concept of life that bewildered man since time immemorial, attain the eternal glory in a personal relationship with Him [svarupa] - so how could there be any bewilderment then with Him, the Supreme Destination of the Truthful Ones? And while Shalva with great force attacked Him with torrents of weapons, Lord Krishna whose prowess never fails, pierced his armor, bow and crest jewel with His arrows and smashed the Saubha vehicle of His enemy with His club. Shattered into thousands of pieces by the club in Krishna's hand, it fell into the water. Shalva thereupon abandoned it, took position and rushed forward with his club in his hands towards Acyuta. As he ran toward Him carrying his club, Krishna severed his arm with a bhalla cutting arrow. In order to kill Shalva He next raised His wonderful disc weapon. Looking like a mountain beneath a rising sun, He shone with a radiation resembling the light at the end of time. The Lord severed the head of that master of great magic with it, complete with earrings and crown, the way lord Indra with his thunderbolt severed Vritrasura's head [see 6.12]. From his men then rose a loudly voiced 'alas, alas!'

After the sinner had fallen and the Saubha fortress was destroyed by the club, kettledrums sounded in the sky oh King, played by a host of demigods. And then... it was Dantavakra who, in order to avenge his friends, furiously ran forward.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 78:

Dantavakra Killed and Romaharshana Slain with a Blade of Grass

- Shri Shuka said: 'Out of friendship for the absent Shishupala, Shalva and Paundraka - who all had passed on to the next world, the wicked one [Dantavakra, see 9.24: 37] appeared who, all alone, on foot and with a club in his hand, oh great King, infuriated made the earth tremble under his feet by his great physical power. Seeing him coming His way Lord Krishna quickly took up His club, leaped down from His chariot and stopped him in his tracks like the shore does with the sea. Raising his club the king of Karusha arrogantly said to Mukunda: 'What a luck, what a luck I have today to see You crossing my path. You oh Krishna who as our maternal cousin have used violence against my friends, want to kill me. Therefore I will kill You oh fool, with my thunderbolt club. I who care about my friends will have paid my debt to them only after having killed You oh ignoramus, You oh enemy in the form of a family member who are like a disease to one's body.'

Thus with harsh words harassing Krishna like one does an elephant with goads, he roared like a lion and stroke Him with his club on the head. Krishna, the deliverer of the Yadus, despite being hit by the club, did not move an inch on the battlefield and with His Kaumodaki [His club] struck him heavily in the middle of his chest. With his heart shattered by the club he vomited blood and fell lifeless to the ground with his hair, arms and legs spread wide. Then, oh king, before the eyes of all living beings, an amazing, very subtle light entered Lord Krishna, just as it happened with Shishupala [see 10.74: 45]. Viduratha, his brother, came next. Plunged in sorrow about his relative, he with sword and shield came forward, breathing heavily in his desire to kill Him. As he attacked Him oh King of kings, Krishna with the razor-sharp edge of His cakra sliced off his head complete with its helmet and earrings. 3-1 After thus having killed the, for others insurmountable, Shalva and his Saubha fortress along with Dantavakra and his younger brother Viduratha, He was praised by gods and men, sages and the perfected ones. The heavenly singers and scientists, the great ones of excellence and the dancing girls, the forefathers and the keepers of the wealth as also the venerable and the mighty ones all sang His glory, showering flowers the moment He surrounded by the most eminent Vrishnis entered His decorated capital. This is how the Controller of Yoga, Krishna the Supreme Lord and Master of the Living Being is victorious. It is to those who have an animalistic vision that He seems to suffer defeat [*].

When Lord Balarama heard about the preparations the Kurus and Pandavas made for war, He being neutral departed under the pretext of going to bathe at the holy places. After at Prabhava having bathed and having honoured the demigods and sages, forefathers and human beings [there], He, surrounded by brahmins, went to the Sarasvati [where she is] flowing westward to the sea. 9-2 Oh son of Bharata, He visited the broad body of water of Bindu-saras, Tritakupa, Sudars'ana, Vis'ala and Brahma-tirtha, Cakra-tirtha, the Sarasvati where she flows eastward and all [the holy places] along the Yamuna and the Ganges. He also went to the Naimisha[ranya] forest where the rishis were engaged in the performance of an elaborate sacrifice [see also 1.1: 4]. They who for a long time had been engaged in the sacrifice recognised Him upon His arrival and properly greeted Him reverentially by standing up and bowing down to Him. After He together with His entourage had been worshiped and had accepted a seat, He noticed that the disciple [Romaharshana, see also 1.4: 22] of the greatest of all sages [Vyasa] had remained seated. Seeing that the suta [a son of a mixed marriage of a brahmin father and kshatriya mother] who had not bowed down or joined his palms, was sitting higher than the rest of the learned ones, the sweet Lord got angry: 'Because he, born as a pratiloma, sits higher than these brahmins and also higher than Me, the Protector of the Religion, he, being so arrogant, deserves it to die. 5-2 As a disciple of the Lord among the sages [Vyasa thus] he has fully studied the many Itihasas, Puranas and Shastras about the religion, but this has not led to good qualities. Not in control with himself, he vainly lacking in humility and not having subdued his mind, deems himself a scholarly authority and is thus engaged like an actor. It is for this purpose indeed that I have descended into this world: to put an end to those who pose as religious but factually are most sinful.'

Even though He was on a pilgrimage and thus had stopped with killing the impious ones, the Supreme Lord after having said this, did what had become inevitable. The Lord put an end to him by means of the tip of a blade of grass that He held in His hand. All the sages said 'Ohhh, ohhh' and in distress said to Sankarshana deva: 'You have committed an irreligious act, oh Master. We have granted him the master's seat for the duration of the sacrifice, oh Darling of the Yadus, along with a long life and freedom from physical worries. 1-3 Even though You, oh Master of Mystic Power, are not regulated by the scriptural injunctions, You unknowingly have killed a brahmin. But if You oh Purifier of the World, atone for Your killing a brahmin, the people in general, who are inspired by no one else, will benefit from Your example.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'I want to be of compassion for the common people and will perform the atonement for this killing. Please tell Me what the prescribed ritual to be done first would be. Oh, please say the word, and by My mystic potency I will bring about the long life, strength and sensory power that you promised him.'

The sages said: 'Please, oh Balarama, arrange it so that both Your potency of killing by means of that [grass] weapon and that what we have said may remain.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'The Vedas tell us that the child taking birth from you is truly one's self. Therefore his son [Suta Gosvami, see 1.2: 1] should be the speaker [of the Purana, endowed] with a long life, strong senses and physical power [see also ]. Oh best of sages, please tell Me what you want. I shall do it, and again, please, oh intelligent ones, think of what the proper atonement would be, for I have no idea.'

The rishis said: 'The fearsome demon Balvala, the son of Ilvala, comes here every new moon and spoils our sacrifice. The best you can do for us oh descendant of Das'arha, is to defeat that sinner who pours pus on us, blood, feces, urine, wine and meat. You subsequently, for twelve months should do penance by serenely traveling around the land of Bharata [India] and find purification by bathing at the holy places.'

*: It is in these verses that the Bhagavatam says that one has the vision of an animal if one thinks that the Lord would ever suffer defeat as seemed to be the case with Krishna fleeing from Jarasandha [10.52], Krishna acting as if he would be impressed by Shalva's tricks [10.77: 27-32], the Buddha being food-poisoned or Jesus Christ being crucified. In the end to His evanescence there is the victory, the enlightenment, the resurrection and the second birth in acceptance of the teaching.

 To illustrate the principle enunciated here by Lord Balarama, the parampara in the person of Shri Shridhara Svami quotes the following Vedic verse that appearing in both the Shatapatha Brahmana 4.9.8. and the Brihad-aranyaka Upanishad. 4.:

angad angat sambhavasi
hridayat abhijayase atma vai putra-namasi
stamjiva Sharadah Shatam

"You have taken birth from my various limbs and have arisen from my very heart. You are my own self in the form of my son. May you live through a hundred autumns."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 79:
Lord Balarama Slays Balvala and Visits the Holy Places

Shri Shuka said: 'Then, on the day of the new moon, a fierce and frightening wind arose scattering dust, oh King, with the smell of pus everywhere. Thereupon a rain of abominable things produced by Balvala poured down upon the sacrificial arena, after which he himself appeared carrying a trident. - The sight of that immense body, which looked like a heap of charcoal with a topknot and beard of burning copper, his fearsome teeth and face with contracted eyebrows, reminded Rama of His club, which crushes opposing armies, and His plow that subdues the Daityas. Both the weapons presented themselves immediately at His side. With the tip of His plow Balarama got hold of Balvala, who moved about in the sky, and with His club then angrily struck the harasser of the brahmins on the head. He produced a cry of agony and fell, with his forehead cracked open, gushing blood to the ground like a red mountain struck by a thunderbolt. The sages praised Rama, awarded Him practical benedictions and ceremonially sprinkled Him with water, just like the great souls did with [Indra] the killer of Vritrasura [Indra, see 6.13]. They gave Rama a Vaijayanti flower garland of unfading lotuses in which Shri resided and a divine set of clothes together with celestial jewelry.'

Next receiving permission to leave them He together with [a group of] brahmins went to the Kaus'iki river where He took a bath. From there He headed for the lake from which the Sarayu flows. Following the course of the Sarayu He arrived in Prayaga where He bathed to propitiate the demigods and other living beings. Thereafter He went to the hermitage of Pulaha Rishi [see also 5.7: 8-9]. 1-1 After having immersed Himself in the Gomati, the Gandaki, the Shona and Vipasa' river, He went to Gaya to worship His forefathers and to the mouth of the Ganges to perform ritual ablutions. At Mount Mahendra He saw Lord Parashurama. After honouring Him He then bathed where the seven branches of the Godavari river converge with the rivers the Vena, the Pampa and the Bhimarathi. Having seen Lord Skanda [Kartikeya] Balarama next visited Shri-s'aila, the residence of Lord Giris'a [Shiva] and saw the Master in Dravida-des'a [the southern provinces] the most sacred hill, the Venkata [of Balaji]. After [having visited] the cities of Kamakoshi and Kanci He went to the river the Kaveri as also to the greatest of them all, the most holy Shri-ranga, where the Lord manifested [as Ranganatha]. He went to the place of the Lord, the mountain Rishabha, then to southern Mathura [Madurai where the goddess Minakshi resides] and next to Setubandha [Cape Comorin] where the gravest sins are destroyed. 6-1 There the Wielder of the Plow, Halayudha, gave a great number of cows away to the brahmins. He went to the rivers the Kritamala and Tamraparni and the Malaya mountain range, where He bowed down to pay respect to Agastya Muni who, sitting there in meditation, gave Him his blessings. Leaving with his permission He went to the southern ocean where he saw the goddess Durga [known as Kanya]. Then reaching Phalgun and taking a bath in the sacred lake of the five Apsaras where Lord Vishnu manifested, He again gave away a myriad of cows. 9-2 The Supreme Lord thereupon traveled through Kerala and Trigarta and arrived at Gokarna [northern Karnataka], a place sacred because of the manifestation of Dhurjathi [he with a load of matted locks], Shiva. Seeing the honoured goddess [Parvati] residing on an island off the coast, Balarama went to Shurparaka where He touched the waters of the Tapi, the Payoshni and the Nirvindhya. Next He entered the Dandaka forest and went to the Reva where the city of Mahishmati is found. There He touched the water of Manu-tirtha and then returned to Prabhava.

From the brahmins [there] He heard about the annihilation of all the kings in a battle [at Kurukshetra] between the Kurus and the Pandavas. He concluded that the earth was being relieved of her burden [see also e.g. 10.50: 9]. He, the beloved Son of the Yadus, then went to the battle where He tried to stop Bhima and Duryodhana who with their maces were fighting each other on the field [see also 10.57: 26]. But when Yudhisht'hira, the twins Nakula and Sahadeva, Krishna and Arjuna saw Him, they were silent as they offered their obeisances with the burning question: 'What does He want to tell us, coming here?' He saw the two with clubs in their hands skillfully moving in circles and furiously strive for the victory. He said: 'Oh King, oh Great Eater, the two of you warriors are equal in prowess. One I think is of a greater physical power, while the other is technically better trained. I do not see how from any of you, who are equally skilled, a victory or defeat can be expected. So stop this useless fight.'

In spite of being sensible people, the two, who fixed in their enmity kept each other's harsh words and misdeeds in mind, did not take heed of His words, oh King. Balarama decided that it was their fate and went to Dvaraka where He was greeted by a delighted family headed by Ugrasena. When He [later on] returned again to Naimisharanya, the sages engaged Him, the Embodiment of All Sacrifice who had renounced all warfare, with pleasure in all the different kinds of rituals [*]. The Almighty Supreme Lord bestowed upon them the perfectly pure spiritual knowledge by which they could perceive this universe as residing within Him and also see Him as pervading the entire creation. After together with His wife [Revati, see 9.3: 29-33] having executed the concluding ritual avabh'ritha bath He, well dressed, nicely adorned and surrounded by His family members and other relatives and friends, appeared as splendid as the moon in its full glory [full and surrounded by the stars].

There are countless other [pastimes] like this of the mighty, unlimited and unfathomable Balarama who through His illusory power appears as a human being. Whoever regularly, at dawn and dusk, remembers the activities of the unlimited Balarama that are all amazing, will become dear to Lord Vishnu.'

*: Shri Prabhupada writes here: 'Actually Lord Balarama had no business performing the sacrifices recommended for ordinary human beings; He is the Supreme Personality of Godhead, and therefore He Himself is the enjoyer of all such sacrifices. As such, His exemplary action in performing sacrifices was only to give a lesson to the common man, to show how one should abide by the injunctions of the Vedas.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 80: An Old Brahmin Friend Visits Krishna

The honourable king said: 'My lord, I would like to hear oh master, what valorous deeds there are more of Lord Krishna, the Supreme Soul of Unlimited Powers. How can anyone who is disgusted with running after material desires and knows the essence oh brahmin, desist from listening to the transcendental topics of the Lord Hailed in the Scriptures after repeatedly having heard them? The actual power of speech is the one describing His qualities, the hands that really work are the ones that do His work, the true mind is the mind remembering Him as dwelling with the mobile and immobile living beings, and the ear that actually hears is the ear turned to His sanctifying topics [compare 2.3: 20-24]. It is about the head that bows to both of His manifestations [among the mobile and immobile beings], about the eye that sees Him only and about the limbs that regularly honour the water that washed the feet of Vishnu or His devotees.'

Suta [1.2: 1] said: "After Vishnurata [Parikshit as being Vishnu-sent] had asked this question, he was addressed by the powerful sage, the son of Vyasa whose heart was fully absorbed in Vasudeva. Shri Shuka said: 'There was a certain friend of Krishna [called Sudama, not the same one as mentioned in 10.41: 43], a brahmin well versed in the Vedas, who, peaceful of mind and in control of his senses, was detached from the sense objects. As a householder he subsisted on that what came of its own accord. His wife was, just like him, poorly dressed and emaciated of hunger. Distressed by the poverty she, with her face dried up and trembling legs, faithful to her husband, approached him and said: 'Is it not so, oh brahmin, oh master of devotion, that the Husband of Shri is your friend and that that best one of the Satvatas is filled with compassion for the brahmins and is willing to give them shelter? Please approach Him, my most gracious man, for He, the Ultimate Shelter of the Sainly Souls, will then provide you with abundant wealth because you have such a hard time maintaining your family. If the Lord of the Bhojas, Vrishnis and Andhakas who is now present in Dvaraka, even gives Himself to a person [just] remembering His lotus feet, then what would the Spiritual Master of the Universe not do for people of worship who are not so much interested in economic success and sensual gratification?'

2-1 The brahmin who thus repeatedly in various ways was entreated by his wife then thought: 'The sight of Uttamas'loka is indeed the highest attainment.' He took the decision to visit Him and asked her: 'If there is anything in the house that I can bring as a gift my good woman, please give it to me!' She begged with the other brahmins for four fists of husked and parched rice, wrapped it in a piece of cloth and gave it to her husband to bring as a gift.

He, the best of the scholars, took it with him and on his way to Dvaraka wondered: 'How will I ever get this audience with Krishna?' 6-1 Together with a couple of local brahmins the scholar passed three gates and guard stations and walked between the houses of Acyuta's faithful followers, the Andakas and Vrishnis. One normally could not go there and so he felt as if he had attained the bliss of the Pure Spirit. He next entered one of the opulent sixteen thousand residences of the Lord's queens [*]. Acyuta who sat on His consort's bed, saw him from a distance, immediately rose and came forward to close him gladly in His arms. The Lotus-eyed One in touch with the body of His dear friend, the wise brahmin, extremely ecstatic released affectionately some tears from His eyes. 0-2 Having him seated on the bed He fetched some items to honour His friend and washed his feet. The Supreme Lord of All the Worlds took the water on His head, oh King. Then the Purifier anointed him with divinely fragrant sandalwood and aloe-wood [lignaloos or aguru] paste and kunkuma. He gladly honoured His friend with aromatic incense and series of lamps and offered him betel nut and a cow. Next He spoke a word of welcome. The goddess [Rukmini] was personally of service by carefully fanning with a yak's tail the dirty and poorly dressed, emaciated twice-born soul, whose veins could be seen. The people in the palace thus seeing Krishna engaged in His spotless reputation, were amazed about the intense love with which the unkempt looking soul [the avadhuta] was honoured: 5-2 'What pious deeds has he performed, this unwashed, condemned and lowly mendicant deprived of all prosperity in the world? How can he with reverence be served by the Spiritual Master of the Three Worlds who is the abode of Shri? Leaving the goddess sitting on her bed He embraced him as an older brother!'

Taking hold of each other's hands, oh King, they discussed the charming topics of the past when they together lived in the school of their spiritual master [see 10.45: 31-32]. The Supreme Lord said: 'Oh brahmin, after the guru received his remuneration from you and you returned [home], oh knower of the dharma, did you marry a suitable wife or not? With your mind occupied by household affairs, you were not driven by desires and I also know that you do not take much pleasure, oh wise soul, in the pursuit of material happiness. Some people perform their worldly duties without being disturbed by desires in their minds. Acting to set an example as I do, they shake off the propensities that naturally arise. Do you, oh brahmin, still remember our stay in the gurukula? It is there that a twice-born soul learns to understand what needs to be known and thus manages to transcend his ignorance. One is born twice my dear friend: after first being born materially one [secondly] manifests through a spiritual master, a bestower of spiritual knowledge like Myself, who teaches what the duties are for all spiritual orders [or stages of life, see ashrama and 7.12]. Among those engaged in the varnashrama system [see also B.G. 4: 13] in this world, they [who thus are twice born] are the expert knowers of the true welfare, oh brahmin, for they cross over the ocean of material existence with the help of the words stemming from Me in the form of the spiritual master. I, the Soul of All Beings, am not as satisfied by ritual worship, a new life, austerity or self-control as I am by faithful service to the spiritual master [compare 7.14: 17]. 5-3 Oh brahmin, do you still remember what we did, when we were living with our spiritual master, when we once by the wife of our guru were sent away to fetch firewood? Having entered a big forest, oh brahmin, all out of season, a fierce harsh thundering wind arose with rain. With the sun having set we, with all directions covered in darkness and with all the water around us, could neither recognise the direction nor high or low areas. Constantly heavily besieged by the fierce wind and water in that flood, we did not know what way to go and in distress wandered through the forest holding each other's hands. Our guru Sandipani knew this and at sunrise set out to search for us, his disciples. The acarya then found us suffering. 'Oh you children, for my sake you have to suffer heavily! In your devotion for me you have disregarded that what is most dear to all living beings: the [comfort of your] body! Well, this is what disciples should do to pay the debt to their spiritual master: being perfectly pure in their love, they must be willing to offer the spiritual master their very self and possessions. I am satisfied with you my dear boys, oh best of the brahmins. May your desires be fulfilled and may in this world and the next your words, your mantras, never lose their attraction [their freshness] compare 10.45: 48!'. Many things like this happened when we were living at the house of the guru. Only by the mercy of the spiritual master a person will find [spiritual] fulfillment and attain peace.'

The brahmin said: 'What more is there for me to achieve in life, oh God of Gods, oh Guru of the Universe, than to have lived together at the guru's house with You whose every desire is fulfilled? Oh Almighty One, Your body, constituting the fertile field of all welfare, comprises the Absolute Truth that is celebrated [in the Vedas]. Your residing with spiritual masters is nothing but an extraordinary role-play [see also e.g. 10.69: 44 and 10.77: 30]!'

*: Shрила Vis'vanatha Cakravarti quotes from the Padma Purana, Uttara-khanda, which says that the brahmin actually entered the palace of Rukmini: 'sa tu rukmini-antah-puradvari kshanam tushnim sthitah'; 'He stood for a moment in silence at the doorway of Queen Rukmini's palace.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 81:

The Brahmin Honoured: Lord Krishna the Godhead of the Brahmins

- Shri Shuka said: 'He, Bhagavan Krishna, the True Goal of the Devotees, the Lord Who Perfectly Knows the Minds of All Beings, in this manner conversing with this best one among the brahmins, then, in His dedication to the ones of learning, laughed and spoke with a smile and a loving glance to His dear friend. The Supreme Lord said: 'What gift have you brought for Me from home, oh brahmin? Even the slightest that in pure love is offered by devotees, turns into something immense for Me, whereas not even the greatest that is being presented by non-devotees pleases Me. Whoever offers Me a leaf, a flower, a fruit and water with devotion, that offer brought from the heart by a soul of good habits I accept [same as in B.G. 9: 26].'

But the twice-born soul thus being addressed, was too embarrassed with Him, the Husband of the Goddess of Fortune, bowed down his head and did not offer the few hands of rice grains, oh King. - As the direct witness in the heart of all living beings fully cognizant of the reason why he had come, He thought: 'He worshiped Me in the past and never desired opulence. But because he, My friend, in order to keep his chaste and devoted wife happy, has come to Me now, I will give him riches not attainable for [even] the immortals [see also B.G. 9: 22].' With that in mind He Himself from under the garment of the twice-born one snatched away the rice grains that were tied in a bundle and said: 'What is this? Have you brought this for Me My dear friend? That gives Me the greatest pleasure! These rice grains satiate Me and the whole universe [that I am]!'

Speaking thus He took a handful to eat and a second one, whereupon Shri [Rukmini devi], devoted to Him, the One Supreme, seized His hand [for the beaten grains were hard to digest]. 'That oh Soul of Each and Everyone, is enough to make a person wishing to satisfy You, prosper in this world and the next with all opulence available.'

After to his satisfaction having drunk and eaten the brahmin spent that night in Acyuta's palace. He thought he had attained heaven. The next day dear King, as he returned home, he was honoured by Shri! The Self-satisfied Maintainer of the Universe who made him happy as he walked along the path. Even though he had received no wealth from Krishna and had been too embarrassed to ask for it himself, he on his way home was filled with joy about the audience he had with the Great One. 'Ah, what a privilege it is to have witnessed the devotion of the Godhead of the Brahmins for the twice-born souls. He who carries Lakshmi in His chest embraced the poorest wretch! Who am I? A destitute sinner! And who is Krishna? The temple of Shri! And He, this friend of the brahmins, closed me in His arms! He seated me on the bed of His consort like one of His brothers. Tired as I was, I was fanned by His queen holding a [yak-tail] hair fan. Being served with sincerity with a massage for my feet and such, I was worshiped like a demigod by the God of Gods, the Godhead of the Scholars! The worship of His feet is the root of all perfections and opulence that man in his emancipation may find in heaven, on earth and in the lower regions. 'If this poor soul acquires opulence he, delighting in excess, will not remember Me'. He must have thought in His grace, and thus did not grant me the slightest amount of wealth.'

Thus lost in thought he arrived at the vicinity of his home. There he found himself placed before high rising palaces rivaling the sun, the fire and the moon. On all sides they were surrounded by wonderful courtyards and gardens swarming with hordes of cooing birds, ponds full of lilies and day and night blooming white lotuses. There were well adorned and ornamented men and women with deer-like eyes. 'What is this, whose place is this, how could this come about?' This way paining his mind he was welcomed by the men and women with a luster like the demigods, who most fortunately loudly sang to instrumental music. His wife, hearing that her husband had arrived, extremely jubilant quickly appeared excitedly from the house like she was the goddess of fortune manifesting herself from her abode. Seeing the husband she was so devoted to, she solemnly held her head down embracing him within her heart with closed eyes filled with tears because of her eagerness and love. He stood amazed at the sight of his wife who, shining in the midst of maidservants with golden lockets around their necks, radiated like a goddess in a vimana. Pleased he together with her entered his home that with its hundreds of gem-studded pillars resembled the palace of the great Indra. 9-3 There were ivory beds ornamented with gold [with bedding] white as foam and couches with golden legs, yak tail fans, golden chairs with soft cushions and canopies hung with strings of pearls. Seeing the sparkling clear quartz walls inlaid with precious emeralds as also the shining jeweled lamps and the women decorated with jewels, the brahmin, now free from worries with all the excessive opulence, reasoned about the cause of his unexpected prosperity: 'This prosperity here, of me always so unlucky and poverty stricken, must be the consequence of the glance that He, the Best of the Yadus who is of the Greatest Opulence, has cast on me. It is no doubt my Friend, the most exalted among the Das'arhas and Enjoyer of Unlimited Wealth, who, without saying a word, like a cloud [pouring rain] has given me this opulence when He, with me in His presence, noticed that I came begging. After having accepted with pleasure a palmful of roasted rice that I brought, this very day He makes something insignificant of the great gift He gives and something great of the meager gift of a friend [like me]. May there life after life, repeatedly be my love [saurhrida], friendship [sakhya], sympathy [maitri] and servitude [dasya] for Him, the Supremely Compassionate Reservoir of Transcendental Qualities, as also my adherence to the intimate association with His devotees. The Supreme and

Never Born Lord does not bestow the wonderful opulences - a kingdom and material assets - upon His devotee when he [not initiated or not twice-born, see 10.80: 32] fails in understanding. In His wisdom He sees how the false pride [the arrogance, the conceit with the wealth, or the mada] leads to the downfall of the wealthy.'

He [Sudama] this way firmly being fixed in intelligence, was most devoted to Janardana and enjoyed free from intense desire [for wealth or profit] together with his wife. Therewith he always kept in mind that he [sooner or later] would have to abandon the objects of his senses. The brahmins are even the master of Him, the God of Gods, Hari, the Master and Lord of Sacrifice. There exists no higher worshipable deity than them [see also 7.11: 14, 7.14: 17-18, 10.24: 25, 10.45: 32]. By thus recognizing the Unconquerable One as being conquered by His own servants [see also 9.4: 63 and 10.9: 19] he, the learned friend of the Supreme Lord, was released from his bondage to the [material] self. By the force of his meditation upon Him he soon attained His abode, the destination of the truthful ones. The human being who hears about this sympathy for the brahmins of the Godhead of the Brahmins, will find love for the Supreme Lord and be freed from the bondage of [fruitive] labour [karma, see also 7.11: 35].'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 82:

All Kings and the Inhabitants of Vrindavana on Pilgrimage Reunite with Krishna

Shri Shuka said: 'When Balarama and Krishna lived in Dvaraka, there was one day [*] an eclipse of the sun as great as the one at the end of the kalpa [a day of Brahma]. The people knowing that beforehand, oh King, came from everywhere to the field of Samanta-pancaka [the five lakes' at Kurukshetra] in the hope that that would work in their favor. - It is the place where Lord Parashurama, the greatest hero among the warriors, rid the earth of its [tyrannical] rulers and the streams of their blood created the great lakes [see 9.16: 18-19]. Even though Bhagavan Lord Parashurama was unaffected by karmic reactions, He, in order to set an example for the common man, was there of worship like a normal person who wishes to dispel the sin. To that occasion therefore, oh son of Bharata, a great number of people of Bharata came there on a holy pilgrimage. Vrishnis like Gada, Pradyumna and others as also [the elders] Akruva, Vasudeva and Ahuka [Ugrasena] who all wanted to eradicate their sins, went to that holy place. Aniruddha together with Sucandra, Shuka, Sarana and the army commander Kritavarma remained behind to guard [the city]. - As effulgent Vidyadharas they in chariots resembling heavenly vehicles moved on in waves of horses, bellowing elephants and masses of foot soldiers. Resplendent with their wives, with golden necklaces, flower garlands, attire and armor, they appeared on the road as supremely divine and majestic as [demigod] sky travelers. The greatly pious Yadavas bathing and fasting there, carefully saw to it that cows, garments, garlands, gold and necklaces were donated to the brahmins. After once more in the lakes of Parashurama as prescribed having taken a bath [the next day to conclude their fast], they fed the leading brahmins with the finest food and prayed thereto: 'Let there be our devotion for Krishna.' The Vrishnis thereupon with the permission of Krishna, their exclusive deity, comfortably sat down to eat in the cool shade of the trees. 2-1 Having arrived there they saw the Matsyas, Us'inaras, Kaus'alyas, Vidarbhas, Kurus, Srinjayas, Kambojas, Kaikayas, Madras, Kuntis, Anartas and Keralas; hundreds of allied and adversary kings and others who were their friends and relatives, oh King. They also saw their dear friends, the gopas and gopis headed by Nanda who had been aching [to see them] for so long. Meeting again, with their hearts and faces blooming as beautiful as lotuses because of the emotions, they embraced each other firmly and thus experienced the greatest delight with streams of tears, goose pimples and a choked-up voice. The women looking at one another, with great eyes filled with tears of pure love, smiled with the greatest friendship and closed each other in their arms, pressing breasts to breasts that were smeared with kunkum paste. Thereupon they paid their respects to the elders and received obeisances from their younger relatives. Having inquired after their well-being and having discussed the comfort of their journey, they next started to talk with each other about Krishna.'

Kunti saw her brothers and sisters with their children, her parents, her sisters-in-law and Mukunda and gave up her sorrow while talking to them. Kunti said: 'Oh respectable brother, I feel most unfulfilled in my prayers because you who are so very good, forgot what happened to me during my times of emergency [see also 1.8: 24]! Friends, relatives, sons, brothers and even parents, easily forget the one [among them] suffering misfortune.'

Shri Vasudeva said: 'Dear sister, do not be cross with us, men are the playthings of fate. Whether someone acts of his own accord or follows the directions of others, he always falls under the control of the Lord. Pestered by Kamsa we scattered in all directions [see 10.2: 7 and 10.4]. Only now we by Divine Ordinance have returned to our places, oh sister.'

Shri Shuka said: 'All the kings who there were honoured by Vasudeva, Ugrasena and the other Yadavas, found peace in the supreme happiness of seeing Acyuta. 3-2 Bhishma, Drona, the son of Ambika [Dhritarashtra], Gandhari with her sons as also the Pandavas and their wives, Kunti, Sanjaya, Vidura and Kripa; Kuntibhoja and Viratha, Bhishmaka, the great Nagnajit, Purujit, Drupada, Shalya, Dhrishthaketu and the king of Kasi; Damaghosha, Vis'alaksha, the kings of Maithila, Madra and Kekaya, Yudhamanyu, Sus'arma, Bahlika and others with their sons, as also, oh best of kings, many other kings resorting under Yudhisht'hira, were all amazed to see the personal form of Shauri, [Krishna] the abode of Shri, there together with His wives. After from both Balarama and Krishna having received proper proof of respect, the kings in their turn filled with joy, enthusiastically praised the Vrishnis, the personal associates of Krishna: 'Oh master of the Bhojas [Ugrasena], you have chosen a commendable birth among men in this world, for you continually see Krishna, He who even by the yogis is rarely seen. 9-3 His fame as praised in the Vedas, the water washing from His feet and the words of the revealed scriptures thoroughly purify this universe [see also B.G. 15: 15]. Even though her wealth had been ravaged by Time, the earth's vitality has been awakened by the touch of His lotus feet with her fulfilling all our desires like an abundance of rain. By seeing Him in person, by touching Him and walking with Him, conversing, lying down, sitting, eating, being bound through marriage with Him and having Him as a blood-relative, you [normally] following the hellish path of family life have now found Vishnu, liberation and heaven [in person] who constitutes the cessation [of one's searching in life. See also 5.14 and 7.14 and B.G. 11: 41-42].'

Shri Shuka said: 'When Nanda found out that the Yadus headed by Krishna had arrived there, he went to meet Him, accompanied by the gopas with their belongings on their wagons. In their delight excited to enjoy His presence after so long a time, the Vrishnis revived as if awakened from death and embraced Him firmly. When Vasudeva, beside himself of love overjoyed embraced Him, he remembered the troubles created by Kamsa because of which he had to leave his sons behind in Gokula [see 10.3 & 10.5]. Krishna and Rama embraced Their [foster] parents and offered Their respects but could, with throats filled with tears of love, not utter a word, oh greatest hero of the Kurus. The so very fortunate couple, Nanda and Yashoda, in their turn raised their sons on their laps, held Them in their arms and gave up their sorrow [of having been separated from Them]. Thereupon Rohini and Devaki embraced the queen of Vraja and addressed her with their throats full of tears, remembering what she had done [for them] in her friendship: 'Which woman can forget your unceasing friendship oh queen of Vraja? Not even obtaining the wealth of Indra would suffice to repay you in this world! When these Two [boys] had not yet met Their [real] parents They, residing with the two of you as Their [foster] parents, received the education and affection, nourishment and protection. My good lady, in the custody of you saintly souls, strange to no one and as protective as eyelids to eyes, They had nothing to fear.'

Shri Shuka said: 'The gopis seeing Krishna, their object of desire after such a long time, the One for seeing whom they would curse the creator of their eyelids [see 10.31: 15], all, by their eyes, took Him into their hearts to embrace Him there to their satisfaction and thus attained the ecstatic absorption that even for souls constantly united [with Him in meditation] is difficult to attain. The Supreme Lord approached them more privately, embraced them, informed after their health and with a smile said the following: 'Dear girlfriends, do you still remember Us, We who intent on destroying the enemy party for that purpose stayed away so long? Maybe you think ill of Us being afraid that We have put you out of Our mind - but in fact it is the Supreme Lord who brings together and separates the living beings. The way the wind brings together masses of clouds, grass, cotton and dust and scatters them again, the same way the Creator of the living beings brings together and scatters His subjects [compare 10.5: 24-25]. By the love for Me that you fortunately developed on your part, you have obtained Me; it is indeed the devotion unto Me that leads the living beings to immortality [compare B.G. 9.33]. Oh ladies, being present both inside and outside, I am both the beginning and the end of all created beings, the same way ether, water, earth, air and fire applies to all material things [see also e.g. 10.9: 13-14]. These material entities, who thus [on the one hand] exist within the elements of creation and [on the other hand] according to their true nature pervade those elements in the form of the atma [the Soul, self and person], you should both ways consider as being present within Me, within the Imperishable, Supreme Truth [see also e.g. 1.3: 1, 3.26: 51, 10.9: 29, B.G. 9: 15 and siddhanta].'

Shri Shuka said: 'The gopis, this way being instructed by Krishna's teaching about the atma, eradicated the subtle covering of their soul [their false ego, see linga. 7.2: 47 and 4.29] by constantly meditating on Him and were thus fulfilled by Him. They said: 'With that what You said, oh Lord with the Lotus navel, we wish that our minds, however being engaged in household affairs, are ever vigilant at Your lotus feet, the feet that the great yogis and highly learned philosophers keep in mind to meditate upon, for they constitute, for those who fell into the dark pit of a material existence, the only shelter of deliverance [see also 7.5: 5, 10.51: 46, 7.9: 28, 7.15: 46].'

*: According to Shri La Sanatana Gosvami in his Vaishnavatoshani commentary this event, described in retrospect, would have occurred after Balarama's visit to Vraja 0.6 and before Maharaja Yudhisht'hira's Rajasuya sacrifice (in 10.7 because the enmity within the Kuru family, the exile of the Pandavas and the ensuing war at Kurukshetra arose directly after the sacrifice.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 83:

Draupadi Meets the Queens of Krishna

Shri Shuka said: 'The Supreme Lord, the spiritual master and goal of the gopis who thus showed His favor, then asked Yudhisht'hira and the rest of His good-hearted relatives about their welfare. They who by seeing His feet were freed from their sinful reactions, felt very honoured thus being questioned by the Lord of the World and gladly replied: 'How can they be unhappy who ever drank the intoxicating nectar of Your lotus-like feet that is poured out by the minds and mouths of the great souls? How can they who with the drinking cups of their ears drank to their fill not experience the happiness, oh Master, oh Destroyer of the forgetfulness of the embodied souls about the Creator who granted them their physical existence? By the light of Your personal form we are released from the bonds of the three [states] of material consciousness [wakefulness, dreaming and sleeping]. Being totally immersed therein, we are of spiritual happiness having bowed down to You, the goal of the perfected saints [the paramahamsas], who by the power of Your illusion have assumed this form for the protection of the unlimited and ever fresh Vedic knowledge that is threatened by time.'

The great sage said: 'While the crest jewel of all personalities who is praised in the scriptures thus was being glorified by His people, the women of the Andhaka and Kaurava clans met to discuss with each other the stories about Govinda that are sung in the three worlds. Please listen as I describe them to you. - Shri Draupadi said: 'Oh Vaidarbhi [Rukmini], Bhadra, Jambavati and Kaus'ala [Nagnajiti]; oh Satyabhama, Kalindi, Shaibya [Mitravinda], Rohini [see * and 10.61*] and Lakshmana [Madra] and other wives of Krishna, please tell us how it came to pass that Acyuta, the Supreme Lord Himself, by the grace of His mystic power lived the way one lives in the world and got married to you?'

Shri Rukmini said: 'Like a lion taking his share from a herd of goats and sheep He, who puts the dust of His feet upon the heads of invincible fighters, took me away when the kings, with their bows ready, were about to offer me to Shishupala. May the feet of Him, the abode of Shri, be my object of worship [see 10.52-54].'

Shri Satyabhama said: 'Being accused [by my father King Shatrjait] He, in order to clear His name, defeated the king of the bears [Jambavan] and brought the jewel back to my father whose heart was distressed about the death of his brother [Prasena]. Afraid [about this accusation] he offered me to the Lord, even though I was spoken for [see 10.56].'

Shri Jambavati said: 'The creator of my body, not realizing that He, the Husband of Sita, was his master and worshipable deity, fought for twenty-seven days with Him. After he recognised Him he came to his senses, took hold of His feet and presented me to Him together with the jewel. I am His maidservant [see also 10.56].'

Shri Kalindi said: 'Knowing that I was executing penances with the desire to touch His feet, He came together with His friend [Arjuna] and took my hand. I am the one cleaning His residence [10.58: 12-23].'

Shri Mitravinda said: 'During my svayamvara He came forward and stole me away the way the enemy of the elephants [a lion] claims his share amidst a pack of dogs. After having defeated the kings and my brothers who insulted Him, He took me to His capital where Shri resides. May I there, life after life, serve Him with washing His feet [10.58: 31].'

Shri Satya said: 'Seven great, strong and vital bulls with the sharpest horns, that by my father were arranged to test the prowess of the kings, destroyed the pride of the heroes. But they were quickly subdued and tied up by Him with the ease of children playing with young goats. This way with His valor paying for me, He defeated the kings on the road with an army of four divisions and took me, being protected by maidservants, with Him. May there be my servitude unto Him [10.58: 32-55].'

Shri Bhadra said: 'With me in love with Him, oh Krishna [Draupadi], my father of his own accord invited my maternal cousin Krishna and gave me to Him together with a retinue of female companions and a military escort of one akshauhini. May there for me, birth after birth wandering because of my karma, be that betterment of myself in touching His feet [10.58: 56].'

Shri Lakshmana said: 'Oh Queen, because I repeatedly heard the glorification by Narada of Acyuta's births and activities, my heart became fixed upon Mukunda, He who by her [the goddess Shri] holding the lotus after due consideration was chosen in rejection of the [demigod] rulers of the world. My father, also known as Brihatsena, oh saintly lady, knew my state of mind and out of love for his daughter arranged for means to meet this end [of marrying with Krishna]. Just as with your svayamvara, oh Queen a fish was used [hung high as a target] that had to be won by Arjuna, also in my case there was such a target. Hidden from sight however, it could only be seen as a reflection in water [in a pot below]. Hearing about this, from everywhere all the kings expert in the art of archery and wielding other weapons, came to my father's city together with their thousands of teachers. My father honoured all of them with full respect for each his strength and age. Then they, who had set their minds upon me, took up the bow and arrows to pierce [the target] in the assembly. Some of them after lifting [the bow] were unable to string it and gave up and some, having pulled the bowstring, fell down because they were hit by it. Other heroes like the kings of Magadha [Jarasandha], Cedi [S'ishupala] and Ambashthna as also Bhima, Duryodhana and Karna, managed to string the bow but could not locate the target. Arjuna managed to locate it and, aiming carefully while looking at the reflection of the fish in the water, took a shot, but the arrow did not hit the target, it just brushed it. 5-2 After the kings were defeated in their pride and had given up, the Supreme Lord playfully took up the bow and managed to string it. At the moment the sun was situated in Abhijit [in 'victory', or at noon] He fixed an arrow on it and pierced, with a single look in the water, the fish with His arrow so that it fell down. Kettledrums resounded in the sky and on earth the sounds of 'jaya' were heard while the demigods overwhelmed by joy released torrents of flowers. Next, with a shy smile on my face and a wreath of flowers in my hair, I entered the arena with gently tinkling ankle bells on my feet, a golden necklace with brilliant jewels around my neck and a pair of fine silken, new garments held together by a belt. I lifted up my face encircled by its many locks of hair and with my cheeks effulgent because of the earrings and looked all around at the kings. With a cool smile casting sidelong glances I slowly placed my necklace around the neck of Murari who had captured my heart. At that moment conch shells, mridangas, tabors, kettledrums and war drums and such instruments resounded while the singers sang and male and female dancers danced. The leading kings could not accept the choice I thus made for the Supreme Lord as my master, oh Draupadi. Upset and with a heart full of imprecation they became quarrelsome. Faced with that situation He lifted me on the chariot with its four excellent horses. He prepared His Sharnga, donned His armor and stood firm to offer battle with His four arms [displayed in full]. Daruka drove the chariot that was trimmed with gold, oh Queen, while the kings looked on as if they were [startled] animals seeing the lion king. Like village dogs with a lion the kings went after Him. Some of them then tried to block His way by raising their bows against Him. Because of the floods of arrows shot from the Sharnga some of them fell with their arms, legs and necks severed, while others gave it up and fled. Like the sun god reaching his abode [for the western horizon] the Lord of the Yadus then entered Dvaraka, His city, that is glorified in heaven and on earth, that was profusely decorated with wonderful archways and banners on flagpoles blocking the sunlight. My father honoured his friends, immediate relations and other family members with the most valuable clothing and jewelry, with beds, seats and with other furniture. In his devotion he presented the most valuable weapons to the Lord of the Complete [Purnasya], as also maidservants endowed with all riches, infantry, elephantry, chariotry and cavalry. By abruptly breaking off our material bonds and doing penances, we have all become the maidservants of His household, of Him, the One Satisfied Within Himself.'

The other queens said [as expressed by Rohini]: 'After He in battle had killed the demon Bhauma and his followers, He discovered that we, the daughters of the kings that the demon defeated during his conquest of the earth, had been imprisoned by him. Because we constantly had remembered His lotus feet as the source of liberation from a material existence He, the One All of whose Wishes are Fulfilled, married us after our release. 1-4 Oh saintly lady, we do not desire rulership over the earth, a heavenly kingdom, unlimited pleasures or mystic power. Nor do we strive for the supreme divinity, to achieve immortality or the abode of Hari. We [just] want to carry on our heads the dust of the divine feet of the Wielder of the Club that is enriched with the fragrance of the kunkuma from the bosom of Shri [see also 10.47: 60,  and the Shri Shri Shikshashthaka verse 4]. We desire the same as what the Pulinda women [the gopis] desire, as what the grass and the plants and the grazing cows and gopas of Vraja desire: to be touched by the feet of the Supreme Soul.'

*: The one called Rohini here is not Rohini, the mother of Balarama, but the one queen representing the 16000 queens that Krishna wed next to His eight principal queens.

 : The parampara points out that the Shri referred to here is the supreme goddess of fortune as identified by the 'Brihad-gautamiya-tantra':

devi krishna-mayi prokta radhika para-devata sarva-Lakshmi-mayi sarva
kantih sammohini para

"The transcendental goddess Shrimati Radharani is the direct counterpart of Lord Shri Krishna. She is the central figure for all the goddesses of fortune. She is endowed with the power to attract the all-attractive Personality of Godhead. She is the primeval internal potency of the Lord."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 84:

Vasudeva of Sacrifice to the Sages at Kurukshetra Explaining the Path of Success

Shri Shuka said: 'When Pritha, the daughter of the king of Subala [Gandhari] and Draupadi, Subhadra and the wives of the kings as also His gopis, heard of the loving attachment [of the wives] to Krishna, Lord Hari, the Soul of All, they were all greatly amazed with tears filling their eyes. - As the women thus were conversing with the women and the men with the men, sages arrived at the place eager to see Krishna and Rama: Dvaipayana, Narada, Cyavana, Devala and Asita; Vis'vamitra, Shatananda, Bharadvaja and Gautama; Lord Parashurama and his disciples, Vasishthha, Galava, Bhrgu, Pulastya and Kasyapa; Atri, Markandeya and Brihaspati; Dvita, Trita, Ekata and the sons of Brahma [the four Kumaras] as also Angira, Agastya, Yajnavalkya, sages like Vamadeva and others. Seeing them the Pandavas, Krishna, Rama, the kings and others who sat down, immediately stood up to bow down to the souls who are honoured throughout the universe. They all, including Balarama and Acyuta, honoured them befittingly with words of welcome, sitting places, water to wash their feet and water to drink, flower garlands, incense and sandalwood paste. With the sages sitting down comfortably the Supreme Lord, who in His embodiment defends the dharma, addressed that with rapt attention listening assembly of great souls. The Supreme Lord said: 'We who achieved this birth have now all obtained its fruit: the audience of the masters of yoga that even by the demigods is rarely won. How is it possible that human beings who are not very renounced and see God in the form of the temple deity, now may enjoy your company and may touch you, ask you questions, bow down and be of worship at your feet and such? By just seeing you, the saints, one is instantly purified, while that is not so with the holy places consisting of water or with the deities made of clay and stone that only after a long time make that happen [1.13: 10]. Neither the fire, the sun, the moon nor the firmament, neither the earth, the water, the ether, the breath, the speech nor the mind take, when they are worshipped, away the sins of someone entangled in material opposites. But they are wiped away by just a few moments of service to men of [brahminical] learning. With the idea of himself as being the body that can be so smelly with its three elements [of mucus, bile and air], with the notion of a wife and that all as being his property, with the view of clay as being something worshipable, with the thought of water as being a place of pilgrimage, he [the common man going for appearances] is not of [respect for] the men of wisdom. As such he is [not much better than] a cow or an ass.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Hearing this being said by Krishna, the Supreme Lord of Unlimited Wisdom, the scholars were silent, confounded by the words that were hard to digest. The sages pondered for some time over the Lord and the subordinate position [He had assumed] and concluded that what He had said was meant to enlighten the people. Thus they addressed Him, the Spiritual Master of the Universe, with a smile on their faces. The honourable sages said: 'Just see how we, the best knowers of the truth and chief creators of the universe, are bewildered by the power of the material illusion created by the activities of the Supreme Lord, who so amazingly covert in His operations pretends to be the one controlled. Effortlessly He creates, all by Himself, the variety of this universe and maintains and destroys it without getting entangled Himself. He is in His actions just like the earth element with the many names and forms of its transformations. What an actor [imitator] the Almighty One is in His activities [see also 8.6: 10]! Your good Self, the Original Personality of the Soul, nonetheless at times assume the mode of goodness in order to protect Your people and to chastise the wicked; it is the mode in which You maintain the eternal Vedic path of the varnashrama divisions [of status/vocational orientations] by means of Your pastimes [see also sanatana dharma]. The Spirit of the Absolute [as known by the Vedas] is Your pure heart wherein the manifest, the unmanifest and the transcendental position is realised by means of austerities, study and turning inward in concentrated meditation [see also B.G. 7: 5]. Oh Absolute Truth, You show Your respect for the community of the brahmins because one by means of those perfect representatives can understand the revealed scriptures. Consequently You are the leader of all souls of respect for the brahminical culture. Today we achieve the fulfillment of our birth, education, austerities and vision, for it is the goal of the saintly souls to find association with You, the Ultimate of all Welfare. We offer [You] Krishna our obeisances, You, the Supreme Lord whose wisdom is always fresh, the Supersoul who covers His greatness with His yogamaya. None of these kings who enjoy Your company, nor the Vrishnis, know You hiding behind the curtain of maya, as the Supreme Soul, the Time and the Lord [B.G. 6: 26]. 4-2 The way a sleeping person, who envisions an alternate reality with names and forms, in what he manifests through his mind does not know of a separate reality beyond it, does one with You similarly having names and forms, have no clue because of the discontinuity of one's memory that is created by the activity of the senses that bewilder one's consciousness with Your maya [compare B.G. 4: 5 and 4.29: 1, 10.1: 41 and 7.7: 25]. Today You granted us the vision of Your feet forming the source of the Ganges that washes away an abundance of sins. When one [with them] well installed in the heart has ripened in one's yoga practice and fully has matured in devotional service, the material mentality that covers the individual souls is destroyed and Your destination is attained - so please, show Your devotees Your mercy.'

Shri Shuka said: 'The sages having said this took leave of Das'arha [Krishna], Dhritarashtra and Yudhishtira, oh sage among kings, and prepared to return to their hermitages. Seeing this the greatly renowned Vasudeva [the father of Krishna] approached them and bowing down took hold of their feet while expressing the following, carefully chosen words. Shri Vasudeva said: 'My obeisances to you who [represent] all the gods [*]. Oh seers, please listen, tell us this: how can we be freed from our karma by doing work?'

Shri Narada said: 'Oh scholars, this question asked by Vasudeva in his eagerness to learn about his ultimate benefit, is not that surprising at all considering the fact that he thinks of Krishna as being a child [of his, his son]. When people are close in this world, it is easily a cause of disregard, just as it is e.g. with someone living at the Ganges who leaves to seek purification elsewhere. 2-3 The quality of [the Lord] His awareness is never disturbed by time-dependent matters like the creation, destruction and so on of this universe, not by its own activity nor by another agency [see B.G. 4: 14 and 10: 30]. The consciousness of Him, the One Controller without a Second, is not affected by hindrances, material actions and their consequences and the natural modes with their flow of changes [kles'a, karma and gunal]. Others [though] may consider Him as being covered by His own expansions of prana and other elements of nature, just like the sun is hidden by clouds, snow or eclipses.'

Then, before all the kings as also Acyuta and Rama listening, oh King, the sages addressed Vasudeva saying: 'It has been ascertained as being correct that karma is counteracted by this [type of] work: to worship with faith and with festive sacrifices Vishnu, the Lord of All Sacrifices. Scholars demonstrated from the viewpoint of the Shastras that this religiousness of being connected [in yoga] is the easiest way to pacify the mind; it brings joy to the heart. For the twice-born soul at home in worship of the Personality of Godhead to perform sacrifices faithfully with spotlessly [justly] acquired possessions, constitutes the path that brings success []. An intelligent person should renounce the desire for wealth by means of sacrifices and charity. He should give up the desire for a wife and kids by engaging in temple affairs. With the help of [the cakra order of] Time [and also as being the destroyer of all worlds, see also 9.5 and B.G. 3: 16] he should forget the desire for a world for himself, oh Vasudeva. All sages renounced their [three types of] desires for a household life and went into the forest for doing penances [see also B.G. 2: 13]. Prabhu, a twice-born soul is born with three debts: a debt to the gods, a debt to the sages and a debt to the forefathers. Not liquidating them by [respectively] sacrifice, studying the scriptures and by begetting children [also pupils and brainchildren like books, see ] he, upon leaving the body, will fall down [back into the material world]. But you [Vasudeva] are presently free from two of the debts, the debt to the sages and the debt to the forefathers, oh magnanimous soul. Be now free from your debt to the gods and renounce your homestead. Oh Vasudeva, [in a previous life] your good self must have been of much worship with devotion for the Supreme Lord of the Universe, for He assumed the role of your son [see also 10.3: 32-45 and 11.5: 41].'

Shri Shuka said: 'Vasudeva having heard the words they spoke, chose for the sages as his priests and propitiated them by bowing his head. The rishis being asked oh King, then engaged the pious soul in fire sacrifices that strictly to the principles with excellent arrangements were performed at the holy field [of Kurukshetra]. 4-4 When he was about to be initiated the Vrishnis came joyfully to the sacrificial pavilion, bathed and well-dressed, wearing garlands and being elaborately ornamented. They came together with their queens who, carrying the items of worship in their hands, were clad in the finest clothes, wore lockets around their necks and were smeared with sandalwood paste, oh King. Clay tom-toms and tabors, kettle drums and drums, conch shells and other musical instruments sounded, male and female dancers danced and bards and panegyrist sweet voiced sang together with the female singers of heaven and their husbands. According to the rules by the priests sprinkled with sacred water [for his initiation], Vasudeva with his eyes being decorated with collyrium and his body being smeared with fresh butter, together with his eighteen wives [see 9.24: 21-23 & 45] looked like the moon king surrounded by the stars. With them all finely decorated wearing silk saris and bangles, necklaces, ankle bells and earrings he, being initiated and clad in deerskin, shone brilliantly. Oh great King, his officials and priests radiated with their jewels and garments of silk as if they were standing in the sacrificial arena of the killer of Vritra [Indra, see 6.11]. At that time the two Lords Rama and Krishna also stepped forward. With each of Them being accompanied by His own wives, sons and family members as expansions of Their glory, They shone just as splendidly. Vasudeva exercised, in accordance with the rules, respect for the Lord of Rituals, Mantras and Paraphernalia, by performing [both the types of] fire sacrifices and such that are differently characterised as 'original' [or primary, different prototypes as described in the Shruti] and 'changed' [or secondary, offerings following adapted procedures, see *4]. Next he compensated at the designated time the priests, who were already richly decorated, with gifts of gratitude that decorated them even more, as also with marriageable girls, cows and land of great value. After the great sages had executed the ritual with oblations by the sponsor and his wife [patni-samyaj] as also the concluding ritual [avabhritya], the brahmins, with [Vasudeva] the chief of the yajna in front, bathed in the lake of Lord Parashurama [9.16: 18-19]. Having bathed he together with the women gave their jewelry and clothing away to the bards and next in his finest apparel honoured all the classes of people and even the graticute with food. 5-5 His relatives, their wives and children, the leaders of the Vidarbhas, Kos'alas, Kuru, Kas'is, Kekayas and Srinjayas, the officials, the priests, the different types of enlightened souls, the ordinary humans, the paranormal souls [the ghostly], the forefathers and the venerable personalities he gave opulent gifts. Then they took leave from Krishna, the Abode of Shri, and departed full of praise for the sacrifice that was performed. 7-5 The immediate family members Dhritarashtra and his younger brother [Vidura], Pritha and her sons [Arjuna, Bhima and Yudhishtira], Bhishma, Drona, the twins [Nakula and Sahadeva], Narada, Bhagavan Vyasadeva and others embraced their friends and relatives, the Yadus, and then, with hearts melting of affection upon the separation, with difficulty returned to their respective places as also did the rest of the guests. Nanda out of affection for his relatives stayed together with the cowherds [a little longer]. They were by Krishna, Balarama, Ugrasena and the rest honoured with extra opulent worship. Vasudeva who with ease had crossed over the ocean of his great ambition [see also 10.3: 11-12], felt most satisfied. Surrounded by his well-wishers he took Nanda's hand and spoke to him.

Shri Vasudeva said: 'The by God forged bond of men called affection is, I think, even for heroes and yogis difficult to give up. Even though the friendship you offered so very saintly has not been reciprocated by us, being so forgetful of what you did, it will never cease, for it is beyond compare. Formerly [sitting in Kamsa's prison] we could not act on your behalf and now, well-to-do, oh brother, we even with you standing in front of us fail to see you because our eyes are blinded being intoxicated by our opulence. May someone who is after the real benefit of life never find the fortune of kings, oh you so full of respect, for with his vision thus being clouded he is blind to even the needs of his own family and friends [compare 10.10: 8].'

Shri Shuka said: 'Thus with tears filling his eyes remembering what he [Nanda] all had done in his friendship, Anakadundubi, with his heart softened by the intimacy, had to weep. Out of love for his friend who showed his affection and for Krishna and Rama, Nanda then said: 'I will go later, I will go tomorrow', but stayed three months longer with the Yadus who honoured him. 7-6 Being satisfied with desirables like the most valuable ornaments, finest linen and various priceless pieces of furniture, he accepted the gifts that were offered by Vasudeva, Ugrasena, Krishna, Uddhava and others. Seen off by the Yadus, he departed together with the inhabitants of Vraja and his family. As they went to Mathura, Nanda, the gopas and the gopis could not put Govinda's lotus feet out of their minds and consequently looked back [many a time]. With their relatives having departed the Vrishnis, who had Krishna as their deity, saw that the rainy season was about to begin and therefore turned back to Dvaraka. To the people [at home] they gave an account of the great festivity and of what had taken place in relation to the lord of the Yadus [Vasudeva] and all the well-wishers they had seen during the pilgrimage [see 10.82].'

*: This statement, so reminds the parampara, is confirmed in the authoritative Shruti-mantras, that declare 'yavatir vai devatas tab sarva veda-vidi brahmane vasanti': "Whatever demigods exist, all reside in a brahmana who knows the Veda."

 : The parampara adds: 'Both Shridhara Svami and Shri Jiva Gosvami here agree that the ritual karma of Vedic sacrifices is particularly meant for attached householders. Those who are already renounced in Krishna consciousness, like Vasudeva himself, need only cultivate their faith in the

: The word putra used here usually refers to a child, but also means doll or any other artificial thing to care for like a home, or works of art, a book or another byproduct as Prabhupada and his pupils called it as e.g. in 3.28: 38 and 11.20: 27-28. It literally means 'preserving from the hell called Put', the place where the childless ones reside.

*4: The parampara explains: 'The Brahmana portion of the Vedic Shruti specifies the complete step-by-step procedure of only a few prototype sacrifices, such as the Jyotishthoma and Dars'a-purnamas. These are called the prakrita, or original, yajnas; the details of other yajnas must be extrapolated from the patterns of these prakrita injunctions according to the strict rules of the Mimamsa-s'astras. Since other yajnas are thus known by derivation from the prototype sacrifices, they are called vaikrita, or "changed".'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 85:

Lord Krishna Instructs Vasudeva and Retrieves Devaki's Sons

The son of Vyasa said: 'One day, Sankarshana and Acyuta, the two sons of Vasudeva, visited Their father who, after They had honoured his feet, welcomed Them affectionately and spoke to Them. Having heard the words of the sages referring to the superhuman qualities of his two sons, he became convinced of Their heroic deeds. Addressing Them by name he said: 'Krishna, oh Krishna, oh greatest yogi, oh eternal Sankarshana, I know that the two of You are the direct [representatives] of the original nature [or pradhana] and the supreme male principle [the purusha or person] of this universe. You are directly the Supreme Lord, the masters of the original substance and the person. Whatever comes into existence whenever for whatever reason, originates from You, is created by You and exists within You, is there for Your sake and belongs to You. Oh Lord of the Beyond, this variegated universe that You created from Yourself, is maintained by You, oh Unborn One, You enter it as the Supersoul [the Paramatma] and [constitute therewith] the life principle of the vitality [prana] and the individuality [jiva]. Of both [the animate, and inanimate] entities that, different as they are and all belonging to the Supreme, are thus dependent, You are the One who constitutes the creative potency that is active within the life air and the other basic forces of the universe [see also 2.5: 32-33]. The glow, brilliance, luminosity and the particular existence of the moon, the fire, the sun, the stars and lightning B.G. 15: 12], the permanence of the mountains and the fragrance and sustaining power of the earth, are all You in fact. The quenching and the vitalizing capacity of water as also the water itself and its taste are You, oh Lord. Oh Controller, on the basis of Your air [the oxygen...] there is the body heat, the mental and physical vigor, the endeavor and the movement [see also B.G. 11: 39]. You are the directions and the spaces they describe, the omnipresent ether and the elemental sound belonging thereto. You are the [primeval] sound that constitutes the syllable AUM and its differentiation in particular forms [of language, see also B.G. 7: 8]. You are the power of sense perception, You are their gods [see also see also 3.12: 26] and of them You are the mercy [granting these sensations]. You are of the intelligence the power to decide and of the living being the power to remember things correctly [B.G. 7: 10 & 15: 15]. You, the primeval Cause of all Causes [the non-manifest original substance pradhana], are the source of the physical elements [tamas], the passions of the senses [rajas] and the stream of consciousness of the creative gods [sattva, see also B.G. 14]. Among the entities that are subject to destruction in this world You are the imperishable being, just as the substance of something is observed [and not lost] with its transformations. The modes of goodness, passion and ignorance and their functions are in this [imperishable] way regulated within You, within the Supreme Absolute Truth, by Your internal potency [the yogamaya of Your pastimes]. On that account there is in You [Yourself] no question of these modifications. When they are conditioned by You [and in You] as products of creation, they have You inside of them, You who otherwise are not material [eternally free, nitya-mukta, see also B.G. 2: 12, 9: 4-5 & 8: 19]. In this world they are ignorant who impelled by their karma [eternally bound, nitya-bandha] move around in the cycle of rebirth because they fail to understand the transcendental destination that is the Soul of the Complete. I was as fortunate to acquire with this life this difficult to attain, most suitable form of human existence, but because of Your deluding energy [maya] I have spent my entire life in confusion about what one's own purpose in life would be. With You who in this world ties everyone together with the ropes of affection, there is with the body and the progeny and other relations the 'this I am' and 'these are mine' to it [see also e.g. 2.9: 2, 4.28: 17, 4.29: 5, 5.5: 8 and 6.16: 41]. The two of You are not our sons but evidently the Lords of pradhana and purusha who descended to remove the burden of rulers from the earth, as You have said [10.50: 7-10]. I therefore today seek the shelter of Your lotus feet that, from the surrendered, from the distressed souls, take away the fear of being entangled [in the material world], oh Friend, and that is all. Enough, I have enough of that hankering for sense enjoyment that binds me to the mortal frame and makes me think of You, the Supreme One, as being my child. In the maternity room You indeed said [see 10.3: 44] that You were the Unborn Soul who age after age having taking birth with us thus operates to defend Your dharma and therewith just like a cloud [changing form] assume and give up various bodies [see B.G. 4: 8]. Oh, who can understand the mystic potency and powerful expansions of You, the all-pervading, most glorified Lord?'

Shri Shuka said: 'Having heard these statements of His father, the Supreme Lord, the best of the Satvatas, with humility bowed down and then replied broadly smiling in a gentle voice. The Supreme Lord said: 'I consider these meaningful words of yours appropriate, oh father, since by referring to Us, your Sons, you have expressed the complete of reality. I, you, He, My brother, and these residents of Dvaraka, must together with everything that moves and not moves, all be considered the same way [as expansions of Me], oh best of the Yadus [B.G. 9: 5 & 15 and the siddhanta]. The Supreme Soul being indeed one, self-luminous, eternal and distinct, by means of the modes, from Himself has created the material entities that belong to those modes. Being free from the modes He is thus seen as many. It is as with the ether, the air, the fire, the water and the earth that, being single elements, depending their locations, in their manifest and unmanifest, small and large products appear as many [see also B.G. 13: 31].'

Shri Shuka said: 'Vasudeva thus having been addressed by the Supreme Lord, oh King, was liberated from his thinking in opposites and became silent, being satisfied within. 7-2 Then at that place, oh best of the Kurus, Devaki, the worshipable goddess of all who to her utter amazement had heard of [the retrieval of] the son of Their guru [10.45], asked Krishna and Rama loudly and clear to bring back her own sons who were murdered by Kamsa. With that in mind looking back, she spoke sad and distraught with tears in her eyes. Shri Devaki said: 'Rama, oh Rama, oh Immeasurable Soul; oh Krishna, Master of the Yoga Masters, I know that the two of You are the Original Personalities, the Lords of the Creators of the Universe [see also catur-vyuh]. Having taken birth from me You have now descended because of the kings who, living in defiance of the scriptures and with their good qualities destroyed by the time [of Kali-yuga], became a burden to the earth. Oh Soul of All That Be, today I have come to seek shelter with You, who by a partial expansion [the modes] of an expansion [the material energy] of an expansion [Narayana] of Yours gives rise to the generation, prospering and dissolution of the universe [see also 2.5]. 2-3 One says that Your guru ordered You to retrieve his son who had died a long time ago. You brought him from the place of the forefathers to Your spiritual master as a gift of gratitude to the teacher. Please, oh You two Masters of the Yoga Masters, fulfill the same way my desire. I would like to see my sons brought back who were killed by Kamsa [see 10.4].'

The rishi [Shuka] said: 'Thus entreated by Their mother, oh descendant of Bharata, Rama and Krishna entered the nether world of Satala utilizing Their internal potency [see 5.24: 18]. The daitya king [Bali] who saw Them entering stood immediately up to bow down to Them together with his entourage. He was overwhelmed with joy of seeing Them, the Supreme Soul and Self of the Universe who were his favorite divinity of worship. Bringing Them royal seats, They were happy to sit down there. He washed the feet of the two Great Souls and together with his followers took the water [upon their heads] that purifies [everyone] up to Brahma. He worshiped Them by presenting all the wealth of himself and his family: the most valuable riches, garments, ornaments, fragrant pastes, bethel nut, lamps, nectarean food and so on [*]. He who had conquered Indra [see 8.15], over and over took hold of the Supreme Lord's feet. With a heart melting of love, with tears of happiness in his eyes and with his hair standing on end, oh King, he spoke with a choked up voice. Bali said: 'My obeisances to Ananta, the Greatest Being and Krishna, the Absolute Truth, the Supersoul, the Disseminator and Creator of analytical knowledge [sankhya, see 3.25-32] and [the science of bhakti] yoga. To see You is indeed something rarely achieved by the living beings. But [if You endeavor to reach us] of Your own accord it lies even within the reach of people like us whose natures are of passion and ignorance [see B.G. 3: 21-23]. 1-4 The sons of Diti and Dana, the singers of heaven, the perfected souls, the scientists, the venerable persons, the wealth keepers, the wild, the carnivorous and the paranormal ones, the mystics, the politicians, we and others like them are constantly fixed in a grudge against the physical presence of You, the direct embodiment of the revealed scriptures who are of pure goodness. Some are obstinate with hatred and some are of devotion with a certain lust [an ulterior motive], while the enlightened souls predominated by the mode of goodness are not attracted in that [negative] way [compare: the atmarama-verse 1.7: 10]. Oh Master of the Yoga Masters, when not even expert yogis know Your bewildering power of yoga that for the greater part is characterised by terms like this [svarupa and vis'esa inborn and modal game of identity], what then to expect of us? Have therefore mercy with me and lead me out of the blind well of a householder's life towards the other shelter of Your lotus feet that is sought by selfless souls. Thus I may wander everywhere alone or else under the protection of those [saints, devotees, Vaishnavas, desire trees] who are willing to help everyone in the world, the ones at whose feet one finds peace and obtains what one needs in life [the 'vrittii']. Please direct us oh Controller of the ones [self-]controlled, make us sinless oh Master, turn us into a person who executes with faith and is thus freed from [scriptural, ritual] fixations.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'Once, during the first Manu, Marici fathered six sons born from Urna. They were demigods who laughed when they saw that the loving one [kam], or Brahma in this case] wanted to copulate with his daughter [called Vak, see 3.12: 28-35, compare 3.20: 23]. 8-4 Because of that offense they immediately entered a womb to be born to Hiranyakas'ipu. They were then by Yogamaya transferred to be born from the womb of Devaki, oh King. They were murdered by Kamsa. She laments over them as being her own sons. These same sons are living here near you [see also  and 10.2*]. We would like to take them from here in order to dispel their mother's sadness. When thereafter the curse is lifted they, being freed from the misery, will come back to their own [heavenly] world. By My grace these six - Smara [Kirtiman, see 10.1: 57], Udgittha, Parishvanga, Patanga, Kshudrabhrit and Ghrimi - will return to the destination of the saintly souls.'

Thus having spoken They, both being honoured by Bali, took the sons back to Dvaraka and presented them to their mother. When she saw the boys, the breasts of the goddess flowed because of her affection for her sons. She placed them on her lap and embraced them, over and over smelling their heads. Bewildered by the illusory energy of Vishnu because of which the creation comes into being, she lovingly allowed her sons to drink from her breasts that were wet as they touched them. 5-5 Having drunk her nectarean milk, that had remained from the milk the Wielder of the Club had drank [before Vasudeva carried Him to Gokula], they, because of [thus] coming in touch with the body of Narayana, regained the awareness of their original selves. Bowing down to Govinda, Devaki, their father and Balarama they, for everyone to see, went to [heaven], the abode where the gods reside. Seeing this return and departure of the dead, divine Devaki thought in great amazement about the magic that was arranged by Krishna, oh King. Oh descendant of Bharata, there are of Krishna, the Supreme Soul unlimited in His valor, countless heroic acts like this.'

Shri Suta said [at Naimisharanya, 1.1: 4]: "Whoever devoutly hears or recounts the way this pastime of Murari whose glories are unlimited is described by Vyasa's respected son, will by thus fixing his mind on the Supreme Lord, go to His all-auspicious heavenly abode, for this true delight for His devotees' ears fully annihilates the sins of the living being."

*: The parampara adds here that there are nine standard processes of devotional service as Prahlada points out in 7.5: 23-24, and that the last, atma-samarpanam, the handing over of one's wealth as modeled by Bali Maharaja for the sake of the atma-nivedanam of self-communication with the Lord, is the culmination toward which every endeavor should aim. If one tries to impress the Lord with wealth, power, intelligence and so on but fails to humbly understand oneself to be His servant, one's so-called devotion is only a presumptuous show. The parampara thus warns here against the false religion of pompous ceremony without regard for the yogic retreat as of Daksha in 4.2. See also B.G. 2: 42-43.

 : The parampara explains with the acaryas Shridhara Svami and Vis'vanatha Cakravarti that after taking Marici's six sons from Hiranyakas'ipu, Lord Krishna's Yogamaya first made them pass through one more life as children of another great demon, Kalanemi [the previous incarnation of Kamsa, see 10.1: 68], and then she finally transferred them to the womb of Devaki. For the full story see footnote 10.1.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 86:

Arjuna Kidnaps Subhadra, and Krishna Instructs Bahulas'va and Shrutadeva

The honourable king [Parikshit] said: 'Oh brahmin, we would like to know how she who is my grandmother, the sister of Krishna and Rama [Subhadra, see 9.24: 53-55], got married to Arjuna.'

- Shri Shuka said: 'Arjuna, the great lord, while on a pilgrimage wandering the earth, reaching Prabhasa heard that Balarama intended to give His maternal cousin away to Duryodhana and to no one else. Desirous of her, he therefore went to Dvaraka disguised as a renunciate with a tridanda [*]. Determined to fulfill his purpose, he resided there during the months of the rainy season and was [according to the custom] all the time honoured by Balarama and the citizens without them being aware who he was. One day being invited as a guest he was brought to the house of Balarama who faithfully presented him a meal which he then ate. With his eyes wide open of happiness, he saw the wonderful girl there who enchanted heroes. Smitten he fixed his mind on her. Seeing him who stole each woman's heart, she desired him also. She fixed her heart and eyes upon him and full of desire bashfully smiling cast sidelong glances. Thinking of nothing but her, Arjuna awaited the right opportunity. With his heart trembling of the strongest desire, he could find no peace. When she during an important religious festival rode away from the fortress in a chariot, the mighty warrior seized the opportunity to abduct the girl who had stolen his heart. That occurred with the consent of her parents [see 10.1: 56] and Krishna. Standing on the chariot, he, like the king of the animals claiming his share, raised his bow and drove back the heroes and guards who tried to stop him while her relatives were angrily shouting. Balarama upon hearing about it was as perturbed as the ocean during a full moon. Lord Krishna and His family had to grasp Him respectfully by His feet in order to pacify Him. He thereupon was pleased to send presents of great value, elephants, horses and male and female servants as a wedding gift for the groom and bride.

Shri Shuka continued: 'There was among Krishna's brahmins one named Shrutadeva. He was one of the best being exclusively devoted to Krishna and was known for the fullness of his realisation - his serenity, learning and freedom from sense gratification. As a householder dwelling in Mithila in the kingdom of Videha, he performed his duties without being concerned about what he received for his sustenance. Day by day doing his tasks as required he was satisfied with just that - and nothing more - what he by providence acquired as his share for his sober maintenance. The ruler of that kingdom stemming from the line of King Mithila [Janaka] was known by the name of Bahulas'va. He was just as selfless as he was my dear King. They were both equally dear to Acyuta. Pleased with the two of them the Supreme Lord mounted His chariot that was brought by Daruka. Together with a group of sages the Master went to Videha. He was accompanied by Narada, Yamadeva, Atri, Krishna Dvaipayana Vyasa, Parashurama, Asita, Aruni, I [Shuka], Brihaspati, Kanva, Maitreya, Cyavana and others. Everywhere He came, the citizens and villagers approached, carrying arghya [offerings of water] to welcome Him like He was the risen sun surrounded by the planets. In Anarta [where Dvaraka is], Dhanva [the desert region], Kuru-jangala [Thanesar and Kurukshetra], Kanka, Matsya [Jaipur and Aloyar], Pancala [the Ganges region], Kunti, Madhu, Kekaya [northeast Punjab], Kos'ala [from Kas' to the Himalayas], Arna [east of Mithila] and in many other kingdoms, the men and women drank with their eyes the gentle smiles and affectionate glances of His lotus face oh King. By [thus] bestowing upon them the fearlessness of the spiritual vision, the Spiritual Master of the Three Worlds put an end to the blindness of their eyes. This way gradually reaching Videha, He heard His glories being sung by the God-conscious souls and the commoners, the glories that eradicate all misfortune and purify every corner of the universe. The moment the villagers and citizens heard that Acyuta had arrived, oh King, they joyfully came forward to greet Him with offerings in their hands. Seeing Him who is Praised in the Verses, they with their faces and hearts blossoming of love and with joined palms held to their heads, bowed down to Him and the sages whom they till then only knew from hearsay. Both the king of Mithila and Shrutadeva prostrated at His feet with each of them in his mind the thought that the Spiritual Master of the Universe especially for him had arrived to be of mercy. Bahulas'va and Shrutadeva then, both with their palms joined, at the same time invited the Descendant of Das'arha and the brahmins to be their guests. The Supreme Lord wanted to please them both and accepted their offer by entering each his house [simultaneously] without them seeing this [vaibhava-prakas'a miracle]. 7-2 The descendent of Janaka [Bahulas'va] who, later that day, saw them fatigued coming from a distance to his house, mindfully brought fine seats outside for them so that they could sit comfortably. Overjoyed at heart with intense devotion and eyes clouded with tears he bowed down to wash the feet, the water of which is capable of purifying the entire world. Together with his family he took it on his head and honoured the Lords [and sages] with sandalwood paste, garlands, clothing, jewelry, incense, lamps, arghya, cows and bulls. After they had eaten their fill, he, while happily massaging the feet of Vishnu on his lap, in order to please them, slowly said the following in a gentle voice.

Shri Bahulas'va said: 'You oh Almighty One, the Self-illuminated Witness and Soul of All Created Beings, have now become visible to us, those who are remembering Your lotus feet. To be true to the statement You have made that 'No one, not even Ananta, Shri or the Unborn Brahma is as dear to Me as the unalloyed devotee', You have manifested before our eyes [see also 7.7: 51-52, 10.9: 20-21, 10.47: 58-63]. What person who knows this would abandon Your lotus feet, when You give Yourself to peaceful sages free from possessions? Descending in the Yadu dynasty for the sake of the ones who are caught in the cycle of birth and death [samsara] You have, in order to put an end to it, disseminated Your fame that removes the sins of the three worlds. All glories to You oh Krishna, oh Supreme Lord of an unlimited intelligence, oh Nara-Narayana who are perfectly peaceful in Your austerity. Please oh Omnipresent One, dwell together with the brahmins for a few days in our home and sanctify this dynasty of Nimi with the dust of Your feet.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Thus being invited by the king, the Supreme Lord and Maintainer of the Entire World stayed there and thus made the men and women of Mithila happy. Shrutadeva who just like Bahulas'va received Krishna in his house, bowed down to the sages and [then] in great delight danced with waving clothes. He made them sit on mats of darbha grass that were brought, he greeted them with words of welcome and then together with his wife washed their feet with pleasure. Overjoyed of having all his desires fulfilled, he most piously sprinkled himself, his house and his family with the water. With offerings of fruits, aromatic root [us'ira], pure nectarean sweet water, fragrant clay, tulsi leaves, kus'a grass and lotus flowers he honoured them with all items of worship at his disposition as also with food conducive to the mood of goodness [see B.G. 17: 8]. He wondered: 'How could it happen that I who fell down in the blind well of family life, may enjoy this association with Krishna and these godly people in whom He resides? It is the dust of their feet that constitutes the dignity of all the holy places.' Having shown his hospitality, Shrutadeva, with them comfortably being seated, sat close together with his wife, relatives and children and addressed them while massaging [the Lord] His feet.

Shrutadeva said: 'It is not just today that we see the Supreme Personality present before us. We in fact enjoy His presence ever since He created this universe with His energies and [as an avatara] entered it in His own [transcendental] state. He enters this world and appears there the way a sleeping person, alone with his mind, creates a separate world in his imagination. You appear in the heart of those persons who with a pure [by meditation peaceful] mind time and again hear and speak about You, glorify You, worship You and converse about You. In spite of being situated in the heart You are far removed from minds agitated by material affairs. One cannot get hold of You by one's own [material] powers, but You support those souls who know to appreciate Your qualities [see also B.G. 7: 25]. May there be my obeisances unto You, who are the Supersoul for the knowers of the Supreme Spirit and the One who [in the form of Time] brings death to the conditioned soul, You, the One who assumes the forms of effect as also the forms of cause, You whose vision is not covered by Your deluding potency but who are covered to our vision. Please, oh You as that Supersoul, command us Your servants. What, oh Lord should we do? Oh, having this form of Your good Self visible before our eyes, is what puts an end to the troubles of humanity!'

Shri Shuka said: 'Having heard what he thus said to Him, the Supreme Lord, the destroyer of the distress of the surrendered souls, addressed him with a broad smile while taking his hand in His own. The Supreme Lord said: 'Oh brahmin, you should know that these sages came along for the purpose of blessing you. Wandering with Me, they purify all the worlds with the dust of their feet. The deities, pilgrimage sites and sacred rivers being visited, being touched and being worshiped, purify gradually, but the same thing is attained [at once] by the glance of those [sages] who are most worshipable [see also 4.30: 37, 7.9: 44, 10.9: 21, 10.84: 11]. A brahmin is by birth the best of all living beings, and even more so, when he, as a portion of Me, is endowed with austerity, learning and contentment! [Even] this four-armed form is not as dear to Me as a brahmin. A man of [brahminical] learning comprises all the Vedas the way I comprise all the gods [see also 10.84: 12]. Those whose intelligence is spoiled and fail to understand it this way, are envious. While they do consider the visible form of an idol worthy of worship, they are of neglect towards their guru, the [brahminical] scholar, who in fact is Me, their very Self. A learned man of respect for Me, keeps the moving and nonmoving part of this universe as also the elementary categories basic to it, in mind as being forms of Me [see also B.G. 5: 18]. Therefore oh brahmin, just worship these brahmin seers with the same faith as you have in Me. You will thus directly be of worship for Me and not in any other way as with [e.g. offering] vast riches [and such].'

Shri Shuka said: 'He [Srutadeva] as also the king of Mithila who thus received instruction from the Lord, by their single-minded devotion unto Krishna and His company of most exalted brahmins, attained the transcendental destination. The Supreme Lord who is of devotion for His own devotees, stayed with the two devotees, taught the path of the truthful soul [*] oh King and returned again to Dvaraka.'

*. The tridanda is a staff carried by vaishnava sannayasis symbolizing the threefold austerity of thought, speech and action. In all these three the renunciate is vowed to serve Vishnu. The staff consists of three sticks wrapped in saffron cloth with a small extra piece wrapped in at the top.

 Time is the Lord's impersonal feature. The parampara says: 'It is understood from the Vedic science of epistemology, the 'Nyaya-S'ashtra', that knowledge of an object (prameya) depends on a valid means of knowing (pramana)' (pp 10.86: 5. So would knowing Krishna in the form of Time as-He-is (I am the Time, the light of the sun and the moon, as He says to be in the Gita) - by means of clocks managed validly to His nature, the Sun as with a sundial, and calendars managed validly to His order, the moon, like with its phases - constitute the proper brahminical conduct. With weeks to the moon and clocks to the sun, standardtime with its mean time deadness, zone time arbitrary false oneness and summertime instability, would constitute the time of ignorance in denial of Krishna, the father of Time, even though Krishna affirms the worship of Time with the pragmatism and thus karmic dictate of standardtime, to which He still calls that demigod (...) worship less attractive and wrong [see also cakra, kala 1.2: 26, B.G. 9: 23, 10: 21, 30 & 33, 7: 8 and the Bhagavatam time quotes].

. Prabhupada adds here: "The instruction we receive from this incident is that King Bahulas'va and Shrutadeva the brahmana were accepted by the Lord on the same level because both were pure devotees. This is the real qualification for being recognised by the Supreme Personality of Godhead."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 87:

The Underlying Mystery: Prayers of the Personified Vedas

Shri Parikhit said: 'Oh brahmin, the Absolute Truth [brahma] cannot be described in words [*] and has no material qualities. How can the revealed scriptures [the Shruti, the Vedas] dealing with the modes of nature, directly refer to that what is elevated above cause [the subtle] and effect [the gross]?'

Shri Shuka said: 'The intelligence, senses, mind and the life force of the living beings were by their Lord and Master evolved for the sake of [dealing with, being satisfied with] elementary matter, for the sake of getting a life and for the sake of the [emancipation of the] soul and its ultimate liberation. The predecessors [like the Kumaras] of our predecessors [like Narada] were fixed upon this same underlying mystery [upanishad] concerning the Absolute Truth. Whoever with faith holds on to it will be free from material attachment and attain peace and happiness [see also 8.24: 38]. I will here relate to you now an account concerning Lord Narayana. It is about a conversation between Narayana Rishi and Narada Muni.

One day when the Supreme Lord's beloved Narada was traveling the worlds, he went for a visit to the ashrama of the Eternal Seer Narayana. From the beginning of Brahma's day He [Narayana Rishi], has just for the welfare in this and the next life of human beings who maintain the dharma, in Bharata-varsha been engaged in penances, spiritual knowledge and peacefulness [see kalpa]. Having arrived there he [Narada] bowed down to Him who sat there surrounded by sages from Kalapa - the village where He resided - and asked this very same question oh best of the Kurus. As the seers were listening the Supreme Lord related the following ancient discussion about the Absolute Truth that took place between the inhabitants of Janaloka [the world of the celibate saints]. The Supreme Lord said: 'Oh son of the self-born Lord [Brahma], long ago in Janaloka a sacrificial ceremony took place held by the [urdhva-retah] celibate sages there who had found their life in Brahma. You [Narada] had left for Shvetadvipa to see the Lord [Aniruddha]. Thereupon a lively discussion ensued [between the sages of Janaloka] about Him [Vishnu in the function of Aniruddha] in whom the Vedas lie down to rest [after the dissolution of the material world] that rose the question that you are now again asking Me. Even though they were equally qualified as for their penance and study of the Shruti as also equal minded towards friends, foes and neutrals, they appointed one of them as their speaker while the rest eagerly listened.'

Shri Sanandana said: 'When He [Maha-Vishnu] after having created this universe withdrew for the sake of its dissolution and was lying asleep, the Vedas in person awakened the Supreme One with descriptions of His characteristics, the way a sleeping king by his court poets is awakened when they as his servants approach him at dawn with [recitations of] his heroic deeds. The Vedas said: 'All glories, oh all glories to You, please Unconquerable One, defeat the eternal illusion that assumed the form of the natural modes and constitutes the [human] weakness. Because You, who in Your original status are complete with all opulences, at times engaging with Your spiritual and material energies awaken the powers of the mobile and immobile embodied beings [awake them to consciousness]. You can by us, the Vedas, be supported []. The world we perceive is by the seers regarded as a product of something greater [of brahman], something that, no more than clay, [as a resource] undergoes any change itself, being transformed in forms that dissolve again. For that reason the seers dedicated their minds, words and actions to You. Where else could the footsteps of men be placed than on the ground they are walking [see also 6.16: 22, 11.24: 18 and B.G. 7: 20-25]? Your people of enlightenment, oh Master of All the Three Worlds, therefore dive deep into the nectarean ocean of narrations [about You, the katha] that eradicate the impurity and put an end to their troubles. It is therefore not that surprising that they who by the power of their own minds dispelled the [unwanted] qualities of the [identification with one's] temporality oh Supreme One, experience the uninterrupted happiness of Your abode in their worship. They who, like a bellows, are just displacing some air as they breathe [see B.G. 18: 61] are full of vitality [only] when they are Your faithful followers, for You, who are elevated above cause and effect, constitute the underlying reality from whose mercy the universal egg of the material complete, the separate existence [the ego] and the other aspects of creation were produced [see 3.26: 51-53]. Adapted to the particular forms of the living being, You then appear here as the Ultimate Form among the different gross and subtle physical coverings [the kos'as and B.G. 18: 54]. Among those living according to the standards of the seers, they who are engrossed in their vision worship the abdomen [the lower centres] while the Arunis [the superior yogis] first of all fix their attention on the pranic knot of the subtle energies [see cakra] of the heart. From there oh Unlimited One, they move [their attention] upward to the head that is Your abode and then they go to the highest destination from which they, having reached it, never again fall down into the mouth of death [see also B.G. 8: 16]. Entering in a certain manner the by You differently created species of life as their motivation, You become visible depending the higher or lower form of Your own created beings, just as fire manifests itself [depending the form ignited]. You thus existing among them as the 'real' among the hunreal, are understood as being one unchanging, equal manifestation of love [taste] by those who free from material entanglements have spotless minds [see also B.G. 2: 12]. The person residing within the bodies he owes to his karma is, as an expansion of You who are the possessor of all energies as is stated [by the Vedas], in fact not of the external [the gross body, the deha], nor of the internal [the subtle body, the linga] but is [by these bodies] enveloped. When scholars of the scriptures have developed faith in ascertaining the status of the living entity as being of that manifestation [as an expansion of Yours, a person], they worship Your feet as the source of liberation and the field in which all offerings are sown. By diving deep into the vast nectar ocean of the adventures of the forms that You have assumed to propagate the hard to grasp principle of the soul, the few souls who found relief from the fatigue [of a material life] do not even wish to be liberated from this world, oh Lord. This is so because they, after abandoning their homes, found association with the community of the swans [the transcendental people] at Your lotus feet [see e.g. 4.24: 58, 4.30: 33, 5.12: 16, 5.13: 21, 7.6: 17-18, 7.14: 3-4]. This body useful for serving You, acts as one's self, one's friend and beloved. They however who alas fail to delight in You, rather find the degradation of the physical frame [in successive births], in spite of You as their very Self being favorably disposed, helpful and affectionate. As a matter of fact they, failing to find their way with their great existential fears, cling to material desires and are [thus] self destructive [soul killing] in their worship of the unreal [see also B.G. 16: 19]. That what by the sages with their breathing, mind and senses being brought under control in steadfast yoga is worshiped in the heart, is also attained by those who remember You in enmity [see also 3.2: 24 and 10.74: 46]. We [the Shrutis] will likewise attain You and, being equally considered by You, equally relish the nectar of the lotus feet that the women enjoy [the gopis, Your wives] whose minds are attracted to Your arms that are as firm as mighty snake bodies. Ah, who out here, who but recently was born and soon will die, has an inkling of the One Who Came First from whom the [leading] seer [Brahma] arose who was followed by the two groups of demigods [controlling the senses and the principles. See B.G. 7: 26] When He lies down to withdraw, at that time nothing remains of the gross and the subtle, nor of that what comprises them both [the bodies] and the flow of Time and the Shastras are also no longer there [B.G. 9: 7]. They who, teaching with authority, declare that life springs from dead matter, that that what is eternal would end [see B.G. 2: 16], that the soul would not be one [see 10.14: 9] and that doing business would constitute reality [see B.G. 17: 28], they who state that the living being thus would have been produced from the three modes [see B.G. 14: 19 and 13: 28], are fixed upon a dualistic notion born from ignorance. Such a thing cannot exist in Your transcendence, in You who are the Essence of Full Perception [see also 5.6: 9-11]. The [temporality of forms and thus the] untrue threefoldness and its [mind] phenomena up to the human beings, appear in You as if they would be true. [They are illusory] but, because they are transformations non-different from Him, they are nevertheless not rejected by the knowers of the Soul, for they consider the entirety of this world as something true [viz. as Your living body]. They [these forms and also persons], created by Him who enters [His creation] in person, are for that reason recognised as being [parts and parcels] of the True Self, just as gold is not different when being assigned different forms [see also 6.16: 22]. They [only] who worship You as the shelter of all created beings do not worry about Death and simply put their feet on his head, but with Your words You tie up even the scholars [among the non-devotees] the way one ties up animals. They who consider themselves Your friends [thus] arrive at purification and not so much those who turned their face away. You are the self-egotistic causeless one [free from the senses] who maintains the power of the sensory functions of all [creatures]. The demigods together with the unborn lord Brahma take part in paying You tribute and partake of the offerings carried, just as the local rulers in a kingdom together with the sovereign who rules the entire country are of respect [for You] and enjoy their share. That is how they who are the appointed leaders perform their duties in fear of You. The species of life, that manifest themselves as stationary and moving, are by Your material energy motivated for action. But that can happen only when You, the One aloof, oh Eternally Liberated One, cast Your brief glance thereupon [by assuming Your forms] for having Your pastimes in the material world. To [You] the Supreme [Personality of Godhead], no one can be a stranger or a friend, just as the ether can have no perceptible qualities. In that sense You are like the void of space. If the countless embodiments of the living beings would be eternal, the omnipresent [Time] as a consequence would not be such a sovereign rule, oh Unchanging One. But it is not otherwise. Because the substance cannot be independent from that from which it was generated [- pradhana, the primeval ether -] [You] the regulator [who are the Time, B.G. 10: 30] must be known as being equally present everywhere [as the 'fourth dimension']. When one supposes that one knows [You materially] one is mistaken in the falsehood of an opinion [on the local order, see 6.5: 19]. Material nature [prakriti] and the person [purusha] do not find their existence at a particular point in time. Not originating as such [from one or the other] it is from the combination of these two [primordial elements] that living bodies find their existence in You, just as bubbles find their existence as a combination of water and air. And just as rivers merge into the ocean and all flavors [of flower nectar] merge into the honey, these living beings with all their different names and qualities [in de end] merge [again] into [You,] the Supreme [see also B.G. 9: 7]. Those who are wise understand how much Your maya bewilders human beings and frequently render traditional service unto You, the source of liberation. How could there for the ones who faithfully follow You be any kind of fear about a material existence, a fear that by the three rimmed [wheel of Time - of past, present and future] - by Your furrowing eyebrows - repeatedly is raised in those who do not take shelter of You [see also B.G. 4: 10, 7: 14 & 14: 26]? The mind being conquered by the senses and the breath is like a horse not under control [B.G. 2: 60 and 5.11: 10]. Those who in this world strive for regulation but have abandoned the feet of the guru, find, being most unsteady with the various methods of control, full of distress hundreds of obstacles on their way oh Unborn One. They are like merchants [sailing] on the ocean who failed to employ a helmsman [see 10.51: 60 & B.G. 4: 34]. What do servants, children, a body, a wife, money, a house, land, vitality and vehicles mean to human beings for whom You became their very Self, the Embodiment of All Pleasure? And what at all would to those, who fail to appreciate the truth [of Him] and carry on with their indulgence in sexual matters, bring [real] happiness in this world that is subject to destruction and, in itself, is lacking meaning [see also B.G. 13: 8-12]? The seers free from false pride who, with the greatest piety, on this earth direct themselves at the places of pilgrimage and the sites of His pastimes, have installed Your feet in their heart and destroy all sins with the water of their feet. They who but once turned their mind towards You, the Supreme Soul of Eternal Happiness, will never again devote themselves to the homely affair [of a family life] that steals away a person's essential qualities. If someone says: 'From the real [of God] the real [of the universe] has manifested', that can certainly be doubted and refuted [*4]. The combination is inconsistent, for it is true in a number of cases, while it is an illusion not being so in other cases. For the sake of worldly purposes, rows of people with a dark vision like to consider it alternatively and bewilder, with different meanings and implications of Your numerous words of wisdom, those who are not using their minds with the ritual praises. Because this universe did not exist in the beginning and after its annihilation neither will exist, can be concluded that that what in-between appears within You, the sole object of love, is the untrue. We understand this universe thus as an [unreal, illusory] combination of different categories of the [real] primal substance [see text 26], while the less intelligent ones prone to falsehood, consider this mind game as real [see B.G. 6: 8]. By reason of [the insurmountable presence of] material nature, he [the living entity] reconciles himself to that undeveloped state and, in taking to her qualities [the gunas], accordingly assumes forms. Bound to those forms he is deprived of spiritual qualities and runs into [the facts of birth and] death. You Yourself on the other hand leave her [the material energy] aside like a snake that sheds its skin and are in Your eightfold greatness [see siddhis] glorified as the One Unlimited in His Glories who is endowed with all spiritual qualities. When those who restrain themselves do not uproot the desires in their hearts, they, in their impurity, cannot reach You who have entered their heart. They are like someone who has forgotten the jewel he hung around his neck. Yoga practitioners who are satisfied with an animalistic life will be unhappy in both [worlds here and hereafter]: [here about] death they cannot escape [and hereafter about] You whose kingdom they cannot attain [see also B.G. 6: 41-42]. Someone who understands You, is not concerned about the favorable or unfavorable, good or bad that is associated with the body he has assumed, neither does he care about what others say. Oh You of All qualities, day after day he fills his ears with the song that is heard in every age through the discipic succession. For that reason the children of Manu [the human beings, see 3.22: 34-39 and 5.13: 25] consider You the ultimate goal of liberation. Neither the masters of heaven nor even You, can reach the end of Your glories oh Unlimited One, oh You within whom the many universes by the drive of Time, each in their own shell, are blown about in the sky like particles of dust. The Shrutis bearing fruit by [neti neti] eliminating that what is not the Absolute Truth, find in You their ultimate conclusion [see siddhanta].

The Supreme Lord said: 'Having heard this instruction about the True Self, the sons of Brahma understood their final destination and worshiped thereupon perfectly satisfied the sage Sanandana. This is how in the past the nectar of the underlying mystery of all the Vedas and Puranas [the Upanishad philosophy] was distilled by the great souls [the classical sages] who appeared in this world to roam in higher spheres. Oh you heir of Brahma [Narada], wander the earth as you wish, meditating with faith upon this instruction about the Soul that turns the desires of man to ashes.'

Shri Shuka said: 'The self-possessed rishi, thus receiving the command of the sage, accepted it faithfully, oh King. Now completely being of success he, whose vow was as firm as a kshatriya's, after due consideration said the following. Shri Narada said: 'My obeisances to Him, the Supreme Lord Krishna of a spotless renown, who manifests His attractive expansions for the liberation of all living beings [1.3: 28].'

Thus having spoken Narada bowed down to the Original Rishi [Narayana] and to the great souls who were His pupils. Then he went from there to the hermitage of my physical father, Dvaipayana Vedavyasa. He was honoured by the great devotee [Vyasa] who offered him a seat, whereupon Narada sat down and described to him what he had heard from the mouth of Shri Narayana. And thus I have answered your question oh King, on how the mind can be engaged in the Absolute Truth [- the reality] without material qualities that cannot be expressed in words. He who watches over this universe in the beginning, the middle and the end, He who is the Controller of the unmanifested matter [pradhana] and the individual soul [jiva], He who sent forth this universe, entered it along with the individual seer and producing bodies [with him] regulates them. He because of whom one surrendering abandons the material energy one embraces the way a sleeper abandons his body, is the Supreme Lord upon whom one incessantly should meditate to be free from fear [see B.G. 16: 11-12, 1.9: 39 and the bhajan Sarvasva Tomara Carana].'

*: Shрила Shridhara Svami elaborately analyzes this problem, of describing the inexpressible Truth in definable terms, by means of the traditional discipline of Sanskrit poetics that states that words have three kinds of expressive capacities, called Shabda-vrittis. These are the different ways a word refers to its meaning, distinguished as mukhya-vritti - literal meaning (divided in rudhi, conventional use and yoga, derived use as in etymology), lakshana-vritti - metaphorical meaning, and the closely related gauna-vritti, a similar meaning; exemplified by: the word lion has the three expressive forms of: it is a lion - literal, he is a lion - metaphorical and he is like a lion - similar use. So in fact the question is how the Absolute would be covered taken literal, in metaphor and in simile.

 : According to Shрила Jiva Gosvami, the twenty-seven verses of the prayers of the personified Vedas (Texts 14 - 4 represent the opinions of each of the twenty-eight major Shrutis. These chief Upanishads and other Shrutis are concerned with the various approaches of the Absolute Truth. See the purports pp 10.87 of this chapter of the parampara for specific quotes.

: The Katha Upanishad .2.1 proclaims:
nityo nityanam cetanas' cetananam
eko bahunam yo vidadhati kaman tam pitha-gam ye 'nupas'yanti dhiras tesham Shantih Shas'vati netaresham

"Among all the eternal, conscious beings, there is one who supplies the needs of everyone else. The wise souls who worship Him in His abode attain everlasting peace. Others cannot."

*4: The parampara writes here: "According to Shрила Vis'vanatha Cakravarti Thakura, the Upanshads teach that this created world is real but temporary."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 88:

Lord Shiva Saved from Vrikasura

The king [Parikshit] said: 'The demigods, demons and human beings who worship the austere Lord Shiva, are usually rich and enjoy their senses, contrary to the ones who honour Lakshmi and her Husband, the Lord Hari. We are in great doubt about this and would like to understand this matter of the contradictory destinations of the worshippers of the two Lords, who are of such opposite characters.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Shiva, who is always united with his Shakti, covers the natural modes with the three characteristics of his emotion [his sattva], his authority [his rajasa] and his darkness [his tamasa]. He thus constitutes the [embodiment of the] threefold principle of [false] ego. From them the sixteen transformations [lingas] have manifested [of the mind, the ten senses and the five elements]. Someone who turns to [the ruling deity of] any of them will enjoy all kinds of material wealth [see under Shiva]. Lord Hari however, the Original Person, is transcendental to material nature and absolutely untouched by the modes. He is the [inner] witness seeing everything. By worshipping Him one is freed from [the influence of] the gunas. This is what your grandfather the king [Yudisthira] asked Acyuta when he, after completing his horse sacrifices, heard from Him about the dharma. The Supreme Lord, his Master, who for the sake of the ultimate benefit of all men had descended into the Yadu family, then was pleased to speak to him as he eagerly listened. The Supreme Lord said: 'From the one I favor I gradually take away the wealth. Wanting he will suffer one distress after the other and be abandoned by his friends and relatives [see also 7.15: 15, 9.21: 12, 10.81: 14 & 20, 10.87: 40, B.G. 9: 22]. When he failing in his attempts to endeavor for money gets frustrated and becomes friends with My devotees, I will show him My mercy. When one, intelligent with the wisdom, understands that the subtle, pure, eternal spirit of the Supreme Infinite Brahman constitutes one's true self, one is freed from samsara. Leaving Me aside because I am most difficult to worship, people worship others from which they quickly find satisfaction in receiving royal opulence. Having become arrogant, proud and negligent they, surprisingly, then insult those whom they owe the benedictions [see also B.G. 2: 42-44; 4: 12; 7: 20-25; 17: 22, 18: 28].'

Shri Shuka said: 'Brahma, Vishnu, Shiva and others are capable of pronouncing curses and granting favors. Brahma and Shiva are quick with their condemnations and blessings my dear King, but the Infalible One [Lord Vishnu] is not. In this connection the following ancient story is told as an example about Girisa [Shiva], who ran into danger because he offered the demon Vrikasura the choice of a benediction. An Asura named Vrika, a son of Shakuni [see 9.24: 5], once met Narada on the road and wickedly asked him whom of the three Lords would be quickly pleased. He said: 'For quick success you better worship Shiva. He is as quickly satisfied by qualities as he is angered by faults. Satisfied about Ten-head [Ravana] and Bana who like minstrels sang his glories, he ran into great trouble [though] when he gave them unequalled power.'

Thus being informed the Asura worshiped him [Lord Shiva] at Kedara [in the Himalayas], by offering oblations of flesh from his own limbs into the fire that is Shiva's mouth. 8-1 Out of frustration not to obtain the sight of the Lord he, at the seventh day, with his hair wetted in the waters of that holy place, was about to cut off his head with a hatchet. But at that moment Shiva supremely merciful rose from the fire looking like Agni. He stopped him by seizing his arms just like he would do. By that touch his body was restored to its original complete state. He told him: 'Enough, enough, dear man, please listen. Choose a benediction from me, I will bestow whatever boon you desire. Ah, tormenting your body so greatly is useless, for I am [already] pleased by persons who with some water approach me for shelter [see also B.G. 17: 5-6].'

The sinner then asked the god for a boon that terrified all living beings: 'May everyone die upon whose head I place my hand!'

Oh son of Bharata, when Rudra heard this, he disgruntled vibrated and granted the request with a forced smile, like he was giving milk to a snake [see also 10.16: 37]. To put the favor to a test the demon then tried to put his hand on the head of Lord Shambu, Shiva who thus became afraid of what he had caused himself. Trembling with fear being pursued by him, he from the north [of his residence] fled in all directions to the limits of the earth and the sky. 5-2 Not knowing what to do against it, the chief demigods remained silent. He thereupon went to Vaikunthha, the place of light beyond all darkness where Narayana, the Supreme Goal is personally present. That place constitutes the destination from where renunciates do not return who stopped with the violence [against other creatures] and found peace [see also Shvetadvipal]. 7-2 The Supreme Lord, the Eradicator of Distress, who from a distance saw the danger, by the power of His yogamaya turned Himself into a young brahmin student and came before him. Complete with a belt, deerskin, rod and prayer beads He had an effulgence that glowed like fire. He respectfully greeted him humbly with kus'a grass in His hands. The Supreme Lord said: 'Dear son of Shakuni, you seem to be tired. Why have you come from so far? Please rest a while, should we not attend to all the desires of this personal body? If We may hear about it oh mighty one, please tell Us what you have in mind. One usually accomplishes one's purposes with the help of others is it not?'

Shri Shuka said: 'Thus being questioned by the Supreme Lord with words that rained like nectar, all his fatigue vanished. He told Him what he had done. The Supreme Lord [then] said to Vrika: 'If that is the case, We cannot put faith in Shiva's statements, for he has been cursed by Daksha to become diabolical as the king of the ghosts and devils [see 4.2: 9-16]. If you, oh King of the Danavas, put faith in him as the 'spiritual master of the universe', then see right now what happens when you place your hand on your own head! If Shambhu's words thus or otherwise prove to be false, oh best of the Danavas, then please kill him who has been fooling you, so that he never lies again.'

He was thus as bewildered by the so very clever, excellent words of the Supreme Lord, that he thought no longer and foolishly placed his hand on his own head. Like being hit by lightning his head was instantly shattered. He fell down whereupon from the sky the sounds could be heard of 'Victory!', 'Hail!' and 'Well done!' Now that, with the death of the sinful Asura Vrika, Shiva was freed from the danger, the celestial sages, the ancestors and the singers of heaven released a rain of flowers. 8-3 Bhagavan, the Supreme Personality, then addressed the delivered Girisa: 'Ah, dear Mahadeva, see how this sinner was killed by his own sinfulness! What happiness, oh master, can there be for a living being who was of offense with the elevated saints, not to mention having been in offense with the Lord of the Universe, the Guru of the Living Being [see also 1.18: 42, 7.4: 20 and B.G. 16: 23]? Whoever hears or speaks about this rescue of lord Shiva by the Lord of the Supersoul, the Inconceivable Personal Manifestation of the Ocean of All Energies, will be freed from his enemies as also from the repetition of birth and death.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 89:

Vishnu the Best of the Gods and the Krishnas Retrieve a Brahmin's Sons

Shri Shuka said: 'Among sages performing a sacrifice at the bank of the Sarasvati, oh King, a controversy arose as to whom of the three [Lords] who are there from the beginning, would be the greatest. Desirous to know this they sent the son of Brahma called Bhrgu to find this out oh King. He went to the court of Brahma. To test his goodness, he did not bow down to him nor did he utter a prayer. That kindled the great Lord's passion who then got angry. In spite of the anger towards his son that was rising in his heart, the self-born one managed to control himself, just as fire is extinguished by its own [evolutionary] product [water, see also 3.12: 6-10]. Next he went to Mount Kailasa where Shiva, glad to see him, rose to his feet in order to embrace his brother. - But when Bhrgu denied this and said: 'You are a transgressor of the path', he became angry and ready to kill rose, with eyes shooting fire, his trident against him. The goddess [Parvati] fell at his feet and pacified him verbally. Bhrgu subsequently went to Vaikunthha where Lord Janardana resides. - The Supreme Lord, the Destination of the Devotees, was lying with His head on the lap of the goddess of fortune. He kicked Him in the chest whereupon He together with Lakshmi rose up. He came down from the bed, bowed His head down to the sage and said: 'Be welcome oh brahmin, take this seat, please forgive Us, oh master, for a moment We did not notice you had arrived! 0-1 Please purify Me, My world and the rulers of all worlds devoted to Me, with the water washing from the feet of your good self that creates the sacredness of the sites of pilgrimage. Today, My lord, I have become the exclusive shelter of the goddess of fortune, because with your foot having freed My chest from all sin, she will consent to reside there.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Bhrgu delighted and pleased by the solemn words the Lord of Vaikunthha thus spoke, fell silent, with tears in his eyes being overwhelmed by devotion. Oh King, Bhrgu returned to the sacrifice of the sages defending the Veda and described in full what he personally had experienced. 4-1 Hearing this the sages fell in amazement, because putting faith in Lord Vishnu as the greatest One bringing peace and fearlessness, they were freed from their doubts. The direct proof of His dharma, spiritual knowledge, detachment, realisation [of tat], eight mystic powers [siddhis] and fame drives away the impurities of the mind. He is called the Supreme Destination for all selfless souls and saintly sages who with minds that are equipoised and peaceful have forsaken the violence [of ruling by passion]. His favorite embodiment is the mode of goodness and the brahmins are His worshipable deities, they who are peaceful persons of keen intellect who revere Him without ulterior motives [see 1.2: 7; 3.25: 37 and 10.81]. In accord with the gunas there are three types of conditioned beings who find their existence by His material energy: the wild ones [of tamasa, the Rakshasas], the unenlightened ones [of rajasa, the Asuras] and the godly ones [of sattva, the Suras]. Among these three beings, those in the mode of goodness [the Suras] are the ones who lead the way [see B.G. 14: 6 & 14: 14].'

Shri Shuka said: 'The scholars [assembled] at the Sarasvati in order to dispel the doubt of the common people thus [with this conclusion] served the lotus feet of the Supreme Personality [of Pure Goodness] and attained His destination.'"

Shri Suta [at Naimisharanya] said: "This is how this nectar with the fragrance of a lotus flowed from the mouth of the son of the sage [Vyasa]. That nectar dealing with the Supreme Personality, shatters the fear of a material existence and makes the traveler on the [worldly] road constantly drink the fine verses through the holes of his ears and forget the fatigue of his wanderings. Shuka said: 'Once, in Dvaraka, it happened that the child born from the wife of a brahmin died the very moment it, as one says, touched the ground, oh descendant of Bharata. The brahmin took the corpse to the gate of the king [Ugrasena] and then, presenting it, in misery lamenting with an agitated mind said the following: 'Because this unqualified, avaricious kshatriya addicted to sense gratification, with a deceitful mind and hostile to the brahmins, failed in his duties, my son had to die. Citizens in service of a wicked ruler of man who, out of control with his senses, delights in violence, will always suffer poverty and be unhappy.'

And so it came to pass a second and a third time that the wise brahmin the same way left [a dead child] at the gate and sang the same song [of lamentation]. 6-2 Arjuna who some day was in the vicinity because of Kes'ava, happened to hear about it when the brahmin lost a ninth child. He said: 'Oh brahmin, is there not someone out here who can wield the bow at your home? Truly these members of the ruling class behave like brahmins attending a sacrifice! There where brahmins have to lament the loss of wives, children and wealth, the ones dressed up as kings are but actors living for their own material interest. Oh great lord, I will protect the offspring of the two of you who are so miserable in this matter. And if I fail to fulfill my promise, I will enter fire to put an end to my sins [compare B.G. 2: 34].'

The brahmin said: 'Neither Sankarshana, Vasudeva, Pradyumna the greatest archer, nor Aniruddha the incomparable chariot fighter, could save them [my sons]. Then why do you so naively try to do that what could not be done by the [catvruhya] Lords of the Universe? We therefore cannot believe it.'

Shri Arjuna said: 'I am neither Sankarshana, oh brahmin, nor Krishna nor even a descendant. I am the one called Arjuna whose bow is the Gandiva! Do not belittle my prowess that satisfied the three-eyed one [Lord Shiva] oh brahmin. I will defeat Death in battle and bring your children back, oh master!'

Oh tormentor of the enemies [king Parikshit], the scholar thus being convinced by Arjuna went home, satisfied about what he had heard about the prowess of the son of Pritha. When his wife was about to deliver again, the most elevated brahmin said distraught to Arjuna: 'Save, please save my child from death!'

He touched pure water, offered his obeisances to the mighty Lord [Shiva], remembered [the mantras for] his weapons and strung the bowstring of his Gandiva. Upwards, downwards and sideways he with arrows being charged with the mantras, created a cage of arrows and thus fenced in the house of delivery. The child that next took birth from the brahmin's wife, cried for some time but then suddenly disappeared into the sky complete with its body. The brahmin thereupon in the presence of Krishna derided Arjuna by saying: 'Just see what a fool I am, I who trusted the boasting of an eunuch! When neither Arjuna, Aniruddha, Balarama nor Kes'ava could save them, who else would be capable to offer protection in a situation like this? Damn that Arjuna with his false words, damn the bow of that braggart who so dumb and delusional thought he could return the ones taken by fate!'

While the wise brahmin thus was cursing him, Arjuna resorted to a mystic incantation and went straight to the heavenly city of Samyamani where the great Yamaraja lives. 3-4 Not finding the brahmin's child there he, with his weapons ready, went from there to the cities of Indra, Agni, Nirriti [the god of death subordinate to Yamaraja], Soma [the moon god], Vayu and Varuna. Next he searched all the other regions, from the subterranean world up to the highest position in heaven. Failing to obtain from them the son of the twice-born soul, he was ready to enter the fire as he had promised, but then was opposed by Krishna who stopped him. [He said:] 'I will show you the sons of the brahmin, please do not despise yourself! Men [as critical with us] like this, are going to bring the spotless fame of the two of us.'

After this statement, the Supreme Lord, the Divine Controller, mounted his chariot together with Arjuna and set off in the western direction. Passing over the seven continents with their seven seas and seven mountain ranges, He crossed the [lokakoka] border that separated the worlds from outer space and entered the vast darkness [see also 5.1: 31-33]. 8-4 There in the darkness the horses Shaibya, Sugriva, Meghapushpa and Balahaka [see also 10.53*] lost their way, oh best of the Bharatas. Seeing their plight the Supreme Lord, the Great Master of All Yoga Masters, sent His personal cakra shining like a thousand suns ahead of the chariot. The Sudarsana disc, that with its extremely intensive effulgence was speeding ahead as fast as the mind, cut itself through the immense dense and fearsome darkness of the manifestation like an arrow from Lord Ramacandra's bow shot at an army. Arjuna followed the path of the cakra beyond that darkness and beheld the all-pervasive, endlessly expanding, transcendental light [the brahma-jyoti], that hurt his eyes so much that he closed them [see also 10.28: 14-15]. From there they entered a body of water that by a mighty wind was moved about into a splendor of huge waves. In the water was situated a wondrous abode that supremely radiated with columns shining brightly with thousands of inlaid gems. The huge serpent Ananta resided there. Amazing with His thousands of heads that radiated with the gems upon the hoods and His twice as many frightening eyes, He with His dark blue necks and tongues resembled the white mountain [Kailasa]. 4-5 On that serpent he saw the almighty, highest authority of the Personality Supreme to all Personalities of Godhead sitting comfortably, looking like a dense raincloud, with beautiful yellow garments, a pleasing attractive face and broad eyes. His thousands of scattered locks bathed in the brilliance of His earrings and the clusters of large jewels in His crown. Being framed by a garland of forest flowers He with His eight handsome long arms, Kaustubha jewel and Shrivatsa mark, was as the Chief of the Rulers of the Universe served by His personal associates headed by Nanda and Sunanda, as also by His cakra and His other weapons that manifested their personal forms, [the consorts of] His energies for prosperity, beauty, fame and material creation [resp. Pushti, Shri, Kirti and Aja] and the complete of His mystic powers [siddhis]. Acyuta paid homage to Himself in His Unlimited Form as did also Arjuna who was amazed by the sight [of Maha-Vishnu]. The Almighty Lord and Master of the Rulers of the Universe then with a smile and an invigorating voice addressed the two of them who had joined their palms. 'I brought the sons of the brahmin over here with the desire to see the two of you who descended as My expansions to protect the dharma. Please quickly return to My presence after you have killed the ones of darkness who burden the earth [see 2.2: 24-27 and 2.6: 26]. Even though all the desires of the two of you have been fulfilled, oh best of all persons, you should be engaged in upholding the dharma for the sake of the common man, just as the sages Nara and Narayana did.'

The two Krishnas [see also B.G. 10: 37] thus being instructed by the Supreme Lord of the Highest Abode, said 'om' while bowing down to the Almighty One. They took the sons of the twice-born soul with them and returned elated to their abode [Dvaraka], the same way they had come. There they handed the sons, who had the same bodies and the same age [as they had when they were lost], over to the brahmin. Having seen the abode of Vishnu, Arjuna was most surprised. He concluded that whatever powers human beings have, are all manifestations of Krishna's mercy. He [Krishna] performed many heroic acts like this in the world, enjoyed the sensual pleasures [see also 1.11: 35-39] and was of worship with the most important sacrifices [e.g. in 10.24 and 10.74 & 75]. Just like Indra at the right time pours his rain, the Supreme Lord in exercising His Supremacy, rained down all that was desired upon His subjects, beginning with His brahmins. By killing all the kings who opposed the dharma and therein having engaged Arjuna and others, He has paved the way for the son of Dharma [Yudhishtira] to carry out the principles of religion [see also 1.14 & 15].'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 90:

The Queens Play and Speak and Lord Krishna's Glories Summarised

- Shri Shuka said: 'The Master of the goddess of fortune resided happily in Dvaraka. His city, opulent in every respect, was populated by the most prominent Vrishnis and their excellently, in new apparel dressed women, who in the beauty of their youth shone like lightning when they on the rooftops were playing with balls and other toys. Its roads were always crowded with well ornamented and honoured elephants dripping with mada, with foot soldiers and horses and chariots shining with gold. The city was richly endowed with gardens and parks with rows of flowering trees where from all sides the sounds of the bees and the birds were heard that frequented them. He [Krishna] enjoyed there with His sixteen thousand wives for whom He, as their one and only love, had expanded Himself in their richly furnished residences in as many different forms [see also 10.69: 41]. There were crystal clear ponds filled with the cooing of flocks of birds and the aroma of the pollen of night and day blooming lotuses and water lilies. The Great Appearance sported there by diving into the water of the streams, whereby His body, being embraced by the women, was smeared with the kunkuma of their breasts. - Being glorified by the singers of heaven who played two-sided drums, kettledrums and tabors as also by male and female reciters playing vinas, His laughing wives squirted Him wet with syringes. Squirting them wet in His turn He sported like the lord of the treasure keepers [Kuvera] with his nymphs. With their clothes wet revealing their thighs and breasts, they looked resplendently as they - with the flowers of their large braids scattered all over the place and with blooming faces beaming wide smiles - tried to seize His syringe and under the spell of Cupid embraced their Spouse. Like He was the king of the elephants surrounded by she-elephants, Krishna enjoyed the being sprayed by and spraying of the women, while the kunkuma from their breasts stuck to His garland and the arrangement of His wealth of hair was disheveled from being absorbed in the game. Done playing Krishna gave the male and female performers who earned their livelihood by singing and playing music, the ornaments and garments of Himself and His wives. Krishna thus sporting stole away the hearts of the wives with His movements, talks, glances and smiles, His jokes, exchanges of love and embraces. With their minds exclusively focussed on Mukunda they, being entranced, spoke like they were mad. Now listen to me as I relate to you the words they spoke thinking about the Lotus-eyed One.

The queens said [see also 10.47: 12-21, 10.83: 8-40]: 'Oh kurari you are lamenting! Deprived of sleep you cannot rest while the Controller tonight is sleeping somewhere in the world at an unknown place. Can it be that your heart, just like ours oh friend, was deeply pierced by His smiling and the munificent, playful glance of His lotus eyes? Oh cakravaki, having closed your eyes for the night, you nevertheless are crying pitifully for your unseen friend. Or do you perhaps, after having attained the servitude, just like us desire to carry in your braided hair the garland that was honoured by Acyuta's feet? Oh dear, dear ocean, you are always making such a noise, never getting any sleep. Are you suffering from sleeplessness? Or were, maybe, your personal qualities stolen by Mukunda so that you also got into this hard to cure [diseased] condition? Oh moon are you, in the grip of the fell disease of consumption, so emaciated that you cannot dispel the darkness with your rays? Or are you maybe dumbstruck, oh dearest, because you, just like us, cannot remember what Mukunda all said? Oh wind from the Malaya mountains, what have we done that displeased you so that our hearts are led by Cupid [Kamadeva], hearts that are already torn apart by Govinda's sidelong glances? Oh honourable cloud, you surely are a friend most dear to the Chief of the Yadavas with the Shrivatsa on His chest. We are, in our meditation on pure love, just as bound to Him as your good self is. Your most eager heart is just as distraught as ours. We just like you, remember Him over and over. And that results in torrents of rain with you, just as it time and again makes us shed streams of tears. It can be so hurtful to associate with Him! Oh sweet-throated cuckoo, please tell me what I should do to please you who vibrate His so very dear sounds, in this voice that is capable of reviving the dead. Oh mountain with your broad-minded intelligence, you do not move or speak. Are you preoccupied with great matters or do you maybe, just like us, desire to hold on your breasts the feet of the darling son of Vasudeva? Oh [rivers,] wives of the ocean, your lakes have alas lost their wealth of lotuses that shriveled away now that they dried up, just like us, who grew very thin because of not obtaining the loving glance of our beloved husband, the Lord of Madhu, who so often stole our hearts [see also 10.47: 41 and 10.48: 11]? Oh swan, be welcome and sit down, please drink some milk and tell us the news oh dear one, for we know you to be a messenger of Shauri. Is the Unconquerable One all well? Does He who is so fickle in His friendship, still remember that He talked to us a long time ago? Why should we [run after Him to] be of worship, oh servant of the campaka? Tell Him who raises the desire, to visit us without the goddess of fortune. Why should that woman have the exclusive right of devotion?'

Shri Shuka said: 'Speaking and acting with such ecstatic love for Krishna, the Master of the Yoga masters, the wives of Lord Madhava attained the ultimate goal. He, who in numerous songs is glorified in numerous ways, attracts with force the mind of any woman who but heard about Him. And how much more attractive would He then be to those who directly see Him? How can we ever describe the austerities of the women who, with the idea of having Him as their husband, the Spiritual Master of the Universe, with pure love served His feet perfectly with massages and so on? Thus proceeding according to the dharma as defended by the Vedas, He, the Goal of all Sainly Souls, demonstrated how one living at home arrives at the regulation of one's religiosity, economic development and sense gratification [the purusharthas]. With Krishna answering to the highest standard of a householder's life, there where over sixteen thousand and one hundred queens [see also 10.59 and 7.14]. Among them there were eight gems of women headed by Rukmini whom I, along with their sons, one after the other have described previously [see 10.83 & 10.61: 8-19], oh King. Krishna, the Supreme Lord Who Never Fails in His Purpose, begot in each of His many wives ten sons [and one daughter]. Among these there were eighteen maharathas of an unlimited prowess, whose fame spread wide. Hear now from me their names. 3-3 They were: Pradyumna and [His son] Aniruddha; Diptiman and Bhanu as also Samba, Madhu and Brihadbhanu; Citrabhanu, Vrika and Aruna; Pushkara and Vedabahu, Shrutadeva and Sunandana; Citrabahu and Virupa, Kavi and Nyagrodha. Oh best of kings, Pradyumna, the son of Rukmini, was of these sons of Krishna - the enemy of Madhu - the most prominent one. He was just like His father. He, the great chariot fighter, married the daughter of Rukmi [named Rukmavati] from whom next Aniruddha was born who was endowed with the strength of a ten thousand elephants [see 10.61]. He, as you know, married Rukmi's granddaughter [Rocana] from whom next His son Vajra was born, one of the few who survived the battle with clubs [see 3.4: 1 & 2]. Pratibahu was his son, who fathered Subahu whose son Shantaseana had Shataseana as his son. No one born in this family was poor in wealth or had few children, was short-lived, small in prowess or neglecting the brahminical interest.

The glorious deeds of the men born in the Yadu dynasty cannot be summed up, oh King, not even in a ten thousand years. I heard that there were thirty-eight million eight-hundred thousand teachers for the children of the Yadu family. Who can keep count of the Yadavas when Ugrasena alone among its great personalities was assisted by ten thousand times ten thousand, times hundreds of thousands of men [*]? The most pitiless Daityas who in [past ages in] wars between the gods and the demons had been killed, took their birth among the human beings and arrogantly troubled the populace. The devas were by the Lord ordered to descend in the one hundred-and-one clans of the family, oh King, in order to subdue them [see 10.1: 62-63]. Krishna was to them, on account of His mastery, the authority of Lord Hari because of which all the Yadavas who were His faithful followers prospered. Because the Vrishnis always thought of Krishna, they, in their activities of sleeping, sitting, walking, conversing, playing, bathing and so on, forgot the presence of their own bodies [and hence were fearless, see also 10.89: 14-17]. Oh King, when Krishna took His birth among the Yadus He outshone the pilgrimage site of the heavenly river [the Ganges] that washes from His feet. Because of His embodiment friends and foes attained their goal [7.1: 46-47]. The undefeated and supremely perfect goddess Shri belongs to Him, she for whom others are struggling. His name being heard or chanted is what destroys the inauspiciousness. He settled the dharma for the lines of [disciple] succession [the schools of the sages]. With Lord Krishna holding the weapon that is the wheel of Time [His cakra], it is no wonder that the burden of the earth was removed [see also 3.2: 7-12]. He is glorious as the Ultimate Abode and is known as the son of Devaki. He is the devotion of the Yadu nobles who with His arms [or His devotees] puts an end to the unrighteous ones. He is the Destroyer of the distress of the moving and not-moving living beings. He is the One who, always smiling with His beautiful face, awakens Cupid in the damsels of Vraja [see 10.30-33, 10.35, 10.47]. Thus proceeding with the wish to protect His transcendental path [of devotional service], He for the sake of His lila has assumed various personal forms. With them imitating the [human] ways, He has destroyed the [burden of the] karma [belonging to them]. When one wants to follow His feet one will have to listen to the stories about this Best One among the Yadus. A mortal who at every sacrificial ceremony hears about, sings about and meditates upon the beautiful topics concerning Mukunda, heads from his home for His abode, the place where the inescapable sway of death is arrested. Even the ones ruling this earth [like Dhruva and Priyavrata] went into the forest for this sake.'

*: The parampara adds here that to the rules of Mimamsa interpretation the number of three is taken as the default number when no specific number is given. So literally would strict to the rules be said here that Ugrasena would have had 30 trillion attendants.

Thus the tenth BOOK of the Shrimad Bhagavatam ends named: The Summum Bonum.

BOOK 11: GENERAL HISTORY

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 1:

The Curse Upon the Yadu Dynasty

Shri Shuka said: 'After Lord Krishna together with Balarama and surrounded by the Yadus had realised the elimination of the Daityas and had reduced the burden of the earth, very soon a conflict arose [between the Kauravas and the Pandavas]. They [the Pandavas] who time and again were angered by the duplicitous gambling, the insults, the grabbing by the hair [of Draupadi] and the other transgressions of their enemies [their nephews, the Kauravas], constituted the immediate cause [with the historical dynastic struggle, see also Yayati and 10.49 & 10.68] for the Supreme Lord to [further] relieve the earth of her burden and [also] kill all the kings who assembled [at Kurukshetra] to take opposite sides. And after the Yadus being protected by His arms had eliminated the kings who with their royal armies had burdened the earth, the Unfathomable Lord thought to Himself: 'One may say that the burden of the earth has been eliminated, but I do not think the load is gone. The intolerable burden [alas] remains with the Yadu dynasty itself.'

They who in every respect sought their refuge in Me, were never frustrated in the exercise of their power. Since they have no defeat to fear from any other side I will arrange a quarrel within the Yadu dynasty, just like fire in a bamboo-grove [is generated by the wind through mutual friction]. That is how I will achieve [My purpose:] My abode of peace [see also 3.3: 14 and 8.8: 37].'

Thus having decided, oh King, the Lord, the Almighty One who realises everything He wants, withdrew His family by means of a curse that was pronounced against them by the brahmins. - After by His form, the beauty of all the worlds, having freed the eyes of men, by His words having attracted the minds of all who remembered them and by His feet having redirected the [wrongful] activities of anyone who saw them, the Lord, who effortlessly on earth spread His glories that are praised in the most beautiful verses and by which one may cross the ocean of ignorance, achieved His [desired] position [of peace and beatitude, see also 7.5: 23-24].'

The King said: 'How could it happen that this curse against the Vrishnis was pronounced by the brahmins? The Vrishnis who were fully absorbed in Krishna, were always charitable and respectful towards the brahmins and served the elders. What led to that curse and what kind of curse was it, oh purest among the twice-born souls? Please tell me how this dissension [could rise] among those who share the same soul [of Krishna].'

The son of Vyasa said: 'Embodied in a form that was the amalgamation of all things beautiful, on earth performing the most auspicious activities and to His full satisfaction enjoying His life as He resided in His abode [of Dvaraka], He, so greatly famed, [now] wanted to destroy His dynasty. That was the only thing left to do for Him. 1-1 After in the house of the lord of the Yadus [Vasudeva] having performed most favorable rituals to bestow piety and take away the impurities of Kali-yuga, the sages Vis'vamitra, Asita, Kanva, Durvasa, Bhrgu, Angira, Kasyapa, Vamadeva, Atri, Vasistha, Narada and others, were by the Soul of Time [Lord Krishna] sent away to go to Pindaraka [a pilgrimage site]. 3-1 [Having arrived there] they were approached by young boys of the Yadu dynasty in a game in which Samba the son of Jambavati [see also 10.68] had dressed up in woman's clothes. Feigning humility they took hold of their feet and impudently asked: 'This black-eyed pregnant woman would like to ask you something, oh men of learning, but she is too embarrassed to do it herself. Can you tell whether she who is about to give birth and desires a son, will get one?'

Oh King, the sages thus being tricked said angrily to them: 'She, oh fools, will for you give birth to a mace that will destroy the dynasty!'

Most terrified to hear that, they hastily uncovered the belly of Samba wherein indeed a club made of iron could be seen. 'What have we done? What will the family say of us? What a bad luck!' they said perturbed, took the club and went home. With the beauty of their faces faded, they brought the club to an assembly of the king [Ugrasena] and told in the presence of all the Yadus what had happened. When they saw the club and heard about the infallible curse of the learned souls, oh King, the inhabitants of Dvaraka were astonished and distraught with fear. Ahuka [Ugrasena], the Yadu king, ordered the club to be ground to bits and next threw the iron together with the remaining pieces of the club into the water of the ocean. The iron was swallowed by a certain fish while the fine dust was carried away by the waves and washed ashore where it grew into canes with sharp-edged blades [called eraka]. The fish was by a fisherman in the ocean caught in a net together with others. The piece of iron contained in the fish's stomach was by a hunter [called Jara] fixed on a shaft [as an arrowhead]. Even though the Supreme Lord very well knew what it all meant, He did not want to reverse the curse of the scholars and, in His form of Time, accepted it.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 2:

Maharaja Nimi Meets the Nine Yogendras

Shri Shuka said: 'Desirous to worship Krishna, oh best of the Kurus, Narada continued to stay in Dvaraka, the capital protected by the arms of Govinda [see also 6.5: 43 & 10.69]. Which sensible person faced with death coming from all sides, oh King, would not be of worship for the lotus feet of Mukunda who is so worshipable for even the best of the immortals? One day Vasudeva said the following to the deva-rishi who came over to his house and was respectfully greeted and worshipped with paraphernalia and a comfortable seat. Shri Vasudeva said: 'Oh great lord, this visit of yours compares to the visit of a good father, for you who are there for both the misers and everyone on the path of Uttamas'loka, appear for the benefit of all embodied souls. What the gods do means misery and happiness to the living beings, but what saints like you do who accepted the Infallible One as their very soul, results in happiness only [see also 1.2: 25-26, 3.25: 21]. The gods behave like one's shadow. They care for their worshipers depending the obeisances one makes and the karma that one has. But the saints are of mercy for the fallen souls [irrespective of what they did. See also B.G. 3: 12, 4: 12, 7: 20-23]. Oh brahmin, I nevertheless would like to ask you about the religious duties to please the Supreme Lord, [for] the mortal soul who with faith hears about them, will be freed from all fear [compare 10.2: 30-33]. A long time ago [in a previous life], I, bewildered by His maya, worshipped Ananta, the Lord who Awards Liberation, for begetting a child in this world and not for my liberation [see also 10.3: 32-45 and 4.1: 20]. Please instruct us therefore,, oh you true to the vow, so that we without much trouble by your mercy may find liberation from this world full of dangers that frightens us at every step.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Oh king, thus being asked by the intelligent Vasudeva, the deva-rishi was pleased to speak to him because his qualities reminded him of the Lord. Shri Narada said: 'This question you asked about the bhagavad-dharma is the correct one, oh best of the Satvatas, for the entire universe is purified by that dharma. By hearing or talking about it, by meditating upon it, accepting it with reverence or appreciating it when done by others, this dutiful respect of the truth purifies immediately even those who are averse to the gods and the entire world. Today you brought the Supreme Lord, the Personality of Godhead Narayana to my mind [see also 10.87: 5], chanting and hearing about whom one becomes supremely blissful and pious. Concerning this matter one often mentions the example of the ancient story of a conversation between the sons of Rishabha and the king of Videha who was a broad-minded soul. The son of Svayambhava Manu named Priyavrata had a son named Agnidhra. From him there was Nabhi and his son is remembered as Rishabhadeva [see also 5.3]. He appeared in this world with the desire to teach the dharma of finding liberation and is considered a plenary expansion of Vasudeva. Of Him there were one hundred sons who perfectly observed the Absolute Truth. The eldest one, Bharata [see 5.7], was completely devoted to Lord Narayana. It is because of his name that this wonderful part of the world is called Bharatavarsha [for India]. When his earthly pleasures ended and he consequently rejected a material life, he left his home behind and achieved in three consecutive births His destination by practicing austerities in worship of Lord Hari. Nine of His [Rishabha's] sons became rulers over the nine separate areas [nava-dvipa] of this subcontinent while eighty-one other sons of him became twice-born brahmins who initiated the complete of the [karma-kanda] path of fruitive Vedic sacrifices [see 5.2: 19-21]. 0-2 The nine remaining sons, Kavi, Havir, Antariksha, Prabuddha, Pippalayana, Avirhotra, Drumila, Camasa and Karabhajana were greatly fortunate sages engaged in explaining the [Vedic] purpose. They were rigorous ascetics learned in the science of spirituality who wandered around naked [dressed by the wind only]. Wandering the earth they [called the nava-yogendras] saw the entire universe consisting of the gross and the subtle, as one and the same form of the Supreme Lord and as non-different from the Self [see also 1.5: 20 and B.G. 13: 14 & 15: 7]. Unimpeded moving at will, they go wherever they like and thus freely travel the worlds of the enlightened souls, the perfected ones and the ones to be propitiated, the heavenly singers, the treasure keepers, the [common] humans, the ones of superpower and the serpentine, visiting the sages, the angels, the ghostly followers of Shiva, the scientists, the twice-born ones and the cows. Once in Ajanabha [name of India before Bharata] they arrived during the soma sacrifice of the great soul Nimi [see also 9.13] that was carried out to the wishes of the seers. Seeing those pure devotees whose brilliance rivaled the sun, oh King, the performer of the sacrifice, the brahmins, everyone, nay even the fires, rose up in respect. The ruler of Videha [Nimi] recognizing them as devotees of Narayana, gladly seated them and honoured them with all the respect they deserved. With humility bowing down to the nine of them who glowed with an effulgence like the sons of Brahma [the Kumaras, see 4.22: 6] the king, immersed in transcendental rapture, posed questions. Shri Videha [Nimi] said: 'I consider you to be direct associates of the Supreme Lord, the enemy of Madhu, as servants of Vishnu who travel around for the sake of purifying all the worlds. I think that to achieve the association of the ones dear to the Lord of Vaikuntha, is as difficult as it is for embodied beings to achieve a human body that any moment can be lost [see also B.G. 8: 16 and 16: 19-20]. I therefore ask you, oh sinless ones, what the supreme good would be in this material ocean where, for human beings, the greatest treasure consists of enjoying but a second the association of the devotees. Please speak about the science of devotional service, provided you deem us qualified enough to hear about it. Satisfied with that service He, the Unborn Lord, will even give Himself personally to the one who sought His refuge.'

Shri Narada said: 'They, the greatest of the great oh Vasudeva, thus at the request of Nimi in their turn affectionately spoke with reverence to the king in the company of the priests and the members of the sacrificial assembly. Shri Kavi said: 'Someone whose intelligence in this world is constantly disturbed because he takes the temporal [body] for the true self, can in my view reach fearlessness [only] when he worships the lotus feet of the Infallible One, the Soul of the Universe in whom all fear ceases [see 3.9: 6 and e.g. B.G.

2: 56, 2: 71, 4: 10, 12: 13-14]. The method thereto is discussed by the Supreme Lord and known as the bhagavata dharma by which people who suffer from ignorance may easily realise the Supreme Soul. A man accepting that dharma, oh King, will never be caught in illusions nor ever trip or fall on this path, not even when he closes his eyes running [see also the catuh-s'loki of B.G. 10: 8-11 and verse 5: 17]. Whatever one according to one's nature physically, verbally, mentally or sensually does with intelligence or a purified consciousness, should all be offered to the Supreme with the thought: 'This I do for Narayana' ['narayanaya iti', compare B.G. 3: 9 and 9: 27]. For those who led by the illusory energy and forgetful about Him, have turned away from the Supreme Lord in falsely identifying themselves [with the body], fear will rise because they are absorbed in matters second to Him. For that reason an intelligent person should be fully and purely devoted to the Lord and consider his spiritual master as his soul and salvation [see B.G. also 4: 34, 1.5: 12 and B.G. 7: 14, 15: 7]. Even though [the object of a mental image may] not [be] present in reality, to the mind of a person experiencing [the material world, its] duality can be manifest like in a dream that is moved by desire and fear [by 'its two mental chariots']. An intelligent person should therefore bring the mind under control that, because of [its reference to] material activities, is committed to positive and negative emotions. That is how one arrives at fearlessness [see also B.G. 6: 35]. Hearing about the all-auspicious appearances and activities of Him with the Wheel in His Hand [see 1.9: 37], of whom the with them associated names are chanted in this world, one should, singing without the material association [of a wife, home and children], freely and without shame move in all directions. Thus being vowed one, by repeating ['chanting'] His so very dear, holy name, develops the attachment of a mind dissolved in laughing and crying loudly and in getting exited like a madman in dance and song, without any concern about what others think of it [*]. One should bow to ether, air, fire, water, earth and the luminaries, all living beings, the directions, the trees and other immovable beings, the rivers and oceans and whatever that might exist in the Supreme Lord's body of creation, while considering nothing as existing separately [from the Soul, ]. Devotion, experiencing the presence of the Supreme Lord and detachment from everything else, are the three [characteristics] that simultaneously occur with someone who sought refuge [in Him] - just about the way things are with someone being engaged in eating who experiences satisfaction with the nourishment he gets and with the reduction of hunger with every bite. For the devotee who thus in obedience [to the disciple succession] is worshipping the feet of Acyuta, devotion, detachment and knowledge of the Supreme Lord will manifest, oh king Nimi, whereupon he then directly will attain transcendental peace [see B.G. 2: 71].'

The king said: 'Please tell me next about the devotee of the Fortunate One. What are his duties, what is his nature, how does he behave among men, what does he say and by which symptoms is he dear to the Lord?'

Shri Havir said: 'The one who sees this Soul [this basic principle of all existence] in all forms of existence [of matter and spirit] and is of devotional service to [the Supreme Spirit Soul,] the Lord with the notion that all forms of existence are situated within the [gigantic universal body of the] Supreme Lord, belongs to His most advanced devotees [an uttama adhikari, see also B.G. 6: 29 & 30]. In the stage before this one, on the middle platform, he [the so-called madhyama adhikari] is of love for the Supreme Lord, of friendship with advanced persons, of mercy to the neophytes and indifferent toward [envious,] hostile souls [see also 4.24: 57, 7.9: 43, B.G. 4: 8 & 15: 7 and ]. He who in his worship of the Lord faithfully engages with the deity [the murti] but is neither respectful towards the devotees nor towards others, is a materialistic devotee [a prakrita or a beginner, a so-called kanishthha adhikari, see also B.G. 7: 20 and 3.29: 24-25 & 7.14: 40]. He who despite the engagement of his senses with their objects, hates nor rejoices and recognises this universe as the deluding material energy of Lord Vishnu, is certainly a first-class devotee [see also B.G. 5: 3]. He who, because he keeps the Lord in mind [see also 6.2: 14], is not bewildered by the [inescapable] nature of a material life consisting of birth, decay, hunger, fear, thirst, sensory functions, the life air, the mind and the intelligence, is the foremost devotee [see also B.G. 2: 56-57]. In the mind of someone who has Vasudeva as His only shelter, lust [see B.G. 3: 37-43], karma and [its consequent] material desires [see also B.G. 6: 4] will never develop. Such a one is truly a first-class devotee. A person who is not attached in the egotistical sentiment of a bodily concept of life - in the sense of being of a good birth, of meritorious acts or a certain varnashrama status orientation, caste or race, is someone dear to the Lord [see B.G. 2: 71 & 12: 13-14]. He who does not think in opposites in the sense of 'mine' and 'thine' about property and the body, someone who is equal and peaceful with all living beings, no doubt belongs to the best devotees [see B.G. 13: 28-31 & 14: 22-25]. He who neither is tempted by the opulence found in the three worlds, nor, not even for a moment, half a second or a split of a second, moves away from the lotus feet of the Supreme Lord that are the refuge of the enlightened souls and others, he who - undisturbed in his remembrance - regards the Unconquerable One as his very soul, is a topmost Vaishnava [see also 18: 66]. Again: how can of the toes of the Supreme Lord's feet, the feet of all those great heroic acts, how can of the lunar light radiating from the jewel-like nails that takes away the pain in the hearts, there be any pain of importance with the ones who are of worship? Can the burning heat of the sun be of any effect when the moon has risen [see also 10.14: 58]? He never leaves the heart of the one whom one calls His foremost devotee, however accidentally that devotee directly might have called for Him [by means of His names], He who, bound by the ropes of love, destroys the sins regardless of their number [see also B.G. 4: 36 and *4].

*: Shri Caitanya Mahaprabhu also emphasised this by quoting: 'harer nama harer nama harer namaiva kevalam kalau nasty eva nasty eva nasty eva gatir anyatha [Adi 17.21]': 'In this age of Kali there is no alternative, there is no alternative, there is no alternative for spiritual progress but the holy name, the holy name, the holy name of the Lord.' Also Shri Bhaktisiddhanta Sarasvati Thhakura recommends to this that one studies the following verse: 'parivadatu jano yatha tatha va nanu mukharo na vayan vicarayamah hari-rasa-madira-madati-matta bhuviluththamo nathamo nirvalis'amah': 'Let the garrulous populace say whatever they like; we shall pay them no regard. Thoroughly maddened by the ecstasy of the intoxicating beverage of love for Krishna, we shall enjoy life running about, rolling on the ground and dancing in ecstasy.' (Padyavali 7 This is what defines Krishna-consciousness.

 Shri Bhaktisiddhanta Sarasvati Thhakura has warned us that if we do not see everything as a manifestation of the Supreme Personality of Godhead, we shall become victims of phalgu-vairagya, or immature renunciation.

: The parampara adds here: 'Shri Bhaktisiddhanta Sarasvati Thhakura has given a nice explanation of the difference between arcana and bhajana. Arcana refers to the platform of sadhana-bhakti, in which one serves the Lord to carry out the rules and regulations of the process. One who has achieved the shelter of the Lord's holy name and is totally engaged in the attempt to serve the Lord should be considered to be on the platform of bhajana, even though his external activities may sometimes be less strict than those of the neophyte engaged in arcana. This apparent lack of strictness, however, refers to laxity not in the basic principles of sane behavior and renunciation of sense gratification, but rather in the details of Vaishnava ceremonies.'

*4: Nimi, the King of Videha, asked, so helps us the parampara, the following nine questions of the nine Yogendras, the saintly sons of Rishabh. What is the highest good? (Chapter Two, verse 3; What are the religious principles (dharma), natural proclivities (svabhava), behavior (acara), speech (vakya) and outward symptoms (lakshana) of a bhagavata, a Vaishnava devotee of the Lord? 4; What is the external energy of Vishnu, the Supreme Lord? .; How can one become dissociated from this maya? .1; What is the true identity of Brahman? .3; What are the three types of karma, namely karma based on the enjoyment of the fruits of work, karma offered to the Supreme Lord, and naishkarmya? .4; What are the various pastimes of the various incarnations of God? .; What is the aim or destination of one who is against the Supreme Lord and devoid of bhakti (in other words, a non-devotee)? .; and What are the respective colours, forms and names of the four yugavatas, the four incarnations of the Supreme Lord who appear in the four ages, and what is the process of worshipping each of Them? .1.

The transcendental answers to these inquiries were given by the great devotees Kavi, Havir, Antariksha, Prabuddha, Pippalayana, Avirhotra, Drumila, Camasa and Karabhajana. These nine paramahansas answered the nine questions, each in turn, in the following verses: 2.33-43; 2.45-55; 3.3-16; 3.18-33; 3.35-40; 3.43-55; 4.2-23; 5.2-18; and 5.20-42.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 3: Liberation from Maya and Karma Knowing and Worshipping the Lord

The honourable king [Nimi] said: 'My lords, please tell us about the illusory potency [or maya, see also 11.2: 48] of the Supreme Lord Vishnu, we would like to understand that what bewilders even the great mystics. We enjoy the nectar of your talks about Lord Hari, but we are not yet satisfied by that antidote against the pain a mortal experiences being tormented by the misery of samsara.'

Shri Antariksha said: 'The Soul of All Living Beings evolved, by means of the elements of the greater creation, all creatures high and low [see B.G. 13: 22 & 14: 18], oh mighty armed one, so that they, the Original Person's own [parts and parcels], could be successful with [the choice between] the sense objects and the true self, the Soul [see also 10.87: 2]. Having entered the living beings that thus were created with the help of the five gross elements and having divided Himself as the one [witness] to the ten [senses of perception and action], He was pleased to engage them [in a life] with the modes of nature. The living being, that by the Supreme Soul was given a life with the modes, enjoys those modes and consequently takes this created body for the true self as also himself for the master and thus becomes entangled [see also B.G. 15: 8, compare 11.2: 37]. The proprietor of the body is because of the sense-motivated actions, driven by desires and engaged in different karmic - fruitive - activities from which he reaps the different fruits. And thus he moves through this world in both a state of happiness and the contrary thereof [see B.G. 2: 62]. This way by his karma reaching destinations that bring him a lot of things that are not so good, the living being till the end of time helplessly experiences birth and death. When the dissolution of the material elements is near [the Lord in the form of] Time that is Without a Beginning or an End, withdraws the manifest universe consisting of the gross objects and subtle modes [back] into the unmanifest [see also 3.29: 40-45, 3.26: 51]. There will be a terrible drought on earth that lasts for a hundred years, so that the three worlds during that period will be seriously scorched by the accumulated heat of the sun. Beginning from the lower regions [Patala], the fire, with its flames fanned by the winds shooting upwards from the mouth of Sankarshana, will burn all directions. Great masses of samvartaka [end time] clouds will rain for a hundred years with torrents as long as elephant trunks, so that everything will be inundated. Oh King, the universe will thereupon, like a fire running out of fuel, be abandoned by the Personality of the Universal Form, as He [in the form of Brahma] enters the subtle reality of the unseen [pradhana, see also B.G. 8: 19, 3.32: 12-15]. The earth, by the wind deprived of its aroma, changes [back] into water and the water by the same process [of the wind] being deprived of its taste, becomes fire [again, see *]. Fire, by darkness deprived of its [quality, its] form, turns into air and the air, losing its [quality of] touch, dissolves into the ether. When the sky [the ether], by the Supreme Soul of Time is deprived of its quality [of sound], it merges into the ego [of not-knowing]. The senses, the mind and the intelligence oh King, merge together with the gods [representing the emotions] into the ego-element and the I-awareness merges together with all its guna-qualities into the Supreme Self [see also 3.6 and 3.26: 21-48]. After thus for you having described the three departments of this bewildering energy, this agent of the Supreme Lord consisting of maintenance, creation and dissolution [characterised by goodness, passion and ignorance], what would you like to hear more from us?'

The honourable king said: 'Oh great sage, please tell how [even] materialistic people with ease may overcome this material energy of the Lord that is so unsurpassable for those lacking in self-control.'

Shri Prabuddha said: 'One should see that people who live as husband and wife, with their endeavors to lessen the distress and to gain in happiness, achieve the opposite result. What happiness can one expect from the unsteadiness of having a home, children, relatives, domestic animals and the hard to acquire wealth which always gives distress, that mean death to the soul? Know that the idealised world for which one thus settles, is founded upon fruitive labour, cannot be sustained and is characterised by matters like a loss of behaving properly in groups of equals and with superiors [B.G. 8: 16]. Someone eager to know about the highest good, should therefore take shelter of a spiritual master who resides in the supreme tranquility of the Absolute Truth and is also well versed in the conclusions of the Vedas [see e.g. 5.5: 10-13, 7.11: 13, 7.12: 1-16, 7.15: 25-26, 10.86: 57 and B.G. 4: 34]. With the guru as one's soul and worshipable deity, one should learn the science of devotional service [the bhagavata dharma or emancipation process, see 11.2: 34] by which, free from illusion being of faithful service, the Supreme Soul can be satisfied who bestows His own Self []. One should first of all detach the mind from everything and properly, with mercy, friendship and reverence for all living beings, cultivate association with devotees [compare 11.2: 46]. [That entails: inner and outer] cleanliness, penance, tolerance and silence, scriptural study, simplicity, celibacy, nonviolence and equanimity concerning the known opposites [see also yama & niyama and B.G. 12: 13-20]. In solitude, without [attachment to] a fixed residence, wearing old rags and satisfied with anything, one should with the Lord constantly kept in mind, meditate upon the omnipresent True Self [see also 2.2: 5, 7.13: 1-10]. With faith in the scriptures about the Supreme Lord and not blaspheming other scriptures, one should with respect for the truth and with one's mind, speech and activities strictly controlled, be innerly peaceful and master one's senses [see also B.G. 15: 15]. 7-2 Hearing, chanting and meditating the incarnations, pastimes and qualities of the Lord whose activities are all wonderful, one must do everything for His sake. Whatever worship, charity, penance, japa or piety one performs, everything held dear, one's wife, sons, home and very life air, one should dedicate to the Supreme [see also B.G. 9: 27]. In rendering service to both [the moving and nonmoving living beings] one must be of friendship with the common man as also with the devotees, the great souls who accepted Krishna as the Lord of their heart. By the glories of the Lord one may find in mutual discussions, in being attracted to each other, in pleasing one another and in one's together putting an end to material activities, the purification of [one's relation with] the soul [see also B.G. 3: 38]. Remembering [Him] and reminding one another, the bhakti unto the Lord who puts an end to the chain of sins, because of that devotion leads to an awakening whereby the body responds with goose bumps [see also 11.2: 40]. Sometimes one cries by the thought of Acyuta, sometimes one laughs or takes great pleasure or speaks, acts wondrously, dances and sings and sometimes one, following the example of the Unborn One, is freed from distress and becomes silent while attaining the Supreme [see also 10.35]. Thus learning about the bhagavata dharma and taking lessons from the consequent bhakti, someone aimed at Narayana will easily overcome the maya that is so difficult to defeat [see also 1.1: 2].'

The honourable king [Nimi] said: 'Please, all of you expert knowers of the Supreme, be so kind to speak to us about the transcendental position of the Supersoul of the Absolute Truth, that is associated with the name of Narayana [see also 1.2: 11].'

Shri Pippalayana said: 'Oh King, know that the Supreme gives life, it is that on the basis of which the senses, the life air and the minds of the bodies of all living beings are moving. It constitutes the cause without cause of the creation, destruction and maintenance of this universe, that exists in the state of wakefulness, in the dream state and in the unconscious state as also external to these states [of consciousness]. This [Supreme Truth] cannot be covered by the mind, by the faculties of speech, sight, intelligence, the life air or by the senses, just as a fire cannot be covered by its own sparks. Not even the Vedic word may express it, for the Vedas deny that the Supreme Self can be expressed in words. It can only be achieved by indirect expressions, by words that refer to that without which there would be no ultimate purpose to the scriptural restrictions [compare 10.87]. In the beginning being One, it thereafter became known as the threefold of goodness, passion and ignorance [of the gunas] that is associated with the power to act and the power of consciousness of the I-awareness that one calls the individual living being [the jiva, the individual soul]. Assuming the forms of spiritual knowledge [the gods], actions [of the senses and their] objects and [good and bad] results it thus possesses a great variety of energies. It is the Supreme alone that [as the Absolute Truth or Brahman] is manifest beyond both the [relative of] the gross and the subtle [see also mahat-tattva, pradhana, 4.29: 79, B.G. 10: 42, 13: 13 & 7: 14]. This Soul, never born and never dying, grows nor decays. It is the knower of the stages of life of the living beings that are subjected to change. That Soul, omnipresent and everlasting, which is pure consciousness, became many [jivas], just as the [one] life air [prana] by the power of the senses resulted in a variety [of vital forms, see also B.G. 2: 23-30 and ]. [With beings that originated] from eggs, with embryos, with plants and with that what is difficult to discern in moisture [micro-organisms], the vital air accompanies the [same] individual soul [see also linga] from one [life form] to the other, just as the self, apart from the thought process invariably stays the same with a memory restoring when one awakens from a deep sleep in which the ego and the senses had merged [see B.G. 2: 22]. When one desires the feet of Him with the Lotus-navel, the dirt in the heart that was generated by the modes of nature and the fruitive action, is cleansed away by the power of bhakti. After one then is purified completely, the truth of the soul is directly realised, just as the rising sun becomes visible to the naked eye [B.G. 2: 55 and 6: 20-23 and nyayika].'

The honourable king said: 'Please explain to us the karma yoga by which a person being purified in this life quickly gets rid of his fruitive actions and, freed from karmic reactions, achieves the Supreme [see also B.G. 1-6 and 3.5]. In the presence of my father [Ikshvaku see also 9.6: 4] I in the past asked the sages [the Kumaras] a similar question, but the sons of Brahma did not reply. Can you speak about the reason for this?'

Shri Avirhotra replied: 'Right action, non-action and wrong action [karma, akarma, vikarma] are Vedic subject matters, not a worldly subject and since Vedic knowledge comes from the Lord Himself, [even such great] enlightened souls [easily] get confused about this matter [see also B.G. 4: 16-17 and 4.29: 26-27]. Offering guidance to ignorant human beings, the Vedas in covert terms prescribe material activities [duties] to be freed from karma, the way one also prescribes a medicine [see also B.G. 3: 26, see 5.5: 17, 10.24: 17-18]. Someone ignorant who has not subdued his senses and fails to do what the Vedas say, will by his lack of dharma following a wrong course of action [vikarma], achieve death time and again [see also B.G. 3: 8, 16: 23-24, 17: 5-6, 18: 7]. When one according to what the Vedas prescribe without attachment performs and sacrifices for the sake of the Supreme Lord, one will certainly achieve the perfection that to raise interest is put in terms of fruitive results [karma-kanda and B.G. 4: 17-23]. Someone who quickly wants to cut the knot [of attachment] in the heart that binds the soul to the body, should, with [respect for] the regulative principles [the vidhi], worship Lord Kes'ava as also study the divine as described in the supplementary Vedic literatures [the tantras, see also B.G. 12: 6-7]. Having obtained the mercy [the initiation] of the teacher of example [the acarya] who shows him what is handed down by tradition, the devotee should worship the Supreme Personality in the particular form he prefers [see also B.G. 3: 35, 7: 20]. Cleansed, sitting in front [of His idol], with a concentrated mind controlling his breath and such [see ashthanga-yoga] and purifying the body by invoking His protection in renunciation [by assigning the different parts of his body to Him by marking them with mantras], he should worship the Lord [see also B.G. 5: 27-28 and 6.8: 4-6]. 0-5 With all available ingredients he [thereto] prepares himself in his heart and mind. He takes the deity and everything belonging to it as also the items to be offered and sprinkles the floor and the place to sit. He prepares the water for the sacrifice and attentively puts the deity in its proper place. He draws sacred marks on His heart and the other parts of His body. Next he is of worship with the appropriate mantra [4*]. 2-5 With the mantras belonging to Him he should be of worship for each particular deity and its limbs, His special features [like His cakra] and His associates [like the pancattattva, see the Shishumara-mantra or the Ambaris'a prayers for the cakra mentioned in 5.23: 8 and 9.5]. Presenting the worship in every respect as it is enjoined with water for His feet, scented water to welcome, water for the mouth and for bathing and such, with clothing, ornaments, fragrances, necklaces, unbroken barleycorns [meant for applying tilaka] and with garlands, incense, lamps and such offerings, he should bow down to the Lord with reverence and prayer. Absorbing himself in that activity [as a servant and not falsely identifying himself] he should, thus meditating, fully be of worship for the murti of the Lord. Then, taking the remnants to his head [for acceptance], he should put Him respectfully back where He belongs. He who thus worships the Lord, the Supreme Soul, who is present in the fire, the sun, the water and so on, as also in the guest and in one's own heart [see also 2.2: 8], will soon be liberated.'

*: When a quality is removed, becomes an element nondifferent from the element that evolved earlier in the evolution of the universe, it then merges, changes, or dissolves into it. That is how the annihilation of the universe takes place.

 Shri Rupa Gosvami formulated four preliminary requisites for advancement in this: [1] Accepting the shelter of the lotus feet of a bona fide spiritual master, [2] becoming initiated by the spiritual master and learning from him how to discharge the duties of devotional service, [3] obeying the orders of the spiritual master with faith and devotion, and [4] following in the footsteps of the great acaryas [teachers] under the direction of the spiritual master.' (Bhakti-rasamrita-sindhu 1.2.7

 Shri Rupa Madhvacarya here quotes, from the Mokshadharma section of Vyasa's Mahabharata, the Lord saying: aham hi jiva-samjno vai mayi jivah sanatanah maivam tvayanumantavyam drishtho jivo mayeti ha aham Shreyo vidhasyami yathadhikaram is'varah 'The living entity, known as jiva, is not different from Me, for he is My expansion. Thus the living entity is eternal, as I am, and always exists within Me. But you should not artificially think, 'Now I have seen the soul.' Rather, I, as the Supreme Personality of Godhead, will bestow this benediction upon you when you are actually qualified.'

*4: Just as each prakrita, impersonalist, materialistic devotee is worshipping the Lord as the deity of his preference in His form of Time with pragmatically perverted, unlearned clocks and week divisions [see the Order of Time and kala for correcting on this] and with mantras like 'be on time' and 'time is money', so too does classical bhakti with the kanishtha or beginning personalist devotee, more faithful to the Vedic authority, worship the personal form of the Lord in the form of a [Krishna] deity while saying 'om namo bhagavate vasudevaya' [4.8: 54], the Gayatri, the Mahamantra and other mantras. In all these cases should be remembered what Vyasa in 11.2: 47 says about murti-worship in general.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 4:

The Activities of Nara-Narayana and the other Avatars described

The honourable king [Nimi] said: 'Please speak to us about the activities of each of these self-chosen appearances by which the Lord performed, is performing and will perform in this world [see also 2.7].'

Shri Drumila said: 'Truly, he who tries to enumerate the unlimited transcendental qualities of the Unlimited One is a person with the intelligence of a child. One may somehow, in due course of time, be able to count the dust particles on earth, but one can never count the qualities of the Reservoir of all Potencies [see also 10.14: 7, 10.51: 38]. When the Original Personality of Godhead Narayana assumed the form of Himself generated body of the universe that was created out of the five material elements and entered it in His plenary expansion, He thus became known as the Purusha [see also 1.3: 1]. In the vastness of this three-world body originated, from His senses, the two kinds of senses of action and perception of the embodied beings, originated from His Will the spiritual knowledge and from His breathing strength, ability and endeavor. He is the prime mover of the creation, destruction and maintenance in passion, ignorance and goodness [see B.G. 3: 27, 13: 30 and S.B. 6.17: 19, 3.26: 7, 3.27: 2, 3.32: 12-15, 10.46: 41, 10.83: 3]. In the beginning He with the mode of passion became Shata-dhriti [Lord Brahma] for the creation of this universe, for the maintenance of dharma and protection of the brahmins He became Vishnu, the Lord of Sacrifice, and for the annihilation in ignorance the Original Person assumed the form of Rudra [Lord Shiva]; among the created beings He is thus always of creation, maintenance and destruction [see also 2.10: 41-46, 4.29: 79, 4.30: 23].

He was born from Murti, the daughter of Daksha and wife of Dharma [*], as Nara and Narayana, the best of sages perfectly of peace. They spoke in favor of performing the duty that is characterised by a cessation of all material activities, and even live today being served by the greatest of sages at Their feet [see B.G. 9: 27 and also 2.7: 6, 4.1: 49: 57, 5.19: 9]. Lord Indra was afraid and thought: 'He [Narayana] wants to usurp my kingdom.' He engaged Cupid who went to Badarikashrama together with his associates the Apsaras. There he in the gentle breeze of spring with his arrows, [consisting of] the glances of the women, tried to pierce Him, not knowing His greatness. The Original Godhead understood the offense committed by Indra and spoke free from pride with a smile to the ones who stood there trembling: 'Please do not fear oh mighty Madana [Lord of Love], oh god of the wind and wives of the demigods, please accept these gifts from Us and bless this ashrama with your presence.'

Oh god of men [Nimi], after He who Brings Fearlessness had spoken this way, the gods full of shame bowed to Him and said, begging for compassion with their heads down: 'Oh Almighty One, with You, the Supreme Unchanging One, this [kind of respect] is not that unusual, not with You at whose feet in great numbers those bow down who are self-controlled and satisfied within [see also 1.7: 10]. For those who serve You to transcend their material worlds and reach the Supreme, there exist many hindrances [temptations] created by the enlightened souls [or the demigods]. But when one allots those souls their share by means of offerings in sacrifices, there are, for this other type of devotee, no such impediments. Because of You being the Protector he can place his foot then on top of those obstacles [see also 9.4: 8 and 10.2: 33]. Some people [dealing] with us in the form of [material troubles like] hunger, thirst, the three time-bound qualities [of seasonal heat, cold and rain], the wind, the tongue and the genitals, fall victim of anger finding no results and abandon their difficult austerities as being useless. Having crossed endless oceans [of hardship] they then [with their anger, so to speak] drown in [the water of] a cow's hoof print [see B.G. 17: 5-6, 6.1: 16 and compare 5.8: 23 and 10.12: 12].'

As they were praising Him [Narayana] He before their eyes showed [a number of] women most wonderful to behold, who nicely being decorated were serving the Almighty One [see also 2.7: 6]. Seeing these women who were like the Goddess of Fortune in person, the followers of the god [of love] were bewildered by the magnificence of the beauty and fragrance that humbled their own luster. The Lord of All Lords with a faint smile said to those who bowed down before Him: 'Please choose from these ladies one you deem suitable as an ornament of heaven.'

The servants of the demigods vibrating 'om' in consent, offered Him their obeisances, chose Urvasi's, the best of the Apsaras, and then returned to heaven with her put in front. Bowing down before Lord Indra in his assembly they, before an audience of all the residents of the three heavens, told him about the strength of Narayana. He stood amazed. The Infalible Lord, Vishnu who with His expansions descends into this world for the welfare of the entire universe, spoke about self-realisation assuming the forms of the [transcendental] swan [Hamsa], Dattatreya, the Kumaras and our father, the Supreme Lord Rishabha [B.G. 14: 4]. The original texts of the Vedas were brought back by Him, the killer of Madhu, in His horse incarnation [Hayagriva]. In His fish incarnation [Matsya] He protected Vaivasvata Manu [Satyavrata], the planet earth, and the herbs during the deluge. In His boar incarnation [Varaha] He delivered the earth from the waters and killed the demoniac son of Diti [Hiranyaksha]. In the form of a tortoise [Kurma] He held the mountain [Mandara] upon His back with which the nectar was churned. He [in His transcendental form, Vishnu] freed the king of the elephants [Gajendra] who in his distress surrendered to Him because of the crocodile. He delivered the ascetic sages [the tiny Valakhilyas] offering prayers, who had fallen [into the water of a cow's hoof print]. He delivered Indra from being absorbed in darkness after he had killed Vritrasura. He delivered the wives of the demigods who were helplessly imprisoned in the asura palace [by Bhaumasura]. He in the form of Nrisimhadeva killed Hiranyakas'ipu, the asura king, in order to free the saintly devotees from fear. As Lord Vamana He on the pretext of charity took the earth away from Bali and gave her to the sons of Aditi. By His various appearances [the ams'a-avatars] He during the reign of each Manu protects the worlds. For the sake of the God-fearing souls He [seated on Garuda thus also] killed the daitya leaders in a battle between the gods and demons [see 8.10]. As Lord Parashurama He rid the earth of the members of the ruling class and destroyed, as the fire that He descending from Bhrgu was, twenty-seven times the dynasty of Haihaya. As the husband of Sita [Ramacandra] He subdued the ocean and killed Ten-head [Ravana] along with his soldiers on Lanka. When one tells the stories about the glories of Him who is always victorious, the contamination of the entire world is annihilated. The Unborn Lord will take His birth [as Krishna] in the Yadu dynasty and will, in order to diminish the burden of the earth, perform deeds that are even hard to perform for the demigods. At the end of Kali-yuga He [as the Buddha] with speculative arguments will bewilder those who perform their sacrifices apart from Him [or the traditions]. He [as Lord Kalki] will finally put an end to all low-class rulers. There are of the so very glorious Lord of the Living Being [the Lord of the Universe Jagadis'vara] we have thus described, oh mighty-armed one, countless appearances and activities just like these.'

*: According to the Matsya Purana .1, Dharma, the father of Nara-Narayana Rishi, was born from the right breast of Brahma and later married thirteen of the daughters of Prajapati Daksha.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 5: Narada Concludes His Teachings to Vasudeva

The honourable king [Nimi] said: 'Oh you perfect in the knowledge of the soul, what is the destination of those who as good as never worship the Supreme Personality of Hari [see also 11.3: *4] and, with their lusts not at peace, are out of control with themselves?'

Shri Camasa said: 'From the face, arms, thighs and feet of the Original Person originated, with the different [combinations * of] the basic qualities of nature, the four spiritual orders [or ashramas] and vocations headed by the brahmins [or varnas, see also B.G. 4: 13]. In case any member of these [orders] is not of worship or of disrespect for the Supreme Lord who is the source of his very self, he will, having strayed from his position, fall down [see B.G. 16: 23]. Many people see no chance to engage in talks about the Lord and never consider Acyuta's glories. Personalities like yourself should be of mercy with [especially] women [compare 5.17: 15], with Shudras and others [who thus have lost their way]. Even intellectuals, nobles and traders who [by initiation] got access to the lotus feet of the Lord, lose their way in their commitment to [all kinds of] philosophies of life [see also 5.6: 11, B.G. 2: 42-43]. Ignorant about karmic matters they, who factually lack in experience but proudly consider themselves very learned, are enchanted by the beauty of the [Vedic] language and express themselves in flattering entreaties [to the demigods] that lead them astray [see also B.G. 9: 3]. Full of passion, with evil desires and lusty, they are as angry as snakes, deceitful and conceited and sinfully make fun of the ones dear to Acyuta. In their homes arranged for the sake of sexuality they speak amongst each other about the blessings of their worship of women. Killing animals without considering the consequences, they are of sacrifice for the sake of their own maintenance only and have no regard for the distribution of food and gifts in gratitude [to the spiritual leaders and their following, see also B.G. 16]. With their intelligence blinded by pride about their wealth, special abilities, lineage, education, renunciation, beauty, strength and performance of rituals, they hard-hearted deride the saintly souls dear to the Lord, nor respect the Controller Himself [see also e.g. 1.8: 26, 4.2: 24, 4.31: 21, 5.1: 12, 7.15: 19, 8.22: 26 and also B.G. 2: 42-43]. Less intelligent persons [preferably] do not hear about the most worshipable Lord glorified in the Vedas, the Supreme Soul who, [as separate] as the ether, is eternally situated in all embodied beings. They rather discuss the [materialistic] ideas that keep them going. In the material world the conditioned soul is always led by sexual intercourse, meat-eating and intoxication [by alcohol and drugs] in disregard of the scriptural injunctions. These matters [though] are settled in [respectively] marital relationships, in sacrifices and in ritual usage with the purpose to suspend them [see also 1.17: 38-39]. One only benefits with the fruit of dharma because of which there is both the knowledge and the wisdom that lead to liberation. But in their houses they [the materialists] do not see the insurmountable power of death over the body they identify themselves with [see also 3.30: 7, 7.6: 8, 4.29: 52-55 but also 4.22: 10]. It is enjoined that wine should be accepted by smelling it and that likewise an animal should be killed as prescribed and not by hurting it [the 'wrong' violent way]. Sexual intercourse the same way is there [for conquering the urge] to beget children and not so much for sensual pleasure [B.G. 7: 11]. For this purest fulfillment of duty according to the rules they [the less intelligent ones] have no understanding. Those who have no knowledge of these facts and most unholily presumptuously consider themselves saintly, harm innocently trusting animals. After they have left their bodies those animals will eat them [compare 5.26: 11-13 and 4.25: 7-8]. Envyng their own True Self, their Lord and Controller living [within their body and] in the bodies of others, they fall down who are bound in their affection to their own mortal frame and its relations. They who did not achieve beatitude but managed to leave behind their ignorance, following the threefold path [of the three goals of pious living: rituals, an income and regulated desires, see also the purusharthas, 10.2: 32] will [still] ruin their life when they are not of any [reflection, meditation and] leisure [or work too hard]. All those who kill their soul [by slaying without meditation] and miss the peace, presume in their ignorance to have knowledge but in due course of time suffer the destruction of all their hopes and dreams when they fail to fulfill their [spiritual] duties. Those who turned their face away from Vasudeva unintentionally enter the darkness, as is arranged by the illusory energy of the Supreme Soul, when they [at the end of their life] leave behind their homes, children, friends and wives.'

The honourable king said: 'What colour and form had the Supreme Lord in which time period and what are the names and methods by which He is worshiped by men? Please enlighten us about this.'

Shri Karabhajana replied: 'Lord Kes'ava [Krishna] has in the [yugas] named Krita [or Satya], Treta, Dvapara and Kali different complexions [see also 10.26: 16], names and forms, and is accordingly worshiped by various processes. In Satya-yuga He is white, has four arms and matted locks and carries a tree bark garment, a black deerskin, a sacred thread, akshaseed prayer beads, a rod and a water pot. The human beings in that age are peaceful, free from envy, kind to all, equipoised and of worship for the Lord by means of both austerity and mind and sense control. He is thus celebrated as Hamsa ['the Swan'], Suparna ['Beautiful Wings'], Vaikunthha ['the Lord of the Kingdom of Heaven'], Dharma ['the Maintainer of the Religion'], Yoges'vara ['the Controller of the Yoga'], Amala ['the Immaculate One'], Is'vara ['the Supreme Controller'], Purusha ['the Original Person'], Avyakta ['the One Unmanifest'] and Paramatma ['the Supersoul']. In Treta-yuga He has a red complexion, golden locks and four arms and wears three belts [according to the initiations for the first three varnas] while carrying, as the personification of the three Vedas, sacrificial ladles [] and such as His symbols. The human beings who as seekers of the Absolute Truth are fixed in their religiosity, worship Him in that age with the rituals of sacrifice of the three Vedas as Hari, the godhead covering all the gods [see also 1.16: 20]. One calls Him [in Treta-yuga] Vishnu ['the All-pervading One'], Yajna ['the Lord of Sacrifice'], Pris'nigarbha [the son of Pris'nii, 10.3: 32], Sarvadeva ['God of All Gods'], Urukrama ['the Lord of the Wide Strides'], Vrishakapi [the Lord as memorable and rewarding who dispels the distress], Jayanta ['All-victorious'] and Urugaya ['Most Glorified']. In Dvapara-yuga the Supreme Lord is gray blue, wearing yellow garments and characterised by His attributes [the disc, club, lotus and conch] and His physical characteristics, like His Shrivatsa, [peacock feather and Kaustubha gem]. Oh King, mortal men who want to gain knowledge of the Supreme worship Him, the Original Person, in that age in the role of a great king, according to the Vedas and Tantras [like e.g. in 1.10: 16-18 and 10.74: 17-24 and ] as follows. 9-3 'We offer Sankarshana, Pradyumna, Aniruddha and You, Vasudeva our obeisances, You Narayana Rishi, the Original and Supreme Personality of Godhead, the Greater Soul, the Controller of the Creation, the Very Form of the Universe and the True Self of all Living Beings [see catur-vyuha].' Oh King, the Lord of the Universe is thus praised in Dvapara-yuga. Please hear also how one in respect of the scriptural regulations is of worship in Kali-yuga [see also 7.9: 38]. [in Kali-yuga] people of proper understanding worship, through sacrifices mostly consisting of congregational chanting, the Lord with a dark complexion and a bright luster [Krishna and Krishna-Caitanya], complete with His limbs, devotees, weapons and companions [see also Panca-tattva] as follows. 'Oh Supreme Personality, let me worship Your lotus feet. One always meditates upon them for they put an end to the humiliation [by the dominance of matter]. Answering to [all] the desire [of the soul] they constitute the authority and place of pilgrimage to which Shiva and Brahma bow down. Taking away the distress of Your servants, they are the most worthy shelter, oh protector of the ones who surrender, and the boat for the ocean of birth and death. Oh Supreme Personality let me honour Your lotus feet, for You fixed in dharma abandoned upon the words of a brahmin [like Akura, Shri Advaita] the so hard to forsake and by the demigods anxiously desired, opulence of Shri, oh You who, being of mercy for the ones who are caught in animal nature, [as Rama, Krishna, the Buddha, as Caitanya etc.] went to the distant land [of India, the wilderness, the forest, the desert, into sannayasa] to pursue Your desired purpose [Your mission, Your dharma, Your presence as the Lord of the devotees, 4*].'

Oh King, this is how the Supreme Lord Hari, the Lord of All Blessings, by the people of each yuga is worshiped with the names and forms belonging to that age. Respectable souls knowing the value of the age praise Kali-yuga pointing out that it's essence consists of the blessing that all desired goals can be attained by the mere congregational chanting [of His names]. For the embodied soul wandering around in this universe there is no greater gain than this [sankirtana] by which the cycle of birth and death is broken and [His] Supreme Peace is attained [see also 2.1: 11, 3.33: 7, 8.23: 16 and 8.23*]. 8-4 The inhabitants of Satya-yuga and the other yugas, oh King, want to take birth in Kali-yuga because one in that age, oh great monarch, everywhere can find devotees of Narayana. One especially finds them in great numbers in the provinces of South India. The human beings there who drink from the water of the rivers the Tamraparni, the Kritamala, the Payasvini, the extremely pious Kaveri, the Mahanadi and the Pratici, oh lord of men, are mostly pure-hearted devotees of the Supreme Lord Vasudeva. Oh King when someone forsakes his material duties and takes to the shelter of Mukunda, the One Affording Shelter, he is neither the servant nor the debtor of the gods, the sages, ordinary living beings, friends and relatives, society or of the forefathers [see also B.G. 3: 9]. Someone who devoted to the shelter of His feet has given up his inclination for others, is very dear to the Supreme Lord Hari. Whatever misconduct [vikarma] somehow took place, will be removed by Him who is situated in everyone's heart [see 8.23: 16 and B.G. 9: 22, 9: 30, 18: 56].'

Shri Narada said: 'After he thus had heard about the science of devotional service [king Nimi.] the master of Mithila felt most satisfied and offered together with the priests prayers to the wise sons of Jayanti [the Yogendras 5.4: 8]. The perfected souls thereupon disappeared before the eyes of everyone present. The king faithfully followed this dharma and achieved the supreme destination. You also [Vasudeva] oh most fortunate soul, will attain the Supreme when you, with faith in these religious duties, are situated in the devotional service you heard about and have abandoned your material concerns. Because the Supreme Lord, the Controller Hari assumed the position of your son, the earth was fulfilled by your glories as husband and wife. Showing your love for Krishna as your son, by your embracing and conversing, taking rest, sitting and eating with Him, your hearts were purified. Kings like Shishupala, Paundraka and Shalva who enviously competing related to His movements, glances and so on, and thus meditating fixed their minds upon Him as they lay down, sat down and such, have achieved a likewise [spiritual] position. What kind of blessings may then be expected for those who were favorably minded [see mukti and also Jaya & Vijaya]? Do not think of Krishna that He would be your son. He is the Supreme Soul and Controller of All, who by the power of His illusory potency appeared as a normal human being and concealed His opulence as the Supreme Infallible One [see also B.G. 4: 6]. The fame of Him who descended to award liberation spread wide over the world because He appeared for both putting an end to the asura members of the noble class who burdened the earth as for the protection of the transcendentalists devoted to Him [see also B.G. 4: 7].'

Shri Shuka said: 'Having heard this, the greatly fortunate Vasudeva and Devaki were most amazed and gave up the illusion they had cherished [of considering Krishna their son]. He who one-pointed of attention meditates upon this pious, historical account, will this very life shake off his [material] contamination and achieve spiritual perfection.'

*: With the Rik-samhita. 4: 1, the Shukla-yajur Veda 4: 1 and the Atharva Veda 9: 6 all saying 'The brahmana appeared as His face, the king as His arms, the vais'ya as His thighs, and the Shudra was born from His feet', according to Shridhara Svami, the brahmins are considered to be born from the mode of goodness, the kshatriyas from a combination of goodness and passion, and the vais'yas from a combination of passion and ignorance and the Shudras from the mode of ignorance.

: Mentioned here are the vikankata wooden sruk and the khadira wooden sruva that serves the sruk for pouring ghee into the fire.

: The parampara, as to remind us of the degradation of devotion through the yugas [see also 1.16: 20] elucidates: 'The inhabitants of Satya-yuga were described as Shantah, nirvairah, suhridah and samah, or peaceful, free from envy, the well-wishers of every living entity, and fixed on the spiritual platform beyond the modes of material nature. Similarly the inhabitants of Treta-yuga were described as dharmisthah and brahma-vadinah, or thoroughly religious, and expert followers of the Vedic injunctions. In the present verse, the inhabitants of Dvapara-yuga are said to be simply jijnasavah, desiring to know the Absolute Truth. Otherwise they are described as martyah, or subject to the weakness of mortal beings.' One after the other age is one thus worshiping by meditation, sacrifices, temple worship and congregational chanting.

4*: The parampara adds to this: 'Corroborating the explanation of this verse, the followers of Caitanya

Mahaprabhu also worship Him in His six-armed form of shad-bhujā. Two arms carry the waterpot and danda of the sannyasi Caitanya Mahaprabhu, two arms carry the flute of Lord Krishna, and two arms carry the bow and arrow of Shri Ramacandra. This shad-bhujā form is the actual purport of this verse of the Shrimad Bhagavatam'.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 6:

Retirement on the Advise of Brahma and Uddhava Addressed in Private

Shri Shuka said: 'Thereafter lord Brahma arrived [in Dvaraka] being surrounded by his sons, the gods and the lords of man. Lord Bhava [Shiva] also came, the for all living beings favorable controller, who was accompanied by a host of ghostly beings. - Also Indra the powerful controller and his gods [the Maruts] came, the sons of Aditi, the good ones of clarity [the Vasus], the protectors of health [the As'vins], the artists [the Ribhus], the descendants of Angira, the expansions of Shiva [the Rudras], the demigods of the intellect [the Vis'vedevas], of commerce [the Sadhyas] and other demigods, the singers and dancing girls of heaven [Gandharvas and Apsaras], the ones of excel [the Nagas], the perfected ones [Siddhas] and the venerable souls [Caranas], the treasure keepers [Guhyaks], the seers [the Rishis], the forefathers [Pitas] and the scientists [Vidyadharas] as also the ones of special talents [the Kinnaras], all came together in Dvaraka eager to see Krishna, the Supreme Lord who removes the impurities everywhere in the universe, who with His transcendental form enchants the entire human society and spreads His fame throughout all the worlds. In that splendid city rich with a great abundance they with their hungry eyes saw Lord Krishna who is so wonderful to behold.

After having covered the best of the Yadus with flower garlands brought from the gardens of heaven, they praised Him, the Lord of the Living Being, and expressed themselves in all kinds of amazing ideas and words. The gods said: 'We with all our intelligence, senses, vital air, mind and words bow down at Your lotus feet, oh Lord, the feet upon which they meditate in their heart who are connected in the love of striving for liberation from the powerful grip of karmic consequences. You, by [engaging] the material energy consisting of the three modes, create, protect and destroy the inconceivable cosmic manifestation within Yourself while being situated within those modes. [Nevertheless] You are by them not entangled in karmic activities at all, oh Unconquerable One, because You, the irrefragable Lord, are always absorbed in Your unrestricted happiness [see also B.G. 3: 22]. Oh Worshipable One, the purification of those persons who have a contaminated consciousness is not as much brought about by incantations, respecting injunctions, study of the scriptures, charity, penances and rituals, oh Greatest of All, as it is caused by listening to those souls who are situated in pure goodness and have a fully matured and transcendental faith in Your glories [see also 4.29: 36-38]. May there for us be Your lotus feet, the fire that annihilates our inauspicious mentality and that by sages desiring the real benefit is carried in their appeared hearts, the fire of Your four forms [of soul, ego, mind and intelligence, the catur-vyuha] that three times a day is worshipped by the self-controlled devotees so as to reach beyond the [material] heavens and acquire an opulence like Yours. Upon them [Your feet] they are meditating, oh Lord, who, having folded their hands, pour the ghee they took into the fire of sacrifice in the [nirukta] process of understanding the three Vedas. Upon them the yoga practitioners are meditating who, inquisitive about Your [yoga]-maya mystic potency, are united in the realisation of the True Self. [But] they are fully attained [only] by the most elevated devotees [see uttama and 11.2: 45-47]. With the withered flower garland that we offer You, Your Lordship's consort Shri [dwelling there], oh Almighty One, feels challenged like a jealous co-wife, for You accept this offering as being properly performed [see also B.G. 9: 26]. May there always be Your lotus feet, the fire that consumes our impure desires! Your feet that like flags decorating flagpoles with three mighty steps [defeat the possessiveness and bring down the water of the Ganges] in each of the three worlds [see 8.20], create fear among the armies of the demons and fearlessness among the troops of the God-fearing souls. For the virtuous souls they are there for the attainment of heaven and for the mischievous ones they are there for exactly the opposite oh Most Powerful One. May these feet oh Supreme Lord, free us Your worshipers from our sins. Brahma and all the other embodied beings have their existence as oxen bound by a rope through their nose. Being controlled by Time they trouble each other. May the lotus feet of You, the Supreme Personality transcendental to both material nature and the individual person, bring us transcendental happiness [compare 1.13: 42, 6.3: 12]. You are the cause of the creation, maintenance and annihilation of this [universe]. You are the cause of the unseen, the individual soul and the complete whole of the manifest reality. They say that You, this very same personality, are the time factor controlling all who appears as a wheel divided in three [summer, winter and spring/autumn]. One says that You are the Supreme Personality who in the form of Time uninterrupted in Your flow effects the decay of everything [*]. The living being [beginning with Maha-Vishnu] acquires its power [potency] from that [time aspect] of Yours. You establish the vastness of matter with it [mahat-tattva]. United with that same nature You therefrom generate - the way an ordinary fetus is produced - the golden primeval egg of the universe endowed with its [seven] outer layers [see kos'a]. You are therewith the original Controller of everything that moves and keeps its place. You after all, are in Your activities oh Master of the Senses, never affected Yourself by the change of the objects of the senses that presents itself because of the operating modes of nature. Others by contrast, engaged of their own accord [in austerities], having turned away live in fear [see also B.G. 16: 23-24]. Your sixteen thousand wives were enchanting every time they launched the arrows of Cupid by showing their feelings with their eyebrows, smiles and glances. But they were not able to perplex Your senses by all the methods of their messages and advances of conjugal love [see also 1.11: 36]. The rivers of nectar of Your stories and the rivers resulting from the bathing of Your feet, can put an end to all the impurities of the three worlds. Those who strive for purification and seek association, approach [You therefore] in two places: by making their ears listen to the stories the tradition offers [in the temples] and by bringing their bodies [in the rivers] in contact with the water that flows from Your feet.'

The honourable son of Vyasa [Shuka] said: 'After he who commands hundreds [of sages, Brahma] together with Shiva and the demigods thus had praised Govinda, the Supreme Lord, he addressed Him offering his obeisances from his position in the sky. Shri Brahma said: 'Oh Lord, we requested You previously to diminish the burden of the earth. Oh Unlimited Soul, You have fulfilled that request the way we wanted it. Having established the principles of dharma among both the pious souls and the seekers of truth, it is indeed Your glory spread by You in all directions, that removes the impurity of all the worlds. For the benefit of the universe assuming a form and descending in the Yadu dynasty, You with magnanimous deeds have performed incomparable activities. Oh Lord, those saintly souls who in the age of Kali hear and chant about Your activities, will easily overcome the darkness [see also 10.14]. Oh Supreme Personality, since Your descent in the Yadu-vams'a one hundred and twenty-five autumns have passed, oh Master. 6-2 Oh You Foundation of Everything, for You there is no longer any obligation to the God-fearing souls and the remaining part of the dynasty has factually been annihilated by this curse of the brahmins [see 11.1]. Therefore we ask You whether You intend to leave for Your Supreme Abode and if You please want to protect us, the servants of Vaikunthha and the guardians of all worlds and their inhabitants.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'I have understood what you said, oh controller of the demigods. All the work has been accomplished for your sake, the burden of the earth has been removed. This same Yadu family that [with My appearance has] expanded its power, courage and opulence, threatened to devour the entire world and has therefore been checked by Me just like an ocean is checked by its shore. If I would not withdraw the vast dynasty of overly proud Yadus, this world would be destroyed by that flood. Because of the brahmins' curse right now the annihilation of the family has begun. After that has taken place, oh sinless Brahma, I will pay a visit to your abode.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Thus being addressed by the Lord of the World, the self-born one fell down at His feet to offer Him his obeisances. The godhead then returned to his abode together with the different gods. The Supreme Lord thereafter observed the development of serious portents in the city of Dvaraka. He spoke to the assembled Yadu elders. The Supreme Lord said: 'These very serious disturbances appearing everywhere are a consequence of the curse the brahmins pronounced against our family, it is impossible to counteract. We should not stay here if we want to continue with our lives. Let us not delay oh venerable souls, and this very day go to Prabhasa, that so very pious place []. The king of the stars [the moon god] who was seized by consumption because of a curse of Daksha, once took a bath there, was immediately freed from his offense and resumed the waxing of his phases. 7-3 When we also bathe there to the satisfaction of the forefathers, offer different kinds of foodstuff to the demigods and the venerable scholars and also distribute gifts with faith in them as being worth the charity, we will overcome the terrible danger, just as one with boats overcomes the ocean.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Oh child of the Kurus, the Yadavas who were thus instructed by the Fortunate One, decided after due consideration to go to the holy site and yoked their horses to their chariots. 0-4 Oh King, Uddhava [see also 3.2 and 10.46 & 47] as an ever faithful follower of Krishna came to hear what the Lord had said. Facing the fearful evil omens [see also 1.14: 2-5] he approached the Lord of the lords of the universe in private and addressed Him with folded hands bowing down his head at His feet. Shri Uddhava said: 'Oh Lord and God of Gods, oh Master of Yoga, oh Piety of Hearing and Singing,

You are about to withdraw this family now and give up this world. Even though You as the Supreme Controller are very well capable of it, You are not willing to counteract the curse of the brahmins! Oh Kes'ava, I cannot even for half a moment tolerate to give up Your lotus feet, please take me also to Your abode [see also 3.29: 13]! Your pastimes are supremely auspicious oh Krishna, they are nectar to the human ear. Once people have the taste of them they forsake all desire for other things. How can we, who were always devoted to You when we were lying down, sitting, walking, standing, bathing, recreating and eating and such, ever abandon You, our dear most Self? Eating the food remnants and adorned with the garlands, fragrances, garments and ornaments that You enjoyed, we, Your servants, will conquer the illusory energy for certain. The but in air clad sinless, peaceful members of the renounced order, who as sages of strict observance always send their seed upwards, to the abode known as Brahma [see urdhva retah and also 10.2: 32]. 8-4 We on the other hand, oh Greatest of All Yogis, who in this world wander on the paths of fruitive labour, will together with Your devotees pass beyond the hard to conquer darkness by discussing the topics that make us remember and glorify Your deeds, words, movements, broad smiles, glances and Your amorous sports after the example of the human world.'

Shri Shuka said: 'Thus being informed oh King, the Supreme Lord, the son of Devaki, for a long time spoke in private with His dear servant Uddhava.'

*: Time in three can be regarded as the three types of seasons, summer winter and spring/autumn or as the three to the order, the cakra, of the sun, moon and the stars or the past, the present and the future and as the time of nature, culture and the psychological experience [see also tri-kalika, 5.22: 2, time-quotes and B.G. 10: 30 & 33, 11: 32].

 Prabhasa is a famous holy place located near the Veraval railway station, within the region of Junagarah. At the base of the same pippala tree under which Lord Krishna was reported to have repored there is now a temple. One mile away from the tree, on the seashore, is the Vira-prabhanjana Mathha, and it is said that from this point the hunter Jara fired the arrow which marked the end of His earthly presence [as described in the last two chapters of this BOOK].

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 7:

Krishna Speaks about the Masters of the Avadhuta and the Pigeon of Attachment

The Supreme Lord said: 'That what you said to Me, oh greatly fortunate one [Uddhava], is indeed My plan [to withdraw the dynasty]. Brahma, Bhava and the leaders of the worlds, are looking forward to see me back in My abode [see 11.6: 26-27]. I have completed My task here for the sake of the God-conscious souls [to diminish the burden of the earth] for which I, upon the prayers of Lord Brahma, have descended together with My partial expansion [Balarama]. Because of the curse [of the brahmins] this family will certainly find its end. It will be destroyed in a mutual quarrel and on the seventh day [from now] the ocean will inundate this city [Dvaraka]. Oh man of virtue, when I have abandoned this world, it will soon fall victim of Kali and be bereft of all piety [see also 1.16 & 17]. After I have left, you certainly should not stay here, oh gentle soul, for in Kali's time the people on earth will take pleasure in misconduct. With your mind fully fixed on Me you should in fact forsake all emotional ties with your family and friends and being equal towards all wander around in this world [see B.G. 6: 9, 6: 29, 14: 22-25]. This world you think of, talk about, look at, listen to and such, you should consider a transitory presentation of matters, a game of shadows that captures your imagination [see also 10.40: 25]. Someone not [spiritually] connected is confused about many values and assumes things to be right or wrong. Thus considering good and evil he makes a difference between right action, no action and wrong action [he judges, see further B.G. 4: 16]. Consider therefore, with your senses under control and your mind connected, this world as situated within the Self that expanded everywhere and that Self as being situated in Me, the Supreme Lord. Fully endowed with knowledge and wisdom, being satisfied in one's mind and of understanding with the Self that for every embodied soul constitutes the object of affection, one is never discouraged by hindrances. Having risen above the two of [right and] wrong, he does not turn away from what is forbidden thinking it is bad, nor does he engage in what is enjoined because of considering it good - like a young child he does not judge. When one firmly being fixed in knowledge and wisdom sees the universe as being pervaded by Me and peacefully, as a well-wisher, acts towards all living beings, one will never again fall into [the] misfortune [of repeated births].'

Shri Shuka said: 'Oh King, after thus by the Supreme Lord having been instructed, the exalted and fortunate Uddhava eager to learn about the supreme principle, bowed down to the Infallible Lord to offer his obeisances and spoke. Shri Uddhava said: 'Oh Lord of Yoga, oh Unity keeping us together, oh Essence of uniting in consciousness and Source of mystical power, You spoke to my advantage about the forsaking as is known in the renounced order [sannyasa]. This renunciation is difficult to perform my Lord, when one is dedicated to [the not regulated love of one's] lust and sense gratification, especially when one is not devoted to You I think [compare B.G. 6: 33-34]. With my consciousness merged with the body and its relations as arranged by Your maya, I am thus foolish [being caught in the notion] of 'I' and 'mine'. Teach me therefore, so that Your servant may easily perform according to the process You teach. Who else is there but You who are of the Truth and personally reveal Yourself to me? Who else but my Lord, the Supreme Soul, does actually qualify for this? Not even among the awakened souls I find such a one. Everyone up to the ones led by Brahma, is in his consciousness an embodied soul who, when he takes the external world for substantial, is bewildered by Your maya. I who with my mind in renunciation am tormented by distress, approach You therefore for shelter Narayana, oh Friend of Man, oh You perfect, unlimited and omniscient Lord ever fresh in Your abode of Vaikunthha.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'Human beings well acquainted with the state of affairs in this world, generally deliver themselves with the help of their own intelligence from the inauspicious disposition [of the 'I' and 'mine' perspective]. A person in a way constitutes his own guru because he with the help of his reasoning and direct perception [his self-instruction], may find his [real] benefit. They who are wise and experienced with the order of [sankhya or analytic] yoga, can see Me in their human existence, clearly manifested in My full glory, with all My energies [see also Kapila]. Many types of bodies have evolved with one, two, three, four or more legs or with none at all. The human form among these is the one most dear to Me [see also 3.29: 30, 6.4: 9]. In this world being situated in such a body one may look for Me, the Supreme Controller, by following direct signs [in bhakti listening and meditating] with the help of one's qualities of perception [intelligence, mind and senses]. [But in mere jnana] by logical reasoning following indirect symptoms [- the ones of My creation -], I cannot be perceived [as a person and am even rejected, see also 2.2: 35, 2.9: 36]. Concerning this one cites the following ancient story of a conversation between the, oh so mighty king Yadu and an avadhuta.

Yadu, who was well versed in the dharma, once saw a young brahmin mendicant wandering around unafraid of anything and took the opportunity to ask him questions [see also 7.13]. Shri Yadu said: 'How did you acquire this extraordinary intelligence, oh brahmin? How can you, fully cognizant not being engaged in any work, travel the world with the confidence of a child? People who are religious, work for an income, gratify their senses and pursue knowledge, are normally endeavoring for the purpose of opulence, a good name and a long life. You however, capable, learned, experienced, handsome and eloquent as you are, are not a doer and do not desire a thing, like a stupefied, maddened, ghostly creature. Everyone burns in the forest fire of lust and greed, but you stand, to be free from the fire, like an elephant in the Ganges and are not burned. We ask you, oh brahmin, to please tell us what the cause is of the inner happiness that you, living all by yourself, experience without any form of material enjoyment.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'The brahmin thus being asked and honoured by the greatly fortunate and intelligent Yadu, who out of his respect for brahmins humbly bowed his head, then spoke. The honourable brahmin said: 'There are many spiritual masters I took shelter of by my intelligence, oh King. Having learned to understand through them I now, being freed, wander around in this world. Please listen to their description. 3-3 The earth, the air, the sky, the water, the fire, the moon and the sun, the python, the sea, the moth, the honeybee and the elephant, the honey thief, the deer, the fish, the prostitute [Pingala], the osprey and the child, the girl, the arrow maker, the serpent, the spider and the wasp, are my twenty-four spiritual masters, oh King. From studying their actions I in this life have learned everything about the Self. Listen oh son of Nahusha [or Yayati], oh tiger among men, I will tell you what I have learned from each of them separately.'

From the earth I learned the rule that a learned person should not deviate from the path and keep steady, however much he is harassed by his fellow living beings who simply follow what is arranged by fate. From the mountain one must learn to be always there for others, that one must devote all one's actions to the welfare of others. For a pious person to the example of a tree be dedicated to others [see Shri Shri Shikshashthaka-3], constitutes the sole reason for his existence [see also 10.22: 31-35 and B.G. 17: 20-22].

A sage should be happy with the mere movement of his vital air and not seek his satisfaction in sense gratification. His spiritual knowing will thus not be lost and his mind and speech will not be distracted. A yogi free from selfhood should, just like the wind, never get entangled in relating to the objects of the senses and all their different favorable and unfavorable qualities. When a self-realised soul has entered different bodies made of earth [elements] in this world and is endowed with their different qualities, he, well aware of himself, will not connect himself with these qualities, just like the wind does not with different odors.

A sage should meditate upon the soul stretched out in all moving and nonmoving living beings and thereby, with his different contacts [embodiments], consider himself a pure spirit, equal to the ether that expands everywhere [see also B.G. 2: 24, 3: 15, 6: 29-30, 9: 6, 11: 17, 12: 3-4 and 13: 14]. Just as the realm of the ether is not touched by the winds that blow the clouds, a person [in his real self] is not affected by his physical bodies consisting of fire, water and earth that are moved by Time according to the modes of nature.

A sage who by nature is a pure, softhearted, sweet and gentle place of pilgrimage for human beings, sanctifies just like water, the souls who gather [the friends], by being seen by them, touched and honoured [see also sakhya].

Brilliant, glowing and immovable because of his austerity, he who only eats when it is necessary is connected in the soul. Even when he eats everything [and thus goes beyond necessity], he does not lose his purity, just like a fire does not [irrespective what it consumes]. Sometimes [like a fire under ashes being] concealed, sometimes being manifested and being worshipable to those who desire the real benefit he [the sage, when he serves as their guru] always enjoys their offerings and burns both their past and subsequent [present] misfortune [see also 10.81: 4 and B.G. 3: 14]. The Almighty One assumes the identity of each after, just like fire appearing in firewood, having entered the different types of bodies of the higher and lower life forms He created by His potency ['true' and 'untrue' ones, god or animal].

The state of the body [one undergoes] from one's birth until one's death changes by the course of Time that itself cannot be seen; it is the body that changes, not the soul, just as the phases of the moon [change, but not the moon itself, B.G. 2: 13, 2: 20]. Just as with flames [one cannot see apart] from a fire individual souls cannot be seen separately from the bodies that constantly die and are born again, also the [absolute of] Time itself cannot be seen, despite [the relativity of] its speeding, compelling stream [*].

A yogi with his senses accepts and forsakes sense objects depending the moment [according to the cakra order] and does not attach to them, just as the sun with its rays engaged in [evaporating and returning] bodies of water is not ruled by them. When the sun seems to have fallen apart in its reflections one, unless one is dull-witted, does not consider its original form as being different. Similarly the soul, despite of having entered in reflections [of different selves], is not seen as different.

One should never lose oneself in too much affection or close association with anyone, because thus indulging one will suffer great distress, just like a foolish pigeon [see also 7.2: 50-56]. A certain pigeon once in the forest built its nest in a tree and dwelt there for some years with a female companion. The pigeons, with their hearts full of love, lived a householder's life whereby their glances, bodies and minds were tied to each other [like with ropes]. Trusting each other making love they in the trees of the forest were engaged in resting, sitting, walking, standing, communicating, playing, eating and so on. Whatever she would like, oh King, was what he, desirous to please her, did. He mercifully catered to all her desires, even when it was difficult and had no control over his senses. The chaste female pigeon got pregnant for the first time and delivered, in due course, in the nest the eggs in the presence of her husband. From them at the appropriate time the little ones hatched with the tender limbs and feathers that were created by the inconceivable potencies of the Lord. The couple then very pleased nourished their progeny, to which they compassionately listened to the awkward sounds of the chirping children that surrounded them. To see the little ones happy with their fluffy wings, their endearing chirping and their activities of jumping up to fly, filled the parents with joy. With their hearts bound together by their affection they, not giving it any further thought, completely bewildered by the illusory potency of Vishnu, fed their children, their offspring. One day the two heads of the family left for finding food for the children and wandered far away, most anxiously searching all around in the forest. Some hunter who happened to pass through the forest saw the young birds moving near their nest and caught them with a net he had spread. The male and female pigeon who were always eagerly engaged in taking care of their children, thereupon returned to the nest to bring them food. The female pigeon saw that the little ones born from her, her children, were trapped in the net and rushed forward in utter distress crying out to them, who were also crying. Bound to her love constantly she had looked after her children without a thought for herself and so she, overwhelmed by the maya of the Unborn One, forgot about herself and was also trapped in the net. The unfortunate male pigeon most miserably lamented that his children and his wife so much alike him, had been caught. They were more dear to him than his life: 'Alas, just see how I, so unintelligent and of little merit, find my destruction. Unfulfilled I failed in my life's purpose and have ruined my family life, the threefold path [of the purusharthas]! She who suitable and faithful accepted me as her husband, as her god, has gone to heaven with her saintly children, leaving me behind in an empty house. What now is the purpose of my life with my wife and children dead? What is there for me, miserable and wretched living in an empty nest? Seeing them caught within the net, still in the grip of death, he in misery sat motionless and also landed empty minded in the net. The ruthless hunter who had achieved his purpose, took the householder, his children and his pigeon wife and headed for his home.

A family man who dissatisfied with the soul takes pleasure in material opposites [like that of man and wife], will [unmediated] suffer greatly with his relatives, just like this bird so miserable in maintaining its family. A person who achieved the human position, but with the door of liberation wide open, is attached to family affairs like this bird, may, to whatever height he might have reached, be considered fallen [see also 3.30, 3.32: 1-3, 4.28: 17, 5.26: 35, 7.14, 7.15: 38-39, 7.15: 67, 8.16: 9 and 10.69: 40].

*: This analytic method, of in this case returning to the subject of the fire after having introduced the next subject of the moon, is called simhavalokana, or 'the lion's glance', by which one simultaneously proceeds forward and casts backward glances to see if anything has been overlooked.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 8:

What One Learns from Nature and the Story of Pingala

The honourable brahmin said: 'Since there is sensual happiness, oh King, in both heaven and hell and also feelings of unhappiness are there for all embodied beings [as their counterpart], an intelligent person should not desire such happiness [see B.G. 2: 14].

He should eat, as passive as a python, what is acquired accidentally, whether it is much or little, tasteless or pure and delicious food [7.13: 37-38]. When no food is coming he, just like a big python that eats whatever providence provides, should lie down and fast for many days [7.15: 15]. Both physically and mentally being strong, he, though endowed with senses, should stay free from desire and, resting [but] clear-minded, carry his body without engaging in action.

A sage is pleasing, grave, unfathomable, unlimited, unsurpassable [in his knowing] and never disturbed, just like the calm waters of the ocean [see also B.G. 12: 15]. Someone wise who accepts Narayana as the One Supreme, just like the ocean with its rivers, does not dry up or swell, whether he flourishes to his liking or is penniless [B.G. 2: 70].

When someone who did not conquer his senses, sees a woman, he is tempted by that seductive illusory energy of the Lord and lands in darkness, just like a moth lands in the fire. Upon seeing the by maya produced clothing, golden ornaments and so on of the women, a person lacking in discrimination will, with his desire for sense-gratification, feel aroused by lusty desires and no doubt lose his spiritual bearings, just like a moth is destroyed [B.G. 2: 62-63].

A sage has to practice the occupation of a honeybee by going door to door without giving trouble and only eat little bits of food, just enough to keep the body alive [5.5: 3, 7.2: 11-13, 7.12: 6, 7.14: 5, 7.15: 15 and B.G. 4: 21]. Just like a honeybee obtains its nectar from small and large flowers, a well versed man must extract the [Vedic] essence from both the smallest and the largest scriptures [11.7: 23, B.G. 15: 15]. With the belly as his container and the hand as his plate he should, not being a collector like a honeybee, accept food in charity and not keep it for the night or the next day. A mendicant should not collect for the night or the following day, because he, just like a honeybee [collecting more and more], will lose himself thereby [in excess].

A mendicant must not touch a girl, not even with his foot or one of wood, because he otherwise will be captured by the physical contact, just like an elephant in the grip of a she-elephant. A man of intelligence should never try to get a woman, because he otherwise may find himself killed [because of a rival], the way an elephant will be destroyed by other elephants superior in strength.

Riches that with great difficulty are accumulated by a greedy person who neither enjoys them himself nor shares them with others, are rather enjoyed by someone else who steals them away, just like the honey collector does upon discovering honey [see also 5.13: 10]. The way a honey thief is the first one to enjoy the honey that was painstakingly collected, also the ascetic is the first one to enjoy the eagerly desired blessings of the wealth that with a lot of trouble was acquired by householders [see e.g. 1.19: 39 and 7.14: 17].

An ascetic moving through the forest should not listen to worldly songs; he should learn from the deer that was captured for being fooled by the hunter's call [see the bhajans]. Taking pleasure in common dancing, musical entertainment and songs, Rishyas'ringa, the son of Mrigi ['deer'], was subdued by women, like he was a plaything [see *, 5.8 and 5.25: 11].

The way a fish that follows its taste with no intelligence is hooked and finds its death, also a person, most harassed being fooled by what the tongue dictates, may against his better judgement waste his life. Sages [even] who are of self-restraint quickly conquer the material senses, except however for the tongue, the desire of which increases with the fasting [see prasadam prayer]. A human being not in control of his tongue but in control of his other senses, has no self-control yet, [only] when he has conquered his tongue, he has mastered them all [see also 8: 16 and B.G. 2: 59].

In the city of Videha there used to be a prostitute called Pingala. Oh son of kings, learn now from me something I learned from her. She one night stood as a prostitute outside her door showing off her beautiful figure to get a customer into her house. Oh best among men, desiring money she looked at all the men passing in the street and thought: 'Oh this lover can pay the price, that one is wealthy enough.' 5-2 With them coming and going she, thus subsisting on selling her love, thought: 'Maybe some guy carrying plenty will approach me for love and give me a bundle.' Giving thought to this vain hope, standing in the doorway and spoiling her sleep, walking down the street and returning to the house, it became midnight. As she sadly dropped her face in her desire for money, her anxiety started to give way to a supreme detachment that brought her happiness. Please hear from me the song she sang after this disgust of her mind, a detachment that is like a sword to the ties of someone's hopes and desires. Dear King, a person who has not developed detachment is not willing to give up his physical ties, just as a human being lacking in wisdom is not willing to give up his [claims of] ownership. Pingala said: 'See how badly illusioned I am! I must be out of my mind, making a fool of myself in my lust to desire useless pleasures from a lover. Being ignorantly devoted to a most insignificant and unsatisfactory lust that only leads to illusion, grief, distress, misery and fear, I have refrained from the love of Him the eternal one bringing welfare, most dear and close to me. Oh, uselessly subjecting my soul to torture, I engaged as a prostitute, the most reprehensible of all occupations! Desiring money and sexual pleasure, I sold my body to greedy, lusty, pitiable womanizers. Who else but me would devote herself to this house with nine doors full of stool and dripping urine that is constructed with the bones of a spine, the ribs, hands and legs and covered by a skin, hair and nails [compare B.G. 5: 13 and 4.25-28]? Among the residents of Videha I am the one as foolish of intelligence to desire, most unfaithful lusting, another man than Him who gives us the Soul, Acyuta. When I pay the price of giving myself to Him, the well-wisher who is the one most dear, the Lord and Soul of all embodied beings, I will enjoy with Him, just like [the goddess] Rama. How little happiness gave me the sensual pleasure and the men who pleased my senses? To have a wife or [even the grace of] the gods has, being spread in time, all its beginning and its end. I who so stubbornly went for pleasure therefore with my disgust somehow must have pleased the Supreme One, Lord Vishnu who brings the happiness I now experience! Had I been unlucky, there would not have been this misery leading to disgust, this loathing that makes someone relinquish his bondage and find [real] peace [compare 1.8: 25]. Having refrained from cherishing vain hope in my addiction to sensual pleasures, I now approach Him for shelter and accept devotedly the great help that He, the Original Lord, offers me. Fully satisfied convinced that I thus can handle whatever comes my way, I will succeed in living and enjoying just with Him, the Self of love and Happiness that is certain. When one has fallen in the well of a material existence, by sensual pleasures has been robbed of one's insight and is caught in the grip of the snake of Time, who else but the Original Lord, would deliver one's soul [see also 10.34]? The moment a soul attentively sees the universe as seised by the snake of Time, he being sober will detach from everything material and be suitable to serve as his own protector.'

The honourable brahmin said: 'Thus being determined to put an end to the desperation that was caused by her desire for lovers, she sat down on her bed having found inner peace. The greatest unhappiness results from [material] desires and the greatest happiness from the absence of them. Therewith putting an end to her hope for a lover, Pingala [finally] happily slept.'

*: Rishyas'ringa, meaning 'deer-horn' to the deer that is musically attracted, was the young son of the sage Mrigi, intentionally brought up by his father in an atmosphere of complete innocence. Mrigi Rishi thought that if his son were never exposed to the sight of women he would always remain a perfect brahmachari. But by chance the inhabitants of the neighbouring kingdom, who were suffering from a long-term drought, received divine advice that rain would return to their kingdom only after the brahmana named Rishyas'ringa stepped foot in it. Therefore they sent beautiful women to the hermitage of Mrigi to entice Rishyas'ringa and bring him back with them. Since Rishyas'ringa had never even heard about women, he easily fell for their trap [quoted from pp 11.8: 18].

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 9:

Detachment from All that is Material

The honourable brahmin said: 'When one strives to own all the things held dear by man [a house, a wife, goods etc.], that will be a source of unhappiness. Anyone who knows this and is of detachment, achieves unlimited happiness.

A large hawk [the osprey] who had a prey was attacked by others who were very strong and without meat. The moment he gave up his [desire for] prey, he achieved happiness.

There is no trace of honour or dishonour in me, nor do I know the anxiety of people with a home and children. Like a child I wander around in this world, sporting and enjoying only the soul. There are two types of people free from anxiety: the one retarded who ignorant like a child is overwhelmed by great happiness and the one who reached the Absolute beyond the natural modes.

Once, at the house of a young girl all of whose relatives [that day] had gone to another place, a couple of men arrived who wanted to marry her. She received them with great hospitality. Being alone she beat the rice so that her guests could eat, and doing so the conch shell bracelets on her arms made a lot of noise. Shy she filled with shame thought about that [servant] noise and then intelligently one by one broke the shell bracelets from her arms, leaving but two on each wrist. From those two there was still the noise of course as she was husking the rice, but after she further removed one from each pair of shell ornaments, only one remained and no sound could be heard anymore. Oh subduer of the enemy, I, wandering around in all regions searching for the truth about the world, personally witnessed the lesson taught by this girl. When there are many people in one place, quarrels will rise, even from two people there will be such conduct. Therefore one should live alone, just like the bracelet of the girl. The mind should be steadied by detachment and a regulated yoga practice [vairagya and abhyasa] in which one conquers one's breathing in sitting postures and carefully concentrates on one point [the true self, see also B.G. 6: 10-15 and 6: 46-47]. When the mind has achieved that position and step by step is freed from its karma contamination, the mode of goodness increases in strength while passion and ignorance recede. Without this fuel [for one's karma] one then attains beatitude [nirvana, see also B.G. 6: 26 and 14: 6-8].

When one is thus being fixed in the soul, one does not know anything about what is outside or inside, just like the arrow maker who absorbed in his arrow did not notice the king standing at his side [see B.G. 7: 27-28].

A sage must walk alone without a fixed residence [or temple], must very alert exercise restraint and should not be recognised in his actions. Without companions he speaks only little. Building a home for one's temporary self is a vain and troublesome endeavor. A serpent happily prospers having entered a home built by others [see also B.G. 4: 18].

The one Self, the One Lord without a second who became the Foundation and Reservoir of All, is Narayana, the Godhead who by His own potency created the universe in the beginning and by His potency of Time withdraws His creation within Himself at the end of the kalpa. 7-1 When the material powers of sattva and so on, are balanced by the time factor that is the potency of the True Self [the Soul, the Lord], the Original Personality, the purusha is found as the Supreme Controller, the Lord of both the primary nature [pradhana] and the person. He, the worshipable object of all conditioned and transcendental souls has His existence in the purest experience that one describes as kaivalya [or beatitude], the fulness of the blissful state without [guna] attributes [see also B.G. 7: 5 and *]. By means of the pure potency of His Self, His own bewildering energy composed of the three modes, He oh subduer of the enemies, at the onset of creation agitating [in the form of Time], manifests the plan of matter [the sutra, the thread, the rule or direction of the mahat-tattva, see also 3.26: 19]. This universe, in which the living being finds its existence [of repeated births], is strung and bound to that [thread, that plan] that manifested itself as the cause of the three modes that [in their turn] bring about the different categories of the manifestation, so one says [see also B.G. 7: 7]. The way a spider expands its thread from itself, with that thread by its mouth enjoys [its meal] and swallows that thread again, the Supreme Lord also operates.

On whatever state of [one's own nature or] form the conditioned soul with intelligence fixes his mind, out of love, hate or fear, he will reach [see B.G. 8: 6]. Oh King, a wasp larva meditating on the fully grown wasp that has put him in the hive, reaches without leaving his previous body [by transformation] the same state of being when fully grown.

This is what I know from taking instruction from all these gurus. Now please oh King, hear from me what I have to say about the knowledge I acquired by learning from my own body. With one's body one always has to suffer because of the inevitable burden of its maintenance and future destruction. I contemplate the truths of the world with it and the body is therefore, despite being there for the service of others, to me a teacher of renunciation and discrimination who convinces me to wander about in detachment. Wishing to give it pleasure one has to divide one's care over the different departments of the wife, the children, the animals, the servants, the home and the relatives. Just as in nature a tree drops the seed that was produced and dies, the body at the time of death must give up the wealth it with great struggle accumulated. One moment the tongue distracts the cherished body and sometimes thirst is doing this, the other moment the genitals distract and then the sense of touch is pressing, the belly demands attention, the ears lead elsewhere, the smell points in a direction or the fickle eyes are leading astray. The operating forces of the body are thus pulled in many directions, just like the head of a household is, being led by many co-wives. After He from His powers had created the many different physical forms of the crawling creatures [the insects], the mammals, birds, snakes and so on, the Lord, in His heart not satisfied with it, created the human life form that He endowed with an intelligence fit for envisioning the Absolute Truth and that brought Him gladness. After many births having attained this human form that is so difficult to attain and, though not eternal, has a great value, someone in control of himself but doomed to die, must as long as he has not ended, without delay in this world endeavor for the ultimate liberation. [the way out], sense-gratification after all is available in all forms of life.

Thus [with all these twenty-four plus one masters] without ties having awakened and with wisdom looking [at the world] from within the soul, I wander the earth free from attachment and false ego. The knowledge acquired from a single teacher cannot be very solid or complete [see 11.3: 21]. The Absolute Truth without a second, is by the sages sung in many ways.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'After the so very intelligent brahmin [who in fact was Lord Dattatreya, see 2.7: 4 and ] thus had spoken to king Yadu and properly was honoured by the king offering his obeisances, then bid farewell and went away, just as contented as he had come. Yadu, the forefather of our forefathers, having heard the words of the avadhuta, became liberated from all his attachment in a consciousness equal toward all.'

*. Considering verse 3.25: 34 stating that devotees seek company to associate with Krishna, the acaryas to this verse say that that single-mindedness with the Lord without speculating as a jnani, is the same as being alone to prevent quarrels [see pp. 11.9: 10].

 The parampara [pp. 11.9: 32] confirms: 'This verse [2.7: 4] mentions that Yadu was purified by contact with the lotus feet of Dattatreya, and similarly the present verse states, vandito sv-arcito rajna - King Yadu worshiped the lotus feet of the brahmana. Thus, according to Shрила Shridhara Svami, the avadhuta brahmana is the Personality of Godhead Himself, and this is confirmed by Shрила Vis'vanatha Cakravarti Thhakura.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 10:

The Soul Free, the Soul Bound

The Supreme Lord said: 'A soul free from desire who accepts My shelter, should practice the varnashrama system of behaving oneself in society [B.G. 4: 13], conscientiously performing the personal duties that I spoke about [see also in e.g. 10.60: 52 and B.G. 3: 35]. A purified soul should understand that all endeavors of embodied souls who, focused on the sensuous self, take the material qualities for true are doomed to fail [see also B.G. 13: 32]. Just as the sensuous matters that the mediator sees in the realm of sleep or in his fantasy do not help him because of their messy nature, also the intelligence is ineffectual when being led by the senses that follow a diversity of outer selves [B.G. 2: 41 & 9: 15]. Devoted to Me one gives up one's active [employment] life [pravritti] and engages in a contemplative life [nivritti]; when one is fully absorbed in [self] inquiry one is no longer bound to the injunctions for performing material labour [karma, see 7.15: 47]. Devoted to Me one should at all times respect the vow of yoga [yama, the vidhi] and its regulated practice [niyama] as good as one can, as also respect a guru who knows My form and is peaceful under My control [see also 7.14: 41-42]. Humble without false pride and jealousy, be industrious [in devotion], non-possessive, fixed in friendship, without haste, interested in inquiring and free from spite and idle talk. Remaining neutral with an equal vision towards one's wife, children, home, land, relatives and bank account and such, one should recognise one's self-interest in that of others [see B.G. 5: 18].

The soul is the self-enlightened seer different from the gross and subtle body, just as fire emitting light as it burns differs from the firewood [see also B.G. 2: 16-24]. Like the different qualities of being dormant, manifesting, being large or small that there are [of the fire], there are also the qualities of the material body that by the higher self, having entered it, are accepted [see also 3.24: 6, 4.9: 7, 10.37: 10-11, 10.46: 36]. This body, which was constructed by the modes of nature [expanding] from the Original Person [see B.G. 8: 4], ties the living entity to a material existence [to samsara] from which it breaks away by the knowledge of the Soul. One should therefore, by cultivating knowledge, get in touch with the pure, transcendental [Supreme] Soul situated within oneself [2.2 and B.G. 9: 5] and gradually give up this concept of the material affair [as being an independent reality]. The acarya can be compared to the lower part of [a pile of] kindling wood, the disciple to the top part and the instructions to the [kindling] stick used in between, while the knowledge that brings happiness is there like the fire [that brings light, compare 9.14: 44-46]. This purest intelligence of the souls of experience [the acaryas], drives away the illusion originating from the gunas and then - being raised by those modes - finds peace itself, the way a fire burns up when it runs out of fuel [see also 11.3: 12].

For the controllers and enjoyers of karma there is of course the eternal duality of happiness and grief, time and place, to have and to be. When you take all that is matter for eternal and complete, your intelligence is ruled by all the different forms and changes belonging to it. All living beings thinking thus oh Uddhava, again and again will find themselves being born [fall ill, die] and so on [see 3.11], after all, being united with a form one is bound to the [conditioning] limbs of time [of sun and moon, day and night etc.]. In this, one can clearly see the lack of independence of the karmic controller as also the happiness and unhappiness of such an enjoyer. What purpose is served by someone [that] helpless [see B.G. 9: 3 and 11.9: 1]? Among the embodied beings the fool is sometimes unhappy and even the sage is not always happy as well. Wishing to be happy always is a useless endeavor and in fact something most egotistical [see also B.G. 2: 15 and 11.9: 4]. Even if one manages to achieve happiness and escape distress, one still has no direct knowledge of the [yoga] process by which death loses its power [compare B.G. 10: 34]. What guarantee of material happiness would a material object or lust be able to provide the person? With death never pleasing close at hand such a thing gives no satisfaction, like with a person condemned who is led to his place of execution. What we heard about [heaven] as also what we know from our own experience [earth] is spoiled by rivalry, fault-finding, lapse and decay. Just like with agriculture where many obstacles are in the way [of a happy result], it is useless to desire for [perfect] material happiness [see also 11.3: 20]. When one manages to perfectly practice one's righteousness [dharma] without being troubled by hindrances, even the status one thus acquires will not last forever. Please, listen therefore to the following [see also B.G. 2: 14].

On earth having worshiped the gods with sacrifices the performer goes to the heavenly worlds where he may enjoy like a god the celestial pleasures he achieved [see B.G. 3: 11 and 4: 12]. Shining in the temple [the 'vimana'] because of his accumulated merit he, being surrounded by goddesses wearing charming clothes, enjoys while he [as he leaves this earth] is glorified with songs by the singers of heaven. Surrounded by the sounds of bells he fares to his desire with the heavenly women, but while relaxing comfortably in the pleasure gardens of the gods, he in his delight has no awareness of his downfall [see e.g. 7.15: 69-73]. After for long having enjoyed the heavens until his pious credits were used up, having exhausted his merits he against his will falls down from heaven, [not properly fixed] being forced from his course by time [compare B.G. 9: 20-22]. 7-2 When he, due to his material involvement, is engaged in actions against the dharma or, not having conquered his senses, lives wantonly as a miserably, greedy philanderer, is of violence against other living beings, kills animals against the rules and worships hordes of ghosts and spirits [compare 7.12: 12], a living being will, once he passed on, helplessly thereupon land in the deepest darkness of the hellish worlds. He will, because of what he did, again have to accept a material body to perform therewith activities that [again] cause him great grief in the future. What happiness would someone find swearing by activities that invariably lead to death [see also 5.26: 37 and B.G. 16: 19-21]? In all the worlds exists fear of Me [in the form of Time] among all their leaders; the individual souls living as long as a kalpa fear Me and even the one supreme, Brahma who lives for two paradhas, fears Me [see also 1.13: 17-20, 3.8: 20, 3.11: 33, 3.25: 42, 3.26: 16, 3.29: 37, 3.29: 40-45, 5.24: 15, 5.24: 28]. The material senses, stimulated by the modes of nature, give rise to activities and the individual soul, the jiva, who is fully engaged by the materially oriented senses and the gunas, undergoes the various karmic consequences [see also 3.32 and B.G. 3: 27]. As long as there is the differentiation of the modes of nature, there will be the different forms of existence of the soul, and as long as there are these different states of the soul, there will be [karmic] dependence [see also B.G. 17: 2]. As long as one is not free from this dependence there will be fear for the Lord and Controller [who is the Time]. They [then] who enjoy this [karmic bond] will become bewildered and always be full of sorrow. With the given reciprocal action [or the operation] of the modes of nature, one calls Me variously the Time, the Soul, the Vedic Knowledge, the World, [the original nature or] Nature [at large], as also the Dharma.'

Shri Uddhava said: 'Even though the one embodied is present in the midst of the modes of nature, he is not necessarily bound to what incessantly operates upon him from the material body [like happiness and distress]. In other words, how can it happen that someone, as a free soul, is caught in the grip of the modes oh Almighty One? 6-3 How is he situated, how does he enjoy, or by what symptoms can he be known? What would he eat or how would he evacuate, lie down or sit [compare B.G. 14: 21]? Please explain to me what I ask You, oh Infallible One, oh Best Answerer of Questions.

This at the same time being eternally bound and being eternally liberated is something confusing me.'

*: This philosophy is known to be propounded by the followers of Jaimini Kavi that defend the pravritti marga of regulated sense-gratification before the nivritti-marga of activities in renunciation; something to which the parampara offering this book, with this verse, strongly opposes pointing out that one is thus eternally stuck, nitya-baddha, in repeated birth, old age, disease etc.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 11:

Bondage and Liberation Explained and the Devotional Service of the Saintly Person

The Supreme Lord said: 'One cannot really say that one is bound or liberated here due to My modes. To be in the grip of the natural qualities or to be free from them is not caused by My illusory energy [*]. There is lamentation, bewilderment, happiness, distress and the acceptance of a material body because of illusion. Material life repeating itself is [merely] an idea of the soul that is just as unreal as a dream. Please Uddhava, understand that knowledge and ignorance are two forms of Myself that, created by My original potency, give rise to the liberation and bondage of the embodied beings. The bondage of the living entity, that is part and parcel of My Oneness, oh great intelligence, is there since time immemorial because of ignorance and the opposite [of liberation] is there because of knowledge. Let Me now My dear, dilate on the different characteristics of the opposing nature of being conditioned and being liberated, an opposition that is found in one and the same practice. Two birds of a similar nature and friends of each other, one day make a nest in a tree. One of them eats from the fruits of the tree, while the other does not eat, even though he is the strongest of the two [see also 6.4: 24]. The one not eating the fruits of the tree, is conscious and knows both himself and the other one, while the one that eats does not have a clue. The latter is always bound, while the one full of knowledge is eternally liberated [see also B.G. 4: 5]. Although engaged in a body an enlightened person does not abide by the body, like having risen from a dream. A foolish person abides by the body even though he is not engaged in the body, like seeing a dream [see B.G. 16: 18]. Someone not enlightened is invariably obliged to the false ego that thinks in accord with the senses that are directed by the gunas and the sense objects also generated [see B.G. 3: 28]. The ignorant soul who thus, by fate ordained, was caught here in this body because of his by the gunas generated karmic activities, thinks: 'I am the doer' [see also B.G. 3: 27]. An intelligent person is not bound that way. Wherever he goes, rests, sits, walks, bathes, sees, touches, smells, eats, hears and so on, he is detached with the qualities he experiences. 2-1 Though being situated in the material world, he, turned away from its ruling powers and assisted by the most expert and in detachment sharpened vision, cuts with all doubts. Just as the sky, the sun and the wind do not attach themselves, he neither attaches to the separateness of things [the duality of the world], like he has awakened from a dream. The person whose functions of the life breath, senses, mind and intelligence are free from desires, is liberated, despite being situated in a body [that is ruled] by the natural modes. One's body is sometimes for some reason attacked by animals or destructive people and sometimes one is worshiped [by a lover or a follower]. An intelligent person is never seriously moved when that happens [see B.G. 14: 22-25]. With an equal vision having moved beyond the notion of good and bad, a wise man will neither praise those who are behaving very well or speaking excellently, nor criticize others who are acting or expressing themselves poorly [see also B.G. 5: 18]. Someone satisfied within should live free from acting, without saying a word and not contemplating good or evil and that way wander around like being dumb [see also 5.9]. When someone well versed in the Vedic literatures is not absorbed in the Supreme [does not meditate or perform devotional service], the fruit of his effort, his work, will be like that of someone taking care of a cow that gives no milk. Oh Uddhava, he who takes care of a cow that gives no milk, an unchaste wife, a body fully dependent upon others, children without service, wealth wrongly spent, and speaks [about Vedic knowledge] without [ever] mentioning Me [see also 10.14: 4 and 5.6: 11], will suffer one misery after another. A wise person My dear Uddhava, will not accept words [or texts] devoid of My purifying activities or desired appearances as lila-avatars for the sake of the maintenance, creation and annihilation of the world. When one desirous of knowledge thus gives up the misconception of a [material] diversity as existing [separately] of the soul [], one should put an end to one's materialistic life and fix one's purified mind upon Me, the All-pervading One [see also B.G. 7: 19, B.G. 18: 55]. In case you are not able to steady your mind on the spiritual platform, then dedicate, not deviating [from the regulative principles], all your actions to Me without expecting anything in return [B.G. 12: 11, 10: 10, 18: 54]. 3-2 When one with belief listens to, sings about and constantly remembers the narrations about My birth and activities that purify the entire world and also expresses them dramatically, and thereto, for My sake, under

My protection regulates one's religiosity, sensual pleasure and finances [the purushartas], one will develop an unflinching devotion unto Me, the One Eternal, oh Uddhava. By the devotion as acquired in the [sat-sanga] association with devotees, someone very easily will be able to attain My refuge that those pure souls undoubtedly will show him.'

Shri Uddhava said: 'What kind of person would in Your opinion, oh Uttamasloka, be a pure soul, and what sort of worship unto You would carry the approval of Your honoured faithful followers? Please speak about this to me, Your surrendered devotee who loves You as his only shelter, oh Master of the Universe, Supervisor of the World and Commander of the Person. You the Supreme Truth and Spirit as [unattached] as the sky, the Original Person transcendental to material nature, are the Supreme Lord who, descending to the desire of Your devotees, has accepted a diversity of forms.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'When someone is merciful, causes no harm, is tolerant towards all embodied beings, is firmly anchored in the truth, an irreproachable soul, is equal-minded and helpful towards everyone; when someone is of an intelligence that is not disturbed by material desires, is of restraint, is soft-natured, pure-hearted, non-possessive, not worldly, eats little, is peaceful, steady, has Me for his shelter and is thoughtful; when someone is vigilant, a profound soul, of a firm resolve, has conquered the shath-guna [different forms of material misery], offers respect, inspires, is friendly, compassionate and learned; when someone knows the qualities and shortcomings as taught by Me, and, worshipping Me, is even willing to give up all his religious preferences [see also B.G. 18: 66], he belongs to the best of the truthful ones [see also 5.18: 12, B.G. 12: 13-20]. Whether someone knows Me like this or not, knows who I am or how I exist, when he is exclusively devoted to Me, I count him among the best devotees. 4-4 Seeing, touching and worshipping My appearance in this world, My devotees render personal service and offer prayers of glorification and obeisance, to which they regularly sing about My qualities and activities. Hearing the topics about Me they always with faith meditate upon Me, oh Uddhava, and offer as servants in full surrender all that they acquire. Discussing My birth and activities they take great delight in engaging with musical instruments and songs and dance, with discussions and festivals in My sacred houses. Sacrificing at all celebrations and annual festivities as mentioned in the Vedic literatures and their tantras, they observe vows and are of initiation in relation to Me. With faithfully installing My deity they endeavor, for themselves as also for others, by working for flower gardens, orchards, playgrounds, cities and temples. Sincere as servants they serve Me by thoroughly cleaning and dusting the house [the temple], washing it with water [and cow-dung, see also 10.6: 20*], sprinkling it with scented water and making mandalas. Modestly without pride, not advertising their devotional service they not even use for themselves the light of the lamps presented to Me and offer Me articles most dear to them or most desirable in the material world. With that kind of offering one qualifies for immortality.'

The sun, the fire, the brahmins, the cows, the Vaishnavas, the sky, the wind, the water, the earth, the self and all living beings, My dearest, constitute the places of My worship. 3-4 In the sun one can find Me by offering selected verses from the three Vedas [see also the Gayatri and the Surya-namskar]. In fire one finds Me with oblations of ghee. One can find Me as the best among the scholars when one worships Me by offering them hospitality. With the cows, My dear, you reach Me by means of offerings of grass and such. One finds Me in the Vaishnavas by honouring them with loving friendship. I am found in the sky [of one's inner space] when one is fixed in meditation in the heart. In the air one finds Me by considering it the most important [life giving principle of prana, by means of pranayama see B.G. 4: 29]. In water one can find Me by using articles of worship together with water [see B.G. 9: 26]. In the earth [one finds Me] with confidential mantras and within the self one can find Me by offering food to the embodied soul [see e.g. Prasada sevaya and Bhoga arati]. One may worship Me as the knower of the field in all living beings [see Paramatma and B.G. 13: 3] by seeing Me as equally present everywhere [see niyama]. Peacefully being absorbed in Me thus meditating these different places, one should be of worship for My transcendental form that is equipped with the conch shell, the disc, the club and the lotus flower [see picture]. Someone who with his mind fixed on Me thus worships Me with sacrificial performances and pious works [as mentioned], obtains loving service unto Me and has My remembrance [of realised knowledge] because of his fine service [see also B.G. 5: 29].

Oh Uddhava, apart from the bhakti-yoga realised through association with My devotees, there are no means that actually work, for I am the path of life, the refuge, for the ones of virtue [see also 4.31: 12]. And now oh child of the Yadus, I will speak to you, who are willing to listen, even about the most confidential supreme secret [of intimate association with Me], for you are My servant, well-wisher and friend [compare B.G. 18: 63 & 68].'

*: The parampara adds: 'The Supreme Personality of Godhead is not different from His potencies, yet He is always above them as the supreme controller.... Liberation means that the living entity should transfer himself to the spiritual potency of the Lord, which can be divided into three categories - hladini, the potency of bliss; sandhini, the potency of eternal existence; and samviti, the potency of omniscience.' This is another formulation of the divine in terms of sat-cit-ananda; Krishna as being eternity, consciousness and bliss.

: Quoting from the Viveka, Shрила Madhvacarya states that nanatva-bhramam, the mistake to the material diversity, indicates the following illusions: considering the living entity to be the Supreme; considering all living entities to be ultimately one entity without separate individuality; considering that there are many Gods [independent of one another, see 5.18: 12]; thinking that Krishna is not God [is not personal as well as impersonal the complete whole, vasudeva sarvam iti, B.G. 7: 19]; and considering that the material universe [the impersonal nature] is the ultimate reality [see also 1.2: 11]. All these illusions are together fought by chanting the Mahamantra or attending to the other bhajans for two hours a day.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 12:

The Confidential Secret Beyond Renunciation and Knowledge

The Supreme Lord said: 'One does not ascend to Me by mysticism or analysis, common piety or the study of the scriptures, by penances, renunciation, pious works or charity, by respecting vows, ceremonies, Vedic hymns, pilgrimage, by general discipline or the basic rules. One rather closes Me in one's heart by the sat-sanga with My devotees [see 11.11: 25] that drives away all attachment to sense gratification. - By associating with My devotees many living beings in every age achieved My refuge like the sons of Diti, the malicious ones, the animals, the birds, the singers and dancers of heaven, the ones of excellence and of perfection, the venerable souls and the treasure keepers, the scientific ones among the humans and the merchants, labourers and women, the uncivilised ones and the ones of passion and slowness. So also did Vritrasura, the son of Kayadhu [Prahlada, see 6.18: 12-13] and others like them, Vrishaparva [see 9.18: 26], Bali, Bana, Maya as also Vibhishana [brother of Ravana], Sugriva [leader of the Vanaras] and Hanuman, Jambavan, Gajendra, Jathayu, Tuladhara, Dharmavyadha, Kubja and the gopis in Vraja, the wives of the brahmins [see 10.23] and others. Not having studied the sacred scriptures, nor having worshiped the great saints, they, without vows and not having undergone austerities, attained Me by association with My devotees. - Only by unalloyed love indeed the gopis, just as others of a limited intelligence like the cows, the immobile creatures, the snakes [like Kaliya] and more animals, managed to achieve perfection and quite easily attained Me, I who cannot even be reached by greatly endeavoring in yoga, analysis, charity, vows, penances, ritualistic sacrifices, exegesis, personal study or taking to the renounced order. When Akura took Me and Balarama to Mathura they, [the inhabitants of Vrindavana] whose hearts were attached [to Me] with the deepest love, suffered greatly because of the separation as they saw no one else to make them happy [see 10: 39]. All the nights they in Vrindavana spent with Me, their most dearly Beloved oh Uddhava, seemed to take but a moment to them, but again bereft of Me they became as long as a kalpa. Just as sages fully absorbed lose the awareness of names and forms - like they are rivers entering the water of the ocean - also they whose consciousness was intimately bound to Me had no awareness anymore of their bodies, their present or their future [see also B.G. 2: 70]. The hundreds and thousands [of women] who desired Me as their friend and lover, had no knowledge of My actual position and attained Me by associating with Me, the Absolute Supreme Truth. 4-1 Therefore oh Uddhava give up the [religious] precepts and prohibitions, denial and routines and what you should listen to and have listened to. Choose for Me alone, the actual shelter of the Soul within all embodied beings. With that exclusive devotion you will enjoy My mercy and have nothing to fear from any side [compare B.g. 18: 66].'

Shri Uddhava said: 'Hearing Your words, oh master of all yoga masters, has not dispelled the doubt in my heart that is clouding my mind.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'He, the living being in person [the Lord], is manifest within along with the prana. He after all entered the heart and has His place in the subtle sound vibration that fills the mind with the grosser form of the [word sounds that are] different intonations of short and long vowels and consonants. Just as fire confined within wood, with the help of air, kindled by friction is born very tiny and increases with ghee, I similarly manifest Myself in this [Vedic, inner] voice. Speech, the function of the hands and legs, the genitals and the anus [the karmendriyas], smell, taste, sight, touch and hearing [the jnanendriyas] and the functions of one's determination, wisdom and self concern [for 'mind, intelligence and false ego'] as also the primary cause of matter

[pradhana or the 'thread', see 11.9: 19] and [the gunas] rajas, tamas and sattva, are thus [to be understood as] transformations [of My nature]. This living entity, one and unmanifest, that is concerned with the threefold [nature of the gunas], constitutes the source of the lotus of creation. He who is eternal, in the course of time divided [therewith] His potencies in many divisions, just like seeds do that fell on fertile soil. The complete of this universe, expanding long and wide like cloth expanding along the threads of its warp and woof, is situated in Him [on His thread, see also 6.3: 12 and B.G. 7: 7]. Since time immemorial there is this tree of material existence [samsara] that, blossoming and producing fruits, is naturally inclined to fruitive action [or karma]. 2-2 Of this tree extending in the sun there are two seeds [sin and piety], hundreds of roots [the living entities], three lower trunks [the modes], five upper trunks [the elements], five saps produced [sound, form, touch, taste and aroma], eleven branches [the mind and the ten indriyas], two birds having a nest [jiva and atma], three types of bark [air, bile and mucus] and two fruits [happiness and distress]. Those who fervently desiring live a household life [the 'vultures'] enjoy one fruit of the tree [that of sin], whereas the other fruit [of piety] is enjoyed by the swanlike [sages] who live in the forest. He who with the help of the worshipable ones [the devotees, the gurus] knows the Oneness of Him who by dint of His maya appears in many forms, knows the [factual meaning of] the Vedas. The sober soul who thus with unalloyed devotion honours the spiritual master and with the axe of knowledge cuts with the subtle body of attachment entertained by the individual soul, attains with the greatest care [living spiritually] the Supreme Soul and then abandons the means [by which he attained, see also B.G. 15: 3-4].'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 13:

The Hamsa-avatara Answers the Questions of the Sons of Brahma

The Supreme Lord said: 'The goodness, passion and ignorance we know from the gunas are matters of the mind and not of the soul; with goodness the other two can be counteracted while goodness itself is controlled by character and good sense [*]. The goodness of someone leads to and strengthens the dharma that is characterised by devotional service unto Me. That what belongs to the mode of goodness [like nature, consciousness, courage and wisdom] will result in [bhagavata]-dharma when one seriously cultivates [its] inner strength. When goodness increases and dominates, dharma puts an end to passion and ignorance. When they are superseded the godlessness [adhama] that is the root of the two, is quickly vanquished. The doctrine [followed], [the way one deals with] water, the people [one associates with], one's surroundings and [the way one behaves with] time, one's [occupational] activities, one's birth [or social background], as also [the type of] meditation, mantras and purificatory rites [one respects] are the ten [factors] determining the [prominence of a particular] mode. That what of these matters belongs to the mode of goodness is appreciated by the classical sages, that what belongs to the mode of ignorance they criticize and that what belongs to the mode of passion they are neutral about. As long as there is no self-realisation [self-remembrance] making amends [for the influence of the modes], a person should cultivate the things belonging to the mode of goodness so that the character develops from which the religiousness rises that leads to spiritual insight. Just as fire, that in a forest of bamboos was generated by friction of the stalks, pacifies after having burned [see also 1.10: 2, 3.1: 21], also the activity of the material body [and the mind] will pacify that was generated by the interaction of the natural modes.'

Shri Uddhava said: 'Mortals generally are very well known with the fact that sense gratification is a source of trouble, but they nevertheless delight in it, oh Krishna. How can it be that they willingly behave like dogs, asses and goats?'

-1 The Supreme Lord said: 'It is because a fool has another intelligence in his I-awareness. Not paying attention [to his dharma] a terrible passion arises in his heart that leads his mind astray. Bound to that passion the mind thus convinced imagines all kinds of things. Focussed on the qualities of nature [the gunas] he is thus beset with desires that make his life unbearable. With the senses not under control someone, bewildered by the force of passion and under the sway of desires, engages in fruitive activities, despite being well aware of the resulting unhappiness. Even though [also] the intelligence of a learned person gets bewildered by passion and ignorance, no attachment arises in him because he, well aware of the contamination, carefully puts his mind back on the right track. When one has conquered the breathing process [pranayama] and has mastered the sitting postures [asana], one should attentively, step by step, without slackening gather one's mind by concentrating on Me at appointed times [to the positions of the sun and the moon, see B.G. 7: 8 and 5: 26-28]. The yoga system as instructed by My pupils under the lead of Sanaka [the Kumaras] boils down to the following: turn the mind away from everything and directly find absorption in Me the way it should [with mantras, see also 8.3: 22-24].'

Shri Uddhava said: 'When and in what form dear Kes'ava, have You instructed Sanaka and the others in this yoga? That is what I would like to know.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'The sons headed by Sanaka who took their birth from the mind of him who originated from the golden egg [Hiranyagarbha or Brahma], inquired of their father about the so very subtle, supreme goal of the science of yoga. Sanaka and the others said to him: 'The mind is directed at the gunas, the qualities of nature, and the gunas impose themselves on the mind. Oh Master, what is for someone who desires liberation, for someone who wishes to cross over this material ocean, the process of breaking away from that mutual effect [see also B.G. 2: 62-63]?'

The Supreme Lord said: 'The great self-born godhead, the creator of all beings, thus being questioned, seriously pondered over what was asked but could not find the words to describe the essential truth, for his mind was bewildered because of his creative labour [see also 2.6: 34, 2.9: 32-37 and 10: 13]. With the desire to find closure he remembered Me, the original godhead [he originated from, see 3.8], and at that time I became visible in My Hamsa form [the Swan*]. Seeing Me they, headed by Brahma, approached Me, offered their obeisances at My lotus feet and asked: 'Who are You?' Thus being questioned by the sages interested in the ultimate truth, I spoke to them. Please Uddhava, hear now what I said to them that moment. 'Oh brahmins, if you with that question mean to say that, relating to the one true essence, there would be no difference between our individual souls, how then would you be able to pose a question like this, oh sages, or how could I as a speaker then be of any authority [or constitute a refuge]? Also if you would refer to the five elements our bodies are equally composed of, your question about who I am would in fact be a meaningless gesture of words. That what by the mind, speech, sight and the other senses is grasped, is what I am. There is really nothing that exists outside of Me, that is what you have to understand clearly. The mind is directed at the gunas and the gunas impose themselves upon the mind dear men, but to the living entity of which I am the Soul, both the mind and the gunas are outer appearances. With the mind directed at the natural qualities and the qualities that, imposing themselves by stimulating the senses, constantly put the mind at work, the one who is of [realisation with] My transcendental [Hamsa] form, [through meditation] must give up both the mind and the [operation of the] gunas [see also vritti and neti neti]. Wakefulness, dreaming and deep sleep are the transformations of the mind due to the modes of nature. The individual soul is, with characteristics different from them, known to be their witness [see also 7.7: 25 and B.G. 7: 5]. The materially motivated intelligence constitutes the bondage that keeps the soul occupied with the modes of nature, but when one is situated in Me, in the fourth state of consciousness [turiya], one at that moment can give up both the mind and the sense objects [see 11.3: 35]. The bondage of the soul as a result of identifying oneself with the body [of false ego], constitutes the opposite purpose. A soul of knowledge who detached in samsara is situated in the fourth state, gives up the anxiety [about those ego-matters]. As long as a person is convinced of many different purposes and does not desist [from that engagement] by means of meditation, he, even though awake, will be sleeping with his eyes open, just as unaware as someone who sees something in a dream [see also B.G. 2: 41]. The states of existence apart from the Supreme Soul are insentient because of the separation created by them: to the seer who is filled with motives and objectives they are just as deluding as what one experiences in a dream. In the waking state he enjoys the qualities of the external matters at the moment. In his dreams he undergoes with all his senses a similar experience in the mind. In deep sleep he withdraws himself completely. But being one in his remembrance [in turiya] he, as a witness of the functioning of the three successive states of consciousness, becomes lord and master over his senses [see also 4.29: 60-79 and B.G. 15: 7-8]. After considering the three states of consciousness that originate from the modes of My nature, My deluding potency, then be resolute about the purpose [of realizing Me as the fourth state] and cut in your heart with the cause of all doubts [the ahankara] by means of the sword of discrimination sharpened by the logic and instructions concerning the truth. Regard this delusional state of mind, [with images] popping up today and gone tomorrow, as the most restless sphere of a firebrand. The one spiritual soul deceptively appears in many divisions as an illusion, a threefold dream of variations operated by the guna creation [see also B.G. 9: 15, 15: 16, linga and siddhanta]. When you turn your eye away from that [creation] and become silent with your desires ended, you [in meditation] must arrive at the realisation of your [actual] happiness. And in case you happen to be [full of thoughts] about this earth, you have to understand that that is insubstantial. That what one gives up one will remember till the end of one's life and will not confuse one again. Just as someone blurred by liquor is indifferent about the clothes he put on, it makes no difference to the one of perfection whether his perishable body sits or stands, or whether he by providence leaves this earth or obtains [a new body], for he reached his original position [of service, his svarupa]. The body will as long as its karma, its chain of fruitive actions, lasts, continue with the breathing it took up as ordained by fate. But having awakened to his original position someone highly situated in the absorption of yoga will no longer cultivate any such [ego driven] dreaming and appear as such. Oh learned souls, understand that with this explanation about the confidential, analytical knowledge of yoga, the science of uniting one's consciousness, I have come to you as Yajna [Vishnu, the Lord of Sacrifice] with the desire to describe the dharma of persons like you. Oh best of the twice-born souls, I am the Supreme Way of yoga, of analysis, of the truth and the sacred law as also the [ultimate] path of [all] beauty, fame and self-control. All the excellence such as being transcendently situated, being free from expectations, being the Well-wisher, the Dearest One, the True Self, the One Equal, the detachment and so on, belongs, for being free from the natural modes, to My honour.'

[Krishna said to Uddhava: I thus put an end to the doubts of the sages headed by Sanaka. Honouring Me with transcendental devotion, they with beautiful hymns chanted My glories. Perfectly worshiped and glorified by the greatest among the sages I thereupon, before the eyes of Brahma, returned to My abode.]

*: In Sanskrit the term sattva, is, apart from meaning goodness, inner strength, good sense and true nature, another word for character. Character, moral backbone, is also described as Shila or svarupa; 'form, piety, morality, habit or custom' or 'one's own form, one's true nature' or one's constitutional position of relating to Krishna as Svami Prabhupada preferred to speak of.

: The parampara comment here says: "Harisa means 'swan', and the specific ability of the swan is to separate a mixture of milk and water, extracting the rich, milky portion. Similarly, Lord Krishna appeared as Hamsa, or the swan, in order to separate the pure consciousness of Lord Brahma from the modes of material nature."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 14:

The Devotional Coherence of the Methods and the Meditation on Vishnu

Shri Uddhava said: 'Krishna, the defenders of the Absolute Truth speak of many processes for spiritual advancement, are they supreme in their combination or would one of them be the most important? You stated clearly, oh Master, that the yoga of devotion by which the mind gets fixed upon You, practiced free from desires, removes all material attachment.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'This message known as the Vedas that concerns the dharma that is founded on Me, was lost at the time of the universal annihilation [pralaya], but was by Me at the beginning [of a new era] spoken to Brahma [see also 3.9: 29-43]. Brahma spoke this to his eldest son Manu and the seven great sages headed by Bhrgu in their turn accepted it from Manu [see 8.1 & 8.13 and B.G. 4: 1-3]. - From these forefathers, there were the following descendants: the godly and the demonic souls, the Shiva followers, the human beings, the perfected ones and the singers of heaven, the scientists and the venerable souls. From [different combinations of] rajas, tamas and sattva [the gunas] generated the many different natures of the different humanoid [Kimdevas], the half-humans [Kinnaras], the snake-like types [Nagas], the wild men [Rakshasas] and the ape-like souls [Kimpurushas]. From all these living entities who by their propensities are divided in many types and just as many leaders, flowed [like rivers from a mountain] the diversity of rituals and mantras. Due to this great variety of natures the philosophies of life are thus divided among the human beings. Some of those philosophies in this constitute traditions of disciplic succession while others are heretical [pashanda]. The people whose intelligence is bewildered by My illusory power, oh best of all persons, express themselves in countless ways about what according to their karma and taste would be better. Some people speak in favor of pious activities while others speak of fame, sense gratification, truthfulness, self-control and peacefulness. Some propound self-interest, political influence, renunciation or consumption and others defend sacrifice, penance, charity, vows and arrangements of do's and don'ts [yama-niyama]. With inevitably a beginning and an end to the meager ends gained with one's karma, there is the prospect of misery as a consequence; situated in ignorance one is doomed to a miserable existence full of complaints. Someone who has fixed his consciousness on Me oh man of learning, and in every respect is free from material desires, knows the happiness of My spiritual Self. How can such a happiness ever be attained by those who are attached to worldly affairs [see 4.31: 12]? He who does not desire, who is of peace and controls his senses, whose consciousness is equal whatever the circumstances and who has a mind that is completely satisfied with Me, is filled with happiness wherever he goes. A soul fixed in Me, wants Me and nothing else. He does not desire the position of Brahma, nor the position of Indra. He neither wants an empire on earth nor a sovereign position in the lower worlds, he does not desire the perfections [the siddhis] of yoga or a second birth [see e.g. 5.1: 6]. Neither the one born from My body [Brahma], nor Shankara [Shiva], Sankarshana [Balarama], the Goddess of Fortune [Shri] or even My own Self is as dear to Me as you [see also B.G. 12: 20]. The sage [the devotee] who without personal desire is of peace, who is not inimical to anyone and of an equal vision, I always follow closely so that there is purification by the dust of the lotus feet [see also 7.14: 17]. The great souls who not eager for sense gratification are of a mind that is constantly attached to Me, who are of inner peace, who care for all individual souls and whose consciousness is not ruled by lusts, experience My happiness that can only be known by complete independence. Despite being harassed by sensual desires, a devotee of Mine who did not conquer his strong senses, by dint of his devotion will not be defeated thereby [see also 1.5: 17, 8.7: 44, 11.13: 12 and B.G. 9: 30, 2: 62-64]. Just as firewood because of the blazing flames of a fire turns into ashes, devotion with Me as the object burns the [consequences of one's] sins completely oh Uddhava. The yoga system, analytical philosophy, pious activities, Vedic study, austerity and renunciation, oh Uddhava, do not keep Me as satisfied as a well developed devotional service unto Me. One obtains Me by single-minded devotion with faith in the Supreme Soul, the object of love of the devotees. Devotional service directed at Me will even purify someone who has eaten dogs. Neither dharma accompanied by truthfulness and mercy, nor knowledge linked to austerity will purify one's consciousness fully when bereft of devotional service unto Me. How can without bhakti one's hair stand on end, without loving service the heart melt, without devotion the tears flow, the bliss be and one's heart be purified? The universe is purified by the one whose voice chokes up, whose heart melts, who cries again and again, sometimes laughs, is ashamed, loudly sings and dances in the connectedness of My bhakti [see also Shri Shri Shikshashthaka and 11.2: 40]. Just like gold being molten in fire gives up impurities and returns to its original state, also the contamination of karma is removed from the spirit soul when one worships Me united in My loving service. Even as the power to see restores once the eye is treated with ointment, the spirit soul again sees the One Subtle Essence once being cleansed by hearing and chanting My pious narrations. Just as the intelligence of someone meditating the objects of the senses is entangled in the sense experience [see B.G. 2: 62-63], one's thought becomes dissolved in Me when one keeps thinking of Me. One's material considerations are therefore like the figments of a dream; [having awakened being] absorbed in Me one forsakes them. The mind is purified when one is completely absorbed in My love. Giving up being intimate with women and keeping far from those attached to uniting sexually, one should [thus free from being physically identified] composed sit at ease in seclusion and with great care concentrate on Me [see also 11.8: 13-14 *]. No other attachment brings a man as much suffering and bondage as the attachment to women and the association with those who are attached to women [see also 1.4: 25, 5.5: 2, 5.13: 16, 6.9: 9, 7.12: 9, 9.14: 36, 9.19: 17, 10.10: 8, 10.51: 51, 10.60: 44-45 & 48].

Shri Uddhava said: 'Oh Lotus-eyed One, how should one meditate on You when one desires liberation, in what way and on what form? Please, can You speak to me about meditation?'

The Supreme Lord said: 'Sitting straight and comfortably on a seat at the level of the floor, one should place one's hands in one's lap and focus one's eyes on the tip of one's nose. Then one should clear the path of one's prana, one's vital air, step by step exercising inhaling, retaining and exhaling and the other way around - while controlling one's senses [, see pranayama, and B.G. 4: 29]. With the help of one's life breath [prana] one should, like through the fibre of a lotus stalk, guide upwards the sound AUM in the heart to vibrate it continuously like a ringing bell so as to reunite the [15 after] sounds of recitation [in the nose, anusvara ]. The life breath must thus joined with the Pranava [see also 9.14: 46] be practiced ten times, at sunrise, noon and sunset. After one month one will then be in control of one's vital air [4]. 6-4 With one's eyes half closed one should, alert and with one's face lifted, concentrate on the lotus within the heart that is directed upwards. Within the whorl of its eight petals one should one after the other picture the sun, the moon and the fire. Within the fire one should consider My harmonious form so auspicious for meditation, that is gentle, cheerful and endowed with four beautiful arms. The neck and the forehead are of a charming beauty as also the pure smile and the ears with the glowing shark shaped earrings. One should meditate on the golden dress, the complexion with the colour of a rain cloud, the curl on the chest where the goddess resides, the conch and the disc, the club and the lotus as also on the beauty of the forest flower garland. One should also meditate upon all the beautiful and charming parts of My body: the feet with their shining bells, the richly glowing Kaustubha gem, the shining crown and bracelets, the girdle and armlets, the merciful smile and the delicate glance. By turning the mind away from the senses and their sense objects one thus with intelligence should lead the charioteer of one's thinking [the soul, the master of intelligence], sober and grave, [with love] in the direction of My completeness. One's consciousness spread over all of this, then must be withdrawn to one point by focussing on the wonderful smile of the face and no longer regarding other parts. Thus being established one should withdraw one's consciousness by meditating on the ether. Also forsaking that, one next must ascend to Me and not think of anything else anymore. With one's consciousness thus fully absorbed, the individual soul sees Me in the self and all selves in Me, the same way the rays of the sun are united in the sun [see also B.G. 9: 29]. The deluded state of considering oneself the owner, the knower and the doer, will all together soon find its dissolution in the mind of the yogi who most concentrated practices the meditation as mentioned [compare: 2.2: 8-14].'

*: Not to have this verse misinterpreted with the Sanskrit word sangam that one would have to shun association with women in stead of shunning being intimate with them, was by Svami Prabhupada stressed - contrary to the tradition in India - that women and men can very well associate both living within one temple or household within the culture of Krishna consciousness. This was one of his great feats of reform to the lead of a traditional temple tradition that was negative about living together with women. Nor must from this verse be concluded that one should not be intimate with women, for procreation would stop then and the human race would end. It is all about not getting attached that way by proper regulation of kama as a basic civil virtue or purushartha. One should, preferably being married, always be prepared - at times - to give up the intimacy with each other and embrace celibacy, the same way as one should always be prepared - at times - to engage in intimacy and embrace each other in Krishna's love for and from women.

: The reversal technique of pranayama as described here practically could mean that one pauses halfway inhaling and exhaling. This is unusual, one normally inhales, pauses and exhales following the natural flow of breath. To meditate normally and still follow this advise, one can also shift the attention from starting with inhaling to starting with exhaling one's breath, and reverse the process this way.

: When one is culturally not of a regular mantra practice of reciting Sanskrit and thus does not have any anusvara, nasal vibration to integrate, it is the advise for this Age of Quarrel to practice the Mahamantra to appease the mind so wayward with modern time: hare Krishna, hare Krishna, Krishna Krishna, hare hare, hare Rama, hare Rama, Rama Rama, hare hare.

*4: Considering the greatly variable length of day worldwide it is customary to do this at the fixed times of the regular hours of a [meditation-]clock preferably set to the sun at twelve when the sun goes through the south [see also cakra].

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 15:

Mystical Perfection: the Siddhis

The Supreme Lord said: 'When a yogi is connected [in the Absolute Truth], has conquered his senses and breathing and has fixed his attention upon Me, the mystical perfections of yoga are at his disposal.'

Uddhava said: 'Oh You who bring all yogis perfection, kindly tell me which method is required for concentration and how these perfections work. And, Acyuta, how many perfections are there?'

The Supreme Lord said: 'The masters of yoga speak of eighteen mystical perfections [siddhis] and meditations [leading to them]. Eight of them are [primary and] prominent in Me and ten of them [are secondary and] originate from the quality [of goodness]. - Oh gentle one, the eight mystical perfections consist of the ability to get, as for the form, into the smallest [animal], the biggest [mahima] or the lightest [laghima relative to garima, the heaviest], the ability to acquire whatever material object [prapti], the ability to enjoy sensually whatever can be seen or heard [prakamya], the ability to have the upper hand in employing the forces [is'ita or is'itva], the ability to be in control by means of magic unobstructed by the modes [vas'itva] and the ability to answer to any desire that seeks [His] favor [kamasayasita]. Know them to be the ones prominent in Me. - [The ten secondary siddhis consist of] the ability in this body not to be plagued by hunger and thirst and such, the ability to hear from afar, the ability to see things far away, the ability to be transported with the speed of mind, the ability to assume any form at will, the ability to enter into the bodies of others, the ability to die at will, the ability to witness the sporting [of the heavenly girls] with the gods, the ability to be of perfect accomplishment as one likes and the ability to have one's commands fulfilled unimpeded. - To know the past, the present and the future, to be free from the dualities, to know the minds of others, to check the potency of fire, the sun, water, poison and so on and not to be conquered by others are examples of the perfections that are described as being the result of concentrating in yoga. Please learn now from Me by means of which type of meditation what perfection occurs.

My worshiper who focusses his mind pertaining to the subtle elements of perception [tanmatra] on Me as the Self of those sense elements and nothing else, obtains the anima perfection [the ability to enter the smallest]. Focussing one's mind on the truth of the complete [the mahat-tattva] with Me as the inhabiting soul, one achieves the perfection of mahima [to enter the greatest] as also grip on each element separately. The yogi may obtain laghima [lightness] by attaching to Me as the supreme element of the smallest elements [the atoms], the subtle property of Time [see also cakra]. He who with his mind focussed upon Me narrows down the mind completely to the emotionality of the I-principle, obtains the siddhi of prapti [mystic acquisition] by which he becomes the proprietor of the senses of all living beings. In order to obtain from Me, whose appearance lies beyond perception, the super excellent siddhi of prakamya [to enjoy whatever whenever] one should fix one's mental activity on Me, the Supersoul that is the thread running through the huge reality of matter [see also sutra]. When one focusses one's consciousness on Vishnu, the Original Controller of the Three [gunas, see also B.G. 7: 13] who is the mover in the form of Time, one will obtain the siddhi of is'itva [the supremacy] by means of which the conditioned body [the field] and its knower can be controlled [*]. The yogi who fixes his mind on Me, Narayana, the fourth state [turiya] that is described by the word fortunate [bhagavat ], obtains, being endowed with My nature, the vas'itva perfection [the ability to subdue by means of magic]. When one focusses one's mind, that is pure in Me, on the impersonal absolute [brahman] that is free from material qualities [or transcendental], one obtains the supreme of happiness wherein one's desire finds its complete fulfillment [kamasayasita].

When a human being concentrates on Me as the Lord of Shvetadvipa, the personification of goodness, the sum total of dharma, he obtains a pure existence free from the six waves [of material disturbance: hunger, thirst, bewilderment, decay, grief and death, anurmi-mattvam see also shath-urmi]. When one in the mind leads away the transcendental sound that is present in the prana [see 11.14: 35], in Me, the personification of the sky, one perceives therein the Swan [Lord Hamsa or the saintly person, see 11.13: 19] and hears the words spoken by all living beings [dura-s'avana, see also divyam Shrotam]. When one merges one's eyes with the sun and the sun with one's eyes [doing so transcendentially and not staring physically into the sun] one can, with one's mind in meditation on Me, therein see anything that is far away [dura-dars'ana, see also 2.1: 30]. When one fully absorbs one's mind in Me, the body, by the power of the meditation on Me, that mind follows together with the breath; the self then moves wherever the mind goes [manojaya]. Because it lies within the power of My yoga [to appear in different forms], for the mind intent on assuming whatever form, the very form that was desired will appear, when I am the shelter [kamarupa]. When a perfected yogi [a siddha] wishes to enter the body of another person, he must give up his own gross body and project himself into that body. That he should accomplish by, like being the wind, entering it through the vital breath, the way a bee switches flowers [para-kaya-pravesanam]. When [a yogi is about to die and] wants to give up the material body, he blocks his anus with his heel and carries his prana from the heart up to the chest and from there to the throat to go to the head, from where he, rising to the spiritual seat at the top of the skull [the brahma-randhrena], leads himself to the spiritual world [svacchandu-mrityu, see also 2.2: 19-21]. When one desires to enjoy the pleasure gardens of the demigods one should meditate upon the mode of goodness situated in Me, so that one sees the by goodness moved women of the demigods arrive in their vehicles [their vimanas, devanam saha-kriandanuarsanam]. When someone by means of his reason became convinced of My truth or else by his devotion unto Me, he with his mind thus absorbed consequently will achieve his purpose [yatha-sankalpa-samsiddhi]. The person who arrived at the realisation of My nature, supremacy and dominion, is someone who by no means can be frustrated because his order and command are as good as Mine [ajnapatihata gatih, see also B.G. 9: 31].

A yogi pure of character who by dint of his devotion unto Me knows how to focus his mind [dharana] acquires insight in the three phases of time [past, present and future] supported by knowledge of birth and death [see tri-kalika]. Of a sage versed in uniting consciousness whose mind was pacified in My yoga the body cannot be injured by fire and so on, just as aquatics cannot be harmed by the water in which they live [see also 7.5: 33-50]. He [my devotee] becomes unconquerable when he meditates upon My expansions that are decorated with the Shrivatsa and the weapons, flags, ceremonial umbrellas and different fans [see also B.G. 11: 32].

The man of wisdom who worships Me thus by the process of concentrating in yoga, will in every respect be attended by the mystical perfections as described. What perfection would be difficult to achieve for a sage who being focussed by meditation on Me subjugated his senses, his breathing and his mind? One says [though] that they [these siddhis], for the one who practices the highest form of yoga - the [bhakti] yoga by means of which one obtains everything thinkable from Me - are a hindrance and a waste of time. All perfections one in this world may acquire by birth, by herbs, austerities and by mantras are all obtained by the practice of [bhakti] yoga. Progress in uniting one's consciousness cannot be achieved by any other method []. I am the cause and the protector of all the perfections. I am the Lord of Yoga [the final union], the Lord of analysis, of dharma and of the [Vedic] teachers, propounders and adherents. The same way material elements have their existence inside and outside the living beings, I Myself, the Soul, who cannot be enclosed, exist inside and outside of all the embodied beings [see also B.G. 2: 29-30].

*: Verse 15 refers to attainment of spiritual perfection by meditation on the personal, transcendental aspect of time of Vishnu, as opposed to meditating time as mentioned in verse 12, relating more to the impersonal aspect of the natural order belonging to the elements, of the cakra that is Vishnu's weapon.

 : Apart from the three gunas to Lord Narayana and the three states of consciousness of waking, dreaming and dreamless sleep, there is also mention of the three planes of existence of the physical gross of the greater universe consisting of the five elements; the astral, subtle, plane of the ten senses of action and perception and their objects, the mind and intelligence, and the causal plane of the consciousness and the knower; in short: the world, the sensual body and the individual knower to which there is the Original Person of God as the fourth [see also B.G. 13: 19].

: The actual perfection of yoga is, following verse 35 coming next, named Krishna consciousness by the Vaishnavas who defend the Bhagavatam in the West.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 16: The Lord's Opulence

Shri Uddhava said: 'You are the Supreme Spirit in person, not restrained and without a beginning and an end. You are the [true] protector and the maintenance, destruction and creation of all that exists. Oh Supreme Lord, for souls lacking in self-control being hard to understand, the brahmin knowers worship Your presence within both the superior and the inferior entities of creation. The great sages achieve perfection by worshiping You with devotion for this and that form. Please speak to me about these forms. Oh Maintainer of All Beings, not being visible You are engaged as the Very Soul of the living beings. You see them while they, bewildered by You[r external reality], do not see You. And, please, oh greatest Might, explain to me what all the potencies are that You manifest in all directions on earth, in heaven and in hell. I offer my obeisances at Your lotus feet, the abode of all holy places.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'This question, oh best of all questioners, was at the time of the destruction posed by Arjuna who desired to fight his rivals [at Kurukshetra, see B.G. 2: 54, 13: 1-2, 14: 21, 18: 1]. Aware of the fact that the killing of his relatives for the sake of sovereignty was an irreligious, abominable act, he desisted and said in a worldly mind: 'Having them killed I would be the killer' [B.G. 1: 37-45, compare 2: 19]. That tiger among men, asked Me just before the battle took place questions like you did and was then by Me instructed with the needed arguments.

I am the Supersoul of these living entities, oh Uddhava, their Well-wisher and Lord and Master; I am the maintenance, creation and annihilation of all living beings. I am the goal of those who seek progress, the Time of those who exert control, I am the equilibrium of the modes of nature as also the virtue of those endowed with good qualities. I am the thread [the rule, sutra] of everything composed of the gunas. I am the totality of all great things, among that what is subtle I am the spirit soul and of all things that are difficult to conquer I am the mind. I am Hiranyagarbha [Brahma, the original teacher] of the Vedas, among the mantras I am the three-lettered Omkara, of the letters I am the first one [the 'a'], and among the sacred metres I am the three-footed one [the Gayatri mantra]. Among all the gods I am Indra, among the Vasus I am Agni, among the sons of Aditi I am Vishnu [Vamana] and among the Rudras I am Nila-Lohita [the one coloured red-blue, Shiva, see also 3.12: 7]. I am Bhrigu among the brahmin sages, I am Manu among the saintly kings, among the demigod sages I am Narada and among the cows I am Kamadhenu [the cow of plenty]. Of the ones perfected in control I am Kapila, Garuda I am among the birds, Daksha among the founding fathers, and Aryama among the forefathers. Oh Uddhava know Me among the sons of Diti as Prahlada, the lord of the unenlightened souls, know Me as the [order of the] moon to the stars and the herbs, and as Kuvera, the lord of wealth among the Yakshas and Rakshasas. Among the lordly elephants I am Airavata, I am Varuna, the master of the aquatics, of all things that heat and illumine I am the sun, and among the human beings I am the master of the realm [the king]. Uchaisrava I am among the horses, among the metals I am gold, Yamaraja I am among those who exercise control and among the serpents I am Vasuki. Among the hooded snakes I am Anantadeva, among the beasts with teeth and horns I am the lion, among the social orders [the status-groups, the ashramas] I am the fourth order [the sannyasis] and among the vocations [the varnas] I am the first one [of the brahmins], oh sinless one. Among the holy rivers I am the Ganges, I am the ocean among the expanses of water, I am the bow among the weapons and among the wielders of the bow I am the destroyer of Tripura [Shiva]. I am Meru among the abodes, among the places that are inaccessible I am the Himalayas, among the trees I am the asvattha, and among the plants I am the ones bearing grains. Among the priests I am Vasistha, among those vowed to the Veda I am Brihaspati, Kartikeya [Skanda] I am among the military leaders and among the foremost [of spiritual leadership] I am the unborn, supreme lord [Brahma, the Creator]. Among the sacrifices I am the study of the Veda, among the vows I am the vow of nonviolence [vegetarianism], and among the purifiers fire, wind, sun, water, speech and soul I am the most pure [the Supersoul]. Of the [eight-fold] process of yoga I am the full opposition with the soul [the final stage of samadhi], to those desiring victory I am prudent counsel, I am the [metaphysical] logic of all discrimination [of distinguishing between spirit and matter], and for the speculative [opinionated, reputed] philosophers I am the diversity of views [shad-dars'ana]. Among the ladies I am Shatarupa [wife of Manu, see 3.12: 54] and among the men I am Svayambhuva Manu. Among the sages I am sage Narayana [see 10.87: 4] and among the celibates I am Sanat-kumara. Among the principles of religion I am renunciation, of all things basic I am the inner awareness, of the secrecy I am the friendliness and the silence, and of the sexual couples I am the unborn one [Brahma, the original father]. Of that what constitutes a stable vision I am the solar year, of the seasons I am spring, among the months I am Margasirsha [November-December] and of the lunar mansions [the twenty-seven nakshatras] I am Abhijit. Among the yugas I am Satya-yuga, among the sober ones I am Devala and Asita, of the Vedic editors I am Dvaipayana [Vyasa] and among the scholars learned in spirituality I am Shukracarya. Among the ones named Bhagavan [the Supreme Lord] I am Vasudeva, among My devotees I am indeed you [Uddhava], among the ape-like souls I am Hanuman and among the scientists I am Sudars'ana. I am the ruby among the jewels, of all things beautiful I am the lotus cup, of all types of grass I am the kus'a grass and of the oblations I am the ghee of the cow. I am the wealth of those engaged in business, I am the gambling of the cheaters, I am the forgiveness of the tolerant and I am the character of the ones in the mode of goodness. I am the mental and physical strength of the strong. Please know that I am the [devotional] work performed by the devotees and that of My nine forms [nava murti] by which these Satvatras are worshiping Me, I am the Supreme Original Form [Vasudeva]. Among the singers of heaven I am Vis'vasvasu, and among the heavenly dancing girls I am Purvacitti. I am the steadiness of the mountains and the pure aroma of the earth. I am the supreme taste of water and of what is most brilliant I am the sun. I am the effulgence of the moon, the stars and the sun, and I am the transcendental sound vibration in the ether [see also 11.15: 19]. Among the ones devoted to the brahminical culture I am Bali, among the heroes I am Arjuna and I am the generation, stability and dissolution of all living beings. Of the potency of all senses I am the walking, speaking, evacuating, handling and enjoying [the karmendriyas] as also the touching, seeing, tasting, hearing and smelling [the jnanendriyas].

All this I enumerated - earth, air, sky, water and fire, the ego, the greater [principle, the intellect], the [additional eleven] transformations [the ten indriyas and the mind], the person, that what is unmanifest and the modes of rajasa, tamasa and sattva - stands together with the spiritual knowledge and the steady conviction [therewith] for Me, I the One Supreme. I, the Supreme Lord, the living entity, the [good] qualities and the possessor of the qualities, am the Soul of all; I am indeed everything, the one outside of whom nothing whatsoever exists. I who create the universes by the millions, may count their atoms after a certain time, but not so My opulences [compare 10.14: 7]. Whatever power, beauty, fame, dominion [see 11.15], humility, renunciation, enjoyment, fortune, strength, tolerance or wisdom one may find, all constitutes an integral part of Me. All these spiritual potencies I briefly described to you [see also B.G. 7, 9 and 10] are transformations that by the mind are put in corresponding words [in the scriptures, in the teachings]. [Therefore] control your mind, control your speech, control your breath and senses. Control yourself [through meditation] from within the soul so that you will never again stumble on the path of material existence. Of a transcendentalist who is not by meditation completely in control of his speech and mind, his vows, penance and charity will flow away like water from an unbaked pot. Someone devoted to Me should therefore control his words, mind and life air. With that intelligence thus connected in devotion unto Me he achieves his life's purpose.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 17:

The Varnashrama System and the Boat of Bhakti: the Students and the Householders

- Shri Uddhava said: 'Oh Lotus-eyed One, You previously described the religious principles of being devoted to You that are respected by all varnashrama followers and even by those who do not follow this system. Explain now to me how human beings by mindfully executing their occupational duties may arrive at devotional service unto You. - Dear Madhava, oh Mighty-armed One, in the past You in the form of Lord Hamsa approached Brahma about the religious principles by which one finds supreme happiness [11.13]. After having ruled for such a very long time oh Subduer of the Enemies, these principles that You have taught today, will not be common any longer in human society [see also 5.6: 10 and 11.5: 36 and Kali-yuga]. - Dear Acyuta, there is no speaker, creator and protector of dharma other than You; not on earth and not even in the assembly of Brahma where You are present in a partial manifestation of Yours [viz. the Vedas, see also 10.87]. When the earth is abandoned by Your lordship, oh Madhusudana, oh Creator, Protector and Speaker, who then oh Lord, will speak about the [knowledge that was] lost? Please describe therefore to me oh Master, oh Knower of All Dharma, who would qualify to observe the original duties that are characterised by devotion unto You and how does one perform them?'

Shri Shuka said: 'He, the Supreme Lord Hari, thus being questioned by the best of His devotees was pleased and then spoke, for the sake of the welfare of all conditioned souls, about the eternal duties of dharma. The Supreme Lord said: 'This question of yours is one faithful to the dharma, it leads man to beatitude. Please, Uddhava, learn from Me about these forms of good [varnashrama] conduct concerning the societal status [ashrama] and vocation [varna]. In the beginning in Satya-yuga there was [only] one class of human beings and they were called hamsa [swan]. The citizens of that age were by birth well known with the duties to be performed - hence the scholars know that age as Krita-yuga, the age of the fulfillment of duty. One during that time with the Pranava gave expression to the [not in four divided] Veda, knowing Me to be the duty in the form of the bull of religion [see 1.16: 18 and 1.17: 24]. Fixed in austerity and free from sins, one worshipped Me as Lord Hamsa. At the beginning of Treta-yuga, oh greatly fortunate one, in My heart from the prana the threefold of knowing [the three Vedas Rig, Sama and Yajur] originated whereby I appeared in the three forms of sacrifice [hence the name Treta, see ritvik]. From the Original Personality the intellectuals, the rulers, the merchants and the labourers [the varnas] generated whose personal activities can be recognised as [respectively] those from the mouth, the arms, the thighs and feet [legs] of the universal form [compare 2.1: 37]. The celibate students came from My heart, the householders are from My loins, from My chest the ones [of retreat] living in the forest found their existence and the renounced order of life is found in My head [see ashramas]. The usual natures of the people of the different societal classes [varnas] and status groups [ashramas] evolved according to the situation of their birth [in My body]: in a low position inferior natures evolved and in a high position superior natures developed. Equanimity, sense-control, austerity, cleanliness, contentment, forgiveness, sincerity, devotion to Me, compassion and truthfulness are the natural qualities of the brahmins [compare 7.11: 21 and B.G. 18: 42]. Ardor, physical strength, determination, heroism, tolerance, generosity, endeavor, steadiness, being mindful of the brahminical culture and leadership are the natural qualities of the ksatriyas [My arms, compare 7.11: 22 and B.G. 18: 43]. Faith, dedication to charity, straightforwardness, service to the brahmins and always engaged in the accumulation of money, constitute the natural qualities of the vais'yas [My thighs, compare 7.11: 23 and B.G. 18: 44]. Free from deceit being obedient towards the twice-born souls [the three higher varnas], of service for both the cows and the divine personalities as also being perfectly contented with the reward thus acquired, are the natural qualities of the Shudras [His feet or legs, compare 7.11: 24 and B.G. 18: 44]. To be unclean, deceitful, thievish, faithless, quarrelsome, lusty, fiery and of constant hankering, constitutes the nature of those who occupy the lowest position [the outcasts]. It is the duty of all members of society to be of nonviolence, truthfulness and honesty, to be free from lust, anger and greed and to desire the welfare and happiness of all living entities.

A twice-born soul having undergone a second birth with purificatory rites [with sankaras receiving a sacred thread] and [initiation into] the Gayatri mantra, should reside in the residence [the school] of the guru and must with his senses under control on his request study the scriptures [see also B.G. 16: 24]. Carrying a belt, a deerskin, a staff, prayer beads, a brahmin thread, a water pot and matted hair, he [the brahmachari] without neglecting [*] his teeth and clothes, uses kus'a grass [to sit upon] and [does] not [accept] a pleasant seat. Bathing and eating, attending sacrifices and doing japa, passing stool and urine, he does in silence [Vaishnavas actually murmur doing japa; he should not [fully] trim his nails or hair, including the hair under his arms and in the public area [see also Shikha]. Someone under the vow of celibacy should never spill his semen and, when it flowed of its own, take a bath, control his breath and chant the Gayatri [see also urdhva-retah]. Purified with fixed attention, at the beginning and the end of the day performing his japa silently, he should serve the fire-god, the sun [see cakra], the acarya, the cow, the brahmin, the teacher, the elderly and the God-fearing soul [compare: 11.14: 35]. He has to recognise Me in the teacher of example [the acarya]. The acarya he should never at any time enviously deny respect considering him a mortal being, for the spiritual master represents all the gods [see also rule of thumb and compare e.g. 7.14: 17, 10.81: 39, 10.45: 32 and 11.15: 27]. In the morning and evening he should bring him the food that was collected and offer it to him together with other articles. In self-restraint he should accept what he allows [to be his share]. He should always humbly be engaged in serving the acarya, following him closely, proving his respect with folded hands wherever he goes, rests, sits or stands. Thus being engaged he [the upakurvana brahmacari] should, free from [unregulated] sense gratification and without breaking the vow [of celibacy], live in the school of the guru until the education is completed [see also Kumaras]. If he [naishthika, faithful for the rest of his life] desires to climb up to the world of the verses [Maharloka], the heaven of Brahma, he should, for the sake of his Vedic studies, offer his body to the guru with the great vow [of permanent celibacy, see yama]. Actively engaged in the spirit and sinless he should worship Me as being the Supreme Undivided Intelligence present in the fire, in the spiritual master, in himself and in all living beings [see also B.G. 5: 18, siddhanta and advaita]. The first thing to be forsaken by someone [sexually ripe but spiritually directed who is] not running his own household, is to glance at, touch, converse and joke and such with [sexually receptive] women or other sexually active living beings [see 11.14: 29 and 6.1: 56-68]. 4-3 Cleanliness, washing one's hands, bathing, in the morning and evening being of religious service, worshipping Me, visiting holy places, handling the prayer beads, avoiding things untouchable, things not fit for consumption and things not to be discussed - this all oh Uddhava, constitutes the voluntary penance that in order to restrain the mind, the words and the body with Me, I who reside within all beings, is enjoined for all spiritual departments [ashramas]. A brahmin observing the great vow who thus burns his karmic mentality by the intensity of his penance, becomes as bright as a fire and a spotless devotee of Mine. When after thus properly having studied the Vedic knowledge, he [the brahmacari] desires [to enter family life], he must offer the spiritual master remuneration and with his permission bathe himself, [put on nice clothes and leave].

Except for when he is My devotee, a true dvija [a person from the three higher classes] should either enter family life [grihastha], the forest [vanaprastha] or become a monk, a mendicant [samnyasin or sannyasi]; he should move from one authorised societal position [ashrama] to the other and not act otherwise. Desiring a household one should marry a wife with similar qualities who is beyond reproach and younger in age. When the first wife is of the same vocation another one may follow [of a lower class - varna - or subdivision of it, the caste - jati]. Sacrifice, Vedic study and charity are the activities of all twice-born souls, but only the brahmins practice the acceptance of charity, giving [Vedic] instructions and performing sacrifices for others [compare 7.11: 14]. When a brahmin considers the acceptance of charity as detrimental to his penance, spiritual power and glory, he must subsist on the other two [of teaching and sacrifice] and when he considers also these two as incompatible with his spirituality, he must subsist on gathering ears of corn left behind in the field [live 'of the stones', see also 6.7: 36, 7.15: 30 and B.G. 9: 22]. The body of a brahmin is not meant for futile sense gratification [and the consequent involuntary penances of war, disease and incarceration], it is meant for [voluntary] penances in this world and an unlimited happiness in the world hereafter [see also 11.6: 9 and B.G. 17: 14-19]. With his consciousness perfectly contented in his occupation of gleaming grains and magnanimously, free from passion cultivating dharma, someone who has fixed his mind upon Me - and who is thus not very attached - can achieve liberation even when he lives a householder's life [compare B.G. 3: 22 and 10.69]. He who delivers a brahmin surrendered to Me [or an experienced devotee] from a life of suffering [poverty], I forelong, like a boat in the ocean, will deliver from all misery. A king saves himself by delivering, like a father, his people from difficulties, just as a bull elephant without any fear for himself protects himself and other elephants [see also 4.20: 14]. The human ruler who thus proceeding on earth removes all sins, will therefore enjoy heaven, together with the king of heaven [Indra] riding a heavenly vehicle as brilliant as the sun. When a [Vedic] scholar suffers want he can engage in doing business like a merchant, or suffering misfortune he must take up the sword [engage in politics]. In no case of misfortune he can behave like a dog [follow a lower master]. A king in case of emergency may maintain himself by acting like a merchant, by hunting or by acting like a man of knowledge. But he can never follow the course of a [n obedient] dog. A vais'ya may adopt the business of a Shudra and a Shudra may adopt the way of an artisan and make baskets and mats, but freed from misery he must not desire a livelihood by engaging in a lower type of work [see also 7.11: 17]. [Being a householder] one should perform worship on a daily basis for the demigods, the sages, the forefathers and all living beings as being My potencies, by studying Vedic knowledge, saying the mantras svadha ['blessed be'] and svaha ['hail to'] and by offering food and such depending the prosperity one enjoys [see also 11.5: 41]. Whether one's money was acquired without endeavor or acquired by performing one's straight duty, one should without burdening one's dependents, be of proper respect with the help of Vedic rituals. One should not be fixed on one's family members nor get bewildered by them [trying to control them]; being wise one sees that things ahead are just as temporary as matters of the past. The association with one's children, wife, relatives and friends is like an association with travelers; one is separated from all of them in a next body, just like a dream disappears that occurs in one's sleep [see also 7.2: 21, 9.19: 27-28]. A liberated soul thus convinced who does not identify with the body and selflessly lives at home like a guest, will not get entangled in the domestic situation. When one with the activities of a family life worships Me, one may as a devotee remain at home or enter the forest, or also, given responsible offspring, take to the renounced order. Someone though whose consciousness is disturbed by his desire for a home, children and money, is in a state of bondage and - henpecked - being of a miserly mentality, unintelligently thinks in terms of I and mine. 'Oh my poor old mom and dad. Oh my wife with a baby in her arms and, oh my young, unprotected children! How in the world can they live when they, wretched because of missing me, have to suffer greatly?' [see e.g. also 11.7: 52-57] Such a person whose mind in his domestic situation thus is overwhelmed by thoughts and emotions, will because of his bewildered intelligence of constant concern about his family, find no satisfaction and land in darkness when he dies.'

*. The term adhauta used here means, according to the Monier Williams Dictionary, the negative of dhauta, which means white, washed, and purified as also removed and destroyed. Concerning teeth and clothes this could mean unpolished teeth and unwashed clothes as also teeth not broken, neglected or rotting and clothes properly covering the body. So it is to the context of the other values of renunciation to decide what meaning would apply. Since adhauta in the first sense would be at odds with the value of cleanliness, Shaucam [see e.g. verse 20 of this chapter and 1.17: 24], here therefore, contrary to previous interpretations, is chosen for the second sense of well maintained teeth and clothes properly covering the body, which is more in line with the normal code of conduct of vaishnava brahmacari devotees in acceptance of a spiritual master [see also pp. 11.17: 23].

 This process of 'tidying' is called the samavartana-samskara that marks the completion of the studies and returning home from living with the guru.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 18:

The Varnashrama System: the Withdrawn and the Renounced

The Supreme Lord said: 'When one in the third phase of one's life wants to retreat into the forest, one should, in order to reside there peacefully, entrust the wife to one's sons or else together with her dwell in the forest. One should arrange for the pure [*] sustenance of the bulbs, roots and fruits of the forest and dress oneself with tree bark, grass, leaves or animal skins. [In the forest] one should allow the hair on one's head and body, one's facial hair and nails [to grow] as also the filth of one's body, not [extensively] clean one's teeth, [but] bathe three times a day and [at night] sleep on the ground. Thus proceeding one must ascetically tolerate the five fires during the summer [the sacrificial fires in four directions and the sun above], the torrents of rain during the rainy season and the cold of winter when one is submerged in water up to one's neck [see also 4.23: 6]. One eats what is either prepared on a fire, what has ripened by time or what was pulverised with a mortar, with a stone or ground with one's teeth. One should personally collect whatever that is needed for one's sustenance depending the place, the time and one's energy and understand that [living in the forest] one must not store anything for another time [see also 7.12: 19]. A vanaprastha may worship Me with oblations [of rice, barley and dal], may offer rice cakes or offer fruits according to the season, but he may never be of the worship mentioned in the scriptures of sacrificing animals. As he did before [when he was a grihastha] he should perform the fire sacrifice, the sacrifice on a new moon day and a full moon day as also the four months' sacrifice [of caturmasya], that are enjoined by the Vedic experts. When he with that ascetic practice has worshipped Me, the sage [the vanaprastha] all skin and bones, from the world of the seers will achieve Me, the Goal of All Penance [see also maharloka]. Is there a greater fool than someone who, for a long time being of this difficult but glorious penance that awards liberation, practices this penance for the purpose of trivial sense gratification [see also vantas'i]? When he in his regulated activities due to old age with his body trembling is no longer able to carry on, he should place the sacrificial fire in his heart, concentrate on Me and enter the fire [see also 7.12: 23]. But in case full detachment from all result-minded action has developed in him and [the achievement of] a higher world means nothing more to him than hell, he may give up the [vanaprastha] sacrificial fire and take to the renounced order [see also B.G. 18: 2 and].

After having worshiped Me according to the injunctions and having given all he has to the priest, he [the vanaprastha] must place the sacrificial fire within his life breath and free from desires and worries wander about [as a sannyasi, see also 9.6*]. The demigods to begin with create obstacles for him in the form of his wife [and other allurements later on]; these he should surpass and transcend [see also B.G. 6: 25, 1.19: 2-3, 5.6: 4, 11.4: 7]. If a sage wishes to wear clothes he uses another cloth to cover his loincloth [or kaupina]. All the rest he gives up, besides a water pot and a staff [accepting] nothing else without necessity. He should place his foot on a clear place [free from living beings], clear the water he wants to drink with his cloth, speak the truth in clear terms and engage in action with a clear mind. Saying little, reserve and breath control constitute the strict disciplines for the voice, the body and the mind. He with whom these are not found My dearest, can, despite his bamboo rods, never be considered a real sannyasi [see also tridanda]. When he goes begging with the four varnas he should at random approach seven different houses, avoid impure [sinful, polluted] households and be satisfied with whatever he acquired [see also cakra, compare 1.4: 8]. Next he somewhere outside has to go to a reservoir of water, wash himself and then without saying a word distribute the food that was begged and purified. Thereafter he should eat the food that remained in its entirety. He should move about alone on this earth free from attachment, with his senses fully under control, and satisfied and amused with the True Self, steady on the spiritual platform, be of an equal vision [B.G. 5: 18, see bhajan]. In a remote and safe place the sage, with his consciousness purified by his love for Me, should concentrate on the soul only as being non-different from Me. By focussing in knowledge he must gain insight in the bound and liberated state of the self. He is bound when the senses are distracted and he is liberated when he has them under control [when he - devoted to Me - concentrates, meditates and gets absorbed, see also 11.10]. The sage with his six senses [the five physical senses and the mind] fully under control being conscious of Me, having experienced the greater happiness of the soul, therefore should live detached from futile material desires. He should travel to the pure places on earth with rivers, mountains and forests. The cities, towns and pasturing grounds he should enter only to beg for alms from those working for material purposes. He again and again must [try to] collect alms from the department of the vanaprastha order of life, for by food obtained by gleaming in a purified existence [not being of fruitive labour, karma], one is freed from illusion and quickly achieves spiritual perfection. He should never take the perishable things he sees with his eyes for the ultimate reality; with a consciousness free from attachment he should turn away from all designs for [material progress in] this life or a future existence. Fixed in his [true] self he should no longer keep the universe in mind and thus arguing [as previously] forsake all that illusory energy that in the self binds together his mind, speech and vital air [see ahankara]. Whether he in detachment is devoted to knowledge or as My devotee not even desires liberation, he [ultimately] should abandon the ashrama duties and their rituals and move beyond the range of rules and regulations [see also 10.78: 31-32, 3.29: 25 and 5.1*]. Despite his intelligence he [the detached soul, a sannyasi] should play like a child, despite his expertise he should act as if incompetent, despite his learning he should speak like being absent-minded and despite his knowing the injunctions he should behave in an unrestricted manner ['wander as a cow']. He should never attach to the [karma-kanda] Vedic philosophy [of sacrificing for the sake of return], nor should he heretically oppose it; he should refrain from scepticism and empty talk, nor take sides in [political] argumentations. Someone wise should never feel disturbed by other people nor should he disturb others. He should tolerate harsh words, never treat anyone with disrespect and never - like an animal to the interest of the body - with anyone create hostility [see also B.G. 12: 15]. The One Supreme Soul is situated within all living beings as also within one's own body. Just like the one moon is reflected in different reservoirs of water, all material bodies are composed of the energy of the One [Lord, see also B.G. 6: 29 & 13: 34]. He [the sannyasi] should not feel dejected when there is no [or no proper] food, nor should he rejoice at times when there is plenty of food; he should be firmly fixed in the notion that both matters [of plenty and scarcity] are determined by fate [by the Lord]. He should endeavor in order to eat and to sustain his personal life force properly, for by that strength he contemplates the spiritual truth that, being understood, leads to liberation [see B.G. 6: 16]. The food he obtained by chance he must eat, whether it is first class or of a low quality. Similarly the clothes and place to sleep a sage must accept the way they came of their own accord [see also 7.13]. General cleanliness, washing the hands, taking a bath and other regular duties are to be performed without any compulsion by a person of spiritual realisation, just as [free as] I, the Controller, act according to the game I play. For him the perception of things [as existing] separate from Me is over, for having Me in view such a perception is destroyed. Sometimes such a notion lingers till the body dies, but then he will attain Me. He who has no notion of My dharma, but in his desire for spiritual perfection developed detachment from the lusty sense enjoyment that leads to unhappiness, should approach a wise [bonafide] spiritual master [of proper reference, a guru, see also B.G. 16: 23-24, 4: 34 & 17: 14]. The devotee should serve the spiritual master who embodies Me, with great faith without envy and offenses for as long as it takes to arrive at a clear realisation of the Absolute Truth [see also 11.17: 27]. 0-4 He though who is not in control of the six forms [of vice, the anarthas], allows the charioteer of the body to be led by the senses, is bereft of knowledge and detachment, and just wants to subsist on [and not learn from] the three-stick staff, denies Me, himself and the divine personalities within himself and harms the dharmas; not having overcome the contamination of this world he will also be lost and abandoned in the world hereafter.

Nonviolence and equanimity constitutes the dharma of a mendicant [a sannyasi], discrimination and penance constitutes the dharma of someone living in the forest [a vanaprastha], protecting all living beings and performing sacrifices constitutes the dharma of a householder [a grihastha], and serving the teacher of example [the acarya] constitutes the dharma of a celibate student [a brahmachari]. Of all those who worship Me with celibacy, austerity, cleanliness, contentment and being friendly towards all living entities, a householder though may approach his wife for intercourse at the proper time. Someone who thus according to his dharma worships Me, is not devoted to anything else and understands Me to be present in all living entities, will obtain unflinching devotional service unto Me. Oh Uddhava, he will come to Me by bhakti, by loving service unto Me, the Supreme Lord of All Worlds, the Absolute Truth and cause, the origin and dissolution of everything. When one thus by one's dharma has purified one's existence, one will, fully understanding My supreme position and endowed with spiritual knowledge and wisdom, very soon reach Me. The followers of the varnashrama dharma are characterised by this [traditional] code of conduct. This sense of duty combined with my bhakti awards the highest perfection of life. Oh saintly soul, this what I described to you on your request, constitutes the means by which one as a devotee can be perfectly engaged in one's duty and come to Me, the One Supreme.*

*: Shrilata Bhaktisiddhanta Sarasvati Thakur quoting from the Manu-samhita points out that the word medhyaih or 'pure' in this context means that while residing in the forest a sage may not accept honey-based liquors, animal flesh, fungus, mushrooms, horseradish or any hallucinogenic or intoxicating herbs, not even on the pretext of a medicinal treatment.

 : Shastri C.L. Goswami comments here to his translation of the book: 'the Shrutis lay down that a brahmana may turn out to be a recluse whenever true vairagya appears in him in whatever stage of life.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 19:

The Perfection of Spiritual Knowledge

The Supreme Lord said: 'Someone who, endowed with knowledge in accord with the oral tradition, is of self-realisation and does not lose himself in speculations [about what would be true knowledge], must, known with the fact that this universe is a complete illusion, for both the sake of Me and spiritual knowledge renounce his worldly concerns. For a person of spiritual knowledge I am the object of worship, the goal, the motive and final conclusion. Besides Me as his favorite, his light and final beatitude, he has no other purpose. They who have fully perfected their knowledge and wisdom know My lotus feet as most auspicious. For that reason the learned transcendentalist who by means of spiritual knowledge holds on to Me, is most dear to Me [see also B.G. 7: 17-18]. Performing austerities, visiting holy places, doing japa, giving charity or other pious activities cannot provide the perfection that is created by but a fraction of this spiritual knowledge [compare 10.46: 32-33]. Therefore oh Uddhava, knowing your true self in association with this spiritual discrimination that you accomplished by intelligence and consciousness, be of your way [svarupa] of serving Me with devotion. With the sacrifice of Vedic knowledge and wisdom the sages achieved the highest perfection by worshipping Me, the Lord of All Sacrifices who is the Supersoul inside of them. The transformation of the three departments [of nature, the gunas] that surrounds you, constitutes an illusion that appears in the present [of the bewildering material energy] that is not there in the beginning nor in the end [of the universe]. In what sense can the being born and such of your material body, that at first did not exist, is not there afterwards, but only exists in between, have any relation to you[r essence, your true self, your soul]?'

Shri Uddhava said: 'Oh Controller of the Universe, oh You in the Form of the Universe, please explain the yoga of devotion unto You that is also sought by the greatest souls. This devotion encompasses the extensive, perfectly pure knowledge endowed with detachment and wisdom, that carries the approval of the established tradition [of storytelling]. Oh Lord, for the one who, tormented on the path of material existence, is overwhelmed by the threefold misery [see 1.17: 19], I see no other shelter but the canopy of Your two lotus feet that shower the nectar. Please uplift this person who so badly craving for some insignificant happiness, bitten by the snake of time, hopelessly fell down in this dark pit [of material existence]. Oh Greatest Authority, pour out Your words of mercy that lead to liberation!'

The Supreme Lord said: '[Yudhishtira] the king who considered no one his enemy, in the past asked Bhishma, the best of the upholders of dharma, this question while we were all attentively listening [see 1.9: 25-42]. When the war between the descendants of Bharata had ended, he, overwhelmed by the destruction of his beloved friends and relatives, after having heard about the many principles of religion, finally asked about the path of liberation. I shall describe to you what was heard from the mouth of that soul vowed to the divine [Bhishma] in support of higher knowledge, detachment, self-realisation, faith and devotional service. That knowledge by which one recognises the one element [of the Absolute Spirit, the Supersoul, the Lord, see 1.2: 11] within the nine, eleven, five and three elements of all living beings, has been determined by Me to be higher knowledge [jnana]. When one is not in that sense concerned with all the elements composed of the three modes but rather sees, as should, the One who brings about, maintains and annihilates this universe, one at that time speaks of self-realisation [vijñana]. That what is there in the beginning, is halfway present from one creation to another and still remains when there is the annihilation of everything, is what one considers true and eternal. Vedic knowledge [śruti], direct experience [pratyakṣa], traditional instruction [aitihya or smṛiti] and logical inference [anumāna] are the four forms of right perception in facing the flickering nature by which a person masters [becomes detached from] the material diversity [see pramana]. Inauspiciousness is found up to the heaven of Virinca [Brahma] because all material routines [including rituals] are subject to change. An intelligent person should understand that, just like the things he sees, everything he is about to see is transitory [see also shath-urmi, 11.3: 20 and B.G. 8: 16].

Because of your love for Me I formerly talked to you about bhakti-yoga oh senseless one. Let Me now also expound on the supreme method of this devotion unto Me. 0-2 Faith in the nectar of the narrations about Me, always recite [sing] My glories, to be fixed on ceremonial worship, to relate to Me with hymns and prayers; to have great respect for My devotional service, to offer obeisances with all of one's limbs, to be of first-class worship for My devotees, to think of Me as being present in all living beings, to dedicate all one's normal activities to Me, to describe with words My qualities, to offer one's mind to Me and reject all material desires; to give up wealth for My sake, to renounce sensual pleasures and material happiness, to be of sacrifice with charity and offerings, to do japa and to keep to vows and austerities for My purpose, are for human beings of surrender oh Uddhava, the different forms of religiosity to rise to loving service unto Me - what other purpose would remain for My devotee [to be accomplished]? When situated in peace one's consciousness is absorbed in the [supreme] soul, one achieves, being strengthened by the mode of goodness, religiosity, spiritual knowledge, detachment and opulence. But when one being fixed upon the material variety, chases one's senses in every direction and thus became a prisoner of one's passion, you should understand that one, by that [materialistic] consciousness dedicated to the impermanent, will achieve the opposite. Dharma is said to lead to My devotional service and spiritual knowledge [jnana] to witnessing the presence of the Supreme Soul. Detachment [vairagya] results in disinterestedness in the objects of sense gratification and opulence [ais'varya] culminates in the mystical perfections of anima and so on [perfections and powers see 11.15 & 11.16 and bhaga].'

Shri Uddhava said: 'How many types of restrictions [yama] and regular duties [niyama] does one speak of, oh Subduer of the Enemy, what is equilibrium, what is self-control dear Krishna, what is tolerance and what is constancy my Lord? What is charity and what is penance, what is heroism, what does one say about reality and truth, what is renunciation and wealth, what is desirable, what a sacrifice and what is religious remuneration? What do you think is the strength of a person, oh Fortunate One, what is opulence and gain, oh Kes'ava, what is education, what modesty, what is superior, what beauty and what is happiness as also unhappiness? Who is learned, who is a fool, what is the real path and what the false path, what is heaven and what is hell and who do You say is a friend and what is home? Who is wealthy, who is poor, who is a wretch and who is a controller; please speak to me about these matters as also about the opposite qualities, oh Lord of the Truthful Souls.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'Nonviolence, truthfulness, not coveting or stealing the property of others, detachment, modesty, non-possessiveness, fearfulness, celibacy, silence, steadiness, forgiveness and fearlessness are the twelve types of restrictions [of yama]. [Inner and outer] cleanliness, doing japa, penance, sacrifice, faith, hospitality, worship of Me, visiting holy places, care for the welfare of others in this world, contentment and serving the spiritual master are the twelve regular duties [of niyama]. These two times twelve types of principles and duties that human beings remember and honour, My dear one, yield results [like beatitude or prosperity] depending each his desire [?]. 6-3 Mental equilibrium means the absorption of one's intelligence in Me [see also 11.16: 10] and self-control entails the disciplining of the senses. Tolerance means that one has to endure unhappiness and constancy entails the conquering of the tongue and genitals. The highest charity is to forsake the rod [to punish others] and giving up one's lust one thinks of penance. One is a hero when one conquers one's propensity to enjoy materially and there is sense of reality when one sees [the One, the Lord] equally present. Kind, so one says, one differs [or is truthful] with the words used by the sages. One speaks of cleanliness when one is detached from performing productive labour [see also e.g. 1.1: 2 and B.G. 18: 6] and in case of renunciation one speaks of sannyasa [the renounced order]. Religiousness constitutes for human beings the wealth to be desired and I Myself, the Most Fortunate One, the Supreme Personality, am the sacrifice. The spiritual reward is wise instruction and the control of one's breath constitutes supreme strength. 0-4 Opulence is My divine nature [see 11.16 and bhaga], gain is My bhakti, education is the nullifying of the division of the self [see siddhanta and advaita] and modesty [sense of shame] is the disgust against improper action [sin]. Beauty means to be of good qualities - like being detached from material desires and such, happiness means to transcend both [material] happiness and distress, unhappiness is to rely on the [physical] happiness of lust and a wise person is someone who can tell the difference between liberation and bondage. A fool is someone who identifies himself with the body and so on [the mind etc.], the right path is the one leading to Me, the wrong path is to be understood as all the leading to a bewildered mind and heaven implies the predominance of the mode of goodness. Hell is the predominance of the mode of ignorance, one's real friend is the spiritual master who is Me My dear friend, and the human body is one's home. He who is enriched with good qualities is called a rich person while a poor person is someone who is discontented. A wretched person is someone who did not subdue his senses, a controller is someone whose intelligence is not attached to the material affair and someone attached to sense gratification is of the opposite [kind of qualities, a slave]. These, oh Uddhava, are the subjects of your inquiry I all properly have elucidated. But why should one elaborately describe the characteristics of good and bad qualities when thinking about good and bad still means that one fails to see the [true] quality [of transcendence] distinct from them [compare with 3.10: 28-29, 6.16: 10-11, 11.7: 8, 11.11: 16 and B.G. 7: 5].'

*: Patanjali formulates in his Yoga Sutras II: 30-32, the restrictions and duties of the yoga adept as follows: "Nonviolence, love of truth, non-stealing, celibacy and the not striving for possessions together constitute the renunciation [yama]. This is the great universal vow valid independent of the place, the time, the circumstance and one's birth. Cleanliness, contentment, penance, consideration and surrender to the person of God constitute the regulation [niyama]."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 20:

Trikanḍa Yoga: Bhakti Surpasses Knowledge and Detachment

Shri Uddhava said: 'The Vedic literature of Your Lordship, oh Lotus-eyed One, that pays attention to the injunctions concerning actions and prohibitions, deals about the good and bad sides of karma [akarma and vikarma]. They also discuss the differences within the varnashrama system wherein the father may be of a higher [anuloma] or a lower [pratiloma] class than the mother, they are about heaven and hell and expound on the subjects of having possessions, one's age, place and time [see also 4.8: 54 and ?]. How can human beings without Your prohibitive and regulatory words concerning final beatitude, tell the difference between virtue and vice [compare 11.19: 40-45]? The Vedic knowledge emanating from You offers the forefathers, the gods as also the human beings a superior eye upon the - not for everyone that evident

- meaning of life, what would be the goal and how we may achieve. The difference between virtue and vice one can see with the help of Your Vedic knowledge and does not arise by itself, but the Vedas also nullify such a difference and thus clearly confuse the issue....'

The Supreme Lord said: 'The three ways of yoga I described in My desire to grant human beings the perfection, are the path of philosophy [jnana], the path of work [karma] and the path of devotion [bhakti]; there are no other means [of elevation] whatsoever [see also B.G. contents and tri-kanda]. For those who disgusted with fruitive labour [or sacrifices] forsake such activities, there is the yoga of spiritual knowledge and for those who have not turned themselves consciously away and do feel for material happiness, there is the path of karma-yoga. When it happens that in a person, who is neither averse nor very attached, faith awakens in My narrations and such, the path of bhakti-yoga will bring perfection. For as long as one is not fed up [with one's material life] and no faith has awakened in My discourses and listening etc. [7.5: 23-24], one will have to continue with one's fruitive labour [see also 1.2: 7, 11.5: 41]. Someone will not go to heaven nor to hell, oh Uddhava, if he holds on to his prescribed duties without deviating and, free from ulterior motives, is of worship with performing sacrifices [see also B.G. 8: 16]. When one, existing in this world, free from sin is situated in one's duties and is pure [in one's motives], one obtains transcendental knowledge and possibly My bhakti [compare 1.5: 23-31]. Just as the residents of hell, even the residents of heaven desire for this planet earth that is so conducive to the spiritual knowledge and devotional service that prove themselves neither in hell nor in heaven. A wise human being should not strive for hell or heaven, nor for this planet earth, for one becomes bewildered when one enters a physical body. Even though [the body is] subject to death, it brings the perfection of one's life purpose within reach. Someone who knows this should [therefore], before he dies, attentively endeavor for transcendence. Not being attached a bird attains happiness after giving up the nest it made in a tree that was cut down by some messengers of death. Knowing that with every day and night one's life span is shortened [likewise], one is beset with fear, free from attachment [though] one, with the intelligence of transcendence being without desires, attains perfect peace. A person is the killer of his own soul when he, in this well suited boat of the so rarely attained but naturally acquired physical human body, does not cross over the ocean of material existence, being propelled by the favorable winds that I am and with the spiritual master as the captain. When a yogi, disgusted with material endeavoring, being detached is in full control of his senses, he has to concentrate his mind to stabilize it with self-discipline. The mind being narrowed down to the spiritual platform should, when suddenly being drawn away, carefully - according to the rules of the game - be brought under the control of the self [see also B.G. 6: 26]. When one conquers one's breath and senses, one should not forget what the actual purpose of the mind is. With one's intelligence perfect in goodness, it should always be led back under the supervision of the soul [to be its servant, see B.G. 3: 42]. This restraining of the mind with the intimate confidentiality with which one also constantly observes a horse that one wants to tame, is what is known as the most supreme practice of yoga [see also B.G. 6: 33-34]. By analyzing how all the different elements [and principles of spiritual knowledge] cohere and are in conflict, how they originate and how they are lost, the mind should be kept attentive until [spiritually] satisfied. The mind of someone who, guided by the instructions [of the spiritual master], being disgusted got detached, will by analysis of and meditation upon what is perceived, give up its false identification [with matter and the body]. The mind must not be focussed on any other practice than on the austerities and procedures of the [eightfold] yoga method, on logical analyses and spiritual knowledge and on the exercises of respect for My form [thus on trikanda, threefold yoga: karma-, jnana- and bhakti-yoga]. If a yogi out of negligence commits a reprehensible deed, he should burn away that sin by means of the yoga method only; never at any time he should try to do this in a different way [compare B.G. 1.5: 17, 4: 19, 9: 30]. When each is firmly grounded in his own position one speaks of virtue, but because of the nature of karmic activities one is impure in one's engagement. Driven by desire to put an end to those [impurities or destabilizing] attachments, one consequently - by the rule of virtue and vice - with this [by Me, then] arrives at [the needed niyama] regulations. 7-2 When faith in my narrations and disgust with all karma has awakened in someone, he [the atmanandi bhakta], despite his lack of ability to [fully] renounce, knows that his lusts are the root of his misery. Therefore repenting the sense gratification resulting in misery that he [nevertheless] also engages in, he should remain happy and worship Me being resolute in that faith and conviction. All the lusts a sage has in his heart are destroyed when his heart is firmly established in Me by constantly worshipping Me in the bhakti-yoga as described [see sthita-prajna]. The knots in the heart are cut, all misgivings are in shreds and the chain of fruitive actions ends when one sees Me as the Supreme Soul of All. For a yogi who being connected in My devotional service fixed his mind on Me, for that reason generally neither the path of knowledge nor the path of detachment [from fruitive activities] is the way to become happy in this world. 2-3 That what is obtained by fruitive action, penance, the cultivation of knowledge and detachment, that what is achieved by mystical yoga, charity, religious observances, auspicious actions or other methods, My devotee easily achieves in My bhakti when he somehow or other desires heaven, final beatitude or My abode. Sainly persons of profound intelligence, devotees fully dedicated to Me, never desire anything but Me, I who grant them beatitude and freedom from birth and death. It is said that it is best not to desire anything, so that with him who does not seek any personal reward, who is fully independent, the bhakti unto Me may arise that grants the greatest happiness [see also 2.3: 10]. With Me the unfavorable qualities of the modes of nature [like bewilderment, slowness and restlessness] cannot [again] manifest themselves in pure devotees, because they, free from desire, are under all circumstances stable in their consciousness. They now belong to the ones who moved beyond what can be understood with a materially motivated intelligence [see also B.G. 9: 30].

Those who follow these methods I have now instructed, achieve the security of My abode in the direct perception of that what is the Absolute Truth.'

*. The vaidehikas consist of those born of a Shudra father and brahmana mother, the sutas are those born from a kshatriya father and a brahmana mother or from a Shudra father and kshatriya mother. The murdhavasikas are those born of a brahmana father and kshatriya mother. Ambashthas are those born from a brahmana father and vais'ya mother [these often work in the healthcare business], Karana indicates those born of a vais'ya father and Shudra mother or of a kshatriya father and vais'ya mother.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 21:

On Distinguishing between Good and Bad

The Supreme Lord said: 'They who give up My paths of jnana, karma and bhakti, will, in the cultivation of their lusts and fickle senses, keep moving through the cycle of birth and death. When one manages to be steady in one's position that is called virtue, while the opposite of that is considered vice; this is the conclusion about these two [see also B.G. 2: 16]. What would be pure or impure concerning the religion, what would be vice or virtue in normal affairs and what would be favorable or unfavorable for one's physical survival are matters [of good and bad] one must evaluate from the same category of elements, oh sinless one [what is good for the body e.g. is not necessarily good for the religion]. This approach of matters I put forward for the sake of those who bear the burden of religious principles. Earth, water, fire, air and ether are the five basic elements that, from Lord Brahma down to the nonmoving creatures, constitute the bodies of the living beings who are all connected in the Supreme Soul. Even though they consist of the same elements and in that sense are equal, the Vedas assign different names and forms to them in service of their self-interest [see varnashrama].

What would be the right and wrong considerations concerning the time, place, the things and so on, is established by Me with the purpose of restricting materially motivated activities. Among all places, those places are impure where there is no respect for the brahminical culture and no spotted antelopes can be found, where there are no saintly, cultured men even when there are spotted antelopes, where it is unclean like Kikatha [a place of low-class men, see mlechha and *] and places where the earth is barren. The time that by its nature [solar position, lunar phase] or by its objects [appointment by calendar and sundial] is suitable for performing one's prescribed duties is considered good and the time that impedes the performance of one's duties or is unsuitable [night time e.g. or times of different obligations] is considered bad [see also B.G. 7: 8, 11.20: 26, kala and kalakutha ]. The purity or impurity of a thing [or of a substance] is determined [validated] with the help of another thing, in respect of what one says about it, by means of a ritual performance [of purification], in respect of time or according to its relative magnitude []. Whether it [- viz. the quality of a thing -] imposes accordingly a sinful [or pious] reaction upon a person depends on that person's power or impotence, intelligence, wealth, condition and place. By a combination of time, air, fire, earth and water or by each of them separately [matters are purified like] grains, things made of wood, clay and bone, thread, skins, liquids and things won from fire. When something in touch with that what is impure removes a bad smell or dirt and thus restores the original nature of an object one speaks of purification. By bathing, charity and austerity a twice-born soul who remembers Me should perform activities in respect of his age, his heroism, ritual purification and prescribed duties, in accord with that what is pure, the cleanliness of the [original] Self. The purification derived from a mantra is a consequence of the correct knowledge about it. The purification by a certain act is the consequence of one's dedication to Me. Dharma [religiosity] prospers by [the purity of] the six factors [as mentioned: the place, the time, the substance, the mantras, the doer and the devotional act], whereas godlessness [adharm] is produced by the contrary.

Sometimes though, a virtue turns out to be a vice and a vice - by providence [or Vedic instruction] - turns out to be a virtue. Respecting the regulative principles one is thus faced with the fact that the distinction between what is good and bad is factually effaced by them [4*]. The same performance of karma because of which someone fell down is not the cause of another fall down. Someone who fell [in love e.g.] does not fall any further; for such a one natural attachment changes into a virtue. Whatever one desists from one is freed from - this is for human beings the foundation of religious life [natural pious living] that takes away the suffering, fear and delusion. When one presumes the objects stimulating the senses to be good, a person will develop attachment as a consequence, from that attachment lust originates and because of that lust [to enjoy at will] there is quarrel among people. Because of quarrelling there is the anger that is difficult to handle and because of anger there is ignorance; and thus someone's broad consciousness is quickly overtaken by darkness [or narrowed consciousness]. Oh saintly soul, a living being bereft that way [of clear understanding] becomes empty-headed so that, as a consequence having fallen away from his goals in life, he - just like dull matter - is as good as dead [compare B.G. 2: 62-63]. Adhering to the sensual affair one, vainly living the life of a tree, fails in knowing oneself and others, so that one's breathing is nothing more than pumping air. The awards promised in the [karma-kanda part of the] scriptures are for man not the highest good; they are merely enticements to create a taste for the ultimate good [upasana-kanda], similar to what one says to make someone take a medicine. From the moment they are born, mortals develop a mind of attachment to their family, their vital functions and the objects of their desire, because of which they lose sight of the interest of their soul. Why would the intelligent ones [the Vedic authority] encourage those, who on the path of danger blind to their real interest in submission [to karmic actions] land in darkness, to further engage in such [attachments, also 5.5: 17]? Some who thus with a perverted intelligence do not understand the purpose [of finding fulfillment in Krishna], speak in [karma-mimamsa] flowery language about [sacrificing for the sake of] material benefits; something about which he who really knows the Vedas does not speak [see also B.G. 2: 42-44]. Those who are lusty, miserly and greedy take the flowers [of karmic sacrifices] for the fruit [of realisation]; bewildered by the fire they suffocate from the smoke and do not realise their position [their true identity of being an individual soul instead of a body]. Armed with their expressions My dear, they do not know Me who is seated within their heart and from whom this universe generated that is also Me. In their self-indulgence they are like people staring into fog. 9-3 Not understanding My confidential conclusion [see also 10.87 and B.G. 9] they, absorbed in their sensuality, [as meat eaters] are attached to the violence [against animals] that may occur under conditions [in nature], but certainly never is encouraged for sacrifices. In reality they take pleasure in being violent against the animals that [without necessity] were slaughtered for their sense gratification. With their ritual worship of the gods, the forefathers and the leading spirits, they are mischievous people. In their hearts they all - like business men investing their wealth - imagine to achieve in a world as pleasing as it sounds, but which is as unreal as a dream. Established in the mode of passion, goodness or ignorance they worship the gods and others headed by Indra who likewise delight in passion, goodness and ignorance, but Me they do not worship properly [thus, see also B.G. 9: 23 and 10: 24 & 25]. 3-3 [They think:] 'When we worship the demigods with sacrifices here, we will enjoy heaven, and when that has ended, turn back to earth in wealth in a fine family.' With their minds thus bewildered by the flowery words [of the Vedas] they nevertheless, as proud and most greedy men, are not attracted to My topics.

The trikanda divided Vedas have the spiritual understanding of the true self, the soul, as their subject matter, but also the seers who esoterically express themselves more indirectly [the 'other gurus'] are dear to Me. The transcendental [Vedic] sound [the Shabda-brahman] manifesting itself [at different levels] in the prana, the senses and the mind [of the pure, self-realised, enlightened person] is most difficult to understand; it is unlimited and as unfathomably deep as the ocean [see also 11.12: 17-18]. The groundless, changeless Absolute of endless potencies that I promote [as My nature, see Omkara], is represented within the living beings in the form of sound vibrations, the way a lotus stalk is represented by a single strand of fiber [see also 11.18: 32 and 6.13: 15]. 8-4 Just as a spider weaves its web from the heart by its orifice, the breath of the Lord [the prana] from the ether is manifesting the sound vibration through the mind in the form of the different phonemes. Full of nectar comprising all the shapes that branch out in thousands of directions, the Master, decorated with consonants, vowels, sibilants and semivowels, has expanded from the syllable om. By the elaborated diversity of expressions and metrical arrangements - that each have four more syllables -, He Himself creates and withdraws again the vast, unlimited expanse [of the Vedic manifestation of sound, see also B.G. 15: 15]. For instance the metres Gayatri, Ushnik and Anushtup; Brihati and Pankti as also Trishthup, Jagati, Aticchanda, Atyashthi, Atijagati and Ativirath [have each in this order four more syllables]. The [confidential] heart of the matter of what these literatures [karma-kanda] enjoin [to be done], what they [upasana-kanda] indicate [as being the object of devotion], what aspects they describe or what alternatives they [jnana-kanda] thus offer [as philosophy], is in this world not known by anyone else but Me [compare 11.20, B.G. 4: 5, 7: 26, 10: 41]. I am the One enjoined, I am the object of worship, I am the alternative [the philosophical hypothesis] that is offered and the One who is explained away [5*]. The transcendental sound vibration of the Vedas establishes Me as being their meaning and elaborately describes the material duality as the department of the bewildering energy one has to emasculate to ultimately become happy.'

*: Shрила Madhvacharya quotes from the Skanda Purana as follows: 'Religious persons should reside within an eight-mile radius of rivers, oceans, mountains, hermitages, forests, spiritual cities or places where the Shalagrama-s'ila [a black oval river-stone suitable for worship] is found. All other places should be considered k'ikatha, or contaminated. But if even in such contaminated places black and spotted antelopes are found, one may reside there as long as sinful persons are not also present. Even if sinful persons are present, if the civil power rests with respectable authorities, one may remain. Similarly, one may dwell wherever the Deity of Vishnu is duly installed and worshipped.'

 : The parampara adds here: 'Political, social or economic disturbances that obstruct the execution of one's religious duties are considered inauspicious times.' Therefore the - form of, type of - time with which one achieves the association of the Supreme Lord or the Lord's pure devotee, is the most auspicious time, whereas the form of time which is politically, economically or socially determined and with which one loses such association, is most inauspicious. Religious timing - to the sun and moon e.g. - is sat kala, or true timing and proper conditioning, whereas humanly determined timing is asat kala, or time conditioning by false authority, a karma motivated time driven by ulterior motives. Scientifically it concerns a biological conflict at the level of the nervous system between natural stimuli of time, like the regularity of daylight, and the cultural stimuli of time that oppose with linear and generalised concepts of time like mean time and zone time. The time sense of modern man is for this reason disturbed, he suffers psychological time, an unstable sense of time which is fundamental to the cultural neurosis.

: An example to illustrate this rather abstract formulation is the clock: the clock is pure or impure relative to its object measured: the time of nature as another 'thing' of time. This is called the criterion of scientific validation or the determination of the zero point of measurement. But also speaking of it in a scientific lecture telling that the mean of time, the clock deviating from nature, is derived from and refers to nature itself through a scientific formula that expresses the so called equation of time, is a political way of sanctifying, declaring the truth of, an obviously deviating clock. Furthermore there is also the religious ritual that presents the cross of Jesus Christ for instance, or the Mahamantra of Lord Caitanya, to the standard of time on the clock in order to forgive the sin of the pragmatical deviating from Krishna's nature of time and the scientific rationalisation about it. Next we can simply set the clock to the nature of time, to the time of Krishna, to be true to the religious insight [see f.c.o.]. And finally, realizing that the confidentiality of Krishna's time cannot be imposed politically, there is the purity to the relative magnitude, as this verse states, that with the modern complexity of time awareness can be respected with a dual display of time offered by some clocks or else with two clocks combined: one display set to nature and one to the politics of pragmatical timekeeping. Thus we can by this verse tolerate the impurity of profit motivated karmic time manipulations and still manage with purity as devotees [Prabhupada who on the one hand demanded punctuality, requested his devotees to further study the subject of time. 'All days and hours are the same to me. I leave that matter to you', he confided in 'A Transcendental Diary' by Hari Shauri Dasa].

4*: The parampara gives an example: 'Someone who abandons one's wife and children is certainly irresponsible and thoughtless. If one takes sannyasa, however, and remains fixed on a higher spiritual platform, he is considered to be a most saintly person. Piety and sin therefore depend upon particular circumstances and are at times difficult to distinguish.' According to Shрила Madhvacharya, persons above the age of fourteen are considered capable of distinguishing between good and bad and are thus responsible for their pious and sinful activities.

5*: This 'explaining away' of Him as an absolute norm is associated with the relationship between form and content. In bhakti one is faced with His form, the form of the acarya and the form of the other devotees as the entrance gate giving access to the Vedic knowledge. Once having passed that gate on one's way inside, the gate for which the Lord stands with His form is of a lesser importance than the content taken care of by jnana. When one has accessed the content, the form is just as obsolete as the package of a product is when one wants to use it after being bought. But Lord Krishna is of course just as well the form as the content. In that sense one rather finds Him on one's way inside. The explaining away pertains to the form thus. This is the necessity demonstrated of the trikanda threefoldness of yoga: karma-yoga constitutes the way, bhakti-yoga constitutes the shop and jnana-yoga shows the contents of spiritual realisation to procure there.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 22:

Prakriti and Purusha: Nature and the Enjoyer

- Shri Uddhava said: 'Oh Lord of the Universe, how many basic elements of creation [tattvas] have been enumerated by the seers? Oh Master, I heard You speak about the twenty-eight basic elements of this world [see also 11.19: 14]. Some say there are twenty-six, others speak of twenty-five or twenty-seven, some speak of nine, some of four and others of eleven elements, while others speak of sixteen, seventeen or thirteen elements. Oh Eternal Supreme One, could You please explain to us what the sages who so differently express themselves with the calculations of their divisions have in mind with them?'

The Supreme Lord said: 'With them [those elements] present everywhere the brahmins speak the way it suits them, after all, what would there for those who lifted up [the veil of] My maya, be difficult to say? 'It is not the way you say it, it is the way I say it': this is what my unsurpassable [bewildering] energies do to those who argue about causes [see darshanas and 6.4: 31]. Because My energies are interacting, differences of opinion arise among the ones who talk about this subject [of causation], but when one finds peace in the control over one's senses the controversy subsides and the arguing stops [one attains the true nature of the Supreme Spirit, atmatattva]. Because the various [subtle and gross] elements mutually pervade one another, oh best among men, a speaker wants to give a fitting description with an enumeration of causes and consequences. With each of those divisions any single element refers to the other elements; whether it is there as a cause or an effect, when you see one element [like the ether] you also see all the other elements that element is part of [*]. Discrimination as heard from the mouth of anyone who wants to reflect upon cause and effect, we accept [as authoritative], when that distinction originated from consistent reasoning. A person is stuck to eternal ignorance and cannot all by himself figure out what the process of self-realisation entails. That knowledge is derived from someone else familiar with the Absolute Truth [compare 11.21: 10]. In this knowledge concerning the good quality of material nature, there is not the slightest difference between the purusha - the Supreme Being, the Soul, the actual person - and is'vara the Lord. To suppose that it would be otherwise is a useless figment [see B.G. 18: 20 and 9: 15 and ]. The modes of goodness, passion and ignorance as the causes of [respectively] maintenance, creation and destruction, constitute material nature [prakriti] but [do] not [control] the soul [see also B.G. 3: 27]. In this world the mode of goodness is of knowledge [light], the mode of passion is of fruitive labour [karma] and the mode of ignorance is of a lack of wisdom. The interaction of the modes is called Time and that what is there by nature, the natural propensity [svabhava], constitutes the thread [the mahat-tattva is the sutra, see also 11.12: 19-21].

The actual person [purusha], material nature [prakriti], the intelligent witnessing [mahat-tattva], the identification with the form [ahankara], ether, air, fire, water and earth are thus the nine elements of creation I referred to [in verse 1]. Hearing, touching, seeing, smelling and tasting are the five [senses] by which one acquires knowledge; the speech organ, the hands, the genitals, the anus and the legs constitute their operation, oh dear one, and the mind is there for both of them. Sounds, tactile qualities, tastes, fragrances, and forms [or colours] are the categories of the sense objects [see vishaya] and speech, manufacturing, excretion [by anus and genitals] and locomotion are the functions covered by them. In the beginning of creation the purusha uninvolved witnesses the material nature of this universe, the universe that by the operation of sattva and the other modes assumes the forms of the gross manifestations and subtler causes [see also 2.10: 10]. All the elements of the 'great principle' [the mahat-tattva] and what belongs to it, received their potencies from the glance of the Lord, undergo transformation and create, amalgamated by the power of nature, the egg of the universe [see also 2.5: 35, 3.20: 14-15, 3.26: 51-53, 3.32: 29, 5.26: 38, 11.6: 16]. With the five physical elements beginning with the ether on the one hand and the individual knower [the jiva] with the Supreme Soul [the Paramatma] on the other hand, we speak of seven constituent elements as the foundation from which the body, the senses and the life air [are produced]. Departing from six elements one speaks of the Transcendental Person as the sixth element conjoined with the five material elements He first projected as His creation and thereupon entered. When one speaks of four elements, fire, water and earth arise from the Original Self; from these elements this cosmos originated, the birth place of all material products. Counting seventeen there is the consideration of the five gross elements, the five senses and their five objects together with the one mind and the soul as the seventeenth element. The same way counting sixteen elements the soul is identified with the mind. With thirteen elements one has the five gross elements, the five senses, the mind and the [individual and supreme] soul. Counting eleven elements one speaks of the soul, the gross elements and the senses. With the eight natural elements [the five gross ones, mind, intelligence and false ego] and the purusha, the Original Person, one thereupon has nine. In this way the various divisions of the tattva elements have been contrived by the seers, all logically being supported by rational arguments; with the sages there is no lack of clarity.'

Shri Uddhava said: 'Because both nature and the enjoyer [prakriti and purusha], despite being constitutionally different, cover one another, oh Krishna, there seems to be no difference between the two: one sees the soul within nature and nature within the soul [see also B.G. 18: 16]. Please oh Lotus eyed One, All-knowing and Very Expert in Reasoning, cut down with Your words the great doubt in my heart. The living beings receive from You the knowledge that by the potency of Your outer illusion is stolen away [again]. Only You understand the real nature of Your illusory power and no one else [see also B.G. 15: 15].'

The Supreme Lord said: 'Prakriti and purusha [nature and the enjoyer] are completely different, oh best of all persons. This creation [prakriti] is subjected to transformation because of the interaction of the gunas. My dear, the deluding energy consisting of the three modes establishes by those modes a diversity of combinations and mentalities. This changeable nature based upon the gunas is of three kinds, one is called adhyatma, the next adhidaiva and another adhibhuta [see also kles'as and 1.17: 19]. In this world one's sight [adhyatma], that what one sees [adhibhuta] and the light upon it [adhidaiva], create each other's perfection with the sun independently in the sky. [So too] the [Super]soul, the original cause separate from these three aspects, by its own conscious experience acts as the perfection of all that was achieved. Next to the eyes the same [trinity] applies to the sense of touch and what one feels with it, to the ear and what one hears, to the tongue and its occupation, to the nose with what is smelled and to one's consciousness together with its attributes. The agitation of the modes takes place on the basis of the primal ether and leads to changes [or pradhana constitutes the cause of the time phenomena]. The principle of the intellect [the mahat-tattva, see also ] therefore gives rise to a false I-awareness that is the cause of three different types of bewilderment: emotion [vaikarika], ignorance [tamasa] and sensual pleasure [andriya]. Lacking the full knowledge of the Supersoul one says things like 'this is real and that is not real' with the focus of discussion on material dualities. Although useless such [speculations] will not cease for as long as persons have turned their attention away from Me, their true abode.'

Shri Uddhava said: 'How do those souls whose minds are diverted from You by the fruitive activities they perform, oh Master, accept and give up higher and lower material bodies? Please Govinda explain to me what by those who are not so spiritual is not understood because they, predominantly knowing this world, were cheated.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'The mind of people that is shaped by their fruitive labour, is bound to the five senses. Traveling from one world to the next, the soul, that has a separate existence, follows that mind [see also linga, vasana and B.G. 2: 22]. The mind that depending its karma always contemplates, rises because of what is seen or heard about through the senses, but inert [when dying away from the sense objects] the remembrance [of that life] is thereupon lost. This total forgetfulness of the living entity in which it does not remember a self that for this or that reason was absorbed in the objects of the senses, is what one calls death. Oh man of charity, what one calls birth is when a person completely identifies himself with the body he assumed, just like what one does in a dream or when one has a fantasy. And just as one in a dream or fantasy has no remembrance of a previous dream or fantasy, one also does not think of having had a previous existence [*4 en B.G. 4: 5]. Because of the creation of this sense refuge, this body, a threefold notion [of being of a high, middle or low class birth] appears concerning the form assumed. This leads the person to [believe in] an outer duality also found inside, like giving birth to bad offspring. My best one, created bodies constantly find and lose their existence as a consequence of Time, the imperceptible, subtle energy of which one does not notice. Just like the flame of a candle, the stream of a river and the fruits of a tree, the lifespan, the circumstances and such of all created beings are determined by it. One has it wrong when one says 'this light is the same as this lamp' and 'this flow of water is the same as this river'. The same way it is wrong to say that 'this human [body] is the same as this person'. It is a way of reasoning by which men are wasting their lives [see also 6.16: 58, 7.6: 1-2]! Actually this person does not take birth from the seed of his own activities, nor does he die. He is immortal and was only joined [with this body] because of illusion, just like fire in firewood [See B.G. 2: 24]. Impregnation, gestation, birth, infancy, childhood, youth, middle age, old age and death are the nine stages of the body. These superior or inferior physical conditions - that one owes to one's own motives [of karmic rebirth] -, a soul accepts as his own because of being bound to the modes, but sometimes he [by the grace of the Lord with due effort in yoga] manages to distance himself from them. From the birth of one's offspring and death of one's forefathers one may conclude to the truth [of one's own life]. He who properly understands the characteristics of this duality [and thus knows he is the continuing soul] is no longer subject to this generation and destruction of things. Someone knowing about the seed and maturity of a tree, is the witness distinct from the birth and death of that tree. In the same way one is the witness separate from the [birth and death of] the physical body. An unintelligent person who fails to distinguish between soul and matter and in touch with matter takes the external world for the real thing, lands completely bewildered in the cycle of birth and death [see also B.G. 9: 21-22 and 1.7: 5]. Wandering around because of his karma he, when he follows the mode of goodness, will go to the sages and the gods. Following the lead of passion he will move among the common people or fall into the [demonic] grip of darkness, and by the mode of ignorance he will find himself among the ghosts and spirits or reach the animal kingdom [see also B.G. 6: 41-42, 9: 25; 17: 4]. Observing dancing and singing persons one tends to imitate them. The same way one is, despite [as a silent witness] not being engaged, inclined towards a material intelligence when one is faced with the qualities of matter [see also 11.21: 19-21]. 4-5 Just as trees seem to move seen in water that moves and the world seems to spin when one's eyes are spinning around, one's mental impressions of experienced sense objects are neither real. Just like the things one sees in a dream are but figments of one's imagination, also the soul's image of a life of birth and death is but a phantom. For someone meditating the objects of the senses, material life will not stop despite being an illusory affair, just like the occurrence of unpleasant things in a dream [may repeat itself*5]. Therefore Uddhava, do not delight in the sense objects that play games with the senses. Just see how one, based upon the illusion of the material duality risen within the self, fails to realise the soul. 8-5 When one is insulted, neglected, ridiculed or envied by bad people, or else chastised, held captive or deprived of one's means of livelihood, or when one is repeatedly spat or urinated upon by ignorant people, someone desiring the Supreme who thus being shaken is having difficulties, should save himself by resorting to his essence [see also 5.5: 30].

Shri Uddhava said: 'How do I learn this? Please, oh Best of All Speakers, tell us that. The offenses of ignorant people against oneself is what I find most difficult to tolerate. Even for scholars it is difficult, oh Soul of the Universe. Except for those who fixed in Your dharma in peace reside at Your lotus feet, material nature no doubt constitutes the greatest burden.'

*: Two examples: A pot is part of the element earth and earth is part of a pot. All matter is part of the ether [substantial space] and ether is part of all the elements.

: The parampara adds here: 'Shri Caitanya Mahaprabhu described the actual situation as acintya-bhedabhedatattva - the supreme controller and the controlled living entities are simultaneously one and different. In the material mode of goodness the oneness is perceived. As one proceeds further, to the stage of vishuddha-sattva, or purified spiritual goodness, one finds spiritual variety within the qualitative oneness, completing one's knowledge of the Absolute Truth' [see also siddhanta].

: To differentiate the basic terms used in this chapter: Prakriti is the material nature with its living beings and gunas, pradhana is the primordial, undifferentiated state of matter without the specific creatures and gunas and the mahat-tattva is the totality of the greater reality of it all, also known as the principle of intellect or the cosmic intelligence. The purusha is the original person who is the enjoyer: the Lord and the living beings who are the same in quality.

*4: According to the well-known exception that confirms the rule says Shri Vis'vanatha Cakravarti Thhakura here that by the mystic power of jati-smara one may remember one's previous body. Patanjali in the Yoga Sutra III.18 says: 'Impressions which, carried along in the self, surface, give insight in previous states of life'.

*5: The classical philosophical stance defended here is: 'When one has a body one is a soul, when one is a body one is a pig', where the pig is here the fallen soul returning time and again to a materialistic life.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 23:

Forbearance: the Song of the Avanti Brahmana

The son of Vyasa said: 'After Uddhava, the greatest of the devotees, had said this to Him, the chief of the Das'arhas whose heroism is so worthy to be discussed, He praised His servant for his words and replied. The Supreme Lord said: 'Oh disciple of Brihaspati, in this world there is virtually no pious soul capable of keeping his mind in check after being disturbed by the insulting words of an uncivilised person. A person is not as much hurt when pierced by arrows through a sensitive part of his body, as by the painful arrows of the harsh words of uncivilised people getting lodged in his heart. In this regard Uddhava, a most pious story is told. Please listen carefully, I shall describe it to you. It was related by a mendicant who, upon being insulted by bad people, kept his composure reminding himself that it happened as a consequence of his past deeds. In Avanti [in the district of Malwa] there once lived a certain brahmin, very rich with many opulences, who earned his livelihood doing business; but he was a miserly person, full of lust, greed and very prone to anger [see also B.G. 2: 49]. He had no respect for his relatives and guests, not even in words, nor catered he, devoid of religiosity, at the right time to his own needs. His sons, in-laws, his wife, daughters and servants turned against the miser with his bad character and in disgust withheld their affection. Thus lacking in dharma as well as pleasure, the five claimants of sacrifice [the deities, see panca-bhaga] became angry with that obsessive treasurer who failed for both the worlds [this and the next]. By his neglect of them he lost all his credit oh magnanimous one, and all the wealth for which he so painstakingly had troubled himself was lost. Oh Uddhava, a part of the wealth of this so-called brahmin was seized by his relatives, some by thieves, some by providence, some by time, some by common people and some by higher authorities [see also 10.49: 22]. When he had lost his property, in him, who devoid of religiosity and pleasure was neglected by his kin, arose a hard to endure anxiety. Thus ruminating he, choked with tears, for a long time lamented in pain over his lost riches, whereupon a great feeling of disgust for worldly affairs came over him.

He then said to himself: 'Alas, how painful to trouble myself that much with all this toiling for money that brought me neither pleasure, nor served the dharmic purpose. In general the wealth of misers never ever results in any happiness: in this life it leads to self-torment and when they die they end up in hell with it. However pure the reputation of the famous may be or however praiseworthy the qualities of the virtuous are, it is all destroyed with a little greed, just like what white leprosy [vitiligo] does with an enchanting, physical beauty. In the building up, realizing, increasing, protecting, spending, losing of and rejoicing with capital, man must toil, fear, worry and live with uncertainty. 8-1 Theft, violence, lies, duplicity, lust, anger, perplexity, pride, discord, enmity, lack of faith, competition and [the three] dangers [of intoxication, promiscuity and gambling, see also 1.17: 24] are the fifteen unwanted things known by man as the consequence of fostering riches. He who desires the ultimate benefit in life should therefore keep the undesirable, that poses as wealth, at a great distance. One's brothers, wife, parents and friends who are unified in love, all, from one moment to the next, turn into enemies over a single penny. For the smallest amount of money they agitated give in to anger, very quickly, as an adversary out for destruction, forget their goodwill and turn you down in the wink of an eye. They who do not appreciate it as a human being to have achieved a birth the immortals pray for with next to that [even] a superior second birth, destroy their self-interest and head for an unfavorable destination [see also B.G. 16: 19-20]. What person who achieved this human life, this gateway to heaven and liberation, would attach to property, a realm of meaninglessness where he is subject to death? When one does not share with the ones who deserve a share - the greater family of the gods, the seers, the forefathers, one's relatives, the living entities and oneself - one falls down like a money minded Yaksha. What can one do as an old man when one, maddened by one's youth, strength and wealth - the means by which a smart man settles for his perfection - has wasted one's life endeavoring for money [see B.G. 3: 35]? How does [even] a man of intelligence fall victim to a never ending, vain pursuit of wealth? All the world is most bewildered enchanted by some kind of inescapable illusory power! What is the use of the goods or they who provide them, or what would be the use of the objects of desire or the people who try to satisfy you? Or, differently stated, of what use is it for someone in the grip of death to be engaged in fruitive activities that only lead to yet another birth? The Supreme Lord, the Supreme Personality who comprises all the gods and who, satisfied with me, led me to this condition of detachment, constitutes the boat for the soul [to cross the material ocean. See also 11.17: 44]. With the time remaining [in my life] I will, free from confusion about the complete of my self-interest, restrict my body to the minimum and find perfect peace within my self [see also 2.2: 3, 7.12: 6]. May the gods, the controllers of the three worlds with this be pleased with me. Was it not

Khathvanga who achieved the spiritual abode in a single moment?'

The Supreme Lord said: 'Thus making up his mind, the most pious brahmin from Avanti untied the knots [of desire] in his heart and became a peaceful, silent mendicant. He wandered this world alone and inconspicuous, and entered, with his self, senses and vital air under control [see tri-danda], its cities and villages to subsist on charity. Seeing him as an old, dirty beggar, low-class people dishonoured him with many an insult oh blessed soul. Some stole away his triple staff, his begging bowl, his water pot and his seat, while others took his prayer beads and his torn rags. Showing them to him they offered them back and then took them again away from the sage. When he at the river shore wanted to enjoy his share of the food he had acquired by begging, the grave sinners urinated upon it and spat on his head. He who after his vow of silence did not speak, they would challenge to speak beating him when he kept silent. Some shouted: 'This one is a thief' while others said: 'Tie him up, bind him!' and bound him in ropes. Some taunted him with disrespect like: 'This one is a religious hypocrite, a cheater who lost his wealth, was thrown out by his family and has now taken to this profession.' 8-3 'See how this person who in his silence pursues his goal as powerful and steadfast as the king of the mountains, is as firmly determined as a [deceptive] heron.' Some ridiculed him speaking thus, while others passed foul air and, binding him in chains, kept the brahmin captive like a pet animal. Thus subjected to [the three types of] impositions as caused by other living beings, by higher powers and by his own nature [see kles'a], he understood that whatever came his way befell him because of fate. Being insulted by lowly people trying to get the better of him he, fixed in goodness keeping firm to his duty, sang the following song [see also B.G. 18: 33].

The brahmin said: 'These people are not the cause of my happiness or distress, nor can I blame the demigods, my body, the planets, my karma or the time. It is, according to the standard authorities [the Shrutis] nothing but the mind that causes someone to rotate in the cycle of material life. The mind acquiring the qualities of the modes becomes very strong because of them and thus gives rise to the different sorts of white [good], red [passionate] and black [ignorant] activities that lead to the conditions [the societal classes] corresponding to those colours. The uninvolved Supersoul of transcendental enlightenment as a friend exists along with - and perceives - the struggling mind, that, with the image of the world it carries, embraces the objects of desire. It is in the engagement with the modes of nature that the individual soul [bewildered by that mind] gets entangled in attachment [see also B.G. 3.42-43]. Charity, one's prescribed duty, niyama, yama, and listening [to the scripture], pious works and the purification by vows all entail the subduing of the mind and have as their aim the absorption of the mind [samadhi] that constitutes the supreme [self-realisation] of yoga. What would be the use of charitable rituals and such for someone whose mind has been pacified by perfectly being absorbed [in Him]? Or, why would one in addition, occupy oneself with these processes of distribution and such when one has lost one's way with a mind not under control? Other gods [and the senses they represent] have always fallen under the control of the mind that itself never allows the control of anything [or anyone] else. He constitutes a fearsome god stronger than the strongest and the One who [in the form of His mantras] can bring him under control, is therefore the God of gods [see also B.G. 6: 35-36, *]. When one [being worldly engaged] fails to subdue that difficult to conquer enemy [see B.G. 6: 6] tormenting and attacking because of its unmanageable urges, some therefore being utterly bewildered create useless quarrels and are thus with the mortals in this world friends, neutrals and rivals. People whose entire mind is seized by their body, think in terms of 'I' and 'mine' and are thus blinded in their intelligence. Because of this difficult to defeat illusion of 'this I am' and 'that is someone else', they wander around in darkness. When you say that [adhibhautika] another human being is the cause of your happiness or distress, you may wonder what this means for the soul; happiness and distress [thus seen] belong to the earth [and not to the soul who finds happiness by self-realisation]. With whom can you be angry about the pain when your tongue happens to be bitten by your own teeth? When you [adhidivaika] say that the gods are responsible for your suffering, then how would that relate to your soul? That sufferig pertains to the changeable nature [of the senses and their rulers, the soul stands apart from]. With whom should you be angry when one limb of your body hurts another limb? When you say that the soul itself [adhyatmika] would be the cause of your happiness and distress, such a difference would be part of your own nature. But how can one when there is only the soul and nothing outside - neither happiness nor distress - blame anyone? That difference after all would be unreal then [see B.G. 2: 14]. If the planets would be the cause of one's happiness and distress, how would that relate to the soul who is unborn? The heavenly bodies relate to that what is born. A planet is only troubled by other planets so they [the astrologers] say, so with whom should the living being distinguished from his body [and his planetary positions] be angry then? If you assume karma to be the cause of your happiness and distress, what does that karma then mean to your soul? Certain is that with the animating person on the one hand and this animated body endowed with consciousness [that on itself is] not alive on the other hand, neither of both constitute the root cause of your karma. What is there left to be upset about then? And if we say that time would be the cause of our happiness and distress, where do we find the soul in that notion? The soul is not equal to the time, the way fire is not equal to its heat and snow is not equal to [cold]. With whom must one be angry when there is no duality in the transcendental position [see also B.G. 18: 16 and time quotes]? For him, [the spiritual soul] superior in transcendence, there is not from anyone, from whatever side or in any way the influence of the duality [of happiness and distress], the influence of the world of opposites, as can be seen with the arising false ego [of the mind being seised] that shapes one's material existence. He who awakens to this intelligence has nothing to fear from the material creation [with all her living beings]. By the worship of Mukunda's feet I will cross over the difficult to defeat ocean of material nescience. I am certain of this because of the foregoing great seers [or acaryas] who were firmly fixed in the worship of the Supreme Soul [see also B.G. 6: 1-2].'

The Supreme Lord said: 'While he had lost his wealth and gotten detached, while he had left his home and free from moroseness traveled the earth, the sage, despite being insulted by rascals, did not forsake his duties and spoke this song. There is no other cause of happiness and grief than the bewilderment of someone's mind that in material life out of ignorance created its friends, neutrals and enemies [see also 10.32: 17-22, B.G. 9: 29]. Therefore My best, bring in every respect with an intelligence absorbed in Me the mind under control and [attain] thus being connected the essence of the science of yoga [see also Shri Shri Shikshashthaka verse 1]. Whoever with full attention meditates on, makes others listen or listens himself to this [song] based upon the knowledge of the Absolute as sung by the mendicant, will for certain never [again] be overwhelmed by the dualities [of happiness and grief].'

*: Some think that the essence of yoga is to stop the mind all together, but Krishna stresses in this chapter clearly that it is about the control, not the stopping. That stopping is an impersonalist mayavada buddhist technique to concentrate on one's essence and constitutes a willfully created illusion [see Buddhism]. Saying neti-neti like Prahlada e.g. the mind will indeed concentrate on the essence which exactly will boost the mind in that direction. So with the stopping of its worldly engagement, the real engagement of the mind in prayers and philosophy begins. Not going for the siddhis, the mystical perfections, the mind must thus be engaged for the Fortunate One, for Krishna, by means of concentration on His names, mantras and stories. By Shraavanam, kirtanam etc. one has to learn to listen, sing and follow according to the scripture, the guru and the co-believers. The first two yoga sutras I.1 & 2 atha yoganUshanamam, yogah citta vritti nirodah, should be translated with 'as the lesson of yoga, now curb the rumination of the mind about worldly things' and not with 'your yoga lesson now is to stop the mind from working'. Of course one has to use one's mind, in obedience to the Holy Spirit, to the voice of God; the mind is after all an aspect of the divine ruled by Aniruddha in the catur vyuha (see also vritti and siddhi).

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 24:

Analytic Knowledge, Sankhya, Summarised

The Supreme Lord said: 'I shall now discuss with you the analytic knowledge as established by the classical authorities. Knowing this a person can immediately give up the bewilderment based upon the material duality. In the first age of dutifulness [Krita], in the beginning when there were [only] persons expert in [spiritual] discrimination, as also before that time [during the period of annihilation], the Knower was simply one and the same as the [universe] known [see also 11.22: 29]. That One Great Undifferentiated Truth inaccessible to speech and mind [Brahman], turned into the twofold of material nature on the one hand and the enjoyment [of the enjoyer of that result] on the other hand [see 11.22]. One essential half, material nature [prakriti] is she [the 'mother'], who is of a dualistic nature, while he, the other entity, the knower, is called the purusha [the enjoying person or male principle]. By My agitation of material nature [in the form of time, of Kala], the modes of tamas, rajas and sattva [the gunas] have manifested in order to fulfill the desires of the living entity. From them the thread [the activating principle of the sutra] arose, together with the principle of intelligence [mahat]. From the transformation of mahat came about the false ego [the ahankara of the purusha who identifies with the object of perception] that is the cause of bewilderment. That I-awareness is thus of the three [guna] categories and [accordingly makes] with clarity, emotion and ignorance [alternately use of] the sense objects [tanmatra], the senses [indriyas] and the mind [manas]. Thus it [the identified self] constitutes the cause of understanding and not understanding [the so-called conscious and unconscious]. The darkness of the false ego gave rise to the subtle sensations of gross matter, its emotion awakened the senses and the clarity of the identified self called for the eleven gods [see deva]. Because all the elements combined to function under My influence they brought the egg of the universe into being that serves as My supreme residence [see from 11.22: 18].

I appeared [as Narayana] in the egg that was situated in the water of the causal ocean and from My navel a lotus arose that is known as the universe. On that lotus the self-born one found his existence [Brahma, see 3.8]. He, the soul of the universe endowed with passion, created from his penance by My mercy the three different worlds called earth, the atmosphere and heaven [bhuh, bhuvah and svaha], as also its rulers [see Gayatri and loka]. Heaven became the residence of the demigods, the atmosphere the home of the ghostly spirits, the earthly places offered the humans and other living beings shelter and the place beyond these three is there for the Siddhas, the ones of perfection [Siddhaloka]. The places of the underworld were by the master created as the residence for all asuras [hunenlightened souls' or demons] and those perfect in their ego [the 'snakes', the Nagas]. All the destinations of the three worlds thus owe their existence to the fruitive activities proper to the modes [see B.G. 4: 17, 10.1: 42-43]. By penance, yoga and by forsaking [in sannayasa] one is of the spotless destinations of mahar, janas, tapas and satya, but My destination [Vaikuntha] is reached by performing devotional service. As arranged by Me, the Supporter, the Soul [the energy] of Time, one rises up from or drowns in the mighty stream of the modes of this world in which one is bound to performing fruitive labour. Whatever the small, the big, the thin and the thick of manifestation, is all brought about by the combination of material nature and its enjoyer [see also B.G. 18: 16]. That what constitutes the cause of something - common matters like things of gold and things of clay - is there in the beginning, during the life as also in the end of that what was produced and is subject to transformation [and is thus illusory as for its form, compare 6.16: 22, 10.87: 15, 11.22: 8]. Something that serves as a previous ingredient of a thing that - as something different - constitutes a change of form of that ingredient, is called the true of something provided it is present from the beginning to the end [compare B.G. 2: 13, 2: 16]. Material nature [prakriti] the foundation of which is constituted by the causal [transformed] ingredient of the Supreme Person [the purusha], together with that what is the agitating agent, viz. Time [kala], makes up the threefold of the Absolute Truth [Brahman] that I am. For as long as I look after it, the grand creation will perpetually, for the sake of the variegation of its qualities, generation after generation continue to exist until its dissolution [see also B.G. 3: 24]. When the form of the universe that is pervaded by Me has manifested the planetary variety of its time periods [of creation, maintenance and decay], this variety with its different worlds [losing its synergy] arrives at [a dissolution into] its five composing gross elements [see yugas, manvantaras, and B.G. 11: 13]. 2-2 The mortal frame [at the time of annihilation] will merge with the food, the food with the grains, the grains with the earth and the earth with the fragrance. Fragrance becomes merged with the water, the water with its quality of taste, the taste with the fire and the fire with the form. Form merges with air, air merges with touch and touch merges thereupon with the ether. Ether merges with the subtle object of sound and the senses [of sound etc.] become merged with their sources [the gods of the sun and moon etc.]. The sources My dear Uddhava, merge with the mind of the ego of goodness, the controller of the sound, that dissolves in the original state of the elements [the ego of slowness]. This all-powerful primal elementary nature then merges with the cosmic intelligence [mahat]. That greater principle dissolves in its own modes and they in their turn merge with their ultimate abode, the unmanifest state of nature that merges with the infallible Time. Time merges with the individuality [the jiva] of the Supreme in command of the illusory potency and that individuality merges with Me, the Supreme Self Unborn [atma], who, characterised by creation and annihilation, is perfectly established in Himself and remains alone [see also 3.11: 28, 4.23: 15-18, 11.3: 12-15]. Just as with the darkness when the sun rises in the sky, how can the bewilderment of the dual mind remain in the heart of the one who seriously studies this? This is what I, the Supervisor of the Spiritual and Material world, had to say concerning this Sankhya instruction of analysis [see also 3.25 - 3.33] that breaks through the bondage of doubts of the people who both go along with and go against nature.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 25:

The Three Modes of Nature and Beyond

The Supreme Lord said: 'Oh best of persons, try to understand what I am about to say concerning the way someone is influenced by a certain mode of My material nature [*]. - With the mode of goodness one finds equanimity, sense control, tolerance, discrimination, penance, truthfulness, compassion, remembrance, contentment, renunciation, freedom from desire, faithfulness, modesty and pleasure within. With the mode of passion there is lust, endeavor, conceit, dissatisfaction, false pride, a desire for blessings, separatism, sense gratification, rashness, love of praise, ridicule, display of valor and hard sanctioning. With the mode of ignorance one runs into intolerance, greed, deceitfulness, violence, attention seeking, hypocrisy, listlessness, quarrel, lamentation, delusion, the suffering of depression, sloth, false expectations, fear and indolence. These, one after the other described by Me, constitute the majority of the effects of the modes. Hear now about their combinations [see also B.G. 14]. Oh Uddhava, the notion of 'I am this way' and 'that is a trait of mine' that people have [in relation to these qualities] when they are engaged with their mind, senses, sense objects and life breath, reflects a combination of the modes [see also 11.23: 49, 11.24: 7, 11.24: 13]. In case a person is fixed in his religiosity, economic development and sense gratification, [also] the resultant faith, wealth and enjoyment is an expression of the interaction of the different modes. When a person in family life is of a dedication characterised by sense gratification and thereafter performs his religious duties, a combination of the modes is a fact. From someone's self-control can be deduced that he is endowed with goodness and so on, his lust is indicative of the mode of passion and such, and from his anger etcetera one may conclude that he is caught in ignorance. When someone worships Me with devotion and indifference about the results of his labour, such a person should be understood to be of a practice of goodness, whether he is a man or a woman. When one in the fulfillment of one's duties worships Me hoping for benedictions, such devotion must be understood as being of the nature of passion, and when one does it with violent intentions one is of ignorance [see also B.G. 17: 20-22]. The modes of sattva, tamas and rajas influence the [conditioned] individual but not Me; one is bound to them because they manifest in the mind and lead to attachment to life-forms and sense-objects [see also B.G. 4: 14]. When the mode of goodness - which is pure, luminous and auspicious - predominates over the other two [of passion and ignorance], a person will be blessed with happiness, religiosity, knowledge and other good qualities [see also B.G. 14: 11, 18: 37]. When passion defeats goodness and ignorance one gets attached, wants to make a difference and tends to impermanence, because of which one with profit minded actions and striving for a good name and wealth becomes unhappy [see also B.G. 14: 12, 18: 38]. When ignorance dominates passion and goodness one's discrimination is defeated, one's consciousness is covered, one's initiative is lost and one becomes endowed with bewilderment, complaints, sleeping too much, violence and false hopes [see also B.G. 14: 13, 18: 39]. When one's consciousness clears up and the senses are no longer distracted, one achieves physical self-confidence and a detached mind; know that to be the goodness of My refuge. When the intelligence is disturbed by too much activity, when one fails to disengage from one's senses, when one is not at ease with one's body and when the mind is unsteady, you should understand that to be the symptoms of passion. Failing in the higher functions of consciousness, getting dull, being unable to focus, not being mindful, not understanding things and being gloomy you should recognise as the mode of ignorance. When goodness increases the strength of the gods increases, when passion increases the demons grow stronger and when ignorance increases Uddhava, the wild men will get on top. Know that one is wakeful in the mode of goodness, that one is sleepy in passion, that one is not aware in the ignorant mode of the living entity and that the fourth [transcendental] state [of consciousness turiya] pervades the three [see also 7.7: 25 and B.G. 6: 16]. In the mode of goodness spiritual [Vedic] persons reach higher and higher, in the mode of ignorance one reaches head first lower and lower [births] and in the mode of passion one is stuck in between [in attachments, see also B.G. 6: 45, 16: 19]. Those who die in goodness go to heaven, those who die in passion go to the human world and those who die in ignorance go to hell. They however who are free from the modes come to Me [see also B.G. 9: 25, 14: 18]. Work dutifully done as a sacrifice unto Me without desiring the fruits is in the mode of goodness, work done with a profit motive is of the mode of passion and work performed with violence and pressure and such, is of the mode of ignorance [B.G. 17: 20-22]. Spiritual knowledge of detachment is of the mode of goodness, fostering opinions one is of the mode of passion and a materialistic conviction belongs to the mode of ignorance. Spiritual knowledge focussed upon Me [however] is considered to be free from the modes [see also 6.14: 2]. To have one's residence in the forest is of the mode of goodness, to reside in a town is said to be of the mode of passion, to reside in a gambling house is of the mode of ignorance but My residence is elevated above the modes [see also 7.12: 22, 11.18: 25]. A worker free from attachment is of the mode of goodness, blinded by personal desire one is of the mode of passion, having lost one's memory one speaks of the mode of ignorance [see 11.22: 38-39] [but] the one who has taken shelter of Me is free from the modes. In the mode of goodness one believes in spiritual matters, in the mode of passion one believes in fruitive activities, in the mode of ignorance one is irreligious, but one is transcendental to the modes with faith in My devotional service. Food that is wholesome, pure and attained effortlessly is considered to be of the mode of goodness, [strongly] catering to the senses it is of the mode of passion and impure food that makes one suffer is of ignorance [see also B.G. 17: 7-10]. Happiness derived from the soul is of the mode of goodness, generated by sense objects it is of passion, happiness derived from delusion and depravity is of the mode of ignorance, but free from the modes happiness is found in Me [see 11.15: 17 & B.G. 5: 21, but also 6: 7].

Material substance, the place, the fruit of action, time, knowledge, activity, the performer, faith, the state of consciousness and the species and destinations of life thus all belong to the three gunas. Oh best among men, all that exists, being seen, heard or pictured in one's mind, is a composition of the three modes that was established by the unseen [Original] Enjoyer. These forms of existence [and stages of life] of the [repeatedly incarnating] living being are bound to the operation of the modes. Oh gentle one, the individual soul who, dedicated to Me in bhakti-yoga, conquers these modes that manifest themselves in the mind, qualifies for My transcendental love. They who obtained this human body by which one acquires knowledge and develops wisdom, should therefore be as smart to shake off their attachment to the modes and worship Me. A learned man should worship Me free from material association; attentively having subdued his senses a sage should take to the mode of goodness and conquer the modes of passion and ignorance. With his intelligence pacified he, being connected [in bhakti] without any [other] dependency, should also conquer the mode of goodness. The embodied soul who [thus] freed from the modes gives up the cause of his conditioning, reaches Me. The living entity, who as an individual soul by Me thus was liberated from the modes of nature that nestled in his mind, achieves thus, by dint of the Absolute Truth, complete fulfillment and will no longer, neither internally nor externally, wander around.'

*: The word nature can also be taken literally as the modes in the sense of the seasons and their primary demigods. Krishna says that Vishnu, who is the original controller above the modes, the best of the gods [10.89: 14-17], is of goodness [11.15: 15], the purest mode [B.G. 14: 6], leading to the godliness of Him [B.G. 14: 14] and that of the seasons He is the season of spring [B.G. 10: 35]. As such is autumn/spring His season of balance and of the mode of goodness. The same way the inertia of cold is representative for the mode of ignorance that is ruled by Shiva and the hyperactivity and heat of the summer is a display of the mode of passion that is ruled by Brahma.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 26: The Song of Pururava

The Supreme Lord said: 'Having acquired this human body that is My characteristic, one achieves, being situated in My dharma, Me, the Supreme Soul of Spiritual Happiness situated in the heart. Someone who fixed in spiritual knowledge has become free from the cause of material life that is based upon the products of the modes, does not get entangled in their illusory qualities despite of being surrounded by them; although present before his eyes they are insubstantial and nothing but illusion to him. One should never at any time seek the company of materialists devoted to the gratification of their genitals and bellies because they who follow such people will fall into the darkest pit, like a blind man following another blind man. The descendant of Ila [called Aila or Pururava, see also 9.14: 15-16], the well-known great emperor, sang the following mighty song when he bewildered being separated from Urvasi, in resignation managed to restrain his grief. The moment she abandoned him and left, he naked crying like a madman ran after her calling out: 'Oh my wife, oh you terrible woman, please stop!' With his mind possessed by Urvasi he after years of insignificantly gratifying his lusts, was not satisfied and did not notice the nights coming and going.'

Pururava said: 'Just see how bewildered I got! With my consciousness contaminated by lust I, in the embrace of this goddess, did not notice my life time passing. I had no idea whether the sun was rising or setting and was, thus spending my days, alas robbed by her of countless years. Oh what a pity this total bewilderment of mine because of which the body of this mighty emperor, this crown jewel of kings, became a toy animal for women! When she abandoned me, the mighty controller, together with all of my kingdom as if I were a blade of grass, I ran crying naked like a madman after the woman. Where is now the influence, strength and sovereignty of the person I am? I ran after this woman leaving me, just like an ass with the hoof being kicked for punishment! What is the use of knowledge, austerities, renunciation, the scriptures or of solitude and silence for the one whose mind is stolen by women? To hell with the fool I am not knowing what his best interest would be; I who thought to be a scholar in achieving the position of a lord and controller but who, just like a bullock or ass, was conquered by women! For so many years serving Urvasi's lips I, with the lust born from my mind, never got enough of the nectar, just like a fire one can never satisfy with oblations. Who else but the Innerly Satisfied Lord of the Sages, the Supreme Lord Beyond the Senses, can free someone else who lost his mind with a courtesan? Out of control with myself being dull-minded, I saw no end to my confusion, even though the goddess [Urvasi] eloquently gave me advice [see 9.14: 20-22]. What would she have done wrong to a 'seer' like me who, taking a rope for a snake, has no notion of his real nature [his svarupa]? I am the one out of control with his senses is it not? What does this filthy body, unclean, full of bad odors, have to offer; what are those 'pleasing [feminine] qualities' and so on anyway? They constitute an influence originating from ignorance! 9-2 One can never tell whether this body belongs to one's parents, wife or employer, to [the funeral] fire, the dogs and jackals or to the [indwelling] soul or one's friends. One gets attached to this unholy matter and praises it, in case of a woman, for having such a cute nose, beautiful smile and face, but one heads with it for the lowest destination [of decay]. In what sense would one differ from worms when one enjoys that what is composed of skin, flesh, blood, muscle, fat, marrow and bone, urine, stool and pus? A man understanding what's best for him, should never run after women or associate with men thus engaged, for the sole reason that the mind united with the senses reaches for sense objects and thus gets agitated [compare 5.5: 2, 7.12: 9, 9.19: 17, 9.14: 36]. [Because] a thing not heard or seen gives no rise to mental agitation, the mind of someone not engaging his senses becomes fixed and pacified. When not even wise men can rely on the six enemies [lust, anger, greed, bewilderment, intoxication and envy; the shath-varga], then what about persons like me? One therefore should get sensorily attached to women or to men attached to women [see also yoshita].'

The Supreme Lord said: 'He, the worshipable lord of gods and men, who thus sang his song [of complaint], then gave up the world of Urvasi. Realizing Me, the Supersoul in his heart, he with the transcendental knowledge found peace within himself and ended his illusion. An intelligent person having abandoned bad association therefore should be fixed on devotees, for only by their words he can cut off the deep attachment of his mind. Devotees with their minds fixed on Me do not depend [on lusts] and are, with an equal minded vision, completely peaceful and free from possessiveness, false ego, the qualities and greed. Oh most fortunate one, these greatly fortunate souls are constantly discussing My stories that have the power to completely eradicate the sins of anyone who chooses for them. They who, faithfully dedicated to Me, hear, chant and respectfully take them [My stories] to heart, will attain My bhakti. What else would there remain [to be accomplished] for a devotee once he has achieved devotional service unto Me, the One of Countless Qualities who is the Absolute Truth comprising the experience of spiritual happiness? Just as cold, fear and darkness will dissipate for the one who resorts to the supreme grace of fire [Agni], similarly dullness, apprehension and ignorance will dissolve for someone who serves the devotees. For those who submerge and again rise in the fearful ocean of material life, the saintly devotees, peaceful in understanding the Absolute, constitute a supreme shelter as good as a life boat for people drowning in the water [compare 11.23: 28 and 11.17: 44]. Devotees constitute the refuge of those afraid to fall down, as good as food is there to grant the living beings their life, I exist as the shelter for the distressed and dharma is there as the wealth of the deceased. The devotees grant you the [divine] eyes while the sun [only] shows the external world after having risen; they are the worshipable ones, one's [true] relatives, they are one's actual self and Me as well [see also e.g. 1.1: 15, 3.5: 47, 3.6: 28, 11.2: 6]. He [Pururava] who for that reason no longer desired the world of Urvasi, then liberated from all attachment, innerly satisfied wandered this earth.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 27:

On Respecting the Form of the Lord
Shri Uddhava said: 'Can You please explain the ritual yoga [kriya-yoga] of the service unto You as a deity, oh Master? Who is of that worship, in respect of what form is one of worship and in what manner are You worshipped then, oh Master of the Satvatas [see also murti and 11.3: 48-55]? The sages Narada, Bhagavan Vyasa and my preceptor the son of Angira [Brihaspati] repeatedly say that for the welfare of men there is nothing as conducive. - The words about this that emanated from Your lotus mouth were spoken by the great unborn Lord [Brahma] unto his sons headed by Bhrigu and by the great Lord Shiva speaking to the goddess [Parvati, see B.G. 3: 9-10]. This [service to Your deity form] is approved by all classes and spiritual orders of society and is, I think, most beneficial for women and the working class oh Magnanimous One. Oh Lotus-eyed Lord, please, oh Controller of All Controllers in the Universe, speak to Your bhakta - who is so very attached - about this means of liberation from the bondage of karma.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'The number of [karma-kanda] prescriptions for worshipping deities [see e.g. B.G. 1-6] is endless Uddhava, let Me in brief explain it nicely one step at a time. One should worship Me as one desires following one of the three kinds of sacrifice according to the Vedas, the explanatory literatures [tantras like the Pancaratra] or a combination of them. Now hear from Me how a person, who according to the for him specific Vedic precepts [] achieved the status of a second birth, should worship Me with faith and devotion. He must, connected in bhakti, free from ulterior motives [honestly] with the necessary paraphernalia worship Me, his worshipable guru, as being present in a deity, a sacrificial area, a fire, in the [position of the] sun, in water or in the twice-born heart itself[]. For purification he should first bathe and brush his teeth and next purify himself with both types of [Vedic and tantric] mantras while applying clay and such [see tilaka, kavaca and 6.8: 3-10]. To be freed from his karma, he perfectly convinced should engage in My ritual worship [puja] and thereto perform duties as prescribed in the Vedas [see also 11.14: 35] with worship and such [like expressing the Gayatri-mantra] at the three junctures of the day [dawn, noon and sunset].

There are eight types of forms with which one remembers Me: in stone, wood, metal, smearable substances [like clay], being painted, in sand, in jewels and as an image kept in the mind. Of the two kinds of individual temple deities that are moved and not moved, the installed deity oh Uddhava, is in His worship not brought forward (avadana) and taken away again (udvasa). Not being installed one has these options, but when assigned a fixed place the following two possibilities are found: not being of a smearable substance [or being painted or made of wood] He is washed, in all other cases He is cleansed without water. There is the worship of My different deities with excellent paraphernalia, there is the worship of a devotee free from material desire using whatever that is readily available and there is the worship in the heart in a mental respect [by love only].

With a deity [in the temple] customary bathing and decorating is most appreciated Uddhava, for a holy place that is an exercise of respect in mantras [tattva-vinyasa] and for fire oblations [of sesame, barley etc.] drenched in ghee are considered best. With the sun that is a meditation in asanas [see Surya-namskar] and with water offerings of water and such are most suitable. Offerings presented with faith by a devotee of Mine are most dear to Me, even if it is just a bit of water. And what to say of an offering [by devotees] of foodstuffs, flowers, lamps, fragrances and incense [see also B.G. 9: 26]? An offer [by contrast] that, even if it is very rich, is made by a non-devotee will not satisfy Me [see also B.G. 16]. Cleansed, having collected the necessary items, having arranged the seat with blades [of kus'a grass] pointing to the east and sitting down facing the east or the north or else directly facing the deity, he should then be of worship [compare 1.19: 17, 4.24: 10, 8.9: 14-15]. After having assigned mantras to his own body and also having done this to My form, he should clean My Deity with his hand and properly prepare the sprinkling vessel and the sacred pot. With the water of the vessel sprinkling the area of the deity, the utensils and his own body, he next should prepare three vessels with water and arrange for the necessary auspicious items as far as available [like flowers, grains, blades of grass, sesame seeds etc., see ]. With the mantras for the heart [hridayaya namah], the head [s'irasa svaha] and the tuft of hair [s'ikhayai vashath] the worshiper should purify the three vessels of water for His feet [padya], His hands [arghya], and His mouth [acamana], and do the same with the Gayatri. He should meditate on the Original Individuality of all Expansions, the very subtle transcendental form of Mine that, within his body that was fully purified by air and fire, is situated on the lotus of the heart and by perfected souls is experienced in the end vibration of the Pranava [see also 2.2]. With that [meditated form] by his own realisation conceived, he, of worship within his body and fully being absorbed in thought of Me, should invite Me within the deity - and all that is respected along with it - by touching My limbs with mantras [nyasa] and thereupon honour Me [externally by performing puja]. 5-2 After first having imagined My seat decorated with the nine Shaktis and the [deities of] dharma etc. [*4] as an effulgent eight-petaled lotus with saffron filaments in its whorl, he should offer to Me the padya, arghya and acamana water and other items of worship to be perfect with the two [of enjoyment and liberation] in respect of both the Vedas and the tantras. One after the other he next must honour My discus-weapon [the Sudars'ana cakra], conch [the Pancajanya], club [the Kaumodaki] and arrows and bow [the Sharnga], My [Balarama items of the] plow and pestle [hala and mushala], My gem [the Kaustubha], garland [the Vajrayanti] and chest mark curl of white hairs [the Shrivatsa]. [He also honours] Garuda, Nanda, Sunanda, Pracanda and Canda, Mahabala, Bala, Kumuda and Kumudekshana [My carrier bird and eight associates]. Durga, Vinayaka [Ganes'a], Vyasa, Vishvakshena [see 6.8: 29, 9.21: 25-26], the spiritual masters and the demigods - each in their own place facing the deity - should be worshipped with the sprinkling of water and other rituals [*5]. 0-3 Every day [the deity] should be bathed, as far as the means permit, using different kinds of water scented with sandalwood, us'ira root, camphor, kunkuma and aguru. Also hymns should be chanted such as the ones from a section of the Vedas known as Svarna-gharma, the incantation called Mahapurusha, the Purusha-sukta [from the Rig Veda] and songs from the Sama Veda like the Rajana and others. My devotee should lovingly decorate Me with clothing, a sacred thread, ornaments, marks of tilaka, garlands and [apply] fragrant oils, the way it is enjoined. The worshiper should with faith present to Me padya and acamana water, fragrances and flowers, whole grains, incense, lamps and other items. According to his means he should make offerings of foodstuffs like candy, sweet rice, ghee, rice flour cake [s'ashkuli], sweet cakes [apupa], sweet rice flour dumplings with coconut [modaka], spicy sweet wheat cake of ghee and milk [samyava], yogurt and vegetable soups. On special days or else every day [the deity] should be offered a massage with ointment, a mirror, an eucalyptus stick for cleaning the teeth, a bath, food to be chewed and not to be chewed, as also song and dance. In a sacrificial area set up as prescribed he should, wearing a girdle, using a fire pit and an elevation for sacrificing, by hand build and bring to a blaze a fire that is equally piled up. Spreading [kus'a grass, mats] and then sprinkling and ceremonially [anvadhana] placing wood in the fire according to the rules, he should, having arranged for the acamana water, sprinkle the items to offer and meditate on Me as residing in the fire. 8-4 Meditating in worship of Me as being brilliant with a colour of molten gold, with My conch, disc, club and lotus, My four arms and peacefulness; My garment with the colour of the filaments of a lotus, shining helmet, bracelets, belt, the ornaments on My arms, the Shrivatsa on My chest, the effulgent Kaustubha and a flower garland; throwing pieces of wood soaked in ghee into the fire and in the course of the arghya ritual making the two offerings of sprinkling ghee [in two ways called Agharas] and [two different] oblations of ghee [called Ajyabhagas], a learned person should, with root mantras and the [sixteen lines of the] Purusha-sukta hymn, offer the oblations into the fire for Yamaraja and the other demigods called Swishthikrit in due order using a mantra for each [see also 11.14: 36-42, 11.19: 20-24, 11.21: 15]. Thus having been of worship he should bow to offer obeisances unto My associates and next present offerings chanting the basic mantra for the deity in question, thereby remembering Narayana as the Original Self of the Absolute Truth. After having offered acamana water and giving the remnants of the food to Vishvakshena, he should present to Me prepared betel nut with fragrant substances for the mouth [see also 11.3: 48-53, 11.25: 28]. He should [next] for some time [see kala, 11.21: 9] become absorbed in celebration by listening himself and make others listen to My stories, by acting out My transcendental activities and by dancing, chanting loudly and singing along with others [see also e.g. 11.5: 36-37, 11.14: 23-24]. With prayers from the Puranas, with large or small prayers from other ancient scriptures, with prayers written by others [see bhajans] and prayers from more common sources, he should prostrate himself, pay his obeisances and say: 'Oh Lord, please show Your mercy [prasada bhagavan]'. Placing his head at My feet with his palms brought together [he may say a prayer like:] 'Oh Lord, please protect this surrendered soul who in this material ocean is afraid of being devoured by death [prapannam pahi mam is'a, bhitam mrityu-graharnavat, compare B.G. 11: 19]'. Praying thus he should put the remnants granted by Me to his head and do this prayer once more - when the deity respectfully is to be bidden farewell - to give the light [of the deity] a place within the light [of his heart]*6).

Whenever one develops faith in Me, in whatever deity form or other manifestation, one should for that form be of worship since I, the Original Soul of All, am situated within My own form as also in all living beings [see also B.G. 6: 31 and *7]. By thus being of worship with the [ritual] processes of acting in yoga as described in the Vedas and more specialised texts, a person will, in both this life and the next, by My grace achieve the perfection he desired. In order to properly establish My deity the devotee should build a strong temple and maintain beautiful flower gardens [that provide flowers] for daily puja, festivals and yearly occasions. In order to assure the continuance of the daily worship and the special occasions, he donates land, shops, cities and villages and will achieve an opulence equal to Mine. Installing a deity one attains the entire earth, building a temple one attains the three worlds and performing puja and likewise services one attains the realm of Brahma, but when one does all of these three one will attain a quality [a transcendental integrity] equal to Mine. He who free from ulterior motives worships Me thus, will by bhakti-yoga unite his consciousness in devotion and attain Me [see also 5.5: 14, 11.12: 24 and B.G. 6: 44]. The one who destroys [or steals away] the service [and/or the goods] delivered to the gods and the brahmins by oneself or by others, is a stool-eating worm bound to take birth for a hundred million years [compare 10.64: 39]. The perpetrator [of that kind of offense] as also his accomplice, the one who instigated it and the one who approved it, all will have to share the karmic consequences in the life that follows over and over [depending the degree of the damage done].'

*: The parampara says to this that members of the three higher classes of society all achieve the twice-born status by initiation into the Gayatri mantra. Brahmana boys may according to the tradition after due preparation be initiated at the age of eight, kshatriya boys when they are eleven and vais'ya boys at the age of twelve.

': The materialistic devotee - almost any person thus - is of devotion with the help of an image of God in the form of a timetable, the sacrificial ground in the form of the desk in his office, the fire in the stove on which he regularly cooks his meals, the sun with the date on the solar calendar and the clock he is manipulating pragmatically, the water with the daily shower he takes and the dishes he washes, and with the twice-born heart that he in his daily contemplations according to the wisdom as an adult acquired from personal experience and from his teachers. Everyone is thus, more or less engaged in devotional service in the practices of devotion as mentioned here, be it at an unconscious materialist and rather impersonal level (see prakrita).

: 'Shrila Shridhara Svami gives references from the Vedic literature stating that the water meant for bathing the feet should be combined with millet seeds, durva grass mixed in water, vishnukranta flowers and other items. The water used for arghya should include the following eight items - fragrant oil, flowers, unbroken barleycorns, husked barleycorns, the tips of kus'a grass, sesame seeds, mustard seeds and durva grass. The water for sipping should include jasmine flowers, ground cloves and kakkola berries' (p.p. 11.27: 2).

*4: The seat of dharma is imagined here as consisting of righteousness, wisdom, detachment and supremacy for its legs, the opposite values for the sides of the seat and the three gunas for the three planks of the base.

*5: According to Shrila Jiva Gosvami the personalities mentioned here are eternally liberated associates of the Lord who reside in the spiritual sky beyond the material manifestation. Not so much the Ganes'a who in this world, as the son of Lord Shiva, is famous for awarding financial success, and the goddess Durga, the wife of Lord Shiva, renowned as the external, illusory potency of the Supreme Lord. (p.p. 11.27: 2).

*6: Devotees accepting flowers, food or fire from the deity customarily take the offering first to their head as a token of respect.

*7: The parampara adds here: 'By regulated, faithful worship one gradually understands that the deity is completely nondifferent from the Supreme Lord Himself. At that stage one, on the strength of deity worship, rises to the second-class platform of devotional service. At this more developed stage one desires to make friendship with other devotees of the Lord, and as one becomes solidly established in the community of Vaishnavas, one completely gives up material life and gradually becomes perfect in Krishna consciousness' (p.p. 11.27: 4).

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 28:

Jnana Yoga or the Denomination and the Real

The Supreme Lord said: 'When one understands that the world, this combination of matter and person, is based upon one and the same reality, one should refrain from praising and criticizing someone else's nature and activities. He who praises or criticizes someone else's nature and actions quickly strays from his [real] interest [of self-realisation] because he thus adheres to the falsehood [of the world of opposites]. A person aware of the objective diversity is just [as unaware of the one reality] as an embodied soul whose senses, overcome by sleep, experience the illusory reality [of a dream] or the deathlike state of having lost consciousness. What would be good or what would be bad in this unreal, deceptive material duality that, considered by the mind and put into words, results in a false [insufficient] image of reality [?]? Even though shadows, echoes and mirages constitute mere suggestions, they create motives [in people]; the same way the body and what belongs to it gives rise to material conceptions [identifications] that create fear until the day one dies [for they offer no firm hold]. - The Master, the Lord, the Soul alone, manifests this universe and Himself, protects all that exists and Himself and withdraws both the creation and Himself. Apart from the Soul, outside of Him, hence no separate living being can be found, just as no other basis can be found for this, within the Self perceived, threefold splendor of the gunas - that you must know as the threefold manifestation generated by the illusory energy of maya [B.G. 14: 19]. Someone who, perfectly conversant and experienced, is well aware of what I have now described, does not blame or praise [in looking for another cause], and wanders the earth as free as the sun. When one by direct perception, logical deduction, scriptural truth and one's self-realisation knows that that which is inessential has a beginning and an end, one should move around in this world free from attachment [see also B.G. 2: 16].'

Shri Uddhava said: 'Material existence is not the experience of the seer who is a soul of self-realisation, nor the experience of the spiritless body that constitutes the seen. Whose experience might it be then oh Lord? The inexhaustible soul, free from the modes, is pure, self-luminous and uncovered just like a fire, while the material body is like firewood that is without understanding. To which of the two belongs the experience of a material life in this world?'

The Supreme Lord said: 'As long as the soul is attracted to the body, the senses and the life force, material existence will continue to flourish, despite being meaningless to the ignorant. Even though not having a purpose of its own, the course of mundane existence [the 'wheel'] does not cease to exist; one keeps, like [being caught] in a dream, contemplating the objects of the senses and the meaninglessness arriving with it [compare 3.27: 4, 4.29: 35 & 73, 11.22: 56, B.G. 2: 14]. But that [dreaming] what presents someone who is not awake many undesirable experiences in his sleep, will certainly not confound the one who awakened. Lamentation, elation, fear, anger, greed, confusion, hankering and such, one observes with the birth and death of the false ego [ahankara] and [is] not [seen] with the soul [that does not take birth or die, see 11.22: 12, 11.23: 50-56, 11.25: 30]. The individual soul [of identification] with his attention directed at the body, the senses, the life force and the mind, assumes, depending the gunas and the karma, his form within the [great universal] Self. With the lead [the sutra] of the complete of nature thus very differently denominated [as a dog, ape or human being], he then controlled by time moves around in material existence. A sober sage free from desire moving around in this world will, with the sword of transcendental knowledge sharpened by worship, cut with this, without a firm basis, [in false ego] being represented in the many forms of the mind, the speech, the life force and the bodily functions. Spiritual knowledge [jnana, entails] the discrimination [of spirit and matter and is nourished by] scripture and penance, personal experience, historical accounts and logical inference. [It is based upon] that what is there in the beginning, what stays the same in between and what remains in the end of this [creation], namely the Time and Ultimate Cause [of brahman, the Absolute Truth, see also B.G. 10: 30, 33, 11: 32 and kala]. Just like gold alone being present before it is processed, when it is processed and in the final product of the processing, I am present in different disguises [of the with the gunas processing of] this creation [see also guna-avatars]. My dearest, this spirit of condensed knowledge [this transcendental intelligence] in its three conditions [of wakefulness, sleep and unconscious sleep], constitutes, while manifesting itself in the form of the three modes as the causing [of rajass], the caused [of tamass] and the causal agent [of sattva, compare 11.22: 30], the fourth factor [the 'gold' or turiya] that as an independent variable stands for the single [Absolute] Truth of each of them. That what was absent before, is absent afterwards and is not there [independently] in between, is but a designation, a reference. Whatever that was created and is known by something else, is actually only [a reference to] that something else - that is how I see it. Even though this creation, which appears with the transformations of the mode of passion, not really exists, it thus shines forth as [a reference to] the Absolute Truth standing in its own light, as the Brahman [the impersonal form of God] of the variety of senses, their objects, the self and the transformations [of the five elements, see also siddhanta]. When one by discriminating this way has achieved clarity about the Absolute of the Spiritual Truth, one must wisely speak against the opposite [of falsely identifying oneself], cut with the doubt regarding the Soul and in the contentment of one's own spiritual happiness desist from all lusty [unregulated] matters [see B.G. 3: 34]. The body made of earth is not the true self, nor are the senses that, their gods or the life air, the external air, water, fire or a mind only interested in matter [food]; nor is the intelligence that, material consciousness, the I that thinks itself the doer, the ether, the earth, material things or the restraint [the universal primeval state of equilibrium]. Having properly distinguished My abode [or personal identity], what will be the virtue of the meditative control of the senses - which are manifestations of the gunas - or what would on the other hand be the objection against their agitation; what difference would it make to the sun whether the clouds gather or disperse? Just as the sky itself is not affected by the coming and going qualities of the atmosphere, fire, water and earth or by the qualities of the seasons [of heat and cold], also the Imperishable Supreme remains free from the influence of sattva, rajass and tamass, the modes that constitute the cause of the I-concept of material existence [see also 1.3: 36, 3.27: 1, B.G. 7: 13]. Nevertheless, until one by steadfast bhakti-yoga unto Me has banned all the impurity of passion from one's mind, one must avoid the attachment with the modes that was produced by the deluding material energy [see B.G. 7: 1, 14 and *]. The same way a disease that was treated imperfectly time and again returns and gives a man trouble, also a mind not purified of its karmic contamination will torment an inexperienced yogi who is still of all kinds of attachment. Imperfect yogis who are commanded by impediments in the form of the human beings [family members, disciples etc., see e.g. Shri Shri Shikshashthaka-4] sent to them by the thirty gods [see tridas'a] will, by their perseverance in their previous life, once again [in a new life] engage in the practice of yoga, but never more be entangled in fruitive activities [see also 11.18: 14, B.G. 6: 41-42]. A normal living being affected by the work he performs, his karma, remains, impelled by sometimes this and then again that impulse, in that position until the moment he dies. But someone intelligent is, despite being situated in the material position, not that [fickle], because he, with the experience of the happiness he found, gave up his material desire. Someone whose consciousness is fixed in the True Self does not give it a moment's thought whether he is standing, sitting, walking or lying down, urinating, eating food or doing whatever else that manifests from his conditioned nature. When one is intelligent one does not take anything else [but the soul] for essential. Whenever such a one faces the not really [independently] existing matters of the senses, he from his logic denies them their separateness, so that they are like the things of a dream that disappear when one wakes up. The soul is not something one accepts or rejects [that comes and goes], but the ignorance [resulting in a material body] that you in many forms under the influence of karma and guna accepted as an inextricable part of yourself My best one, [ultimately] dissolves again in simply that knowledge. Just as the rising sun puts and end to the darkness in the human eye without creating what exists, also a clever and thorough search for My pure truth puts an end to the darkness of someone's intelligence. This self-luminous, unborn, immeasurable Greatness of Understanding who is aware of everything is the One Without a Second in whom words find their closure and by whom impelled speech and the life airs are moving. Whatever notion of duality one might have of the [Supreme] Soul is nothing but a figment of the mind; for such an idea there is no other ground than one's own [identified] self [compare 7.13: 7]. The explanations [in terms of good and bad, see also 11.21: 16] offered by the so-called scholars of the meaning of this, in names and forms perceivable, duality that unmistakably consists of the five elements, are [completely] in vain [see also 5.6: 11].

The body of a yogi who with a lack of experience tries to engage in the practice of yoga, may be hindered by rising disturbances. In that case the following rule of conduct is prescribed. Some disturbances may be overcome by postures [asanas] combined with concentration exercises [dharana], others can be defeated by penances [tapas, see ], mantras and medicinal herbs. Certain inauspicious matters one can overcome step by step by constantly thinking of Me [Vishnu-smarana], by [loudly or silently] honouring My names and such [japa, sankirtana] and by following in the footsteps of the masters of yoga [see also B.G. 6: 25]. Some [yogis] keep their bodies under control and make them fit by focussing on health, employing different methods and exercises for the sake of material perfection [siddhis]. It goes without saying that good health should not be worshipped when such an endeavor is useless, for in matters of the body one is, just like a fruit on a tree, subject to decay [see also 11.15: 33]. Although the material body of someone regularly practicing yoga will attain fitness, being intelligent My devotee does not put faith in such yoga and will give it up [in the course of time*4]. The yogi who, free from desires takes to My shelter and practices this process of yoga, experiences the inner happiness [of the soul] and accepts no defeat by disturbances.'

*: Contrary to popular notions that the medium would be the message, here is stated clearly that the medium is not the message. The words and the ideas, and also the so-called fixed form of things, are all false relative to the original truth, the message, the essence. That what is expressed is the essence, not the expression itself. So the one living being of the person and the living material nature with her Time as the masculine aspect, is the essence and all ideas, fixed things of it and words about it are actually false. Thus we have the paradox of the in itself false expression in words and ideas, this sentence before you as a reader e.g., of that what is true on itself as the wholeness of life. So there are idols of Krishna being worshiped with the strict warning not to consider them as something material. Thus praise and criticism, good and bad, are dual notions missing the point of what is objectively the value free reality of brahman, the Absolute Truth of the reality free from illusion that is equally present both outside and inside. Or as one puts it these days: science is value-free.

 The purport of this is that, even though material nature as His gigantic virath-rupa form is nondifferent from the Supreme Lord (as elaborately described in this and other chapters), one who has yet to conquer material desire must not artificially seek solace in material things, declaring them to be nondifferent from the Lord [see p.p. 11.28: 27].

 Concerning penance the beginner is reminded of the fact that voluntary penance, voluntary suffering, is better than penance enforced from the outside in the form of a disease, legal prosecution, shortage, calamities etc. Like the Jews in Exodus would be ready to leave Egypt one should be ready for the coming of the Lord [see also 11.17: 42 and B.G. 2: 40, 12: 16].

*4: Here one is reminded of the fact that characters like Ravana and Hiranyakas'ipu also practiced yoga and attained fitness; attaining perfections that way can also be something demoniac and is thus not the object of belief as stated here.

Attaining the Lord is rather the motive for the yogi. Control, health and order is something nice to achieve, but without the Lord it is just as well a thing of the devil.

Bhakti Yoga: the Most Auspicious way to Conquer Death
Shri Uddhava said: 'This process of yoga is, I think, most difficult to execute for someone not spiritual. Please, oh Acyuta, tell me in simple terms how a person may easily succeed [see also B.G. 6: 33-34]. Generally oh Lotus-eyed One, [beginning] yoga practitioners get frustrated trying to unite the mind and, unable to find absorption, grow weary of subduing their thoughts. For that reason oh Lotus-eyed Lord of the Universe, the swanlike [devotees] delight in taking to the shelter of Your lotus feet that are the source of all ecstasy, while they who take pride in the results of their yoga, do not [take shelter] and are defeated by Your material energy. It comes as no surprise Acyuta, that You as a friend to all servants with no other shelter, are joined in intimacy with them [are commanded by them]. You who [as Rama] were affectionate with the animal-like [Vanaras] while the edges of Your footstool were covered by the effulgent helmets of the great controllers [like Brahma]. Knowing the benefit You offer oh Supreme Soul, Bestower of All Perfections and dearest Lord to those seeking shelter, who would reject You or ever be devoted to anything else and forget [about You in exchange] for some opulence? What would not be granted to us when we serve the dust of Your feet [see also 10.44: 15, 10.47: 46]? The scholars - despite all their work - would not even with a lifetime as long as Brahma's be capable of expressing the gratitude [we owe You], oh Lord. For You, in order to remind us of the greater [spiritual] joy for dispelling the sadness of being embodied, show us Your path in two ways: in the form of that what from the caitya authority [of the Supersoul] is mentally conceived within and that what from the outside is conceived on the authority of the acarya [the parampara-guru of the tradition].'

Shri Shuka said: 'Thus questioned by Uddhava who in his heart was most attached to Him, the Lord of all Lords spoke lovingly with an attractive smile, He who - with the universe as His plaything - by His energies assumed His three [principal] forms [the guna-avatars].' The Supreme Lord said: 'I shall explain to you My most auspicious dharma by means of which, with faith executed, a mortal being may defeat unconquerable death. He whose mind is attracted to My devotional service and has offered his heart and intelligence unto Me, should remember to perform step by step all his prescribed duties for My sake. One should take shelter of the holy places frequented by My saintly devotees and [follow the example of] the conduct of My devotees among the demigods, humans and demons. Either alone or in association one should with respect for the position of the moon [e.g.], at special occasions and at festivals engage in singing and dancing and so on, with royal opulence [and generous contributions]. With a pure heart one should see Me, the Supreme Soul free as the sky, as being present within and without oneself and all living beings [see also B.G. 13: 16 and 1.7: 10]. 3-1 Oh brightest spirit, when one with My love thus is of respect for all living beings, one with such an approach has taken shelter of the highest possible knowledge, the absolute unity of spirit. This way regarding the brahmin and the outcast, the thief and the man faithful to the brahminical culture, the sun and the spark, the gentle one and the cruel one equally, one is considered a wise person [see B.G. 5: 18]. Of the person who constantly meditates upon My presence in all men quickly the rivalry, envy, disdain and false ego will disappear. Ignoring the laughter of one's friends and without being embarrassed about outer appearances one should [factually] throw oneself like a rod to the ground and offer one's obeisances to [all.] even [to] dogs, outcasts, cows and asses [see also Shri Shri Shikshashthaka-3]. With the functions of what one says, thinks and does, one this way will have to be of worship as long as one has not developed the vision of Me being present in all living beings [see also tridanda]. For the one who by knowledge and realisation sees the Supreme Soul everywhere, everything is based upon the Absolute Truth. Thus free from doubt he should desists from [material striving, karmic activities]. I consider this - with the functions of one's mind, words and actions seeing Me within all living beings - the most appropriate of all processes. My dear, because this by Me perfectly established method is free from the modes and has no ulterior motives there is, when one thus tries to be of service unto Me Uddhava, not even the slightest loss [see also B.G. 2: 40]. Oh best among the pious souls, when one is capable of performing one's duty free from ulterior motives for the sake of Me, the One Supreme, [the emotions] of that endeavor like fear and such, will be futile [see also B.G. 18: 6]. This in one's life by means of the false and mortal achieving of Me, the One Immortal, constitutes the cleverness of the clever and the intelligence of the intelligent.

This survey both in brief and in detail I thus explained to you, constitutes the complete science of the Absolute Truth that even for the demigods is difficult to access. With clear, logical arguments I repeatedly explained to you the spiritual knowledge; properly understood this will put an end to the doubts a person may have and liberate him. He who concentrates on this question of yours as also on My clear reply, will attain the eternal secret of the Vedas, the Supreme, Absolute Truth. I shall naturally, give Myself to that person who without reservation passes on to devotees this traditional instruction of Mine, this knowledge of the Absolute Truth. He who repeats [for others] this Supreme [Knowledge] that is so sanctifying and clear, reveals My presence with the lamp of knowledge and will find purification day after day. The person who attentively and with faith regularly listens to this and is of transcendental devotional service unto Me [is a bhakta], will not get entangled in karmic activities [see also B.G. 3: 9]. Uddhava, oh friend, do you have a clear understanding of the spiritual now and has this lamentation and illusion that arose in your mind been removed [see 11.6: 42-49 and also B.G. 18: 72]? Do not share this with a hypocrite, an atheist or a cheat, nor with someone not willing to listen, a non-devotee or an obstinate person [compare to B.G. 18: 67]. Share it with a person free from these bad qualities, someone virtuous and pure, kindly disposed and dedicated to the welfare of the brahmins, as also with labourers and women if they are of devotion [compare B.G. 9: 32]. For the inquisitive one fully understanding this, there is nothing further to know; once one has drunk the nectar of this palatable beverage nothing will remain. Everything that people of success with the four goals of life [cauth-vidah] may find in knowledge, fruitive labour, mystic yoga, ordinary activities or in political ruling, you can equally find in Me My best one [see also B.G. 18: 66]. When a mortal surrenders himself to Me and forsakes all his fruitive labour in his desire of service, he at that time attains freedom from birth and death and qualifies for sharing in My nature.'

Shri Shuka said: 'After he had heard the words of Uttamas'loka and thus was shown the path of yoga, Uddhava with folded hands said nothing because his throat was choked up with love and his eyes were brimming with tears. Checking himself to steady his mind that was overwhelmed by love, oh King, he felt most grateful. With folded hands he touched the lotus feet of the Hero of the Yadus with his head and addressed Him. Shri Uddhava said: 'The great darkness of the delusion I embraced oh Unborn Primeval Person, was dispelled by Your presence. What cold, darkness and fear would have power over someone who approached the sun? You who are so merciful in Your goodness offered to me Your servant, in return the torchlight consisting of Your wisdom. Whoever filled with gratitude can abandon the basis of Your feet and look for another shelter? The because of Your maya firmly binding rope of my affection for the Das'arhas, Vrishnis, Andhakas and Satvatas, cast by You for the production of offspring, was severed by the sword of the correct knowledge about the soul. Let me offer my obeisances unto You oh Greatest Yogi, please tell me how I as a surrendered soul can be steadfast in the attraction of Your lotus feet.'

The Supreme Lord said: 'Please Uddhava, accept My advice to head for My hermitage called Badarika. At the riverbanks there be purified by the touching of and bathing in the water emanating from My feet [see 5.17]. Be, with your eyes fixed upon the Alakananda [a tributary of the Ganges] cleansed of all impurities, dress yourself in bark My deer, eat from the forest and be happy freed from desire. Exercise with your intelligence, spiritual knowledge and wisdom, forbearance with all dualities, keep saintly to your principles, restrict your senses and live in peace and absorption. Believe in and meditate upon that what you from Me have learned to discriminate. When you with your words and mind absorbed in Me thus devote yourself to My dharma you will, with that discipline reaching beyond the three destinations [the gunas or the three worlds], thereupon reach Me.'

Shri Shuka said: 'After thus having been addressed by the Lord of Understanding, Uddhava circumambulated Him keeping Him to the right and even though he at the time of his departure was free from the influence of material opposites, he with a breaking heart with his head bowed down flooded His feet with his tears. Finding it most difficult to let go of His love, he because of the departure was overwhelmed by emotions and could not abandon Him. Filled with pain he again and again offered his obeisances and placed the slippers of his Maintainer on his head. Then he departed [*]. The great devotee then installed Him permanently in his heart and went to the illustrious place of pilgrimage [which as such is also called Vis'ala] the One Friend in the Universe had mentioned. There properly executing his austerities, he attained the Lord's destination [Vaikunthha]. Anyone who with honest belief is full of attention for [listens to, speaks about and practices] this ocean of ecstasy, this nectarean sea of spiritual knowledge [of bhakti-yoga] that by Krishna, He whose feet are served by the masters of Yoga, was collected for His devotee, will liberate [himself and therewith] the entire world. I am bowed down to the greatest and first of all beings, the personality named Krishna, who makes His many devotees drink the nectar from the [milk] ocean that is de essence of the Vedas, the essence of the spiritual knowledge and wisdom that

He, as the author of the Vedas, like a bee delivered in order to take away the fear of material existence.'

*: The parampara adds here: 'According to the Shrimad Bhagavatam [3.4: 5], while Uddhava was enroute to Badarikashrama he heard about the Lord's journey to Prabhasa. Turning back and following Lord Krishna from behind, he saw the Lord alone just after the withdrawal of the Yadu dynasty. After being again mercifully instructed by the Personality of Godhead (along with Maitreya, who had just arrived), Uddhava felt his knowledge of the truth reawaken, and then, by the order of the Lord, he went on his way.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 30:

The Disappearance of the Yadu dynasty

The honourable king [Parikshit] said: 'What did the Supreme Lord and Protector of All Living Beings do in Dvaraka after Uddhava, the great devotee, had left for the forest? Please tell how He, the Chief of the Yadus Dearest to All Eyes, gave up His body when His family found destruction after being cursed by the brahmins [see 11.1]? Attached to His form the women could not turn their eyes away from Him and having entered the ears of the sages His form, occupying their minds, would not leave them. How attractive were the words that by the ambitious poets were used to express His beauty? And what to say of those who, seeing Him on the battlefield on Arjuna's chariot, acquired a similar status [of being liberated]?'

The powerful rishi [Shuka] said: 'Observing the great disturbances that had appeared in the sky, the earth and in outer space, Krishna addressed the Yadus seated in the Sudharma hall [see 10.50: 54] as follows [see also 1.14]. The Supreme Lord said: 'Oh best of the Yadus, considering these fearful, great and inauspicious omens, that are like the flags of the king of death, we should not stay a moment longer here in Dvaraka. The women, the children and the elderly should go from here to Shankhodhara [halfway Dvaraka and Prabhasa] and we will go to Prabhasa where the Sarasvati flows westward. There we should purify by bathing, fast and fix our minds, and then worship the gods [the idols] with various offerings, ablations and alepa [smearing with sandalwood]. When the brahmins have performed the ceremonies for our well-being, we will give them cows, land, gold, clothing, elephants, horses, chariots and houses [see also 3.3: 26-28]. This is the course we have to follow in order to avert misfortune and bring about good fortune, for to worship the best among the living beings - the gods, the brahmins and the cows - brings about the highest perfection [compare to 10.24: 25].' After they all thus had listened to the Enemy of Madhu, the elderly Yadus said 'So be it!' and crossed over by boat [to the mainland] to head for Prabhasa in chariots. There the Yadus performed in accordance with the instructions of the Lord of the Yadus, the Supreme Personality, all auspicious rituals with transcendental devotion and everything else that would strengthen them. Then they, as was destined [see 11.1: 4], lost their intelligence drinking from a large supply of sweet tasting mairaya [honey-liquor], the ingredients of which overpowered their minds [see also 6.1: 58-60]. Among the heroes bewildered by Krishna's illusory potency a terrible quarrel arose because they were intoxicated by the excessive drinking became arrogant. Infuriated they on the shore took up their weapons - their bows, swords, bhalla-arrows [arrows with a particular arrowhead] clubs, lances and spears - and fought. Attacking with arrows, they most enraged faced each other with flying flags riding chariots, elephants and other carriers: asses, camels, bulls, buffaloes, mules and even humans, just like elephants in the forest fighting with their tusks. With their enemy aroused Pradyumna in the battle fought ferociously against Samba, Akruva against Bhoja, Aniruddha against Satyaki, Subhadra against Sangramajit, Sumitra against Suratha and the two Gadas [the brother and a son of Krishna] against each other. Others also, like Nis'athha, Ulmuka and more of them headed by Sahasrajit, Shatajit and Bhanu, confronted and killed each other, blinded by their intoxication and totally being bewildered by Mukunda. Completely forgetting their friendship, the Kuntis, the Kukuras, the Visarjanas, the Madhus and Arbudas, Vrishnis and Andhakas, the Bhojas, the Satvatas, the Das'arhas and the inhabitants of Mathura and Shurasena slaughtered each other. In their bewildered state relatives killed relatives and friends killed friends; sons fought against their fathers and their brothers, nephews against uncles, paternal uncles against maternal uncles and well-wishers against well-wishers. Running out of arrows and having their bows broken and missiles used, they took up cane stalks [rakas, see 11.1: 22]. Those stalks held in their fists turned into iron rods as strong as thunder bolts as they attacked their enemies with them, and even though Krishna tried to stop them, they attacked Him as well. Confused with their minds turned to killing, they mistook Balarama for an enemy of King and also raised their weapons against Him. The Two [of Balarama and Krishna] then also most furiously joined the fight, oh son of the Kurus, and engaged in killing, using the stalks in Their fists as clubs as They moved about in the fight. In the grip of the brahmin curse with their minds clouded by Krishna's maya, the fury of their rivalry led to their destruction, just like a fire of bamboos turns a forest into ashes.

When all of His clans this way had found destruction, Krishna concluded that [just as it was planned, 11.1: 1-4], the remaining burden of the earth had been removed. Balarama on the shore of the ocean resorted to meditation on the Original Person and, merging Himself within Himself, gave up the human world. Seeing that Balarama had left, the Supreme Lord, the son of Devaki, found a pippala tree and silently sat down on the lap of the earth [see also 3.4]. 8-3 Exhibiting His four-armed form He, like a fire without smoke, with His brilliant effulgence dissipated the darkness in all directions. With His Shrivatsa mark and gray-blue cloud-like colour, He wore a heavenly pair of silken garments and radiated [with His ornaments] like molten gold. His face, which like a blue lotus smiled beautifully with His charming lotus eyes, was adorned with His locks of hair and gleaming shark-shaped earrings. Splendid with a belt, a sacred thread, a helmet and bracelets, arm-ornaments, necklaces, ankle bells and other royal symbols, there was the Kaustubha gem. And so He sat there with His right foot reddish like a lotus placed on His thigh, with the forms of His personal weapons in His hands and with a garland of forest flowers around His neck. His foot that had the form of a deer's face, was [then] pierced by an arrow of a hunter named Jara who thought he saw a deer. The arrow was fashioned from a fragment of the iron that had remained [from the by the brahmins cursed club that had been destroyed, see 11.1: 23]. When he [Jara] saw the four-armed personality he, afraid of having committed an offense, fell with his head down at the feet of the Enemy of the Asuras. 'This sinful person acted in ignorance, oh Madhusudana, please forgive this sinner's deed, oh Uttamas'loka, oh Sinless One. Oh Master, what I did in disrespect of You, Vishnu, was wrong, oh You whose constant remembrance, so they say, destroys the darkness of ignorance of all men. Please kill me therefore immediately oh Lord of Vaikuntha, so that I, a sinful deer hunter, may not again commit such an offense against the saints [*]. What can I, impure by birth, say about Him, about You [and the destruction of the Yadus]? The operation of Your mystic power is not even understood by Virinca, Rudra and the other masters and sons of the Vedic word, for their vision is clouded by Your bewildering potency!'

Shri Bhagavan said: 'Fear not, oh Jara, please get up, for what you did was My desire; you have My permission to go to heaven, the abode for those who are of good deeds.'

After thus having been instructed by Krishna, the Fortunate One who generated His own form, he circumambulated Him three times. Then bowing down to Him he departed in a vimana [a heavenly vehicle, also: a 'higher spirit'] to heaven. Daruka searching where Krishna was, coming close scented the fragrant air of tulasi and went in that direction. He found Him there brilliant and effulgent, surrounded by His weapons and resting at the base of the As'vaththa. With his heart overwhelmed by emotions he rushed down from the chariot and fell with his eyes full of tears at His feet. 'Oh Master, not seeing Your lotus feet my power of vision is lost and I fail to know the directions, nor can I find peace; just the way one in the night of a new moon lands in darkness.'

As he was speaking thus, right before the eyes of the chariot driver the chariot, along with the horses and the flag of Garuda marking it, rose up in the sky, oh King of kings. And while Vishnu's divine weapons were following, Janardana spoke to the driver who stood perplexed about what was happening. 'Oh driver, go to Dvaraka and inform Our family members about the mutual destruction of their close relatives, about My condition and about the passing away of Sankarshana. You and your relatives should not remain in Dvaraka. Now the Yadu capital has been abandoned by Me it will sink into the ocean. Each of you should take your own family as also Our parents with you and under the protection of Arjuna go to Indraprastha. You however, [I wish to] remain firm in My devotional service with indifference [about material affairs] being fixed in spiritual knowledge. Understand that [all of] this was a creation of My maya and thus obtain inner tranquility.'

After thus being addressed by Him he [Daruka] circumambulated Him, over and over offering his obeisances. He placed his head at His lotus feet, and went with a sad heart to the city.'

: Shri Vis'vanatha Cakravarti Thhakura wonders, since deer are by nature fearful and timid, how any deer could possibly be on the scene of such a huge battle, and how a hunter could calmly go about his business in the midst of such carnage. Therefore, the withdrawal of the Yadu dynasty and Lord Krishna's own disappearance from this earth were not material historical events; they are instead a display of the Lord's internal potency for the purpose of winding up His manifest pastimes on earth [p.p. 11.30: 37]. Also the name of the hunter Jara, meaning old age, is indicative of the metaphorical purport of this incident [see also footnote 10.87:]. In the Mahabharata-tatparya-niraya, Shri Madhvacharya-pada wrote that the Lord for His mission created a body of material energy into which the arrow was shot. But the Lord's actual four-armed form was never touched by the arrow of Jara, who is actually an incarnation of the Lord's devotee Bhriгу Rishi. In a previous age Bhriгу Muni had offensively placed his foot on the chest of Lord Vishnu.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 31:

The Ascension* of Lord Krishna

["Ascension", "Assumption", or "Translation", is a belief usually associated with the so-called "Abrahamic religions." In this belief concept, holy, sacred, divine or saint individuals have ascended into Heaven after death, or in some cases, even without dying first. However, this concept is also known in Hinduism (and consequently also in Jainism, Buddhism, or other Indian religions) due to Zoroastrian-Persian and Hebrew influence on the protagonists in the Mahabharata. Both, resurrection and rebirth, terms which are often interpreted and translated in different ways, offer people spiritual salvation in the face of certain physical death.]

Shri Shuka said: 'Then Brahma arrived there [in Prabhasa], along with Shiva with his consort, the demigods led by Indra, the sages and the lords of the people. - The forefathers, the perfected souls and divine singers, the scientists and the champions, the venerable ones, the treasure keepers and the wild men, the ones of superpower and the dancing girls of heaven and all the ones of Garuda [the dvijas] desirous to witness the passing away of the Supreme Lord, eagerly chanted and praised the birth and activities of Lord Shauri [Krishna]. Crowding the sky in a great number of vimanas oh King, they being joined in transcendental devotion showered flowers. When the Supreme Lord saw the great father [Brahma] and his powerful expansions [the demigods], the Almighty One closed His lotus eyes and fixed His consciousness within Himself. Without in meditation on the fire burning in a mystic trance the object so auspicious for all concentration and meditation, viz. His body most attractive to all the worlds, He entered His heavenly abode [compare 4.4].

And while in heaven kettledrums resounded and flowers fell from the sky, Truth, Righteousness, Constancy, Fame and Beauty followed Him as He left the earth [*], see also 10.39: 53-55]. The demigods and others headed by Brahma not knowing the path that Krishna took, did not all see Him entering His abode, but those who did were most amazed. Just as mortals cannot determine the path lightning describes in the sky while leaving the clouds, the demigods could not determine Krishna's path. But Brahma, Shiva and the others who saw it, in astonishment glorified the yogic power of the Lord. Thereupon each of them returned to his own world. Oh King, understand the appearance and the disappearance of the Supreme One among the embodied beings, to be a false show like that of an actor, enacted by His illusory potency. Creating this universe by Himself, entering it, engaging in pastimes in it and in the end winding it up, He ceases [with these functions] and remains in the greatness of the Supreme Self. He who brought the son of His guru back in the same body after he had been taken to the world of Yamaraja [10.45], He who protected you against being burned by the superior weapon [1.12], He who even conquered Shiva who is the death of the agents of death [10.63], why would He who brought the deer hunter [Jara] body and all to the spiritual world, not be capable of preserving Himself? Despite the fact that He as the One Possessing Unlimited Potencies constitutes the exclusive cause of the maintenance, creation and annihilation of all created beings, He did not desire to keep His physical frame here in the mortal world. Why would He, who is the destination for those who are fixed upon Him, keep up appearances [see also 3.2: 10-11]? Anyone who, rising early in the morning, attentively with devotion glorifies this supreme destination of Krishna, will undoubtedly reach that unsurpassable position [see also B.G. 8: 6].

When Daruka arrived in Dvaraka, he fell down at the feet of Vasudeva and Ugrasena that he wet with his tears because of missing Krishna. 6-1 He told the story of the complete destruction of the Vrishnis oh ruler of man. When the people heard it they, with their hearts upset, were rendered senseless in their grief. Overwhelmed by the separation from Krishna, they struck their faces and quickly went to the place where their relatives were lying lifeless. Devaki, Rohini and Vasudeva thereupon could not find their sons Krishna and Balarama and lost their consciousness because of the pain of their bereavement. Tormented by their separation from the Supreme Lord they gave up their lives on the spot my best one. Then the [Yadava] wives climbed upon the funeral pyre and embraced their [dead] husbands. The wives of Balarama entered the fire and embraced His body, and so did the wives of Vasudeva and the Lord's daughters-in-law for Pradyumna and the others. Also Krishna's wives led by Rukmini, His first queen, entered the fire fully absorbed in Him. Arjuna distressed because of his separation from Krishna, his dear friend, consoled himself with the transcendental words of Krishna's song [like 2: 11-12, 2: 20-21, 2: 27, 4: 7, 4: 6, 7: 25 and 14: 27 of the Bhagavad Gita]. Arjuna saw to it that for the relatives who had died and who had no remaining family members, the funeral rites were executed in order of the seniority of the deceased as is prescribed. Immediately after Dvaraka had been abandoned by the Lord, it was flooded by the ocean, except, oh King, for the residence of the Supreme Personality of Godhead [see archeology pictures 1, 2 & 3 of the site]. In that very place Madhusudana, the Supreme Lord, is eternally present; as the most auspicious of all auspicious places, its remembrance alone is enough to take away everything inauspicious. Arjuna moved the survivors - the women, the children and elders of the deceased - to Indraprastha and placed there Vajra [Aniruddha's son] on the throne. After Your grandfathers had heard from Arjuna about the death of their Friend oh King, they all left to make the great journey, but not before they had first installed you as the maintainer of the dynasty [they went northwards, see also 1.15: 34-51]. Any conditioned soul who with faith sings about the birth and activities of Vishnu, the God of Gods, will be freed from all sins [see Shri Das'avatara Stotra]. The attractive and most auspicious exploits and childhood pastimes of the incarnation of the Supreme Lord Hari [with all His expansions, see 10.1: 62-63], have now been described here [in this Story of the Fortunate One] as also elsewhere [in other scriptures]. Anyone who proclaims them will attain the transcendental devotional service that is the destination of the perfect sages [the paramahansas].'

*: Shri Vishvanatha Cakravarti Thhkura comments here: 'Truth and other qualities departed so that various bad qualities could become prominent in Kali-yuga.'

Thus the eleventh BOOK of the Shrimad Bhagavatam ends named: Krishna's Final Instructions.

BOOK 12: THE AGE OF DETERIORATION

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 1:

The Degraded Dynasties and Corrupt Nature of the Rulers of Kali-yuga

Shri Parikshit said: 'Please oh sage, can you tell me whose dynasty ruled over the earth after Krishna, the jewel of the Yadu dynasty, had left for His heavenly abode?' [*]

- Shri Shuka said: 'The last descendant of Brihadhratha in the future [see 9.22: 49] was named Puranjaya [not the one mentioned in 9.6: 12]. His minister Shunaka will assassinate his master to make his own son named Pradyota [historical: Bimbisara] king. His son Palaka will have Vis'akhayupa as his son and Rajaka will be his successor. His son will be Nandivardhana. These five Pradyotana kings will enjoy the earth for one hundred thirty-eight years. Then Shishunaga will take birth and Kakavarna will be his son, from whose son Kshemadharmas, Kshetrajna will be born. The son Vidhisara [of Kshetrajna] will have Ajatas'atru as his son and Darbhaka, his son, will have Ajaya as his successor. - From Ajaya there will be [another] Nandivardhana whose son is Mahanandi. These ten Shishunaga kings, oh best of the Kurus, will rule over the earth in the age of Kali for three hundred sixty years. Oh King, the son of Mahanandi, a certain Nanda, will take birth from the womb of a working class woman and will, as a powerful master over millions, be the destroyer of the royal class. The kings will become irreligious and be no better than Shudras. He [Mahapadmananda], that ruler over millions, will be like a second Parashurama and as an unchallenged authority bring the entire earth under one rule [see 9.15 & 16]. From him eight sons headed by Sumalya will take birth and enjoy this earth as kings for a hundred years. A certain brahmin [called Canakya] trusted by the nine Nandas [Mahapadmananda and his sons] will overturn them. With them removed the Mauryas will rule the earth in Kali-yuga []. The brahmin will put Candragupta on the throne and his son Varisara will next be succeeded by Ashokavardhana. SuYasha [Dasaratha Maurya] will be born to him, Sangata [Samprati], his son, will father Shalishuka of whom next Somas'arma [Devavarman] will be born who will father Shatadhanva from whose loins Brihadhratha will take his birth. These ten Maurya kings, oh eminent hero of the Kuru dynasty, will rule the earth in Kali-yuga for the time of one hundred thirty-seven years. 5-1 From Agnimitra [the son of the first Shunga king named Pushpamitra, a general who will murder Brihadhratha] there will be Sujyeshthha [Vasujyeshthha] who will father Vasumitra whose son will be Bhadraka [Andhraka] who will be succeeded by Pulinda [Pulindaka]. His son will be Ghosha to whom Vajramitra will be born. His son Bhagavata [Bhagabhadr] will beget Devabhuti oh eminent Kuru. These ten Shunga kings will enjoy the earth for more than hundred [109] years. Thereafter this earth will be ruled by the Kanva dynasty poor in qualities, oh ruler of man. Vasudeva, a most intelligent minister from the Kanva family, [with the help of a female slave] will kill the lusty Shunga king Devabhuti and thereupon himself assume leadership. His son Bhumitra will have a successor called Narayana [with a son named Sus'arma]. These Kanva kings will rule the earth for three-hundred-forty-five more years in Kali-yuga. A low-class most degraded man of the Andhra race called Bali, will as a servant kill Sus'arma, the [last] Kanva king, and rule the earth for some time. 1-2 His brother named Krishna, will be the next ruler of the earth. His son Shantakarna will have Paurnamasa as his successor. His son Lambodara will beget king Cibilaka. Cibilaka will father Meghasvati who in his turn will beget Athamana, who will be succeeded by Anishtakarma. Haleya, his son, will have Talaka as his son whose son Purishabhuru will have Sunandana as the next king. Cakora [his son] will be succeeded by the eight Bahus, among whom Shivasvati will be a great subduer of enemies. To Gomati, his son, Puriman will be born, whose son will be called Medas'ira. Shivaskanda born from his loins will have YajnaShri as his son and his descendant will be Vijaya who will father the sons Candravijna and Lomadhi. These thirty kings will rule the world for four hundred fifty-six years, oh son of the Kurus []. From the city of Avabhriti then seven Abhira kings will follow, ten Gardabhis and sixteen Kanka kings, earthly rulers who will be very greedy. Next there will be eight Yavanas, fourteen Turushkas and furthermore ten Gurundas and eleven kings of the Maula dynasty. 9-3 The eleven Maulas will rule for three hundred years after these [preceding three dynasties] have ruled the earth for one thousand ninety-nine years my dear. When they are all dead and gone, in the city of Kilakila the kings Bhutananda, Vangiri, Shishunandi, his brother Yas'onandi and then Praviraka will rule for one-hundred-and-six years. 2-3 To them [the Kilakilas] thirteen sons will be born called the Bahlikas. Thereafter the kings Pushpamitra, his son Durmitra as also seven Andhras, seven Kaus'alas and the rulers of Vidura and Nishadha will reign at the same time [over different realms]. In the province of Magadha a king named Vis'vaspurji will assume power, who like another Puranjaya will turn the people of all classes into inferior Pulindas, Yadus and Madrakas [low-class, uncivilised men, see *4]. This unintelligent king, who protected in the city of Padmavati will rule over the earth from the source of the Ganges to Prayaga, will in respect of the citizens predominantly act against the brahminical order and ruin the mighty class of the ksatriyas. The twice-born souls living in the provinces Shaurashthra, Avanti, Abhira, Shura, Arbuda and Malava will [at that time] fail to fulfill their vows while they who rank first among the people [the kings] will become no better than Shudras. The lands at the river Sindhu, as also the districts of Candrabhaga, Kaunti and Kas'mira, will be ruled by uncivilised men [mlecchas], Shudras and others who, lacking spiritual strength, deviate from the standard.

Oh King, these generally uncivilised, earthly caretakers [politicians] who, simultaneously ruling, are dedicated to irreligious and unrealistic practices will, with fierce tempers [competing for the dominion] allow their subjects hardly any freedom [economically]. They will ruin the lives of women, children, cows and intellectuals and hanker for money and the wives of other men. Lacking in strength they mostly have short, unstable careers of success and failure and live short lives. Not initiated and devoid of regulative principles these barbarians behaving like kings, under the sway of passion and ignorance, will virtually devour the citizens. The people in the cities following the example of the character, behavior and speech of these men, will, harassed by these rulers and by each other, thus be destroyed [in wars, economic collapse and natural disasters, see also kles'a, Kali-yuga and B.G. 16: 6-12].'

 : The parampara adds: 'The great historical narration Shrimad Bhagavatam, which began with the events prior to the cosmic manifestation, now reaches into the realm of modern recorded history. Modern historians recognise both the Maurya dynasty and Candragupta, the king mentioned in the following verse.' [p.p. 12.1.11]

: According an academic translator of the Bhagavatam, Ganesh Vasudeo Tagare [1989, Morilal Banarsidass], this period would be found short before the beginning of the christian year count. Analyzing this text in reference to historical sources he, stating that there are many discrepancies with the cultural [manipulated?] records, also concludes that historically the Kanva dynasty would have only ruled for forty-five years from 75 to 30 B.C., and not for the three hundred forty-five as the Sanskrit text states here. According to him this part of the Bhagavatam would have been of a later date and consist of a mishmash of hearsay historical knowledge, which is a position contested by the parampara of course, since it is more likely to err in the discordance of worldly interest than in the harmony of a consciousness motivated by spiritual discipline.

*4: The total span of generations covered here from the first Puranjaya to the last one in the line of the Kali-yuga decay, thus would have stretched from about 2000 B.C. to about the twelfth century AD.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 2:

Despair and Hope in the Age of Quarrel

Shri Shuka said: 'And then, oh King, under the strong influence of the time [of Kali-yuga] religiousness, truthfulness, cleanliness, tolerance and mercy as also duration of life, physical strength and memory will diminish day after day [see also 1.16]. Among the people of the age of Kali all one attains by good birth, behavior and qualities will be wealth while material power will be the only factor determining what is just and reasonable. Relations between men and women will be based upon sensual pleasure, business will be ruled by deceit, masculinity and femininity are there for sexual attraction and a sacred thread will suffice to be considered learned. External marks only determine someone's spiritual status and constitute the basis for mutual exchanges, because of a lack of funds one is less credible and scholarship consists of word jugglery. Poverty simply means a lack of virtue and hypocrisy and deceit are the standard of virtue; verbal agreement is enough to be married and a bath suffices to start the day. A holy place is a reservoir of water somewhere far away, beauty depends on one's hair style, life's purpose is to fill one's belly, someone audacious is considered truthful, when one can maintain a family one is an expert and one observes religious principles for the sake of one's reputation. With the earth being crowded with a populace thus corrupted, anyone who is the strongest among the intellectuals, the rulers, the merchants and the working class, will be called the king. The citizens whose wives and property are stolen by a merciless and avaricious ruling class that behaves like ordinary thieves, will flee to the mountains and the forests. Suffering draughts, famine and taxation they will be ruined and resort to the consumption of leaves, roots, meat, honey, fruits, flowers and seeds [see also 1.16: 20, 4.20: 14, 4.21: 24, B.G. 3: 14]. Plagued by cold, wind, heat, rain and snow as also by quarrels, hunger, thirst and diseases, they suffer a great deal of distress and anxiety. The maximum duration of life for human beings in Kali-yuga will be fifty years. 2-1 When the bodies of all living entities are in decay from the contamination of Kali-yuga, when the dutifulness of the members of all status-orientations is lost, when the Vedic path for all man has changed into a predominantly atheistic sense of duty, when the kings mainly consist of thieves and the people in their various occupations are lying criminals of useless violence [against specially animals], when the societal classes as good as all are engaged in profit-minded labour, cows have the same value as goats, the hermitages hardly can be distinguished from materialistic households, family bonds do not reach beyond the ties of marriage, when the plants and herbs are mostly small sised and all trees are like Shami trees, when there is always lightning in the clouds and the homes are ruled by loneliness [voidism, impersonalism, see Pranati], when Kali-yuga is running at its end and the people behave like asses, the Supreme Lord will descend in the mode of pure goodness to defend the dharma.

The spiritual master of all the moving and nonmoving living beings, Lord Vishnu, the Supreme Personality and Controller of All, takes birth for the protection of the religion and to put an end to the karma of the saintly souls. In the village of Shambhala Lord Kalki will appear in the home of the great soul, the eminent brahmin VishnuYasha ['the glory of Vishnu']. 9-2 Mounting His swift horse Devadatta, the Lord of the Universe endowed with His sword, transcendental qualities and eight mystic opulences [siddhis], will subdue the reprobates. With speed traveling the earth on His horse He, unrivaled in His splendor, will slaughter the thieves dressing as kings by the millions. When all the robbers have been killed, the minds of all the residents of the towns and cities will clear up who came in touch with the breeze carrying the most sacred fragrance of the [with sandalwood paste] decorated body of Lord Vasudeva. When Vasudeva, the Supreme Lord, is situated in their hearts in the transcendental form of His goodness, the production of offspring will be abundant. After the Supreme Lord Kalki, the Lord and Master of Dharma, has incarnated, Satya-yuga will begin and progeny will be created in the mode of goodness [see yuga]. The moment the sun and the moon together with Jupiter [Bhrihaspati] in the same constellation [of Karkatha or Cancer] enter the lunar mansion of Tishya [or Pushya, 3° 20' to 16° 40' see zodiac], Satya-yuga [Krita] will begin.

I briefly described all the past, present and future kings belonging to the solar and lunar dynasties [see also vams'a]. Beginning from the birth of your good self up to the coronation of king Nanda [see 12.1: 12] eleven hundred and fifty years will pass []. 7-2 On the [northwest] line between the two stars [Pulaha and Kratu] one first sees rising in the constellation of the seven sages [Ursa Major, the Great Bear], one in the nightly sky sees their [ruling] lunar mansion. The sages [the stars] in that lunar mansion remain connected with it for a hundred human years. Now, in your time, they are situated in the nakshatra called Magha. When Vishnu the Supreme Lord, the sun known as Krishna, returned to heaven, this world entered the age of Kali in which people delight in sin. For as long as He, the Husband of Rama, touched the earth with His lotus feet, Kali could not prevail on earth. Kali-yuga begins when the [constellation of the] seven divine sages enter[] Magha. That period covers twelve hundred [godly] years [or 432,000 human years, see also kala]. When the seven sages pass from Magha to the lunar mansion of Purvasadha, this age of Kali will attain its full strength beginning with the time of king [Mahapadma] Nanda and his descendants. The historians say that the age of Kali began the very day that Shri Krishna departed for the spiritual world. At the end of the thousand celestial years of the fourth [Kali] age, Satya-yuga will start again, the time when the minds of men will be self-enlightened.

Thus this dynasty from [Vaivasvata] Manu has been enumerated as it is known on earth. The positions of the scholars, the traders and the workers in each age can therewith also be understood. Of these personalities, these great souls, one only remembers their names; all that remains of their glory on this earth are their stories. Devapi, the brother of Shantanu [9.22: 12-17] and Maru [9.12: 5-6] who took birth in the Ikshvaku dynasty, are endowed with great mystical power and both live [even now] in Kalapa. At the end of the age of Kali they will return to human society and promulgate the varnashrama-dharma as it was before, deriving from the instructions they received from Vasudeva [Krishna]. The four ages of Krita [Satya], Treta, Dvapara and Kali that the living beings undergo in this world, will repeat themselves continuously following this sequential order [see also mahayuga]. Oh King, these kings, these gods among man and the others I described, who arriving on this earth exert their possessiveness, in the end all have to forsake this world and face their demise. Even if someone's body carries the name of king it is nevertheless destined to be known as stool, worms or ashes. For the sake of that body he was an enemy of other living beings and therefore ends up in hell. What does such a one know about his self-interest [compare 6.18: 25, 7.15: 37, 10.10: 10, 10.51: 50]? [A king may think:] 'How can this same undivided earth as controlled by the personalities of my predecessors and now under my control, stay in the hands of my son, grandson and other descendant?' When one accepts this body that is composed of earth, water and fire, with a notion of 'I' and when one says 'mine' to this earth, one lacks in intelligence, for in the end reaching one's own absence one has to forsake both this body and this earth [see also 4.9: 34-35]. Oh King, of whatever that kings may enjoy in the world with all their power, is by Time nothing more preserved than some accounts and histories [compare with 2.9: 33, 5.19: 28, 11.19: 16, 11.28: 21].'

*: From this statement can be derived, that the Candragupta that after Nanda by Canakya was put on the throne must have been another Candragupta than the one who 1500 years later supposedly defeated Alexander the Great in the fourth century B.C. The parampara adds to the discrepancy of three centuries further: 'Although Shukadeva Gosvami previously described approximately fifteen hundred years of royal dynasties, it is understood that some overlapping occurred between kings.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 3:

The Song of Mother Earth and the Remedy for Kali-yuga

Shri Shuka said: 'When the earth saw the kings busily engaged in conquering her, she laughed and said: 'Ah, just see how these kings, these playthings of death, wish to conquer me! This lust of the rulers of man and even the sages, is doomed to fail; those kings are putting their faith in a lump of matter that compares to a water bubble.' - 'Let us first conquer the sixfold [of the senses and the mind], then subdue the leading ministers and then the advisors. Next we rid ourselves of the citizens, the friends, the elephant keepers and the thorns [the thugs]. This way we will step by step conquer the earth and her girdle of seas', but thinking thus with their hearts caught in expectations, they do not realise the finality of their existence [compare B.G 16: 13-18]. Having conquered the lands by the sea they, with all their might, next enter the seas. Of what use is such a victory over the self? Spiritual liberation is the fruit of conquering oneself!

The Manus and their sons, oh best of the Kurus, all gave up [ruling over me] and left [for the forest] the way they came, but those lacking in intelligence try to conquer me through warfare. Because of me among materialistic persons conflict arises between fathers and sons and between brothers, for their hearts are ruled by possessing power. Endeavoring for me saying 'This entire land is mine and not yours, you fool', the rulers quarrel, kill each other and get killed [compare e.g. 2.5: 13, 2.7: 42, 4.29: 5, 5.5: 8, 6.16: 41, 7.8: 7-10, 9.4: 2-12]. -1 Prithu, Pururava, Gadhni, Nahusha, Bharata, Kartavyarjuna, Mandhata, Sagara, Rama [*], Khathvanga, Dhundhivya [or] Kuvalyas'va [9.6: 23-24], Raghu [9.10: 1], Trinabindu [9.2: 30], Yayati, Sharyati [9.3: 1], Shantanu [9.22: 12-13], Gaya [5.15: 6-13], Bhagiratha [9.9: 2-17], Kakutstha [9.6: 12], Nishadha [Nala, 9.9: 16-17, 9.23: 20-21, from the descendants of Nishadha, 9.12: 1], Nriga [Nabhaga, 10.64: 10], Hiranyakas'ipu, Vritra, Ravana, who made the whole world lament, Namuci [8.11: 29-49], Shambara [10.36: 36], Bhauma, Hiranyaksha and Taraka [8.10: 19-24], as also many other demons and kings of great control over others, were all heroes who well informed were unconquerable and subdued everyone. Living for me, oh mighty one, they expressed great possessiveness but, by the force of Time being subjected to death, they failed to accomplish their goals, historical accounts is all that remained of them [see also B.G. 4: 7].

[Shuka continued:] These narrations I related to you about great kings who spread their fame in all the worlds and then departed, do not express the highest purpose, oh mighty one. They are but a wealth of words [a backdrop] for dilating on renunciation and wisdom. It is rather the repeated discussing and singing about the qualities of the Lord Praised in the Verses, what destroys everything inauspicious. He who desires Lord Krishna's pure devotional service should therefore do that regularly [seeking that association] and hear [about Him] time and again.'

The honourable king [Parikshit] said: 'By what means my Lord, do the people living in Kali-yuga eradicate the faults accumulating because of that age? Please explain to me how it is. How about the yugas, the duties prescribed for them, the time they last and when they end, as also the Time itself that represents the movement of the Controller, of Lord Vishnu the Supreme Soul [see also time quotes page].'

Shri Shuka said: 'The religion of the people in Satya-yuga, oh King, is by the people of the time maintained with all its four legs: the powerful legs of truth [satya], compassion [daya], penance [tapas] and charity [dana, or also Shauca, purification [*]], compare 1.17: 24, 3.11: 21 and see niyama]. The [hamsa]-people [of that age] are content, merciful, friendly, peaceful, self-controlled, tolerant, satisfied within, equal-minded and mostly ascetic [see also 3.13: 35 and 11.17: 10]. In Treta-yuga one fourth of [the strength of each of] the legs of dharma is gradually lost because of the legs of adharm or godlessness: untruth, violence, dissatisfaction and discord [compare 1.17: 25]. During that age people are of devotion with rituals and penances, without any excessive violence or wanton desires. Prospering in their respect for the three Vedas they follow the three paths [of regulating the religion, the economy and sense gratification], while the four classes are predominantly brahminically oriented oh King. The dharmic qualities of austerity, compassion, truth and charity are in Dvapara-yuga reduced to one half [of their strength] because of the adharmic characteristics of violence, discontent, lies and hatred. One is [in that age] of a high moral fiber, one loves glory and is absorbed in Vedic study. One is opulent with large families and joyful, while brahmins and nobles constitute the greatest number among the four classes. Because of the constant increase of the principles of godlessness, in Kali-yuga the legs of religiousness further decrease to one fourth [of their strength, compare 1.17: 25], until they finally will be destroyed. In that age the people will be greedy, ill-mannered, lacking in compassion, prone to useless quarrel, unfortunate and obsessed with material desires, while they will mainly consist of labourers and less civilised characters. The qualities of goodness, passion and ignorance that thus [depending the age] are observed in a person, undergo - being impelled by [the operation of] Time - permutations within the mind []. The time when the mind, the intelligence and the senses flourish in the mode of goodness, should be understood as Satya-yuga, the age of taking pleasure in knowledge and austerity. Oh intelligent one, when the conditioned souls devoted to their duties are of ulterior motives and strive for honour, that predominance of passion must be considered the time of Treta. When greed and dissatisfaction, false pride, envy and hypocrisy are seen everywhere and actions are dominated by selfishness, one speaks of the time of Dvapara, the age of passion and ignorance.

Kali-yuga is known as the age of ignorance, where there is deceit, false testimony, sloth and lethargy, violence, depression, lamentation, delusion, fear and poverty. As a consequence the mortals will be shortsighted, unfortunate, eating too much, lusty and poverty-stricken while the women will act of their own accord and be unchaste. In the populated areas uncivilised people will take high positions [and act like thieves], the Vedic scriptures will be slighted by false doctrines [heretics], the political leaders will devour the people and the twice-born souls will be dedicated to their bellies and genitals. The youngsters [the students] will be averse to vows and impure in their engagements, the householders will be beggars [with what they claim], the withdrawn souls [the middle-aged, with no nature left to retreat into] will be city-dwellers and the renounced order will greedily endeavor for wealth [be engaged in 'reli-business']. Smaller in size, voracious and having many children, [the women will have] lost their timidity and constantly speak harshly and with great audacity be as deceitful as thieves. The merchants will indulge in cheating so that their business dealings will be wicked while the people unnecessarily will consider any contemptible occupation [in the sex industry or gambling business] a good job. Servants will abandon a master who lost his wealth - even if he is the best one around, masters will abandon a handicapped servant - even when he belonged to the family for generations, and cows will be abandoned [and killed] as soon as they stopped giving milk. Under the control of women, men in Kali-yuga will be wretched and forsake their fathers, brothers, friends and relatives, while regularly associating with their brothers and sisters-in-law in a conception of friendship based upon sexual enjoyment. Labourers being dressed up as mendicants of austerity, will accept religious charity to earn their living and mount a high seat to speak about religious matters without any knowledge of dharmic principles. 9-4 With their minds constantly full of stress, emaciated by famine and taxes in times of scarcity with droughts on the surface of the earth, oh King, the people of Kali-yuga will be troubled by countless worries and live in fear. Lacking in clothing, food, drink, rest, sexual love [vyavaya, also called 'change'], bathing and personal ornaments they will appear like ghostly creatures. In the age of Kali one will even over a single coin develop enmity [5.14 and 5.14: 26], reject friendly relations, kill oneself [be suicidal] and even kill one's relatives [domestic violence]. Only interested in the petty service of the stomach and the genitals one, even being born in a respectable family, will not protect the elderly parents, the wife and the children. Oh King, with their minds diverted by atheism the mortals in Kali-yuga in general will not worship the Infallible One, the Personality of Godhead who is the Supreme Spiritual Master of the three worlds at whose feet the various masters bow down. In Kali-yuga the people do not worship Him, even though He is the One by whom a person, who dying in distress collapsing with a faltering voice helplessly chants His name, is freed from the chains of karma and achieves the topmost destination [see also B.G. 8: 10 and 6.2]. The objects [and food], places and the individual nature of man are as a result of Kali-yuga all polluted [diseased, full of faults], but when one installs Bhagavan, the Supreme Personality in one's heart, He takes all this contamination away.

Of those human beings who but even heard, glorified, meditated, worshiped or venerated the Supreme Lord, the inauspiciousness is cleansed away that from a thousand births accumulated in their hearts. Just as the discolouration one finds in gold because of other metals is removed by fire, the impurities of the mind of yoga practitioners are removed when Lord Vishnu has entered their heart. Education, penance, breath control, friendship, bathing in holy waters, vows, charity and praying with prayer beads do not realise as full the purification of the mind as the presence of Him, the Unlimited Personality of Godhead, in the heart. Therefore oh King, do your utmost best to establish Lord Kes'ava in your heart; the moment you die [here after this week] you will with your attention focussed on Him attain the highest destination. The Supreme Lord meditated upon by those who are dying is the Supreme Controller, the Soul and Shelter of All, who leads them to their true identity my dearest. In the ocean of faults of Kali-yuga, oh King, there is luckily one great good quality: just by singing about [and meditating on] Krishna's name, see bhajans] one can be liberated from material bondage and achieve beatitude [see also bhagavata dharma and kirtana]. The same result one achieves in Satya-yuga by meditating on Vishnu, one achieves in Treta-yuga by worshipping with sacrifices and one achieves in Dvapara-yuga by serving the lotus feet [of Him in the form of a king], is in Kali-yuga achieved by singing about [and meditating on the names of] the Lord [see also 11.5: 38-40].'

*: According to Shri La Shridhara Svami, and as confirmed by Shri La Vis'vanatha Cakravarti Thhakura, the king Rama mentioned here is not the incarnation of Godhead Ramacandra. This is corroborated by the M.W. dictionary mentioning the demigod Varuna, writers, teachers and other great personalities addressed with that name. Probably Bhargava is meant, also known as Ushana, who most powerfully formed a dynasty descending from the sages Bhrigu and Markandeya [see: 9.16: 32 and 4.1: 45].

: In the M.W. dictionary three meanings are given for the word dana: 1. donating, giving gifts 2. sharing or communicating and 3. purification. The last meaning confirms the use of the term Shauca in the First BOOK of Shrimad-Bhagavatam as the fourth leg of the bull of religion. This alternative definition of the word danam is confirmed by Shri La Vis'vanatha Cakravarti Thhakura.

: The parampara adds to this: 'The particular age represented by goodness (Satya), passion (Treta), passion and ignorance (Dvapara) or ignorance (Kali) exists within each of the other ages as a subfactor.'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 4:

Pralaya: The Four Types of Annihilation

Shri Shuka said: 'Time beginning with the smallest unit of the atom and culminating in the two halves [or parardhas of the life of Brahma], oh King, has been described [in 3.11] together with the duration of the yugas. Now hear about the annihilation of a kalpa. A thousand cycles of four yugas is called a kalpa, a day of Brahma, in which there are fourteen original progenitors of mankind [Manus] oh ruler of the citizens. At their end there is a period of dissolution of the same duration that is described as the night of Brahma. During that time the three worlds are subject to destruction. This is said to be the occasional annihilation [or naimittika pralaya] in which [Narayana] the creator of the universe lies down upon His bed Ananta, to absorb the universe including Lord Brahma. After the completion of two parardhas [the two halves of the entire life] of the highest situated living being, Lord Brahma, the seven elements [mahat, ahankara and the five tanmatras] are subject to destruction. This [occasion] oh King, at which the universal egg, this aggregate [of these seven universal aspects] reaches the time of its disruption and dissolves oh King, constitutes the elemental [prakritika] annihilation. For a hundred years oh King, the clouds will not shower rain upon the earth. The people being confounded by the time will, in the distress of their hunger with the lack of food that follows, [even] consume each other and step by step find their destruction. The sun with its terrible rays will evaporate all the juice of the earth, the ocean and the living bodies, and not give the slightest [precipitation] in return. Thereupon from the mouth of Lord Sankarshana the fire of destruction will issue, that raised by the force of the wind will burn all levels of existence on earth [and the other planets, 3.11: 30, 8.5: 35]. The universal egg burning on all sides with the flames of the fire from below and the sun above, will glow like a ball of cow dung. Next for more than a hundred years the terrible wind of the ultimate destruction [samvartaka] will blow and turn the sky gray with dust. Clusters of multicoloured clouds dear King, then will pour down rain for a hundred years with tremendous claps of thunder. The shell of the universe will thereupon fill up and constitute a single [cosmic] body of water. The moment the water of the flood takes away the quality of fragrance, the element earth, being deprived of its fragrance, will dissolve [see also 3.26: 49-61, 11.3: 9, 11.24: 22-27].

Fire then takes away the taste of water, after which it, deprived of this quality, dissolves. Next follows fire that by air is deprived of its form because it takes its quality [of touch] away, after which the air enters the ether that takes away that quality. Then, oh King the ether dissolves in the original element of nature [adi, false ego in ignorance] that takes away its quality of sound. Subsequently the senses are seized by the vital power of the universe [tejas or false ego in passion] my best, while the gods are absorbed by the universal modification [vikara, the false ego of goodness]. Cosmic intelligence [mahat] seizes the false ego with all its functions after which mahat is absorbed by the modes of nature of sattva and so on. These three modes, oh King, are then, under the pressure of Time, overtaken by the inexhaustible doer [the original unmanifest form of nature]. The original doer is not subject to transformation in divisions of time [shath-urmi] and such qualities; being unmanifest without a beginning and an end, it [or He] is the infallible eternal cause. 0-2 Therein [in His primal state] one does not find speech, mind, or the mode of goodness, passion or ignorance. Neither the elements of the complete whole - the vital air, the intelligence, the senses and so on - are found there, nor are the gods there or the arrangement of the different planetary orders. There is no sleeping, waking or deep sleep, no water, air, ether, fire, earth or sun. That what is like a void or someone fast asleep, is the [primal] substance that defies all logical explanation and serves as the root [the pradhana], so say the authorities. This [state] constitutes the [prakritika pralaya] dissolution wherein all the material elements of nature and energies of the unseen Original Person are completely dismantled by Time and helplessly merge.

It is spiritual knowledge [the consciousness, the Absolute Truth alone] that is the foundation which manifests in the form of these elements of intelligence, the senses and the sense objects. Whatever that is perceived as having a beginning and an end is insubstantial, for it has no existence apart from its cause [only being a reference to it, compare 11.28: 21]. A lamp, an eye that perceives and the form perceived do not stand apart from the light [that is treated by them]. The same way intelligence, the senses and sense perceptions do not stand apart from the [one Supreme] reality [the Absolute Truth] that is quite different [see also siddhanta and B.G. 9.15]. The wakefulness, sleep and deep sleep that belong to the intelligence are therefore called a deception of the senses [relative to the fourth state of meditation called turiya]. This oh King is the duality experienced by the soul [11.13: 27-34]. Just as clouds are there and are not there in the sky, this entire universe with its different parts being generated and having vanished is there and not there within the Absolute of the Truth. The ingredient cause my best, of any composite entity out here, is something real [that can be perceived] so is stated [in the Vedanta-sutra], just as the threads of a piece of cloth can be perceived separately from the fabric they form [see also 6.3: 12, 11.12: 21]. Whatever one may experience as having a general cause and a specific effect constitutes a form of illusion; everything with a beginning and an end is insubstantial because of the interdependence [of cause and effect]. Even though knowable to us the changeable nature of [the phenomenal world or] even a single atom, can in no way be explained without [- as standing apart from -] the Self inside [of the Time, the Lord, the expansion of the universe, the 'fourth dimension'], for if that would be so [if there would not be such a Self] it should, being equal to the consciousness, stay the way it is. One cannot have different types of Absolute Truth; if an unknowing person thinks of the Absolute in terms of opposites, that is just like having two skies, two daylights or two life breaths. Just as gold appears to men in many forms depending its use, the Supreme Lord Adhokshaja who is inconceivable to the senses, is described in different terms by a worldly person and a person of Vedic knowledge. A cloud brought about by the sun is made visible by the sun but means darkness to the eyes that are a partial expansion of the sun. Similarly the ego, one's I-awareness, is a quality of the Absolute made visible by the Absolute, but as a partial expansion of the Absolute that ego means darkness [falsehood] to the individual soul being bound to the material self. When a cloud produced by the sun is riven, the eye sees the sun's form. When the same way the false ego that covers the spirit soul is destroyed by spiritual [self-inquiry, remembrance [of the Original Self]] will be the result. When one thus with this sword of discrimination has cut away the false ego originating from illusion that binds the soul and one has developed a firm realisation of the Infallible Supreme Soul, one speaks of the entire annihilation [of one's materially determined existence, atyantika pralaya], dear King.

Oh subduer of the enemies, some expert knowers of the subtle all-pervading spirit, assert that the creation and destruction of all living beings beginning with Brahma, is an everlasting [nitya] process. The [more or less favorable living] conditions of all living beings subject to transformation, are rapidly and continuously wiped out by the mighty force of the current of Time and constitute the causes of their birth and death. These states of existence created by the Time, the form of the Lord without a beginning or an end, one does not see [directly], just as the [movements of the] planets in the sky are not seen [directly, see also 3.10: 10-14]. Annihilation in the sense of a continuous [nitya], periodical [naimittika], natural [elemental or prakritika] and complete [atyantika] destruction has been described. This is how Time [kala] operates.

These narrations about the lila of the creator of the universe, Narayana, the reservoir of all existences, have been related briefly and clearly to you, oh best of the Kurus. Not even the Unborn One [Lord Brahma] would be able to enumerate them completely. For a person distressed by the fire of the different miseries of life and the desires to cross the hard to overcome ocean of material existence, there is no boat but the one of being devoted with a taste for the narrations of the pastimes of the Fortunate One, the Supreme Personality. Long ago the infallible Lord Nara-Narayana taught this essential compendium of all the classical stories, to Narada Muni who passed it on to Krishna Dvaipayana [Vyasa, the author; see 5.19: 10-15]. He, that powerful Lord Badarayana, thereupon was pleased to teach me this Bhagavatam oh Maharaja, this anthology equal in status to the four Vedas. Suta Gosvami, sitting here with us oh best of the Kurus, will [in his turn] pass it on when he is questioned by sages headed by Shaunaka during a lengthy sacrificial ceremony in the forest of Naimisharanya [see 1.1].'

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 5:

Final Instructions to Maharaja Parikshit

Shri Shuka said: 'In this [narration] I have elaborately described the Supreme Lord Hari, the Soul of the Universe, from whose grace Lord Brahma was born [3.8] from whose anger Lord Shiva [3.12: 7] took birth. Oh King, you who think 'I am going to die', have to give up this animalistic mentality; it is not so that you - just like the body - [as a soul] have been born while you before were non-existent. You likewise neither shall die today [see also B.G. 2: 12 & 2: 20]. You will not get a new life as a child of yours or in the form of a grandchild, the way a plant sprouts from its own seed; you differ from the body and that what belongs to it as much as fire [differs from the wood it is burning *]. The way one in a dream can witness one's own head being cut off [while staying alive] one also witnesses the physical body composed of the five elements and so on. That is why the soul of the body is of an unborn and eternal nature [see also B.G. 2: 22]. When a pot is broken the air in the pot again will be as the air before; so too the individual regains his original spiritual state when the body is dead. The material bodies, qualities and actions of the spirit soul result from a materially oriented mind; and it is maya, the illusory potency of the Lord, that brings about the material mind and the consequent [repeated] material existence of the individual living being [through ahankara, see also 2.5: 25, 3.26: 31-32, 3.27: 2-5]. The combination of oil, a vessel, a wick and fire is what one sees together with the burning of a lamp. Likewise one sees how because of the interaction of the modes of passion, goodness and ignorance the material existence of the physical body develops and finds destruction. The soul differing from the gross [deha] and the subtle [linga] body, is self-luminous, and constitutes, because it is as unchanging as the sky, the foundation [adhara] that is eternal and beyond comparison. Oh prabhu, engaging your intelligence thus with logical inferences in meditation upon Lord Vasudeva, you should carefully consider your essence, your true self, that is covered by your physical frame. Takshaka [the snake-bird] sent by the words of the brahmin [1.18] will not burn you; the messengers of death cannot supersede you [your soul] who [now] have mastered the causes of death and death itself [see also 11.31: 12]. 1-1 With the consideration 'I am the Original Supreme Spirit, the Abode of the Absolute and the Supreme Destination' you should place yourself within the Supreme Self that is free from material designations. [Having done this] you will, with the entire world thus set apart from the self, not even notice Takshaka or your own body when he, licking his lips and with his mouth full of poison, bites your foot. Dear soul, is there anything more you want to know, oh King, after all that I in response to your questions told you about the activities of the Lord?'

*: In the Shruti-mantra it is said: pita putrena pitriman yoni-yonau: "A father has a father in his son, because he may take birth as his own grandson."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 6:

Maharaja Parikshit Liberated and the Veda Handed Down in Four

Shri Suta said: "After Maharaja Parikshit, the one protected by Vishnu, had heard what was said by the sage, the equal minded seer of the Supreme Soul, the son of Vyasa, he approached his lotus feet, bowed his head down and said with his hands folded the following to him. The king said: 'With the great mercy shown by your goodness full of compassion, I have attained perfection because you described directly to me the Lord Without a Beginning or End. It is no surprise at all for great souls absorbed in the Infallible One to be of mercy with the ignorant conditioned souls who are tormented by distress. We [thus] heard from you this collection of classical stories in which the Supreme Lord Uttamasloka is being described [*]. My lord, I do not fear Takshaka or any other living being, nor do I fear repeated deaths; I have entered the Spirit of the Absolute revealed by you as [nirvana, as] standing apart from everything material, and [am now] free from fear. Please allow me oh brahmin, to place my speech [and other sensory functions] in Adhokshaja so that I, with an absorbed mind having forsaken all sensual desires, can give up my life. With the help of you who showed the all-auspicious, supreme shelter of the Lord Almighty, I have become fixed in non-material knowledge and wisdom and has my ignorance been eradicated.'"

Suta said: "Thus having been addressed the powerful saint, the son of Vyasa, gave him the permission. After the king, that god among the people, along with the renounced sages had worshiped him, the sage left. -1 Parikshit, the saintly king, by the power of reason thereupon placed his mind in his soul, meditated on the Supreme Truth and arrested his breath so that he became as motionless as a tree. On the bank of the Ganges sitting on darbha grass laid to the east, the great yogi, facing the north, broke in perfect realisation of the Absolute Spirit with all doubts. Dear scholars, when Takshaka, being triggered by the angered son of the brahmin sage [Samika], was on his way to kill the king, he encountered Kasyapa Muni [see 1.18]. He was an expert in countering poison, but Takshaka satisfied him with valuables and persuaded him to return home. Thereupon he, able to assume any form desired, disguised himself as a brahmin and bit the king. Before the eyes of all embodied souls the body of the fully self-realised saint among the kings was consumed by the fire of the snake's poison and turned immediately to ashes. From all directions of the earth and the sky a great cry of lamentation was heard of the surprise of all demigods, demons, human beings and other creatures. The kettledrums of the demigods resounded, the Gandharvas and Apsaras sang and the self-realised souls spoke words of praise and rained down a shower of flowers. When Janamejaya heard that his father had been bitten by Takshaka, he most enraged accordingly together with the brahmins offered all the snakes [of the world] as oblations in a sacrificial ceremony. Takshaka seeing the great serpents being burned in the blazing fire of the snake sacrifice, agitated by fear went to Indra for shelter. King Janamejaya not seeing Takshaka among them, said to the brahmins: 'Why has Takshaka, the lowest of all serpents, not been burned?'

[They answered:] 'Oh best of the kings, he is hiding, having approached Indra for shelter. The snake is protected by him and therefore did not end up in the fire.'

After the highly intelligent son of Parikshit heard these words he said to the priests: 'Dear scholars, why not throw Takshaka along with Indra into the fire?'

Hearing that the priests performed the ritual for offering Takshaka along with Indra. [They prayed:] 'Oh Takshaka, may you quickly fall into this fire here together with Indra and his host of demigods.' Indra who together with Takshaka and his vimana was thrown from his position by the derogatory words of the brahmins, became most disturbed. Brihaspati, the son of Angira, who saw him together with Takshaka fall from the sky in his vimana, addressed the king: 'This snake-bird does not deserve to be killed by you, oh ruler of men. He, this king of the snakes, drank from the nectar [of the gods] and is therefore beyond any doubt free from aging and immortal! The life and death of a living being and his destination [in a next life], oh King, are solely the result of his karma; no other agent than this brings him happiness and distress. A living being dying because of snakes, thieves, fire and lightning, hunger, thirst, disease or other agents oh King, undergoes that because of his accumulated karma. For that reason oh King, this sacrifice should be stopped that is performed with the intent to harm others. People burning innocent snakes will have to suffer that fate themselves [see also the Mahabharata 1.43]."

Suta said: "Thus being addressed he said: 'So be it!', and with respect for the words of the great sage he ceased with the snake sacrifice and worshiped that master of speech [Brihaspati]. It is this great material illusion [mahamaya] belonging to Vishnu that, because of the interaction of the material qualities [the gunas], causes misfortune, cannot be counteracted and from which the souls who are part and parcel of Him become bewildered and are caught in material bodies. 0-3 The visible illusory energy wherein abiding one lacking in peace thinks in terms of deceit, will not [prevail] when one constantly investigates what goes on in the soul. This is so because one therein, [in that state] the transcendentalists speak about, is not of the materialistic arguments that assume so many forms nor thereof is a mind full of decisions and doubts. In that [transcendental consciousness] the living entity is not of worldly concerns or of their causes and the benefits achieved by them, nor is he therein of the I-awareness [that is so strong] in being bound to the modes. That is all excluded then. A wise soul should take pleasure in warding off the waves of worldly conditioning as also anyone thus being entangled [see also e.g. 6.4: 31-32]. The supreme refuge of Lord Vishnu is, by those who wish to give up everything inessential, designated as that which is 'neither this, nor that' [see also neti neti]. Rejecting the immorality [of materialism] and with their emotions directed at nothing else, they embrace in their hearts the 'not-that' [of the Soul, of Him] to which they hold on deeply absorbed in meditation [in samadhi]. [Thus] not being corrupted by the 'I' and 'mine' that is based upon having a body and a home, they attain this supreme refuge of Lord Vishnu. Insulting words one should tolerate and one should never disrespect anyone, nor should one identify with this material body or hold a grudge against whomever. I offer my obeisances to Him, the Supreme Personality of Godhead Shri Krishna whose knowledge is always new and upon whose lotus feet meditating I have assimilated this collection of wisdom [Samhita]."

Shri Shaunaka said: "Please tell us this oh gentle soul [Suta]: in what way spoke Paila and the other highly intelligent disciples of Vyasa who constitute the Vedic authority, about the Vedas and how have they divided them?"

Suta said: "Oh brahmin, Lord Brahma, the most elevated being, had his mind perfectly under control and heard in his heart the subtle transcendental sound [of ta-pa, 2.9: 6] that arose from the ether. One can hear that sound when one closes one's ears [for sounds from the outside. See also Shabda]. By the worship of that sound, oh brahmin, yogis cleanse the contamination away from the heart that is known as the substance, the activity and the doer [], and find liberation from rebirth. From that [sound] the threefold omkara [A-U-M] came into being that, manifesting itself unseen, constitutes the representation of the Supreme Lord [Bhagavan], the Absolute Truth [Brahman] and the Supersoul [Paramatma, see also 1.2: 11, B.G. 7: 8]. 0-4 One perceives this [eternal, itself imperceptibly manifesting] sound, outside the physical sense of hearing and power of vision. The complete of the Vedic sound one employs is an elaboration of this omkara that from the soul manifests itself in the ether. It constitutes the direct expression of the self-generating Absolute Truth and Supersoul, it constitutes the eternal seed of the Vedas and constitutes the secret of all mantras [see also 7.15: 31, 9.14: 48, 11.14: 34-35, 11.21: 36-40]. Oh eminence of Bhrgu, the three sounds of the alphabet beginning with A that came into being [the sounds A, U and M], are fundamental to [all] the threefold forms of material existence: the modes [the gunas], the names [of the three Vedas], the destinations [the three types of lokas] and the states of consciousness [avasthatraya]. The mighty unborn Lord [Brahma] created from it [that threefold sound] the different sounds of the total collection of vowels, sibilants, semivowels and consonants as they are known by their short and long forms. For the purpose of giving instruction on the four sacrifices [see ritvik], the almighty one created with all these sounds from his four faces the four Vedas, along with his omkara and yahriti invocations [of the names of the seven lokas]. He taught them [as a complete set] to his sons who were the great rishis among the brahmins most expert in the art of Vedic recitation, and they in their turn imparted them as instructors of dharma [acaryas] to their sons. Throughout the four yugas generation after generation, one after the other disciple fixed in his vows received them [these Vedas] by disciplic succession [parampara]. They were divided among the prominent sages at the end of Dvapara-yuga. The brahmin sages, inspired by the Infallible Lord situated in their hearts, came to that dividing among each other of the Vedas when they saw that under the influence of time the intelligence [of the people] diminished, the life span shortened and the strength weakened [see also 1.4: 16-18]. 8-4 Oh brahmin, in this period [of Manu], Brahma and Shiva and other rulers over the worlds requested the Supreme Lord, the Protector of the Universe, to protect the principles of religion. Oh most fortunate soul, the Lord [in the form of Krishna Dvaipayana Vyasa], by Paras'ara begotten in the womb of Satyavati, then descended as a partial expansion of His plenary portion [Sankarshana] and divided the Veda in four. Like someone sorting out gems, he separated the group of mantras in four categories of collections [Samhitas]: the Rig, Atharva, Yajur and Sama Veda [see Vedas]. The highly intelligent and mighty sage, asked four of his disciples to approach him one by one, oh brahmin, to give each of them one of the [four] collections. 2-5 He taught Paila the first collection [the Rig Veda] named Bahvrica ['many verses'], to Vais'ampayana he spoke the collection of Yajur mantras called Nigada ['the recited'], the Sama mantras titled Chandoga [singer in metre] he told Jaimini and the [Atharva] mantras from [the sages] Atharva and Angira he entrusted to his dear disciple Sumantu [see also 4.21: 22]. 4-5 Paila told his Samhita [that he divided in two] to Indrapramiti and Bashkala. The latter one oh son of Bhrgu [Shaunaka], divided his collection in four parts he handed down to his disciples Bodhya, Yajnavalkya, Paras'ara and Agnimitra. The self-controlled sage Indrapramiti taught his collection to the learned seer [his son] Mandukeya and his disciple Devamitra taught it to Saubhari and others. Shakalya, his son, divided his collection in five parts he gave to Vatsya, Mudgala, Shaliya, Gokhalya and Shis'ira. Sage Jatukarnya, also a disciple of his added to the collection he received a glossary when he passed it down to Balaka, Paila, Jabala and Viraja. Bashkali [the son of Bashkala] assembled from the different branches [of the Rig Veda] the collection called the Valakhilya-Samhita that was received by [the daiitya sons] Valayani, Bhajira and Kas'ara. This is how those many collections of the Rig Veda verses were maintained by these brahmin seers [in disciplic succession]. Anyone who hears about the distribution of these sacred verses is freed from all sins.

[Some] disciples of Vais'ampayana were known as the Carakas ['the ones vowed'] for they executed a vow on behalf of their guru to atone for the sin of having killed a brahmin. They became authorities on the Atharva Veda. Yajnavalkya, another disciple, said: 'Oh master, what value have the endeavors of these weak fellows? I will perform a most difficult penance!'

Thus being addressed his spiritual master got angry and said: 'Go away, enough of you, a disciple insulting scholars; give immediately everything up that I taught you!'

The son of Devarata then regurgitated the collected Yajur mantras. After he had left the sages greedily looked at these Yajur mantras and turned into partridges picking them up. These branches of the Yajur Veda thus became known as the most beautiful Taittiriya-Samhita ['the partridge collection']. Oh brahmin, Yajnavalkya, looking for extra mantras unknown to his spiritual master, thereupon carefully worshipped the Lord of the sun.

Shri Yajnavalkya said: 'My obeisances unto the Supreme Personality of Godhead, who, appearing as the sun and just like the ether in the form of the Supersoul inside and in the form of Time outside, is present in the hearts of the four kinds of living entities beginning from Brahma down to the blades of grass [as born from wombs, eggs, moist and seed, see also 2.10: 37-40]. You who cannot be covered by material terms, all by Yourself, with the flow of years made up of the tiny fragments of kshanas, lavas and nimeshas [see 3.11: 7], carry out the maintenance of this universe by taking away and returning its water [in the form of rain]. Oh Lord of the Sun, oh Glowing One, oh Best among the Gods, by the rules of the sacred tradition I daily meditate, at the [three] junctures of the day, with full attention on Your glowing sphere, on You the mighty controller, who burn all the sins, the consequent suffering as also what led to them, of all souls offering prayers [see also 11.14: 35 and the Gayatri]. You, who in this world are the Lord dwelling in the hearts of all the moving and nonmoving living beings depending on Your shelter, awaken [and inspire] their unconscious material mind, senses and different vital airs [the vayus]. This world was seized and swallowed by the horrible mouth of the python known as darkness and became unconscious like being dead. You alone, most magnanimous mercifully casting Your glance, awaken [the sleeping souls] with the gift of insight. At the beginning, half way and at the end of the day You thus, day after day engage [the pious] in the ultimate benefit known as one's own nature of delivering service in a spiritual existence [svadharm]. Like an earthly king You [in the form of the sun] travel around everywhere creating fear among the sinners while the deities of the directions holding lotus flowers, with folded palms offer their respects. Hoping for Yajur mantras not known to anyone else, I therefore with prayer approach You two lotus feet, oh Lord, that are honoured by the spiritual masters of the three worlds [lokas, and see 5.23: 8]."

Suta said: "He, the Supreme Lord of the Sun thus glorified being satisfied, assumed the form of a horse and presented to the sage the Yajur mantras that were never learned by any other mortal being [see also 5.18: 6]. The mighty sage divided the hundreds of Yajur mantras in fifteen branches that were accepted by the disciples Kanva, Madhyandina and others under the name Vajasaneyi: 'stemming from the manes of the horse.' Of Jaimini Rishi, the manager of the Sama Veda, there was a son Sumantu as also a grandson Sutvan. Each of them he told one half of the collection. 6-7 Sukarma, another disciple [of Jaimini] and great thinker, divided the tree of the Sama Veda into a thousand collections of Sama mantras after which, oh brahmin, the disciples Hiranyanabha - the son of Kus'ala - Paushyanji as also another one named Avantya who was most advanced in spiritual realisation, took charge of them. From Paushyanji and Avantya there were five hundred disciples who are called the Sama Veda singers of the north, or also [in later times, some of them] the singers of the south. Laugakshi, Mangali, Kulya, Kus'ida and Kukshi, [five] other disciples of Paushyanji, each took care of a hundred collections of mantras. Krita, a disciple of Hiranyanabha, communicated twenty four Samhitas to his disciples and the remaining ones were handed down by the self-realised sage Avantya."

*: The Shrimad Bhagavatam is also known by the name of 'Paramahansa Samhita': the collection of stories about the Supreme Swanlike Lord.

 : The substance, the activity and the doer as impurities are understood as manifestations of the ego-inspiring modes of the ignorance of inert matter, the passion of movement and the goodness of knowledge, also known as the adhibhautika hindrance of the body, the adhyatmika hindrance of the organs of action and the adhidivaika hindrance of the senses of perception [see kles'a].

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 7:

The Devotion in Samhita Branches and the Ten Topics of the Puranas

Shri Suta said: "Sumantu Rishi, the knower of the Atharva Veda [see 12.6: 52-53], instructed his mantra collection to his disciple [named Kabandha], who [dividing it in two] spoke it to Pathya and Vedadars'a. Please listen: Shauklayani, Brahmabali, Modosha and Pippalayani, the disciples of Vedadars'a and the disciples Kumuda, Shunaka and Jalali of Pathya my dear brahmin, were also all of them authorities on the Atharva Veda. Then Babhru and Saindhavyana, two disciples of Shunaka [Angira], the same way learned two Samhitas and other disciples headed by Savarna learned them [from them again] in their turn. Also Nakshatrakalpa, Shantikalpa, Kasyapa, Angirasa and others belong to these acaryas of the Atharva Veda. Hear now, oh sage, about the authorities of the Puranas.

Trayyaruni, Kasyapa, Savarni, Akritavrana, Vais'ampayana and Harita are the six masters of the Puranas. Each of them learned one collection from the mouth of Vyasa's pupil, my father [Romaharshana], and I, as a disciple of [all] these [masters], became well versed in all [the collections]. Kasyapa, I, Savarni and Akritavrana, who is a disciple of Rama [Parashurama, see also 10.74: 7-9], learned four basic collections from [Romaharshana], the disciple of Vyasa. Oh brahmin, please listen attentively to what the characteristics are of a Purana as ascertained by the most intelligent brahmin seers in accordance with the Vedic scriptures. -1 The creation [of this universe, sarga], the subsequent creation [of different worlds and beings, visarga], the maintenance [the sustenance, the vritti or sthana] and protection [the raksha or poshana of the living beings], the reigns [of the various manas], the dynasties [vams'as], the narrations about them [vams'a-anucaritam], the annihilation [of different kinds, pralaya or samstha], the reason [the individual living entity or hetu] and the supreme shelter [of the Fortunate One or apas'raya], oh brahmin, are the ten topics characterizing a Purana as understood by the authorities on the matter. Some state that relative to the greater ones, the smaller Puranas deal with only five of these subjects [see also Shuka on this 2.10: 1-7 and *].

Creation [sarga] is what one calls the generation from the primordial state. From that state the agitation of the modes raised the cosmic intelligence from which the identification with matter rose that is divided in three aspects [for types of beings to the modes]. This further led to the manifestation of the subtle forms of perception, the senses and the objects of sense perception [formation by the conditioning of and identification with Time, compare 2.10: 3].

The secondary creation [visarga] consists of the collection of ideas [impressions, desires, expectations, the vansas] of the moving and nonmoving living beings. These propensities are, by the grace of the Original Person [the purusha], produced the same way as seed that produces [even more] seed.

Living beings subsist on other living beings that move around or else do not move around. For human beings specifically this [vritti] means that one therein acts according to either one's personal nature, one's lust or to scriptural regulations.

Raksha [or protection] concerns the [activities of the] incarnations of the Infallible One who age after age are present here among the animals, the mortals, the seers and the demigods of this universe, and kill the enemies of the threefold Veda [see also B.G. 4: 7].

With every reign of a Manu one speaks of the sixfold [manifestation of the] Lord: the Manu, the demigods, the sons of the Manu, the different controllers of the enlightened souls [the Indras], the seers [or rishis] and the partial incarnations [of the Lord, the ams'a-avatars].

Dynasties [vams'as] originating from Brahma extend as series of kings through the past, present and future [trikalika] and their histories [vams'a-anucaritam] describe the activities of the prominent members in succession.

The periodical, natural, continuous and complete annihilation taking place as a consequence of His potency constitutes the four aspects of what the scholars describe as the dissolution of this universe [as samtha or pralaya, see also 12.4].

The reason [hetu] of the [existence of the] creation [sarga] and everything thereto [the maintenance and destruction] of this [universe] is [constituted by] the individual living soul [the spiritual and personal jiva], who out of ignorance is of result-minded action [accumulates karma], someone of whom others speak as the unmanifest [impersonal and conditioned] self.

The Absolute Truth [God', brahma, devadeva] as the supreme shelter [apas'raya] is present both separate from and connected with [or inside] the waking, sleeping and dreamless state, the material forms presented by the illusory energy and the individual [moral] conduct. Just as the basic substance of material objects exists both separately from as in connection with existing matters with a name and form, it [the Absolute Truth] throughout the various phases of a bodily existence, is connected with and separate from the seed in the beginning up to the five elements [one returns to] in the end [compare 8.6: 10]. When the mind stops out of it own by giving up the three functions of consciousness [vritti-traya] or by practicing [bhakti]-yoga, one knows the Supreme Soul and ceases from material endeavoring [zie ook 3.25: 32-33].

The sages expert in the ancient stories, say that, thus being distinguished by their characteristics, there are eighteen big and [eighteen] small Puranas [from 9.000 up tot 81.000 verses, see also Upa-purana]. 3-2 They [the big ones] are known as the three times six Puranas [according to each guna-avatara] named Brahma, Padma, Vishnu, Shiva, Linga, Garuda, Narada, Bhagavata, Agni, Skanda, Bhavishya, Brahma-vaivarta, Markandeya, Vamana, Varaha, Matsya, Kurma and Brahmhanda [see Puranas]. Oh brahmin, I thus described thoroughly the branches [of Vedic knowledge] conducive to one's spiritual potency the way they were divided by the sage [Vyasa], his disciples and the disciples of his disciples."

*: The Vedic verse (Amarkhasa) to this secondary status of a Purana says: sargas' ca pratisargas' ca vams'o manvantarani ca vams'anucaritam ceti puranam panca-lakshanam; "Creation, secondary creation, the dynasties of kings, the reigns of Manus and the activities of various dynasties are the five characteristics of a Purana."

Shrila Jiva Goswami has explained to this that the ten principal topics of Shrimad-Bhagavatam are found within each of the twelve BOOKS. One should not try to assign each of the ten topics to a particular BOOK. Nor should the Shrimad-Bhagavatam be artificially interpreted to show that it deals with the topics successively. The simple fact is that all aspects of knowledge important to human beings, summarised in the ten categories mentioned above, are described with various degrees of emphasis and analysis throughout the Shrimad-Bhagavatam [pp. 12.7: 9-10].

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 8:

Markandeya Resists All Temptation and Prays to Nara-Narayana Rishi

Shri Shaunaka said: "Oh Suta, may you live long, oh saintly soul. Oh best of speakers, please talk to us, for you are for a mankind wandering in the endless darkness the seer of the opposite [of the light]. - People say that the son of Mrikandu, a seer [called Markandeya] was blessed with an exceptionally long life span and that he was the only soul to remain at the end of the kalpa when this entire universe was engulfed. He, the foremost descendant of Bhrgu this kalpa factually took birth in my own family. We as yet have not seen any such great deluge of all creation taking place in our age. When he alone wandered this great ocean [of destruction] he spotted, so the story goes, a single wonderful personality, an infant boy, lying within the fold of a banyan leaf. About this, oh Suta we are in great doubt. Oh yogi by everyone regarded the greatest authority on the Puranas, please put for us so eager to know about it, an end to that doubt."

Suta said: "Oh great sage, the effect of your question is that it will take away the confusion of the entire world for it leads to the discussion of the story of Narayana that removes the dirt of Kali-yuga. -1 After Markandeya had received the second-birth initiation rituals from his father and orderly had studied the Vedic hymns and principles of religion, he was equipped with austerity and recitation. Keeping to the great vow [of lifelong celibacy, see yama] he was peaceful with matted hair and bark clothes, and carried a water pot, a medicant's staff, a sacred thread and a celibate's belt. With the skin of a black deer and lotus-seed prayer beads he for the sake of his regulated practice [see niyama] worshiped at sunrise and sunset the Lord in the form of the fire, the sun, the guru, the scholars and the Supreme Soul. In the morning and the evening he brought what he had collected by begging to his spiritual master and being invited by his guru then joined in the eating in silence, or else, not being asked, he would fast [see also 7.12: 5 and 7.14: 17]. When he thus with penance and study had worshiped the Master of the Senses for countless [or millions of] years, he had conquered what is impossible to conquer: death. Brahma, Bhrgu, Shiva, Daksha, the sons of Brahma and many others among the human beings, demigods, forefathers and ghostly spirits all stood amazed about that [achievement]. This way with his austerities, recitations and restraint maintaining the great vow of celibacy, the yogi having turned his mind inwards, meditated upon the Lord in the Beyond and rid himself of all hindrances. As he was thus fixing his mind with the powerful practice of yoga, the enormous lapse of time passed consisting of six manvantaras [of 71 mahayugas each]. In the seventh period of Manu, Purandara [Indra] heard about the austerities, became afraid of them, oh brahmin, and decided to obstruct them. He sent celestial singers and dancing girls to the sage as also Cupid, the spring season, the [sandalwood scented] Malaya breeze, the child of passion [or greed] and the child of intoxication. Oh mighty soul, they all went to his hermitage on the northern side of the Himalaya mountains where the river Pushpabhadra and the peak named Citra are situated. 8-2 The fine site of the ashrama was crowded with twice-born souls, was marked with nice trees and creepers and reservoirs of pellucid water everywhere. Humming with maddened bees it was filled with families of birds - excitedly cooing cuckoos and busily dancing, proud peacocks. The winds blowing there transported the cooling drops of mist from the waterfalls and being embraced by the charm of flowers, called for the god of love. With the moon rising at night showing its face, springtime appeared there with series of new sprouts and blossoms from the multitude of creepers closely embracing the trees. The god of love, the master of hordes of heavenly women, showed himself there holding his bow and arrows, as he was followed by groups of singing Gandharvas playing musical instruments. The servants of Indra found him sitting there in meditation after having offered his sacrificial oblations, with his eyes closed as invincible as fire personified. The women danced in front of him and the celestial singers sang, making charming music with drums, cymbals and vinas. And while the servants of Indra, the child of greed and the child of spring tried to agitate the mind of the sage, Cupid fixed his five-pointed arrow [concerning one's sight, smell, sound, touch and taste] on his bow. 6-2 The wreath of flowers fell from the hair of Punjikasthali [an Apsara] who, with her waist greatly challenged by her heavy breasts, was playing with a number of balls. Running after the balls with her eyes wandering here and there, the belt of her thin garment loosened and the wind lifted up the fine fabric [see also 3.20: 35-36, 3.22: 17, 5.2: 14, 8.12: 17-24]. Cupid, thinking he had conquered him, then shot his arrow, but all these actions directed at the sage proved to be as futile as the endeavors of a disbeliever. Oh sage, this way trying to compromise the sage, they felt themselves being burned by his potency and thus desisted, just like children having aroused a snake. Oh brahmin, even though the followers of Indra had violated the great muni, he did not yield to the sentiments of ego. For a great soul that is not so surprising at all.

Seeing and hearing how, because of the strength of the brahmin seer, Kamadeva along with his associates stood powerless, the mighty king of heaven was greatly amazed. In order to show the sage His mercy who thus had fixed his mind in austerity, recitation and restraint, the Lord manifested Himself in the forms of Nara and Narayana. 3-3 One of Them was white and the other black. Their eyes were like blooming lotuses, They had four arms, had clothes of bark and black deerskin. They carried a water pot and a straight staff of bamboo in Their most purifying hands and had three-stranded sacred threads. With prayer beads of lotus seeds and with the Vedas that purify all living beings [in the form of bundles of darbha] They, being worshiped by the chief demigods and standing tall with an effulgent yellowish colour, radiating like lightning were austerity personified. Seeing the sages Nara and Narayana, the forms of the Supreme Personality of Godhead, he stood up to offer his obeisances with the greatest respect and prostrated himself. Because he, when he saw Them, experienced happiness all over his body, mind and senses and the hairs on his body stood on end, he was unable, from the tears filling his eyes, to see Them clearly before him. Standing humbly with folded hands he addressed Them eagerly as if he wanted to embrace Them, and choking said to the two Lords the syllables 'na-ma-ha, na-ma-ha' (my obeisances, my obeisances). He offered Them seats, bathed Their feet and worshiped Them with incense and flower garlands while anointing Them with sandal wood and other fragrant substances. As They sat comfortably on Their places ready to bestow Their mercy upon the sage, he again bowed down at Their feet and spoke the following words to the supremely worshipable personalities.

Shri Markandeya said: 'Oh Almighty One, how can I describe You who moves the vital breath of all embodied living beings including Brahma, Shiva and myself, and who following stirs into action the power of speech, the mind and the senses. Nevertheless [despite this physical imposition] You become the loving friend of everyone worshipping You. These personal forms of the Fortunate One oh Supreme Lord, You manifest for the ultimate benefit of the cessation of material misery and the defeat of death. And just as You for the sake of protection manifest various other forms, You - like a spider [with its web] - once having created this universe, again swallow it up completely. Because of You, the Protector, the Supreme Controller of the moving and nonmoving living beings, the one situated at the soles of His feet is never touched by the emotions of karma, guna and kala; it is before You indeed that the sages with the Veda in their heart at every moment in praise bow down to worship and meditate to attain You. We know of nothing else but the attainment of Your feet, the very form of liberation oh Lord, that benefits the person who has to fear from all sides. Brahma whose time takes two parardhas, is most afraid on account of this because You are the Time. And how much more would that not be true for the worldly entities created by him [see 10.13: 56]? Let me therefore with forsaking the covering of my soul, worship the foundation of Your feet, of You who are the intelligence of the real and the teacher of the soul who are the Absolute Truth. The material body with everything thereto is but temporal, one remembers it for only a moment and without its essence it has no meaning. One must attain You and thus see all desired purposes fulfilled. Oh Lord, oh Friend of the Soul, even though all the products of Your illusory potency carrying the names sattva, rajas and tamas, exist as a form of [Your] pastime for the sake of the maintenance, destruction and creation of this universe, it is the mode of goodness, sattva, that exists for our liberation and not any of the other two [of passion and ignorance] that bring men danger, bewilderment and fear [see also guna-avatars and 10.89: 18]. Because fearlessness, the happiness of the soul and the spiritual world are attained by the mode of goodness, the Satvatas, Your devotees, are of that consideration and never of any other [mode or] form of the Original Person. For that reason the spiritual authorities in this world worship as most dear to them the transcendental personal form of You [Vishnu], as also the form of those who have only eyes for You [the Vaishnavas], oh Supreme Lord [see also 1.2: 26]. The All-pervading, All-inclusive Manifestation and Master of the Universe, the Supreme Personality of Godhead, I offer my obeisances, for He is the supremely worshipable deity Narayana, the sage of perfect purity and Nara, the best of the humans and master of the Vedic scriptures in command of His speech [see hamsa]. He who by the deceptive command of his eyes, becomes diverted in his intelligence and fails to recognise [Your presence] within his own senses, heart and even within the objects perceived, may despite his understanding being covered by Your maya nevertheless succeed when he directly obtains the Vedic knowledge from its source, from You the Spiritual Master of All. The vision of the Supreme Soul, the mystery revealed by the Vedic texts, is what the great scholars headed by the Unborn Lord [Brahma] become bewildered about when they try to adjust, with all sorts of philosophies, the subject matter of Him to their way of life. Him, the Supreme Personality who escapes the understanding of the [materially conditioned] spirit soul I offer my respects [compare 1.3: 37, 4.31: 11, 4.18: 5, 5.6: 11, 5.14: 1, 7.15: 58, 11.19: 1, 11.20: 7 and B.G. 16: 23-24]."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 9:

Markandeya is Shown the Lord's Bewildering Potency
Shri Suta said: "The Supreme Lord Narayana, Nara's Friend, who thus by Markandeya, the intelligent sage, was properly respected, thereupon satisfied spoke to the eminent follower of Bhrgu. The Supreme Lord said: 'Oh dear man perfectly absorbed in the soul, you are the best of all brahmin seers for by your austerities, recitations and concentration you do not deviate in your devotional service unto Me. We are perfectly satisfied about your steady adherence to the great vow. We wish you all the best. Please choose a benediction to your liking. I am the Giver of All Benedictions you desire.'

The honourable rishi said: 'You, oh Lord of Lords, oh Infallible One, are victorious as the Remover of the Distress of the Surrendered Soul. We are perfectly satisfied with as much as the benediction of having seen Your good Self. Brahma and others with a mind matured in yoga all acquired the sight of Your omnipotent lotus feet and now You in person are visible before my eyes. Nonetheless oh Lotus-eyed Crest Jewel of Fame, I would like to witness the illusory potency because of which the entire world along with its rulers knows the Absolute Truth as a material differentiation [compare B.G. 11: 3-4].'

Suta said: 'Oh sage [Shaunaka], the Supreme Lord by the rishi to His satisfaction being glorified and worshiped with these words said with a smile to him 'So be it'. Thereupon the Lord departed for Badarikashrama. - The rishi remained behind in his hermitage thinking only of that purpose [of witnessing the energy of the Lord] and venerated and meditated under all circumstances the Lord to the best of his ability [as being present] in the fire, the sun, the moon, the water, the earth, the wind, the lightning as also in his heart. Thus immersed in the stream of pure love [prema] he sometimes forgot to prove his respects. Oh best of Bhrgu, when the sage one day was performing his evening worship on the bank of the Pushpabhadra, a great wind arose oh brahmin. It created a terrible sound followed by the appearance of threatening clouds as solid as wagon wheels that resounded loudly with lightning and torrential showers of rain everywhere. Then from all sides the four oceans appeared that engulfed the surface of the earth with wind-tossed waves in which there were terrible sea monsters and fearful whirlpools accompanied by ominous sounds. Perplexed the sage became afraid seeing how the earth flooded and all the four types of inhabitants of the universe [as born from moist, seed, embryos and eggs] including himself, inside and outside were plagued by the fierce winds, the bolts of lightning and the great waves of water rising higher than the sky. Before his eyes the water of the great ocean was swirled around by hurricanes in frightening waves as it swelled with the rain from the clouds and covered the entire earth with its continents, islands and mountains. With the three worlds, the earth, outer space, the celestial bodies and heavenly places flooded in all directions the great sage, as the only soul remaining, wandered about like a dumb and blind person, with his matted locks scattered. Suffering hunger and thirst, attacked by monstrous crocodiles and whale-eaters and plagued by the winds he, tormented by the waves, moved about in the infinite darkness he had fallen into, overcome by fatigue and not knowing which direction of the sky or the earth he went. 7-1 Sometimes drowning in a great whirlpool and then beaten by the waves he was threatened by monsters that tried to eat him the one moment and the other moment were attacking each other. In distress he sometimes felt sick and suffered pains with occasional depressions, bewilderment, misery, unhappiness and happiness, while fearing for his life at other times. Countless and countless, hundreds and thousands of years passed with him in bewilderment wandering around in that maya, that deluding material energy of Vishnu.

One day, as he was roaming about there, the twice-born soul spotted upon a raised mound of earth a beautiful young banyan tree with fruits and blossoms. Upon a branch of it toward the northeast he saw an infant boy lying within the fold of a leaf swallowing the darkness with His effulgence [see also 3.33: 4]. 2-2 Amazed the king among the scholars drank with his eyes from the sight of His complexion that was as blue as a great emerald, His beautiful lotus face, His conch shell-striped throat, His broad chest, fine nose and beautiful eyebrows. His splendid hairs trembled to His breath, His beautiful shell-shaped ears resembled pomegranate flowers, His coral lips by their effulgence slightly reddened the nectarean charming smile on his face and the corners of His eyes were reddish like the whorl of a lotus. His breathing moved the lines of His abdomen contorted by His deep leaf like navel and ... he saw how the infant with the graceful fingers of His two hands grabbed one of His lotus feet and placed it in His mouth [*]. When he saw the baby his weariness was dispelled instantly and out of pleasure the lotus of his heart and his lotus eyes spread wide open. With his hair standing on end he asked himself who that wonderful appearance could be and went straight for the child to find an answer. That very moment the man of Bhrgu with a breath of the infant was drawn into His body like a mosquito whereupon he utterly surprised stood perplexed to see from that position the entire universe the way it was before. 8-2 He saw the entire expanse of all the stars, the mountains and oceans, the directions of the great islands and continents, the enlightened and unenlightened souls, the forests, countries, rivers, cities and mines, the peasant villages, the cow pastures and the various engagements of the varnashrama society. Of this universe being manifested as real he saw the basic elements of nature and all their gross manifestations as also the Time itself in the form of the different yugas and kalpas and whatever other object of use in material life. In front of the universe seeing the Himalayas, the Pushpabhadra river and his hermitage where he had met the rishis [Nara and Narayana], he was by the breath of the infant thrown outside again and fell back into the ocean of dissolution. 1-3 And there, on the raised stretch of land in the water where the banyan grew, was the child again lying in the fold of its leaf, glancing at him with a nectarean smile of love from the corner of His eyes. Placing the vision of the infant within his heart he greatly excited ran to embrace the Lord of the Beyond. That very instant He, the Supreme Lord, the master of yoga in person who is hidden in the heart of all living beings, suddenly became invisible to the rishi, the same way things that are made by an incompetent person may suddenly fail to serve. Oh brahmin, following Him immediately also the banyan disappeared and the waters of the annihilation of the world and he found himself in front of his ashrama as before."

*: The infant putting its foot into its mouth is by Shрила Vis'vanatha Cakravarti Thhakura interpreted as the Lord saying, 'see how sweet my feet are to the taste of the devotee'.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 10:

Shiva, Lord and Helper Glorifies Markandeya Rishi

Shri Suta said: "He who this way experienced the might of the yoga-maya as arranged by Narayana, sought shelter with Him. Shri Markandeya said: 'I fall at the soles of the feet of You who takes away the fear of those who approached You, oh Lord who with Your illusory potency in the form of knowledge even bewilders the scholars.'"

Suta said: "The great Lord Rudra [Shiva] who, accompanied by Rudrani [Uma] and surrounded by his entourage, traveled through the sky on his bull, saw how he was thus absorbed in meditation. - Uma observing the seer then said to Giri'sa: 'Look at this man of learning who with his body, senses and mind motionless is as calm as the water and schools of fish of the ocean with the wind laid down. Please, oh you who are the bestower of it, award him the perfection of his penances.'"

The mighty Lord said: 'I am sure that the brahmin seer does not desire any benedictions in any field, not even liberation, for he has achieved the transcendental devotional service unto the Supreme Lord, the Inexhaustible Original Person. Nevertheless Bhavani, let us talk to this pure devotee. It is indeed man's highest achievement to gain the association of saintly souls.'"

Suta said: "Thus having spoken he, the master of all knowledge, the controller of all embodied souls and the shelter of the righteous ones, approached him. Having arrested the functions of his mind, he [the sage] had neither knowledge of himself or the outer world, nor of the arrival of the two powers of control over the universe in person. Giri'sa the Controller, the great Lord, understanding that, entered the ethereal privacy of Markandeya's heart by means of his mystic potency, just like the wind passing through an opening. 1-1 Shiva appeared inside of him with hair locks blond like lightning, having three eyes and ten arms and rising as high as the sun. Together with a tiger skin he used for his garment, he exhibited his bow and trident, arrows and sword, shield, prayer beads, damaru (a small drum), ax and skull. When he saw him in his heart manifesting suddenly, the sage desisted from his trance and wondered in surprise: 'Who is this and where did he come from?'"

Opening his eyes and seeing that Lord Rudra had arrived with his associates and Uma, the sage with his head offered the one guru of the three worlds his obeisances. He honoured him together with his company and Uma with words of welcome, sitting places, water for their feet, water to drink, perfumed oil, garlands, incense and lamps. He said: 'Oh mighty one, what can I do for you, oh Lord who pacifies the universe by the full satisfaction of your ecstatic experience? I offer you my obeisances who delights in the mode of ignorance, you who devoted to passion are horrifying and you who give pleasure in the mode of goodness.'"

Suta Gosvami said: "Praised by these words he, the mighty Lord, the foremost of the demigods and shelter of the truthful soul, perfectly satisfied and happy-minded addressed him with a smile. The great Lord said: 'Please, choose a boon to your liking, for of all [demigod] givers of benedictions the three of us are the [guna-avatara] Lords by whose infallible audience a mortal being finds immortality. 0-2 The local rulers and inhabitants of all worlds, I, the great Lord Brahma and Lord Hari, glorify, worship and assist those who are saintly, peaceful and free from material attachment, who care for all living beings and free from enmity and equal towards all, are of a single-minded devotion unto us. They [these devotees] do not even acknowledge the slightest difference between me, the Infallible One and the one unborn, nor between themselves or other people and that is why we praise you. Mere bodies of water are no holy places and deities on themselves are devoid of life; they purify the soul only after a long time, but you do so by simply being seen [see also 10.48: 31]. We offer the brahmins our respects who carry our forms represented by the three Vedas and who by penances, study and concentration in yoga [samayama] are absorbed in the True Self. Even the greatest sinners and outcasts find purification by seeing you and hearing about you, and what would that not mean when one directly speaks to you [see also 7.14: 17, 10.64: 41-42]?"

Suta Gosvami said: "Thus with his ears drinking from the nectar reservoir of words full of the secret of dharma of the one decorated with the moon, the sage was not satisfied. He who because of Vishnu's maya was terribly exhausted from having wandered for such a long time, had been freed from a great load of trouble by the grace of Lord Shiva's nectarine words and spoke to him. Shri Markandeya said: 'Ah, how inconceivable for embodied souls this pastime is of the great controllers: they offer their obeisances to the ones they control who praise them as the lords of the universe! In general the authorised speakers act [by precept and example] for the embodied souls to accept the dharma and encourage and praise those who do so. Such an attitude of the Fortunate One [and His associates] does not compromise the power of His activities formed by His illusory energy [maya], any more than the tricks of a magician compromise his ability. 1-3 He who as the Supersoul from His mind [by Himself in the form of Time] created this universe and subsequently entered it [in the form of the avatars], manifests Himself like being the doer through the operating modes of nature, just like a person witnessing a dream. Let me offer my obeisances to Him, the Supreme Personality who, endowed with the three gunas, is the true Self on top of them. He is the pure, unequalled spiritual master who is the original form of the Absolute Truth [see B.G. 4: 13, 13: 30, 14: 19]. From seeing You a person can achieve whatever he desires, irrespective what. But what other benediction should I desire from you, oh all-pervading Lord whose presence itself is the highest [one may attain]? Nevertheless I would like to ask from you who stand for the Complete that entails the fulfillment of all wishes, one benediction: the unfailing devotional service unto the Supreme Personality of Godhead and unto the both of You and the ones devoted to Him.'"

Suta Gosvami said: "Thus being worshiped and glorified by the well-spoken words of the sage, the great Lord Sharva, thereto encouraged by his consort, said: 'Oh great sage full of devotion for Adhokshaja, may all your wishes be fulfilled. And may you also till the end of the kalpa enjoy fame, piety and freedom from old age and death. May you have knowledge of the threefold nature of time [tri-kalika], oh brahmin as also wisdom in combination with a free heart. May there for you being blessed with brahminical potency, be the status of teacher of the Purana.'"

Suta Gosvami said: "After having granted the sage these blessings he, the Lord with the three eyes, went away, on his way telling the goddess what he [Markandeya] in the past had accomplished and experienced. He that best soul of Bhrgu, who had achieved the greatest of the great in yoga, even today demonstrably travels about, on his path of serving the Lord with single-minded devotion. This is what I could describe to you of the amazing potency of the illusory energy of the Supreme Personality as experienced by the intelligent Markandeya. Some declare this unprecedented life [of the sage] to be [nothing more than] the repeatedly being born of the human being in the illusory creation of the Supreme Soul, but they have no idea what they are talking about. Oh best one of Bhrgu [Shaunaka], the story I described is infused with the potency of the Lord with the Chariot wheel in His hand [Krishna as the Lord of Time]; for anyone who hears it himself or makes someone else listen to it there will never be a repetition of births, a worldly conditioned existence, based on karma."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 11:

Vishnu's Attributes and the Order of the Month of Him as the Sun god

Shri Saunaka said: "Oh great devotee of the Supreme Personality known with the essence. You, oh best knower who knows so much, we now ask about this matter of the definitive conclusion of all the supplementary literatures [the tantras]. - We wish you all fortune! Please describe to us eager to learn, the kriya-yoga method of proceeding with His form by which, expertly performed, a mortal being may attain immortality. How do the followers of the tantric prescriptions [the tantras] in their regular worship conceive of the limbs, associates, weapons and ornaments of the Master of the Goddess of Fortune who is pure consciousness in person?"

Suta said: "My obeisances to the gurus! I shall speak about the opulences of Lord Vishnu that by the standard authorities beginning with Padmaja [Lord Brahma as the one born on the lotus] are described in the Vedas and tantras. He, the universal form [the complete of the universe, the virath-rupa], consists of the nine elements of creation [the tattvas] beginning with maya [or prakriti] and their [sixteen] transformations [vikaras]. In that conscious existence the three worlds [the lokas] produced are discerned [see also 11.22: 4-25]. - This form of the Purusha, has the earth for His feet, heaven for His head, cosmic space for His navel, the sun for His eyes, the air for His nostrils and the directions for His ears. The Master, the Lord, has the Prajapati for His genital and death for His anus. The Absolute Controller has the local rulers [the demigods] for His many arms, the moon for His mind, yama [or Yama] for His eyebrows, shame for His upper lip and greed for His lower lip. The moonlight stands for the teeth, delusion for the smile, the trees for the hairs on the body of the Almighty Lord and the clouds are the hair on the head of the Purusha [see also e.g. 2.6: 1-11, 2.10: 24-32, 10.40: 13-14, 11.12: 18-20]. Just as one can determine the dimensions of a normal individual by measuring the spread of his limbs, one can determine the dimensions of Him, the Gigantic Person, by the spread of the planetary systems [see also 5.20-24]. The Kaustubha gem carried by the Unborn One represents the spiritual light of the individual soul. The Shrivatsa mark on the chest of the Almighty represents its expansive effulgence [of the gem/the soul]. 1-1 His material energy consisting of different combinations of the natural modes is represented by His flower garland, the yellow garment He wears stands for the Vedic metres and His sacred thread represents the three syllable AUM. The processes of sankhya and yoga are carried by the Godhead in the form of His makara [sea-monster] earrings, and His crown, freeing all the worlds from fear, represents the superior [transcendental] position. The seat He sits on is called Ananta [the snake bed] - it is unevolved matter [pradhana, the primal ether], the lotus [the Lord's throne] thereupon is the goodness associated with dharma, spiritual knowledge and so on. 4-1 The club He carries constitutes the principle element [of prana or the vital air] relating to the sensory power, physical power and the power of mind. His excellent conch shell is the element water and His Sudarsana disc is the principle of tejas [the vital power, the dignity, the fire in opposition]. His sword is, [pure] as the atmosphere, the ether element, His shield consists of the mode of ignorance, His bow Sharnaga is the specific order [of spirit, the rupa] of time, and His quiver of arrows consists of the karma [the action or the karmendriyas]. His arrows, they say, are the senses, His chariot is the incitement to action [the mind], His external appearance constitutes the objects of perception [tanmatras] and His gestures [mudras] represent the essence of purposeful action. The cyclic order [of time, viz. the sun and the moon] constitutes the exercise of respect for the Godhead, spiritual initiation [diksha] is the purification process for the spiritual soul and devotional service to the Fortunate One is how one puts an end to a bad course (sin). The supreme lotus of Bhagavan's pastimes refers to the meaning of the word bhaga [His opulences] and the fan and whisk the Supreme Lord has accepted for His worship are religion and fame. Dear brahmins, His umbrella is Vaikuntha, the place free from foolishness and the one called Suparna [Garuda] who is the carrier of the Personality of Sacrifice [Vishnu or Yajna] represents the threefold Veda [see footnote]. The goddess Shri inseparable from the Lord constitutes His visible inner nature [*], Vishvakshena is known as the personification of the tantra scriptures and the eight doorkeepers headed by Nanda [] stand for the Lord's qualities of anima and such [the siddhis]. Vasudeva, Sankarshana, Pradyumna and Aniruddha are, as you know, the names of the manifested forms [the vyuha expansions] of the Original Person Himself oh brahmin [Shaunaka]. Bhagavan, the Supreme Lord, can be discussed in terms of [the states of consciousness concerning] the entire universe [vis'va], the passionate ego [taijasa], the individual learning [prajna] and the transcendence [turiya], that stand for [respectively His] functions of the [omnipresent perception of] external objects [as embodied by the expansion of His mind Prayumna], of sense itself [of the force, by the expansion of His ego Sankarshana], of the one that senses [of the expansion of His personal intelligence Aniruddha] and of spiritual self-realisation [the transcendental beatitude of Him, Vasudeva]. In His four personal forms [His expansions], Bhaga-van [the possessor of the fullness], the Lord and Controller, maintains these four states with the help of His major [arms; as in verse 14-15] and minor limbs [His extra limbs, His guardians], His weapons and His ornaments. Oh best of the brahmins, He alone is the self-illuminating source of the Absolute Truth [the Vedas] who, perfect in His own greatness and completeness, by His own material energy creates, withdraws and maintains this universe. As such [a performer of various material functions] He, while not being covered in His transcendental awareness, is [sometimes] described as being materially unfolded [as divided]. But by those who are devoted to Him He can be realised as their one true self, their very Soul. Shri Krishna, friend of Arjuna, chief of the Vrishnis, Annihilator of the Rebellious Royal Dynasties whose prowess never deteriorates, oh Govinda, place of pilgrimage whose glories, which bring about auspiciousness by just hearing about them, are sung by Vraja's cowherd men and women and their dependents, please protect Your servants! Anyone who rises at dawn and with his mind absorbed in Him [in tat] to himself meditates these characteristics of the Supreme Original Person, arrives at the realisation of the Absolute Truth present in his heart."

Shri Shaunaka said: "The great sage Shuka described to the listening king Parikshit [the grace of Vishnu] the seven [pairs of] attendants of the sun god occupying a different position in each month. Please speak to us so faithful, about the names and actions of these expansions of the Lord's manifestation as Surya, and the deities involved [see also 5.21: 18]."

Suta said: "This regulator of all the planets [the sun] revolving in their midst [around mount Meru, see 5.22: 2] was [by the Lord in the form of Time] created from the [proto-material primal energy [pradhana] of Vishnu, the Supreme Soul of all embodied beings. The sun being the one and only Lord, the original creator and self indeed of all the [planetary] worlds, constitutes the basis of all ritualistic activities of the Vedas that are differently described by the sages. Oh brahmin, the material energy of the Lord is thus described in nine: the time, the place, the endeavor, the performer, the instrument, the specific ritual, the scripture, the paraphernalia and the result [compare B.G. 18: 13-15].

The Supreme Lord assuming the form of Time, is there for the [regulation of the] planetary motion to the rule of twelve [months or masas, see also B.G. 10: 21], beginning with Madhu. In each of the twelve He [accompanying the sun god] moves differently with His [six] associates [He as a certain Deva together with a different Apsara, Rakshasa, Naga, Yaksha, sage and Gandharva]. Dhata [as the Surya Deva], Kritasthali [as the Apsara], Heti [as the Rakshasa], Vasuki [as the Naga], Rathakrit [as the Yaksha], Pulastya [as the sage] and Tumburu [as the Gandharva] are the ones ruling the month of Madhu [or Caitra at the vernal equinox, March/April]. [Likewise respectively] Aryama, Punjikasthali, Praheti, Kacchanira, Athauja, Pulaha and Narada rule the month of Madhava [Vaisakha, April/May]. Mitra, Menaka, Paurushya, Takshaka, Rathasvana, Atri and Haha are the ones ruling the month of Shukra [Jyaishta or Jeshtha, May/June]. Varuna, Rambha, Citrasvana, Shukra, Sahajanya, Vasistha and Huhu are the ones ruling the month of Shuci [Ashadha, June/July]. Indra, Pramloca, Varya, Elapatra, Shrota, Angira and Vis'vasu are the ones ruling the month of Nabhas [S'raavana, July/August]. Vivasvan, Anumloca, Vyaghra, Shankhapala, Asarana, Bhriju and Ugrasena are the ones ruling the month of Nabhasya [Bhadrapada, August/September ]. Pusha, Ghritaci, Vata, Dhananjaya, Suruci, Gautama and Sushena are the ones ruling the month of Tapas [Magha, January/February]. Parjanya, Senajit, Varca, Airavata, Ritu, Bharadvaja and Vis'va are the ones ruling the month of Tapasya [Phalgun, February/March]. Amshu, Urvas'i, Vidyuchatru, Mahas'ankha, Tarkshya, Kasyapa and Ritasena are the ones ruling the month of Sahas [Marga's'raha, November/December]. Bhaga, Purvacitti, Spurjia, Karkothaka, Urna, Ayu and Arishtanemi are the ones ruling the month of Pushya [Pausa, December/January]. Tvashtha, Tilottama, Brahmapeta, Kambalava's, Shatajit, Jamadagni the son of Ricika and Dhritrashtra are the ones ruling the month of Rikica and the month of Isha [As'vina, September/October]. And Vishnu, Rambha, Makhapeta, As'vatara, Satyajit, Vis'vamitra and Suryavaca are the ones ruling the month of Urja [Karttika, October/November].

All these [personalities] constitute the glories of Vishnu, the Supreme Personality of Godhead in the form of the sun god; they take away the sinful reactions of everyone who in the morning and the evening, day after day remember them. The Lord who [as the Deva] with His six types of associates thus moves in all directions through this universe, therewith disseminates in each of the twelve months a pure consciousness for its inhabitants in this and a next life. 7-4 While the sages glorify Him with the Sama, Rig and Yajur hymns that reveal His identity, the Gandharvas sing loudly about Him, the Apsaras dance in front of Him, the Nagas prepare the chariot, the Yakshas harness the horses and the strong Rakshasas push it from behind. In front of the chariot the sixty thousand pure Valakhilya brahmin sages go, being of worship with prayers to the Almighty [see also 4.1: 39]. The Unborn Lord Hari, the Supreme Controller, the Possessor of All Opulences without a beginning or an end, protects the worlds, by expanding Himself thus in each kalpa into [all these] various forms."

Threefold Veda: The Rig- Yajur- and Sama Veda are the three Vedas of the principal original division of the Vedic verses also called trayi vidya. They are about the reciting of hymns (Rig), the performance of sacrifices (Yajur) and the chanting of songs (Sama). The Atharva Veda is a later addition dealing with the so-called atharvanas, the procedures for everyday life.

*: According to the Skanda Purana in the verses beginning with 'aparam tv aksharam ya sa' there are three infallible energies thus: the external material energy of maya, the internal potency of Sr'i and the Supreme Energy of the Purusha, the Lord Himself.

 The Padma Purana 56.9-2 lists eighteen guardians or attendants of the Lord: Nanda, Sunanda, Jaya, Vijaya, Canda, Pramada, Bhadra, Subhadra, Dhata, Vidhata, Kumuda, Kumudaksha, Pundariksha, Vamana, Shankukarna, Sarvanetra, Sumukha and Supratisthitha.

. At this point is broken with the regular order of the months. The different translators do not agree about the cause of this break of order and some have suggested to correct the order of the verses given to correct this.

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 12:

The Topics of Shrimad Bhagavatam Summarised

Suta said: "Offering my obeisances to Lord Krishna, to the creator, to the brahmins and to the supreme of dharma, I shall now discuss the eternal nature of religion [in terms of the topics discussed in the Bhagavatam]. Oh sages, upon your request I related to you these wondrous pastimes of Lord Vishnu that are especially suitable for people in respect of the person. The direct interest of this [narration] is the glorification of the Lord, the Remover of All Sins, Narayana, the Lord of the Senses, the Supreme Personality and Master of the Satvatas. Herein the creation and annihilation of this universe and the confidential knowledge of the One Self-existent Supreme Spirit is discussed, including the purity of perception and the means of cultivating that [self-realisation].

- Bhakti-yoga and the renunciation belonging to it are discussed at length [in 1.2, 7.5-10 and 11.29], just as the history of Narada [1.4-6] and the story of Parikshit that describes how the sage among the kings fasted until death because of a curse of [the son of] a sage to the occasion of which he had a conversation with Shuka, the best of the brahmins [see 1.8-18]. What follows is a discussion of how one may attain liberation by concentrating in yoga in case one has to die [2.2: 15-21], a conversation between Narada and Brahma [2.5], the row of avatars [1.3 en 2.7] and how the process of evolution takes place from the primary of nature [or pradhana, 3.26: 10-72]. Next there is the discussion Vidura had with Uddhava [3.1: 25 - 3.4] and the one Vidura had with Maitreya [3.5 - 4.31], [preceded by] what a Purana entails [in general, see 2.10: 1 and 12.7: 9-10], following which the subject is discussed of the winding up of creation within the Mahapurusha [2.10: 6, 3.11: 30, 8.5: 35, 11.3: 8-15, 12.4]. It then continues about the creation as happening from [the modes of] material nature, the generation of the seven derivatives [of mahat, ahankara and the tanmatras, see 3.20: 12-17] and the evolution of the egg of the universe from which the universal form of the Lord arises [3.6]. The gross and subtle movements of time [3.11 are also discussed including] the generation of the lotus [3.8] and the killing of Hiranyaksha in order to deliver the earth from the ocean [3.17-19]. [Then there is a discussion about] the creation of the higher beings, the animals [the mammals] and the lower species [3.12: 37-48], the birth of Rudra [3.12] and the appearance of Svayambhuva Manu from the male/female division of the Lord [see 3.12: 49-53, 4.1]. 2-1 [Discussed are] the progeny of the first woman Shatarupa the excellent consort [of Manu], the offspring of [the nine daughters of] the pious wife [Devahuti] of the founding father Kardama [see 3.24: 20-25 and 4.1], the descent of the Supreme Soul, the Supreme Personality of Lord Kapila and the conversation the scholarly Kapila had with Devahuti [His mother, 3.25-33]. 4-1 The stories about the descendants of the nine brahmins [who married Kardama's daughters, 4.1], the destruction of Daksha's sacrifice [4.2-7] and the history of Dhruva [4.8-13] are then followed by those about Prithu [4.15-23] and Pracinarbarhi [4.24-29], his conversation with Narada [4.29] and the stories about Priyavrata [5.1], Nabhi [5.3] and the lives of Rishabha [5.3-6] and Bharata Maharaja, oh brahmins [5.7-13]. The continents, subcontinents and oceans, the mountains and rivers are described in detail [5.19-20] as also the complete of the celestial sphere [5.21-23] and the situation of the subterranean regions and hell [5.24-26]. [Next there are the descriptions of] Daksha's [re-birth as the son of the Pracetas [6.4] and the progeny of his daughters constituting the demigods, demons and human beings, the animals [the mammals], serpents, birds and other species [6.6]. [There is also an account of] the birth and death of [Vritra, 6.9-12] the son of Tvashtha and the two sons of Diti, Hiranyaksha [3.14-19] and Hiranyakas'ipu, oh brahmins, and the history of the great soul Prahlada, the lord of the Daityas [7.2-8]. 9-2 The reigns of the Manus [8.1] are described in detail as also the liberation of the king of the elephants [Gajendra, 8.2-4] and the avatars of Lord Vishnu for each period of Manu [8.5 and 13], like Hayas'irsha [8.24: 8 and 57; 5.18: 1], Nrisimha [7.9-10], Vamana [8.18-22], Matsya [8.24] and the descent of Kurma for the purpose of [supporting the] churning of the nectar from the milk ocean by the inhabitants of heaven [8.7-8]. [Next there is an account of] the great war between the demons and the gods [8.10] as also the succession of the dynasties of kings [9.2, 7, 9, 12, 13, 17, 20-24]; the dynasty of the great soul Sudyumna [9.1] and the birth of Ikshvaku and his dynasty [9.6]. In this book the stories about Ila [9.1: 16-27] and Tara [9.14: 4-13] are discussed including a description of the descendants of the Surya-vams'a, like Shas'ada [Vikukshi, 9.6: 6-11] and Nriga [9.1: 11-12, 9.2: 17 and 10: 64]. Then there are the stories about Sukanya [9.3], [the daughter of] Sharyati, the intelligent Kakutsha [Puranjaya, 9.6: 12-19], Mandhata [9.6: 33-37 and 9.7], Saubhari [9.6], Sagara [9.8] and Khatvanga [9.9: 41-47]. The actions of Lord Ramacandra, the King of Kos'ala [are presented] that dispel all sin [9.10 and 11], of Nimi who gave up his material body [9.13] and also the appearance of the descendants of king Janaka [or Shiradhvaja] is discussed [9.13: 18-27]. 5-2 The elimination of the ruling class by Lord Parashurama, the greatest descendant of Bhriju [is discussed 9.15 and 16] as also Aila [Pururava, 9.14 and 15], Nahusha [9.18: 1], Yayati [9.18 and 19], Dushmanta's son Bharata [9.20], Shantanu [9.22: 12-13] and Shantanu's son Bhishma [9.22: 18-19] of the Candra-vams'a and the celebrated dynasty of Yadu, the eldest son of Yayati [9.23: 18-29]. [It is] the dynasty in which the Supreme Lord known as Krishna, the Master of the Universe, descended in the house of Vasudeva. Subsequently His birth [10.3] and how He grew up in Gokula are described [10.4-10]. 8-3 His countless exploits are [next] glorified: how He sucked the milk along with the life-air out of Putana [10.6], how He as a child broke the cart and trampled Trinavarta [10.7], killed Baka, Vatsa [10.11] and Agha, [10.12 and how He dealt with] Brahma who hid the calves and boys [10.13 and 14], how He with His companions destroyed Dhenuka [10.15] and Pralamba [10.18] and how He saved them [the gopas] from a forest fire that entrapped them [10.17 and 19]. 1-3 There is the [story about the] taming of the snake Kaliya [10.16-17], the contentment of the Infalible Lord about the vows observed by the young gopis [10.21 and 22], the mercy for the sorry wives of the brahmins performing a sacrifice [10.23]; the lifting of Govardhana hill [10.25] and the worship and ritual bathing next performed by Indra and Surabhi [10.27], Krishna's sporting with the gopis during the nights [10.29-33], the rescue of Nanda Maharaja from a great serpent [10.34] and the killing of the foolish Shankhacuda [10.34], Arishtha [10.36] and Kes'i [10.37]. [There is the description of] the arrival of Akrua [10.38] and the departure thereafter of Rama and Krishna, the lamentation of the women of Vraja [10.39] and the tour [of the Lords] in Mathura [10.41]. The killing of the elephant Kuvaleyapida [10.43], of the wrestlers Mushthika and Canura, and of Kamsa and others [10.44] is discussed as also the retrieval of the deceased son of Sandipani, the guru [10.45]. Residing in Mathura in the company of Uddhava and Balarama oh brahmins, the Lord performed pastimes for the satisfaction of the circle of the Yadus [10.48]. [Next there are the stories about] the repeated annihilation of the troops assembled by Jarasandha [10.50], about the founding of Dvaraka and about the killing of the king of the barbarians [Kalayavana, 10.51]. [These are followed by descriptions of] the kidnapping of Rukmini to the occasion of which the Lord defeated His rivals in battle [10.53] and how the parijata tree together with the Sudharma hall were obtained from the abode of the demigods [from Indra, 10.50: 54]. The killing of the master of Pragiyotishapura [Bhauma or Naraka] and the taking away of the young maidens [is discussed in 10.59] with next following the forced yawning of Shiva in the battle with Bana and the severing of Bana's arms [10.63]. 0-4 The [Bhagavatam also discusses the] prowess and death of Pancajana [10.45: 40-41], Shambara [10.55], Pithha [10.59], Mura [10.59], Dvividva [10.67], the king of Cedi [10.74], Shalva [10.76-77], the foolish Dantavakra [10.78] and others, how the Pandavas became the direct cause [for Krishna] to relieve the earth's burden [10.49] and how the burning of Varanasi came about [10.66]. 2-4 [There is the story of] the withdrawal of His family [11.30] on the pretext of a curse from the brahmins [11.1] and [an account of] the wonderful discussion between Vasudeva and Uddhava in which the science of the true self came to its full expression in ascertaining the dharma [of how to live with Krishna not physically being present anymore, see 11.6-29]. Thereafter His forsaking the mortal world by the strength of His own mystical power [is related, 11.31]. [Also discussed are] the characteristics of the different yugas and their corresponding behaviors [11.17 and 12.3], the disturbance of man in Kali-yuga [12.1-3], the four types of annihilation and the three [guna] kinds of creation [12.4]. [Finally there is an account about] Vishnurata [Parikhit], the intelligent saintly king who had to relinquish his body [12.5-6], the story of how the seer [Vyasa and others] conveyed the branches of the Veda [12.6-7], the pious narration about Markandeya [12.8-10], the composition of the [universal form of the] Mahapurusha and the arrangement [of time] in relation to the sun, the self of the universe [12.11].

Thus, oh best of the brahmins, I have discussed here everything that you asked about. Therewith I have praised the complete of the activities of the Lord's lila-avatars. When one falls, trips, hurts oneself or sneezes and then spontaneously loudly cries 'haraye namah' [obeisances to Hari], one is freed from all [reactions to one's] sin. Of persons glorifying the Supreme Lord and hearing about the potency of the Unlimited One, all vice that enters the heart is cleansed away entirely, the same way the sun removes the darkness or a strong wind removes the clouds. False, meaningless, empty words are all those discussions wherein the Supreme Lord in the Beyond is not mentioned. Only those stories are true, auspicious and meritorious that have the qualities of the Fortunate One as their conclusion. Those words are pleasing, attractive and always new that praise the glories of Uttamas'loka, the One Celebrated in the Verses; to the mind they mean a constant great celebration that for everyone dries up the ocean of misery. A use of colourful words never describing the glories of the Lord that sanctify the entire universe, compares to a place of pilgrimage for crows and is never served by the swanlike, pure saintly devotees who think of Acyuta only [alike 1.5: 10]. That creation of words which revolutionizes the sins of the people and in which, although imperfectly composed, each verse depicts the names and glories of the unlimited Lord, is heard, sung and accepted by the ones who are purified and honest [identical to 1.5: 11]. Even endeavoring free from material motives, spiritual knowledge devoid of the love of the Infalible One actually does not look very good. What is the use of fruitive labour always giving pain - even when done perfectly - when it is not offered to the Lord [alike 1.5: 11]? The great effort of faithful to the scriptures and with penance fulfilling one's duties within the varnashrama system, leads to nothing but a good name and wealth. But when one listens and exercises respect and so on with glorifying His qualities, one obtains the remembrance of the lotus feet of the Maintainer of the Goddess of Fortune. The remembrance of Lord Krishna's lotus feet destroys everything inauspicious and leads to good fortune. Connected in knowledge, wisdom and detachment one with devotion unto the Supreme Soul arrives at purification of the heart. You, oh most eminent brahmins, are all extremely fortunate with a fixed position for Narayana, the Original Soul and Godhead of all, in your heart. With that love for the Heavenly Lord Beyond Whom No Other is Found, be perpetually of worship! I also was reminded of this science of the Soul hearing it in the attentively listening assembly of great sages from the mouth of Shuka, the supreme sage, when king Parikhit was fasting until death. Oh brahmins, this what I told you about the glories of Vasudeva whose great actions are so worthy to be described, completely puts an end to all inauspiciousness. Someone who with unswerving attention every yama [three hour period] and every kshana [a moment or 1.6 second] with faith makes others listen or faithfully listens himself to but one verse or even half a verse, but one line or even half a line, [therewith] certainly purifies his soul. If one, refraining from eating, with careful attention recites from or listens to [the Bhagavatam] on the eleventh or either twelfth day [Ekadas'i or Dvadas'i of a 15-day lunar fortnight, see 3.11: 10], one will be blessed with a long life and be freed from all that causes a fall. When one self-controlled and fasting studies this collection of verses at [the holy places of] Pushkara, Mathura or Dvaraka, one will be freed from the fear [of time, or of a material life, see also 1.13: 19]. The demigods and sages, the perfected souls and the forefathers, the progenitors and the kings will bestow all that one desires, when one glorifies these verses by proclaiming them or listening to them. A twice-born soul who studies them will as a result obtain the same rivers of honey, ghee and milk that one acquires by studying the Rig, Yajur and Sama verses. Diligently studying this essential compilation of classical stories, someone twice-born will attain that supreme position the Supreme Personality of Godhead spoke about. An educated man studying them acquires knowledge of matters, a king acquires the domain encircled by the oceans, a businessman acquires the control over treasures and a worker will rid himself of all that leads to a fall down. While the Fortunate One in His countless forms is extensively described in the form of stories in each of these verses, by contrast Hari, the Lord of all beings who annihilates all the impurities of Kali-yuga, is elsewhere [in other scriptures] not constantly glorified. I am bowed down to Him the Unborn, Unlimited, Real Self by whose energies there is the creation, maintenance and destruction of the universe, to Him the Infalible Lord whose glory is hard to understand for [even] the masters of heaven being headed by the unseen one [Aja or Brahma], the mighty one [S'akra or Indra], and the beneficent one [Shankara or Shiva]. My obeisances to the Eternal Lord, the Best of All the Gods, to the Fortunate One whose Manifestation is Pure Consciousness and who by the collection of His nine powers [s'aktis or potencies] settled for His own Self as the refuge for the moving and nonmoving living beings.

I bow down to him, the son of Vyasa who defeats everything inauspicious, he who, attracted in his heart by the pleasing pastimes of the Unconquerable Lord, in denial though of any other type of consciousness was as merciful to give up his solitary happiness and disclose the [Bhagavata] Purana about His activities, the light of reality."

BHAGAVATA PURANA CHAPTER 13:

The Glories of Shrimad Bhagavatam

Suta said: "I offer Him my obeisances, the Godhead who in arrangements of mantras from the Vedas, their limbs [the angas] and the Upanishads with transcendental prayers is praised by Brahma, Indra, Rudra and the children of heaven [the Maruts], the Godhead about whom the Sama Veda chanters are singing, the Godhead upon whom the yogis who see Him in their minds concentrate in meditation, He whose end is not known to anyone among the enlightened and unenlightened souls. The Supreme Personality of Godhead in the form of a tortoise [Kurma] became sleepy from the scratching edges of the stones of Mandara mountain that most heavily rotated upon His back. May all of you be protected by the winds that are the traces left behind by the flow of His breathing and by the ceaseless tides of the ebb and flow of the water that up to the present day follows the example of His in and outgoing breath. Please listen now to a summation of the number [of verses] of the Puranas, what the purpose is of its subject matter, how the book should be given as a gift, what the glory of that gift-giving is and what the blessing is of the reading and such of this text.

- The Brahma Purana has ten thousand verses, the Padma Purana counts fifty-five thousand, the Shri Vishnu Purana twenty-three thousand and the Shiva Purana twenty-four thousand. The Shrimad Bhagavatam counts eighteen thousand verses, the Narada Purana has twenty-five thousand, the Markandeya Purana nine thousand and the Agni Purana fifteen thousand four hundred verses. The Bhavishya Purana has fourteen thousand five hundred verses, the Brahma-vaivarta Purana counts eighteen thousand and the Linga Purana eleven thousand verses. The Varaha Purana offers twenty-four thousand verses, the Skanda Purana eighty-one thousand one hundred and the Vamana Purana is described in ten thousand verses. The Kurma Purana is described in seventeen thousand verses, the Matsya Purana has fourteen thousand of them, the Garuda Purana next has nineteen thousand verses and the Brahmanda Purana counts twelve thousand verses. In sum the Puranas are thus expressed in four hundred thousand verses [*]. Eighteen thousand of them constitute, as said, the Bhagavatam [see further under Purana].

This [tale of wisdom] was by the Supreme Personality of Godhead [Narayana, see 3.8-10] out of mercy for the first time in its entirety revealed to Brahma who fearful of a material existence sat upon the lotus that grew from His navel [see also 1.1: 1]. 1-1 From the beginning to the end filled with accounts about renunciation it delights the saintly and godly souls with the nectar of its many narrations about the Lord's pastimes. With beatitude [or eternal happiness by emancipation in devotional service] as its one ultimate goal, it has as its prime subject the One Reality Without a Second - the essence of all Vedanta philosophy - that is characterised by the non-difference of the Absolute [impersonal] Truth [brahman] and the One [personal] Soul [atma ]. He who gives the Bhagavatam as a gift on the day of the full moon in the month Bhadra [August/September, in its full glory as the king of all literature] seated on 'a golden throne' [in the constellation of Leo], reaches the supreme destination. Other classical collections of stories [other bibles, other Puranas or holy scriptures] are prominent in the assembly of the saintly only for as long as the great ocean of nectar that is the Bhagavatam is not heard. The Shrimad Bhagavatam constitutes the essence of all Vedanta philosophy, someone who found satisfaction from the taste of that nectar will never feel attracted to anything else [to other sacred scriptures]. Of all Puranas this one is like what the Ganges means in relation to all rivers flowing towards the sea, what Acyuta, the Infalible One, means in relation to all deities and what Shambhu [Shiva] means in relation to all Vaishnavas. Just as unsurpassed Kas'i [Benares] is among all holy places, Shrimad Bhagavatam is matchless among all the Puranas, oh brahmins. Shrimad Bhagavatam is the spotless Purana most dear to the Vaishnavas in which the perfectly pure and supreme spiritual knowledge is celebrated of none but the best devotees. Therein the freedom from all fruitive labour is revealed together with the [therewith associated] knowledge, detachment and devotion that will deliver the person who in consideration of the transcendence with his devotional service manages to listen and exercise the mantras the way it should.

I meditate upon the incomparable torch light of the Immortal Supreme Immaculate Pure Truth Free from Sorrow who long ago revealed this transcendental knowledge to the deity ['Ka' or Brahma], who transferred it to Narada the great sage who delivered it by means of his personal form to Krishna Dvaipayana Vyasa who next handed it down to the king of the yogis [Shukadeva] who on his turn was as merciful to reveal it to [Parikhit] the grace of the Fortunate One. I offer Him my obeisances, the Supreme Personality of Godhead Lord Vasudeva, the Supreme Witness who mercifully explained this [story, this science] to [Brahma] the deity who desired liberation. I offer him my obeisances, the king of the yogis, Shukadeva Gosvami, the personal manifestation of the Absolute Truth who freed [Parikhit] the grace of Vishnu who was bitten by the snake of material existence. Oh Lord of Lords, You are our Master, therefore please make it so that we life after life may rise up in bhakti at Your feet. I offer my obeisances to Him, the Supreme Lord, whose congregational chanting of the holy name destroys all sins and to whom bowing down all misery finds its end."

Thus the twelfth BOOK of the Shrimad Bhagavatam ends named: The Age of Deterioration.

With this last BOOK the Story of the Fortunate One ends, the Bhagavata Purana also known as the Shrimad Bhagavatam and the Paramahansa Samhita. All glories to the Brahma-Madha-Gaudiya Sampradaya parampara of the foregoing Vaishnava acaryas headed by Lord Gauranga, Shri Krishna Caitanya Mahaprabhu, who by their commentaries, translations, bhajans and lectures made this presentation possible and brought the full of the Vaishnava culture to the humble western servant of Krishna, Anand Aadhar Prabhu, who in truth is never finished with his work.

*. Next, so affirms the Matsya Purana, there are besides the Purana also a hundred thousand verses found in the Itihasa (the single history) of Vyasa's Mahabharata and a twenty-five thousand in the Itihasa of Valmiki's Ramayana. Thus the complete number of verses for the complete collection of classical stories amounts to five-hundred twenty-five thousand [the smaller Upa-puranas not counted].

: This reminds one of the theme of Krishna as being the Time or Kala, and Krishna as being the person, the Supreme Soul, the Original Person manifest before our eyes and present in the beyond. The world seems to be divided in impersonalist science, philosophy and governance on the one hand and personalistic religion of detachment and personal sentiment in civil attachment on the other. But when one with respecting the Time [of nature] as it should finds the person and with respecting the person as it should [in Krishna consciousness] finds the original Time, the problem is solved knowing the oneness of the personal/impersonal opposition to be our equal minded friend and guiding father in the beyond Lord Krishna. As the last word to this dual matter of respect for His reality He states: (in B.G. 18: 'But with all these activities must without doubt, performing them out of duty, the association with their results be given up; that, oh son of Pritha, is My last and best word on it.' Therefore we are of emancipation in devotional service, free from ulterior motives.

(The Bhagavad Gita (Sanskrit: "The Song of God") is a part of the Mahabharata; Book 6, Section 25 to 43. The Mahabharata is composed in the form of a dialogue between Prince Arjuna and Krishna, an incarnation or avatar of the god Vishnu. Written down between the 3rd and 2nd century BC, it is commonly known as the Gita.

The Gita is set in a narrative framework of a dialogue between Pandava prince Arjuna and his guide and charioteer Krishna, an avatar of Lord Vishnu. At the start of the Dharma Yuddha (righteous war) between Pandavas and Kauravas, Arjuna is filled with moral dilemma and despair about the violence and death the war will cause in the battle against his own kin. He wonders if he should renounce and seeks Krishna's counsel, whose answers and discourse constitute the Bhagavad Gita. Krishna counsels Arjuna to "fulfill his Kshatriya (warrior) duty to uphold the Dharma" through "selfless action". The Krishna-Arjuna dialogues cover a broad range of spiritual topics, touching upon ethical dilemmas and philosophical issues that go far beyond the war Arjuna faces.

Numerous commentaries have been written on the Bhagavad Gita with widely differing views on the essentials. According to some, Bhagavad Gita is written by the god Ganesha which was told to him by Vyasa. Vedanta commentators read varying relations between Self and Brahman in the text: Advaita Vedanta sees the non-dualism of Atman (soul) and Brahman (universal soul) as its essence,[6] whereas Bhedabheda and Vishishtadvaita see Atman and Brahman as both different and non-different, while Dvaita Vedanta sees dualism of Atman (soul) and Brahman as its essence. The setting of the Gita in a battlefield has been interpreted as an allegory for the ethical and moral struggles of human life.

The Bhagavad Gita presents a synthesis of Hindu ideas about dharma, theistic bhakti, and the yogic ideals of moksha. The text covers jñāna, bhakti, karma, and rāj yogas (spoken of in the 6th chapter) incorporating ideas from the Samkhya-Yoga philosophy.

The Bhagavad Gita is the best known and most famous of Hindu texts, with a unique pan-Hindu influence. The Gita's call for selfless action inspired many leaders of the Indian independence movement including Bal Gangadhar Tilak and Mahatma Gandhi; the latter referred to it as his "spiritual dictionary".

Theories on the date of the composition of the Gita vary considerably. Some scholars accept dates from the fifth century to the second century BC as the probable range, the latter likely. The Hinduism scholar Jeaneane Fowler, in her commentary on the Gita, considers second century BC to be the probable date of composition. Just like the Mahabharata and other early Hindu texts, Gita was likely composed about 200 BC. According to the Indologist Arvind Sharma, the Gita is generally accepted to be a 2nd-century-BC text.

The context of the Bhagavad Gita suggests that it was composed in an era when the ethics of war were being questioned and renunciation to monastic life was becoming popular. Such an era emerged after the rise of Buddhism and Jainism in the 5th century BC, and particularly after the semi-legendary life of Ashoka in 3rd century BC. Thus, the first version of the Bhagavad Gita may have been composed in or after the 3rd century BC.

The Author

The author of the Mahabharata, as well as the Bhagavad Gita in it, is Krishna Vyasa (Sanskrit: vyāsa, literally "Compiler"). He is an important figure in most Hindu traditions and is sometimes called Veda Vyāsa, "the one who classified the Vedas") or Krishna Dvaipāyana (referring to his complexion and birthplace). Vyasa is also a character in it. He is considered to be the scribe of both the Vedas and Puranas. According to Hindu beliefs, Vyasa is an avatar (a kind of angel) of the god Vishnu and one of the seven Chiranjivins (long lived, or immortals), who are still in existence according to Hindu belief.

We do not know much about Vyasa. He appears for the first time as the compiler of, and an important character in, the Mahabharata. It is said that he was the expansion of the god Vishnu who came in Dwaparayuga to make all the Vedic knowledge available in writing which was available in only in spoken form at that time. He was the son of Satyawati, daughter of the fisherman Dusharaj, and the wandering sage Parashara. He is credited with being the author of the first Purana, Vishnu Purana. Vyasa was born on an island in the Yamuna river. There are two different views regarding the place of his birth. One of the views suggests that he was born in the Tanahun district in western Nepal. Another view suggests that he was born on Island in Yamuna river near Kalpi, Uttar Pradesh, India. Vyasa had a dark complexion and may be called by the name Krishna (black), and also the name Dwaipayana, meaning 'island-born'.

Vyasa is traditionally known as the chronicler of this epic and also features as an important character in Mahābhārata, Vyasa asks Ganesha to assist him in writing the text. Ganesha imposes a precondition that he would do so only if Vyasa would narrate the story without a pause. Vyasa set a counter-condition that Ganesha understands the verses first before transcribing them. Thus Vyasa narrated the entire Mahābhārata and all the Upanishads and the 18 Puranas, while Lord Ganesha wrote.

Parashara, Vyasa's father, was a maharshi (meaning Great Sage of the highest order of ancient Indian sages) and the author of many ancient Indian texts. He is accredited as the author of the first Purana, the Vishnu Purana, before his son Vyasa wrote it in its present form. He was the grandson of Vasishtha, the son of Sakti Maharshi. There are several texts which give reference to Parashara as an author/speaker. Modern scholars believe that there were many individuals who used this name throughout time whereas others assert that the same Parashara taught these various texts and the time of writing them varied. The actual sage himself never wrote the texts; the various texts attributed to him are given in reference to Parashara being the speaker to his student.

Vyasa's mother Satyawati (also spelled Satyawati) was the queen of the Kuru king, Shantanu of Hastinapur and the great-grandmother of the Pandava and Kaurava princes (principal characters of the Hindu epic Mahabharata). As she is also the mother of Vyasa, he is also member of both royal dynasties who fought in the Mahabharata War.

Satyavati's story appears in the Mahabharata, the Harivamsa and the Devi Bhagavata Purana. Satyawati is the adopted daughter of a fisherman chieftain, Dashraj and was brought up as a commoner on the banks of the river Yamuna. She is the biological daughter of the Chedi king Uparichara Vasu and a cursed apsara (celestial nymph) who was turned into a fish called Adrika. When she was young, she helped her father, Dashraj, in his job as a ferryman and a fisherwoman. As a young woman, Satyawati met the wandering sage Parashara, who fathered her son Vyasa out of wedlock. The sage also gave her a musky fragrance, which earned her names like Yojanagandha ("She whose fragrance is spread as far as a yojana") and Gandhavati ("fragrant one").

Later King Shantanu, captivated by her fragrance and beauty, fell in love with Satyawati. She married Santanu on her father's condition that their children inherit the throne, denying the birthright of Shantanu's eldest son (and crown prince) Bhisma. Satyawati bore Shantanu two children, Chitrangada and Vichitravirya. After Shantanu's death, she and her prince's sons with the help of Bhisma ruled the kingdom. Although both her sons died childless, she arranged for her first son, Vyasa, to father the children of the two widows of Vichitravirya through niyoga. The children, (Dhritrashtra and Pandu) became the fathers of the Kauravas and Pandavas respectively. After Pandu's death, Satyawati went to the forest for penance and died there.

Vyasa had a son named Shuka, who was his spiritual successor and heir. As per Skanda Purana, Vyasa married Vatikā, alias Pinjālā, who was the daughter of a sage named Jābālī. It is described that Vyasa's union with her produced his heir, who repeated everything that he heard, thus receiving the name Shuka (lit. Parrot). Other texts including the Devi Bhagavata Purana also narrate the birth of Shuka but with drastic differences. Vyasa was desiring an heir, when an apsara (celestial damsel) named Ghrītachī flew in front of him in form of a beautiful parrot, causing him sexual arousal. He discharges his semen, which fell on some sticks and a son developed. This time, he was named Shuka because of the role of the celestial parrot. Shuka appears occasionally in the story as a spiritual guide to the young Kuru princes.

Besides his heir, Vyasa had four other disciples — Paila, Jaimini, Vaishampayana and Sumantu. Each one of them was given the responsibility to spread one of the four Vedas. Paila was the made the incharge of Rigveda, Jaimini of the Samaveda, Vaishampayana of the Yajurveda and Sumantu of Atharvaveda. Vyasa is believed to have lived on the banks of Ganga in modern-day Uttarakhand. The site was also the ritual home of the sage Vashishta, along with the Pandavas, the five brothers of the Mahabharata.

Content

Structure

The Bhagavad Gita is a poem written in the Sanskrit language. Its 700 verses are structured into several ancient Indian poetic meters, with the principal being the shloka (Anushtubh chanda). It has 18 chapters in total. Each shloka consists of a couplet, thus the entire text consists of 1,400 lines. Each shloka line has two quarter verses with exactly eight syllables. Each of these quarters is further arranged into "two metrical feet of four syllables each", state Flood and Martin. The metered verse does not rhyme. While the shloka is the principal meter in the Gita, it does deploy other elements of Sanskrit prosody. At dramatic moments, it uses the tristubh meter found in the Vedas, where each line of the couplet has two quarter verses with exactly eleven syllables.

The Narrative

The Gita is a dialogue between Krishna and Arjuna right before the start of the climactic Kurukshetra War in the Hindu epic Mahabharata. Two massive armies have gathered to destroy the other. The Pandava prince Arjuna asks his charioteer Krishna to drive to the center of the battlefield so that he can get a good look at both the armies and all those "so eager for war". He sees that some among his enemies are his own relatives, beloved friends, and revered teachers. He does not want to fight to kill them and is thus filled with doubt and despair on the battlefield. He drops his bow, wonders if he should renounce and just leave the battlefield. He turns to his charioteer and guide Krishna, for advice on the rationale for war, his choices and the right thing to do. The Bhagavad Gita is the compilation of Arjuna's questions and moral dilemma, Krishna's answers and insights that elaborate on a variety of philosophical concepts.[103][105] The compiled dialogue goes far beyond the "a rationale for war"; it touches on many human ethical dilemmas, philosophical issues and life's choices. According to Flood and Martin, although the Gita is set in the context of a war epic, the narrative is structured to apply to all situations; it wrestles with questions about "who we are, how we should live our lives, and how should we act in the world". According to Sargeant, it delves into questions about the "purpose of life, crisis of self-identity, human soul, human temperaments, and ways for spiritual quest".

Characters

- Arjuna, one of the five Pandavas
- Krishna, Arjuna's charioteer and guru who was actually an incarnation of Vishnu
- Sanjaya, counselor of the Kuru king Dhritrashtra (secondary narrator)
- Dhritrashtra, Kuru king (Sanjaya's audience) and father of the Kauravas

The 18 Chapters

Bhagavad Gita comprises 18 chapters (section 25 to 42) in the Bhisma Parva of the epic Mahabharata. Because of differences in recensions, the verses of the Gita may be numbered in the full text of the Mahabharata as chapters 6.25–42 or as chapters 6.23–40. The number of verses in each chapter vary in some manuscripts of the Gita discovered on the Indian subcontinent. However, variant readings are relatively few in contrast to the numerous versions of the Mahabharata it is found embedded in, and the meaning is the same.

The original Bhagavad Gita has no chapter titles. Some Sanskrit editions that separate the Gita from the epic as an independent text, as well as translators, however, add chapter titles such as each chapter being a particular form of yoga. For example, Swami Chidbhavananda describes each of the eighteen chapters as a separate yoga because each chapter, like yoga, "trains the body and the mind". He labels the first chapter "Arjuna Vishada Yogam" or the "Yoga of Arjuna's Dejection". Sir Edwin Arnold titled this chapter in his 1885 translation as "The Distress of Arjuna".

Chapter 1 (46 verses)

The 1st chapter may have the following titles: Arjuna vishada yoga, Prathama Adhyaya, The Distress of Arjuna, The War Within, or Arjuna's Sorrow.

The Bhagavad Gita opens by setting the stage of the Kurukshetra battlefield. Two massive armies representing different loyalties and ideologies face a catastrophic war. With Arjuna is Krishna, not as a participant in the war, but only as his charioteer and counsel. Arjuna requests Krishna to move the chariot between the two armies so he can see those "eager for this war". He sees family and friends on the enemy side. Arjuna is distressed and in sorrow. The issue is, states

THE GRAND BIBLE

Arvind Sharma, "is it morally proper to kill?" This and other moral dilemmas in the first chapter are set in a context where the Hindu epic and Krishna have already extolled ahimsa (non-violence) to be the highest and divine virtue of a human being. The war feels evil to Arjuna and he questions the morality of war. He wonders if it is noble to renounce and leave before the violence starts, or should he fight, and why.

Chapter 2 (72 verses)

The 2nd chapter may have the following titles: Sankhya Yoga, The Book of Doctrines, Self-Realisation, or The Yoga of Knowledge (and Philosophy). It begins the philosophical discussions and teachings found in Gita. The warrior Arjuna whose past had focused on learning the skills of his profession now faces a war he has doubts about. Filled with introspection and questions about the meaning and purpose of life, he asks Krishna about the nature of life, soul, death, afterlife and whether there is a deeper meaning and reality. [118] Krishna answers. The chapter summarizes the Hindu idea of rebirth, samsara, eternal soul in each person (Self), universal soul present in everyone, various types of yoga, divinity within, the nature of Self-knowledge and other concepts. The ideas and concepts in the second chapter reflect the framework of the Samkhya and Yoga schools of Hindu philosophy. This chapter is an overview for the remaining sixteen chapters of the Bhagavad Gita.

Chapter 3 (43 verses)

The 3rd chapter may have the following titles: Karma yoga, Virtue in Work, Selfless Service, or The Yoga of Action. Arjuna, after listening to Krishna's spiritual teachings in Chapter 2, gets more confounded and returns to the predicament he faces. He wonders if fighting the war is "not so important after all" given Krishna's overview on the pursuit of spiritual wisdom. Krishna replies that there is no way to avoid action (karma), since abstention from work is also an action. Krishna states that Arjuna has an obligation to understand and perform his duty (dharma), because everything is connected by the law of cause and effect. Every man or woman is bound by activity. Those who act selfishly create the karmic cause and are thereby bound to the effect which may be good or bad. Those who act selflessly for the right cause and strive to do their dharmic duty do God's work. Those who act without craving for fruits are free from the karmic effects, because the results never motivated them. Whatever the result, it does not affect them. Their happiness comes from within, and the external world does not bother them. According to Flood and Martin, chapter 3 and onwards develops "a theological response to Arjuna's dilemma".

Chapter 4 (42 verses)

The 4th chapter may have the following titles: as Jñāna-Karma-Sanyasa yoga, The Religion of Knowledge, Wisdom in Action, or The Yoga of Renunciation of Action through Knowledge.

Krishna reveals that he has taught this yoga to the Vedic sages. Arjuna questions how Krishna could do this, when those sages lived so long ago, and Krishna was born more recently. Krishna reminds him that everyone is in the cycle of rebirths, and while Arjuna does not remember his previous births, he does. Whenever dharma declines and the purpose of life is forgotten by men, says Krishna, he returns to re-establish dharma. Every time he returns, he teaches about inner Self in all beings. The later verses of the chapter return to the discussion of motiveless action and the need to determine the right action, performing it as one's dharma (duty) while renouncing the results, rewards, fruits. The simultaneous outer action with inner renunciation, states Krishna, is the secret to the life of freedom. Action leads to knowledge, while selfless action leads to spiritual awareness, state the last verses of this chapter. The 4th chapter is the first time where Krishna begins to reveal his divine nature to Arjuna.

Chapter 5 (29 verses)

The 5th chapter may have the following titles: Karma-Sanyasa yoga, Religion by Renouncing Fruits of Works, Renounce and Rejoice, or The Yoga of Renunciation.

The chapter starts by presenting the tension in the Indian tradition between the life of sannyasa (monks who have renounced their household and worldly attachments) and the life of grihastha (householder). Arjuna asks Krishna which path is better. Krishna answers that both are paths to the same goal, but the path of "selfless action and service" with inner renunciation is better. The different paths, says Krishna, aim for—and if properly pursued, lead to—Self-knowledge. This knowledge leads to the universal, transcendent Godhead, the divine essence in all beings, to Brahman – the Krishna himself. The final verses of the chapter state that the self-aware who have reached self-realisation live without fear, anger, or desire. They are free within, always.

Chapter 6 (47 verses)

The 6th chapter may have the following titles: Dhyana yoga, Religion by Self-Restraint, The Practice of Meditation, or The Yoga of Meditation.

The chapter opens as a continuation of Krishna's teachings about selfless work and the personality of someone who has renounced the fruits that are found in chapter 5. Krishna says that such self-realized people are impartial to friends and enemies, are beyond good and evil, equally disposed to those who support them or oppose them because they have reached the summit of consciousness. The verses 6.10 and after proceed to summarize the principles of Yoga and meditation in the format similar to but simpler than Patanjali's Yogasutra. It discusses who is a true yogi, and what it takes to reach the state where one has no malice towards anyone. Selfless service is also a topic here:

"It is not those who lack energy nor those who refrain from action, but those who work without expecting reward who attain the goal of meditation. Theirs is true renunciation."—Bhagavad Gita 6.1 [Eknath Easwaran]

Chapter 7 (30 verses)

The 7th chapter may have the following titles: Jnana-Vijnana yoga, Religion by Discernment, Wisdom from Realisation, or The Yoga of Knowledge and Judgement.

The chapter 7 once again opens with Krishna continuing his discourse. He discusses jnana (knowledge) and vijnana (realization, understanding) using the Prakriti-Purusha (matter-soul) framework of the Samkhya school of Hindu philosophy, and the Maya-Brahman framework of its Vedanta school. The chapter states that evil is the consequence of ignorance and the attachment to the impermanent, delusive Maya. It equates self-knowledge and the union with Purusha (Krishna) as the Self to be the highest goal of any spiritual pursuit.

Chapter 8 (28 verses)

The 8th chapter may have the following titles: Aksara-Brahma yoga, Religion by Devotion to the One Supreme God, The Eternal Godhead, or The Yoga of the Imperishable Brahman.

The chapter opens with Arjuna asking questions such as what is Brahman and what is the nature of karma. Krishna states that his own highest nature is the imperishable Brahman, and that he lives in every creature as the adhyatman. Every being has an impermanent body and an eternal soul, and that "Krishna as Lord" lives within every creature. The chapter discusses cosmology, the nature of death and rebirth. This chapter contains eschatology of the Bhagavad Gita. Importance of the last thought before death, differences between material and spiritual worlds, and light and dark paths that a soul takes after death are described.

Chapter 9 (34 verses)

The ninth chapter may have the following titles: Raja-Vidya-Raja-Guhya yoga, Religion by the Kingly Knowledge and the Kingly Mystery, The Royal Path, or The Yoga of Sovereign Science and Sovereign Secret.

Chapter 9 opens with Krishna continuing his discourse as Arjuna listens. Krishna states that he is everywhere and in everything in an unmanifested form, yet he is not in any way limited by them. Eons end, everything dissolves and then he recreates another eon subjecting them to the laws of Prakriti (nature). He equates himself to being the father and the mother of the universe, to being the Om, to the three Vedas, to the seed, the goal of life, the refuge and abode of all. The chapter recommends devotional worship of Krishna.

Chapter 10 (42 verses)

The 10th chapter may have the following titles: Vibhuti-Vistara-yoga, Religion by the Heavenly Perfections, Divine Splendor, or The Yoga of Divine Manifestations.

Krishna reveals his divine being in greater detail, as the ultimate cause of all material and spiritual existence, one who transcends all opposites and who is beyond any duality. Krishna says he is the atman in all beings, Arjuna's innermost Self, also compassionate Vishnu, the Surya (sun god), Indra, Shiva-Rudra, Ananta, Yama, as well as the Om, Vedic sages, time, Gayatri mantra, and the science of Self-knowledge. Arjuna accepts Krishna as the purushottama (Supreme Being).

Chapter 11 (55 verses)

Some translators title the chapter as Vishvarupa-Darshana yoga, The Manifesting of the One and Manifest, The Cosmic Vision, or The Yoga of the Vision of the Cosmic Form.

On Arjuna's request, Krishna displays his "universal form" (Viśvarūpa). This is an idea found in the Rigveda and many later Hindu texts, where it is a symbolism for atman (Self) and Brahman (Absolute Reality) eternally pervading all beings and all existence. Chapter 11 describes Arjuna entering first into savikalpa samadhi (a particular), and then nirvikalpa samadhi (a universal) as he gets an understanding of Krishna.

Chapter 12 (20 verses)

The 12th chapter may have the following titles: Bhakti yoga, The Religion of Faith, The Way of Love, or The Yoga of Devotion.

In this chapter, Krishna glorifies the path of love and devotion to God. Krishna describes the process of devotional service (Bhakti yoga). This chapter of the Gita offers an easier path to most human beings to identify and love God in a human-like representation, in any form. He can be projected as a merciful father, a divine mother, a wise friend, a passionate beloved, or even a mischievous child. The text states that combining "action with inner renunciation" with the love of Krishna as a personal God leads to peace. In the last eight verses of this chapter, Krishna states that he loves those who have compassion for all living beings, are content with whatever comes their way, who live a detached life that is impartial and selfless, unaffected by fleeting pleasure or pain, neither craving for praise nor depressed by criticism.

Chapter 13 (34 verses)

The 13th chapter may have the following titles: Ksetra-Ksetrajna Vibhaga yoga, Religion by Separation of Matter and Spirit, The Field and the Knower, or The Yoga of Difference between the Field and Field-Knower.

The chapter opens with Krishna continuing his discourse from the previous chapter. He describes the difference between transient perishable physical body (kshetra) and the immutable eternal soul (kshetrajna). The presentation explains the difference between ahamkara (ego) and atman (soul), from there between individual consciousness and universal consciousness. The knowledge of one's true self is linked to the realization of the soul. This chapter offers the clearest enunciation of the Samkhya philosophy by explaining the difference between field (material world) and the knower (soul), prakriti and purusha. It redefines the battlefield as the human body, the material realm in which one struggles to know oneself where human dilemmas are presented as a symbolic field of interior struggle.

Chapter 14 (27 verses)

The 14th chapter may have the following titles: Gunatraya-Vibhaga yoga, Religion by Separation from the Qualities, The Forces of Evolution, or The Yoga of the Division of Three Gunas.

The chapter once again opens with Krishna continuing his discourse from the previous chapter. Krishna explains the difference between purusha and prakriti, by mapping human experiences to three Gunas (tendencies, qualities). These are listed as sattva, rajas and tamas. All phenomena and individual personalities are a combination of all three gunas in varying and ever-changing proportions. The gunas affect the ego, but not the soul, according to the text. This chapter also relies on the Samkhya theories.

Chapter 15 (20 verses)

The 15th chapter may have the following titles: Purushottama yoga, Religion by Attaining the Supreme Krishna, The Supreme Self, or The Yoga of the Supreme Purusha.

The 15th chapter expounds on Krishna theology, in the Vaishnava Bhakti tradition of Hinduism. Krishna discusses the nature of God, according to Easwaran, wherein Krishna not only transcends impermanent body (matter), he also transcends the atman (soul) in every being. The verses in this chapter in association with select verses in other chapters make the metaphysics of the Gita to be dualistic. The fundamental element, in every thing, is God.

Chapter 16 (24 verses)

The 16th chapter may have the following titles: Daivasura-Sampad-Vibhaga yoga, The Separateness of the Divine and Undivine, Two Paths, or The Yoga of the Division between the Divine and the Demonic.

According to Easwaran, this is an unusual chapter where two types of human nature are expounded, one leading to happiness and the other to suffering. Krishna identifies these human traits to be divine and demonic respectively. He states that truthfulness, self-restraint, sincerity, love for others, desire to serve others, being detached, avoiding anger, avoiding harm to all living creatures, fairness, compassion and patience are marks of the divine nature. The opposite of these are demonic, such as cruelty, conceit, hypocrisy and being inhumane, states Krishna.

Chapter 17 (28 verses)

The 17th chapter may have the following titles: Shraddhatraya-Vibhaga Yoga, Religion by the Threefold Kinds of Faith, The Power of Faith, or The Yoga of the Threefold Faith.

Krishna qualifies the three divisions of faith, thoughts, deeds, and even eating habits corresponding to the three modes (gunas).

Chapter 18 (78 verses)

The 18th chapter may have the following titles: Moksha–Sanyasa Yoga, Religion by Deliverance and Renunciation, Freedom and Renunciation, or The Yoga of Liberation and Renunciation.

In the final and long chapter, the Gita offers a final summary of its teachings in the previous chapters. It begins with discussion of spiritual pursuits through sannyasa (renunciation, monastic life) and spiritual pursuits while living in the world as a householder. It re-emphasises the karma-phala-tyaga teaching, or "act while renouncing the fruits of your action".

THEMES

The Nature of God

The Gita describes a kind of universal God which and who is everywhere, unaffected, constant, absolute, indescribable and without features. This Absolute God is neither a He nor a She, but a "neuter principle", an "It or That". The Gita teaches both the abstract God and the personalised Brahman (God), the latter in the form of Krishna. The whole concept reminds us of early Christianity with God the father and Christ the son. The general practice is very different from the totalitarian and rigid practice promoted by the so-called Abrahamic religions, such as Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. The Gita text accomplishes the co-existence of universal God and the personal (humanised) God by blurring any distinction between universal (impersonal) God and the personalised God. This practice has led scholars to call the Gita as pantheistic, theistic and monistic. This dualistic image of God offers believers different ways to find God. One could say, the way to the goal is more important than the goal itself.

The Nature of Self

The Gita, states Fowler, "thoroughly accepts" atman as a foundational concept. In the Upanishads, this is the Brahmanical idea that all beings have a "permanent real self", the true essence, the soul it refers to as Atman (Self). In the Upanishads that preceded the Gita such as the Brihadaranyaka Upanishad, the salvific goal is to know and realise this Self, a knowledge that is devoid of the delusions of instinctive "I, mine, egoistic" typically connected with the body, material life processes that are impermanent and transient. The Gita accepts atman as the pure, unchanging, ultimate real essence, experiencer of one's being.

The Nature of the World

The Gita considers the world to be transient, all bodies and matter as impermanent. Everything that constitutes prakriti (nature, matter) is process driven and has a finite existence. It is born, grows, matures, decays and dies. It considers this transient reality as Maya. Like the Upanishads, the Gita focuses on what it considers as real in this world of change, impermanence, and finitude. To build its theological framework about the world, the text relies on the theories found in Samkhya and Vedanta schools of Hinduism.

Asceticism, Renunciation and Ritualism

The Gita rejects ascetic life, renunciation as well as Brahminical Vedic ritualism where outwardly actions or non-action are considered a means of personal rewards in this life, after-life or a means of liberation. It instead recommends the pursuit of an active life where the individual adopts "inner renunciation", acts to fulfill what he determines to be his dharma, without craving for or concerns about personal rewards, viewing this as an "inner sacrifice to the personal God for a higher good". The Gita rejects "actionless behaviour" found in some Indic monastic traditions. It also "relegates the sacrificial system of the early Vedic literature to a path that goes nowhere because it is based on desires".

Just War and Duty

Unlike any other religious scripture, the Bhagavad Gita broadcasts its message in the centre of the battlefield. Several modern Indian writers have interpreted the battlefield setting as an allegory of "the war within". In the Gita we can see religious defence of the warrior class's (Kshatriya Varna) duty (svadharma), which is to conduct combat and war with courage. The Gita is defending killing when necessary for the betterment of society, such as, for example, the killing of a tyrant, suppressor or conqueror. Defensive war seem not to be just an allegorical teaching, but a literal defence of just war. The bravery and courage of Arjuna to fight as a warrior obviously serves as an ideal.

Dharma, the Eternal Law of Righteousness

Dharma is a prominent paradigm of the Mahabharata, and it is referenced in the Gita as well. The term dharma has a number of meanings. Fundamentally, it means "what is right". Contextually, it also means the essence of "duty, law, class, social norms, ritual and cosmos itself" in the text, in the sense "the way things should be in all these different dimensions". The Bhagavad Gita itself says what dharma is all about: it means duty and in verse 2.7 it refers to the "right [and wrong]", and in 14.27 to "eternal law of righteousness".

Moksha: Liberation / Salvation

Liberation or moksha in Vedanta philosophy is not something that can be acquired. Atman (Soul) and Self-knowledge, along with the loss of egotistic ignorance, the goal of moksha, is something that is always present as the essence of the self, and must be realised by each person by one's own effort. While the Upanishads largely uphold such a monistic viewpoint of liberation, the Bhagavad Gita also accommodates the dualistic and theistic aspects of moksha. The Gita, while including impersonal Nirguna Brahman as the goal, mainly revolves around the relationship between the Self and a personal God or Saguna Brahman. A synthesis of knowledge, devotion, and desireless action is offered by Krishna as a spectrum of choices to Arjuna; the same combination is suggested to the reader as a way to moksha. The Bhagavad Gita shows that every aspect of life is in fact a way of salvation.)

BHAGAVADGITA.CHAPTER 1

Dhritarashtra said: What did my (people) and the Pândavas do, O Sangaya! when they assembled together on the holy field of Kurukshetra, desirous to do battle?

Sangaya said: Seeing the army of the Pândavas drawn up in battle-array 1, the prince Duryodhana approached the preceptor, and spoke (these) words: 'O preceptor! observe this grand army of the sons of Pându, drawn up in battle-array by your talented pupil, the son of Drupada. In it are heroes (bearing) large bows, the equals of Bhima and Arjuna in battle—(namely), Yuyudhâna, Virâta, and Drupada, the master of a great car 2, and Dhristaketu, Kekitâna, and the valiant king of Kâsi, Purugit and Kuntibhoga, and that eminent man Saibya; the heroic Yudhâmanyu, the valiant Uttamauga, the son of Subhadra, and the sons of Draupadi—all masters of great cars. And now, O best of Brâhmanas! learn who are most distinguished among us, and are leaders of my army. I will name them to you, in order that you may know them well. Yourself, and Bhîshma, and Karna, and Kripa the victor of (many) battles; Asvatthâman, and Vikarna, and also the son of Somadatta, and many other brave men, who have given up their lives for me, who fight with various weapons, (and are) all dexterous in battle. Thus our army which is protected by Bhîshma is unlimited; while this army of theirs which is protected by Bhîma is very limited. And therefore do ye all, occupying respectively the positions I assigned to you, protect Bhîshma 2 only.'

Then his powerful grandire, Bhîshma, the oldest of the Kauravas, roaring aloud like a lion, blew his conch, (thereby) affording delight to Duryodhana. And then all at once, conchs, and kettledrums, and tabors, and trumpets were played upon; and there was a tumultuous din. Then, too, Mâdhava and the son of Pându (Arjuna), seated in a grand chariot to which white steeds were yoked, blew their heavenly conchs. Hrîshîkesa 3 blew the Pânkaganya 4, and Dhanangaya the Devadatta, and Bhîma, (the doer) of fearful deeds, blew the great conch Paundra. King Yudhishtira, the son of Kuntî 5, blew the Anantaviçyaya, and Nakula and Sahadeva (respectively) the Sughosha and Manîpushpaka. And the king of Kâsi, too, who has an excellent bow, and Sikhandin, the master of a great car, and Dhristadyumna, Virâta, and the unconquered Sâtyaki, and Drupada, and the sons of Draupadi, and the son of Subhadra, of mighty arms, blew conchs severally from all sides, O king of the earth! That tumultuous din rent the hearts of all (the people) of Dhritarashtra's (party), causing reverberations throughout heaven and earth. Then seeing (the people of) Dhritarashtra's party regularly marshalled, the son of Pându, whose standard is the ape, raised his bow 1, after the discharge of missiles had commenced, and O king of the earth! spake these words to Hrîshîkesa: 'O undegraded one! station my chariot between the two armies, while I observe those, who stand here desirous to engage in battle, and with whom, in the labours of this struggle, I must do battle. I will observe those who are assembled here and who are about to engage in battle, wishing to do service in battle 2 to the evil-minded son of Dhritarashtra.'

Sangaya said: Thus addressed by Guðâkesa 3, O descendant of Bharata 4! Hrîshîkesa stationed that excellent chariot between the two armies, in front of Bhîshma and Drona and of all the kings of the earth, and said O son of Prithâ! look at these assembled Kauravas.' There the son of Prithâ saw in both armies, fathers and grandfathers, preceptors, maternal uncles, brothers, sons 1, grandsons, companions, fathers-in-law, as well as friends. And seeing all those kinsmen standing (there), the son of Kuntî was overcome by excessive pity, and spake thus despondingly.

Arjuna said: Seeing these kinsmen, O Krishna! standing (here) desirous to engage in battle, my limbs droop down; my mouth is quite dried up; a tremor comes on my body; and my hairs stand on end; the Gândîva (bow) slips from my hand; my skin burns intensely. I am unable, too, to stand up; my mind whirls round, as it were; O Kesava! I see adverse omens 2; and I do not perceive any good (to accrue) after killing (my) kinsmen in the battle. I do not wish for victory, O Krishna! nor sovereignty, nor pleasures: what is sovereignty to us, O Govinda! what enjoyments, and even life? Even those, for whose sake we desire sovereignty, enjoyments, and pleasures, are standing here for battle, abandoning life and wealth—preceptors, fathers, sons as well as grandfathers, maternal uncles, fathers-in-law, grandsons, brothers-in-law, as also (other) relatives. These I do not wish to kill, though they kill (me), O destroyer of Madhu 3! even for the sake of sovereignty over the three worlds, how much less then for this earth (alone)? What joy shall be ours, O Ganârđana! after killing Dhritarashtra's sons? Killing these felons I will shall only incur sin. Therefore it is not proper for us to kill our own kinsmen, the sons of Dhritarashtra. For how, O Mâdhava! shall we be happy after killing our own relatives? Although having their consciences corrupted by avarice, they do not see the evils flowing from the extinction of a family, and the sin in treachery to friends, still, O Ganârđana! should not we, who do see the evils flowing from the extinction of a family, learn to refrain from that sin? On the extinction of a family, the eternal rites of families are destroyed 2. Those rites being destroyed, impiety predominates over the whole family 3. In consequence of the predominance of impiety, O Krishna! the women of the family become corrupt 4; and the women becoming corrupt, O descendant of Vrîshni! intermingling of castes results; that intermingling necessarily leads the family and the destroyers of the family to hell; for when the ceremonies of (offering) the balls of food and water (to them) fail 5, their ancestors fall down (to hell). By these transgressions of the destroyers of families, which occasion interminglings of castes, the eternal rites of castes and rites, of families are subverted. And O Ganârđana! we have heard that men whose family-rites are subverted, must necessarily live in hell. Alas! we are engaged in committing a heinous sin, seeing that we are making efforts for killing our own kinsmen out of greed of the pleasures of sovereignty. If the sons of Dhritarashtra, weapon in hand, should kill me in battle, me weaponless and not defending (myself), that would be better for me.

Sangaya said: Having spoken thus, Arjuna cast aside his bow together with the arrows, on the battle-field, and sat down in (his) chariot, with a mind agitated by grief.

Sangaya said: To him, who was thus overcome with pity, and dejected, and whose eyes were full of tears and turbid, the destroyer of Madhu spoke these words.

And the God said: How (comes it that) this delusion, O Arjuna! which is discarded by the good, which excludes from heaven, and occasions infamy, has overtaken you in this (place of) peril? Be not effeminate, O son of Prithâ! it is not worthy of you. Cast off this base weakness of heart, and arise, O terror of (your) foes!

Arjuna said: How, O destroyer of Madhu! shall I encounter with arrows in the battle Bhîshma and Drona—both, O destroyer of enemies! entitled to reverence? Not killing (my) preceptors—(men) of great glory—it is better to live even on alms in this world. But killing them, though they are avaricious of worldly goods, I should only enjoy blood-tainted enjoyments. Nor do we know which of the two is better for us—whether that we should vanquish them, or that they should vanquish us. Even those, whom having killed, we do not wish to live—even those sons of Dhritarashtra stand (arrayed) against us. With a heart contaminated by the taint of helplessness 1, with a mind confounded about my duty, I ask you. Tell me what is assuredly good for me. I am your disciple; instruct me, who have thrown myself on your (indulgence). For I do not perceive what is to dispel that grief which will dry up my organs 2 after I shall have obtained a prosperous kingdom on earth without a foe, or even the sovereignty of the gods 3.

Sangaya said: Having spoken thus to Hrîshîkesa, O terror of (your) foes! Guðâkesa said to Govinda, 'I shall not engage in battle;' and verily remained silent. To him thus desponding between the two armies, O descendant of Bharata! Hrîshîkesa spoke these words with a slight smile.

And the God said: You have grieved for those who deserve no grief, and you talk words of wisdom 1. Learned men grieve not for the living nor the dead. Never did I not exist, nor you, nor these rulers of men; nor will any one of us ever hereafter cease to be. As, in this body, infancy and youth and old age (come) to the embodied (self) 2, so does the acquisition of another body; a sensible man is not deceived about that. The contacts of the senses 3, O son of Kuntî! which produce cold and heat, pleasure and pain, are not permanent, they are ever coming and going. Bear them, O descendant of Bharata! For, O chief of men! that sensible man whom they 4 (pain and pleasure being alike to him) afflict not, he merits immortality. There is no existence for that which is unreal; there is no non-existence for that which is real. And the (correct) conclusion about both 5 is perceived by those who perceive the truth. Know that to be indestructible which pervades all this; the destruction of that inexhaustible (principle) none can bring about. These bodies appertaining to the embodied (self) which is eternal, indestructible, and undefinable, are said 6 to be perishable; therefore do engage in battle, O descendant of Bharata! He who thinks it to be the killer and he who thinks it to be killed, both know nothing. It kills not, is not killed 1. It is not born, nor does it ever die, nor, having existed, does it exist no more. Unborn, everlasting, unchangeable, and primeval, it is not killed when the body is killed 2. O son of Prithā! how can that man who knows it thus to be indestructible, everlasting, unborn, and inexhaustible, how and whom can he kill, whom can he cause to be killed? As a man, casting off old clothes, puts on others and new ones, so the embodied (self) casting off old bodies, goes to others and new ones. Weapons do not divide it (into pieces); fire does not burn it, waters do not moisten it; the wind does not dry it up. It is not divisible; it is not combustible; it is not to be moistened; it is not to be dried up. It is everlasting, all-pervading, stable, firm, and eternal 3. It is said to be unperceived, to be unthinkable, and to be unchangeable. Therefore knowing it to be such, you ought not to grieve, But even if you think that it is constantly born, and constantly dies, still, O you of mighty arms! you ought not to grieve thus. For to one that is born, death is certain; and to one that dies, birth is certain 4. Therefore about (this) unavoidable thing, you ought not to grieve. The source of things, O descendant of Bharata! is unperceived; their middle state is perceived; and their end again is unperceived. What (occasion is there for any) lamentation regarding them? One looks upon it 2 as a wonder; another similarly speaks of it as a wonder; another too hears of it as a wonder; and even after having heard of it, no one does really know it 3. This embodied (self), O descendant of Bharata! within every one's body is ever indestructible. Therefore you ought not to grieve for any being. Having regard to your own duty also, you ought not to falter, for there is nothing better for a Kshatriya 4 than a righteous battle. Happy those Kshatriyas, O son of Prithā! who can find such a battle (to fight)--come of itself 5--an open door to heaven! But if you will not fight this righteous battle, then you will have abandoned your own duty and your fame, and you will incur sin. All beings, too, will tell of your everlasting infamy; and to one who has been honoured, infamy is (a) greater (evil) than death. (Warriors who are) masters of great cars will think that you abstained from the battle through fear, and having been highly thought of by them, you will fall down to littleness. Your enemies, too, decrying your power, will speak much about you that should not be spoken. And what, indeed, more lamentable than that? Killed, you will obtain heaven; victorious, you will enjoy the earth. Therefore arise, O son of Kuntī! resolved to (engage in) battle. Looking alike on pleasure and pain, on gain and loss, on victory and defeat, then prepare for battle, and thus you will not incur sin. The knowledge here declared to you is that relating to the Sāṅkhya, 1. Now hear that relating to the Yoga. Possessed of this knowledge, O son of Prithā! you will cast off the bonds of action. In this (path to final emancipation) nothing that is commenced becomes abortive; no obstacles exist; and even a little of this (form of) piety protects one from great danger 2. There is here 3, O descendant of Kuru! but one state of mind consisting in firm understanding. But the states of mind of those who have no firm understanding are many-branched and endless. The state of mind consisting in firm understanding regarding steady contemplation 4 does not belong to those, O son of Prithā! who are strongly attached to (worldly) pleasures and power, and whose minds are drawn away by that flowery talk which is full of (ordinances of) specific acts for the attainment of (those) pleasures and (that) power, and which promises birth as the fruit of acts 1--(that flowery talk) which those unwise ones utter, who are enamoured of Vedic words, who say there is nothing else, who are full of desires, and whose goal is heaven 2. The Vedas (merely) relate to the effects of the three qualities 3; do you, O Arjuna! rise above those effects of the three qualities, and be free from the pairs of opposites 4, always preserve courage 5, be free from anxiety for new acquisitions or protection of old acquisitions, and be self-controlled 6. To the instructed Brāhmana, there is in all the Vedas as much utility as in a reservoir of water into which waters flow from all sides 7. Your business is with action alone; not by any means with fruit. Let not the fruit of action be your motive (to action). Let not your attachment be (fixed) on inaction 8. Having recourse to devotion, O Dhanangaya! perform actions, casting off (all) attachment, and being equal in success or ill-success; (such) equality is called devotion. Action, O Dhanangaya! is far inferior to the devotion of the mind. In that devotion seek shelter. Wretched are those whose motive (to action) is the fruit (of action). He who has obtained devotion in this world casts off both merit and sin 1. Therefore apply yourself to devotion; devotion in (all) actions is wisdom. The wise who have obtained devotion cast off the fruit of action; and released from the shackles of (repeated) births 2, repair to that seat where there is no unhappiness 3. When your mind shall have crossed beyond the taint of delusion, then will you become indifferent to all that you have heard or will heard 4. When your mind, confounded by what you have heard 5, will stand firm and steady in contemplation 6, then will you acquire devotion.

Arjuna said: What are the characteristics, O Kesava! of one whose mind is steady, and who is intent on contemplation? How should one of steady mind speak, how sit, how move?

And the God said: When a man, O son of Prithā! abandons all the desires of his heart, and is pleased in his self only and by his self 1, he is then called one of steady mind. He whose heart is not agitated in the midst of calamities, who has no longing for pleasures, and from whom (the feelings of) affection, fear, and wrath 2 have departed, is called a sage of steady mind. His mind is steady, who, being without attachments anywhere, feels no exultation and no aversion on encountering the various agreeable and disagreeable 3 (things of this world). A man's mind is steady, when he withdraws his senses from (all) objects of sense, as the tortoise (withdraws) its limbs from all sides. Objects of sense draw back from a person who is abstinent; not so the taste (for those objects). But even the taste departs from him, when he has seen the Supreme 4. The boisterous senses, O son of Kuntī! carry away by force the mind even of a wise man, who exerts himself (for final emancipation). Restraining them all, a man should remain engaged in devotion, making me his only resort. For his mind is steady whose senses are under his control. The man who ponders over objects of sense forms an attachment to them; from (that) attachment is produced desire; and from desire anger is produced 5; from anger results want of discrimination 6; from want of discrimination, confusion of the memory; from confusion of the memory, loss of reason; and in consequence of loss of reason, he is utterly ruined. But the self-restrained man who moves among 1 objects with senses under the control of his own self, and free from affection and aversion, obtains tranquillity 2. When there is tranquillity, all his miseries are destroyed, for the mind of him whose heart is tranquil soon becomes steady. He who is not self-restrained has no steadiness of mind; nor has he who is not self-restrained perseverance 3 in the pursuit of self-knowledge; there is no tranquillity for him who does not persevere in the pursuit of self-knowledge; and whence can there be happiness for one who is not tranquil? For the heart which follows the rambling senses leads away his judgement, as the wind leads a boat astray upon the waters. Therefore, O you of mighty arms! his mind is steady whose senses are restrained on all sides from objects of sense. The self-restrained man is awake, when it is night for all beings; and when all beings are awake, that is the night of the right-seeing sage 4. He into whom all objects of desire enter, as waters enter the ocean, which, (though) replenished, (still) keeps its position unmoved,--he only obtains tranquillity; not he who desires (those) objects of desire. The man who, casting off all desires, lives free from attachments, who is free from egoism 1, and from (the feeling that this or that is) mine 2, obtains tranquillity. This, O son of Prithā! is the Brahmic 3 state; attaining to this, one is never deluded; and remaining in it in (one's) last moments, one attains (brahma-nirvāna) the Brahmic bliss 4.

BHAGAVADGITA.CHAPTER 3

Arjuna said: If, O Ganārđana! devotion is deemed by you to be superior to action, then why, O Kesava! do you prompt me to (this) fearful action? You seem, indeed, to confuse my mind by equivocal words. Therefore, declare one thing determinately, by which I may attain the highest good.

And the God said: O sinless one! I have already declared, that in this world there is a twofold path 5--that of the Sāṅkhyas by devotion in the shape of (true) knowledge; and that of the Yogins by devotion in the shape of action. A man does not attain freedom from action 6 merely by not engaging in action; nor does he attain perfection 7 by mere 8 renunciation. For nobody ever remains even for an instant without performing some action; since the qualities of nature constrain everybody, not having free-will (in the matter), to some action 1. The deluded man who, restraining the organs of action 2, continues to think in his mind about objects of sense, is called a hypocrite. But he, O Arjuna! who restraining his senses by his mind 3, and being free from attachments, engages in devotion (in the shape) of action, with the organs of action, is far superior. Do you perform prescribed action, for action is better than inaction, and the support of your body, too, cannot be accomplished with inaction. This world is fettered by all action other than action for the purpose of the sacrifice 4. Therefore, O son of Kuntī! do you, casting off attachment, perform action for that purpose. The Creator, having in olden times created men together with the sacrifice, said: 'Propagate with this. May it be the giver to you of the things you desire. Please the gods with this, and may those gods please you. Pleasing each other, you will attain the highest good. For pleased with the sacrifices, the gods will give you the enjoyments you desire. And he who enjoys himself without giving them what they have given, is, indeed, a thief.' The good, who eat the leavings of a sacrifice, are released from all sins. But the unrighteous ones, who prepare food for themselves only, incur sin 5.

From food are born (all) creatures; from rain is the production of food; rain is produced by sacrifices; sacrifices are the result of action; know that action has its source in the Vedas; the Vedas come from the Indestructible. Therefore the all-comprehending Vedas are always concerned with sacrifices 1. He who in this world does not turn round the wheel revolving thus, is of sinful life, indulging his senses, and, O son of Prithā! he lives in vain. But the man who is attached to his self only, who is contented in his self, and is pleased with his self 2, has nothing to do. He has no interest at all in what is done, and none whatever in what is not done, in this world 3; nor is any interest of his dependent on any being. Therefore 4 always perform action, which must be performed, without attachment. For a man, performing action without attachment, attains the Supreme. By action alone, did Ganaka and the rest work for perfection 5. And having regard also to the keeping of people (to their duties) they should perform action. Whatever a great man does, that other men also do. And people follow whatever he receives as authority. There is nothing, O son of Prithā! for me to do in (all) the three worlds, nothing to acquire which has not been acquired. Still I do engage in action. For should I at any time not engage without sloth in action, men would follow in my path from all sides, O son of Prithā! If I did not perform actions, these worlds would be destroyed, I should be the cause of caste interminglings; and I should be ruining these people. As the ignorant act, O descendant of Bharata! with attachment to action, so should a wise man act without attachment, wishing to keep the people (to their duties). A wise man should not shake the convictions of the ignorant who are attached to action, but acting with devotion (himself) should make them apply themselves to all action. He whose mind is deluded by egoism thinks himself the doer of the actions, which, in every way, are done by the qualities of nature 1. But he, O you of mighty arms! who knows the truth about the difference from qualities and the difference from actions 2, forms no attachments, believing that qualities deal with qualities 3. But those who are deluded by the qualities of nature form attachments to the actions of the qualities 4. A man of perfect knowledge should not shake these men of imperfect knowledge (in their convictions). Dedicating all actions to me with a mind knowing the relation of the supreme and individual self, engage in battle without desire, without (any feeling that this or that is) mine, and without any mental trouble 1. Even those men who always act on this opinion of mine, full of faith, and without carping, are released from all actions. But those who carp at my opinion and do not act upon it, know them to be devoid of discrimination, deluded as regards all knowledge 2, and ruined. Even a man of knowledge acts consonantly to his own nature 3. All beings follow nature. What will restraint effect? Every sense has its affections and aversions towards its objects fixed. One should not become subject to them, for they are one's opponents 4. One's own duty, though defective, is better than another's duty well performed. Death in (performing) one's own duty is preferable; the (performance of) the duty of others is dangerous.

Arjuna said: But by whom, O descendant of Vrishni! is man impelled, even though unwilling, and, as it were, constrained by force, to commit sin?

And the God said: It is desire, it is wrath 1, born from the quality of passion; it is very ravenous, very sinful. Know that that is the foe in this world. As fire is enveloped by smoke, a mirror by dust, the fetus by the womb, so is this 2 enveloped by desire. Knowledge, O son of Kuntī! is enveloped by this constant foe of the man of knowledge, in the shape of desire, which is like a fire 3 and insatiable. The senses, the mind, and the understanding are said to be its seat 4; with these it deludes the embodied (self) after enveloping knowledge. Therefore, O chief of the descendants of Bharata! first restrain your senses, then cast off this sinful thing which destroys knowledge and experience 5. It has been said 6, Great are the senses, greater than the senses is the mind, greater than the mind is the understanding. What is greater than the understanding is that 7. Thus knowing that which is higher than the understanding, and restraining (your)self by (your)self, O you of mighty arms! destroy this unmanageable enemy in the shape of desire.

CHAPTER IV.

And the God said: This everlasting 1 (system of) devotion I declared to the sun, the sun declared it to Manu 2, and Manu communicated it to Ikshvāku. Coming thus by steps, it became known to royal sages. But, O terror of (your) foes! that devotion was lost to the world by long (lapse of) time. That same primeval devotion I have declared to you to-day, seeing, that you are my devotee and friend, for it is the highest mystery.

Arjuna said: Later is your birth the birth of the sun is prior. How then shall I understand that you declared (this) first?

And the God said: I have passed through many births, O Arjuna I and you also. I know them all, but you, O terror of (your) foes! do not know them. Even though I am unborn and inexhaustible in (my) essence, even though I am lord of all beings, still I take up the control of my own nature 3, and am born by means of my delusive power. Whensoever, O descendant of Bharata! piety languishes, and impiety is in the ascendant, I create myself. I am born after age, for the protection of the good, for the destruction of evil-doers, and the establishment of piety. Whoever truly knows thus my divine birth and work, casts off (this) body and is not born again. He comes to me, O Arjuna! Many from whom affection, fear 1, and wrath have departed, who are full of me, who depend on me, and who are purified by the penance of knowledge 2, have come into my essence. I serve men in the way in which they approach me 3. In every way, O son of Prithā! men follow in my path 4. Desiring the success of actions 5, men in this world worship the divinities, for in this world of mortals, the success produced by action is soon obtained. The fourfold division of castes was created by me according to the apportionment of qualities and duties. But though I am its author, know me to be inexhaustible, and not the author. Actions defile me not. I have no attachment to the fruit of actions. He who knows me thus is not tied down by actions. Knowing this, the men of old who wished for final emancipation, performed action. Therefore do you, too, perform action as was done by men of old in olden times. Even sages are confused as to what is action, what inaction. Therefore I will speak to you about action, and learning that, you will be freed from (this world of) evil. One must possess knowledge about action; one must also possess knowledge about prohibited action; and again one must possess knowledge about inaction. The truth regarding action is abstruse. He is wise among men, he is possessed of devotion, and performs all actions 1, who sees inaction in action, and action in inaction. The wise call him learned, whose acts are all free from desires and fancies, and whose actions are burnt down by the fire of knowledge. Forsaking all attachment to the fruit of action, always contented, dependent on none, he does nothing at all, though he engages in action. Devoid of expectations, restraining the mind and the self, and casting off all belongings 2, he incurs no sin, performing actions merely for the sake of the body 3. Satisfied with earnings coming spontaneously 4, rising above the pairs of opposites, free from all animosity, and equable on success or ill-success, he is not fettered down, even though he performs (actions). The acts of one who is devoid of attachment, who is free 5, whose mind is fixed on knowledge, and who performs action for (the purpose of) the sacrifice 6 are all destroyed. Brahman is the oblation; with Brahman (as a sacrificial instrument) it is offered up; Brahman is in the fire; and by Brahman it is thrown; and Brahman, too, is the goal to which he proceeds who meditates on Brahman in the action 1. Some devotees perform the sacrifice to the gods, some offer up the sacrifice by the sacrifice itself in the fire of Brahman 2. Others offer up the senses, such as the sense of hearing and others, in the fires of restraint 3; others offer up the objects of sense, such as sound and so forth, into the fires of the senses 4. Some again offer up all the operations of the senses and the operations of the life-breaths into the fire of devotion by self-restraint 5, kindled by knowledge. Others perform the sacrifice of wealth, the sacrifice of penance, the sacrifice of concentration of mind, the sacrifice of Vedic study 6, and of knowledge, and others are ascetics of rigid vows. Some offer up the upward life-breath into the downward life-breath, and the downward life-breath into the upper life-breath, and stopping up the motions of the upward and downward life-breaths, devote themselves to the restraint of the life-breaths 7. Others, who (take) limited food, offer up the life-breaths into the life-breaths. All of these, conversant with the sacrifice, have their sins destroyed by the sacrifice. Those who eat the nectar-like leavings of the sacrifice repair to the eternal Brahman 1. This world is not for those who perform no sacrifice, whence (then) the other, O best of the Kauravas! Thus sacrifices of various sorts are laid down in the Vedas. Know them all to be produced from action 2, and knowing this you will be released (from the fetters of this world). The sacrifice of knowledge, O terror of (your) foes! is superior to the sacrifice of wealth, for action, O son of Prithā! is wholly and entirely comprehended in knowledge. That 3 you should learn by salutation, question, and service 4. The men of knowledge who perceive the truth will teach knowledge to you. Having learnt that, O son of Pāndu! you will not again fall thus into delusion; and by means of it, you will see all beings, without exception, first in yourself, and then in me 5. Even if you are the most sinful of all sinful men, you will cross over all trespasses by means of the boat of knowledge alone. As a fire well kindled, O Arjuna! reduces fuel to ashes, so the fire of knowledge reduces all actions to ashes 6. For there is in this world no means of sanctification like knowledge 7, and that one perfected by devotion finds within one's self in time. He who has faith, whose senses are restrained, and who is assiduous, obtains knowledge 1. Obtaining knowledge, he acquires, without delay, the highest tranquillity. He who is ignorant and devoid of faith, and whose self is full of misgivings, is ruined. Not this world, not the next, nor happiness, is for him whose self is full of misgivings. Actions, O Dhanangaya! do not fetter one who is self-possessed 2, who has renounced action by devotion, and who has destroyed misgivings by knowledge. Therefore, O descendant of Bharata! destroy, with the sword of knowledge, these misgivings of yours which fill your mind, and which are produced from ignorance. Engage in devotion. Arise!

Arjuna said: O Krishna! you praise renunciation of actions and also the pursuit (of them). Tell me determinately which one of these two is superior.

And the God said: Renunciation and pursuit of action are both instruments of happiness. But of the two, pursuit of action is superior to renunciation of action. He should be understood to be always an ascetic 3, who has no aversion and no desire. For, O you of mighty arms! he who is free from the pairs of opposites is easily released from (all) bonds. Children--not wise men--talk of sãnkhyã and yoga as distinct. One who pursues either well obtains the fruit of both. The seat which the sãnkhyas obtain is reached by the yogas 1 also. He sees (truly), who sees the sãnkhyã and yoga as one. Renunciation, O you of mighty arms! is difficult to reach without devotion; the sage possessed of devotion attains Brahman 2 without delay. He who is possessed of devotion, whose self is pure, who has restrained his self 3, and who has controlled his senses, and who identifies his self with every being, is not tainted though he performs (actions). The man of devotion, who knows the truth, thinks he does nothing at all, when he sees 4, hears, touches, smells, eats, move-b, sleeps, breathes, talks, throws out 5, takes, opens or closes the eyelids; he holds that the senses deal with the objects of the senses. He who, casting off (all) attachment, performs actions dedicating them to Brahman, is not tainted by sin, as the lotus-leaf 6 (is not tainted) by water. Devotees, casting off attachment, perform actions for attaining purity of self, with the body, the mind, the understanding, or even the senses 7--(all) free (from egoistic notions). He who is possessed of devotion, abandoning the fruit of actions, attains the highest tranquillity. He who is without devotion, and attached to the fruit (of action), is tied down by (reason of his) acting in consequence of (some) desire. The self-restrained, embodied (self) lies at ease within the city of nine portals 1, renouncing all actions by the mind, not doing nor causing (any thing) to be done. The Lord is not the cause of actions, or of the capacity of performing actions amongst men, or of the connexion of action and fruit. But nature only works. The Lord receives no one's sin, nor merit either. Knowledge is enveloped by ignorance, hence all creatures are deluded 2. But to those who have destroyed that ignorance by knowledge of the self, (such) knowledge, like the sun, shows forth that supreme (principle). And those whose mind is (centred) on it, whose (very) self it is, who are thoroughly devoted to it, and whose final goal it is, go never to return, having their sins destroyed by knowledge. The wise look upon a Brãhmana possessed of learning and humility, on a cow, an elephant, a dog, and a Svapãka, as alike 3. Even here, those have conquered the material world, whose mind rests in equability 4; since Brahman is free from defects and equable, therefore they rest in Brahman. He who knows Brahman, whose mind is steady, who is not deluded, and who rests in Brahman, does not exult on finding anything agreeable, nor does he grieve on finding anything disagreeable 1. One whose self is not attached to external objects, obtains the happiness that is in (one's) self; and by means of concentration of mind, joining one's self (with the Brahman), one obtains indestructible happiness. For the enjoyments born of contact (between senses and their objects) are, indeed, sources of misery; they have a beginning as well as an end 2. O son of Kuntī! a wise man feels no pleasure in them. He who even in this world, before his release from the body, is able to bear the agitations produced from desire and wrath, is a devoted man, he is a happy man. The devotee whose happiness is within (himself), whose recreation is within (himself), and whose light (of knowledge) also is within (himself), becoming (one with) the Brahman 3, obtain the Brahmic bliss 4. The sages whose sins have perished, whose misgivings are destroyed, who are self-restrained, and who are intent on the welfare of all beings 5, obtain the Brahmic bliss. To the ascetics, who are free from desire and wrath 6, and whose minds are restrained, and who have knowledge of the self, the Brahmic bliss is on both sides (of death). The sage who excludes (from his mind) external objects, (concentrates) the visual power between the brows 1, and making the upward and downward life-breaths even, confines their movements within the nose, who restrains senses, mind, and understanding 2, whose highest goal is final emancipation, from whom desire, fear, and wrath have departed, is, indeed, for ever released (from birth and death). He knowing me to be the enjoyer of all sacrifices and penances, the great Lord of all worlds, and the friend of all beings, attains tranquillity.

And the God said: He who, regardless of the fruit of actions, performs the actions which ought to be performed, is the devotee and renouncer; not he who discards the (sacred) fires

3, nor he who performs no acts. Know, O son of Pāndu! that what is called renunciation is devotion; for nobody becomes a devotee who has not renounced (all) fancies 4. To the sage who wishes to rise to devotion, action is said to be a means, and to him, when he has risen to devotion, tranquillity 5 is said to be a means. When one does not attach oneself to objects of sense, nor to action, renouncing all fancies, then is one said to have risen to devotion. (A man) should elevate his self by his self 6; he should not debase his self, for even (a man's) own self is his friend, (a man's) own self is also his enemy 1. To him who has subjugated his self by his self 2, his self is a friend; but to him who has not restrained his self, his own self behaves inimically, like an enemy. The self of one who has subjugated his self and is tranquil, is absolutely concentrated (on itself), in the midst of cold and heat, pleasure and pain, as well as honour and dishonour. The devotee whose self is contented with knowledge and experience 3, who is unmoved 4, who has restrained his senses, and to whom a sod, a stone, and gold are alike, is said to be devoted. And he is esteemed highest, who thinks alike 5 about well-wishers, friends, and enemies, and those who are indifferent, and those who take part with both sides, and those who are objects of hatred, and relatives, as well as about the good and the sinful. A devotee should constantly devote his self to abstraction, remaining in a secret place 6, alone, with his mind and self 7 restrained, without expectations, and without belongings. Fixing his seat firmly in a clean 8 place, not too high nor too low, and covered over with a sheet of cloth, a deerskin, and (blades of) Kusa (grass),--and there seated on (that) seat, fixing his mind exclusively on one point, with the workings of the mind and senses restrained, he should practice devotion for purity of self. Holding his body, head, and neck even and unmoved, (remaining) steady, looking at the tip of his own nose 1, and not looking about in (all) directions, with a tranquil self, devoid of fear, and adhering to the rules of Brahmakãrins 2, he should restrain his mind, and (concentrate it) on me, and sit down engaged in devotion, regarding me as his final goal. Thus constantly devoting his self to abstraction, a devotee whose mind is restrained, attains that tranquillity which culminates in final emancipation, and assimilation with me. Devotion is not his, O Arjuna! who eats too much, nor his who cats not at all; not his who is addicted to too much sleep, nor his who is (ever) awake. That devotion which destroys (all) misery is his, who takes due food and exercise 3, who toils duly in all works, and who sleeps and awakes (in) due (time) 4. When (a man's) mind well restrained becomes steady upon the self alone, then he being indifferent to all objects of desire, is said to be devoted. As a light standing in a windless (place) flickers not, that is declared to be the parallel for a devotee, whose mind is restrained, and who devotes his self to abstraction. That (mental condition), in which the mind restrained by practice of abstraction, ceases to work; in which too, one seeing the self by the self 5, is pleased in the self; in which one experiences that infinite happiness which transcends the senses, and which can be grasped by the understanding only; and adhering to which, one never swerves from the truth; acquiring which, one thinks no other acquisition higher than it; and adhering to which, one is not shaken off even by great misery; that should be understood to be called devotion in which there is a severance of all connexion with pain. That devotion should be practised with steadiness and with an unresponding heart. Abandoning, without exception, all desires 1, which are produced from fancies, and restraining the whole group of the senses on all sides by the mind only 2, one should by slow steps become quiescent 3, with a firm resolve coupled with courage 4; and fixing his mind upon the self, should think of nothing. Wherever the active and unsteady mind breaks forth 5, there one should ever restrain it, and fix it steadily on the self alone. The highest happiness comes to such a devotee, whose mind is fully tranquil, in whom the quality of passion has been suppressed, who is free from sin, and who is become (one with) the Brahman. Thus constantly devoting his self to abstraction, a devotee, freed from sin, easily obtains that supreme happiness--contact with the Brahman 6. He who has devoted his self to abstraction, by devotion, looking alike on everything, sees the self abiding in all beings, and all beings in the self 1. To him who sees me in everything, and everything in me, I am never lost, and he is not lost to me 2. The devotee who worships me abiding in all beings, holding that all is one 3, lives in me, however he may be living 4. That devotee, O Arjuna! is deemed to be the best, who looks alike on pleasure or pain, whatever it may be, in all (creatures), comparing, all with his own (pleasure or pain) 5.

Arjuna said: I cannot see, O destroyer of Madhu! (how) the sustained existence (is to be secured) of this devotion by means of equanimity which you have declared--in consequence of fickleness. For, O Krishna! the mind is fickle, boisterous 6 strong, and obstinate; and I think that to restrain it is as difficult as (to restrain) the wind.

And the God said: Doubtless, O you of mighty arms! the mind is difficult to restrain, and fickle 7. Still, O son of Kuntī! it may be restrained by constant practice and by indifference (to worldly objects). It is my belief, that devotion is hard to obtain for one who does not restrain his self. But by one who is self-restrained and assiduous, it can be obtained through (proper) expedients.

Arjuna said: What is the end of him, O Krishna! who does not attain the consummation of his devotion, being not assiduous 1, and having a mind shaken off from devotion, (though) full of faith? Does he, fallen from both (paths) 2, go to ruin like a broken cloud, being, O you of mighty arms! without support, and deluded on the path (leading) to the Brahman? Be pleased, O Krishna! to entirely destroy this doubt of mine, for none else than you can destroy this doubt.

And the God said: O son of Prithā! neither in this world nor the next, is ruin for him; for, O dear friend! none who performs good (deeds) comes to an evil end. He who is fallen from devotion attains the worlds of those who perform meritorious acts, dwells (there) for many a year, and is afterwards born into a family of holy and illustrious 3 men. Or he is even born into a family of talented devotees; for such a birth as that in this world is more difficult to obtain. There he comes into contact with the knowledge which belonged to him in his former body, and then again, O descendant of Kuru! he works for perfection 4. For even though reluctant 5, he is led away by the self-same former practice, and although he only wishes to learn devotion, he rises above the (fruits of action laid down in the) divine word. But the devotee working with great efforts 1, and cleared of his sins, attains perfection after many births, and then reaches the supreme goal. The devotee is esteemed higher than the performers of penances, higher even than the men of knowledge, and the devotee is higher than the men of action; therefore, O Arjuna! become a devotee. And even among all devotees, he who, being full of faith, worships me, with his inmost self intent on me, is esteemed by me to be the most devoted.

And the God said: O son of Prithā! now hear how you can without doubt know me fully, fixing your mind on me, and resting in me, and practising devotion. I will now tell you exhaustively about knowledge together with experience; that being known, there is nothing further left in this world to know. Among thousands of men, only some 2 work for perfection 3; and even of those who have reached perfection, and who are assiduous, only some know me truly. Earth, water, fire, air, space, mind, understanding, and egoism 1, thus is my nature divided eightfold. But this is a lower (form of my) nature. Know (that there is) another (form of my) nature, and higher than this, which is animate, O you of mighty arms! and by which this universe is upheld. Know that all things have these (for their) source 2. I am the producer and the destroyer of the whole universe. There is nothing else, O Dhanangaya! higher than myself; all this is woven upon me, like numbers of pearls upon a thread 3. I am the taste in water, O son of Kuntī! I am the light of the sun and moon. I am 'Om 4' in all the Vedas, sound 5 in space, and manliness in human beings; I am the fragrant smell in the earth, refulgence in the fire; I am life in all beings, and penance 6 in those who perform penance. Know me, O son of Prithā! to be the eternal seed of all beings; I am the discernment of the discerning ones, and I the glory of the glorious 7. I am also the strength, unaccompanied by fondness or desire 8, of the strong. And, O chief of the descendants of Bharata! I am love unopposed to piety 9 among all beings. And all entities which are of the quality of goodness, and those which are of the quality of passion and of darkness, know that they are, indeed, all from me; I am not in them, but they are in me 1. The whole universe deluded by these three states of mind, developed from the qualities, does not know me, who am beyond them and inexhaustible; for this delusion of mine, developed from the qualities, is divine and difficult to transcend. Those cross beyond this delusion who resort to me alone. Wicked men, doers of evil (acts), who are deluded, who are deprived of their knowledge by (this) delusion, and who incline to the demoniac state of mind 2, do not resort to me. But, O Arjuna! doers of good (acts) of four classes worship me: one who is distressed, one who is seeking after knowledge, one who wants wealth, and one, O chief of the descendants of Bharata! who is possessed of knowledge. Of these, he who is possessed of knowledge, who is always devoted, and whose worship is (addressed) to one (Being) only, is esteemed highest. For to the man of knowledge I am dear above all things, and he is dear to me. All these are noble. But the man possessed of knowledge is deemed by me to be my own self. For he with (his) self devoted to abstraction, has taken to me as the goal than which there is nothing higher. At the end of many lives, the man possessed of knowledge approaches me, (believing) that Vāsudeva is everything. Such a high-souled man is very hard to find. Those who are deprived of knowledge by various desires approach other divinities, observing various regulations 1, and controlled by their own natures 2. Whichever form (of deity) any worshipper wishes to worship with faith, to that form I render his faith steady. Possessed Of that faith, he seeks to propitiate (the deity in) that (form), and obtains from it those beneficial things which he desires, (though they are) really given by me. But the fruit thus (obtained) by them, who have little judgement, is perishable. Those who worship the divinities go to the divinities 3, and my worshippers, too, go to me. The undiscerning ones, not knowing my transcendent and inexhaustible essence, than which there is nothing higher, think me, who am unperceived, to have become perceptible 4. Surrounded by the delusion of my mystic power 5, I am not manifest to all. This deluded world knows not me unborn and inexhaustible. I know, O Arjuna! the things which have been, those which are, and those which are to be. But me nobody knows. All beings, O terror of (your) foes! are deluded at the time of birth by the delusion, O descendant of Bharata! caused by the pairs of opposites arising from desire and aversion. But the men of meritorious actions, whose sins have terminated, worship me, being released from the delusion (caused) by the pairs of opposites, and being firm in their beliefs 1. Those who, resting on me, work for release from old age and death 2, know the Brahman 3, the whole Adhyātma, and all action. And those who know me with the Adhibhūta, the Adhidaiva, and the Adhiyagna, having minds devoted to abstraction, know me at the time of departure (from this world).

Arjuna said: What is that Brahman, what the Adhyātma, and what, O best of beings! is action? And what is called the Adhibhūta? And who is the Adhiyagna, and how in this body, O destroyer of Madhu? And how, too, are you to be known at the time of departure (from this world) by those who restrain their self?

And the God said: The Brahman is the supreme, the indestructible. Its manifestation (as an individual self) is called the Adhyātma. The offering (of an oblation to any divinity), which is the cause of the production and development of all things, is named action. The Adhibhūta is all perishable things. The Adhidaiva is the (primal) being. And the Adhiyagna, O best of embodied (beings)! is I myself in this body. And he who leaves this body and departs (from this world) remembering me in (his) last moments, comes into my essence. There is no doubt of that. Also whichever form 1 (of deity) he remembers when he finally leaves this body, to that he goes, O son of Kuntī! having been used to ponder on it. Therefore, at all times remember me, and engage in battle. Fixing your mind and understanding on me, you will come to me, there is no doubt. He who thinks of the supreme divine Being, O son of Prithā! with a mind not (running) to other (objects), and possessed of abstraction in the shape of continuous meditation (about the supreme), goes to him. He who, possessed of reverence (for the supreme Being) with a steady mind, and with the power of devotion, properly concentrates the life-breath between the brows 2, and meditates on the ancient Seer, the ruler, more minute than the minutest atom 3, the supporter of all, who is of an unthinkable form, whose brilliance is like that of the sun, and who is beyond all darkness 4, he attains to that transcendent and divine Being. I 5 will tell you briefly about the seat, which those who know the Vedas declare to be indestructible; which entered by ascetics from whom all desires have departed; and wishing for which, people pursue the mode of life of Brahmakārin 1. He who leaves the body and departs (from this world), stopping up all passages 2, and confining the mind within the heart 3, placing the life-breath in the head, and adhering to uninterrupted meditation 4, repeating the single syllable 'Om,' (signifying) the eternal Brahman 5, and meditating on me, he reaches the highest goal. To the devotee who constantly practises abstraction. O son of Prithā! and who with a mind not (turned) to anything else, is ever and constantly meditating on me, I am easy of access. The high-souled ones, who achieve the highest perfection, attaining to me, do not again come to life, which is transient, a home of woes 6. All worlds, O Arjuna! up to the world of Brahman, are (destined) to return 7. But, O son of Kuntī! after attaining to me, there is no birth again. Those who know a day of Brahman to end after one thousand ages, and the night to terminate after one thousand ages, are the persons who know day and night 1. On the advent of day, all perceptible things are produced from the unperceived; and on the advent of night they dissolve in that same (principle) called the unperceived. This same assemblage of entities, being produced again and again, dissolves on the advent of night, and, O son of Prithā! issues forth on the advent of day, without a will of its own 2. But there is another entity, unperceived and eternal, and distinct from this unperceived (principle), which is not destroyed when all entities are destroyed. It is called the unperceived, the indestructible; they call it the highest goal. Attaining to it, none returns 3. That is my supreme abode. That supreme Being, O son of Prithā! he in whom all these entities dwell 4, and by whom all this is permeated, is to be attained to by reverence not (directed) to another. I will state the times, O descendant of Bharata! at which devotees departing (from this world) go, never to return, or to return. The fire, the flame 5, the day, the bright fortnight, the six months of the northern solstice, departing (from the world) in these, those who know the Brahman go to the Brahman. Smoke, night, the dark fortnight, the six months of the southern solstice, (dying) in these, the devotee goes to the lunar light and returns 1. These two paths, bright and dark, are deemed to be eternal in this world 2. By the one, (a man) goes never to return, by the other he comes back. Knowing these two paths, O son of Prithā! no devotee is deluded 3. Therefore at all times be possessed of devotion, O Arjuna! A devotee knowing all this 4, obtains all the holy fruit which is prescribed for (study of) the Vedas, for sacrifices, and also for penances and gifts, and he attains to the highest and primeval seat.

Now I will speak to you, who are not given to carping, of that most mysterious knowledge, accompanied by experience, by knowing which you will be released from evil. It is the chief among the sciences, the chief among the mysteries. It is the best means of sanctification. It is imperishable, not opposed to the sacred law. It is to be apprehended directly 1, and is easy to practise. O terror of your foes! those men who have no faith in this holy doctrine, return to the path of this mortal world, without attaining to me. This whole universe is pervaded by me in an unperceived form. All entities live in me, but I do not live in them 2. Nor yet do all entities live in me. See my divine power. Supporting all entities and producing all entities, my self lives not in (those) entities. As the great and ubiquitous atmosphere always remains in space, know that similarly all entities live in me 3. At the expiration of a Kalpa, O son of Kuntī! all entities enter my nature; and at the beginning of a Kalpa, I again bring them forth. Taking the control of my own nature 4, I bring forth again and again this whole collection of entities, without a will of its own 5, by the power of nature. But, O Arjuna! these actions do not fetter 6 me, who remain like one unconcerned, and who am unattached to those actions. Nature gives birth to movables and immovables through me, the supervisor, and by reason of that 7, O son of Kuntī! the universe revolves. Deluded people of vain hopes, vain acts, vain knowledge 1, whose minds are disordered, and who are inclined to the delusive nature of Asuras and Rākshasas, not knowing my highest nature as great lord of all entities, disregard me as I have assumed a human body 2. But the high-souled ones, O son of Prithā! who are inclined to the godlike nature, knowing me as the inexhaustible source of (all) entities, worship me with minds not (turned) elsewhere.

Constantly glorifying me, and exerting themselves 3, firm in their vows 4, and saluting me with reverence, they worship me, being always devoted. And others again, offering up the sacrifice of knowledge, worship me as one, as distinct, and as all-pervading in numerous forms 5. I am the Kratu 6, I am the Yagna, I am the Svadhā, I am the product of the herbs. I am the sacred verse. I too am the sacrificial butter, and I the fire, I the offering 7. I am the father of this universe, the mother, the creator, the grandsire, the thing to be known, the means of sanctification, the syllable Om 8, the Rik, Sāman, and Yagus also; the goal, the sustainer, the lord, the supervisor, the residence 1, the asylum, the friend, the source, and that in which it merges, the support, the receptacle, and the inexhaustible seed. I cause heat and I send forth and stop showers. I am immortality and also death; and I, O Arjuna! am that which is and that which is not 2. Those who know the three (branches of) knowledge, who drink the Soma juice, whose sins are washed away, offer sacrifices and pray to me for a passage into heaven; and reaching the holy world of the lord of gods, they enjoy in the celestial regions the celestial pleasures of the gods. And having enjoyed that great heavenly world, they enter the mortal world when (their) merit is exhausted 3. Thus those who wish for objects of desire, and resort to the ordinances of the three (Vedas), obtain (as the fruit) going and coming. To those men who worship me, meditating on me and on no one else, and who are constantly devoted, I give new gifts and preserve what is acquired by them 4. Even those, O son of Kuntī! who being devotees of other divinities worship with faith, worship me only, (but) irregularly 5. For I am the enjoyer as well as the lord 6 of all sacrifices. But they know me not truly, therefore do they fall 7. Those who make vows 8 to the gods go to the gods; those who make vows to the manes go to the manes, those who worship the Bhūtas go to the Bhūtas; and those likewise who worship me go to me. Whoever with devotion offers me leaf, flower, fruit, water, that, presented with devotion, I accept from him whose self is pure. Whatever you do, O son of Kuntī! whatever you eat, whatever sacrifice you make, whatever you give, whatever penance you perform, do that as offered to me 1. Thus will you be released from the bonds of action, the fruits of which are agreeable or disagreeable. And with your self possessed of (this) devotion, (this) renunciation 2, you will be released (from the bonds of action) and will come to me. I am alike to all beings; to me none is hateful, none dear. But those who worship me with devotion (dwell) in me 3, and I too in them. Even if a very ill-conducted man worships me, not worshipping any one else, he must certainly be deemed to be good, for he has well resolved 4. He soon becomes devout of heart, and obtains lasting tranquillity. (You may) affirm, O son of Kuntī! that my devotee is never ruined. For, O son of Prithā! even those who are of sinful birth 5, women, Vaisyas; and Sūdras likewise, resorting to me, attain the supreme goal. What then (need be said of) holy Brāhmanas and royal saints who are (my) devotees? Coming to this transient unhappy I world, worship me. (Place your) mind on me, become my devotee, my worshipper; reverence me, and thus making me your highest goal, and devoting your self to abstraction, you will certainly come to me.

Yet again, O you of mighty arms! listen to my excellent 2 words, which, out of a wish for your welfare, I speak to you who are delighted (with them). Not the multitudes of gods, nor the great sages know my source; for I am in every way 3 the origin of the gods and great sages. Of (all) mortals, he who knows me to be unborn, without beginning, the great lord of the world, being free from delusion, is released from all sins. Intelligence, knowledge, freedom from delusion, forgiveness, truth, restraint of the senses, tranquillity, pleasure, pain, birth, death, fear, and also security, harmlessness, equability, contentment, penance, (making) gifts, glory, disgrace, all these different tempers 4 of living beings are from me alone. The seven great sages, and likewise the four ancient Manus 5, whose descendants are (all) these people in the world, were all born from my mind. (partaking) of my powers. Whoever correctly knows these powers and emanations of mine, becomes possessed of devotion free from indecision; of this (there is) no doubt. The wise, full of love 2, worship me, believing that I am the origin of all, and that all moves on through me. (Placing their) minds on me, offering (their) lives to me, instructing each other, and speaking about me, they are always contented and happy. To these, who are constantly devoted, and who worship with love., I give that knowledge by which they attain to me. And remaining in their hearts, I destroy, with the brilliant lamp of knowledge, the darkness born of ignorance in such (men) only, out of compassion for them.

Arjuna said: You are the supreme Brahman, the supreme goal, the holiest of the holy. All sages, as well as the divine sage Nārada, Asita 3, Devala, and Vyāsa, call you the eternal being, divine, the first god, the unborn, the all-pervading. And so, too, you tell me yourself, O Kesava! I believe all this that you tell me (to be) true; for, O lord! neither the gods nor demons understand your manifestation 4. You only know your self by your self. O best of beings! creator of all things! lord of all things! god of gods! lord of the universe! be pleased to declare without, exception your divine emanations, by which emanations you stand pervading all these worlds. How shall I know you, O you of mystic power! always meditating on you? And in what various entities 1, O lord! should I meditate on you? Again, O Ganārđana! do you yourself declare your powers and emanations; because hearing this nectar, I (still) feel no satiety.

And the God said: Well then, O best of Kauravas! I will state to you my own divine emanations; but (only) the chief (ones), for there is no end to the extent of my (emanations). I am the self, O Gudākesa! seated in the hearts of all beings 2. I am the beginning and the middle and the end also of all beings. I am Vishnu among the Ādityas 3, the beaming sun among the shining (bodies); I am Marīki among the Maruts 4, and the moon among the lunar mansions 5. Among the Vedas, I am the Sāma-veda 6. I am Indra among the gods. And I am mind among the senses 7. I am consciousness in (living) beings. And I am Sankara 8 among the Rudras, the lord of wealth 9 among Yakshas and Rakshases. And I am fire among the Vasus, and Meru 10 among the high-topped (mountains). And know me, O Arjuna! to be Brihaspati, the chief among domestic priests. I am Skanda among generals. I am the ocean among reservoirs of water 1. I am Bhṛigu among the great sages. I am the single syllable (Om 2) among words. Among sacrifices I am the Gapa sacrifice 3; the Himālaya among the firmly-fixed (mountains); the Asvattha 4 among all trees, and Nārada among divine sages; Kītrāratha among the heavenly choristers, the sage Kapila among the Siddhas 5. Among horses know me to be Ukkaishravas 6, brought forth by (the labours for) the nectar; and Airāvata among the great elephants, and the ruler, of men among men 7. I am the thunderbolt among weapons, the wish-giving (cow) among cows. And I am love which generates 8. Among serpents I am Vāsuki. Among Nāga 9 snakes I am Ananta; I am Varuna among aquatic beings. And I am Aryaman among the manes, and Yama 10 among rulers. Among demons, too, I am Pralhāda. I am the king of death (Kāla, time) among those that count 11. Among beasts I am the lord of beasts, and the son of Vinatā 1 among birds. I am the wind among those that blow 2. I am Rāma 3 among those that wield weapons. Among fishes I am Makara 4, and among streams the Gāhnāvī 5. Of created things I am the beginning and the end and the middle also, O Arjuna! Among sciences, I am the science of the Adhyātma, and I am the argument of controversialists. Among letters I am the letter A 6, and among the group of compounds the copulative 7 compound. I myself am time inexhaustible, and I the creator whose faces are in all directions. I am death who seizes all, and the source of what is to be. And among females, fame 8, fortune, speech, memory, intellect, courage, forgiveness. Likewise among Sāman hymns, I am the Brihat-sāman 9, and I the Gāyatri 10 among metres. I am Mārgasīrsha among the months, the spring among the seasons 1; of cheats, I am the game of dice; I am the glory of the glorious, I am victory, I am industry, I am the goodness of the good. I am Vāsudeva among the descendants of Vṛishni 2, and Arjuna among the Pāndavas. Among sages also, I am Vyāsa 3; and among the discerning ones, I am the discerning Usanas 4. I am the rod of those that restrain, and the policy 5 of those that desire victory. I am silence respecting secrets. I am the knowledge of those that have knowledge And, O Arjuna! I am also that which is the seed of all things. There is nothing movable or immovable which can exist without me. O terror of your foes! there is no end to my divine emanations. Here I have declared the extent of (those) emanations only in part. Whatever thing (there is) of power, or glorious, or splendid, know all that to be produced from portions of my energy. Or rather, O Arjuna! what have you to do, knowing all this at large? I stand supporting all this by (but) a single portion (of myself) 6.

Arjuna said: In consequence of the excellent and mysterious words concerning the relation of the supreme and individual soul., which you have spoken for my welfare, this delusion of mine is gone away. O you whose eyes are like lotus leaves! I have heard from you at large about the production and dissolution of things, and also about your inexhaustible greatness. O highest lord! what you have said about yourself is so. I wish, O best of beings! to see your divine form. If, O lord! you think that it is possible for me to look upon it, then, O lord of the possessors of mystic power 1! show your inexhaustible form to me.

And the God said: In hundreds and in thousands see my forms, O son of Prithā! various, divine, and of various colours and shapes. See the Ādityas, Vasus, Rudras, the two Asvins, and Maruts likewise. And O descendant of Bharata! see wonders, in numbers, unseen before. Within my body, O Gudākesa! see to-day the whole universe, including (everything) movable and immovable, (all) in one, and whatever else you wish to see. But you will not be able to see me with merely, this eye of yours. I give you an eye divine. (Now) see my divine power.

Sangaya said: Having spoken thus, O king! Hari, the great lord of the possessors of mystic power, then showed to the son of Prithā. his supreme divine form, having many mouths and eyes, having (within it) many wonderful sights, having many celestial ornaments, having many celestial weapons held erect, wearing celestial flowers and vestments, having an anointment of celestial perfumes, full of every wonder, the infinite deity with faces in all directions 1. If in the heavens, the lustre of a thousand suns burst forth all at once, that would be like the lustre of that mighty one. There the son of Pāndu then observed in the body of the god of gods the whole universe (all) in one, and divided into numerous 2 (divisions). Then Dhanangaya filled with amazement, and with hair standing on end, bowed his head before the god, and spoke with joined hands.

Arjuna said: O god! I see within your body the gods, as also all the groups of various beings; and the lord Brahman seated on (his) lotus seat, and all the sages and celestial snakes. I see you, who are of countless forms, possessed of many arms, stomachs, mouths, and eyes on all sides. And, O lord of the universe! O you of all forms! I do not see your end or middle or beginning. I see you bearing a coronet and a mace and a discus--a mass of glory, brilliant on all sides, difficult to look at, having on all sides the effulgence of a blazing fire or sun, and indefinable. You are indestructible, the supreme one to be known. You are the highest support 1 of this universe. You are the inexhaustible protector of everlasting piety. I believe you to be the eternal being. I see you void of beginning, middle, end--of infinite power, of unnumbered arms, having the sun and moon for eyes, having a mouth like a blazing fire, and heating the universe with your radiance. For this space between heaven and earth and all the quarters are pervaded by you alone. Looking at this wonderful and terrible form of yours, O high-souled one! the three worlds are affrighted. For here these groups of gods are entering into you. Some being afraid are praying with joined hands, and the groups of great sages and Siddhas are saying 'Welfare 2!' and praising you with abundant (hymns) of praise. The Rudras, and Adityas, the Vasus, the Sādhyas, the Visvas, the two Asvins, the Maruts, and the Ushmapas, and the groups of Gandharvas, Yakshas, demons, and Siddhas are all looking at you amazed. Seeing your mighty form, with many mouths and eyes, with many arms, thighs, and feet, with many stomachs, and fearful with many jaws, all people, and I likewise, are much alarmed, O you of mighty arms! Seeing you, O Vishnu! touching the skies, radiant, possessed of many hues, with a gaping mouth, and with large blazing eyes, I am much alarmed in my inmost self, and feel no courage, no tranquillity.

And seeing your mouths terrible by the jaws, and resembling the fire of destruction, I cannot recognise the (various) directions, I feel no comfort. Be gracious, O lord of gods! who pervadest the universe. And all these sons of Dhritarāshtra, together with all the bands of kings, and Bhīshma and Drona, and this charioteer's son 1 likewise, together with our principal warriors also, are rapidly entering your mouths, fearful and horrific 2 by (reason of your) jaws. And some with their heads smashed are seen (to be) stuck in the spaces between the teeth. As the many rapid currents of a river's waters run towards the sea alone, so do these heroes of the human world enter your mouths blazing all round. As butterflies, with increased velocity, enter a blazing fire to their destruction, so too do these people enter your mouths with increased velocity (only) to their destruction. Swallowing all these people, you are licking them over and over again from all sides, with your blazing mouths. Your fierce splendours, O Vishnu! filling the whole universe with (their) effulgence, are heating it. Tell me who you are in this fierce form. Salutations be to thee, O chief of the gods! Be gracious. I wish to know you, the primeval, one, for I do not understand your actions.

And the God said:

I am death, the destroyer of the worlds, fully developed, and I am now active about the overthrow of the worlds. Even without you, the warriors standing in the adverse hosts, shall all cease to be. Therefore, be up, obtain glory, and vanquishing (your) foes, enjoy a prosperous kingdom. All these have been already killed by me. Be only the instrument, O Savyasākin 1! Drona, and Bhīshma, and Gayadratha, and Karna, and likewise other valiant warriors also, whom I have killed, do you kill. Be not alarmed. Do fight. And in the battle you will conquer your foes.

Sangaya said: Hearing these words of Kesava, the wearer of the coronet 2, trembling, and with joined hands, bowed down; and sorely afraid, and with throat choked up, he again spoke to Krishna after saluting him.

Arjuna said: It is quite proper, O Hrishīkesa! that the universe is delighted and charmed by your renown, that the demons run away affrighted in all directions, and that all the assemblages of Siddhas bow down. (to you). And why, O high-souled one! should they not bow down to you (who are) greater than Brahman, and first cause? O infinite lord of gods! O you pervading the universe! you are the indestructible, that which is, that which is not, and what is beyond them 3. You are the primal god, the ancient being, you are the highest support of this universe 1. You are that which has knowledge, that which is the object of knowledge, you are the highest goal. By you is this universe pervaded., O you of infinite forms! You are the wind, Yama, fire, Varuna, the moon, you Pragāpati, and the great grandsire 2. Obeisance be to thee a thousand times, and again and again obeisance to thee! In front and from behind obeisance to thee! Obeisance be to thee from all sides, O you who are all! You are of infinite power, of unmeasured glory; you pervade all, and therefore you are all! Whatever I have said contemptuously.--for instance, 'O Krishna! 'O Yādava! 'O friend!--thinking you to be (my) friend, and not knowing your greatness (as shown in) this (universal form), or through friendliness, or incautiously; and whatever disrespect I have shown you for purposes of merriment, on (occasions of) play, sleep, dinner, or sitting (together), whether alone or in the presence (of friends).--for all that, O undegraded one! I ask pardon of you who are indefinable 3. You are the father of the world--movable and immovable.--you its great and venerable master; there is none equal to you, whence can there be one greater. O you whose power is unparalleled in all the three worlds? Therefore I bow and prostrate myself, and would propitiate you, the praiseworthy lord. Be pleased, O god! to pardon (my guilt) as a father (that of his) son, a friend (that of his) friend, or a husband (that of his) beloved. I am delighted at seeing what I had never seen before, and my heart is also alarmed by fear. Show me that same form, O god! Be gracious, O lord of gods! O you pervading the universe! I wish to see you bearing the coronet and the mace, with the discus in hand, just the same (as before) 1. O you of thousand arms! O you of all forms! assume that same four-handed form.

And the God said: O Arjuna! being pleased (with you), I have by my own mystic power shown you this supreme form, full of glory, universal, infinite, primeval, and which has not been seen before by any one else but you, O you hero among the Kauravas! I cannot be seen in this form by any one but you, (even) by (the help of) the study of the Vedas, or of 2 sacrifices, nor by gifts, nor by actions, nor by fierce penances. Be not alarmed, be not perplexed, at seeing this form of mine, fearful like this. Free from fear and with delighted heart, see now again that same form of mine.

Sangaya said: Having thus spoken to Arjuna, Vāsudeva again showed his own form, and the high-souled one becoming again of a mild form, comforted him who had been affrighted.

Arjuna said: O Ganardana! seeing this mild, human form of yours, I am new in my right mind, and have come to my normal state.

And the God said: Even the gods are always desiring to see this form of mine, which it is difficult to get a sight of, and which you have seen. I cannot be seen, as you have seen me, by (means of) the Vedas, not by penance, not by gift, nor yet by sacrifice. But, O Arjuna! by devotion to me exclusively, I can in this form be truly known, seen, and assimilated I with, O terror of your foes! He who performs acts for (propitiating) me, to whom I am the highest (object), who is my devotee, who is free from attachment, and who has no enmity towards any being, he, O son of Pāndu! comes to me.

Arjuna said: Of the worshippers, who thus, constantly devoted, meditate on you, and those who (meditate) on the unperceived and indestructible, which best know devotion?

And the God said: Those who being constantly devoted, and possessed of the highest faith, worship me with a mind fixed on me, are deemed by me to be the most devoted. But those, who, restraining the (whole) group of the senses, and with a mind at all times equable, meditate on the indescribable, indestructible, unperceived (principle) which is all-pervading, unthinkable, indifferent 1, immovable, and constant, they, intent on the good of all beings, necessarily attain to me. For those whose minds are attached to the unperceived, the trouble is much greater. Because the unperceived goal 2 is obtained by embodied (beings) with difficulty. As to those, however, O son of Prithā! who, dedicating all their actions to me, and (holding) me as their highest (goal), worship me, meditating on me with a devotion towards none besides me, and whose minds are fixed on me, I, Without delay, come forward as their deliverer from the ocean of this world of death. Place your mind on me only; fix your understanding on me. In me you will dwell 3 hereafter, (there is) no doubt. But if you are unable to fix your mind steadily on me, then, O Dhanangaya! endeavour 4 to obtain me by the abstraction of mind (resulting) from continuous meditation 5. If you are unequal even to continuous meditation, then let acts for (propitiating) me be your highest (aim). Even performing actions for (propitiating) me, you will attain perfection. If you are unable to do even this, then resort to devotion 6 to me, and, with self-restraint, abandon all fruit of action. For knowledge is better than continuous meditation; concentration 7 is esteemed higher than knowledge; and the abandonment of fruit of action than concentration; from (that) abandonment, tranquillity soon (results). That devotee of mine, who hates no being, who is friendly and compassionate, who is free from egoism, and from (the idea that this or that is) mine, to whom happiness and misery are alike, who is forgiving, contented, constantly devoted, self-restrained, and firm in his determinations, and whose mind and understanding are devoted to me, he is dear to me. He through whom the world is not agitated 1, and who is not agitated by the world, who is free from joy and anger and fear and agitation, he too is dear to me. That devotee of mine, who is unconcerned 2, pure, assiduous 3, impartial, free from distress 4, who abandons all actions (for fruit 5), he is dear to me. He who is full of devotion to me, who feels no joy and no aversion, who does not grieve and does not desire, who abandons (both what is) agreeable and (what is) disagreeable, he is dear to me. He who is alike to friend and foe, as also in honour and dishonour, who is alike in cold and heat, pleasure and pain, who is free from attachments, to whom praise and blame are alike, who is taciturn 6, and contented with anything whatever (that comes), who is homeless 7, and of a steady mind, and full of devotion, that man is dear to me. But those devotees who, imbued with faith, and (regarding) me as their highest (goal), resort to this holy (means for attaining) immortality, as stated, they are extremely dear to me.

And the God said: This body, O son of Kuntī! is called Kshetra 1, and the learned call him who knows it the Kshetragna. 2. And know me also, O descendant of Bharata! to be the Kshetragna in all Kshetras. The knowledge of Kshetra and Kshetragna is deemed by me (to be real) knowledge. Now hear from me in brief what that Kshetra (is), what (it is) like, what changes (it undergoes), and whence (it comes), and what is he 3, and what his powers, (all which) is sung in various ways by sages in numerous hymns 4, distinctly, and in well-settled texts full of argument, giving indications or full instruction about the Brahman. The great elements 5, egoism, the understanding, the unperceived also, the ten senses, and the one, and the five objects of sense, desire, aversion, pleasure, pain, body, consciousness, courage, thus in brief has been declared the Kshetra with changes 1. Absence of vanity, absence of ostentatiousness, absence of hurtfulness, forgiveness, straightforwardness, devotion to a preceptor, purity 2, steadiness, self-restraint, indifference towards objects of sense, and also absence of egoism; perception of the misery and evil of birth, death 3, old age, and disease; absence of attachment, absence of self-identifying regard for son, wife 4, home, and so forth; and constant equability on the approach of (both what is) agreeable and (what is) disagreeable; unswerving devotion to me, without meditation on any one else; resorting to clean places, distaste for assemblages of men 5, constancy in knowledge of the relation of the individual self to the supreme, perception of the object

6 of knowledge of the truth, this is called knowledge; that is ignorance which is opposed to this. I will declare that which is the object of knowledge, knowing which, one reaches immortality; the highest Brahman, having no beginning nor end, which cannot be said to be existent or non-existent 7. It has hands and feet on all sides, it has eyes, heads, and faces on all sides, it has ears on all sides, it stands pervading everything in the world. Possessed of the qualities of all the senses, (but) devoid of all senses 1, unattached, it supports all, is devoid of qualities, and the enjoyer 2 of qualities. It is within all things and without them; it is movable and also immovable; it is unknowable through (its) subtlety; it stands afar and near 3. Not different in (different) things 4, but standing as though different, it should be known to be the supporter of (all) things, and that which absorbs and creates (them). It is the radiance even of the radiant (bodies); it is said (to be) beyond darkness. It is knowledge, the object of knowledge, that which is to be attained to by knowledge, and placed in the heart of all 5. Thus in brief have Kshetra, knowledge, and the object of knowledge been declared. My devotee, knowing this, becomes fit for assimilation with me. Know nature and spirit both (to be) without beginning, and know all developments and qualities 6 (to be) produced from nature. Nature is said to be the origin of the capacity of working (residing) in the body and the senses; and spirit is said (to be) the origin of the capacity of enjoying pleasures and pains 1. For spirit with nature joined, enjoys the qualities born of nature. And the cause of its birth in good or evil wombs is the connexion with the qualities 2. The supreme spirit in this body is called supervisor, adviser 3, supporter, enjoyer, the great lord, and the supreme self also. He who thus knows nature and spirit, together with the qualities, is not born again, however living 4. Some by concentration see the self in the self by the self; others by the Sāṅkya-yoga; and others still by the Karma-yoga 5; others yet, not knowing this, practise concentration, after hearing from others 6. They, too, being (thus) devoted to hearing (instruction) cross beyond death. Whatever thing movable or immovable comes into existence, know that to be from the connexion of Kshetra and Kshetragna. O chief of the descendants of Bharata! He sees (truly) who sees the supreme lord abiding alike in all entities, and not destroyed though they are destroyed. For he who sees the lord abiding everywhere alike, does not destroy himself 1 by himself, and then reaches the highest goal. He sees (truly), who sees (all) actions (to be) in every way done by nature alone, and likewise the self (to be) not the doer. When a man sees all the variety of entities as existing in one 2, and (all as) emanating from that, then he becomes (one with) the Brahman. This inexhaustible supreme self, being without beginning and without qualities, does not act, and is not tainted. O son of Kuntī! though stationed in the body. As by (reason of its) subtlety the all-pervading space is not tainted, so the self stationed in every body is not tainted. As the sun singly lights up all this world, so the Kshetragna, O descendant of Bharata! lights up the whole Kshetra. Those who, with the eye of knowledge, thus understand the difference between Kshetra and Kshetragna, and the destruction of the nature of all entities 3, go to the supreme.

And the God said: Again I will declare (to you) the highest knowledge, the best of (all sorts of) knowledge, having learnt which, all sages have reached perfection beyond (the bonds of) this (body). Those who, resorting to this knowledge, reach assimilation with my essence, are not born at the creation, and are not afflicted 1 at the destruction (of the universe). The great Brahman 2 is a womb for me, in which I cast the seed. From that, O descendant of Bharata! is the birth of all things. Of the bodies, O son of Kuntī! which are born from all wombs, the (main) womb is the great Brahman, and I (am) the father, the giver of the seed. Goodness, passion, darkness, these qualities 3 born from nature, O you of mighty arms! bind down the inexhaustible soul in the body. Of these, goodness, which, in consequence of being untainted, is enlightening and free from (all) misery, binds the soul, O sinless one! with the bond of pleasure and the bond of knowledge 4. Know that passion consists in being enamoured, and is produced from craving and attachment. That, O son of Kuntī! binds down the embodied (self) with the bond of action. Darkness (you must) know to be born of ignorance, it deludes all embodied (selves). And that, O descendant of Bharata! binds down (the self) with heedlessness 1, indolence, and sleep. Goodness unites (the self) with pleasure; passion, O descendant of Bharata! with action; and darkness with heedlessness, after shrouding up knowledge. Passion and darkness being repressed, goodness stands, O descendant of Bharata! Passion and goodness (being repressed), darkness; and likewise darkness and goodness (being repressed), passion 2. When in this body at all portals 3 light (that is to say) knowledge prevails, then should one know goodness to be developed. Avarice, activity 4, performance of actions, want of tranquillity, desire, these are produced, O chief of the descendants of Bharata! when passion is developed. Want of light, want of activity 5, heedlessness, and delusion, these are produced, O descendant of Kuru! when darkness is developed. When an embodied (self) encounters death, while goodness is developed, then he reaches the untainted worlds of those who know the highest 6. Encountering death during (the prevalence of) passion, he is born among those attached to action. Likewise, dying during (the prevalence of) darkness, he is born in the wombs of the ignorant 1. The fruit of meritorious action is said to be good, untainted; while the fruit of passion is misery; and the fruit of darkness ignorance. From goodness is produced knowledge, from passion avarice 2, and from darkness heedlessness and delusion and ignorance also. Those who adhere to (the ways of) goodness go up 3; the passionate remain in the middle; while those of the qualities of darkness, adhering to the ways of the lowest quality, go down. When a right-seeing person sees none but the qualities (to be) the doers (of all action), and knows what is above the qualities 4, he enters into my essence. The embodied (self), who transcends these three qualities, from which bodies are produced 5, attains immortality, being freed from birth and death and old age and misery.

Arjuna said: What are the characteristics, O lord! of one who has transcended these three qualities? What is his conduct, and how does he transcend these three qualities 6?

And the God said: He is said to have transcended the qualities, O son of Pāndu! who is not averse to light and activity and delusion (when they) prevail, and who does not desire (them when they) cease 1; who sitting like one unconcerned is never perturbed by the qualities 2; who remains steady and moves 3 not, (thinking) merely that the qualities 4 exist; who is self-contained 5; to whom pain and pleasure are alike; to whom a sod and a stone and gold are alike; to whom what is agreeable and what is disagreeable are alike; who has discernment; to whom censure and praise of himself are alike; who is alike in honour and dishonour; who is alike towards the sides of friends and foes; and who abandons all action 6. And he who worships me with an unswerving devotion, transcends these qualities, and becomes fit for (entrance into) the essence of the Brahman. For I am the embodiment of the Brahman 7, of indefeasible immortality, of eternal piety, and of unbroken happiness.

BHAGAVADGITA.CHAPTER 15

And the God said: They say the inexhaustible Asvattha 1 has (its) roots above, (its) branches below; the Khandas are its leaves. He who knows it knows the Vedas. Upwards and downwards extend its branches, which are enlarged by the qualities, and the sprouts of which are sensuous objects. And downwards to this human world are continued its roots which lead on to action. Its form is not thus known here, nor (its) end, nor beginning, nor support. But having with the firm weapon of unconcern, cut this Asvattha, whose roots are firmly fixed, then should one seek for that seat from which those that go there never return, (thinking) that one rests on that same primal being from whom the ancient course (of worldly life) emanated. Those who are free from pride and delusion, who have overcome the evils of attachment, who are constant in (contemplating) the relation of the supreme and individual self, from whom desire has departed, who are free from the pairs (of opposites) called pleasure and pain, go undeluded to that imperishable seat 2. The sun does not light it, nor the moon, nor fire 1. That is my highest abode, going to which none returns. An eternal portion of me it is, which, becoming an individual soul in the mortal world, draws (to itself) the senses with the mind as the sixth 2. Whenever the ruler (of the bodily frame) obtains or quits a body, he goes taking these (with him) as the wind (takes) perfumes from (their) seats 3. And presiding over the senses of hearing and seeing, and touch, and taste, and smell, and the mind, he enjoys sensuous objects. Those who are deluded do not see (him) remaining in or quitting (a body), enjoying or joined to the qualities 4; they see, who have eyes of knowledge. Devotees making efforts perceive him abiding within their self 5. But those whose self has not been refined, and who have no discernment, do not perceive him even (after) making efforts. Know that glory (to be) mine which, dwelling in the sun, lights up the whole world, or in the moon or fire.

Entering the earth 1, I by my power support all things; and becoming the juicy moon, I nourish all herbs. I becoming the fire, and dwelling in the bodies of (all) creatures, and united with the upward and downward life-breaths, cause digestion of the fourfold food 2. And I am placed in the heart of all 3; from me (come) memory, knowledge, and their removal; I alone am to be learnt from all the Vedas; I am the author of the Vedāntas 4; and I alone know the Vedas. There are these two beings in the world, the destructible and the indestructible 5. The destructible (includes) all things. The unconcerned one is (what is) called the indestructible. But the being supreme is yet another, called the highest self, who as the inexhaustible lord, pervading the three worlds, supports (them). And since I transcend the destructible, and since I am higher also than the indestructible 6, therefore am I celebrated in the world and in the Vedas as the best of beings. He who, undeluded, thus knows me the best of beings, worships me every way 1, O descendant of Bharata! knowing everything. Thus, O sinless one! have I proclaimed this most mysterious science. He who knows this, has done all he need do, and he becomes possessed of discernment.

BHAGAVADGITA.CHAPTER 16

Freedom from fear, purity of heart, perseverance (in pursuit of) knowledge and abstraction of mind, gifts 2, self-restraint 2, and sacrifice, study of the Vedas, penance, straightforwardness, harmlessness, truth 2, freedom from anger, renunciation 3, tranquillity, freedom from the habit of backbiting 4, compassion for (all) beings, freedom from avarice, gentleness, modesty, absence of vain activity, noble-mindedness, forgiveness, courage, purity, freedom from a desire to injure others, absence of vanity, (these), O descendant of Bharata! are his who is born to godlike endowments. Ostentatiousness, pride, vanity 5, anger, and also harshness and ignorance (are) his, O son of Prithā! who is born to demoniac 6 endowments. Godlike endowments are deemed to be (means) for final emancipation, demoniac for bondage 1. Grieve not, O descendant of Bharata! you are born to godlike endowments. (There are) two classes of created beings in this world, the godlike and the demoniac; the godlike (class) has been described at length; now hear from me, O son of Prithā! about the demoniac. Demoniac persons know not action or inaction 2, neither purity nor yet (correct) conduct nor veracity are in them. They say the universe is devoid of truth 3, devoid of fixed principle 4, and devoid of a ruler, produced by union (of male and female) caused by lust 5, and nothing else. Holding this view, (these) enemies of the world, of ruined 6 selfs, of little knowledge, and of ferocious actions, are born for the destruction (of the world). Entertaining insatiable desire, full of vanity, ostentatiousness, and frenzy, they adopt false notions 7 through delusion, and engage in unholy observances. Indulging in boundless thoughts ending with death 8, given up to the enjoyment of objects of desire, being resolved that that is all, bound down by nets of hopes in hundreds, given up to anger and desire, they wish to obtain heaps of wealth unfairly for enjoying objects of desire. 'This have I obtained to-day; this wish I will obtain; this wealth is mine; and this also shall be mine; this foe I have killed; mine too I will destroy; I am lord, I am the enjoyer, I am perfect 1, strong, happy; I have wealth; I am of noble birth; who else is like me? I will sacrifice 2; I will make gifts; I will rejoice.' Thus deluded by ignorance, tossed about by numerous thoughts, surrounded by the net of delusion, and attached to the enjoyment of objects of desire, they fall down into impure hell. Honoured (only) by themselves, void of humility, and full of the pride and frenzy of wealth, these calumniators (of the virtuous) perform sacrifices, which are sacrifices only in name, with ostentatiousness and against prescribed rules 3; indulging (their) vanity, brute force, arrogance, lust, and anger; and hating me in their own bodies and in those of others 4. These enemies 5, ferocious, meanest of men, and unholy, I continually hurl down, to these worlds 6, only into demoniac wombs. Coming into demoniac wombs, deluded in every birth, they go down to the vilest state, O son of Kuntī! without ever coming to me. Threefold is this way, to hell,--ruinous to the self 1,--lust, anger, and likewise avarice; therefore one should abandon this triad. Released from these three ways to darkness, O son of Kuntī! a man works out his own welfare, and then proceeds to the highest goal. He 2 who abandoning scripture ordinances, acts under the impulse of desire, does not attain perfection 3, nor happiness, nor the highest goal. Therefore in discriminating between what should be done and what should not be done, your authority (must be) scripture. And knowing what is declared by the ordinances of scripture, you should perform action in this world.

BHAGAVADGITA.CHAPTER 17

Arjuna said: What is the state of those, O Krishna! who worship with faith, (but) abandoning scripture ordinances--goodness, passion, or darkness?

And the God said: Faith is of three kinds in embodied (beings), it is produced from dispositions 4. It is of the quality of goodness, of the quality of passion, and of the quality of darkness. Hear about it. The faith of all, O descendant of Bharata! is conformable to the heart 1. A being here is full of faith, and whatever is a man's faith, that is a man himself 2. Those of the quality of goodness worship the gods; those of the quality of passion the Yakshas and Rakshases 3; and the others, the people of the quality of darkness, worship departed (spirits) and the multitudes of Bhūtas. Know those to be of demoniac convictions, who practise fierce penance 4 not ordained by scripture; who are full of ostentatiousness and egoism, and of desire, attachment, and stubbornness; who are without discernment; and who torment the groups of organs in (their) bodies, and me also seated within (those) bodies. The food also, which is liked by all, and likewise the sacrifice, the penance, and gifts, are of three kinds. Listen to the distinctions regarding them as follows. The kinds of food which increase life, energy, strength, health, comfort, and relish, which are savoury, oleaginous, full of nutrition, and agreeable, are liked by the good. The kinds of food which are bitter, acid, saltish, too hot, sharp, rough, and burning, and which cause pain, grief, and disease, are desired by the passionate. And the food 5 which is cold, tasteless, stinking, stale, impure, and even leavings, are liked by the dark. That sacrifice is good which, being prescribed in (scripture) ordinances, is performed by persons not wishing for the fruit (of it), and after determining (in their) mind that the sacrifice must needs be performed. But when a sacrifice is performed, O highest of the descendants of Bharata! with an expectation of fruit (from it), and for the purpose of ostentation, know that sacrifice (to be) passionate. They call that sacrifice dark, which is against the ordinances (of scripture), in which no food is dealt out (to Brāhmanas, &c.), which is devoid of Mantras 1, devoid of Dakshinā presents, and which is without faith. Paying reverence to gods, Brāhmanas, preceptors, and men of knowledge; purity 2, straightforwardness, life as Brahmakārin, and harmlessness, (this) is called the penance bodily. The speech which causes no sorrow, which is true, agreeable, and beneficial, and the study 3 of the Vedas, (this) is called the penance vocal. Calmness of mind, mildness, taciturnity 4, self-restraint, and purity of heart, this is called the penance mental. This threefold penance, practised with perfect faith, by men who do not wish for the fruit, and who are possessed of devotion is called good. The penance which is done for respect, honour, and reverence 5, and with ostentatiousness, and which is uncertain and transient 1, is here called passionate. And that penance is described as dark, which is performed under a misguided conviction, with pain to oneself, or for the destruction of another. That gift is said (to be) good, which is given, because it ought to be given, to one who (can) do no service (in return), at a (proper) place and time, and to a (proper) person. But that gift which is given with much difficulty, for a return of services, or even with an expectation of fruit 2, is said to be passionate. And that gift, is described as dark, which is given to unfit persons, at an unfit place and time, without respect, and with contempt. Om, Tad, and Sat, this is said (to be) the threefold designation of the Brahman. By that 3, the Brāhmanas and the Vedas and sacrifices were created in olden times. Hence, the performance by those who study the Brahman, of sacrifices, gifts, and penances, prescribed by the ordinances (of scripture), always commence after saying 'Om 4.' Those who desire final emancipation perform the various acts of sacrifice and penance, and the various acts of gift, without expectation of fruit, after (saying) 'Tad 5.' 'Sat' is employed to express existence and goodness; and likewise, O son of Prithā! the word 'Sat' is used to express an auspicious act. Constancy in (making) sacrifices, penances, and gifts, is called 'Sat,' and (all) action, too, of which that 1 is the object, is also called 'Sat.' Whatever oblation is offered, whatever is given, whatever penance is performed, and whatever is done, without faith 2, that, O son of Prithā! is called 'Asat,' and that is nought, both after death and here 3.

BHAGAVADGITA.CHAPTER 18

Arjuna said: O you of mighty arms! O Hrīshīkesa! O destroyer of Kesin! I wish to know the truth about renunciation and abandonment distinctly.

And the God said: By renunciation the sages understand the rejection of actions done with desires. The wise call the abandonment of the fruit of all actions (by the name) abandonment. Some wise men say, that action should be abandoned as being full of evil; and others, that the actions of sacrifice, gift, and penance should not be abandoned. As to that abandonment, O best of the descendants of Bharata! listen to my decision; for abandonment, O bravest of men! is described (to be) threefold. The actions of sacrifice, gift, and penance should not be abandoned; they must needs be performed; for sacrifices, gifts, and penances are means of sanctification to the wise. But even these actions, O son of Prithā! should be performed, abandoning attachment and fruit; such is my excellent and decided opinion. The renunciation of prescribed action is not proper. Its abandonment through delusion 1 is described as of the quality of darkness. When a man abandons action, merely as being troublesome, through fear of bodily affliction, he does not obtain the fruit 2 of abandonment by making (such) passionate abandonment. When prescribed action is performed, O Arjuna! abandoning attachment and fruit also, merely because it ought to be performed, that is deemed (to be) a good abandonment. He who is possessed of abandonment 3, being full of goodness, and talented, and having, his doubts destroyed, is not averse from unpleasant actions, is not attached to pleasant 4 (ones). Since no embodied (being) can abandon actions without exception 5, he is said to be possessed of abandonment, who abandons the fruit of action. The threefold fruit of action, agreeable, disagreeable, and mixed, accrues after death to those who are not possessed of abandonment, but never to renouncers 1. Learn from me, O you of mighty arms! these five causes of the completion of all actions, declared in the Sāṅkhya system 2. The substratum, the agent likewise, the various sorts of organs, and the various and distinct movements, and with these the deities, too, as the fifth. Whatever action, just or otherwise, a man performs with his body, speech, and mind, these five are its causes. That being so, the undiscerning man, who being of an unrefined understanding, sees the agent in the immaculate self, sees not (rightly) 3. He who has no feeling of egoism 4, and whose mind is not tainted, even though he kills (all) these people, kills not, is not fettered, 5 (by the action). Knowledge 6, the object of knowledge, the knower--threefold is the prompting to action. The instrument, the action, the agent, thus in brief is action threefold. Knowledge and action and agent are declared in the enumeration of qualities 1 (to be) of three classes only, according to the difference of qualities. Hear about these also as they really are. Know that knowledge to be good, by which (a man) sees one entity, inexhaustible, and not different in all things (apparently) different 2 (from one another). Know that knowledge to be passionate, which is (based) on distinctions 3 (between different entities), which sees in all things various entities of different kinds. And that is described as dark, which clings to one created (thing) only as everything, which is devoid of reason, devoid of real principle, and insignificant 4. That action is called good, which is prescribed, which is devoid of attachment, which is not done from (motives of) affection or aversion, (and which is done) by one not wishing for the fruit. That is described as passionate, which (occasions) much trouble, is performed by one who wishes for objects of desire, or one who is full of egoism 5. The action is called dark, which is commenced through delusion, without regard to consequences, loss, injury, or strength 6. That agent is called good, who has cast off attachment, who is free from egotistic talk, who is possessed of courage and energy, and unaffected by success or ill-success. That agent is called passionate, who is full of affections 7, who wishes for the fruit of actions, who is covetous, cruel, and impure, and feels joy and sorrow. That agent is called dark, who is without application 1, void of discernment, headstrong, crafty, malicious, lazy, melancholy, and slow. Now hear, O Dhanangaya! the threefold division of intelligence 2 and courage, according to qualities, which I am about to declare exhaustively and distinctly. That intelligence, O son of Prithā! is good which understands action and inaction 3, what ought to be done and what ought not to be done, danger and the absence of danger, emancipation and bondage. That intelligence, O son of Prithā! is passionate, by which one imperfectly understands piety and impiety, what ought to be done and also what ought not to be done. That intelligence, O son of Prithā! is dark, which shrouded by darkness, understands impiety (to be) piety, and all things incorrectly. That courage, O son of Prithā! is good courage, which is unswerving 4, and by which one controls the operations of the mind, breath, and senses, through abstraction. But, O Arjuna! that courage is passionate, by which one adheres to piety, lust, and wealth 5, and through attachment 6 wishes, O son of Prithā! for the fruit, That courage is dark, O son of Prithā! by which an undiscerning man does not give up sleep, fear, sorrow, despondency, and folly. Now, O chief of the descendants of Bharata! bear from me about the three sorts of happiness. That happiness is called good, in which one is pleased after repetition 1 (of enjoyment), and reaches the close of all misery, which is like poison first and comparable to nectar in the long run, and which is produced from a clear knowledge of the self 2. That happiness is called passionate, which (flows) from contact between the senses and their objects, and which is at first comparable to nectar and in the long run like poison. That happiness is described as dark, which arises from sleep, laziness, heedlessness, which deludes the self, both at first and in its consequences. There is no entity either on earth or in heaven among the gods, which is free from these three qualities born of nature. The duties of Brāhmanas, Kshatriyas, and Vaisyas, and of Sūdras, too, O terror of your foes! are distinguished according to the qualities born of nature 3. Tranquillity 4, restraint of the senses, penance, purity, forgiveness, straightforwardness, also knowledge, experience, and belief (in a future world), this is the natural duty of Brāhmanas. Valour, glory, Courage, dexterity 1, not slinking away from battle, gifts, exercise of lordly power 2, this is the natural duty of Kshatriyas. Agriculture, tending cattle, trade, (this) is the natural duty of Vaisyas. And the natural duty of Sūdras, too, consists in service. (Every) man intent on his own respective duties obtains perfection 3. Listen, now, how one intent on one's own duty obtains perfection. Worshipping, by (the performance of) his own duty, him from whom all things proceed, and by whom all this is permeated, a man obtains perfection. One's duty, though defective, is better than another's duty well performed 4. Performing the duty prescribed by nature, one does not incur sin. O son of Kuntī! one should not abandon a natural duty though tainted with evil; for all actions are enveloped by evil, as fire by smoke 5. One who is self-restrained, whose understanding is unattached everywhere, from whom affections have departed, obtains the supreme perfection of freedom from action 6 by renunciation. Learn from me, only in brief, O son of Kuntī! how one who has obtained perfection attains the Brahman, which is the highest culmination of knowledge. A man possessed of a pure understanding, controlling his self by courage, discarding sound and other objects of sense, casting off affection and aversion; who frequents clean places, who eats little, whose speech, body, and mind are restrained, who is always intent on meditation and mental abstraction 1, and has recourse to unconcern, who abandoning egoism 2, stubbornness, arrogance, desire, anger, and (all) belongings, has no (thought that this or that is) mine, and who is tranquil, becomes fit for assimilation with the Brahman 3, and with a tranquil self, he grieves not, wishes not; but being alike to all beings, obtains the highest devotion to me. By (that) devotion he truly understands who I am and how great. And then understanding me truly, he forthwith enters into my (essence). Even performing all actions, always depending on me, he, through my favour, obtains the imperishable and eternal seat. Dedicating in thought 4 all actions to me, he constantly given up to me, (placing) your thoughts on me, through recourse to mental abstraction. (Placing) your thoughts on me, you will cross over all difficulties by my favour. But if you will not listen through egotism 5, you will be ruined. If entertaining egotism, you think that you may not fight, vain, indeed, is that resolution of yours. Nature 6 will constrain you. That, O son of Kunti! which through delusion you do not wish to do, you will do involuntarily, tied down by your own duty, flowing from your nature. The lord, O Arjuna! is seated in the region of the heart 1 of all beings, turning round all beings (as though) mounted on a machine, by his delusion. With him, O descendant of Bharata! seek shelter in every way 2; by his favour you will obtain the highest tranquillity, the eternal seat. Thus have I declared to you the knowledge more mysterious than any mystery. Ponder over it thoroughly, and then act as you like. Once more, listen to my excellent words-most mysterious of all. Strongly I like you, therefore I will declare what is for your welfare. On me (place) your mind, become my devotee, sacrifice to me, reverence me, you will certainly come to me. I declare to you truly, you are dear to me. Forsaking all duties 3, come to me as (your) sole refuge. I will release you from all sins. Be not grieved. This 4 you should never declare to one who performs no penance 5, who is not a devotee 6, nor to one who does not wait on (some preceptor) 7, nor yet to one who calumniate me. He who, with the highest devotion 8 to me, will proclaim this supreme mystery among my devotees, will come to me, freed from (all) doubt. No one amongst men is superior to him in doing what is dear to me. And there will never be another on earth dearer to me than he. And he who will study this holy dialogue of ours, will, such is my opinion, have offered to me the sacrifice of knowledge 1. And the man, also, who with faith and without carping will listen (to this), will be freed (from sin), and attain to the holy regions of those who perform pious acts 2. Have you listened to this, O son of Prithâ! with a mind (fixed) on (this) one point only? Has your delusion (caused) by ignorance been destroyed, O Dhanangaya?

Arjuna said: Destroyed is my delusion; by your favour, O undegraded one! I (now) recollect 3 myself. I stand freed from doubts 4. I will do your bidding.

Sangaya said: Thus did I hear this dialogue between Vāsudeva and the high-minded son of Prithâ, (a dialogue) wonderful and causing the hair to stand on end. By the favour of Vyāsa, I heard this highest mystery, (this) devotion 5, from Krishna himself, the lord of the possessors of mystic power, who proclaimed it in person. O king! remembering and (again) remembering this wonderful and holy dialogue of Kesava and Arjuna, I rejoice over and over again. And remembering and (again) remembering that excessively wonderful form of Hari also, great is my amazement, O king! and I rejoice over and over again. Wherever (is) Krishna, the lord of the possessors of mystic power, wherever (is) the (great) archer, the son of Prithâ, there in my opinion (are) fortune, victory, prosperity 1, and eternal justice.

(Jainism is a religion originally from India that teaches that "all the events in the universe are self-caused, random, fixed and are independent of previous events or external causes or god": Jain philosophy is the oldest philosophy of India that distinguishes body (matter) from the soul (consciousness) completely. It teaches that the universe is eternal and that every living being has a soul which has the power to become all-knowing (observer of all the random events). A soul which has won over its inner enemies like attachment, greed, pride, etc. is called jina which means conqueror or victor (over ignorance). The holy book of Jainism is Pravachansara.

Jain dharma is one of the world's oldest religions and has two major ancient sub-traditions, Digambaras and Svetambaras, with different views on ascetic practices, gender and which texts can be considered canonical; both have mendicants supported by laypersons (śrāvaka and śrāvika). Most Jains live in India, and according to the 2001 Census of India there are around 4.2 million living there. However, the Oxford Handbook of Global Religions, published in 2006, suggests that census figures may provide lower than the true number of followers as many Jains officially identify themselves as Hindu. The true number of Jains therefore could be estimated between 5 and 10 million.

Main Teachings

1. Every living being has a soul.
2. Every soul is potentially divine, with innate qualities of infinite knowledge, perception, power, and bliss (masked by its karmas).
3. The universe is self-regulated, with all the events self-caused, and every soul has the potential to achieve divine consciousness (siddha) through its own efforts.
4. There is no supreme divine creator, owner, preserver or destroyer.
5. Therefore, Jainists think of every living being as themselves, harming no one and be kind to all living beings.
6. Every soul is born as a celestial, human, sub-human or hellish being according to its own karmas.
7. Every soul is the architect of its own life, here or hereafter.
8. When a soul is freed from karmas, it becomes free and attains divine consciousness, experiencing infinite knowledge, perception, power, and bliss.
9. Right View, Right Knowledge and Right Conduct (triple gems of Jainism) provide the way to this realisation.
10. Navakar Mantra is the fundamental prayer in Jainism and can be recited at any time of the day. Praying by reciting this mantra, the devotee bows with respect to liberated souls still in human form (Arihantas), fully liberated souls (Siddhas), spiritual leaders (Acharyas), teachers (Upadhyas) and all the monks. By saluting them, Jains receive inspiration from them to follow their path to achieve true bliss and total freedom from the karmas binding their souls. In this main prayer, Jains do not ask for any favours or material benefits. This mantra serves as a simple gesture of deep respect towards beings who are more spiritually advanced. The mantra also reminds followers of the ultimate goal, nirvana or moksha.
11. Jainism stresses on the importance of controlling the senses including the mind, as they can drag one far away from true nature of the soul.
12. Limit possessions and lead a pure life that is useful to yourself and others. Owning an object by itself is not possessiveness; however attachment to an object is. [8] Non-possessiveness is the balancing of needs and desires while staying detached from our possessions.
13. Enjoy the company of the holy and better qualified, be merciful to those afflicted souls and tolerate the perversely inclined.
14. It is important not to waste human life in evil ways. Rather, strive to rise on the ladder of spiritual evolution.
15. The goal of Jainism is liberation of the soul from the negative effects of unenlightened thoughts, speech and action. This goal is achieved through clearance of karmic obstructions by following the triple gems of Jainism.
16. Jains mainly worship idols of Jinas, Arihants and Tirthankars, who have conquered the inner passions and attained divine consciousness. Jainism acknowledges the existence of powerful heavenly souls (Yaksha and Yakshini) that look after the well beings of Thirthankarars. Usually, they are found in pair around the idols of Jinas as male (yaksha) and female (yakshini) guardian deities. Even though they have supernatural powers, they are also wandering through the cycles of births and deaths just like most other souls.

Jainism has been praised for some of its practices and beliefs. The leader of the campaign for Indian independence, Mahatma Gandhi, greatly influenced by Jainism, said: "No religion in the World has explained the principle of Ahimsa so deeply and systematically as is discussed with its applicability in every human life in Jainism. As and when the benevolent principle of Ahimsa or non-violence will be ascribed for practice by the people of the world to achieve their end of life in this world and beyond, Jainism is sure to have the uppermost status and Mahavira is sure to be respected as the greatest authority on Ahimsa."

If we want to find out what a certain religion or belief-system is all about, we only need to look at the persons who were involved in its founding. In this regard, it is of particular importance to look at language, geography, names, and their relationships with other people.

In Jainism, a Tirthankara (Sanskrit: tīrthankara; literally a 'ford-maker') is a saviour and spiritual teacher of the dharma (righteous path). The word tirthankara signifies the founder of a tirtha, which is a fordable passage across the sea of interminable births and deaths, the samsara. The Tirthankaras are considered as the founders of Jainism; there were 24. These 24 Tirthankaras are legendary figures, if we put it simple, and they are closely connected to the Jain cosmology. Jain cosmology is the description of the shape and functioning of the Universe (loka) and its constituents (such as living beings, matter, space, time etc.) according to Jainism. Jain cosmology considers the universe as an uncreated entity that has existed since infinity with neither beginning nor end [with this model of thought, the Jains come quite close to the findings of modern scientists].

According to Jains, a Tirthankara is an individual who has conquered the samsara, the cycle of death and rebirth, on their own, and made a path for others to follow. After understanding the true nature of the self or soul, the Tirthankara attains Kevala Jnana (omniscience). The first Tirthankara founded Jainism. Tirthankara provides a bridge for others to follow the new teacher from samsara to Mahaviraswami (liberation).

The word tirthankara signifies the founder of a tirtha which means a fordable passage across the sea of interminable births and deaths (called samsara). Tirthankaras are variously called "Teaching Gods", "Ford-Makers", "Crossing Makers" and "Makers of the River-Crossing. There is only one Tirthankara historically verifiable and that is the 24th and last Tirthankara whose name is Mahavira. The other Tirthankaras also might have existed as real persons but we have no archaeological evidence that could stand up to scientific scrutiny.

Mahavira, also known as Bhagwan Mahavira, Vardhamana or Veer, was the spiritual successor of 23rd Tirthankara Parshvanatha. Mahavira was born in the early part of the 6th century BC into a royal Kshatriya Jain family in Bihar, India, not far away from Buddha's homeland in southern Nepal. His mother's name was Trishala and father's name was Siddhartha [which was also Buddha's name]. They were lay devotees of Parshvanatha. Mahavira abandoned all worldly possessions at the age of about 30 and left home in pursuit of spiritual awakening, becoming an ascetic [Buddha's renunciation story sounds almost the same - he was 29 when he became a pious ascetic.] Mahavira practised intense meditation and severe austerities for 12 and a half years, after which he attained Kevala Gyan (omniscience). He preached for 30 years and attained Moksha (salvation) in the 6th century BC, although the year varies by sect.

Historically, Mahavira, who preached Jainism in ancient India, was [probably] an older contemporary of Gautama Buddha. Scholars variously date him from 6th-5th century BC and his place of birth is also a point of dispute among them. What kind of personal relationship existed between Mahavira and Siddhartha Gautama Buddha is unclear. Mahavira was member of the legendary "Solar dynasty" [Suryavansha = "Descendants of the Sun"], also called the "Ikshvaku dynasty". Rama [born in Ayodhya to King Dasharatha and Queen Kaushalya who was also the mother of Shanta, a character in the famous Ramayana epic.], likewise belonged to the Ikshvaku dynasty.

According to the Jain texts, twenty-two out of the twenty-four Jain Tirthankara belonged to this dynasty. According to Buddhist texts and tradition, Siddhartha Gautama Buddha also descended from this dynasty. Many important personalities belonging to this royal house: Mandhatrî, Muchukunda, Ambarisha, Bharata Chakravartin, Bahubali, Harishchandra, Dilîpa, Sagara, Raghu, Rama and Pasenadi. Both, the Hindu Puranas and the Buddhist texts include Shuddhodhana, Gautama Buddha and his son Rahula in their accounts of the Ikshvaku dynasty. According to the Buddhist texts, Mahasammata, an ancestor of Ikshvaku was the founder of this dynasty, who was elected by the people as the first king. According to the Puranas, supreme preceptor of the Ikshvaku dynasty was sage Vashishta.

Mahavira taught that observance of the vows of ahimsa (non-violence), satya (truth), asteya (non-stealing), brahmacharya (chastity), and aparigraha (non-attachment) are necessary for spiritual liberation. He taught the principles of Anekantavada (many-sided reality): syadvada and nayavada. Mahavira's teachings were compiled by Indrabhuti Gautama (his chief disciple) as the Jain Agamas. The texts, transmitted orally by Jain monks, are believed to have been largely lost by about the 1st century AD (when the remaining were first written down in the Svetambara tradition). The surviving versions of the Agamas taught by Mahavira are some of Svetambara Jainism's foundation texts, but their authenticity is disputed in Digambara Jainism.

Mahavira is usually depicted in a sitting or standing meditative posture, with the symbol of a lion beneath him. His earliest iconography is from archaeological sites in the North Indian city of Mathura, and is dated from the 1st century BC to the 2nd century AD. His birth is celebrated as Mahavir Janma Kalyanak and his nirvana (salvation) is observed by Jains as Diwali.

List of the 24 tirthankaras
Present cosmic age

In chronological order, the names, emblems and colours of the 24 tirthankaras of this age are mentioned below: Dhanusa means "bow", hatha means "hands" and 1 Purva equals 8,400,000 x 8,400,000 or 70,560,000,000,000 years. Where these exaggerations come from is not clear but we find them also in the Hebrew Bible [See: Methuselah the biblical patriarch who is said to have died at the age of 969 years; Genesis 5:21–27.].

1. Rishabhanatha (Adinatha), 8,400,000 Purva
2. Ajitanatha, 7,200,000 Purva
3. Sambhavanatha, 6,000,000 Purva
4. Abhinandanatha, 5,000,000 Purva
5. Sumatinatha, 4,000,000 Purva
6. Padmaprabha, 3,000,000 Purva
7. Suparshvanatha, 2,000,000 Purva
8. Chandraprabha, 1,000,000 Purva
9. Pushpadanta (Suvudhinath), 2,00,000 Purva
10. Shitalanatha, 1,00,000 Purva
11. Shreyanasanatha, 84,00,000 Years
12. Vasupujya, 72,00,000 Years
13. Vimalanatha, 60,00,000 Years
14. Anantanatha, 30,00,000 Years
15. Dharmnatha, 10,00,000 Years
16. Shantinatha, 7,00,000 Years
17. Kunthunatha, 95,000 Years
18. Aranatha, 84,000 Years
19. Mallinatha (a woman), 56,000 Years
20. Munisuvrata, 30,000 Years
21. Naminatha, 10,000 Years
22. Neminatha, 1000 Years
23. Parshvanatha, 100 Years
24. Mahavira, 72 Years

Comparing Jainism with Buddhism and Hinduism

All three religions share concepts and doctrines such as karma and rebirth, with similar festivals and monastic traditions. They do not believe in eternal heaven or hell or judgement day. They grant the freedom to choose beliefs such as in gods or no-gods, to disagree with core teachings, and to choose whether to participate in prayers, rituals and festivals. They all consider values such as non-violence to be important, link suffering to craving, individual's actions, intents, and karma, and believe spirituality is a means to enlightened peace, bliss and eternal liberation (moksha). Most importantly, they all share the Five Precepts, the basic laws which are identical to the last five of the Jewish and Christian Ten Commandments. In any case, when one goes through Hindu, Jain, Buddhist and Daoist texts, one can get the impression that those texts peculiarly look like ancient Jewish texts, especially when it comes to law and rules.

Jainism differs from both Buddhism and Hinduism in its ontological premises. All believe in impermanence, but Buddhism incorporates the premise of anatta ("no eternal self or soul"). Hinduism incorporates an eternal unchanging atman ("soul"), while Jainism incorporates an eternal but changing jiva ("soul"). In Jain thought, there are infinite eternal jivas, predominantly in cycles of rebirth, and a few siddhas (perfected ones). Unlike Jainism, Hindu philosophies encompass nondualism where all souls are identical as Brahman and posited as interconnected one.

While both Hinduism and Jainism believe "soul exists" to be a self-evident truth, most Hindu systems consider it to be eternally present, infinite and constant (vibhu), but some Hindu scholars propose soul to be atomic. Hindu thought generally discusses Atman and Brahman through a monistic or dualistic framework. In contrast, Jain thought denies the Hindu metaphysical concept of Brahman, and Jain philosophy considers the soul to be ever changing and bound to the body or matter for each lifetime, thereby having a finite size that infuses the entire body of a living being.

Jainism is similar to Buddhism in not recognising the primacy of the Vedas and the Hindu Brahman. Jainism and Hinduism, however, both believe "soul exists" as a self-evident truth. Jains and Hindus have frequently intermarried, particularly in northern, central and western regions of India. Some early colonial scholars stated that Jainism like Buddhism was, in part, a rejection of the Hindu caste system, but later scholars consider this a Western error. A caste system not based on birth has been a historic part of Jain society, and Jainism focused on transforming the individual, not society.

Monasticism is similar in all three traditions, with similar rules, hierarchical structure, not traveling during the four-month monsoon season, and celibacy, originating before the Buddha or the Mahavira. Jain and Hindu monastic communities have traditionally been more mobile and had an itinerant lifestyle, while Buddhist monks have favoured belonging to a sangha (monastery) and staying in its premises. Buddhist monastic rules forbid a monk to go outside without wearing the sangha's distinctive ruddy robe, or to use wooden bowls. In contrast, Jain monastic rules have either required nakedness (Digambara) or white clothes (Svetambara), and they have disagreed on the legitimacy of the wooden or empty gourd as the begging bowl by Jain monks.

Jains have similar views with Hindus that violence in self-defence can be justified, and that a soldier who kills enemies in combat is performing a legitimate duty. Jain communities accepted the use of military power for their defence; there were Jain monarchs, military commanders, and soldiers. The Jain and Hindu communities have often been very close and mutually accepting. Some Hindu temples have included a Jain Tirthankara within its premises in a place of honour, while temple complexes such as the Badami cave temples and Khajuraho feature both Hindu and Jain monuments.

Jain ethics and the Five Precepts (5 Vows)

Jainism teaches five ethical duties, which it calls "the Five Vows". They are identical to the Five Precepts in Buddhism, Daoism, and the second half of the Jewish and Christian Ten Commandments which all can be traced back to the Instructions of Shuruppak, Mesopotamia, 2600 BC). They are called Anuvratas (Small Vows) for Jain laypersons, and Mahavratas (Great Vows) for Jain mendicants (beggars). For both, its moral precepts preface that the Jain has access to a guru (teacher, counsellor), deva (Jina, god), doctrine, and that the individual is free from five offences: doubts about the faith, indecisiveness about the truths of Jainism, sincere desire for Jain teachings, recognition of fellow Jains, and admiration for their spiritual pursuits. Such a person undertakes the following Five Vows of Jainism:

1. Ahimsa (Non-violence = Thou shalt not kill)
2. Satya (Truth = Thou shalt not bear false witness)
3. Asteya (Non-stealing = Thou shalt not steal)
4. Brahmacharya (Chastity = Thou shalt not commit adultery)
5. Aparigraha (Non-possession = Thou shalt not covet)

The Five Precepts (Vows) in detail, with the decriptions of the Transgressions, they look like this:

1. Ahimsa, "intentional non-violence" or "noninjury": The first major vow taken by Jains is to cause no harm to other human beings, as well as all living beings (particularly animals). This is the highest ethical duty in Jainism, and it applies not only to one's actions, but demands that one be non-violent in one's speech and thoughts. Transgressions: Binding, beating, mutilating limbs, overloading, withholding food and drink.

2. Satya, "truth": This vow is to always speak the truth. Neither lie, nor speak what is not true, and do not encourage others or approve anyone who speaks an untruth. Transgressions: Perverted teaching, divulging what is done in secret, forgery, misappropriation, and proclaiming other's thoughts (which sounds pretty much like our modern copyright laws).

3. Asteya, "not stealing": A Jain layperson should not take anything that is not willingly given. Additionally, a Jain mendicant should ask for permission to take it if something is being given. Transgressions: Prompting others to steal, receiving stolen goods, under- buying in a disordered state, using false weights and measures, and deceiving others with artificial or imitation goods.

4. Brahmacharya, "celibacy": Abstinence from sex and sensual pleasures is prescribed for Jain monks and nuns. For laypersons, the vow means chastity, faithfulness to one's partner. Transgressions: Bringing about marriage, intercourse with an unchaste married woman, cohabitation with a harlot, perverted sexual practices, and excessive sexual passion.

5. Aparigraha, "non-possessiveness": This includes non-attachment to material and psychological possessions, avoiding craving and greed. Jain monks and nuns completely renounce property and social relations, own nothing and are attached to no one. Transgressions: Exceeding the limits set by oneself with regard to cultivable lands and houses, riches such as gold and silver, cattle and corn, men and women servants, and clothes.

Jainism prescribes seven supplementary vows, including three gunya vratas (merit vows) and four siksa vratas. The Sallekhana (or Santhara) vow is a "religious death" ritual observed at the end of life, historically by Jain monks and nuns, but rare in the modern age. In this vow, there is voluntary and gradual reduction of food and liquid intake to end one's life by choice and with dispassion. This is believed to reduce negative karma that affects a soul's future rebirths.

Apart from five fundamental vows seven supplementary vows are prescribed for a sravaka. These include three gunya vratas (Merit vows) and four siksa vratas (Disciplinary vows). The vow of sallekhana is observed by the votary at the end of his life. It is prescribed both for the ascetics and householders. According to the Jain text, Puruṣarthasiddhyupaya:

The man who incessantly observes all the supplementary vows and sallekhana (together, these are called seals) for the sake of safeguarding his vows (vratas), gets fervently garlanded (a gesture to indicate her choice for a husband) by the maiden called 'liberation'.

— Puruṣarthasiddhyupaya

The five 'lesser vows' of anuvrata consist of the five greater vows but with less restrictions to incorporate the duties of a householder, i.e. a layperson with a home, he or she has responsibilities to the family, community and society that a Jain monk does not have. These minor vows have the following incorporated into ethical conduct:

1. Take account of the responsibilities of a householder.
2. Are often limited in time.
3. Are often limited in scope.

Guna Vratas

1. Digvrata- restriction on movement with regard to directions. Transgressions: Exceeding the limits set in the directions, namely upwards, downwards and horizontally, enlarging the boundaries in the accepted directions, and forgetting the boundaries set, are the five transgressions of the minor vow of direction.

2. Bhogopabhogaparimana- vow of limiting consumable and non-consumable things. Transgressions: Victuals containing (one-sensed) organisms, placed near organisms, mixed with organisms, stimulants, and ill-cooked food.

3. Anartha-dandaviramana- refraining from harmful occupations and activities (purposeless sins). Transgressions: Vulgar jokes, vulgar jokes accompanied by gesticulation, garrulity, unthinkingly indulging in too much action, keeping too many consumable and non-consumable objects.

Siksa Vratas

1. Samayika- vow to meditate and concentrate periodically. Transgressions: Misdirected three-fold activity, lack of earnestness, and fluctuation of thought.

2. Desavrata- limiting movement to certain places for a fixed period of time. Transgressions: Sending for something outside the country of one's resolve, commanding someone there to do this, indicating one's intentions by sounds, by showing oneself and by throwing clod, etc.

3. Prosadhopavasa- Fasting at regular intervals. Transgressions: Excreting, handling sandalwood paste, flowers mats and, and spreading mats and garments without inspecting and cleaning the place and the materials, lack of earnestness, and lack of concentration.

4. Atihti samvibhag- Vow of offering food to the ascetic and needy people. Transgressions: Placing the food on things with organisms such as green leaves, covering it with such things, food of another host, envy and untimely food

Sallekhana

Sallekhana, also known as samlehna, santhara, samadhi-marana or sanyasana-marana, is a supplementary vow to the ethical code of conduct of Jainism. It is the religious practice of voluntarily fasting to death by gradually reducing the intake of food and liquids. It is viewed in Jainism as the thinning of human passions and the body, and another means of destroying rebirth-influencing karma by withdrawing all physical and mental activities. It is not considered as a suicide by Jain scholars because it is not an act of passion, nor does it deploy poisons or weapons. After the sallekhana vow, the ritual preparation and practice can extend into years. Sallekhana is a vow available to both for Jain ascetics and householders. Historic evidence such as nishidhi engravings suggest sallekhana was observed by both men and women, including queens, in Jain history. However, in the modern era, death through sallekhana has been a relatively uncommon event.

Food Law and Fasting: There are no food laws in Jainism, however the practice of non-violence towards all living beings has led to Jain culture being vegetarian [This applies also for many Hindus and Buddhists and it may be interesting to find out what its origin is.]. Devout Jains practice lacto-vegetarianism, meaning that they eat no eggs, but accept dairy products if there is no violence against animals during their production. Veganism is encouraged if there are concerns about animal welfare. Jain monks, nuns and some followers avoid root vegetables such as potatoes, onions, and garlic because tiny organisms are injured when the plant is pulled up, and because a bulb or tuber's ability to sprout is seen as characteristic of a higher living being. Jain monks and advanced laypeople avoid eating after sunset, observing a vow of ratri-bhojana-tyaga-vrata. Monks observe a stricter vow by eating only once a day.

Jains fast particularly during festivals. This practice is called upavasa, tapasya or vrata, and may be practiced according to one's ability. Digambaras fast for Dasa-laksana-parvan, eating only one or two meals per day, drinking only boiled water for ten days, or fasting completely on the first and last days of the festival, mimicking the practices of a Jain mendicant for the period. Svetambara Jains do similarly in the eight day paryusana with samvatsari-pratikramana. The practice is believed to remove karma from one's soul and provides merit (punya). A "one day" fast lasts about 36 hours, starting at sunset before the day of the fast and ending 48 minutes after sunrise the day after. Among laypeople, fasting is more commonly observed by women, as it shows her piety and religious purity, gains merit earning and helps ensure future well-being for her family. Some religious fasts are observed in a social and supportive female group. Long fasts are celebrated by friends and families with special ceremonies.

God: Jainism is a transtheistic religion, holding that the universe was not created, and will exist forever. It is believed to be independent, having no creator, governor, judge, or destroyer. In this, it is unlike the Abrahamic religions, but similar to Buddhism. However, Jainism believes in the world of heavenly and hell beings who are born, die and reborn like earthly beings. Jain texts maintain that souls who live happily in the body of a god do so because of their positive karma. It is further stated that they possess a more transcendent knowledge about material things and can anticipate events in the human realms. However, once their past karmic merit is exhausted, it is explained that their souls are reborn again as humans, animals or other beings. In Jainism, perfect souls with a body are called arihant (victors) and perfect souls without a body are called Siddhas (liberated souls).

Salvation (also called Liberation): According to Jainism, purification of soul and liberation can be achieved through the path of three jewels: Samyak darsana (Correct View), meaning faith, acceptance of the truth of soul (jīva); Samyak gyana (Correct Knowledge), meaning undoubting knowledge of the tattvas; and Samyak charitra (Correct Conduct), meaning behaviour consistent with the Five vows. Jain texts often add samyak tap (Correct Asceticism) as a fourth jewel, emphasizing belief in ascetic practices as the means to liberation (moksha). The four jewels are called moksha marg (the path of liberation).

Scriptures: Jain canonical scriptures are called Agamas. They are believed to have been verbally transmitted, much like the ancient Buddhist and Hindu texts, and to have originated from the sermons of the tirthankaras, whereupon the Ganadharas (chief disciples) transmitted them as Shrut Jnana (heard knowledge). The spoken scriptural language is believed to be Ardhamagadhi by the Svetambara Jains, and a form of sonic resonance by the Digambara Jains.

The Svetambaras believe that they have preserved 45 of the 50 original Jain scriptures (having lost an Anga text and four Purva texts), while the Digambaras believe that all were lost, and that Acharya Bhutabali was the last ascetic who had partial knowledge of the original canon. According to them, Digambara Acharyas recreated the oldest-known Digambara Jain texts, including the four anuyoga. The Digambara texts partially agree with older Svetambara texts, but there are also gross differences between the texts of the two major Jain traditions. The Digambaras created a secondary canon between 600 and 900 AD, compiling it into four groups or Vedas: history, cosmography, philosophy and ethics.

The most popular and influential texts of Jainism have been its non-canonical literature. Of these, the Kalpa Sutras are particularly popular among Svetambaras, which they attribute to Bhadrabahu (c.300 BC). This ancient scholar is revered in the Digambara tradition, and they believe he led their migration into the ancient south Karnataka region and created their tradition. Svetambaras believe instead that Bhadrabahu moved to Nepal. Both traditions consider his Nirvyuktis and Samhitas important. The earliest surviving Sanskrit text by Umaswati, the Tattvarthasutra is considered authoritative by all traditions of Jainism. In the Digambara tradition, the texts written by Kundakunda are highly revered and have been historically influential. Other important Jain texts include: Samayasara, Ratnakaranda sravakacara, and Niyamasara.

Jains under Mohammedan Persecution: Jainism has faced persecution during and after the Mohammedan conquests on the Indian subcontinent. Islamic rulers, such as Mahmud Ghazni (1001), Mohammad Ghori (1175) and Ala-ud-din Muhammad Shah Khalji (1298) further oppressed the Jain community. Muslims vandalised idols and destroyed temples or converted them into mosques because total submission of non-Muslims is the most important doctrine of Islam; the word Islam itself means submission. They also burned Jain books and killed Jains because anyone who does not belong to the "People of the Book" [Jews, Christians, Zoroastrians] is to put to death when they do not immediately submit to Islam, according to Islamic scripture. There were significant exceptions, such as Emperor Akbar (1542–1605) whose legendary religious tolerance, out of respect for Jains, ordered the release of caged birds and banned the killing of animals on the Jain festival of Paryusan. After Akbar, Jains faced an intense period of Muslim persecution in the 17th century. The Jain community were the traditional bankers and financiers, and this significantly impacted the Muslim rulers. However, they rarely were a part of the political power during the Islamic rule period of the Indian subcontinent.

Colonial era reports and Christian missions variously viewed Jainism as a sect of Hinduism, a sect of Buddhism, or a distinct religion. Christian missionaries were frustrated at Jain people without pagan creator gods refusing to convert to Christianity, while colonial era Jain scholars such as Champat Rai Jain defended Jainism against criticism and misrepresentation by Christian activists. Missionaries of Christianity and Islam considered Jain traditions idolatrous and superstitious. These criticisms, states John E. Cort, were flawed and ignored similar practices within sects of Christianity.)

THE AKARANGA SUTRA

From: Jaina Sutras, Part 1,
Sacred Books of the East, Vol. 22
Editor: F. Max Müller, Oxford
Original Language: Prakrit
Translation: Hermann Jacobi, 1884

Estimated Range of Dating, Book 1: 500 B.C. - 300 B.C.
Estimated Range of Dating, Book 2: 200 B.C. - 50 AD.

(The Acharanga Sutra or Acaranga Sutra (First Book c. 5th–4th century BC; Second Book c. 2nd–1st century BC) is the first of the twelve Angas, part of the agamas (religious texts) which were compiled based on the teachings of Mahavira.

The existing text of the Acharanga Sutra which is used by the Svetambara sect of Jainism was recompiled and edited by KshamaShraman Devardhigani, who headed the council held at Valabhi c. 454 AD. The Digambaras do not recognise the available text, and regard the original text as having been lost in its original form. The Digambara text, Mulachara is said to be derived from the original Acharanga and discusses the conduct of a Digambara monk.

The Acharanga Sutra is the oldest agama, from a linguistic point of view, written in Ardhamagadhi Prakrit. The Sutra contains two books, or Srutaskandhas. The first book is the older part, to which other treatises were later added. It describes the conduct and behavior of ascetic life: the mode of asking for food, bowl, clothes, conduct while walking and speaking and regulation of possessions by ascetics. It also describes the penance of Mahavira, the Great Hero.

The second book is divided into four sections called Kulas. There were originally five Kulas, but the fifth, the Nisihiyagghana, is now reckoned as a separate work. The first and second parts lay down rules for conduct of ascetics.

The Acaranga has been described in details in Samavayanga and the Nandī. According to them, the main studies of the Acaranga are 'Acarā gocara' i.e. code of conduct, vinaya (humility), vainayika (fruit of humility), sthana (differenc postures), gamana (travelling), cankramana (movements), bhojana-matra (quantity of food intake), svadhyaya (spiritual studies), bhāṣa samiti (principles of speech), gupti (restraint or of mind, speech and body), sayya (place of stay), upadhī (belongings) etc. The Acaranga recommends purity of all these aspects. Acharya Umasvati has briefly dealt with the subject matter of the nine chapters of the Acaranga. They are:

1. Śaḍjīvanikaya yatana – self-restraint in respect of the six kinds of living beings.
2. Abandoning of ego over worldly things.
3. Conquest over trials and tribulations of life.
4. Unshakable perception about righteousness.
5. Detachment to decay worldly affairs.
6. The process to ward or destroy the karmas.
7. Service towards elders.
8. Penance and austerities.
9. Renunciation of attachment to sexual objects)

AKARANGA SUTRA BOOK 1

AKARANGA BOOK 1 1ST LECTURE, CALLED KNOWLEDGE OF THE WEAPON.

FIRST LESSON

1 O long-lived (Gambusvamin)! I (Sudharman) have heard the following discourse from the venerable (Mahavira):

2 Here many do not remember whether they have descended in an eastern direction (when they were born in this world), or in a southern, or in a western, or in a northern direction, or in the direction from above, or in the direction from below, or in a direction intermediate (between the cardinal points), or in a direction intermediate between these (and the cardinal points).

3 Similarly, some do not know whether their soul is born again and again or not; nor what they were formerly, nor what they will become after having died and left this world.

4 Now this is what one should know, either by one's own knowledge or through the instruction of the highest (i.e. a Tirthakara), or having heard it from others: that he descended in an eastern direction, or in any other direction (particularised above). Similarly, some know that their soul is born again and again, that it arrives in this or that direction, whatever direction that may be.

5 He believes in soul, believes in the world, believes in reward, believes in action (acknowledged to be our own doing in such judgements as these): 'I did it; 'I shall cause another to do it; 'I shall allow another to do it.' In the world, these are all the causes of sin, which must be comprehended and renounced.

6 A man that does not comprehend and renounce the causes of sin, descends in a cardinal or intermediate direction, wanders to all cardinal or intermediate directions, is born again and again in manifold births, experiences all painful feelings.

7 About this the Revered One has taught the truth (comprehension and renunciation). For the sake of the splendour, honour, and glory of this life, for the sake of birth, death, and final liberation, for the removal of pain, all these causes of sin are at work, which are to be comprehended and renounced in this world. He who, in the world, comprehends and renounces these causes of sin, is called a reward-knowing sage (muni). Thus I say.

SECOND LESSON.

[After the chief tenets of Jainism with regard to soul and actions have briefly been stated in the first lesson, the six remaining lessons of the first lecture treat of the actions which injure the six classes of lives or souls. The Jainas seem to have arrived at their concept of soul, not through the search after the Self, the self-existing unchangeable principle in the ever-changing world of phenomena, but through the perception of life. For the most general Jaina term for soul is life (giva), which is identical with self (aya, atman). There are numberless lives or souls, not only embodied in animals, men, gods, hell-beings (tasa, trasa), and plants (vanassai, vanaspati), but also in the four elements—earth, water, fire, wind. Earth, etc., regarded as the abode of lives is called earth-body, etc. These bodies are only perceptible when an infinite number of them is united in one place. The earth-lives, etc., possess only one organ, that of feeling; they have undeveloped (avyakta)intellect and feelings (vedana), but no limbs, etc. The doctrines about these elementary lives are laid down in Bhadrabahu's Nirvyukti of our Sutra, and are commented upon in Silanka's great commentary of it. They are very abstruse, and deal in the most minute distinctions, which baffle our comprehension.]

1 The (living) world is afflicted, miserable, difficult to instruct, and without discrimination. In this world full of pain, suffering by their different acts, see the benighted ones cause great pain.

2 See! there are beings individually embodied (in earth; not one all-soul). See! there are men who control themselves, (whilst others only) pretend to be houseless (i.e. monks, such as the Bauddhas, whose conduct differs not from that of householders), because one destroys this (earth-body) by bad and injurious doings, and many other beings, besides, which he hurts by means of earth, through his doing acts relating to earth.

3 About this the Revered One has taught the truth: for the sake of the splendour, honour, and glory of this life, for the sake of birth, death, and final liberation, for the removal of pain, man acts sinfully towards earth, or causes others to act so, or allows others to act so. This deprives him of happiness and perfect wisdom. About this he is informed when he has understood or heard, either from the Revered One or from the monks, the faith to be coveted.

4 There are some who, of a truth, know this (i.e. injuring) to be the bondage, the delusion, the death, the hell. For this I a man is longing when he destroys this (earth-body) by bad, injurious doings, and many other beings, besides, which he hurts by means of earth, through his doing acts relating to earth. Thus I say.

5 As somebody may cut or strike a blind man (who cannot see the wound), as somebody may cut or strike the foot, the ankle, the knee, the thigh, the hip, the navel, the belly, the flank, the back, the bosom, the heart, the breast, the neck, the arm, the finger, the nail, the eye, the brow, the forehead, the head, as some kill (openly), as some extirpate (secretly), (thus the earth-bodies are cut, struck, and killed though their feeling is not manifest).

6 He who injures these (earth-bodies) does not comprehend and renounce the sinful acts; he who does not injure these, comprehends and renounces the sinful acts. Knowing them, a wise man should not act sinfully towards earth, nor cause others to act so, nor allow others to act so. He who knows these causes of sin relating to earth, is called a reward-knowing sage. Thus I say.

HIRD LESSON.

[The water-lives which are treated of in this lesson are, as is the case with all elementary lives, divided into three classes: the sentient, the senseless, and the mixed. Only that water which is the abode of senseless water-lives may be used. Therefore water is to be strained before use, because the senseless lives only are believed to remain in water after that process.]

1 (Thus I say): He who acts rightly, who does pious work, who practises no deceit, is called houseless.

2 One should, conquering the world, persevere in that (vigour of) faith which one had on the entrance in the order; the heroes (of faith), humbly bent, (should retain their belief in) the illustrious road (to final liberation) and in the world (of water-bodies); having rightly comprehended them through the instruction (of Mahavira), (they should retain) that which causes no danger (i.e. self-control). Thus I say.

3 A man should not (himself) deny the world (of water-bodies), nor should he deny the self. He who denies the world (of water-bodies), denies the self; and he who denies the self, denies the world (of water-bodies).

4 See! there are men who control themselves; others pretend only to be houseless; for one destroys this (water-body) by bad, injurious doings, and many other beings, besides, which he hurts by means of water, through his doing acts relating to water.

5 About this the Revered One has taught the truth: for the sake of the splendour, honour, and glory of this life, for the sake of birth, death, and final liberation, for the removal of pain, man acts sinfully towards water, or causes others to act so, or allows others to act so.

6 This deprives him of happiness and perfect wisdom. About this he is informed when he has understood and heard from the Revered One, or from the monks, the faith to be coveted. There are some who, of a truth, know this (i.e. injuring) to be the bondage, the delusion, the death, the hell. For this a man is longing when he destroys this (water-body) by bad and injurious doings, and many other beings, besides, which he hurts by means of water, through his doing acts relating to water. Thus I say.

7 There are beings living in water, many lives; of a truth, to the monks water has been declared to be living matter. See! considering the injuries (done to water-bodies), those acts (which are injuries, but must be done before the use of water, eg. straining) have been distinctly declared. Moreover he (who uses water which is not strained) takes away what has not been given (i.e. the bodies of water-lives). (A Bauddha will object): 'We have permission, we have permission to drink it, or (to take it) for toilet purposes.' Thus they destroy by various injuries (the water-bodies). But in this their doctrine is of no authority. He who injures these (water-bodies) does not comprehend and renounce the sinful acts; he who does not injure these, comprehends and renounces the sinful acts.

8 Knowing them, a wise man should not act sinfully towards water, nor cause others to act so, nor allow others to act so. He who knows these causes of sin relating to water, is called a reward-knowing sage. Thus I say.

FOURTH LESSON.

1 (Thus I say): A man should not, of his own accord, deny the world (of fire-bodies), nor should he deny the self. He who denies the world (of fire-bodies), denies the self; and he who denies the self, denies the world (of fire-bodies).

2 He who knows that (viz. fire) through which injury is done to the long-living bodies (i.e. plants) [The fire-bodies live not longer than three days.], knows also that which does no injury (i.e. control); and he who knows that which does no injury, knows also that through which no injury is done to the long-living bodies.

3 This has been seen by the heroes (of faith) who conquered ignorance; for they control themselves, always exert themselves, always mind their duty. He who is unmindful of duty, and desiring of the qualities (i.e. of the pleasure and profit which may be derived from the elements) is called the torment (of living beings). Knowing this, a wise man (resolves): 'Now (I shall do) no more what I used to do wantonly before.'

4 See! there are men who control themselves; others pretend only to be houseless; for one destroys this (fire-body) by bad and injurious doings, and many other beings, besides, which he hurts by means of fire, through his doing acts relating to fire. About this the Revered One has taught the truth: for the sake of the splendour, honour, and glory of this life, for the sake of birth, death, and final liberation, for the removal of pain, man acts sinfully towards fire, or causes others to act so, or allows others to act so.

5 This deprives him of happiness and perfect wisdom. About this he is informed when he has understood, or heard from the Revered One or from the monks, the faith to be coveted. There are some who, of a truth, know this (i.e. injuring) to be the bondage, the delusion, the death, the hell. For this a man is longing, when he destroys this (fire-body) by bad and injurious doings, and many other beings, besides, which he hurts by means of fire, through his doing acts relating to fire. Thus I say.

6 There are beings living in the earth, living in grass, living on leaves, living in wood, living in cowering, living in dust-heaps, jumping beings which coming near (fire) fall into it. Some, certainly, touched by fire, shrivel up; those which shrivel up there, lose their sense there; those which lose their sense there, die there.

7 He who injures these (fire-bodies) does not comprehend and renounce the sinful acts; he who does not injure these, comprehends and renounces the sinful acts. Knowing them, a wise man should not act sinfully towards fire, nor cause others to act so, nor allow others to act so. He who knows the causes of sin relating to fire, is called a reward-knowing sage. Thus I say.

FIFTH LESSON.

[The discussion of the 'wind-bodies,' which should follow that of the fire-bodies, is postponed for two lessons in which the vegetable and animal world is treated of. The reason for this interruption of the line of exposition is, as the commentators state, that the nature of wind, because of its invisibility, is open to doubts, whilst plants and animals are admitted by all to be living beings, and are, therefore, the best support of the hylozoistical theory. That wind was not readily admitted by the ancient Indians to be a peculiar substance may still be recognised in the philosophical Sutras of the Brahmins. For there it was thought necessary to discuss at length the proofs for the existence of a peculiar substance, wind. It should be remarked that wind was never identified with air, and that the Jainas had not yet separated air from space.]

1 'I shall not do (acts relating to plants) after having entered the order, having recognised (the truth about these acts), and having conceived that which is free from danger (i.e. control).'

2 He who does no acts (relating to plants), has ceased from works; he who has ceased from them is called 'houseless.' Quality is the whirlpool (avatta = samsara), and the whirlpool is quality. Looking up, down, aside, eastward, he sees colours, hearing he hears sounds; longing upwards, down, aside, eastward, he becomes attached to colours and sounds.

3 That is called the world; not guarded against it, not obeying the law (of the Tirthakaras), relishing the qualities, conducting himself wrongly, he will wantonly live in a house (i.e. belong to the world).

4 See! there are men who control themselves; others pretend only to be houseless; for one destroys this (body of a plant) by bad and injurious doings, and many other beings, besides, which he hurts by means of plants, through his doing acts relating to plants.

5 About this the Revered One has taught the truth: for the sake of the splendour, honour, and glory of this life, for the sake of birth, death, and final liberation, for the removal of pain, man acts sinfully towards plants, or causes others to act so, or allows others to act so. This deprives him of happiness and perfect wisdom. About this he is informed when he has understood, or heard from the Revered One or from the monks, the faith to be coveted. There are some who, of a truth, know this (i.e. injuring) to be the bondage, the delusion, the death, the hell. For this a man is longing when he destroys this (body of a plant) by bad and injurious doings, and many other beings, besides, which he hurts by means of plants, through his doing acts relating to plants. Thus I say.

6 As the nature of this (i.e. men) is to be born and to grow old, so is the nature of that (i.e. plants) to be born and to grow old; as this has reason, so that has reason; as this falls sick when cut, so that falls sick when cut; as this needs food, so that needs food; as this will decay, so that will decay; as this is not eternal, so that is not eternal; as this takes increment, so that takes increment; as this is changing, so that is changing.

7 He who injures these (plants) does not comprehend and renounce the sinful acts; he who does not injure these, comprehends and renounces the sinful acts. Knowing them, a wise man should not act sinfully towards plants, nor cause others to act so, nor allow others to act so. He who knows these causes of sin relating to plants, is called a reward-knowing sage. Thus I say.

SIXTH LESSON.

1 Thus I say: There are beings called the animate, viz. those who are produced 1st. from eggs (birds, etc.), 2nd. from a fetus (as elephants, etc.), 3rd. from a fetus with an enveloping membrane (as cows, buffaloes, etc.), 4th. from fluids (as worms, etc.), 5th. from sweat (as bugs, lice, etc.), 6th. by coagulation (as locusts, ants, etc.), 7th. from sprouts (as butterflies, wagtails, etc.), 8th. by regeneration (men, gods, hell-beings).

2 This is called the Samsara for the slow, for the ignorant. Having well considered it, having well looked at it, I say thus: all beings, those with two, three, four senses, plants, those with five senses, and the rest of creation, (experience) individually pleasure or displeasure, pain, great terror, and unhappiness. Beings are filled with alarm from all directions and in all directions. See! there the benighted ones cause great pain. See! there are beings individually embodied.

3 See! there are men who control themselves; others pretend only to be houseless, for one destroys this (body of an animal) by bad and injurious doings, and many other beings, besides, which he hurts by means of animals, through his doing acts relating to animals.

4 About this the Revered One has taught the truth: for the sake of the splendour, honour, and glory of this life, for the sake of birth, death, and final liberation, for the removal of pain, man acts sinfully towards animals, or causes others to act so, or allows others to act so. This deprives him of happiness and perfect wisdom. About this he is informed, when he has understood, or heard from the Revered One or from the monks, the faith to be coveted. There are some who, of a truth, know this (i.e. injuring) to be the bondage, the delusion, the death, the hell. For this a man is longing, when he injures this (body of an animal) by bad and injurious doings, and many other beings, besides, which he hurts by means of animals, through acts relating to animals. Thus I say.

5 Some slay (animals) for sacrificial purposes, some kill (animals) for the sake of their skin, some kill (them) for the sake of their flesh, some kill them for the sake of their blood; thus for the sake of their heart, their bile, the feathers of their tail, their tail, their big or small horns, their teeth, their tusks, their nails, their sinews, their bones; with a purpose or without a purpose. Some kill animals because they have been wounded by them, or are wounded, or will be wounded.

6 He who injures these (animals) does not comprehend and renounce the sinful acts; he who does not injure these, comprehends and renounces the sinful acts. Knowing them, a wise man should not act sinfully towards animals, nor cause others to act so, nor allow others to act so. He who knows these causes of sin relating to animals, is called a reward-knowing sage. Thus I say.

SEVENTH LESSON.

1 He who is averse from (all actions relating to) wind, knows affliction. Knowing what is bad, he who knows it with regard to himself, knows it with regard to (the world) outside; and he who knows it with regard to (the world) outside, knows it with regard to himself: this reciprocity (between himself and) others (one should mind). Those who are appeased, who are free from passion, do not desire to live.

2 See! there are men who control themselves; others pretend only to be houseless, for one destroys this (wind-body) by bad and injurious doings, and many other beings, besides, which he hurts by means of wind, through his doing acts relating to wind.

3 About this the Revered One has taught the truth: for the sake of the splendour, honour, and glory of this life, for the sake of birth, death, and final liberation, for the removal of pain, man acts sinfully towards wind, or causes others to act so, or allows others to act so. This deprives him of happiness and perfect wisdom. About this he is informed when he has understood, or heard from the Revered One or from the monks, the faith to be coveted. There are some who, of a truth, know this to be the bondage, the delusion, the death, the hell. For this a man is longing when he destroys this (wind-body) by bad and injurious acts, and many other beings, besides, which he hurts by means of wind, through his doing acts relating to wind. Thus I say.

4 There are jumping beings which, coming near wind, fall into it. Some, certainly, touched by wind, shrivel up; those which shrivel up there, lose their sense there; those which lose their sense there, die there.

5 He who injures these (wind-bodies) does not comprehend and renounce the sinful acts; he who does not injure these, comprehends and renounces the sinful acts. Knowing them, a wise man should not act sinfully towards wind, nor cause others to act so, nor allow others to act so. He who knows these causes of sin relating to wind, is called a reward-knowing sage. Thus I say.

6 Be aware that about this (wind-body) too those are involved in sin who delight not in the right conduct, and, though doing acts, talk about religious discipline, who conducting themselves according to their own will, pursuing sensual pleasures, and engaging in acts, are addicted to worldliness. He who has the true knowledge about all things, will commit no sinful act, nor cause others to do so, etc.

7 Knowing them, a wise man should not act sinfully towards the aggregate of six (kinds of) lives, nor cause others to act so, nor allow others to act so. He who knows these causes of sin relating to the aggregate of the six (kinds of) lives, is called a reward-knowing sage. Thus I say.

End of the First Lecture, called Knowledge of the Weapon.

AKARANGA BOOK 1 2ND LECTURE, CALLED CONQUEST OF THE WORLD.

FIRST LESSON.

1 Quality is the seat of the root, and the seat of the root is quality. He who longs for the qualities, is overcome by great pain, and he is careless. (For he thinks) I have to provide for a mother, for a father, for a sister, for a wife, for sons, for daughters, for a daughter-in-law, for my friends, for near and remote relations, for my acquaintances, for different kinds of property, profit, meals, and clothes. Longing for these objects, people are careless, suffer day and night, work in the right and the wrong time, desire wealth and treasures, commit injuries and violent acts, direct the mind, again and again, upon these injurious doings (described in the preceding lecture).

2 (Doing so), the life of some mortals (which by destiny would have been long) is shortened. For when with the deterioration of the perceptions of the ear, eye, organs of smelling, tasting, touching, a man becomes aware of the decline of life, they after a time produce dotage. Or his kinsmen with whom he lives together will, after a time, first grumble at him, and he will afterwards grumble at them. They cannot help thee or protect thee, nor canst thou help them or protect them.

3 He is not fit for hilarity, playing, pleasure, show. Therefore, ah! proceeding to pilgrimage, and thinking that the present moment is favourable (for such intentions I, i.e. in the qualities of the external things lies the primary cause of the Samsara, viz. sin; the qualities produce sin, and sinfulness makes us apt to enjoy the qualities.), he should be steadfast and not, even for an hour, carelessly conduct himself. His youth, his age, his life fade away. A man who carelessly conducts himself; who killing, cutting, striking, destroying, chasing away, frightening (living beings) resolves to do what has not been done (by any one)—him his relations with whom he lived together, will first cherish, and he will afterwards cherish them. But they cannot help thee or protect thee, nor canst thou help them or protect them.

4 Or he heaps up treasures for the benefit of some spendthrifts, by pinching himself. Then, after a time, he falls in sickness; those with whom he lives together will first leave him, and he will afterwards leave them. They cannot help thee or protect thee, nor canst thou help them or protect them.

5 Knowing pain and pleasure in all their variety, and seeing his life not yet decline, a wise man should know that to be the proper moment (for entering a religious life); while the perceptions of his ear, eye, organs of smelling, tasting, touching are not yet deteriorated, while all these perceptions are not yet deteriorated, man should prosecute the real end of his soul. Thus I say.

SECOND LESSON.

1 A wise man should remove any aversion (to control); he will be liberated in the proper time. Some, following wrong instruction, turn away (from control). They are dull, wrapped in delusion. While they imitate the life of monks, (saying), 'We shall be free from attachment,' they enjoy the pleasures that offer themselves. Through wrong instruction (the would-be) sages trouble themselves (for pleasures); thus they sink deeper and deeper in delusion, (and cannot get) to this, nor to the opposite shore. Those who are freed (from attachment to the world and its pleasures), reach the opposite shore. Subduing desire by desirelessness, he does not enjoy the pleasures that offer themselves. Desireless, giving up the world, and ceasing to act, he knows, and sees, and has no wishes because of his discernment; he is called houseless.

2 (But on the contrary) he suffers day and night, works in the right and the wrong time, desires wealth and treasures, commits injuries and violent acts, again and again directs his mind upon these injurious doings; for his own sake, to support or to be supported by his relations, friends, the ancestors, gods, the king, thieves, guests, paupers, Sramanas.

3 Thus violence is done by these various acts, deliberately, out of fear, because they think 'it is for the expiation of sins [The sacrificial rites of the Brahmanas are meant.], or for some other hope. Knowing this, a wise man should neither himself commit violence by such acts, nor order others to commit violence by such acts, nor consent to the violence done by somebody else.

This road (to happiness) has been declared by the noble ones, that a clever man should not be defiled (by sin). Thus I say.

THIRD LESSON.

1 Frequently (I have been born) in a high family, frequently in a low one; I am not mean, nor noble, nor do I desire (social preferment). Thus reflecting, who would brag about his family or about his glory, or for what should he long?

2 Therefore a wise man should neither be glad nor angry (about his lot): thou shouldst know and consider the happiness of living creatures. Carefully conducting himself, he should mind this: blindness, deafness, dumbness, one-eyedness, hunchbackedness I, blackness, variety of colour (he will always experience); because of his carelessness he is born in many births, he experiences various feelings.

3 Not enlightened (about the cause of these ills) he is afflicted (by them), always turns round (in the whirl of) birth and death. Life is dear to many who own fields and houses. Having acquired dyed and coloured (clothes), jewels, earrings, gold, and women, they become attached to these things. And a fool who longs for life, and worldly-minded, laments that (for these worldly goods) penance, self-restraint, and control do not avail, will ignorantly come to grief.

4 Those who are of a steady conduct do not desire this (wealth). Knowing birth and death, one should firmly walk the path (i.e. right conduct), (and not wait for old age to commence a religious life).

For there is nothing inaccessible for death. All beings are fond of life, like pleasure, hate pain, shun destruction, like life, long to live. To all life is dear.

5 Having acquired it (i.e. wealth), employing bipeds and quadrupeds, gathering riches in the three ways, whatever his portion will be, small or great, he will desire to enjoy it. Then at one time, his manifold savings are a large treasure. Then at another time, his heirs divide it, or those who are without a living steal it, or the king takes it away, or it is ruined in some way or other, or it is consumed by the conflagration of the house. Thus a fool doing cruel deeds which benefit another, will ignorantly come thereby to grief.

6 This certainly has been declared by the sage. They do not cross the flood, nor can they cross it; they do not go to the next shore, nor can they go to it; they do not go to the opposite shore, nor can they go to it. And though hearing the doctrine, he does not stand in the right place; but the clever one who adopts the true (faith), stands in the right place (i.e. control). He who sees by himself, needs no instruction. But the miserable, afflicted fool who delights in pleasures, and whose miseries do not cease, is turned round in the whirl of pains. Thus I say.

FOURTH LESSON.

1 Then, after a time, he falls in sickness: those with whom he lives together, first grumble at him, and he afterwards grumbles at them. But they cannot help thee or protect thee, nor canst thou help them or protect them.

2 Knowing pleasure and pain separately [The meaning seems to be: If people do not know that pleasure and pain are the result of their own works, etc.], they trouble themselves about the enjoyment (of the external objects). For some men in this world have (such a character that) they will desire to enjoy their portion, whether it be large or small, in the three ways: Then, at one time, it will be sufficiently large, with many resources. Then, at another time, his heirs divide it, or those who have no living steal it, or the king takes it away, or it is ruined in some way or other, or it is consumed by the conflagration of the house. Thus a fool, doing cruel acts, comes ignorantly to grief.

3 Wisely reject hope and desire, and extracting that thorn (i.e. pleasure) thou (shouldst act rightly). People who are enveloped by delusion do not understand this: he who (gathers wealth) will, perhaps, not have the benefit of it. The world is greatly troubled by women. They (viz. men) forsooth say, 'These are the vessels (of happiness).' But this leads them to pain, to delusion, to death, to hell, to birth as hell-beings or brute beasts. The fool never knows the law.

4 Thus spake the hero: 'Be careful against this great delusion; the clever one should have done with carelessness by considering death in tranquillity, and that, the nature of which is decay (viz. the body); these (pleasures), look! will not satisfy (thee). Therefore have done with them! Sage, look! this is the great danger, it should overcome none whomsoever. He is called a hero who is not vexed by (the hardships caused) by control. He should not be angry because the (householder) gives him little. If turned off, he should go. Thou shouldst conform to the conduct of the sages.' Thus I say.

FIFTH LESSON.

1 That for this (viz. pleasure) the wants of the world should be supplied by bad injurious doings: for one's own sons, daughters, daughters-in-law, kinsmen, nurses, kings, male and female slaves, male and female servants, for the sake of hospitality, of supper and breakfast, the accumulation of wealth is effected.

2 (This is) here for the enjoyment of some men. (But a wise man) exerting himself, houseless, noble, of noble intellect, of noble perception recognises the proper moment (for all actions). He should not accept, nor cause others to accept, or permit them to accept anything unclean I [Amagandha, unclean, is also a Buddhist term; see Rhys Davids' Buddhism, pp. rat, 181.]. Free from uncleanness he should wander about.

3 Being not seen in buying and selling, he should not buy, nor cause others to buy, nor consent to the buying of others. This mendicant who knows the time, the strength (of himself), the measure (of all things), the practice, the occasion (for begging, etc.), the conduct, the religious precepts, the true condition (of the donor or hearer), who disowns all things not requisite for religious purposes, who is under no obligations, he proceeds securely (on the road to final liberation) after having cut off both (love and hate). Clothes, alms-bowls, blankets, brooms, property, straw mats, with regard to these things he should know (what is unclean). When he receives food he should know the quantity required. This has been declared by the Reverend One: he should not rejoice in the receipt of a gift, nor be sorry when he gets nothing. Having got much, one should not store it away; one should abstain from things not requisite for religious purposes. With a mind different (from that of common people) a seer abandons (these things). This is the road taught by the noble ones, well acquainted with which one should not be defiled (by sin). Thus I say.

4 Pleasures are difficult to reject, life is difficult to prolong. That man, certainly, who loves pleasures, is afflicted (by their loss), is sorry in his heart, leaves his usual ways, is troubled, suffers pain. The farsighted one who knows the world, knows its inferior part (hell), its upper part (heaven), its side-long part (the state of brute beasts). He who knows the relation (of human affairs, viz.) that he who desires for the world is always turned round (in the samsara), is called among mortals a hero, who liberates those who are fettered.

5 As the interior (of the body is loathsome), so is the exterior; as the exterior, so is the interior. In the interior of the body he perceives the four interior humours, he observes their several courses (or eruptions). A well-informed man knowing (and renouncing the body and pleasures), should not eat (his saliva); he should not oppose himself to the (current of knowledge). Certainly, that man who engages in worldly affairs, who practises many tricks, who is bewildered by his own doings, acts again and again on that desire which increases his unrighteousness. Hence the above has been said for the increase of this (life). (A man addicted to pleasures) acts as if immortal, and puts great faith (in pleasure); but when he perceives that this body sustains pains, he cries in his ignorance. Therefore keep in your mind what I say.

6 A heretic I professes to cure (the love of pleasure), while he kills, cuts, strikes, destroys, chases away, resolves to do what has not been done before. To whom he applies the cure—enough of that fool's affection; or he who has (the cure) applied, is a fool. This does not apply to the houseless. Thus I say.

SIXTH LESSON.

1 He who perfectly understands (what has been said in the preceding lesson) and follows the (faith) to be coveted, should therefore do no sinful act, nor cause others to do one. Perchance he meditates a sin (by an act against only one) (of the six aggregates of lives); but he will be guilty (of sin against) every one of the six, Desiring happiness and bewailing much, he comes ignorantly to grief through his own misfortune.

2 Through his own carelessness every one produces that phase of life in which the vital spirits are pained. Observing (the pain of mundane existence, one should) not (act) with violence. This is called the true knowledge (and renunciation). He who ceasing from acts relinquishes the idea of property, relinquishes property itself. That sage has seen the path (to final liberation) for whom there exists no property. Knowing this, a wise man, who knows the world and has cast off the idea of the world, should prudently conquer I the obstructions to righteousness. Thus I say.

3 The hero does not tolerate discontent.

The hero does not tolerate lust.

Because the hero is not careless,

The hero is not attached (to the objects of the senses).

Being indifferent against sounds (and the other) perceptions, detest the comfort of this life.

A sage adopting a life of wisdom, should treat his gross body roughly.

The heroes who have right intuition, use mean and rough food.

Such a man is said to have crossed the flood (of life), to be a sage, to have passed over (the samsara), to be liberated, to have ceased (from all activity). Thus I say.

4 A sage is called unfit who does not follow the law and fails in his office. (But on the contrary) he is praised as a hero, he overcomes the connection with the world, he is called the guide (or the right way). What has been declared to be here the unhappiness of mortals, of that unhappiness the clever ones propound the knowledge.

5 Thus understanding (and renouncing) acts, a man who recognises the truth, delights in nothing else; and he who delights only in the truth, recognises nothing else. As (the law) has been revealed for the full one, so for the empty one; as for the empty one, so for the full one. But he (to whom the faith is preached) will perhaps disrespectfully beat (the preacher). Yet know, there is no good in this (indiscriminate preaching). (But ascertain before) what sort of man he is, and whom he worships. He is called a hero who liberates the bound, above, below, and in the sideward directions. He always conforms to all knowledge (and renunciation); the hero is not polluted by the sin of killing. He is a wise man who perfectly knows the non-killing, who searches after the liberation of the bound. The clever one is neither bound nor liberated; he should do or leave undone (what the hero does or does not do); he should not do what (the hero) leaves undone: Knowing (and renouncing) murder of any kind and worldly ideas in all respects. He who sees himself, needs no instruction. But the miserable and afflicted fool who delights in pleasures and whose miseries do not cease, is turned round in the whirl of pains. Thus I say.

End of the Second Lecture, called Conquest of the World.

AKARANGA BOOK 1 3RD LECTURE, CALLED HOT AND COLD.

FIRST LESSON.

1 The unwise sleep, the sages always wake. Know, that in this world the (cause of) misery brings forth evil consequences! Knowing the course of the world, one should cease from violent acts. He who correctly possesses these (sensual perceptions), viz. sounds, and colours, and smells, and tastes, and touches,

2 who self-possessed, wise, just, chaste, with right comprehension understands the world, he is to be called a sage, one who knows the law, and righteous. He knows the connection of the whirl (of births) and the current (of sensation with love and hate). Not minding heat and cold, equanimous against pleasure and pain, the Nirgrantha does not feel the austerity of penance. Waking and free from hostility, a wise man, thou liberatest (thyself and others) from the miseries.

3 But a man always benighted, subject to old age and death, does not know the law. Seeing living beings suffering, earnestly enter a religious life. Considering this, O prudent one, look!

Knowing the misery that results from action, The deluded and careless one returns to life; Disregarding sounds and colours, upright, Avoiding Mara one is liberated from death.

4 Carefully abstaining from pleasures and ceasing from bad works he is a hero, guarding himself, who is grounded in knowledge [Regarding the evil-doer]. He who knows the violence done for the sake of special objects, knows what is free from violence [And renounces.]; he who knows what is free from violence, knows the violence done for special objects. For him who is without karman, there is no appellation. The condition of living beings arises from karman.

Examining karman and the root of karman, viz. killing, examining (it) and adopting its contrary, he is not seen by both ends. Knowing this, a wise man who knows the world and has cast off the idea of the world, should prudently conquer the obstructions to righteousness. Thus I say.

SECOND LESSON.

1 Look, Sir, at birth and old age here,

Examine and know the happiness of the living,

Thence the most learned, knowing (what is called) the highest good,

He who has right intuition, commits no sin.

2 Undo the bond with mortals here;

He who lives by sins, is subject to both,

Desirous of pleasures they heap up karman,

Influenced by it they are born again.

3 Killing (animals) he thinks good sport, and derives mirth from it:

Away with that fool's company, he increases his own unrighteousness.

4 Thence the most learned, knowing (what is called) the highest good,

Aware of the punishment, commits no sin;

Wisely avoid the top and the root!

Cutting them off, he knows himself free from karman.

1 That man will be liberated from death; he is a sage who sees the danger, knowing the highest good in this world, leading a circumspect life, calm, guarded, endowed (with knowledge, etc.), always restrained, longing for death, he should lead a religious life. Manifold, indeed, appear sinful actions; therefore prove constant to truth! Delighting in it, a wise man destroys all karman.

2 Many, indeed, are the plans of this man (of the world); he will satisfy his desires; he (thereby causes) the slaughter of others, the pain of others, the punishment of others, the slaughter, the blame, the punishment of a whole province. Doing such things, some have exerted themselves.

3 Therefore the second (i.e. the wrong creed) is not adhered to. The knowing one seeing the vanity (of the world) [knowing the rise and fall of the souls], the Brahman follows the unrivalled (control of the Jainas). He should not kill, nor cause others to kill, nor consent to the killing of others. 'Avoid gaiety, not delighting in creatures (i.e. women), having the highest intuition, keeping off from sinful acts.

And the hero should conquer wrath and pride,

Look at the great hell (as the place) for greed.

Therefore the hero abstaining from killing,

Should destroy sorrow, going the road of easiness.

Here now the hero, knowing the bondage,

Knowing sorrow, should restrain himself.

Having risen to birth among men,

He should not take the life of living beings.

THIRD LESSON.

1 'Knowing the connection of the world, (carelessness is not for his benefit).' Look at the exterior (world from analogy with thy own) self; [then] thou wilt neither kill nor destroy (living beings); viz. out of reciprocal regard [well examining] he does no sinful act. What is the characteristic of a sage? 'Recognising the equality (of all living beings), he appeases himself.'

2 Knowing the highest good, one should never be careless; Guarding one's self, always prudent, one should pass life on the right road. 'One should acquire disregard of sensual enjoyment, being with a great one (i.e. a god) or the small ones (men).' When one knows whence men come and where they go, and when both ends are out of sight, one is not cut, nor slit, nor burnt, nor struck by any one in the whole world. [For the sake of love and hate, or worldly and heavenly bliss.] Some do not remember what preceded the present: 'what has been his past? what will be his future?' Some men here say: 'what has been his past, that will be his future.'

3 There is no past thing, nor is there a future one; So opine the Tathagatas. He whose karman has ceased and conduct is right, who recognises the truth (stated above) and destroys sinfulness (thinks): What is discontent and what is pleasure? not subject to either, one should live; Giving up all gaiety, circumspect and restrained, one should lead a religious life.

4 Man! Thou art thy own friend; why wishest thou for a friend beyond thyself? Whom he knows as a dweller on high, him he should know as a dweller far (from sin) and whom he knows as a dweller far (from sin), him he should know as a dweller on high. Man! restraining thyself (from the outward world) 'thou wilt get free from pain.' Man, understand well the truth! exerting himself in the rule of truth a wise man overcomes Mara.

5 'The gifted man, following the law, sees well his true interest.' In a twofold way, for the sake of life's splendour, honour and glory (some men exert themselves), wherein they go astray. The gifted, touched by calamity, are not confounded. 'Mind this! the worthy one, in this world, gets out of the creation.' Thus I say.

FOURTH LESSON.

1 That man (i.e. the liberated) conquers wrath, pride, deceit, and greed. This is the doctrine of the Seer who does not injure living beings and has put an end (to acts and to samsara). Preventing propensity to sin destroys former actions. He who knows one thing, knows all things; and he who knows all things, knows one thing [Because true knowledge of one thing is inseparable from true knowledge of all things.]. He who is careless in all respects, is in danger; he who is not careless in all respects, is free from danger.

2 He who conquers one (passion), conquers many; and he who conquers many, conquers one. 'Knowing the misery of the world' rejecting the connection with the world, 'the heroes go on the great journey,' they rise gradually; 'they do not desire life.'

3 He who avoids one (passion), avoids (them all) severally; and he who avoids them severally, avoids one. Faithful according to the commandment (of the Tirthakaras), wise, and understanding the world according to the commandment—such a man is without danger from anywhere. There are degrees in injurious acts, but there are no degrees in control.

4 He who knows wrath, knows pride; he who knows pride, knows deceit; he who knows deceit, knows greed; he who knows greed, knows love; he who knows love, knows hate; he who knows hate, knows delusion; he who knows delusion, knows conception; he who knows conception, knows birth; he who knows birth, knows death; he who knows death, knows hell; he who knows hell, knows animal existence; he who knows animal existence, knows pain.

Therefore, a wise man should avoid wrath, pride, deceit, greed, love, hate, delusion, conception, birth, death, hell, animal existence, and pain. This is the doctrine of the Seer, who does not injure living beings and has put an end (to acts and to samsara). Preventing the propensity to sin destroys former actions. Is there any worldly weakness in the Seer? There exists none, there is none. Thus I say.

End of the Third Lecture, called Hot and Cold.

AKARANGA BOOK 1 4TH LECTURE, CALLED RIGHTEOUSNESS.

FIRST LESSON.

1 The Arhats and Bhagavats of the past, present, and future, all say thus, speak thus, declare thus, explain thus: all breathing, existing, living, sentient creatures I should not be slain, nor treated with violence, nor abused, nor tormented, nor driven away.

2 This is the pure, unchangeable, eternal law, which the clever ones, who understand the world, have declared: among the zealous and the not zealous, among the faithful and the not faithful, among the not cruel and the cruel, among those who have worldly weakness and those who have not, among those who like social bonds and those who do not: 'that is the truth, that is so, that is proclaimed in this (creed).'

3 Having adopted (the law), one should not hide it, nor forsake it. Correctly understanding the law, one should arrive at indifference for the impressions of the senses, and 'not act on the motives of the world.' 'He who is not of this mind [Who acts not on worldly motives.], how should he come to the other?' What has been said here, has been seen (by the omniscient ones), heard (by the believers), acknowledged (by the faithful), and thoroughly understood by them. Those who acquiesce and indulge (in worldly pleasures), are born again and again. 'Day and night exerting thyself, steadfast,' always having ready wisdom, perceive that the careless (stand) outside (of salvation); if careful, thou wilt always conquer. Thus I say.

SECOND LESSON.

1 There are as many asravas as there are parisravas, and there are as many parisravas as there are asravas. There are as many anasravas as there are aparisravas, and there are as many aparisravas as there are anasravas. He who well understands these words and regards the world according to the instruction (and understands), that which has been distinctly declared, that 'wise man proclaims (the truth) here to men,' who still belong to the samsara, who are awakened, and have reached discrimination.

2 'Those also who are afflicted and careless' (will be instructed). I say this as a truth. There is nothing secure from the mouth of death. Those who are led by their desires, who are the tabernacle of fraud, 'who seized by Time dwell in the heap (of karman),' are born again and again. [Many who are again and again (immersed) in delusion, (will often renew) their acquaintance with the places of pain; they experience the pains inherent in regeneration. He who often does cruel acts, often undergoes (punishment in hell, etc.) He who seldom does cruel acts, seldom undergoes (punishment).]

3 Some say thus, also the wise ones; the wise ones say thus, also some others. Many and several in this world, Brahmanas or Sramanas, raise this discussion: We have seen, heard, acknowledged, thoroughly understood, in the upper, nether, and sidelong directions, and in all ways examined it: all sorts of living beings may be slain, or treated with violence, or abused, or tormented, or driven away. Know about this: there is no wrong in it.

4 That is a doctrine of the unworthy. But those who are teachers, have said: You have wrongly seen, wrongly heard, wrongly acknowledged, wrongly understood, in the upper, nether, and sidelong directions, in all ways wrongly examined it, when you say thus, speak thus, declare thus, explain thus: All sorts of living beings may be slain, or treated with violence, or abused, or tormented, or driven away. Know about this: there is no wrong in it. That is a doctrine of the unworthy.

5 But we say thus, speak thus, declare thus, explain thus: All sorts of living beings should not be slain, nor treated with violence, nor abused, nor tormented, nor driven away. Know about this, there is no wrong in it. This is the doctrine of the teachers.

6 First the persuasion of every one should be ascertained, and then we will ask them severally: Ye professors! is pain pleasant to you, or unpleasant? If they give the right answer, reply: For all sorts of living beings pain is unpleasant, disagreeable, and greatly feared. Thus I say.

THIRD LESSON.

1 'Reflect and observe that whether you go to this world or to that beyond, in the whole world those who are discerning beings, who abstain from cruelty, relinquish karman. They are flesh-subduing, called duty-knowing, upright men, aware that pain results from actions.' Thus say those who have right intuition.

2 All the professors, conversant with pain, preach renunciation. Thus thoroughly knowing karman, observing the commandment, wise, unattached (to the world), recognising thy Self as one [i.e. as separate and different from the world.], subdue the body, chastise thyself, weaken thyself: 'just as fire consumes old wood!' Thus with a composed mind, unattached, 'unhesitatingly avoid wrath!' Considering the shortness of life 'know pain, or what will come [According to the commentators the present and future pains.];' one shall feel the several feelings; and perceive the world suffering under them.

3 Those who are free from sinful acts are called anidana. Hence a very wise man should not be inflamed (by wrath). Thus I say.

FOURTH LESSON.

1 One should mortify (one's flesh) in a low, high, and highest degree, quitting one's former connections, and entering tranquillity. Therefore a hero is careful, a person of pith, guarded, endowed (with knowledge, etc.), and always restrained. Difficult to go is the road of the heroes, who go whence there is no return (final liberation). Subdue blood and flesh.

THE GRAND BIBLE

2 That man is called a worthy one, a hero, one to be followed, who living in chastity [guarding his eyes] shakes off the aggregate. He who desires the current of karma, is a fool who has not cut off the fetters of, nor conquered the connection with, (the world.) For such as dwell in darkness, and are without knowledge, there is no success in faith. Thus I say.

3 'Whence should he have it [Success in faith.], who does not get it early, late, or in the middle of life?' But the discerning one is awakened, and ceases to act. See that it is good to be so! Cutting off that 'whence bondage, cruel death, and dreadful pain,' and the (desire for) external (objects) flow, he who among mortals knows freedom from acts, 'seeing that acts will bear fruit, the knower of the sacred lore, parts from (karma).'

4 There are those who have established themselves in the truth, who (were, are, or will be) heroes, endowed (with knowledge), always exerting themselves, full of equanimity, valuing the world (as it deserves) in the east, west, south, north. We shall tell the knowledge of them who (were, etc.) heroes, endowed (with knowledge), always exerting themselves, full of equanimity, valuing the world (as it deserves). Is there any worldly weakness in the Seer? There exists none, there is none. Thus I say.

End of the Fourth Lecture, called Righteousness.

AKARANGA BOOK 1 5TH LECTURE, CALLED ESSENCE OF THE WORLD.

FIRST LESSON.

1 Many entertain cruel thoughts against the world with a motive or without one; they entertain cruel thoughts against these (six classes of living beings). To him pleasures are dear. Therefore he is near death. Because he is near death, he is far (from liberation). But he who is neither near (death) nor far (from liberation), considers the life of a slow and ignorant fool as similar to a dewdrop trembling on the sharp point of the blade of Kusa grass which falls down when shaken by the wind. A fool, doing cruel acts, comes thereby ignorantly to grief. Through delusion he is born, dies, etc.' Being conversant with the deliberation about this delusion, one is conversant with the samsara; being not conversant with that deliberation, one is not conversant with the samsara. He who is clever, should not seek after sexual intercourse. But having done so, (it would be) a second folly of the weak-minded not to own it. Repenting and excluding (from the mind) the begotten pleasures, one should instruct others to follow the commandment. Thus I say.

2 See! many who desire colours, are led around (in the samsara), they (experience) here again and again feelings (i.e. punishment). Many live by injurious deeds against the world, they live by injurious deeds against these (living beings). Also the fool, suffering (for his passions), delights in bad acts here, mistaking that for salvation which is none. Many (heretics) lead the life of a hermit (in order to avoid worldly sorrows and pains).

3 Such a man has much wrath, much pride, much conceit, much greed; he delights in many (works), acts frequently like a stage-player or a rogue, forms many plans, gives way to his impulses, is influenced by his acts though he pretends to be awakened: (thinking) that nobody will see him. Through the influence of ignorance and carelessness the fool never knows the law. Men! unhappy creatures, world-wise are those who, not freeing themselves from ignorance, talk about final liberation: they turn round and round in the whirlpool (of births). Thus I say.

SECOND LESSON.

1 Many do not live by injurious deeds against the world, they do not live by injurious deeds against these (living beings). Ceasing from them, making an end of them, he perceives: this is a favourable opportunity [For adopting the right conduct.]; he who searches for the right moment for this body (should never be careless). This is the road taught by the noble ones.

2 When he has become zealous for the law, he should never be careless, knowing pain and pleasure in their various forms. Men act here on their own motives; it has been declared that they suffer for their own sins. Neither killing nor lying, he should (patiently) bear (all unpleasant) feelings when affected by them. That man is called a true monk.

3 Those who are not given to sinful acts are (nevertheless) attacked by calamities; but then the steadfast will bear them. (He has to bear) them afterwards as (he has done) before (his conversion). (The body) is of a fragile, decaying nature, (it is) unstable, transient, uneternal, increasing and decreasing, of a changeable nature. Perceive this as its true character. For him who well understands this, who delights in the unique refuge, for the liberated and inactive there is no passage (from birth to birth). Thus I say.

4 Many are attached to something in the world--be it little or much, small or great, sentient or nonsentient--they are attached to it (here) amongst these (householders). Thus some incur great danger. For him who contemplates the course of the world and does not acknowledge these attachments (there is no such danger). Knowing that that which is well understood is well practised, man! with thy eyes on the highest good, be victorious (in control). Among such men only is real Brahmanhood. Thus I say.

5 I have heard this, and it is in my innermost heart; and the freedom from bonds is in your innermost heart. He who has ceased (to have worldly attachments), the houseless, suffers with patience a long time. The careless stand outside, the careful lead a religious life. Maintain rightly this state of a sage. Thus I say.

THIRD LESSON.

1 Many are not attached to something in this world, they are not attached to it among these (householders). He is a wise man who has heard and understood the word of the learned ones. Without partiality the law has been declared by the noble ones. As I have destroyed here the connection with the world, so is the connection elsewhere difficult to destroy. Therefore I say: One should not abandon firmness.

2 Some who early exert themselves, do not afterwards slide back; some who early exert themselves, afterwards slide back; those who do not early exert themselves, (can of course) not slide back. That man also is of this description, who knowing the world (as worthless nevertheless) follows its ways. 'Knowing this, it has been declared by the sage.' Here the follower of the commandment, the wise, the passionless, he who exerts himself before morning and after evening 1, always contemplating virtue and hearing (the merit of it) will become free from love and delusion. 'Fight with this (your body)! why should you fight with anything else?' Difficult to attain is this (human body) which is worth the fight. For the clever ones have praised the discernment of wisdom; the fool who falls from it, is liable to birth, etc.

3 In this (religion of the Jainas the cause of the fool's fall) has been declared (to depend) on colour* and killing. [* Colour stands for all perceptions of the senses. Of course, the attachment to sensual pleasures is meant.] But a sage who walks the beaten track (to liberation), regards the world in a different way. 'Knowing thus (the nature of) acts in all regards, he does not kill,' he controls himself, he is not overbearing.

4 Comprehending that pleasure (and pain) are individual, advising kindness, he will not engage in any work in the whole world: keeping before him the one (great aim, liberation), and not turning aside, 'living humbly, unattached to any creature.' The rich (in control) who with a mind endowed with all penetration (recognises) that a bad deed should not be done, will not go after it. What you acknowledge as righteousness, that you acknowledge as sagedom (mauna); what you acknowledge as sagedom, that you acknowledge as righteousness. It is inconsistent with weak, sinning, sensual, ill-conducted house-inhabiting men.

5 'A sage, acquiring sagedom, should subdue his body.' The heroes who look at everything with indifference, use mean and rough (food, etc.) 'Such a man is said to have crossed the flood (of life), to be a sage, to have passed over (the samsara), to be liberated, to have ceased (from acts). Thus I say.

FOURTH LESSON.

1 For a monk who has not yet reached discrimination, it is bad going and difficult proceeding when he wanders (alone) from village to village. Some men (when going wrong) will become angry when exhorted with speech. And a man with wary pride is embarrassed with great delusion.

2 There are many obstacles which are very difficult to overcome for the ignorant and the blinded. Let that not be your case! That is the doctrine of the clever one (Mahavira). Adopting the (akarya's) views, imitating his indifference (for the outer world), making him the guide and adviser (in all one's matters), sharing his abode, living carefully, acting according to his mind, examining one's way, not coming too near (the akarya), minding living beings, one should go (on one's business).

3 (A monk should according to the akarya's order) go and return, contract or stretch (his limbs), thoroughly clean (what ought to be cleaned). Sometimes, though a monk be endowed with virtue and walks in righteousness, living beings, coming in contact with his body, will be killed. (If this happens through mere carelessness) then he will get his punishment in this life; but if it was done contrary to the rules, he should repent of it and do penance for it. Thus he who knows the sacred lore*, recommends penance combined with carefulness. [* The monk must closely inspect everything with which he comes in contact in order to avoid killing animals; this holds good with regard to walking, sitting, sleeping, eating, drinking, etc.]

4 (When a monk) with fully developed intuition and knowledge, calm, guarded, endowed (with knowledge), always restrained, perceives (a woman tempting him), he should consider within himself: what will this person do? The greatest temptation in this world are women. This has been declared by the sage.

5 When strongly vexed by the influence of the senses, he should eat bad food, mortify himself, stand upright, wander from village to village, take no food at all, withdraw his mind from women. First troubles, then pleasures; first pleasures, then troubles [In order to attain pleasure, one has to work for the means; after the enjoyment of the pleasures one has to undergo punishment in hell, etc.]: thus they are the cause of quarrels. Considering this and well understanding it, one should teach oneself not to cultivate (sensuality). Thus I say. He should not speak of women, nor look at them, nor converse with them, nor claim them as his own, nor do their work. Careful in his speech and guarding his mind, he should always avoid sin. He should maintain this sagedom. Thus I say.

FIFTH LESSON.

1 Thus I say: a lake is full of water, it is in an even plain, it is free from dust, it harbours (many fish*) [*Like unto it is a teacher who is full of wisdom, who lives in a quiet country, is free from passion, and protects living beings.]. Look! he (the teacher) stands in the stream (of knowledge) and is guarded in all directions. Look! there are great Seers in the world, wise, awakened, free from acts. Perceive the truth: from a desire of (a pious) end they chose a religious life. Thus I say.

2 He whose mind is always wavering, does not reach abstract contemplation. Some, bound (by worldly ties), are followers (i.e. understand the truth); some who are not bound, are followers. How should he not despond who amongst followers is a non-follower? 'But that is truth beyond doubt, what has been declared by the Ginas.'

3 Whatever a faithful, well-disposed man, on entering the order, thought to be true, that may afterwards appear to him true; what he thought to be true, that may afterwards appear to him untrue; what he thought to be untrue, that may afterwards appear to him true; what he thought to be untrue, that may afterwards appear to him true. What he thinks to be true, that may, on consideration, appear to him true, whether it be true or untrue. What he thinks to be untrue, that may, on consideration, appear to him untrue, whether it be true or untrue. But he who reflects should say unto him who does not reflect: Consider it to be true. Thus the connection (i.e. the continuity of sins) is broken.

4 Regard this as the course of the zealous one, who stands (in obedience to the spiritual guide). In this point do not show yourself a fool! As it would be unto thee, so it is with him whom thou intendest to kill. As it would be unto thee, so it is with him whom thou intendest to torment. In the same way (it is with him) whom thou intendest to punish, and to drive away. The righteous man who lives up to these sentiments, does therefore neither kill nor cause others to kill (living beings). He should not intentionally cause the same punishment for himself.

5 The Self is the knower (or experiencer), and the knower is the Self. That through which one knows, is the Self. With regard to this (to know) it (the Self) is established. Such is he who maintains the right doctrine of Self. This subject has truly been explained. Thus I say.

SIXTH LESSON.

1 Some not instructed (in the true law) make (only a show) of good conduct; some, though instructed, have no good conduct. Let that not be your case! That is the doctrine of the clever one. Adopting the (akarya's) views, imitating his indifference (for the outer world), making him the guide and adviser (in all one's matters), sharing his abode, conquering (sinfulness), one sees the truth; unconquered one should be one's own master, having no reliance on anything (in the world). He who is great and withdraws his mind from the outer world, should learn the teaching (of the Tirthakaras) through the teaching (of the akarya); by his own innate knowledge, or through the instruction of the highest, or having heard it from others. A wise man should not break the commandment. Examining all (wrong) doctrines from all sides and in all respects, one should clearly understand (and reject) them. 'Knowing the delight of this world [For the same pain he has caused to others in this life, he will suffer in the life hereafter.], circumspect and restrained, one should lead the life of an ascetic.' Desiring liberation [This means that knowledge is a modification (parinama) of the Self, and therefore one with it, but not as a quality or action of the Self different from it.], a hero should, through the sacred lore, ever be victorious. Thus I say.

2 The current (of sin) is said to come from above, from below, and from the sides; these have been declared to be the currents through which, look, there is sinfulness. 'Examining the whirlpool, a man, versed in the sacred lore, should keep off from it.' Leaving the world to avert the current (of sin), such a great man, free from acts, knows and sees the truth; examining (pleasures) he does not desire them.

3 Knowing whence we come and whither we go, he leaves the road to birth and death, rejoicing in the glorious (liberation). 'All sounds recoil thence, where speculation has no room,' nor does the mind penetrate there. The saint knows well that which is without support.

4 (The liberated) is not long nor small nor round nor triangular nor quadrangular nor circular; he is not black nor blue nor red nor green nor white; neither of good nor bad smell; not bitter nor pungent nor astringent nor sweet; neither rough nor soft; neither heavy nor light; neither cold nor hot; neither harsh nor smooth; he is without body, without resurrection, without contact (of matter), he is not feminine nor masculine nor neuter; he perceives, he knows, but there is no analogy (whereby to know the nature of the liberated soul); its essence is without form; there is no condition of the unconditioned. There is no sound, no colour, no smell, no taste, no touch--nothing of that kind. Thus I say.

End of the Fifth Lecture, called Essence of the World.

AKARANGA BOOK 1 6TH LECTURE, CALLED THE CLEANING.

FIRST LESSON.

1 He who is awakened amongst men, preaches; the man to whom all these classes of lives are well known, preaches the unparalleled wisdom. He praises the road to liberation for those who well exert themselves, who have forsworn cruelty, are zealous and endowed with knowledge. Thus some great heroes are victorious; but, look, some others who are wanting in control do not understand (the welfare of) their souls. Thus I say.

2 As in a lake a greedy leaf-covered tortoise cannot rise up; as the trees do not leave their place (though shaken by storms, etc.); thus men, born in various families, cry bitterly because they are attached to the objects of the senses [Literally, the colours.]; on account of their sinfulness they do not reach liberation.

3 Now look at those who are born in these families to reap the fruit of their own acts: Boils and leprosy, consumption, falling sickness, blindness and stiffness, lameness and humpbackedness, Dropsy and dumbness, look! apoplexy(?) and eye-disease, trembling and crippledness, elephantiasis and diabetes,

These are the sixteen diseases enumerated in due order; besides them many illnesses and wounds occur.

Contemplating their (i.e. the creatures') death, knowing their births in higher and lower regions, contemplating the fruit (of their acts), hear about this according to truth.

There are said to be blind beings dwelling in darkness; once or frequently meeting this lot, they experience pleasant and unpleasant feelings. This has been declared by the awakened ones.

4 There are beings endowed with voice, with taste, water-beings dwelling in water, beings living in the air: 'beings torment beings. See the great danger in this world; many pains (are the lot) of the creatures. Men who are given to their lusts, come to destruction through their weak, frail body. 'The fool works hard, thinking' that the unhappy one suffers many pains. 'Knowing that these diseases are many, should the afflicted search after (remedies)?' See! they are of no avail, have done with them! Sage! see this great danger! Do not hurt anybody! Contemplate. Be attentive! I shall proclaim the doctrine of renunciation.

5 To reap the fruit of their acts they are born in these various families, they increase, are born, grow up, become awakened, and leave the world in due order as great sages. The lamenting parents say to them who proceed on the glorious road: 'Do not leave us!'

6 Consulting their own pleasure, indulging their passions, 'making a noise 1, the parents cry.' No man who leaves his parents is (fit to become) a flood-crossing sage! (The ascetic) does not take refuge there (in his family); for what could attract him there?

He should always maintain this knowledge! Thus I say.

SECOND LESSON.

1 Though some know the misery of the world, have relinquished their former connections, have given up ease, live in chastity, and, whether monk or layman, thoroughly understand the law, they are not able (to persevere in a religious life). The ill-disposed, giving up the robe, alms-bowl, blanket, and broom, do not bear the continuous hardships that are difficult to bear. He who prefers pleasures will, now or after an hour [i.e. after a short time.], be deprived (of the body), not to recover it; *The body with five organs, in which alone liberation can be realised, for an infinite space of time. And thus they do not cross (the samsara), for the sake of these pleasures which entail evil consequences and are associated with others of their kind.

2 But some who embrace the law, will practise it, being careful about its outward signs; not giving way to worldliness, but being firm. Knowing (and renouncing) all lust, a devout man becomes a great sage when he breaks all bonds, thinking: Nothing belongs to me. A man who, thinking, I am I, exerts himself for this (creed), ceases (to act), is houseless, walks about bald-headed. The naked, fasting (monk), who combats the flesh, will be abused, or struck, or hurt; he will be upbraided with his former trade, or reviled with untrue reproaches. Accounting (for this treatment) by his former sins, knowing pleasant and unpleasant occurrences, he should patiently wander about. Quitting all worldliness one should bear all (disagreeable) feelings, being possessed of the right view.

3 Those are called naked, who in this world, never returning (to a worldly state), (follow) my religion according to the commandment. This highest doctrine has here been declared for men. Delighted with this, destroying that (i.e. the effect of works), he will successively give up sinfulness, after having come to a knowledge of it. Here (in our religion) some live as single mendicants. Therefore a wise man should lead the life of an ascetic by collecting pure alms or any alms in all sorts of families. 'If (the food) be of good or bad smell, or if dreadful beasts inflict pain on (other) beings'--all that happens to you, you will firmly bear it. Thus I say.

THIRD LESSON.

1 A sage who is well instructed in the law and leads a life of abstinence, is always a destroyer of the effects of works. To a mendicant who is little clothed and firm in control, it will not occur (to think): My clothes are torn, I shall beg for (new) clothes; I shall beg for thread; I shall beg for a needle; I shall mend (my clothes); I shall darn them; I shall repair them; I shall put them on; I shall wrap myself in them.

2 The unclothed one, who excels in this (abstinence), will often be molested by (sharp blades of) grass, by cold, heat, gnats, and mosquitoes. The unclothed one, who effects scarcity (of his wants or of his karman), bears these and various other hardships. He is fit for penance, as has been declared by the Reverend One. Understanding this in all respects and with his whole mind, he should perfectly know righteousness. The great heroes (i.e. the Tirthakaras) who for a long time walked in the former years, the worthy ones bore the troubles (mentioned above); endowed with perfect knowledge they had lean arms and very little flesh and blood. He who discontinues (to sin) and is enlightened, is said to have crossed (the samsara), to be liberated, and to have ceased (to act). Thus I say.

3 But can discontent lay hold of a mendicant, who has ceased to act and leads a religious life, for a long time controlling himself? He advances in his spiritual career and exerts himself. As an island which is never covered with water, so is the law taught by the noble ones (a safe refuge for those in danger). They are free from desires, free from murder, beloved, wise, learned. For their benefit has been the exertion of the Reverend One; as birds (feed) their young ones, so are the disciples regularly to be instructed day and night. Thus I say.

FOURTH LESSON.

1 The disciples are thus regularly instructed, day and night, by the knowledge-endowed great heroes, receiving knowledge from them. Some, being seduced from the calmness of the mind, adopt rough manners. Some, living in chastity, dispute the authority (of the teacher), others hear and understand his words; they intend to lead a godly life, but having left the world [Or obedience to their teacher], they are not qualified (for a religious life). Others, being incensed by lusts, greedy, sensual, 'do not care for abstract meditation and religious instruction: these men speak harshly unto the teacher.' It is a second folly of the slow-minded to call virtuous, calm, religiously living men worthless. Some, turning from (control), assign its difficulty as their reason (for doing so) [They do not upbraid their teachers, and hence are not guilty of the second folly.]; others, falling from the pure knowledge and defiling the creed, though not without devotion, for the love of life change (their vows). 'When they feel the hardships (of a religious life) they slide back, for their love of life.' Their leaving the world is a bad leaving.

2 Those who deserve to be called fools, are born again and again. Standing low (in learning or control) they will exalt themselves (and say) in their pride: I am learned. They speak harshly unto the passionless; they upbraid them with their former trades, or revile them with untrue reproaches. The wise, therefore, should know the law. Thou lovest unrighteousness, because thou art young, and lovest acts, and sayest: 'Kill beings;' thou killest them or consentest to their being killed by others. (Such a man) thinks contemptuously: A very severe religion has been proclaimed. Sinking in opposition to the law, he is called murderer. Thus I say.

3 Some think: What have I to do with this or that man? Thus they leave father and mother, kith and kin, like heroes exerting themselves, free from murder. Look! the pious and calm become desponding; the rising, cast down. Those troubled with sensuality, the cowardly men become perverters of the faith [Or breakers of vows.]. Therefore the reputation of some becomes bad. He is an apostate ascetic! He is an apostate ascetic!

4 Look! Some, though living with religious, pious, calm, and worthy (monks), are not religious, nor pious, nor calm, nor worthy. Knowing them, the learned, the wise, the steadfast hero will always be victorious through the right faith. Thus I say.

FIFTH LESSON.

1 Staying in or between houses, in or between villages, in or between towns, in or between countries, a monk is attacked by murderers, or is subject to the hardships (of a mendicant's life). A hero should bear these hardships.

2 A saint, with right intuition, who cherishes compassion for the world, in the east, west, south, and north, should preach, spread, and praise (the faith), knowing the sacred lore. He should proclaim it among those who exert themselves, and those who do not*, among those who are willing to hear (the word). [* This is equivalent either to believers and heretics, or to clerical and lay men.]

3 Not neglecting tranquillity, indifference, patience, liberation, purity, uprightiness, gentleness, and freedom from worldly cares, one should, with due consideration, preach the law of the mendicants to all sorts of creatures.

4 With due consideration preaching the law of the mendicants, one should do no injury to one's self, nor to anybody else, nor to any of the four kinds of living beings. But a great sage, neither injuring nor injured, becomes a shelter for all sorts of afflicted creatures, even as an island, which is never covered with water.

5 Thus a man who exerts himself, and is of a steady mind, without attachment, unmoved (by passion) but restless (in wandering about), having no worldly desires, should lead the life of an ascetic. Having contemplated the beautiful law, the discerning one is liberated. Therefore look at worldliness, ye men, fettered in fetters!

Those whom lust conquers, sink; therefore do not shrink from the hard (control)! He who knows (and renounces) perfectly and thoroughly these injurious acts, from whom the injurers do not shrink 1, 'who has shaken off wrath, pride,' delusion, and greed, 'he is called a removed one.' Thus I say.

6 On the decay of the body (he does not despond, but deserves) his appellation, 'the leader of the battle.' The sage who has reached the other side, unafflicted and unmoved like a beam, being in the power of death, desires death as the dissolution of the body. Thus I say.

End of the Sixth Lecture, called the Cleaning.

AKARANGA BOOK 1 7TH LECTURE, CALLED LIBERATION.

FIRST LESSON.

1 I say: To friendly or hostile (heretics) one should not give food, drink, dainties and spices, clothes, alms-bowls, and brooms; nor exhort these persons to give (such things), nor do them service, always showing the highest respect. Thus I say.

2 (A heretic may say): Know this for certain: having or not having received food, etc. (down to) brooms, having or not having eaten (come to our house), even turning from your way or passing (other houses); we shall supply your wants. Confessing an individual creed, coming and going, he may give, or exhort to give, or do service (but one should not accept anything from him), showing not the slightest respect. Thus I say.

3 Some here are not well instructed as regards the subject of conduct; for desirous of acts, they say: 'Kill creatures;' they themselves kill or consent to the killing of others; or they take what has not been given; or they pronounce opinions, e. g. the world exists, the world does not exist, the world is unchangeable, the world is ever changing; the world has a beginning, the world has no beginning; the world has an end, the world has no end; (or with regard to the self and actions): this is well done, this is badly done; this is merit, this is demerit; he is a good man, he is not a good man; there is beatitude, there is no beatitude; there is a hell, there is no hell. When they thus differ (in their opinions) and profess their individual persuasion, know (that this is all) without reason 1. Thus they are not well taught, not well instructed in the religion such as it has been declared by the Reverend One, who knows and sees with quick discernment. (One should either instruct the opponent in the true faith) or observe abstinence as regards speech. Thus I say.

4 Everywhere [In all other religious sects.] sins are admitted; but to avoid them is called my distinction. For ye who live in a village or in the forest, or not in a village and not in the forest, know the law as it has been declared. 'By the Brahman, the wise (Mahavira), three 3 vows have been enjoined.' Noble and tranquil men who are enlightened and exert themselves in these (precepts), are called free from sinful acts.

5 Knowing (and renouncing) severally and singly the actions against living beings, in the regions above, below, and on the surface, everywhere and in all ways--a wise man neither gives pain to these bodies, nor orders others to do so, nor assents to their doing so. Nay, we abhor those who give pain to these bodies. Knowing this, a wise man should not cause this or any other pain (to any creatures). Thus I say.

THE GRAND BIBLE

SECOND LESSON.

1 A mendicant may exert himself, or stand or sit or lie in a burying-place or in an empty house or in a mountain cave or in a potter's workshop. A householder may approach a mendicant who stays in any of these places, and say unto him: O long-lived Sramana! I shall give you what I have bought or stolen or taken, though it was not to be taken, nor given, but was taken by force, viz. food, drink, dainties and spices, clothes, an alms-bowl, a plaid, a broom--by acting sinfully against all sorts of living beings; or I shall prepare you snug lodgings; eat (the offered food), dwell (in the prepared house; The above-detailed benefactions.)

2 O long-lived Sramana! A mendicant should thus refuse a householder of good sense and ripe age: O long-lived householder! I do not approve of thy words, I do not accept thy words, that, for my sake, thou givest unto me what thou hast bought or stolen or taken, though it was not to be taken, nor given, but was taken by force, viz. food, drink, dainties and spices, clothes, an alms-bowl, a plaid, a broom--by acting sinfully against all sorts of living beings; or that thou preparest pleasant lodgings for me. O long-lived householder! I have given up this, because it is not to be done.

3 A mendicant may exert himself, etc. (first sentence of § 1). A householder, without betraying his intention, may approach him who stays in some one of the above-mentioned places, and give unto him what has been taken, etc. (all as above, down to) or prepare pleasant lodgings, and accommodate the mendicant with food (and lodging). A mendicant should know it by his own innate intelligence, or through the instruction of the highest (i.e. the Tirthakaras), or having heard it from others: This householder, forsooth, for my sake injures all sorts of living beings, to give me food, etc., clothes, etc., or to prepare pleasant lodgings. A mendicant should well observe and understand this, that he may order (the householder) not to show such obsequiousness. Thus I say.

4 Those who having, with or without the mendicant's knowledge, brought together fetters, become angry (on the monk's refusal) and will strike him, saying: Beat, kill, cut, burn, roast, tear, rob, despatch, torture him! But the hero, come to such a lot, will bravely bear it, or tell him the code of conduct, considering that he is of a different habit; or by guarding his speech he should in due order examine the subject, guarding himself. This has been declared by the awakened ones: The faithful should not give to dissenters food, etc., clothes, etc., nor should they exhort them (to give), nor do them service, always showing the highest respect. Thus I say.

5 Know the law declared by the wise Brahmana one should give to one of the same faith food, etc., clothes, etc., and one should exhort him (to give) or do him service, always showing the highest respect. Thus I say.

THIRD LESSON.

1 Some are awakened as middle-aged men and exert themselves well, having, as clever men, heard and received the word of the learned. The noble ones have impartially preached the law. Those who are awakened, should not wish for pleasure, nor do harm, nor desire (any forbidden things). A person who is without desires and does no harm unto any living beings in the whole world, is called by me 'unfettered.'

2 One free from passions understands perfectly the bright one, knowing birth in the upper and nether regions. Bodies increase through nourishment, they are frail in hardships.' See some whose organs are failing (give way to weakness).

A person who has no desires, cherishes pity. He who understands the doctrine of sin, is a mendicant who knows the time, the strength, the measure, the occasion, the conduct, the religious precept; he disowns all things not requisite for religious purposes, in time exerts himself, is under no obligations; he proceeds securely (on the road to final liberation) after having cut off both (love and hate).

3 A householder approaching a mendicant whose limbs tremble for cold, may say: O long-lived Sramana! are you not subject to the influences of your senses?

O long-lived householder! I am not subject to the influences of my senses. But I cannot sustain the feeling of cold. Yet it does not become me to kindle or light a fire [i.e. self-control.], that I may warm or heat myself; nor (to procure that comfort) through the order of others.

Perhaps after the mendicant has spoken thus, the other kindles or lights a fire that he may warm or heat himself. But the mendicant should well observe and understand this, that he may order him to show no such obsequiousness. Thus I say.

FOURTH LESSON.

1 A mendicant who is fitted out with three robes, and a bowl as fourth (article), will not think: I shall beg for a fourth robe. He should beg for (clothes) which he wants, and which are permitted by the religious code; he should wear the clothes in the same state in which they are given him; he should neither wash nor dye them, nor should he wear washed or dyed clothes, nor (should he) hide (his garments when passing) through other villages, being careless of dress. This is the whole duty* of one who wears clothes [The original has fire-body, which the faithful are enjoined not to injure; see lecture, lesson 4.]. But know further, that, after winter is gone and the hot season has come, one should leave off the used-up (garment of the three), being clad with an upper and under garment, or with the undermost garment, or with one gown, or with no clothes--aspiring to freedom from bonds [i.e. freedom from worldly cares and interest.]. Penance suits him. Knowing what the Reverend One has declared, one should thoroughly and in all respects conform to it.

2 When it occurs to a blessed 4 mendicant that he suffers pain, and cannot bear the influence of cold, he should not try to obviate these trials, but stand fast in his own self which is endowed with all knowledge. 'For it is better for an ascetic that he should take poison.' Even thus he will in due time put an end to existence. This (way to escape trials) has been adopted by many who were free from delusion; it is good, wholesome, proper, beatifying, meritorious. Thus I say.

FIFTH LESSON.

1 A mendicant who is fitted out with two robes, and a bowl as third (article), will not think: I shall beg for a third robe. He should beg for robes which are allowed to be begged for; he should wear the clothes, etc. etc. This is the whole outfit of one who wears clothes. But know further, that after the winter is gone and the hot season has come, one should leave off the used-up garments; having left off the used-up garments, (one should) be clad with the undermost garment, with a gown, or with no clothes at all--aspiring to freedom from bonds. Penance suits him. Knowing what the Reverend One has declared, one should thoroughly and in all respects conform to it.

2 When the thought occurs to a mendicant that through illness he is too weak, and not able to beg from house to house--and on his thus complaining a householder brings food, etc., obtained (without injuring life), and gives it him--then he should, after deliberation, say: O long-lived householder! it does not become me to eat or drink this food, etc., or (accept) anything else of the same kind.

3 A mendicant who has resolved, that he will, when sick, accept the assistance of fellow-ascetics in good health, when they offer (assistance) without being asked, and that vice versa he, when in health, will give assistance to sick fellow-ascetics, offering it without being asked--(he should not deviate from his resolution though he die for want of help).

4 Taking the vow to beg (food, etc.) for another (who is sick), and to eat (when sick) what is brought by another; taking the vow to beg, etc., and not to eat what is brought; taking the vow not to beg, etc., but to eat what is brought; taking the vow neither to beg, etc., nor to eat what is brought--(one should adhere to that vow). Practising thus the law as it has been declared, one becomes tranquil, averted from sin, guarded against the allurements of the senses. Even thus (though sick) he will in due time put an end to existence [As in the preceding lesson a man who cannot conquer his sensuality, is permitted to commit suicide (by hanging himself, etc.), in order to put an end to his trials and temptations, so in this lesson a man whose sickness prevents him from persevering in a life of austerities, is permitted to commit suicide by rejecting food and drink. This is called bhaktapana pratyakhyana mukti. It seems therefore to have been regarded as leading to final liberation (mukti)]. This (method) has been adopted by many who were free from delusion; it is good, wholesome, proper, beatifying, meritorious. Thus I say.

SIXTH LESSON.

1 A mendicant who is fitted out with one robe, and a bowl as second (article), will not think: I shall beg for a second robe. He should beg for such a robe only as is allowed to be begged for, and he should wear it in the same state as he receives it. This is, etc. (see lesson 4, § 1).

But when the hot season has come, one should leave off the used-up clothes; one should be clad with one or no garment--aspiring to freedom from bonds. Knowing what the Reverend One, etc. (see lesson 5, § 1).

When the thought occurs to a mendicant: 'I am myself, alone; I have nobody belonging to me, nor do I belong to anybody,' then he should thoroughly know himself as standing alone--aspiring to freedom from bonds. Penance suits him. Knowing what the Reverend One has declared, one should thoroughly and in all respects conform to it.

2 A male or female mendicant eating food etc. should not shift (the morsel) from the left jaw to the right jaw, nor from the right jaw to the left jaw, to get a fuller taste of it, not caring for the taste (of it)--aspiring to freedom from bonds. Penance suits him. Knowing what the Reverend One has declared, one should thoroughly and in all respects conform to it.

3 If this thought occurs to a monk: 'I am sick and not able, at this time, to regularly mortify the flesh,' that monk should regularly reduce his food; regularly reducing his food, and diminishing his sins, 'he should take proper care of his body, being immovable like a beam; exerting himself he dissolves his body.'

4 Entering a village, or a scot-free town, or a town with an earth-wall, or a town with a small wall, or an isolated town, or a large town, or a sea-town, or a mine, or a hermitage, or the halting-places of processions, or caravans, or a capital--a monk should beg for straw; having begged for straw he should retire with it to a secluded spot. After having repeatedly examined and cleaned the ground, where there are no eggs, nor living beings, nor seeds, nor sprouts, nor dew, nor water, nor ants, nor mildew, nor waterdrops, nor mud, nor cobwebs--he should spread the straw on it. Then he should there and then effect (the religious death called) itvara [Itvara or ingitamarana consists in starving oneself, while keeping within a limited space. A religious death is usually permitted only to those who have during twelve years undergone preparatory penance, consisting chiefly in protracted periods of fasting. The scholiast says that in our case the itvara is not enjoined for sick persons who can no longer sustain austerities; but they should act as if they were to commit the itvara suicide, hoping that in five or six days the sickness would leave them, in which case they are to return to their former life. But if they should get better but die, it is all for the best.]

5 This is the truth: speaking truth, free from passion, crossing (the samsara), abating irresoluteness, knowing all truth and not being known, leaving this frail body, overcoming all sorts of pains and troubles through trust in this (religion), he accomplishes this fearful (religious death). Even thus he will in due time put an end to existence. This has been adopted by many who were free from delusion; it is good, wholesome, proper, beatifying, meritorious. Thus I say.

SEVENTH LESSON.

1 To a naked monk the thought occurs: I can bear the pricking of grass, the influence of cold and heat, the stinging of flies and mosquitos; these and other various painful feelings I can sustain, but I cannot leave off the covering of the privities. Then he may cover his privities with a piece of cloth.

A naked monk who perseveres in this conduct, sustains repeatedly these and other various painful feelings: the grass pricks him, heat and cold attack him, flies and mosquitos sting him. A naked monk (should be) aspiring to freedom from bonds. Penance suits him. Knowing what the Reverend One has declared, one should thoroughly and in all respects conform to it.

2 A monk who has come to any of the following resolutions--having collected food, etc., I shall give of it to other monks, and I shall eat (what they have) brought; (or) having collected food, etc., I shall give of it to other monks, but I shall not eat (what they have) brought; (or) having collected food, etc., I shall not give of it to other monks, but I shall eat (what they have) brought; (or) having collected food, etc., I shall not give of it to other monks, nor eat (what they have) brought;

3 (or) I shall assist a fellow-ascetic with the remnants of my dinner, which is acceptable I and remained in the same state in which it was received, and I shall accept the assistance of fellow-ascetics as regards the remnants of their dinner, which is acceptable and remained in the same state in which it was received;--(that monk should keep these vows even if he should run the risk of his life)

4--aspiring to freedom from bonds. Penance suits him. Knowing what the Reverend One has declared, one should thoroughly conform to it.

5 (The last two paragraphs of the last lesson are to be reproduced here.)

Thus I say.

EIGHTH LESSON.

1 The wise ones who attain in due order to one of the unerring states (in which suicide is prescribed), those who are rich in control and endowed with knowledge, knowing the incomparable (religious death, should continue their contemplation).

2 Knowing the twofold (obstacles, i.e. bodily and mental), the wise ones, having thoroughly learned the law, perceiving in due order (that the time for their death has come), get rid of karma.

3 Subduing the passions and living on little food, he should endure (hardships). If a mendicant falls sick, let him again take food.

4 He should not long for life, nor wish for death he should yearn after neither, life or death.

5 He who is indifferent and wishes for the destruction of karma, should continue his contemplation. Becoming unattached internally and externally, he should strive after absolute purity.

6 Whatever means one knows for calming one's own life, that a wise man should learn (i.e. practise) in order to gain time (for continuing penance).

7 In a village or in a forest, examining the ground and recognising it as free from living beings, the sage should spread the straw. [Here commences the description of the bhakta pratyakhyana marana, suicide by rejecting food.]

8 Without food he should lie down and bear the pains which attack him. He should not for too long time give way to worldly feelings which overcome him.

9 When crawling animals or such as live on high or below, feed on his flesh and blood, he should neither kill them nor rub (the wound).

10 Though these animals destroy the body, he should not stir from his position. After the asravas have ceased, he should bear (pains) as if he rejoiced in them.

11 When the bonds fall off, then he has accomplished his life. (We shall now describe) a more exalted (method 1) for a well-controlled and instructed monk.

12 This other law has been proclaimed by Gnatriputra: He should give up all motions except his own in the thrice-threelfold way.

13 He should not lie on sprouts of grass, but inspecting the bare ground he should lie on it. Without any comfort and food, he should there bear pain.

14 When the sage becomes weak in his limbs, he should strive after calmness [He should not give way to melancholy thoughts.]. For he is blameless, who is well fixed and immovable (in his intention to die).

15 He should move to and fro (on his ground), contract and stretch (his limbs) for the benefit of the whole body; or (he should remain quiet as if he were) lifeless.

16 He should walk about, when tired of (lying), or stand with passive limbs; when tired of standing, he should sit down.

17 Intent on such an uncommon death, he should regulate the motions of his organs. Having attained a place swarming with insects, he should search for a clean spot.

18 He should not remain there whence sin would rise. He should raise himself above (sinfulness), and bear all pains.

19 And this is a still more difficult method 1, when one lives according to it: not to stir from one's place, while checking all motions of the body.

20 This is the highest law, exalted above the preceding method: Having examined a spot of bare ground he should remain there; stay O Brahmana!

21 Having attained a place free from living beings, he should there fix himself. He should thoroughly mortify his flesh, thinking: There are no obstacles in my body.

22 Knowing as long as he lives the dangers and troubles, the wise and restrained (ascetic) should bear them as being instrumental to the dissolution of the body.

23 He should not be attached to the transitory pleasures, nor to the greater ones; he should not nourish desire and greed, looking only for eternal praise.

24 He should be enlightened with eternal objects, and not trust in the delusive power of the gods; a Brahmana should know of this and cast off all inferiority.

25 Not devoted to any of the external objects he reaches the end of his life; thinking that patience is the highest good, he (should choose) one of (the described three) good methods of entering Nirvana. Thus I say.

End of the Seventh Lecture, called Liberation.

AKARANGA BOOK 1 8TH LECTURE, (CALLED) THE PILLOW OF RIGHTEOUSNESS.

FIRST LESSON.

1 As I have heard it, I shall tell how the Venerable Ascetic, exerting himself and meditating, after having entered the order in that winter, wandered about*. 'I shall not cover myself with that robe,' only in that winter (he used it). He had crossed (the samsara) for the rest of his life. This (refusing of dress) is in accordance with his doctrine. [* Silanka remarks: 'This verse has not been explained by the author of the old tika. Why? Either because it offers no difficulty, or because it was wanting. Yet it is found in the Manuscripts, of the text alone. We do not exactly know the reason.' Which old tika is meant by Silanka we cannot tell with certainty. It scarcely can be the Kurni, for in the Bombay Manuscript. of it the text of the verse in question is given, but no explanation beyond the words: esa pukha, this is (given as an answer to) a question.]

2 More than four months many sorts of living beings gathered on his body, crawled about it, and caused pain there.

3 For a year and a month he did not leave off his robe. Since that time the Venerable One, giving up his robe, was a naked, world-relinquishing, houseless (sage).

4 Then he meditated (walking) with his eye fixed on a square space before him of the length of a man. Many people assembled, shocked at the sight; they struck him and cried.

5 Knowing (and renouncing) the female sex in mixed gathering places, he meditated, finding his way himself: I do not lead a worldly life.

6 Giving up the company of all householders whomsoever, he meditated. Asked, he gave no answer; he went, and did not transgress the right path.

7 For some it is not easy (to do what he did), not to answer those who salute; he was beaten with sticks, and struck by sinful people.

8 Disregarding slights difficult to bear, the Sage wandered about, (not attracted) by story-tellers, pantomimes, songs, fights at quarter-staff, and boxing-matches.

9 At that time the son of Gnatri saw without sorrow (or pleasure) people in mutual conversation. Gnatriputra obtained oblivion of these exquisite sorrows.

10 For more than a couple of years he led a religious life without using cold water; he realised singleness, guarded his body, had got intuition, and was calm.

11 Thoroughly knowing the earth-bodies and water-bodies and fire-bodies and wind-bodies, the lichens, seeds, and sprouts, 12 He comprehended that they are, if narrowly inspected, imbued with life, and avoided to injure them; he, the great Hero.

13 The immovable (beings) are changed to movable ones, and the movable beings to immovable ones; beings which are born in all states become individually sinners by their actions.

14 The Venerable One understands thus: he who is under the conditions (of existence), that fool suffers pain. Thoroughly knowing (karman), the Venerable One avoids sin.

15 The sage, perceiving the double (karman) [Present and future.], proclaims the incomparable activity [i.e. religious life.], he, the knowing one; knowing the current of worldliness, the current of sinfulness, and the impulse, 16 Practising the sinless abstinence from killing, he did not act, neither himself nor with the assistance of others; he to whom women were known as the causes of all sinful acts, he saw (the true state of the world).

17 He did not use what had expressly been prepared for him 5; he well saw (that bondage comes) through action. Whatever is sinful, the Venerable One left that undone: he consumed clean food.

18 He did not use another's robe, nor does he eat out of another's vessel. Disregarding contempt, he went with indifference to places where food was prepared.

19 Knowing measure in eating and drinking, he was not desirous of delicious food, nor had he a longing for it. A sage should not rub his eyes nor scratch his body.

20 Looking a little sideward, looking a little behind, answering little when spoken to, he should walk attentively looking on his path.

21 When the cold season has half-way advanced, the houseless, leaving off his robe and stretching out his arms, should wander about, not leaning against a trunk.

22 This is the rule which has often been followed by the wise Brahmana, the Venerable One, who is free from attachment: thus proceed (the monks).

Thus I say.

THIRD LESSON.

1 Always well guarded, he bore the pains (caused by) grass, cold, fire, flies, and gnats; manifold pains.

2 He travelled in the pathless country of the Ladhas, in Vaggabhumi and Subbhabhumi 1; he used there miserable beds and miserable seats.

3 In Ladha (happened) to him many dangers. Many natives attacked him. Even in the faithful part of the rough country the dogs bit him, ran at him.

4 Few people kept off the attacking, biting dogs. Striking the monk, they cried 'Khukhu,' and made the dogs bite him.

5 Such were the inhabitants. Many other mendicants, eating rough food in Vaggabhumi, and carrying about a strong pole or a stalk (to keep off the dogs), lived there.

6 Even thus armed they were bitten by the dogs, torn by the dogs. It is difficult to travel in Ladha.

7 Ceasing to use the stick (i.e. cruelty) against living beings, abandoning the care of the body, the houseless (Mahavira), the Venerable One, endures the thorns of the villages (i.e. the abusive language of the peasants), (being) perfectly enlightened.

8 As an elephant at the head of the battle, so was Mahavira there victorious. Sometimes he did not reach a village there in Ladha.

9 When he who is free from desires approached the village, the inhabitants met him on the outside, and attacked him, saying, 'Get away from here.'

10 He was struck with a stick, the fist, a lance, hit with a fruit, a clod, a potsherd. Beating him again and again, many cried.

11 When he once (sat) without moving his body, they cut his flesh 1, tore his hair under pains, or covered him with dust.

12 Throwing him up, they let him fall, or disturbed him in his religious postures; abandoning the care of his body, the Venerable One humbled himself and bore pain, free from desire.

13 As a hero at the head of the battle is surrounded on all sides, so was there Mahavira. Bearing all hardships, the Venerable One, undisturbed, proceeded (on the road to Nirvana).

This is the rule which has often been followed, etc.

FOURTH LESSON.

1 The Venerable One was able to abstain from indulgence of the flesh, though never attacked by diseases. Whether wounded or not wounded, he desired not medical treatment.

2 Purgatives and emetics, anointing of the body and bathing, shampooing and cleansing of the teeth do not behave him, after he learned (that the body is something unclean).

3 Being averse from the impressions of the senses, the Brahmana wandered about, speaking but little. Sometimes in the cold season the Venerable One was meditating in the shade.

4 In summer he exposes himself to the heat, he sits squatting in the sun; he lives on rough (food): rice, pounded jujube, and beans.

5 Using these three, the Venerable One sustained himself eight months. Sometimes the Venerable One did not drink for half a month or even for a month.

6 Or he did not drink for more than two months, or even six months, day and night, without desire (for drink). Sometimes he ate stale food.

7 Sometimes he ate only the sixth meal, or the eighth, the tenth, the twelfth; without desires, persevering in meditation.

8 Having wisdom, Mahavira committed no sin himself, nor did he induce others to do so, nor did he consent to the sins of others.

9 Having entered a village or a town, he begged for food which had been prepared for somebody else. Having got clean food, he used it, restraining the impulses.

10 When there were hungry crows, or thirsty beings stood in his way, where he begged, or when he saw them flying repeatedly down,

11 When a Brahmana or Sramana, a beggar or guest, a Kandala 1, a cat, or a dog stood in his way, 12 Without ceasing in his reflections, and avoiding to overlook them, the Venerable One slowly wandered about, and, killing no creatures, he begged for his food.

13 Moist or dry or cold food, old beans, old pap, or bad grain, whether he did or did not get such food, he was rich (in control).

14 And Mahavira meditated (persevering) in some posture, without the smallest motion; he meditated in mental concentration on (the things) above, below, beside, free from desires.

15 He meditated free from sin and desire, not attached to sounds or colours; though still an erring mortal (khadmastha), he wandered about, and never acted carelessly.

16 Himself understanding the truth and restraining the impulses for the purification of the soul, finally liberated, and free from delusion, the Venerable One was well guarded during his whole life.

This is the rule which has been followed, etc.

End of the Ninth Lecture, called the Pillow of Righteousness.

End of the First Book.

THE AKARANGA SUTRA, BOOK 2 FIRST PART.

AKARANGA BOOK 2 FIRST LECTURE, CALLED BEGGING OF FOOD.

FIRST LESSON.

1 When a male or a female mendicant, having entered the abode of a householder with the intention of collecting alms, recognises food, drink, dainties, and spices as affected by, or mixed up with, living beings, mildew, seeds or sprouts, or wet with water, or covered with dust--either in the hand or the pot of another [By the other is meant the householder or the giver (datri).]--they should not, even if they can get it, accept of such food, thinking that it is impure and unacceptable.

2 But if perchance they accept of such food, under pressing circumstances, they should go to a secluded spot, a garden, or a monk's hall--where there are no eggs, nor living beings, nor sprouts, nor dew, nor water, nor ants, nor mildew, nor drops (of water), nor mud, nor cobwebs--and rejecting (that which is affected by), and cleaning that which is mixed up (with living beings, etc.), they should circumspectly eat or drink it. But with what they cannot eat or drink, they should resort to a secluded spot, and leave it there on a heap of ashes or bones, or rusty things, or chaff, or cowdung, or on any such-like place which they have repeatedly examined and cleaned.

3 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept as alms whatever herbs they recognise, on examining them, as still whole, containing their source of life, not split longwise or broadwise, and still alive, fresh beans, living and not broken; for such food is impure and unacceptable.

4 But when they recognise after examination that those herbs are no more whole, do not contain their source of life, are split longwise or broadwise, and no more alive, fresh beans, lifeless and broken, then they may accept them, if they get them; for they are pure and acceptable.

5 A monk or nun on a begging-tour should not accept as alms whatever flattened grains, grains containing much chaff, or half-roasted spikes of wheat, etc., or flour of wheat, etc., or rice or flour of rice, they recognise as only once worked; for such food is impure and unacceptable.

6 But when they recognise these things as more than once worked, as twice, thrice worked, then they may accept them, if they get them; for they are pure and acceptable.

7 A monk or a nun desiring to enter the abode of a householder for collecting alms, should not enter or leave it together with a heretic or a householder; or a monk who avoids all forbidden food, etc., together with one who does not.

8 A monk or a nun entering or leaving the out-of-door places for religious practices or for study I should not do so together with a heretic or a householder; or a monk who avoids all forbidden food, together with one who does not.

9 A monk or a nun wandering from village to village should not do so together with a heretic or a householder; or a monk who avoids all forbidden food, together with one who does not.

10 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not give, immediately or mediately, food, etc., to a heretic or a householder; or a monk who avoids all forbidden food, to one who does not.

A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept food, etc., from a householder whom they know to give out of respect for a Nirgrantha, in behalf of a fellow-ascetic, food, etc., which he has bought or stolen or taken, though it was not to be taken nor given, but was taken by force, by acting sinfully towards all sorts of living beings; for such-like food, etc., prepared by another man or by the giver himself, brought out of the house or not brought out of the house, belonging to the giver or not belonging to him, partaken or tasted of, or not partaken or tasted of, is impure and unacceptable.

11 In this precept substitute for 'on behalf of one fellow-ascetic,' (2) on behalf of many fellow-ascetics, (3) on behalf of one female fellow-ascetic, (4) on behalf of many female fellow-ascetics; so that there will be four analogous precepts.

12 A monk or a nun should not accept of food, etc., which they know has been prepared by the householder for the sake of many Sramanas and Brahmanas, guests, paupers, and beggars, after he has counted them, acting sinfully towards all sorts of living beings; for such food, whether it be tasted of or not, is impure and unacceptable.

13 A monk or a nun should not accept of food, etc., if the said food, etc., has been prepared by the giver himself, has not been partaken or tasted of; for such food, etc., is impure and unacceptable; but if the food, etc., has been prepared by another person, has been brought out of the house, belongs to the giver, has been partaken or tasted of, one may accept it; for it is pure and acceptable.

14 A monk or a nun wishing to enter the abode of a householder with the intention of collecting alms, should not, for the sake of food or drink, enter or leave such always liberal, always open houses, where they always give a morsel, always the best morsel, always a part of the meal, always nearly the half of it.

This certainly is the whole duty of a monk or a nun in which one should, instructed in all its meanings and endowed with bliss, always exert oneself.

Thus I say.

SECOND LESSON.

1 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept food, etc., in the following case: when, on the eighth or paushadha day, on the beginning of a fortnight, of a month, of two, three, four, five, or six months, or on the days of the seasons, of the junction of the seasons, of the intervals of the seasons, many Sramanas and Brahmanas, guests, paupers, and beggars are entertained with food, etc., out of one or two or three or four vessels, pots, baskets, or heaps of food; such-like food which has been prepared by the giver, etc., (all down to) not tasted of, is impure and unacceptable. But if it is prepared by another person, etc. (see first lesson, § 13), one may accept it; for it is pure and acceptable.

2 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour may accept food, etc., from unblamed, uncensored families, to wit, noble families, distinguished families, royal families, families belonging to the line of Ikshvaku, of Hari, cowherds' families, Vaisya families, barbers' families, carpenters' families, takurs' families, weavers' families; for such food, etc., is pure and acceptable.

3 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept food, etc., in the following case: when in assemblies, or during offerings to the manes, or on a festival of Indra or Skanda or Rudra or Mukunda or demons or Yakshas or the snakes, or on a festival in honour of a tomb, or a shrine, or a tree, or a hill, or a cave, or a well, or a tank, or a pond, or a river, or a lake, or the sea, or a mine--when on such-like various festivals many Sramanas and Brahmanas, guests, paupers, and beggars are entertained with food, etc. (all as in § 1, down to) acceptable.

4 But when he perceives that all have received their due share, and are enjoying their meal, he should address the householder's wife or sister or daughter-in-law or nurse or male or female servant or slave and say: 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) will you give me something to eat?' After these words of the mendicant, the other may bring forth food, etc., and give it him. Such food, etc., whether he beg for it or the other give it, he may accept; for it is pure and acceptable.

5 When a monk or a nun knows that at a distance of more than half a yugana a festive entertainment is going on, they should not resolve to go there for the sake of the festive entertainment.

6 When a monk hears that the entertainment is given in an eastern or western or southern or northern place, he should go respectively to the west or east or north or south, being quite indifferent (about the feast); wherever there is a festive entertainment, in a village or scot-free town, etc. (see 1, 7, 6, § 4), he should not go there for the sake of the festive entertainment.

The Kevalin assigns as the reason for this precept, that if the monk eats food, etc., which has been given him on such an occasion, he will incur the sin of one who uses what I has been prepared for him, or is mixed up with living beings, or has been bought or stolen or taken, though it was not to be taken, nor was it given, but taken by force.

7 A layman might, for the sake of a mendicant, make small doors large, or large ones small; put beds from a level position into a sloping one, or from a sloping position into a level one; place the beds out of the draught or in the draught; cutting and clipping the grass outside or within the upasraya, spread a couch for him, (thinking that) this mendicant is without means for a bed. Therefore should a well-controlled Nirgrantha not resolve to go to any festival which is preceded or followed by a feast.

This certainly is the whole duty, etc. (see end of lesson).

Thus I say.

THIRD LESSON.

1 When he has eaten or drunk at a festive entertainment, he might vomit (what he has eaten), or not well digest it; or some other bad disease or sickness might befall him.

The Kevalin says this is the reason:

A mendicant, having drunk various liquors, together with the householder or his wife, monks or nuns, might not find the (promised) resting-place on leaving the scene of entertainment and looking out for it; or in the resting-place he may get into mixed company; in the absence of his mind or in his drunkenness he may lust after a woman or a eunuch; approaching the mendicant (they will say): 'O long-lived Sramana! (let us meet) in the garden, or in the sleeping-place, in the night or in the twilight.' Luring him thus by his sensuality (she says): 'Let us proceed to enjoy the pleasures of love.' He might go to her, though he knows that it should not be done.

2 These are the causes to sin, they multiply continuously. Therefore should a well-controlled Nirgrantha not resolve to go to any festival which is preceded or followed by a feast.

3 A monk or a nun, hearing or being told of some festivity, might hasten there, rejoicing inwardly: 'There will be an entertainment, sure enough!' It is impossible to get there from other families alms which are acceptable and given out of respect for the cloth 1, and to eat the meal. As this would lead to sin, they should not do it. But they should enter there, and getting from other families their alms, should eat their meal.

4 A monk or a nun, knowing that in a village or a scot-free town, etc. (see 1, 7, 6, § 4), an entertainment will be given, should not resolve to go to that village, etc., for the sake of the entertainment. The Kevalin assigns as the reason here: When a man goes to a much-frequented and vulgar entertainment somebody's foot treads on his foot, somebody's hand moves his hand, somebody's bowl clashes against his bowl, somebody's head comes in collision with his head, somebody's body pushes his body, or somebody beats him with a stick or a bone or a fist or a clod, or sprinkles him with cold water, or covers him with dust; or he eats unacceptable food, or he receives what should be given to others. Therefore should a well-controlled Nirgrantha not resolve to go to a much-frequented and vulgar entertainment to partake of it.

5 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept such food, etc., about the acceptability or unacceptability of which his (or her) mind has some doubts or misgivings for such food, etc.

6 When a monk or a nun wishes to enter the abode of a householder, they should do so with the complete outfit.

7 A monk or a nun entering or leaving the out-of-door places for religious practices or study, should do so with the complete outfit.

8 A monk or a nun wandering from village to village should do so with the complete outfit.

9 A monk or a nun should not, with the complete outfit, enter or leave the abode of a householder to collect alms, or the out-of-door places for religious practices and study, or wander from village to village on perceiving that a strong and widely-spread rain pours down, or a strong and widely-spread mist is coming on, or a high wind raises much dust, or many flying insects are scattered about and fall down.

10 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept food, etc., in the houses of Kshatriyas, kings, messengers, and relations of kings, whether they are inside or outside, or invite them; for such food, etc., is impure and unacceptable. Thus I say.

FOURTH LESSON.

1 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not resolve to go to a festival, preceded or followed by an entertainment, to partake of it, when they know that there will be served up chiefly meat or fish or roasted slices of meat or fish; nor to a wedding breakfast in the husband's house or in that of the bride's father; nor to a funeral dinner or to a family dinner where something is served up,--if on their way there, there are many living beings, many seeds, many sprouts, much dew, much water, much mildew, many drops (of water), much dust, and many cobwebs; or if there have arrived or will arrive many Sramanas and Brahmanas, guests, paupers, and beggars, and if it will be a crowded assembly, so that a wise man may not enter or leave it, or learn there the sacred texts, to question about them, to repeat them, to consider them, to think about the substance of the law.

2 A monk or a nun may go to such an entertainment (as described in the preceding Sara), provided that on their way there, there are few living beings, few seeds, etc.; that no Sramanas and Brahmanas, etc., have arrived or will arrive; that it is not a crowded assembly, so that a wise man may enter or leave, etc. [This precept applies, according to the commentator, only to sick monks, or such as can get nothing elsewhere.]

3 A monk or a nun desirous to enter the abode of a householder, should not do so, when they see that the milch cows are being milked, or the food, etc., is being cooked, and that it is not yet distributed. Perceiving this, they should step apart and stay where no people pass or see them. But when they conceive that the milch cows are milked, the dinner prepared and distributed, then they may circumspectly enter or leave the householder's abode for the sake of alms.

4 Some of the mendicants say to those who follow the same rules of conduct, live (in the same place), or wander from village to village: 'This is indeed a small village, it is too populous, nor is it large; reverend gentlemen, go to the outlying villages to beg alms [The just arrived monks should do as they are bidden.]'

Some mendicant may have their kinsmen or relations, e. g. a householder or his wife, or daughters, or daughters-in-law, or nurses, or male and female slaves or servants. Such families with which he is connected by kindred or through marriage, he intends to visit before (the time of begging): 'I shall get there (he thinks) food or dainties or milk or thick sour milk or fresh butter or ghee or sugar or oil or honey or meat or liquor, a sesamum dish 3, or raw sugar, or a meal of parched wheat 4, or a meal of curds and sugar with spices 5; after having eaten and drunk, and having cleaned and rubbed the alms-bowl, I shall, together with other mendicants, enter or leave the abode of a householder to collect alms.' As this would be sinful, he should not do so.

5 But, at the proper time, entering there with the other mendicants, he may there in these or other families accept alms which are acceptable and given out of respect for his cloth, and eat his meal.

This certainly is the whole duty, etc. (see end of lesson).

Thus I say.

FIFTH LESSON.

1 When a monk or a nun on entering the abode of a householder sees that the first portion of the meal is being thrown away 1 or thrown down, or taken away, or distributed, or eaten, or put off, or has already been eaten or removed; that already other Sramanas and Brahmanas, guests, paupers, and beggars go there in great haste; (they might think), 'Hallo! I too shall go there in haste.' As this would be sinful, they should not do so.

2 When a monk or a nun on a begging-tour comes upon walls or gates, or bolts or holes to fit them, they should, in case there be a byway, avoid those (obstacles), and not go on straight.

The Kevalin says: This is the reason: Walking there, he might stumble or fall down; when he stumbles or falls down, his body might become contaminated with faeces, urine, phlegmatic humour, mucus, saliva, bile, matter, semen, or blood. And if his body has become soiled, he should not wipe or rub or scratch or clean [In honour of the gods.] or warm or dry it on the bare ground or wet earth [or dusty earth] on a rock or a piece of clay containing life, or timber inhabited by worms, or anything containing eggs, living beings, etc. (down to) cobwebs; but he should first beg for some straw or leaves, wood or a potsherd, which must be free from dust, resort with it to a secluded spot, and on a heap of ashes or bones, etc. (see 2, 1, 1, § 2), which he has repeatedly examined and cleaned, he should circumspectly wipe or rub, warm or dry (his body).

3 When a monk or a nun on a begging-tour perceives a vicious cow coming towards them, or a vicious buffalo coming towards them, or a vicious man, horse, elephant, lion, tiger, wolf, panther, bear, hyena, sarabha, shakal, cat, dog, boar, fox, leopard coming towards them, they should, in case there be a byway, circumspectly avoid them, and not walk on straight.

4 When a monk or a nun on a begging-tour comes on their way upon a pit, pillar, thorns, or unsafe, marshy or uneven ground, or mud, they should, in case there be a byway, avoid these (obstacles), and not walk on straight.

When a monk or a nun on a begging-tour perceives that the entrance of a householder's abode is secured by a branch of a thorn bush, they should not, without having previously got the (owner's) permission, and having examined and swept (the entrance), make it passable or enter and leave (the house). But they may circumspectly do so, after having got the (owner's) permission, and having examined and swept it.

5 When a monk or a nun on a begging-tour knows that a Sramana or a Brahmana, a guest, pauper or beggar has already entered (the house), they should not stand in their sight or opposite the door 1.

The Kevalin says: This is the reason: Another, on seeing him, might procure and give him food, etc. Therefore it has been declared to the mendicants: This is the statement, this is the reason, this is the order, that he should not stand in the other mendicants' sight or opposite the door.

Knowing this, he should go apart and stay where no people pass or see him. Another man may bring and give him food, etc., while he stays where no people pass or see him, and say unto him: 'O long-lived Sramana! this food, etc., has been given for the sake of all of you; eat it or divide it among you.' Having silently accepted the gift, he might think: Well, this is just (enough) for me! As this would be sinful, he should not do so.

Knowing this, he should join the other beggars, and after consideration say unto them: 'O long-lived Sramanas! this food, etc., is given for the sake of all of you; eat it or divide it among you.' After these words another might answer him: 'O long-lived Sramana! distribute it yourself.' Dividing the food, etc., he should not (select) for himself too great a portion, or the vegetables, or the conspicuous things, or the savoury things, or the delicious things, or the nice things, or the big things; but he should impartially divide it, not being eager or desirous or greedy or covetous (of anything). When he thus makes the division, another might say: 'O long-lived Sramana! do not divide (the food); but let us, all together, eat and drink.' When he thus eats, he should not select for himself too great a portion, etc.; but should eat and drink alike with all, not being desirous, etc.

6 When a monk or a nun on a begging-tour perceives that a Sramana or Brahmana, a beggar or guest has already entered the house, they should not overtake them and address (the householder) first. Knowing this, they should go apart and stay where no people pass or see them. But when they perceive that the other has been sent away or received alms, and has returned, they may circumspectly enter the house and address the householder.

This certainly is the whole duty, etc.

Thus I say.

SIXTH LESSON.

1 When a monk or a nun on a begging-tour perceives that many hungry animals have met and come together in search of food, e. g. those of the chicken-kind or those of the pig-kind, or that crows have met and come together, where an offering is thrown on the ground, they should, in case there be a byway, avoid them and not go on straight.

2 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not stand leaning against the door-post of the householder's abode, or his sink or spitting-pot, nor in sight of, or opposite to his bathroom or privy; nor should they contemplate a loophole or a mended spot or a fissure (of the house) or the bathing-house, showing in that direction with an arm or pointing with a finger, bowing up and down.

3 Nor should they beg, pointing with a finger at the householder, or moving him with a finger, or threatening him with a finger, or scratching him with a finger, or praising him, or using coarse language.

4 If he sees somebody eating, eg. the householder or his wife, etc., he should after consideration say: 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) will you give me some of that food?' After these words the other might wash or wipe his hand or pot or spoon or plate with cold or hot water 1. He should after consideration say: 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) do not wash or wipe your hand or pot or spoon or plate! If you want to give me something, give it as it is!' After these words the other might give him a share, having washed or wiped his hand, etc., with cold or hot water. But he should not accept anything out of such a hand, etc., which has been before treated thus; for it is impure and unacceptable.

5 It is also to be known that food, etc., is impure and unacceptable, which is given with a wet hand, though the hand be not purposely wetted.

6 The same rule holds good with regard to a moistened hand, etc., and a dusty hand, etc., and a hand which is soiled with clay, dew, orpiment, vermilion, realgar, collyrium, white chalk, alum, rice-flour, kukkusa, ground drugs.

7 It is also to be known that he may accept such food, etc., which is given with a soiled hand, etc., to one similarly soiled (i.e. with what one is to receive), or to one unsoiled, with hand similarly soiled; for such food, etc., is pure and acceptable.

8 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept flattened grains, grains containing much chaff, etc. (see 2, 1, 1, § 5), which a layman, for the sake of the mendicant, has ground 1, grinds, or will grind, has winnowed, winnows, or will winnow on a rock or a piece of clay containing life, etc. (see 2, 1, 5, § 2, all down to) cobwebs; for such large, parched grains, etc., are impure and unacceptable.

9 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept fossil salt or sea salt which a householder, for the sake of the mendicant, has ground or pounded, grinds or pounds, will grind or pound on a rock or a piece of clay containing life, etc.; for such-like fossil salt or sea salt is impure and unacceptable.

10 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept food, etc., which is prepared over the fire; for such food is impure and unacceptable. The Kevalin says: This is the reason: A layman will kill the fire-bodies, by wetting or moistening, wiping or rubbing, throwing up or turning down the food, etc., for the sake of the mendicant. Hence it has been declared to the mendicants: This is the statement, this is the reason, this is the order, that they should not accept food, etc., which has been prepared over the fire, etc.

This certainly is the whole duty, etc.

Thus I say.

SEVENTH LESSON.

1 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept food, etc., which has been placed on a post or pillar or beam or scaffold or loft 1 or platform or roof or some such-like elevated place; for such food fetched from above is impure and unacceptable. The Kevalin says: This is the reason: The layman might fetch and erect a stool or a bench or a ladder or a handmill, get upon it, and getting upon it fall or tumble down. Thus he might hurt his foot or arm or breast or belly or head or some other part of his body; or he might kill or frighten or bruise or smash or crush or afflict or pain or dislocate all sorts of living beings. Therefore he should not accept such-like food, etc., fetched from above.

2 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept food, etc., which a layman, for the sake of the mendicant, has taken from a granary or vault by contorting himself up and down and horizontally; thinking that such-like food is brought from underground.

3 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept food, etc., which is kept in earthenware. The Kevalin says: This is the reason: The layman might, for the sake of the mendicant, break the earthen vessel containing the food, etc., and thereby injure the earth-body; in the same way he might injure the fire-body, the wind-body, plants and animals; by putting it again (in earthenware), he commits the pakkhakamma sin. Hence it has been said to the mendicant, etc., that he should not accept food, etc., which is put in earthenware.

4 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept food, etc., placed on the earth-body, the wind-body, the fire-body, for such food is impure and unacceptable. The Kevalin says: This is the reason: A layman might, for the sake of the mendicant, stir or brighten the fire, and taking the food, etc., down from it, might give it to the mendicant. Hence it has been said, etc., that he should accept no such food.

5 When a monk or a nun on a begging-tour sees that a layman might, for the sake of the mendicant, cool too hot food, etc., by blowing or fanning with a winnowing basket or fan or a palm leaf or a branch or a part of a branch or a bird's tail or a peacock's tail or a cloth or a corner of a cloth or the hand or the mouth, they should, after consideration, say (to the householder or his wife): 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) do not blow or fan the hot food, etc., with a winnowing basket, etc.; but if you want to give it me, give it as it is.' After these words the other might give it after having blown or fanned it with a winnowing basket, etc.; such-like food they should not accept, because it is impure and unacceptable.

6 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept food, etc., which is placed on vegetable or animal matter 1; for such food is impure and unacceptable.

7 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept water which has been used for watering flour or sesamum or rice, or any other such-like water which has been recently used for washing, which has not acquired a new taste, nor altered its taste or nature, nor has been strained; for such-like water is impure and unacceptable. But if it has long ago been used for washing, has acquired a new taste, has altered its taste or nature, and has been strained, it may be accepted, for it is pure and acceptable.

8 When a monk or a nun on a begging-tour finds water used for washing sesamum, chaff or barley, or rainwater or sour gruel or pure water, they should, after consideration, say (to the householder or his wife): 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) will you give me some of this water?' Then the other may answer him: 'O long-lived Sramana! take it yourself by drawing it with, or pouring it in, your bowl!' Such-like water, whether taken by himself or given by the other, he may accept.

9 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept such water as has been taken from the bare ground, etc. (see 2, 1, 5, § 2, all down to) cobwebs, or water which the layman fetches in a wet or moist or dirty vessel, mixing it with cold water.

This certainly is the whole duty, etc.

Thus I say.

EIGHTH LESSON.

1 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept juice of mangos, insipidated juice of mangos, juice of wood-apples, citrons, grapes, wild dates, pomegranates, cocoa-nuts, bamboos, jujubes, myrobalans, tamarinds, or any such-like liquor containing particles of the shell or skin or seeds, which liquor the layman, for the sake of the mendicant, pressed, strained, or filtered through a basket 1, cloth, or a cow's tail; for such liquor is impure and unacceptable.

2 When a monk or a nun on a begging-tour smells, in travellers' houses or garden houses or householders' houses or maths, the scent of food or drink or sweet scents, they should not smell them, being indifferent against smell, and not eager or desirous or greedy or covetous of the pleasant smell.

3 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept raw things which are not yet modified by instruments 1, as bulbous roots, growing in water or dry ground, mustard stalks; for they are impure and unacceptable. The same holds good with regard to long pepper, ground long pepper, common pepper, ground common pepper, ginger or ground ginger.

4 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept such raw fruits which are not yet modified by instruments, as those of Mango, Amratika, Ghigghira [Name of a shrub.], Surabhi 3, Sallaki [Boswellia Thurifera.], for they, etc.

5 The same holds good with regard to raw shoots which, etc., as those of Asvattha, Nyagrodha, Pilamkhu 5, Niyura [Cedrela Toona.], Sallaki.

6 The same holds good with regard to raw berries which, etc., as those of Kapittha [The wood-apple tree, Feronia Elephantum.], pomegranate, or Pippala.

7 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept raw, powdered fruits which are not well ground and still contain small seeds, as those of Umbara, Pilamkhu, Nyagrodha, and Asvattha; for etc.

8 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept unripe wild rice, dregs, honey, liquor, ghee, or sediments of liquor, if these things be old or if living beings are engendered or grow or thrive in them, or are not taken out, or killed or destroyed in them.

9 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept any such-like raw plants 1 as Ikshumeru, Ankakarelu, Kaseru, Samghatika, Putialu.

10 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept any such-like (vegetables) as Nymphaea or stalk of Nymphaea or the bulb of Nelumbium or the upper part or the filament of Lotus or any part of the plant.

11 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept such-like raw substances as seeds or sprouts, growing on the top or the root or the stem or the knots (of a plant), likewise the pulp or blossoms of the plantain, cocoa-nut, wild date, and palmyra trees.

12 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept any such-like raw unmodified substances as sugar-cane, which is full of holes, or withering or peeling off or corroded by wolves; or the points of reeds or the pulp of plantains.

13 The same holds good with regard to garlic or its leaves or stalk or bulb or integument.

14 Likewise with regard to cooked fruits of Aththiya [A certain tree.], Tinduka [Diospyros Glutinosa.], Vilva [Aegle Marmelos], Sriparni [Pistia Stratiotes.].

15 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept such raw, unmodified substances as corn, clumps of corn, cakes of corn, sesamum, ground sesamum, or cakes of sesamum.

This is the whole duty, etc.

Thus I say.

NINTH LESSON.

1 In the east or west or south or north, there are some faithful householders, etc., (all down to) servants who will speak thus: 'It is not meet that these illustrious, pious, virtuous, eloquent, restrained, controlled, chaste ascetics, who have ceased from sensual intercourse, should eat or drink food, etc., which is adhakarmika 1; let us give to the ascetics all food, etc., that is ready for our use, and let us, afterwards, prepare food for our own use.' Having heard such talk, the mendicant should not accept such-like food, etc., for it is impure and unacceptable.

2 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour or in their residence or on a pilgrimage from village to village, who know that in a village or scot-free town, etc., dwell a mendicant's nearer or remoter relations--viz. a householder or his wife, etc.--should not enter or leave such houses for the sake of food or drink. The Kevalin says: This is the reason: Seeing him, the other might, for his sake, procure or prepare food, etc. Hence it has been said to the mendicant, etc., that he should not enter or leave such houses for the sake of food or drink.

Knowing this, he should go apart and stay where no people pass or see him. In due time he may enter other houses, and having begged for alms which are acceptable and given out of respect for his cloth, he may eat his dinner. If the other has, on the mendicant's timely entrance, procured or prepared food, etc., which is adhakarmika, he might silently examine it, and think: 'Why should I abstain from what has been brought.' As this would be sinful, he should not do so. But after consideration he should say: 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) as it is not meet that I should eat or drink food, etc., which is adhakarmika, do not procure or prepare it.' If after these words the other brings and gives him adhakarmika food which he has prepared, he should not accept such-like food, etc., for it is impure and unacceptable.

3 When a monk or a nun on a begging-tour sees that meat or fish is being roasted, or oil cakes, for the sake of a guest, are being prepared, they should not, quickly approaching, address the householder; likewise if the food is prepared for the sake of a sick person.

4 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour might, of the received quantity of food, eat only the sweet-smelling parts and reject the bad-smelling ones. As this would be sinful, they should not do so; but they should consume everything, whether it be sweet smelling or bad smelling, and reject nothing.

5 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour might, of the received quantity of drink, imbibe only the well-flavoured part, and reject the astringent part. As this would be sinful, they should not do so; but they should consume everything, whether it be well flavoured or astringent, and reject nothing.

6 A monk or a nun, having received a more than sufficient quantity of food, might reject (the superfluous part) without having considered or consulted fellow-ascetics living in the neighbourhood, who follow the same rules of conduct, are agreeable and not to be shunned; as this would be sinful, they should not do so. Knowing this, they should go there and after consideration say: 'O long-lived Sramanas! this food, etc., is too much for me, eat it or drink it!' After these words the other might say: 'O long-lived Sramana! we shall eat or drink as much of this food or drink as we require; or, we require the whole, we shall eat or drink the whole.'

7 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept food, etc., which for the sake of another has been put before the door, if the householder has not permitted him to do so, or he gives it him; for such food, etc. But on the contrary he may accept it.

This is the whole duty, etc.
Thus I say.

TENTH LESSON.

1 A single mendicant, having collected alms for many, might, without consulting his fellow-ascetics, give them to those whom he list; as this would be sinful, he should not do so. Taking the food, he should go there (where his teacher etc. is) and speak thus: 'O long-lived Sramana! there are near or remote (spiritual) relations of mine: a teacher, a sub-teacher, a religious guide, a Sthavira, a head of a Gana, a Ganadhara, a founder of a Gana; forsooth, I shall give it them.' The other may answer him: 'Well now, indeed, O long-lived one! give such a portion!' As much as the other commands, thus much he should give; if the other commands the whole, he should give the whole.

2 A single mendicant, having collected agreeable food, might cover it with distasteful food, thinking: 'The teacher or sub-teacher, etc., seeing what I have received, might take it himself; indeed, I shall not give anything to anybody!' As this would be sinful, he should not do so.

Knowing this, he should go there (where the other mendicants are), should put the vessel in his out-stretched hand, show it (with the words): Ah, this! ah, this! and hide nothing.

3 A single mendicant, having received some food, might eat what is good, and bring what is discoloured and tasteless; as this would be sinful, he should not do so.

4 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept any part of the sugar-cane 1, whether small or large, pea-pods, seed-pods, of which articles a small part only can be eaten, and the greater part must be rejected; for such things are impure and unacceptable.

5 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept meat or fish containing many bones, so that only a part of it can be eaten and the greater part must be rejected; for such meat or fish, etc., is impure and unacceptable.

6 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour may be invited to meat or fish containing many bones, (by the householder who addresses him thus): 'O long-lived Sramana! will you accept meat with many bones?' Hearing such a communication, he should say, after consideration: 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) it is not meet for me to accept meat with many bones; if you want to give me a portion of whatever size, give it me; but not the bones!' If after these words the other (i.e. the householder) should fetch meat containing many bones, put it in a bowl and return with it, (the mendicant) should not accept such a bowl, whether out of the other's hand or a vessel [They are detailed in the original: amtarukkhuyam, a piece between two knots; ukkhugamdiyam, a piece containing a knot; ukkhukoyagam (?), ukkhumeragam, top of a stalk; ukkhusalagam, long leaf; ukkhudalagam, fragment of a leaf.]; for it is impure and unacceptable. But if he has inadvertently accepted it, he should not say: 'No, away, take it!' Knowing this, he should go apart, and in a garden or an upasraya, where there are few eggs, etc., (all down to o) cobwebs, eat the meat or fish, and taking the bones, he should resort to a secluded spot and leave them on a heap of ashes, etc. (see 2, 1, 1, § 2).

7 If a householder should fetch fossil salt or sea salt, put it in a bowl and return with it, a monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not accept it out of the other's hand or vessel; for, etc.

But if he has inadvertently accepted it, he should return with it to the householder, if he is not yet too far away, and say, after consideration: 'Did you give me this with your full knowledge or without it?' He might answer: I did give it without my full knowledge; but indeed, O long-lived one! I now give it you; consume it or divide it (with others)!' Then being permitted by, and having received it from, the householder, he should circumspectly eat it or drink it, and what he cannot eat or drink he should share with his fellow-ascetics in the neighbourhood, who follow the same rules of conduct, are agreeable, and not to be shunned; but if there are no fellow-ascetics, the same should be done as in case one has received too much food.

This is the whole duty, etc.
Thus I say.

ELEVENTH LESSON.

1 Some mendicants say unto (others) who follow the same rules of conduct, or live in the same place, or wander from village to village, if they have received agreeable food and another mendicant falls sick [This is the way in which the commentator construes the sentence. There is some confusion in the text, which cannot easily be removed.]: 'Take it! give it him! if the sick mendicant will not eat it, thou mayst eat it.' But he (who is ordered to bring the food) thinking, 'I shall eat it myself,' covers it and shows it (saying): This is the lump of food, it is rough to the taste, it is pungent, it is bitter, it is astringent, it is sour, it is sweet; there is certainly nothing in it fit for a sick person.' As this would be sinful, he should not do so. But he should show him which parts are not fit for a sick person (saying): 'This particle is pungent, this one bitter, this one astringent, this one sour, this one sweet.'

2 Some mendicants say unto (others) who follow the same rules of conduct, or live in the same place, or wander from village to village, if they have received agreeable food and another mendicant falls sick: 'Take it! give it him! if the mendicant will not eat it, bring it to us!' If nothing prevents me, I shall bring it.' (Then he might act as stated in § 1, which would be sinful.)

3 For the avoidance of these occasions to sin there are seven rules for begging food and as many for begging drink, to be known by the mendicants.

Now, this is the first rule for begging food. Neither hand nor vessel are wet 1: with such a hand or vessel he may accept as pure, food, etc., for which he himself begs or which the other gives him. That is the first rule for begging food.

4 Now follows the second rule for begging food. The hand and the vessel are wet. The rest as in the preceding rule. That is the second rule for begging food.

5 Now follows the third rule for begging food. In the east, etc., there are several faithful householders, etc., (all down to) servants: they have put (food) in some of their various vessels, as a pan, a pot, a winningnow basket, a basket, a precious vessel. Now (the mendicant) should again know: is the hand not wet and the vessel wet; or the hand wet and the vessel not wet? If he collect alms with an alms-bowl or with his hand, he should say, after consideration: 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) with your not-wet hand, or with your wet vessel, put (alms) in this my bowl, or hand, and give it me!' Such-like food, for which he himself begs or which the other gives him, he may accept; for it is pure and acceptable. That is the third rule for begging food.

6 Now follows the fourth rule for begging food. A monk or a nun may accept flattened grains, etc. (cf. 2, 1, 1, § 5), for which they beg themselves or which the other gives them, if it be such as to require little cleaning or taking out (of chaff); for it is pure, etc. That is the fourth rule for begging food.

7 Now follows the fifth rule for begging food. A monk or a nun may accept food which is offered on a plate or a copper cup or any vessel, if the moisture on the hands of the giver is almost dried up; for, etc. That is the fifth rule for begging food.

8 Now follows the sixth rule for begging food. A monk or a nun may accept food which had been taken up from the ground, either taken up for one's own sake or accepted for the sake of somebody else, whether it be placed in a vessel or in the hand; for, etc. That is the sixth rule for begging food.

9 Now follows the seventh rule for begging food. A monk or a nun may accept food of which only a part may be used, and which is not wanted by bipeds, quadrupeds, Sramanas, Brahmanas, guests, paupers, and beggars, whether they beg for it themselves, or the householder gives it them. That is the seventh rule for begging food.

10 These are the seven rules for begging food; now follow the seven rules for begging drink. They are, however, the same as those about food, only the fourth gives this precept: A monk or a nun may accept as drink water which has been used for watering flour or sesamum, etc. (2, 1, 7, § 7), if it be such as to require little cleaning and taking out (of impure) articles; for, etc.

11 One who has adopted one of these seven rules for begging food or drink should not say: 'These reverend persons have chosen a wrong rule, I alone have rightly chosen.' (But he should say): 'These reverend persons, who follow these rules, and I who follow that rule, we all exert ourselves according to the commandment of the Gīna, and we respect each other accordingly.'

This certainly is the whole duty, etc.
Thus I say.

End of the First Lecture, called Begging of Food.

AKARANGA BOOK 2 SECOND LECTURE, CALLED BEGGING FOR A COUCH. FIRST LESSON.

1 If a monk or a nun want to ask for a lodging, and having entered a village or scot-free town, etc., conceive that lodging to contain eggs, living beings, etc., they should not use it for religious postures, night's-rest, or study.

2 But if the lodging contains only few eggs or few living beings, etc., they may, after having inspected and cleaned it, circumspectly use it for religious postures, etc. Now, if they conceive that the householder, for the sake of a Nirgrantha and on behalf of a fellow-ascetic (male or female, one or many), gives a lodging which he has bought or stolen or taken, though it was not to be taken nor given, but was taken by force, by acting sinfully towards all sorts of living beings, they should not use for religious postures, etc., such a lodging which has been appropriated by the giver himself, etc. (see 2, 1, 1, § 11).

The same holds good if there be instead of a fellow-ascetic many Sramanas and Brahmanas, guests, paupers, and beggars. But if the lodging has been appropriated by another man than the giver, etc., they may, after having inspected and cleaned it, circumspectly use it for religious postures, etc.

3 A monk or a nun, knowing that the layman has, for the sake of the mendicant, matted the lodging, whitewashed it, strewn it (with grass, etc.), smeared it (with cowdung), levelled, smoothed, or perfumed it (or the floor of it), should not use that lodging, which has been prepared by the giver himself, etc., for religious postures. But if it has been prepared by another person, etc., they may circumspectly use it for religious postures.

4 A monk or a nun, knowing that a layman will, for the sake of a mendicant, make small doors large, etc. (all as in 2, 1, 2, § 7, down to) spread his couch or place it outside, should not use such a lodging which has been appropriated by the giver himself, etc., for religious postures, etc. But if it has been appropriated by another person, etc., they may circumspectly use it for religious postures, etc.

5 Again, a monk or a nun, knowing that the layman, for the sake of the mendicant, removes from one place to another, or places outside, bulbs or roots or leaves or flowers or fruits or seeds or grass-blades of water plants, should not use such a lodging, which is appropriated by the giver himself, for religious postures, etc. But if it has been prepared by another person, etc., they may circumspectly use it for religious postures, etc.

6 A monk or a nun, knowing that the layman, for the sake of the mendicant, removes from one place to another, or places outside, a chair or a board or a ladder or a mortar, should not use such a lodging-place, etc. (all as at the end of the last paragraph).

7 A monk or a nun should not use for religious postures, etc., a lodging-place above ground, as a pillar or a raised platform or a scaffold or a second story or a flat roof, likewise no underground place (except under urgent circumstances). If by chance they are thus lodged, they should there not wash or clean their hands or feet or eyes or teeth or mouth with hot or cold water; nor should they put forth there any other secretion, as excrements, urine, saliva, mucus, bilious humour, ichor, blood, or any other part of the bodily humours.

The Kevalin says: This is the reason: Making secretions he might stumble or fall; stumbling or falling he might hurt his hand, etc. (2, 1, 7, § 1), or any other limb of his body, or kill, etc., all sorts of living beings. Hence it has been said to the mendicant, etc., that he should use no above-ground lodging-place for religious postures, etc.

8 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour should not use, for religious postures, a lodging-place used by the householder, in which there are women, children, cattle, food, and drink. This is the reason: A mendicant living together with a householder's family may have an attack of gout, dysentery, or vomiting; or some other pain, illness, or disease may befall him; the layman might, out of compassion, smear or anoint the mendicant's body with oil or ghee or butter or grease, rub or shampoo it with perfumes, drugs, lodhra, dye, powder, padmaka, then brush or rub it clean; clean, wash, or sprinkle it with hot or cold water, kindle or light a fire by rubbing wood on wood; and having done so, he might dry or warm (the mendicant's body).

Hence it has been said to the mendicant, etc., that he should not use for religious postures, etc., a lodging-place which is used by the householder.

9 This is (another) reason: While a mendicant lives in a lodging used by the householder, the householder or his wife, etc., might bully, scold, attack or beat each other. Then the mendicant might direct his mind to approval or dislike: 'Let them bully each other!' or, 'Let them not bully each other!' etc. etc.

Hence it has been said to the mendicant, etc., that he should not use, for religious postures, etc., a lodging-place used by the householder.

10 This is (another) reason: While the mendicant lives together with householders, the householder might, for his own sake, kindle or light or extinguish a fire-body. Then the mendicant might direct his mind to approval or dislike: 'Let them kindle or light or extinguish a fire-body!' or, 'Let them not do so.'

Hence it has been said to the mendicant, etc. (see above).

11 This is (another) reason: While the mendicant lives together with householders, he might see the householder's earrings or girdle or jewels or pearls or gold and silver 2 or bracelets (those round the wrist and those round the upper arm) or necklaces (those consisting of three strings, or those reaching halfway down the body, or those consisting of eighty strings or forty strings or one string or strings of pearls, golden beads or jewels) or a decked or ornamented girl or maiden. Thus the mendicant might direct his mind to approval or dislike: 'Let her be thus!' or, 'Let her not be thus.' So he might say, so he might think. Hence it has been said to the mendicant, etc. (see above).

12 This is (another) reason: While a mendicant lives together with householders, the householder's wives, daughters, daughters-in-law, nurses, slave-girls or servant-girls might say: 'These reverend Sramanas, etc., have ceased from sexual intercourse; it behoves them not to indulge in sexual intercourse: whatever woman indulges with them in sexual intercourse, will have a strong, powerful, illustrious, glorious, victorious son of heavenly beauty.' Hearing and perceiving such talk, one of them might induce the mendicant ascetic to indulge in sexual intercourse.

Hence it has been said to the mendicant, etc., that he should not use for religious postures, etc., a lodging used by the householder.

This is the whole duty, etc.

Thus I say.

SECOND LESSON.

1 Some householders are of clean habits and the mendicants, because they never bathe, are covered with uncleanness; they smell after it, they smell badly, they are disagreeable, they are loathsome. Hence the householders, with regard to the mendicant, put off some work which otherwise they would have done before, and do some work which otherwise they would have put off.

Hence it has been said to the mendicant, etc., that he should not use, for religious postures, etc., a lodging used by the householder.

2 This is the reason: While a mendicant lives together with householders, the householder might, for his own sake, have prepared something to eat. Then, afterwards, he might, for the sake of the mendicant, prepare or dress food, etc., and the mendicant might desire to eat or drink or swallow it.

Hence it has been said to the mendicant, etc. (see above).

3 This is the reason: While the mendicant lives together with a householder, there may be ready wood cleft for the use of the householder. Then, afterwards, (the householder) might, for the sake of the mendicant, cleave or buy or steal wood, kindle or light, by rubbing wood on wood, the fire-body, and the mendicant might desire to dry or warm himself at, or enjoy, the fire.

Hence it has been said to the mendicant, etc. (see above).

4 When in the night or twilight a mendicant, to ease nature, leaves the door open, a thief, watching for an occasion, might enter. It is not meet for the mendicant to say: 'This thief enters or does not enter, he hides himself or does not hide himself, he creeps in or does not creep in, he speaks or does not speak; he has taken it, another has taken it, it is taken from that man;

this is the thief, this is the accomplice, this is the murderer, he has done so [For if he gives warning of the thief, the warnor or the thief might be slain; but if he gives no warning, no life will be lost, though the mendicant's integrity may be doubted.]. The householder will suspect the ascetic, the mendicant, who is not a thief, to be the thief. Hence it has been said to the mendicant, etc.

5 A monk or a nun should not use, for religious postures, etc., sheds of grass or straw which contain eggs, living beings, etc. But they may do so if they contain few eggs, few living beings, etc.

6 A mendicant should not stay in halting-places, garden houses, family houses, monasteries, where many fellow-ascetics are frequently arriving.

1. If the reverend persons continue to live in those places after staying there for a month* in the hot or cold seasons or for the rainy season (he should say): 'O long-lived one! you sin by overstaying the fixed time.' [* Or any fixed period, which the mendicant has vowed not to exceed staying in one place.]

7 2. If the reverend persons repeatedly live in halting-places, etc., after staying there for the proper time, without passing two or three intermediate months somewhere else, (he should say): 'O long-lived one! you sin by repeating your retreat in the same place.'

8 3. Here, in the east, west, north, or south, there are, forsooth, some faithful householders, householders' wives, etc., who are not well acquainted with the rules of monastic life (with regard to the fitness of lodging-places); nevertheless they believe in, perceive, are convinced of, (the merit of) giving lodging to mendicants. They (accordingly) give lodging-places for the sake of many Sramanas and Brahmanas, guests, paupers, and beggars, in workshops, chapels, temples, assembly halls, wells, houses or halls for shopkeeping or for keeping or building carriages, distilleries, houses where Darbha-grass, bark, trees, wood or charcoal are being worked, houses on burial-places, rooms for retirement near the place of sacrifice 1, empty houses, hill-houses, caves, stone-houses, or palaces. He should say to those reverend persons who live in such-like places as workshops, etc., together with other guests: 'O long-lived one! you sin by living in a place frequented by other sectarians.'

9 4. Here, in the east, etc. They accordingly give, etc. (all as in §8 down to) palaces. If the mendicants come there while the other religious men do not come there, they sin by living in a place not frequented by other mendicants.

10 5. In the east, west, north, or south there are faithful householders, viz. a householder or his wife, etc., who will speak thus: 'It is not meet that these illustrious, pious, virtuous, eloquent, controlled, chaste ascetics, who have ceased from sexual intercourse, should dwell in a lodging which is adhakarmika: let us give to the mendicants the lodgings which are ready for our use, viz. workshops, etc., and let us, afterwards, prepare lodgings for our own use, viz. workshops, etc.' Hearing and perceiving such talk, if the reverend persons frequent such-like lodgings, viz. workshops, etc., and live in them which are ceded by other people (they should be warned): 'O long-lived one! that (lodging is infected by the sin called) vargakriya.'

11 6. Here, in the east, etc. (see §8 all down to) they give lodging-places for the sake of many Sramanas and Brahmanas, guests, paupers, and beggars, after having well counted them, in workshops, etc.

If the reverend persons frequent such-like lodgings, viz. workshops, etc., and live in them which are ceded by other people (they should be warned): 'O long-lived one! that (lodging is infected by the sin called) mahavargakriya.'

12 7. Here, in the east, etc. They accordingly give, for the sake of many sorts of Sramanas 1, after having well counted them, lodging-places, viz. workshops, etc. If the reverend persons frequent such-like lodgings, viz. workshops, etc., and live in them which are ceded by other people (they should be warned): 'O long-lived one! that (lodging is infected by the sin called) savadyakriya.'

13 8. Here, in the east, etc. They accordingly prepare, for the sake of one sort of Sramanas, lodgings, viz. workshops, etc., for which purpose great injury is done to the earth, water, fire, wind-bodies, plants, and animals, great injury, great cruelty, great and manifold sinful acts; by wasting cold water or strewing (the ground), smearing it with cowdung, shutting the doors and securing the bed, lighting a fire. If the reverend persons frequent such-like lodgings, viz. workshops, etc., and lead in such ceded lodgings an ambiguous 2 life (they should be warned): 'O long-lived one! that (lodging is infected by the sin called) mahasavadyakriya.'

14 9. But if the lodgings, viz. workshops, etc., are prepared by the householders for their own sake under the same circumstances as detailed in the preceding paragraph, and the reverend persons frequent such-like lodgings, they lead, in those lodgings, an unambiguous life. 'O long-lived one! that (lodging is infected by the very small sin called) alpa savadyakriya.'

This is the whole duty, etc.

Thus I say.

THIRD LESSON.

1 'It' is difficult to obtain pure, acceptable alms; it is indeed not free from such preparations as strewing the ground (with Darbha-grass), smearing it (with cowdung), shutting the doors and securing the beds. [* The commentators say that this passage contains the mendicant's answer to an invitation to live in this or that village. By the second it is meant the lodging.] And he (the mendicant) delights in pilgrimage, religious exercises, study, begging for a bed, a couch, or other alms.'

Some mendicants explain thus (the requisites of a lodging); they are called upright, searching after liberation, practising no deceit.

Some householders (who, having learned the requisites of a lodging-place, fit one out accordingly, try to deceive the mendicants, saying): 'This lodging, which we offer you, has been assigned to you, it has been originally prepared for our sake, or for the sake of some relations, it has been used, it has been relinquished.'

Explaining* thus, he truly explains. (The teacher says): Well, he is (an explainer of the truth). [* The commentator supposes here the householder to further p. 130 inquire after the requisites of, and the objections to, the lodging-place. The mendicant should explain them.]

2 If a mendicant, at night or at the twilight, leaves or enters a small lodging, one with a small door, a low or cramped lodging, (he should put forward) first his hand, then his foot, and thus circumspectly leave or enter it.

The Kevalin says: This is the reason: There might be a badly bound, badly placed, badly fastened, loose umbrella, pot, stick, staff, robe, hide, leather boots or piece of leather belonging to Sramanas or Brahmanas; and the mendicant, when leaving or entering (the lodging) at night or twilight, might stumble or fall; stumbling or falling he might hurt his hand or foot, etc. (see IV, 1, 7, § 1), kill, etc., all sorts of living beings.

Hence it has been said to the mendicant, etc., that one (should put forward) first the hand, then the foot, and thus circumspectly leave or enter such a lodging.

3 He (the mendicant) should, at halting-places, etc., ask for a lodging-place, after having inquired who is the landlord or who is the tenant. He should ask permission to use the lodging-place in this way: 'By your favour, O long-lived one! we shall dwell here for a while (for the time and in the place) which you will concede.' (If the landlord should object and say that he owns the lodging for a limited time only, or if he asks for the number of monks for which the lodging is required, he should answer) 1: 'As long as this lodging belongs to you, (or) for the sake of as many fellow-ascetics (as shall stand in need of it), we shall occupy the lodging; afterwards we shall take to wandering.'

4 A monk or a nun may know the name and gotra of him in whose lodging he lives; in that case they should not accept food, etc., in that house whether invited or not invited; for it is impure and unacceptable.

5 A monk or a nun should not use for religious postures, etc., a lodging-place which is used by the householder, which contains fire or water; for it is not fit for a wise man to enter or leave it, etc. (cf. II, 1, 4, § 1).

6 A monk or a nun should not use for religious postures, etc., a lodging for which they have to pass through the householder's abode, or to which there is no road; for it is not fit, etc. (see last paragraph).

7 A monk or a nun should not use for religious postures, etc., a lodging where the householder or his wife, etc., might bully or scold, etc., each other (see 2, 2, 1, § 9); for it is not fit, etc.

8 A monk or a nun should not use for religious postures, etc., a lodging where the householder or his wife, etc., rub or anoint each other's body with oil or ghee or butter or grease; for it is not fit, etc.

9 A monk or a nun should not use for religious postures, etc., a lodging where the householder or his wife, etc., rub or shampoo each other's body with perfumes, ground drugs, powder, lodhra, etc. (see 2, 2, 1, § 8); for it is not fit, etc.

10 A monk or a nun should not use for religious postures, etc., a lodging where the householder or his wife, etc., clean, wash, or sprinkle each other's body with cold or hot water; for it is not fit, etc.

11 A monk or a nun should not use for religious postures, etc., a lodging where the householder or his wife, etc., go about naked or hide themselves, or talk about sexual pleasures, or discuss a secret plan; for it is not fit, etc.

12 A monk or a nun should not use for religious postures, etc., a lodging which is a much-frequented playground 1; for it is not fit, etc.

13 1. If a monk or a nun wish to beg for a couch, they should not accept one which they recognise full of eggs, living beings, etc.

14 2. If the couch is free from eggs, living beings, but is heavy, they should not accept such a couch.

3. If the couch is free from eggs, living beings, light, but not movable, they should not accept such a couch. (15)

THE GRAND BIBLE

16 4. If the couch is free from eggs, living beings, etc., light, movable, but not well tied, they should not accept such a couch.

17 5. If the couch is free from eggs, living beings, light, movable, and well tied, they may accept such a couch.

18 For the avoidance of these occasions to sin there are four rules, according to which the mendicant should beg for a couch. Now this is the first rule for begging for a couch.

If a monk or a nun beg for a couch, specifying (its quality), viz. one of Ikkata-reed, a hard one, one of Gantuka-grass, of Para-grass, of peacock feathers, of hay, of Kusa-grass, of brush-hair, of Pakkaka, of Pippala, of straw, they should, after consideration, say: 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) please give me this here!' If the householder prepares one of the above-specified couches, or if the mendicant asks himself, and the householder gives it, then he may accept it as pure and acceptable.

This is the first rule.

19 Now follows the second rule.

If a monk or a nun beg for a couch (of the above-detailed description) after having well inspected it, they should, after consideration, say: 'O long-lived one! etc.' (all as in the first rule).

This is the second rule 2.

20 If a monk or a nun beg for a couch of the above-detailed description, viz. one of Ikkata-grass, etc., from him in whose house he lives, they may use it if they get it; if not, they should remain in a squatting or sitting posture (for the whole night).

This is the third rule.

21 Now follows the fourth rule.

If a monk or a nun beg for a couch such as it is spread, either on the ground or on a wooden plank, they may use it if they get it; if not, they should remain in a squatting or sitting posture (for the whole night).

This is the fourth rule.

22 A monk who has adopted one of these four rules, should not say, etc. (all as in 2, 1, 11, § 12, down to) we respect each other accordingly.

23 If a monk or a nun wish to give back a couch, they should not do so, if the couch contains eggs, living beings, etc. But if it contains few living beings, etc., they may restrainedly do so, after having well inspected, swept, and dried it.

24 A monk or a nun on a begging-tour or in a residence or on a pilgrimage from village to village should first inspect the place for easing nature. The Kevalin says: This is the reason: If a monk or a nun, in the night or the twilight, ease nature in a place which they have not previously inspected, they might stumble or fall, stumbling or falling they might hurt the hand or foot, etc., kill, etc., all sorts of living beings.

25 A monk or a nun might wish to inspect the ground for their couch away from that occupied by a teacher or sub-teacher, etc. (see 2, 1, 10, § 1), or by a young one or an old one or a novice or a sick man or a guest, either at the end or in the middle, either on even or uneven ground, or at a place where there is a draught or where there is no draught. They should then well inspect and sweep (the floor), and circumspectly spread a perfectly pure bed or couch.

26 Having spread a perfectly pure bed or couch, a monk or a nun might wish to ascend it. When doing so, they should first wipe their body from head to heels; then they may circumspectly ascend the perfectly pure bed or couch, and circumspectly sleep in it.

27 A monk or a nun sleeping in a perfectly pure bed or couch (should have placed it at such a distance from the next one's) that they do not touch their neighbour's hand, foot, or body with their own hand, foot, or body; and not touching it, should circumspectly sleep in their perfectly pure bed or couch.

28 Before inhaling or breathing forth, or coughing or sneezing or yawning or vomiting or eructating, a monk or a nun should cover their face or the place where it lies; then they may circumspectly inhale or breathe forth, etc.

29 Whether his lodging is even or uneven; full of, or free from, draughts; full of, or free from, dust; full of, or free from, flies and gnats; full of, or free from, dangers and troubles--in any such-like lodging one should contentedly stay, nor take offence at anything.

This is the whole duty, etc.

Thus I say.

End of the Second Lecture, called Begging for a Couch.

AKARANGA BOOK 2 THIRD LECTURE, CALLED WALKING. FIRST LESSON.

1 When the rainy season has come and it is raining, many living beings are originated and many seeds just spring up, the roads between (different places) contain many living beings, seeds, etc. (see 2, 1, 1, § 2), the footpaths are not used, the roads are not recognisable. Knowing this (state of things) one should not wander from village to village, but remain during the rainy season in one place.

2 When a monk or a nun knows that in a village or scot-free town, etc. (see 1, 7, 6, § 3), there is no large place for religious practices nor for study; that there cannot easily be obtained a stool, bench, bed, or couch, nor pure, acceptable alms; that there have come or will come many Sramanas and Brahmanas, guests, paupers, and beggars; that the means of existence are extremely small; that it is not fit for a wise man to enter or leave it, etc. (see 2, 1, 4, § 1); in such a village, scot-free town, etc., they should not remain during the cold season.

3 When a monk or a nun knows that in a village or scot-free town, etc., there is a large place for religious practices or for study; that there can easily be obtained a stool, bench, bed, or couch, or pure, acceptable alms; that there have not come nor will come Sramanas and Brahmanas, guests, paupers, and beggars; that the means of existence are not small, etc., they may remain in such a village, etc., during the rainy season.

4 Now they should know this: After the four months of the rainy season are over, and five or ten days of the winter have passed, they should not wander from village to village, if the road contains many living beings, etc., and if many Sramanas and Brahmanas, etc., do not yet travel.

5 But if after the same time the road contains few living beings, and many Sramanas and Brahmanas, etc., travel, they may circumspectly wander from village to village.

6 A monk or a nun wandering from village to village should look forward for four cubits, and seeing animals they should move on by walking on his toes or heels or the sides of his feet. If there be some bypath, they should choose it, and not go straight on; then they may circumspectly wander from village to village.

7 A monk or a nun wandering from village to village, on whose way there are living beings, seeds, grass, water, or mud, should not go straight if there be an unobstructed byway; then they may circumspectly wander from village to village.

8 A monk or a nun on the pilgrimage, whose road (lies through) places belonging to borderers, robbers, Mlekkhas, non-Aryan people, half-civilised people, unconverted people, people who rise or eat at an improper time, should, if there be some other place for walking about or friendly districts, not choose the former road for their voyage.

9 The Kevalin says: This is the reason: The ignorant populace might bully, beat, etc., the mendicant, in the opinion that he is a thief or a spy, or that he comes from yonder (hostile village); or they might take away, cut off, steal or rob his robe, alms-bowl, mantle, or broom. Hence it has been said to the mendicant, etc., that one whose road (lies through) places belonging, etc. (all as in the last paragraph); then he may circumspectly wander from village to village.

10 A monk or a nun on the pilgrimage, whose road (lies through) a country where there is no king or many kings or an unanointed king or two governments or no government or a weak government, should, if there be some other place for walking about or friendly districts, not choose the former road for their voyage. The Kevalin says: This is the reason: The ignorant populace might bully or beat, etc., the mendicant, etc. (all as in § 9).

11 A monk or a nun on the pilgrimage, whose road lies through a forest in which they are not certain of crossing in one or two or three or four or five days, should, if there be some other place for walking about or friendly districts, not choose the former road for their voyage.

12 The Kevalin says: This is the reason: During the rain (he might injure) living beings, midew, seeds, grass, water, mud. Hence it has been said to the mendicant that one whose road lies through such a forest, etc. (all as in the last paragraph) then he may circumspectly wander from village to village.

13 A monk or a nun on the pilgrimage, on whose way there is some watercourse which must be crossed by a boat, should not ascend such a boat which plies up or down or across (the river), neither for a shorter nor a longer voyage, if they know that the householder [By householder is here intended the host of the mendicant.] will buy or purloin the boat, or doing the work necessary to put the boat in order, pull it ashore out of the water, or push it from the shore into the water, or bale it, if it is filled (with water), or cause a sinking boat to float.

14 A monk or a nun, knowing that a boat will cross the river, should, after having received the owner's permission, step apart, examine their outfit, put aside their provender, wipe their body from head to heels, reject the householder's food, and putting one foot in the water and the other in the air, they should circumspectly enter the boat.

15 A monk or a nun in entering the boat should not choose for that purpose the stern or the prow or the middle of the boat; nor should they look at it holding up their arms, pointing at it with their finger, bowing up and down.

16 If, on board, the boatman should say to the monk, 'O long-lived Sramana! pull the boat forward or backward, or push it, or draw it with the rope towards you, or let us do it together,' he should not comply with his request, but look on silently.

17 If, on board, the other should say to him, 'O long-lived Sramana! you cannot pull the boat forward or backward, or push it, or draw it with a rope towards you; give us the rope, we will ourselves pull the boat forward or backward, etc.,' he should not comply with his request, but look on silently.

18 If, on board, the other should say to him, 'O long-lived Sramana! if you can, pull the boat by the oar, the rudder, the pole, and other nautical instruments,' he should not comply with his request, but look on silently.

19 If, on board, the other should say to him, 'O long-lived Sramana! please, lade out the water with your hand, or pitcher, or vessel, or alms-bowl, or bucket,' he should not comply with his request, but look on silently.

20 If, on board, the other should say to him, 'O long-lived Sramana! please, stop the boat's leak with your hand, foot, arm, thigh, belly, head, body, the bucket, or a cloth, or with mud, Kusa-grass, or lotus leaves,' he should not comply with his request, but look on silently.

21 If a monk or a nun see that water enters through a leak in the boat, and the boat becomes dirty all over, they should not approach the boatman and say: 'O long-lived householder! water enters through a leak into the boat, and it becomes dirty all over.'

One should not think so or speak so; but undisturbed, the mind not directed outwardly, one should collect one's self for contemplation; then one may circumspectly complete one's journey by the boat on the water.

This is the whole duty, etc. Thus I say.

SECOND LESSON.

1 If, on board, the boatman should say to the mendicant, 'O long-lived Sramana! please, take this umbrella, pot, etc. (see 2, 2, 3, § 2), hold these various dangerous instruments [The original has six words for different kinds of rubbing, which it would be impossible to render adequately in any other language.], let this boy or girl drink,' he should not comply with his request, but look on silently.

2 If, on board, the boatman should say to another of the crew, 'O long-lived one! this Sramana is only a heavy load for the boat, take hold of him with your arms and throw him into the water!' hearing and perceiving such talk, he should, if he wears clothes, quickly take them off or fasten them or put them in a bundle on his head.

3 Now he may think: These ruffians, accustomed to violent acts, might take hold of me and throw me from the boat into the water. He should first say to them: 'O long-lived householders! don't take hold of me with your arms and throw me into the water! I myself shall leap from the boat into the water!' If after these words the other, by force and violence, takes hold of him with his arms and throws him into the water, he should be neither glad nor sorry, neither in high nor low spirits, nor should he offer violent resistance to those ruffians; but undisturbed, his mind not directed to outward things, etc. (see 2, 3, 1, § 21), he may circumspectly swim in the water.

4 A monk or a nun, swimming in the water, should not touch (another person's or their own?) hand, foot, or body with their own hand, foot, or body; but without touching it they should circumspectly swim in the water.

5 A monk or a nun, swimming in the water, should not dive up or down, lest water should enter into their ears, eyes, nose, or mouth; but they should circumspectly swim in the water.

6 If a monk or a nun, swimming in the water, should be overcome by weakness, they should throw off their implements (clothes, etc.), either all or a part of them, and not be attached to them. Now they should know this: If they are able to get out of the water and reach the bank, they should circumspectly remain on the bank with a wet or moist body.

7 A monk or a nun should not wipe or rub or brush or stroke or dry or warm or heat (in the sun) their body. But when they perceive that the water on their body has dried up, and the moisture is gone, they may wipe or rub, etc., their body in that state; then they may circumspectly wander from village to village.

8 A monk or a nun on the pilgrimage should not wander from village to village, conversing with householders; they may circumspectly wander from village to village.

9 If a monk or a nun on the pilgrimage come across a shallow water, they should first wipe their body from head to heels, then, putting one foot in the water and the other in the air, they should wade through the shallow water in a straight line.

10 If a monk or a nun on the pilgrimage come across a shallow water, they should wade through it in a straight line, without being touched by or touching (another person's or their own?) hand, foot, or body with their own hand, foot, or body.

11 A monk or a nun, wading through shallow water in a straight line, should not plunge in deeper water for the sake of pleasure or the heat; but they should circumspectly wade through the shallow water in a straight line. Now they should know this: If one is able to get out of the water and reach the bank, one should circumspectly remain on the bank with a wet or moist body.

12 A monk or a nun should not wipe or rub, etc. (all as in § 7).

13 A monk or a nun on the pilgrimage, with their feet soiled with mud, should not, in order that the grass might take off the mud from the feet, walk out of the way and destroy the grass by cutting, trampling, and tearing it. As this would be sinful, they should not do so. But they should first inspect a path containing little grass; then they may circumspectly wander from village to village.

14 If a monk or a nun on the pilgrimage come upon walls or ditches or ramparts or gates or bolts or holes to fit them, or moats or caves, they should, in case there be a byway, choose it, and not go on straight.

15 The Kevalin says: This is the reason: Walking there, the mendicant might stumble or fall down; when he stumbles or falls down, he might get hold of trees, shrubs, plants, creepers, grass, copsewood, or sprouts to extricate himself. He should ask travellers who meet him, to lend a hand; then he may circumspectly lean upon it and extricate himself; so he may circumspectly wander from village to village.

16 If a monk or a nun perceive in their way (transports of) corn, waggons, cars, a friendly or hostile army, some encamped troops, they should, in case there be a byway, circumspectly choose it, and not walk on straight. One trooper might say to another: 'O long-lived one! this Sramana is a spy upon the army; take hold of him with your arms, and drag him hither!' The other might take hold of the mendicant with his arms and drag him on. He should neither be glad nor sorry for it, etc. (see § 3); then he may circumspectly wander from village to village.

17 If on his road travellers meet him and say, 'O long-lived Sramana! how large is this village or scot-free town, etc.? how many horses, elephants, beggars, men dwell in it? is there much food, water, population, corn? is there little food, water, population, corn?' he should not answer such questions if asked, nor ask them himself.

This is the whole duty, etc.

Thus I say.

THIRD LESSON.

1 A monk or a nun on the pilgrimage, in whose way there are walls or ditches or ramparts or gates, etc. (see 2, 3, 2, § 14), hill houses, palaces, underground houses, houses in trees, mountain caves, a sacred tree or pillar, workshops, etc. (see 2, 2, § 8), should not look at them holding up their arms, pointing at them with their fingers, bowing up and down. Then they may circumspectly wander from village to village.

2 A monk or a nun on the pilgrimage, on whose way there are marshes, pasture-grounds, moats, fortified places, thickets, strongholds in thickets, woods, mountains, strongholds on mountains, caves 1, tanks, lakes, rivers, ponds, lotus ponds, long winding ponds, water-sheets, rows of water-sheets, should not look at them holding up their arms, etc. (see § 1).

3 The Kevalin says: This is the reason: The deer, cattle, birds, snakes, animals living in water, on land, in the air might be disturbed or frightened, and strive to get to a fold or (other place of) refuge. (thinking): 'The Sramana will harm me!'

Hence it has been said to the mendicant, etc., that he should not look at the objects (mentioned in § 2) holding up his arms, etc. [The passage closes: 'then he may circumspectly wander from village to village together with the master and teacher (ayariovagghaya).'] But as the master and teacher have not been mentioned before, and will be mentioned in the next Sutra, it is almost certain that the words in question have been brought over from the next Sutra, or that they ought to be supplied to all Sutras from the beginning of the third lesson.]

4 A monk or a nun, wandering from village to village together with the master or teacher, should not touch the master's or teacher's hand with their own, etc.; but without touching or being touched they should circumspectly wander from village to village together with the master or teacher.

5 A monk or a nun, wandering from village to village together with the master or teacher, might be met on the road by travellers and asked: 'O long-lived Sramana! who are you? whence do you come, and where do you go?' The master or teacher may answer and explain; but whilst the master or teacher answers and explains, one should not mix in their conversation. Thus they may wander from village to village with a superior priest.

6 A monk or a nun, wandering from village to village with a superior priest, should not touch the superior's hand with their own, etc. (see § 4).

7 A monk or a nun, wandering from village to village with superior priests, might be met on the road by travellers, and be asked: 'O long-lived Sramana! who are you?' He who has the highest rank of them all, should answer and explain; but whilst the superior answers and explains, one should not mix in their conversation, etc. (see § 5).

8 A monk or a nun, wandering from village to village, might be met on the road by travellers, and be asked: 'O long-lived Sramana! did you see somebody on the road? viz. a man, cow, buffalo, cattle, bird, snake, or aquatic animal—tell us, show us!' The mendicant should not tell it, nor show it, he should not comply with their request, but look on silently, or, though knowing it, he should say that he did not know. Then he may circumspectly wander from village to village.

9 He should act in the same manner, if asked about bulbs of water-plants, roots, bark, leaves, flowers, fruits, seeds, water in the neighbourhood, or a kindled fire;

10 Likewise, if asked about (transports of) corn, waggons, cars, etc. (see II, 3, 2, § 16).

11 Likewise, if asked: 'O long-lived Sramana! how large is this village or scot-free town, etc.?'

12 Likewise, if asked: 'O long-lived Sramana! How far is it to that village or scot-free town, etc.?'

13 If a monk or a nun, wandering from village to village, sees a vicious cow coming towards them, etc. (see 2, 1, 5, § 3), they should not, from fear of them, leave the road, or go into another road, nor enter a thicket, wood, or stronghold, nor climb a tree, nor take a plunge in a large and extended water-sheet, nor desire a fold or any other place of refuge, or an army or a caravan; but undisturbed, the mind not directed to outward things, they should collect themselves for contemplation; thus they may circumspectly wander from village to village.

14 If the road of a monk or a nun on the pilgrimage lies through a forest, in which, as they know, there stroll bands of many thieves desirous of their property, they should not, for fear of them, leave the road, etc. (all as in § 13).

15 If these thieves say, 'O long-lived Sramana! bring us your clothes, etc., give them, put them down!' the mendicant should not give or put them down. Nor should he reclaim (his things) by imploring (the thieves), or by folding his hands, or by moving their compassion, but by religious exhortation or by remaining silent.

16 If the thieves, resolving to do it themselves, bully him, etc., tear off his clothes, etc., he should not lodge an information in the village or at the king's palace; nor should he go to a layman, and say, 'O long-lived householder! these thieves, resolving to do (the robbing) themselves, have bullied me, etc., they have torn off my clothes,' etc. He should neither think so, nor speak so; but undisturbed, etc. (see § 13).

This is the whole duty, etc.

Thus I say.

End of the Third Lecture, called Walking.

AKARANGA BOOK 2 4TH LECTURE, CALLED MODES OF SPEECH.

FIRST LESSON.

1 A monk or a nun, hearing and perceiving these uses of speech, should know that the following ones are not to be employed and have not hitherto been employed (by persons of exemplary conduct); those who speak in wrath or in pride, for deception or for gain, who speak, knowingly or unknowingly, hard words. They should avoid all this, which is blamable. Employing their judgement, they should know something for certain and something for uncertain*:

2 (N. N.) having received food or not having received food, having eaten it or not having eaten it, has come or has not come, comes or does not come, will come or will not come. [*The commentator understands this passage and the following paragraph in a different way: a man of ripe judgement should utter no such positive assertions, e. g. it is certain (that it will rain), or it is not certain, etc. He seems to have been of opinion that the prohibition in the last sentence, savvam etam savagga vaggega, extends also to the following sentence. But this is not probable, as etam generally refers to what precedes, and imam to what follows.]

3 Well considering (what one is to say), speaking with precision, one should employ language in moderation and restraint: the singular, dual, plural; feminine, masculine, neuter gender; praise, blame, praise mixed with blame, blame mixed with praise; past, present, or future (tenses), the first and second, or third (person). If one thinks it necessary to speak in the singular, he should speak in the singular; if he thinks it necessary to speak in the plural, he should speak in the plural, etc. Considering well: this is a woman, this is a man, this is a eunuch, this is to be called thus, this is to be called otherwise, speaking with precision, he should employ language in moderation and restraint.

4 For the avoidance of these occasions to sin, a mendicant should know that there are four kinds of speech: the first is truth; the second is untruth; the third is truth mixed with untruth; what is neither truth, nor untruth, nor truth mixed with untruth, that is the fourth kind of speech: neither truth nor untruth. Thus I say.

All past, present, and future Arhats have taught and declared, teach and declare, will teach and declare these four kinds of speech; and they have explained all those things which are devoid of intellect, which possess colour, smell, taste, touch, which are subject to decay and increase, which possess various qualities.

5 A monk (or a nun should know that) before (the utterance) speech is speech in (antecedent) non-existence; that while uttered, it is (real) speech; that the moment after it has been uttered, the spoken speech is speech in (subsequent) non-existence.

6 A monk or a nun, well considering, should not use speech whether truth or untruth, or truth mixed with untruth, if it be sinful, blamable, rough, stinging, coarse, hard, leading to sins, to discord and factions, to grief and outrage, to destruction of living beings.

7 A monk or a nun, considering well, should use true and accurate speech, or speech which is neither truth nor untruth (i.e. injunctions); for such speech is not sinful, blamable, rough, stinging, etc.

8 A monk or a nun, if addressing a man who, if addressed, does not answer, should not say: 'You loon! you lout! you Sudra! you low-born wretch! you slave! you dog! you thief! you robber! you cheat! you liar! etc.; you are such and such! your parents are such and such!' Considering well, they should not use such sinful, blamable, etc., speech.

9 But in that case they should say: 'N. N.! O long-lived one! O long-lived ones! O layman! O pupil! O faithful one! O lover of faith!' Considering well, they should use such sinless, blameless, etc., speech.

10 A monk or a nun, if addressing a woman who, if addressed, does not answer, should not say: 'You hussy! you wench! etc.' (repeat the above list of abusive words adapted to females). Considering well, they should not use such sinful, blamable, etc., speech.

11 A monk or a nun, if addressing a woman who, if addressed, does not answer, should say: 'O long-lived one! O sister! madam! my lady! O lay-sister! O pupil! O faithful one! O lover of faith!' Considering well, they should use such sinless, blameless, etc., speech.

12 A monk or a nun should not say: 'The god 1 of the sky! the god of the thunderstorm! the god of lightning! the god who begins to rain! the god who ceases to rain! may rain fall or may it not fall! may the crops grow or may they not grow! may the night wane or may it not wane! may the sun rise or may it not rise! may the king conquer or may he not conquer!' They should not use such speech.

13 But knowing the nature of things, he should say: The air; the follower of Guhya; a cloud has gathered or come down; the cloud has rained.'

This is the whole duty, etc.

Thus I say.

SECOND LESSON.

1 A monk or a nun, seeing any sort (of diseases), should not talk of them in this way: 'He has got boils, or leprosy, etc. (see 1, 6, 1, § 3); his hand is cut, or his foot, nose, ear, lip is cut.' For as all such people, spoken to in such language, become angry, hence, considering well, they should not speak to them in such language.

2 A monk or a nun, seeing any sort (of good qualities), should speak thus: 'He is strong, powerful, vigorous, famous, well-formed, well-proportioned, handsome.' For as all such people, spoken to in such language, do not become angry, they should, considering well, speak to them in such language.

3 A monk or a nun, seeing any sort of such things as walls or ditches, etc. (see 2, 3, 2, § 14), should not speak of them in this way: This is well-executed, finely executed, beautiful, excellent, (so done) or to be done;' they should not use such sinful, etc., language.

4 A monk or a nun, seeing walls, etc., should speak about them in this way: 'This has been executed with great effort, with sin, with much labour; it is very magnificent, it is very beautiful, it is very fine, it is very handsome;' considering well, they should use such sinless, etc., language.

5 A monk or a nun, seeing food, etc., prepared, should not speak about it in this way: 'This is well executed, finely executed, beautiful, excellent, (so done) or to be done;' considering well, they should not use such sinful, etc., language.

6 A monk or a nun, seeing food, etc., prepared, should speak about it in this way: 'This has been executed with great effort, with sin, with much labour; it is very good, it is excellent, it is well seasoned, it is most delicious, it is most agreeable;' considering well, they should use such sinless, etc., language.

7 A monk or a nun, seeing a man, a cow, a buffalo, deer, cattle, a bird, a snake, an aquatic animal of increased bulk, should not speak about them in this way: 'He (or it) is fat, round, fit to be killed or cooked;' considering well, they should not use such sinful, etc., language.

8 A monk or a nun, seeing a man, a cow, etc., of increased bulk, should speak about them in this way: 'He is of increased bulk, his body is well grown, well compacted, his flesh and blood are abundant, his limbs are fully developed;' considering well, they should use such sinless, etc., language.

9 A monk or a nun, seeing any sort of cows (or oxen), should not speak about them in this way: 'These cows should be milked or tamed or covered, should draw a waggon or car;' considering well, they should not use such sinful, etc., language.

10 A monk or a nun, seeing any sort of cows (or oxen), should speak about them in this way: 'It is a young cow, a milch cow, she gives much milk, it is a short or a large one, a beast of burden;' considering well, they should use such sinless, etc., language.

11 A monk or a nun, seeing big trees in parks, on hills, or in woods, should speak about them in this way: 'These (trees) are fit for palaces, gates, houses, benches, bolts, boats, buckets, stools, trays, ploughs, mattocks (?), machines, poles, the nave of a wheel (?), gandi, seats, beds, cars, sheds; considering well, they should not use such sinful, etc., language.

12 A monk or a nun, seeing big trees in parks, on hills, or in woods, should speak about them in this way: 'These trees are noble, high and round, big; they have many branches, extended branches, they are very magnificent,' etc. (see § 4); considering well, they should use such sinless, etc., language.

13 A monk or a nun, seeing many wild fruits, should not speak about them in this way: 'They are ripe, they should be cooked or eaten, they are just in season, or soft, or they have just split;' considering well, they should not use such sinful, etc., language.

14 A monk or a nun, seeing many wild fruits, should speak about them in this way: 'They are very plentiful, they contain many seeds, they are fully grown, they have developed their proper shape;' considering well, they should use such sinless, etc., language.

15 A monk or a nun, seeing many vegetables, should not speak about them in this way: 'They are ripe, they are dark coloured, shining, fit to be fried or roasted or eaten;' considering well, they should not use such sinful, etc., language.

16 A monk or a nun, seeing many vegetables, should speak about them in this way: 'They are grown up, they are fully grown, they are strong, they are excellent, they are run to seed, they have spread their seed, they are full of sap;' considering well, they should use such sinless, etc., language.

17 A monk or a nun, hearing any sort of sounds, should not speak about them in this way: 'This is a good sound, this is a bad sound;' considering well, they should not use such sinless, etc., language; but they should call them good, if they are good; bad, if they are bad; considering well, they should use such sinless, etc., language.

18 In the same manner they should speak about the (five) colours, as black, etc.; the (two) smells, as pleasant or unpleasant; the (five) tastes, as sharp etc.; the (five) kinds of touch, as hard, etc.

19 A monk or a nun, putting aside wrath, pride, deceit, and greed, considering well, speaking with precision, what one has heard, not too quick, with discrimination, should employ language in moderation and restraint.

This is the whole duty, etc.

Thus I say.

End of the Fourth Lecture, called Modes of Speech.

AKARANGA BOOK 2 5TH LECTURE, CALLED BEGGING OF CLOTHES. FIRST LESSON.

1 A monk or a nun wanting to get clothes, may beg for cloth made of wool, silk, hemp, palm-leaves, cotton, or Arkatula, or such-like clothes. If he be a youthful, young, strong, healthy, well-set monk, he may wear one robe, not two; if a nun, she should possess four raiments, one two cubits broad, two three cubits broad, one four cubits broad [The first to wear in the cloister, the second and third for out-of-door, the fourth for assemblies.]. If one does not receive such pieces of cloth, one should afterwards sew together one with the other.

2 A monk or a nun should not resolve to go further than half a yohana to get clothes. As regards the acceptance of clothes, those precepts which have been given in the (First Lesson of the First Lecture, called) Begging of Food, concerning one fellow-ascetic, should be repeated here; also concerning many fellow-ascetics, one female fellow-ascetic, many female fellow-ascetics, many Sramanas and Brahmanas; also about (clothes) appropriated by another person.

3 A monk or a nun should not accept clothes which the layman, for the mendicant's sake, has bought, washed, dyed, brushed, rubbed, cleaned, perfumed, if these clothes be appropriated by the giver himself. But if they be appropriated by another person, they may accept them; for they are pure and acceptable.

4 A monk or a nun should not accept any very expensive clothes of the following description: clothes made of fur, fine ones, beautiful ones; clothes made of goats' hair, of blue cotton, of common cotton, of Bengal cotton, of Patta, of Malaya fibres, of bark fibres, of muslin, of silk; (clothes provincially called) Desaraga, Amila, Gaggala, Phaliya, Kayaha; blankets or mantles.

5 A monk or a nun should not accept any of the following plaids of fur and other materials: plaids made of Udra, Pesa fur 1, embroidered with Pesa fur, made of the fur of black or blue or yellow deer, golden plaids, plaids glittering like gold, interwoven with gold, set with gold, embroidered with gold, plaids made of tigers' fur, highly ornamented plaids, plaids covered with ornaments.

6 For the avoidance of these occasions to sin there are four rules for begging clothes to be known by the mendicants.

Now, this is the first rule:

A monk or a nun may beg for clothes specifying (their quality), viz. wool, silk, hemp, palm-leaves, cotton, Arkatula. If they beg for them, or the householder gives them, they may accept them; for they are pure and acceptable.

This is the first rule.

7 Now follows the second rule:

A monk or a nun may ask for clothes which they have well inspected, from the householder or his wife, etc. After consideration, they should say: 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) please give me one of these clothes!' If they beg for them, or the householder gives them, they may accept them; for they are pure and acceptable.

This is the second rule.

8 Now follows the third rule:

A monk or a nun may beg for an under or upper garment. If they beg for it, etc. (see § 7).

This is the third rule.

9 Now follows the fourth rule:

A monk or a nun may beg for a left-off robe, which no other Sramana or Brahmana, guest, pauper or beggar wants. If they beg, etc. (see § 7).

This is the fourth rule.

A monk or a nun who have adopted one of these four rules should not say, etc. (all as in 2, 1, 11, § 12, down to) we respect each other accordingly.

10 A householder may perhaps say to a mendicant begging in the prescribed way: 'O long-lived Sramana! return after a month, ten nights, five nights, to-morrow, to-morrow night; then we shall give you some clothes.' Hearing and perceiving such talk, he should, after consideration, say: 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) it is not meet for me to accept such a promise. If you want to give me (something), give it me now!'

After these words the householder may answer: 'O long-lived Sramana! follow me! then we shall give you some clothes.' The mendicant should give the same answer as above.

After his words the householder may say (to one of his people): 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) fetch that robe! we shall give it the Sramana, and afterwards prepare one for our own use, killing all sorts of living beings.'

Hearing and perceiving such talk, he should not accept such clothes; for they are impure and unacceptable.

11 The householder 1 may say (to one of his people): 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) fetch that robe, wipe or rub it with perfume, etc. (see 2, 2, 1, § 8); we shall give it to the Sramana.'

Hearing and perceiving such talk, the mendicant should, after consideration, say: 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) do not wipe or rub it with perfume, etc. If you want to give it me, give it, such as it is!'

After these words the householder might nevertheless offer the clothes after having wiped or rubbed them, etc.; but the mendicant should not accept them, for they are impure and unacceptable.

12 The householder may say (to another of his people): 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) bring that robe, clean or wash it with cold or hot water!'

The mendicant should return the same answer as above (in § 11) and not accept such clothes.

13 The householder may say (to another of his people): 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) bring that cloth, empty it of the bulbs, etc. (see 2, 2, 1, § 5); we shall give it to the Sramana.' Hearing and perceiving such talk, the mendicant should say, after consideration: 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) do not empty that cloth of the bulbs, etc.; it is not meet for me to accept such clothes.' After these words the householder might nevertheless take away the bulbs, etc., and offer him the cloth; but he should not accept it; for it is impure and unacceptable.

14 If a householder brings a robe and gives it to the mendicant, he should, after consideration, say: 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) I shall, in your presence, closely inspect the inside of the robe.'

The Kevalin says: This is the reason: There might be hidden in the robe an earring or girdle or gold and silver, etc. (see 2, 2, 1, § 11), or living beings or seeds or grass. Hence it has been said to the mendicant, etc., that he should closely inspect the inside of the robe.

15 A monk or a nun should not accept clothes which are full of eggs or living beings, etc.; for they are impure, etc. A monk or a nun should not accept clothes which are free from eggs or living beings, etc., but which are not fit nor strong nor lasting nor to be worn--which though pleasant are not fit (for a mendicant); for they are impure and unacceptable.

16 A monk or a nun may accept clothes which are fit, strong, lasting, to be worn, pleasant and fit for a mendicant; for they are pure and acceptable.

17 A monk or a nun should not wash his clothes, rub or wipe them with ground drugs, etc., because they are not new.

A monk or a nun should not clean or wash his clothes in plentiful water, because they are not new.

18 A monk or a nun should not make his clothes undergo the processes (prohibited in § 17), because they have a bad smell.

19 A monk or a nun wanting to air or dry (in the sun) their clothes, should not do so on the bare ground or wet earth or rock or piece of clay containing life, etc. (see 2, 1, 5, § 2). [If the garment falls on the ground, it would come in contact with dust, etc., then it would contain living beings and be no more pure.]

20 A monk or a nun wanting to air or dry (in the sun) their clothes, should not hang them for that purpose on a post of a house, on the upper timber of a door-frame, on a mortar, on a bathing-tub, or on any such-like above-ground place, which is not well fixed or set, but shaky and movable.

21 A monk or a nun wanting to air or dry (in the sun) their clothes, should not lay them for that purpose on a dyke, wall, rock, stone, or any such-like above-ground place, etc.

22 A monk or a nun wanting to air or dry (in the sun) their clothes, should not do it on a pillar, a raised platform, a scaffold, a second story, a flat roof, or any such-like above-ground place, etc.

23 Knowing this, he should resort to a secluded spot, and circumspically air or dry his clothes there on a heap of ashes or bones, etc. (see 2, 1, 1, § 1), which he has repeatedly inspected and cleaned.

This is the whole duty, etc.

Thus I say.

SECOND LESSON.

1 A monk or a nun should beg for acceptable clothes, and wear them in that state in which they get them; they should not wash or dye them, nor should they wear washed or dyed clothes, nor (should they) hide (their clothes) when passing through other villages, being careless of dress. This is the whole duty for a mendicant who wears clothes.

A monk or a nun wanting, for the sake of alms, to enter the abode of a householder, should do so outfitted with all their clothes; in the same manner they should go to the out-of-door place for religious practices or study, or should wander from village to village.

Now they should know this: A monk or a nun dressed in all their clothes should not enter or leave, for the sake of alms, the abode of a householder, etc. etc., on perceiving that a strong and widely spread rain pours down, etc. (see II, 1, 3, § 9).

2 If a single mendicant borrows for a short time a robe (from another mendicant) and returns after staying abroad for one, two, three, four, or five days, he (the owner) should not take such a robe for himself, nor should he give it to somebody else, nor should he give it on promise (for another robe after a few days), nor should he exchange that robe for another one. He should not go to another mendicant and say: 'O long-lived Sramana! do you want to wear or use this robe?' He (the owner of the robe) should not rend the still strong robe, and cast it away; but give it him (who had borrowed it) in its worn state; he should not use it himself.

3 The same rule holds good when many mendicants borrow for a short time clothes, and return after staying abroad for one, etc., days. All should be put in the plural.

4 'Well, I shall borrow a robe and return after staying abroad for one, two, three, four, or five days; perhaps it will thus become my own.' As this would be sinful, he should not do so.

5 A monk or a nun should not make coloured clothes colourless, or colour colourless clothes; nor should they give them to somebody else thinking that they will get other clothes; nor should they give it on promise (for other clothes); nor should they exchange them for other clothes; nor should they go to somebody else and say: 'O long-lived Sramana! do you want to wear or use these clothes?' They should not rend the still strong clothes, and cast them away, that another mendicant might think them bad ones.

6 If he sees in his way thieves, he should not from fear of them, and to save his clothes, leave the road or go into another road, etc. (see II, 3, 3, § 13), but undisturbed, his mind not directed to outward things, he should collect himself for contemplation; then he may circumspically wander from village to village.

7 If the road of a monk or a nun on the pilgrimage lies through a forest in which, as they know, there stroll bands of many thieves desirous of their clothes, they should not from fear of them, and to save their clothes, leave the road or go into another road, etc. (all as in § 6).

8 If these thieves say: 'O long-lived Sramana! bring us your robe, give it, deliver it!' he should not give or deliver it. He should act in such cases (as prescribed in II, 3, 3, §§ 15 and 16).

This is the whole duty, etc.

Thus I say.

End of the Fifth Lecture, called Begging of Clothes.

AKARANGA BOOK 2 6TH LECTURE, CALLED BEGGING FOR A BOWL. FIRST LESSON.

1 A monk or a nun wanting to get a bowl, may beg for one made of bottle-gourd or wood or clay, or such-like bowls. If he be a youthful, young, etc. (see 2, 5, 1, § 1) monk, he may carry with him one bowl, not two.

A monk or a nun should not resolve to go farther than half a Yohana to get a bowl.

As regards the acceptance of a bowl, those four precepts which have been given in (the First Lesson of the First Lecture, called) Begging of Food, concerning one fellowascetic, etc., should be repeated here, the fifth is that concerning many Sramanas and Brahmanas.

A monk or a nun should not accept a bowl which the layman has, for the mendicant's sake, bought, etc. (see the Lecture called Begging of Clothes).

2 A monk or a nun should not accept any very expensive bowls of the following description: bowls made of iron, tin, lead, silver, gold, brass, a mixture of gold, silver, and copper, pearl, glass, mother of pearl, horn, ivory, cloth, stone, or leather; for such very expensive bowls are impure and unacceptable.

3 A monk or a nun should not accept bowls which contain a band of the same precious materials specialised in § 2; for etc.

4 For the avoidance of these occasions to sin there are four rules for begging a bowl to be known by the mendicants.

Now this is the first rule:

A monk or a nun may beg for a bowl specifying its quality, viz. bottle-gourd or wood or clay. If they beg for such a bowl, or the householder gives it, they may accept it, for it is pure and acceptable.

This is the first rule.

5 Now follows the second rule:

A monk or a nun may ask for a bowl, which they have well inspected, from the householder or his wife, etc. After consideration, they should say: 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) please give me one of these bowls, viz. one made of bottle-gourds or wood or clay.' If they beg for such a bowl, or the householder gives it, they may accept it; for etc.

This is the second rule.

6 Now follows the third rule:

A monk or a nun may beg for a bowl which has been used by the former owner or by many people. If they beg for it, etc. (see § 5).

This is the third rule.

7 Now follows the fourth rule:

A monk or a nun may beg for a left-off bowl which no other Sramana or Brahmana, guest, pauper, or beggar wants. If they beg for it, etc. (see § 5).

This is the fourth rule.

A monk or a nun having adopted one of these four rules should not say, etc. (see II, 1, tr, § 12, all down to) we respect each other accordingly.

8 A householder may perhaps say to a mendicant begging in the prescribed way: 'O long-lived Sramana! return after a month,' etc. (all as in the Lecture called Begging of Clothes 1).

9 The householder may say (to one of his people): 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) fetch that bowl, rub it with oil, ghee, fresh butter or marrow, we shall give it,' etc. (see II, 5, 1, § 11); or wash, wipe, or rub it with perfumes,' etc.; or 'wash it with cold or hot water;' or 'empty it of the bulbs,' etc. (see II, 5, 1, §§ 11 and 12).

10 The householder may say (to the mendicant): 'O long-lived Sramana! stay a while till they have cooked or prepared our food, etc., then we shall give you, O long-lived one! your alms-bowl filled with food or drink; it is not good, not meet that a mendicant should get an empty alms-bowl.' After consideration, the mendicant should answer: 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) it is indeed not meet for me to eat or drink food, which is adhakarmika; do not cook or prepare it; if you want to give me anything, give it as it is.' After these words the householder might offer him the alms-bowl filled with food or drink which had been cooked or prepared: he should not accept such an alms-bowl, for it is impure and unacceptable.

11 Perhaps the householder will bring and give the mendicant an alms-bowl; the mendicant should then, after consideration, say: 'O long-lived one! (or, O sister!) I shall in your presence closely inspect the interior of the bowl.'

The Kevalin says: This is the reason: In the alms-bowl there might be living beings or seeds or grass. Hence it has been said to the mendicant, etc., that he should closely inspect the interior of the alms-bowl.

12 All that has been said in the Lecture called Begging of Clothes (2, 5, 1, § 15 down to the end) is mutatis mutandis to be repeated here. (In § 15, add before perfumes) with oil, ghee, butter or marrow.

This is the whole duty, etc.

Thus I say.

SECOND LESSON.

1 A monk or a nun, entering the abode of a householder for the sake of alms, should after examining their alms-bowl, taking out any living beings, and wiping off the dust, circumspectly enter or leave the householder's abode.

The Kevalin says: This is the reason: Living beings, seeds or dust might fall into his bowl. Hence it has been said to the mendicant, etc., that he should after examining his alms-bowl, taking out any living beings, circumspectly enter or leave the householder's abode.

2 On such an occasion the householder might perhaps, going in the house, fill the alms-bowl with cold water and, returning, offer it him; (the mendicant) should not accept such an alms-bowl* either in the householder's hand or his vessel; for it is impure and unacceptable. [* Though the alms-bowl is expressly mentioned, it must stand here for water, as the commentators interpret the passage.]

3 Perhaps he has, inadvertently, accepted it; then he should empty it again in (the householder's) water-pot; or (on his objecting to it) he should put down the bowl and the water somewhere, or empty it in some wet place.

4 A monk or a nun should not wipe or rub a wet or moist alms-bowl. But when they perceive that on their alms-bowl the water has dried up and the moisture is gone, then they may circumspectly wipe or rub it.

5 A monk or a nun wanting to enter the abode of a householder, should enter or leave it, for the sake of alms, with their bowl; also on going to the out-of-door place for religious practices or study; or on wandering from village to village.

If a strong and widely spread rain pours down, they should take the same care of their alms-bowl as is prescribed for clothes (in the preceding Lecture, Lesson 2, § 1).

This is the whole duty, etc.

Thus I say.

End of the Sixth Lecture, called Begging for a Bowl.

AKARANGA BOOK 2 7TH LECTURE, CALLED REGULATION OF POSSESSION. FIRST LESSON.

1 'I shall become a Sramana who owns no house, no property, no sons, no cattle, who eats what others give him; I shall commit no sinful action; Master, I renounce to accept anything that has not been given.' Having taken such vows, (a mendicant) should not, on entering a village or scot-free town, etc., take himself, or induce others to take, or allow others to take, what has not been given. A mendicant should not take or appropriate any property, viz. an umbrella* or vessel or stick, etc. (see II, 2, 3, § 2), of those monks together with whom he stays, without getting their permission, and without having inspected and wiped (the object in question); but having got their permission, and having inspected and wiped (the object in question), he may take or appropriate it. [* The commentator (Silanka) states that the monks in Kunkanadesa, etc., are allowed to carry umbrellas, because of the heavy rains in that country.]

2 He may beg for a domicile in a traveller's hall, etc. (see 2, 1, 8, § 2), having reflected (on its fitness for a stay); he should ask permission to take possession of it from him who is the landlord or the steward of that place: 'Indeed, O long-lived one! for the time, and in the space which you concede us, we shall dwell here. We shall take possession of the place for as long a time as the place belongs to you; and of as much of it as belongs to you; for as many fellow-ascetics (as shall stand in need of it); afterwards we shall take to wandering.'

3 Having got possession of some place, a mendicant should invite to that food, etc., which he himself has collected, any fellow-ascetics arriving there who follow the same rules and are zealous brethren; but he should not invite them to anything of which he has taken possession for the sake of somebody else.

4 Having got possession of some place (in a traveller's hall, etc.), a mendicant should offer a footstool or bench or bed or couch, which he himself has begged, to any fellow-ascetics arriving there who follow other rules than he, yet are zealous brethren; but he should not offer them anything of which he has taken possession for the sake of somebody else.

5 Having got possession of some place in a traveller's hall, etc., a mendicant might ask from a householder or his sons the loan of a needle or a Pippalaka or an ear-picker or a nail-parer, he should not give or lend it to somebody else; but having done that for which he wanted one of the above articles, he should go with that article there (where the householder, etc., is), and stretching out his hands or laying the article on the ground, he should, after consideration, say: 'Here it is! here it is!' But he should not with his own hand put it in the hand of the householder.

6-12 A monk or a nun should not take possession of anything on the bare ground, on wet ground, where there are eggs, etc.; nor on pillars or such an above-ground place (2, 2, 1, § 7); nor on a wall, etc.; nor on the trunk of a tree, etc.; nor where the householder or fire or water, or women or children or cattle are, and where it is not fit for a wise man to enter or to leave, etc., nor to meditate on the law; nor where they have to pass through the householder's abode or to which there is no road, and where it is not fit, etc.; nor where the householder or his wife, etc., bully or scold each other, etc. (see 2, 2, 1, § 9, and 3, § 7); nor where they rub or anoint each other's body with oil or ghee or butter or grease; nor where they take a bath, etc.; nor where they go about naked, etc. (all as in 2, 2, 3, §§ 7-12).

This is the whole duty, etc.

Thus I say.

SECOND LESSON.

1 He may beg for a domicile in a traveller's hall, etc. (see 2, 1, 8, § 2), having reflected (on its fitness); he should ask permission to take possession of it from the landlord or the steward of that place: 'Indeed, O long-lived one! for the time and in the space you concede us, we shall dwell here [§ 2 of the preceding Lesson is repeated word for word.], etc. (see 1, § 2). Now what further after the place is taken possession of? He should not remove from without to within, or vice versa, any umbrella or stick, etc. (see 2, 2, 3, § 2) belonging to Sramanas or Brahmanas (previously settled there); nor should he wake up a sleeping person, nor offend or molest the (inmates).

2 A monk or a nun might wish to go to a mango park; they should then ask the landlord's or steward's permission (in the manner described above). Now what further after the place is taken possession of? Then they might desire to eat a mango. If the monk or the nun perceive that the mango is covered with eggs, living beings, etc. (see 2, 1, 1, § 2), they should not take it; for it is impure, etc.

3 If the monk or the nun perceive that the mango is free from eggs, living beings, etc., but not nibbled at by animals, nor injured, they should not take it; for it is impure, etc. But if they perceive that the mango is free from eggs, living beings, etc., and is nibbled at by animals and injured, then they may take it; for it is pure, etc.

4 The monk might wish to eat or suck one half of a mango or a mango's peel or rind or sap or smaller particles. If the monk or the nun perceive that the above-enumerated things are covered with eggs, or living beings, they should not take them; for they are impure, etc. But they may take them, if they are free from eggs, etc., and nibbled at by animals or injured.

5 A monk or a nun might wish to go to a sugarcane plantation. They should ask permission in the manner described above. The monk or the nun might wish to chew or suck sugar-cane. In that case the same rules as for eating mango apply also; likewise if they wish to chew or to suck the sugar-cane's pulp, fibres, sap, or smaller particles.

6 A monk or a nun might wish to go to a garlic field. They should ask permission in the manner described above. The monk or the nun might wish to chew or suck garlic. In that case the same rules as for eating mangoes apply also; likewise if they wish to chew or suck the bulb or peel or stalk or seed of garlic.

7 A monk or a nun, having got possession of a place in a traveller's hall, etc., should avoid all occasions to sin (proceeding from any preparations made by) the householders or their sons, and should occupy that place according to the following rules.

8 Now this is the first rule: He may beg for a domicile in a traveller's hall, etc., having reflected (on its fitness for a stay), etc. (§ 2 of the preceding Lesson is to be repeated here). This is the first rule.

9 Now follows the second rule: A monk resolves: 'I shall ask for possession of a dwelling-place, etc., for the sake of other mendicants, and having taken possession of it for their sake, I shall use it.' This is the second rule.

10 Now follows the third rule: A monk resolves: 'I shall ask for possession of a dwelling-place, etc., for the sake of other mendicants, and having taken possession of it for their sake, I shall not use it.' This is the third rule.

11 Now follows the fourth rule: A monk resolves: 'I shall not ask for possession of a dwelling-place, etc., for the sake of other mendicants; but if the dwelling-place, etc., has already been ceded to them, I shall use it.' This is the fourth rule.

12 Now follows the fifth rule: A monk resolves: 'I shall ask for possession of a dwelling-place for my own sake, not for two, three, four, or five persons.' This is the fifth rule.

13 Now follows the sixth rule:

If a monk or a nun, occupying a dwelling-place in which there is Ikkada reed, etc. (see 2, 2, 3, § 18), get this thing, then they may use it; otherwise they should remain in a squatting or sitting posture.

This is the sixth rule.

14 Now follows the seventh rule: A monk or a nun may beg for a dwelling-place paved with clay or wood. If they get it, then they may use it; otherwise they should remain in a squatting or sitting posture. This is the seventh rule.

One who has adopted one of these seven rules, should not say, etc. (all as in 2, 1, 11, § 12).

15 I have heard the following explanation by the venerable (Mahavira): The Sthaviras, the venerable ones, have declared that division is fivefold:

The lord of the gods' dominion;

The king's dominion;

The houseowner's dominion;

The householder's dominion;

The religious man's dominion.

This is the whole duty, etc.

Thus I say.

End of the Seventh Lecture, called Regulation of Possession.

SECOND PART.

THE SEVEN LECTURES.

AKARANGA BOOK 2 8TH LECTURE.

1 When a monk or a nun wishes to perform religious postures 3, they should enter a village or a scot-free town, etc.; having entered it, they should not accept a place, even if it is offered, which is infected by eggs or living beings, etc.; for such a place is impure and unacceptable. In this way all that has been said about couches (in the Second Lecture) should be repeated here as far as 'water-plants' (2, 2, 1, § 5).

2 Avoiding these occasions to sin, a mendicant may choose one of these four rules for the performance of religious postures.

This is the first rule: I shall choose something inanimate, and lean against it; changing the position of the body, and moving about a little, I shall stand there. This is the first rule.

3 Now follows the second rule: I shall choose something inanimate, and lean against it; changing the position of the body, but not moving about a little, I shall stand there. This is the second rule.

4 Now follows the third rule: I shall choose something inanimate, and lean against it; not changing the position of the body, nor moving about a little, I shall stand there. This is the third rule.

5 Now follows the fourth rule: I shall choose something inanimate, but I shall not lean against it; not changing the position of the body, nor moving about a little, I shall stand there. Abandoning the care of the body, abandoning the care of the hair of the head, beard, and the other parts of the body, of the nails, perfectly motionless, I shall stand there. This is the fourth rule.

One who has adopted one of these four rules, etc. (see II, 1, II, § 12).

This is the whole duty, etc. Thus I say.

AKARANGA BOOK 2 9TH LECTURE.

1 When a monk or a nun wishes to go to a pure place for study, they [The original has the first person ketisami.] should not accept one which is infected by eggs or living beings, etc.; for it is impure and unacceptable. But if that place for study to which they wish to go, is free from eggs or living beings, etc., they may accept it; for it is pure and acceptable. In this way all that has been said in the corresponding passage about couches I should be repeated here as far as 'water-plants.'

2 If parties of two, three, four, or five (mendicants) resolve to go to the place for study, they should not embrace or hug, bite with their teeth or scratch with their nails each other's body.

This is the whole duty, etc. Thus I say.

AKARANGA BOOK 2 10TH LECTURE.

1 A monk or a nun being pressed by nature should, in case they have not their own broom, beg for that of a fellow-ascetic. A monk or a nun, seeing that the ground is infected by eggs or living beings, etc., should not ease nature on such an unfit ground. But if the ground is free from eggs or living beings, etc., then they may ease nature on such a ground.

2, 3 A monk or a nun, knowing that the householder with regard to such a place for the sake of one or many, male or female fellow-ascetics, for the sake of many Sramanas or Brahmanas whom he has well counted, kills living beings and commits various sins, should not ease nature on such a place or any other of the same sort, whether that place be appropriated by another person or not 3, etc. (see II, 1, 1, § 13).

4 Now he should know this: If that place has not been appropriated by another person, etc., he may ease nature on such a place (after having well inspected and cleaned it).

5 A monk or a nun should not ease nature on a ground which for their sake has been prepared or caused to be prepared (by the householder), or has been occupied by main force, or strewn with grass, or levelled, or smeared (with cowdung), or smoothed, or perfumed.

6 A monk or a nun should not ease nature on a ground where the householders or their sons remove from outside to inside, or vice versa, bulbs, roots, etc. (see II, 2, 1, § 5).

7 A monk or a nun should not ease nature on a pillar or bench or scaffold or loft or tower or roof.

8 A monk or a nun should not ease nature on the bare ground or on wet ground or on dusty ground or on a rock or clay containing life, or on timber inhabited by worms or on anything containing life, as eggs, living beings, etc.

9 A monk or a nun should not ease nature in a place where the householders or their sons have, do, or will put by bulbs, roots, etc.

10 A monk or a nun should not ease nature in a place where the householders or their sons have sown, sow, or will sow rice, beans, sesamum, pulse, or barley.

11 A monk or a nun should not ease nature in a place where there are heaps of refuse, furrows, mud, stakes, sprigs, holes, caves, walls, even or uneven places.

12 A monk or a nun should not ease nature in fireplaces, layers (or nests) of buffaloes, cattle, cocks, monkeys, quails, ducks, partridges, doves, or francoline partridges.

13 A monk or a nun should not ease nature in a place where suicide is committed, or where (those who desire to end their life) expose their body to vultures, or precipitate themselves from rocks or trees*, or eat poison, or enter fire. [* The commentator says: where they fall like a tree, having starved themselves to death, or where they fall from trees.]

14 A monk or a nun should not ease nature in gardens, parks, woods, forests, temples, or wells.

15 A monk or a nun should not ease nature in towers, pathways, doors, or town gates.

16 A monk or a nun should not ease nature where three or four roads meet, nor in courtyards or squares.

17 A monk or a nun should not ease nature where charcoal or potash is produced, or the dead are burnt, or on the sarcophaguses or shrines of the dead.

18 A monk or a nun should not ease nature at sacred places near rivers, marshes or ponds, or in a conduit.

19 A monk or a nun should not ease nature in fresh clay pits, fresh pasture grounds for cattle, in meadows or quarries.

20 A monk or a nun should not ease nature in a field of shrubs, vegetables, or roots.

21 A monk or a nun should not ease nature in woods of Asana [Terminalia Tomentosa.], Sana [Crotolaria Juncea.], Dhataki [Grislea Tomentosa.], Ketaki [Pandanus Odoratissimus.], Mango, Asoka, Punnaga, or other such-like places which contain leaves, flowers, fruits, seeds, or sprouts.

22 A monk or a nun should take their own chamber-pot or that of somebody else, and going apart with it, they should ease nature in a secluded place where no people pass or see them, and which is free from eggs or living beings, etc.; then taking (the chamber-pot), they should go to a secluded spot, and leave the excrements there on a heap of ashes, etc. (see II, 1, 1, § 2).

This is the whole duty, etc.

Thus I say.

AKARANGA BOOK 2 11TH LECTURE.

1 A monk or a nun should not resolve to go where they will hear sounds of a Mridanga, Nandimridanga, or Ghallari [These are different kinds of drums.], or any such-like various sounds of drums.

2 If a monk or a nun hear any sounds, viz. of the Vina, Vipamki, Vadvisaka, Tunaka, Panaka, Tumbavinika, or Dhamkuna, they should not resolve to go where they will hear any such-like various sounds of stringed instruments.

3 The same precepts apply to sounds of kettledrums, viz. of the Tala, Lattiya, Gohiya, or Kirikiriya;

4 Also to sounds of wind instruments, viz. the conch, flute, Kharumukhi, or Piripiriya.

5 A monk* or a nun should not, for the sake of hearing sounds, go to walls or ditches, etc. (see II, 3, 3, §§ 1 and 2); [* The beginning, 'If a monk or a nun hear particular sounds somewhere, viz.,' and the end, 'they should not resolve to go to suchlike or other places for the sake of hearing sounds,' are in the text repeated in all, §§ 5-16. In the translation the text has been somewhat Abridged.]

6 Nor to marshes, pasture grounds, thickets, woods, strongholds in woods, mountains, strongholds in mountains;

7 Nor to villages, towns, markets, or a capital, hermitages, cities, halting-places for caravans;

8 Nor to gardens, parks, woods, forests, temples, assembly halls, wells;

9 Nor to towers, pathways, doors, or town gates;

10 Nor where three or four roads meet, nor to courtyards or squares;

11 Nor to stables (or nests) of buffaloes, cattle, horses, elephants, etc. (see 10, § 12);

12 Nor to places where buffaloes, bulls, horses, etc., fight;

13 Nor to places where herds of cattle, horses, or elephants are kept;

14 Nor to places where story-tellers or acrobats perform, or where continuously story-telling, dramatical plays, singing, music, performance on the Vina, beating of time, playing on the Turya, clever playing on the Pataha is going on;

15 Nor to places where quarrels, affrays, riots, conflicts between two kingdoms, anarchical or revolutionary disturbances occur;

16 Nor to places where a young well-attended girl, well-attired and well-ornamented, is paraded, or where somebody is led to death.

17 A monk or a nun should not, for the sake of hearing sounds, go to places where there are many great temptations 1, viz. where many cars, chariots, Mlekkhas, or foreigners meet.

18 A monk or a nun should not, for the sake of hearing sounds, go to great festivals where women or men, old, young, or middle-aged ones are well-dressed and ornamented, sing, make music, dance, laugh, play, sport, or give, distribute, portion or parcel out plenty of food, drink, dainties, and spices.

19 A monk or a nun should not like or love, desire for, or be enraptured with, sounds of this or the other world, heard or unheard ones, seen or unseen ones.

This is the whole duty, etc.

Thus I say.

AKARANGA BOOK 2 12TH LECTURE.

1 If a monk or a nun see various colours (or forms), viz. in wreaths, dressed images, dolls, clothes, woodwork, plastering, paintings, jewelry, ivory-work, strings, leaf-cutting, they should not for the sake of pleasing the eye resolve to go where they will see various colours (or forms). All that has been said in the last chapter with regard to sounds should be repeated here with regard to colours (or forms); only the passages on music are to be omitted.

AKARANGA BOOK 2 13TH LECTURE.

1 One should neither be pleased with nor prohibit the action of another which relates to one's self, and produces karman.

One should neither be pleased with nor prohibit it [In the text these words are repeated after each Sutra in §§ 1-10.];

If another (i.e. a householder) wipes [or rubs] the mendicant's feet;

2 If he kneads or strokes them;

3 If he touches or paints them;

4 If he smears or anoints them with oil, ghee, or marrow;

5 If he rubs or shampoos them with Lodhra, ground drugs, powder, or dye;

6 If he sprinkles or washes them with hot or cold water;

7 If he rubs or anoints them with any sort of ointment;

8 If he perfumes or fumigates them with any sort of incense;

9 If he extracts or removes a splinter or thorn from them;

10 If he extracts or removes pus or blood from them.

11 If he wipes or rubs the mendicant's body, etc. (see §§ 2-8 down to) if he perfumes or fumigates it with any sort of incense.

12 If he wipes or rubs a wound in (the mendicant's) body (etc. 1, down to) if he sprinkles or washes it with hot or cold water;

13 If he cuts or incises it with any sharp instrument; if after having done so, he extracts or removes pus or blood from it.

14 If he wipes or rubs a boil, abscess, ulcer, or fistula (etc., down to) if he cuts or incises it with any sharp instrument; if after having done so, he extracts or removes pus or blood from it;

15 If he removes, or wipes off, the sweat and uncleanness on his body;

16 If he removes, or wipes off, the dirt of his eyes, ears, teeth, or nails.

17 If he cuts or dresses the long hair of his head or his brows or his armpits;

18 If he removes, or wipes off, the nit or lice from his head.

19 One should neither be pleased with nor prohibit it, if the other, sitting in the Anka or Paryanka posture, wipes or rubs (the mendicant's) feet; in this way the §§ 1-18 should be repeated here.

20 One should neither be pleased with nor prohibit it, if the other, sitting in the Anka or Paryanka posture, fastens or ties a necklace of many or less strings, a necklace hanging down over the breast, a collar, a diadem, a garland, a golden string;

21 If the other leading him to, or treating him in, a garden or a park, wipes or rubs (the mendicant's) feet, etc. (all as above); similarly with actions done reciprocally.

22 One should neither be pleased with nor prohibit it, if the other tries to cure him by pure charms;

If the other tries to cure him by impure charms;

If he tries to cure him, digging up and cutting, for the sake of a sick monk, living bulbs, roots, rind, or sprouts.

23 For sensation is the result of former actions; all sorts of living beings experience sensation.

This is the whole duty, etc.

Thus I say.

AKARANGA BOOK 2 14TH LECTURE.

1 One should not be pleased with nor prohibit a reciprocal action, which relates to one's self, and produces karman.

A mendicant should not be pleased with nor prohibit it, if (he and the other) wipe or rub each other's feet, etc.

In this way the whole Thirteenth Lecture should be repeated here.

This is the whole duty, etc. Thus I say.

End of the Second Part, called the Seven Lectures.

THIRD PART.

AKARANGA BOOK 2 15TH LECTURE,

CALLED THE CLAUSES.

1 In that period, in that age lived the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, the five (most important moments of whose life happened) when the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Uttaraphalguni; to wit: In Uttaraphalguni he descended (from heaven), and having descended (thence), he entered the womb (of Devananda); in Uttaraphalguni he was removed from the womb (of Devananda) to the womb (of Trisala); in Uttaraphalguni he was born; in Uttaraphalguni tearing out his hair, he left the house, and entered the state of houselessness; in Uttaraphalguni he obtained the highest knowledge and intuition, called Kevala, which is infinite, supreme, unobstructed, unimpeded, complete, and perfect. But in Svati the Venerable One obtained final liberation.

2 When in this Avasaripini era, the Sushama-sushama period, the Sushama period, the Sushamaduhshama period, and much time of the Duhshamasushama period had elapsed, seventy-five years nine and a half months of it being left; in the fourth month of summer, in the eighth fortnight, in the light fortnight of Ashadha, on its sixth day, while the moon was in conjunction with Uttaraphalguni, the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira descended from the great Vimana, the all-victorious and all-prosperous Pushpottara, which is like the lotus amongst the best (and highest flowers), and like the Svastika and Vardhamanaka amongst the celestial regions, where he had lived for twenty Sagaropamas till the termination of his allotted length of life, (divine) nature and existence (among gods). Here, forsooth, in the continent of Gambudvipa, in Bharatavarsha, in the southern part of it, in the southern brahmanical part of the place Kundapura, he took the form of an embryo in the womb of Devananda, of the Galandharayana gotra, wife of the Brahmana Rishabhadata, of the gotra of Kodala, taking the form of a lion.

3 The knowledge of the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira (with reference to this transaction) was threefold: he knew that he was to descend; he knew that he had descended; he knew not when he was descending. For that time has been declared to be infinitesimally small.

4 Then in the third month of the rainy season, the fifth fortnight, the dark (fortnight) of Asvina, on its thirteenth day, while the moon was in conjunction with Uttaraphalguni, after the lapse of eighty-two days, on the eighty-third day current, the compassionate god (Indra), reflecting on what was the established custom (with regard to the birth of Tirthakaras), removed the embryo from the southern brahmanical part of the place Kundapura to the northern Kshatriya part of the same place, rejecting the unclean matter, and retaining the clean matter, lodged the fetus in the womb of Trisala of the Vasishtha gotra, wife of the Kshatriya Siddhartha, of the Kasyapa gotra, of the clan of the Gnatris, and lodged the fetus of the Kshatriyani Trisala in the womb of Devananda of the Galandharayana gotra, wife of the Brahmana Rishabhadata, of the gotra of Kodala, in the southern brahmanical part of the place Kundapuri.

5 The knowledge of the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira (with regard to this transaction) was threefold: he knew that he was to be removed; he knew that he was removed; he also knew when he was being removed.

6 In that period, in that age, once upon a time, after the lapse of nine complete months and seven and a half days, in the first month of summer, in the second fortnight, the dark (fortnight) of Kaitra, on its thirteenth day, while the moon was in conjunction with Uttaraphalguni, the Kshatriyani Trisala, perfectly healthy herself, gave birth to a perfectly healthy (boy), the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira.

7 In that night in which the Kshatriyani Trisala, perfectly healthy herself, gave birth to a perfectly healthy (boy), the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, there was one great divine, godly lustre (originated) by descending and ascending gods and goddesses (of the four orders of) Bhavanapatis, Vyantaras, Gyotishkas, and Vimanavasins; and in the conflux of gods the bustle of gods amounted to confusion.

8 In that night, etc., the gods and goddesses rained down one great shower of nectar, sandal powder, flowers, gold, and pearls.

9 In that night the gods and goddesses (of the above-mentioned four orders) performed the customary ceremonies of auspiciousness and honour, and his anointment as a Tirthakara.

10 Upwards from the time when the Venerable Mahavira was placed in the womb of the Kshatriyani Trisala, that family's (treasure) of gold, silver, riches, corn, jewels, pearls, shells, precious stones, and corals increased.

11 When the parents of the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira had become aware of this, after the lapse of the tenth day, and the performance of the purification, they prepared much food, drink, sweetmeats, and spices; and having invited a host of friends, near and remote relatives, they distributed, portioned out, bestowed (the above-mentioned materials) to Sramanas, Brahmanas, paupers, beggars [The next word, bhivvumdaga, has been left out in the translation.], eunuchs, etc., and distributed gifts to those who wanted to make presents; then they gave a dinner to the host of friends, near and remote relatives, and after dinner they announced the name (of the child) to their guests:

12 'Since the prince was placed in the womb of the Kshatriyani Trisala, this family's (treasure) of gold, silver, riches, corn, jewels, pearls, shells, precious stones, and corals increased; therefore the prince shall be called Vardhamana (i.e. the Increasing).'

13 The Venerable Ascetic Mahavira was attended by five nurses: a wet-nurse, a nurse to clean him, one to dress him, one to play with him, one to carry him; being transferred from the lap of one nurse to that of another, he grew up on that beautiful ground, paved with mosaic of precious stones, like a Kampaka tree [Michelia Champaka.] growing in the glen of a mountain.

14 Then the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, after his intellect had developed and the childhood had passed away, lived in the enjoyment of the allowed, noble, fivefold joys and pleasures: (consisting in) sound, touch, taste, colour, and smell.

15 The Venerable Ascetic Mahavira belonged to the Kasyapa gotra. His three names have thus been recorded by tradition: by his parents he was called Vardhamana, because he is devoid of love and hate (he is called) Sramana (i.e. Ascetic), because he sustains dreadful dangers and fears, the noble nakedness, and the miseries of the world; the name Venerable Ascetic Mahavira has been given to him by the gods.

The Venerable Ascetic Mahavira's father belonged to the Kasyapa gotra; he had three names: Siddhartha, Sreyarsa, and Gasamsa. His mother belonged to the Vasishtha gotra, and had three names: Trisala, Videhadatta, and Priyakarini. His paternal uncle Suparsva belonged to the Kasyapa gotra. His eldest brother, Nandivardhana, and his eldest sister, Sudarsana, belonged both to the Kasyapa gotra. His wife Yasoda belonged to the Kaundinya gotra. His daughter, who belonged to the Kasyapa gotra, had two names: Anogga and Priyadarsana. His granddaughter, who belonged to the Kausika gotra, had two names: Seshavati and Yasovati.

16 The Venerable Ascetic Mahavira's parents were worshippers of Parsva and followers of the Sramanas. During many years they were followers of the Sramanas, and for the sake of protecting the six classes of lives they observed, blamed, repented, confessed, and did penance according to their sins. On a bed of Kusa-grass they rejected all food, and their bodies dried up by the last mortification of the flesh, which is to end in death. Thus they died in the proper month, and, leaving their bodies, were born as gods in Adbhuta Kalpa. Thence descending after the termination of their allotted length of life, they will, in Mahavideha, with their departing breath, reach absolute perfection, wisdom, liberation, final Nirvana, and the end of all misery.

17 In that period, in that age the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, a Gnatri Kshatriya, Gnatritputra, a Videha, son of Videhadatta, a native of Videha, a prince of Videha, lived thirty years amongst the householders under the name of 'Videha.'

After his parents had gone to the worlds of the gods and he had fulfilled his promise, he gave up his gold and silver, his troops and chariots, and distributed, portioned out, and gave away his valuable treasures (consisting of) riches, corn, gold, pearls, etc., and distributed among those who wanted to make presents to others. Thus he gave away during a whole year. In the first month of winter, in the first fortnight, in the dark (fortnight) of Margasiras, on its tenth day, while the moon was in conjunction with Uttaraphalguni, he made up his mind to retire from the world.

18 1st A year before the best of Ginas will retire from the world, they continue to give away their property, from the rising of the sun.

2nd One crore and eight lakhs of gold is his gift at the rising of the sun, as if it were his morning meal.

3rd Three hundred and eighty-eight crores and eighty lakhs were given in one year.

4th The Kundaladharas of Vaisramana, the Laukantika and Maharddhika gods in the fifteen Karmabhumi 1 wake the Tirthakara.

5th In Brahma Kalpa and in the line of Krishnas, the Laukantika Vimanas are eightfold and infinite in number.

6th These orders of gods wake the best of Ginas, the Venerable Vira: Arhat! propagate the religion which is a blessing to all creatures in the world!

When the gods and goddesses (of the four orders of) Bhavanapatis, Vyantaras, Gyotishkas, and Vimanavasins had become aware of the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira's intention to retire from the world, they assumed their proper form, dress, and ensigns, ascended with their proper pomp and splendour, together with their whole retinue, their own vehicles and chariots, and rejecting all gross matter, retained only the subtle matter. Then they rose and with that excellent, quick, swift, rapid, divine motion of the gods they came down again crossing numberless continents and oceans till they arrived in Gambudvipa at the northern Kshatriya part of the place Kundapura; in the north-eastern quarter of it they suddenly halted.

19 Sakra, the leader and king of the gods, quietly and slowly stopped his vehicle and chariot, quietly and slowly descended from it and went apart. There he underwent a great transformation, and produced by magic a great, beautiful, lovely, fine-shaped divine pavilion, which was ornamented with many designs in precious stones, gold, and pearls. In the middle part of that divine pavilion he produced one great throne of the same description, with a footstool.

20 Then he went where the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira was, and thrice circumambulating him from left to right, he praised and worshipped him. Leading him to the divine pavilion, he softly placed him with the face towards the east on the throne, anointed him with hundredfold and thousandfold refined oil, with perfumes and decoctions, bathed him with pure water, and rubbed him with beautifying cool sandal, laid on a piece of cloth worth a lakh. He clad him in a pair of robes so light that the smallest breath would carry them away; they were manufactured in a famous city, praised by clever artists, soft as the fume of horses, interwoven with gold by skilful masters, and ornamented with designs of flamingos. Then (the god) decked him with necklaces of many and fewer strings, with one hanging down over his breast and one consisting of one row of pearls, with a garland, a golden string, a turban, a diadem, wreaths of precious stones, and decorated him with garlands, ribbons, scarves, and sashes like the Kalpavriksha.

21 The god then, for a second time, underwent a great transformation, and produced by magic the great palankin, called Kandraprabha [i.e. shining like the moon.], which a thousand men carry. (This palankin) was adorned with pictures of wolves, bulls, horses, men, dolphins, birds, monkeys, elephants, antelopes, sarabhas [A fabulous animal with eight legs.], yaks, tigers, lions, creeping plants, and a train of couples of Vidyadharas; it had a halo of thousands of rays; it was decorated with thousands of brilliant glittering rupees; its lustre was mild and bright; the eyes could not bear its light; it shone with heaps and masses of pearls; it was hung with strings and ribbons, and with golden excellent necklaces, extremely beautiful; it was embellished with designs of lotuses and many other plants; its cupola was adorned with many precious stones of five colours, with bells and flags; it was conspicuous, lovely, beautiful, splendid, magnificent.

22 7th This palankin was brought for the best of Ginas, who is free from old age and death; it was hung with wreaths and garlands of divine flowers, grown in water or on dry ground.

8th In the middle of the palankin (was) a costly throne covered with a divine cloth, precious stones and silver, with a footstool, for the best of Ginas.

9th He wore on his head a chaplet and a diadem, his body was shining, and he was adorned with many ornaments; he had put on a robe of muslin worth a lakh.

10 After a fast of three days, with a glorious resolution he ascended the supreme palankin, purifying all by his light.

11 He sat on his throne, and Sakra and Isana, on both sides, fanned him with chowries, the handles of which were inlaid with jewels and precious stones.

12 In front it was uplifted by men, covered with joyful horripilation; behind the gods carried it: the Suras and Asuras, the Garudas and the chiefs of Nagas.

13 The Suras carried it on the eastern side, and the Asuras on the southern one; on the western side the Garudas carried it, and the Nagas on the northern side.

14th As a grove in blossom, or a lotus-covered lake in autumn looks beautiful with a mass of flowers, so did (then) the firmament with hosts of gods.

15th As a grove of Siddhartha [White mustard.], of Karnikara [Cassia Fistula.] or of Kampaka [Michelia Champaka.] looks beautiful with a mass of flowers, so did (then) the firmament with hosts of gods.

16th In the skies and on earth the sound of musical instruments produced by hundreds of thousands of excellent drums, kettle-drums, cymbals, and conches was extremely pleasant.

17th Then the gods ordered many hundreds of actors to perform a very rich concert of four kinds of instruments: stringed instruments and drums, cymbals and wind-instruments.

At that period, in that age, in the first month of winter, in the first fortnight, the dark (fortnight) of Margasiras, on its tenth day, called Suvrata, in the Muhurta called Vigaya, while the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Uttaraphalguni, when the shadow had turned towards the east, and the first Paurushi was over, after fasting three days without taking water, having put on one garment, the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, in his palankin Kandraprabha, which only a thousand men can carry, with a train of gods, men, and Asuras left the northern Kshatriya part of the place Kundapura by the high way for the park Gnatri Shanda. There, just at the beginning of night, he caused the palankin Kandraprabha to stop quietly on a slightly raised untouched ground, quietly descended from it, sat quietly down on a throne with the face towards the east, and took off all his ornaments and finery.

18th At the command of Sakra, the clamour of men and gods, and the sound of musical instruments suddenly ceased, when Mahavira chose the holy conduct.

19th Day and night following that conduct which is a blessing to all animated and living beings, the zealous gods listen to him with joyful horripilation.

THE GRAND BIBLE

When the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira had adopted the holy conduct which produced that state of soul in which the reward of former actions is temporarily counteracted, he reached the knowledge called Manahpariyaya, by which he knew the thoughts of all sentient beings, with five organs, which are not defective, and possess a developed intellect, (living) in the two and a half continents and the two oceans. Then he formed the following resolution: I shall for twelve years neglect my body and abandon the care of it; I shall with equanimity bear, undergo, and suffer all calamities arising from divine powers, men or animals.

24 The Venerable Ascetic Mahavira having formed this resolution, and neglecting his body, arrived in the village Kummara when only one Muhurta of the day remained. Neglecting his body, the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira meditated on his Self, in blameless lodgings, in blameless wandering, in restraint, kindness, avoidance of sinful influence (samvara), chaste life, in patience, freedom from passion, contentment; control, circumspectness, practising religious postures and acts; walking the path of Nirvana and liberation, which is the fruit of good conduct. Living thus he with equanimity bore, endured, sustained, and suffered all calamities arising from divine powers, men, and animals, with undisturbed and unafflicted mind, careful of body, speech, and mind.

25 The Venerable Ascetic Mahavira passed twelve years in this way of life; during the thirteenth year in the second month of summer, in the fourth fortnight, the light (fortnight) of Vaisakha, on its tenth day, called Suvrata, in the Muhurta called Vigaya, while the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Uttaraaphalguni, when the shadow had turned towards the east, and the first wake was over, outside of the town Grimbhikagrama, on the northern bank of the river Rigupalika, in the field of the householder Samaga, in a north-eastern direction from an old temple, not far from a Sal tree, in a squatting position with joined heels exposing himself to the heat of the sun, with the knees high and the head low, in deep meditation, in the midst of abstract meditation, he reached Nirvana, the complete and full, the unobstructed, unimpeded, infinite and supreme, best knowledge and intuition, called Kevala.

26 When the Venerable One had become an Arhat and Gina, he was a Kevalin, omniscient and comprehending all objects, he knew all conditions of the world, of gods, men, and demons; whence they come, where they go, whether they are born as men or animals (kyavana), or become gods or hell-beings (upapada); their food, drink, doings, desires, open and secret deeds, their conversation and gossip, and the thoughts of their minds; he saw and knew all conditions in the whole world of all living beings.

27 On the day when the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira reached the Kevala, the gods (of the four orders of) Bhavanapatis, Vyantaras, Gyotishkas, and Vimanavasins descended from, and ascended to heaven, etc. (as on the moment of his birth, see above, § 7).

28 Then when the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira had reached the highest knowledge and intuition, he reflected on himself and the world: first he taught the law to the gods, afterwards to men.

29 The Venerable Ascetic Mahavira endowed with the highest knowledge and intuition taught the five great vows, with their clauses, the six classes of lives to the Sramanas and Nirgranthas, to Gautama, etc.

The six classes of lives are earth-body, etc. (down to) animals.

1st. The first great vow, Sir, runs thus:

1 I renounce all killing of living beings, whether subtle or gross, whether movable or immovable. Nor shall I myself kill living beings (nor cause others to do it, nor consent to it). As long as I live, I confess and blame, repent and exempt myself of these sins, in the thrice threefold way I, in mind, speech, and body. There are five clauses.

The first clause runs thus: A Nirgrantha is careful in his walk, not careless. The Kevalin assigns as the reason, that a Nirgrantha, careless in his walk, might (with his feet) hurt or displace or injure or kill living beings. Hence a Nirgrantha is careful in his walk, not careless in his walk. This is the first clause.

2 Now follows the second clause: A Nirgrantha searches into his mind (i.e. thoughts and intentions). If his mind is sinful, blamable, intent on works, acting on impulses, produces cutting and splitting (or division and dissension), quarrels, faults, and pains, injures living beings, or kills creatures, he should not employ such a mind in action; but if, on the contrary, it is not sinful, etc., then he may put it in action. This is the second clause.

3 Now follows the third clause: A Nirgrantha searches into his speech; if his speech is sinful, blamable, etc. (all down to) kills creatures, he should not utter that speech. But if, on the contrary, it is not sinful, etc., then he may utter it. This is the third clause.

4 Now follows the fourth clause: A Nirgrantha is careful in laying down his utensils of begging, he is not careless in it.

The Kevalin says: A Nirgrantha who is careless in laying down his utensils of begging, might hurt or displace or injure or kill all sorts of living beings. Hence a Nirgrantha is careful in laying down his utensils of begging, he is not careless in it.

This is the fourth clause.

5 Now follows the fifth clause: A Nirgrantha eats and drinks after inspecting his food and drink; he does not eat and drink without inspecting his food and drink. The Kevalin says: If a Nirgrantha would eat and drink without inspecting his food and drink, he might hurt and displace or injure or kill all sorts of living beings. Hence a Nirgrantha eats and drinks after inspecting his food and drink, not without doing so. This is the fifth clause.

In this way the great vow is correctly practised, followed, executed, explained, established, effected according to the precept. This is, Sir, the first great vow: Abstinence from killing any living beings. i.

2nd. The second great vow runs thus:

1 I renounce all vices of lying speech (arising) from anger or greed or fear or mirth. I shall neither myself speak lies, nor cause others to speak lies, nor consent to the speaking of lies by others. I confess and blame, repent and exempt myself of these sins in the thrice threefold way, in mind, speech, and body. There are five clauses.

The first clause runs thus: A Nirgrantha speaks after deliberation, not without deliberation. The Kevalin says: Without deliberation a Nirgrantha might utter a falsehood in his speech. A Nirgrantha speaks after deliberation, not without deliberation. This is the first clause.

2 Now follows the second clause: A Nirgrantha comprehends (and renounces) anger, he is not angry. The Kevalin says: A Nirgrantha who is moved by anger, and is angry, might utter a falsehood in his speech. A Nirgrantha, etc. This is the second clause.

3 Now follows the third clause: A Nirgrantha comprehends (and renounces) greed, he is not greedy. The Kevalin says: A Nirgrantha who is moved by greed, and is greedy, might utter a falsehood in his speech. A Nirgrantha, etc. This is the third clause.

4 Now follows the fourth clause: A Nirgrantha comprehends (and renounces) fear, he is not afraid. The Kevalin says: A Nirgrantha who is moved by fear, and is afraid, might utter a falsehood in his speech. A Nirgrantha, etc. This is the fourth clause.

5 Now follows the fifth clause: A Nirgrantha comprehends (and renounces) mirth, he is not mirthful. The Kevalin says: A Nirgrantha who is moved by mirth, and is mirthful, might utter a falsehood in his speech. A Nirgrantha, etc. This is the fifth clause.

In this way the great vow is correctly practised, followed, etc. This is, Sir, the second great vow. ii.

3rd. The third great vow runs thus:

1 I renounce all taking of anything not given, either in a village or a town or a wood, either of little or much, of small or great, of living or lifeless things. I shall neither take myself what is not given, nor cause others to take it, nor consent to their taking it. As long as I live, I confess and blame, etc. (all down to) body. There are five clauses.

The first clause runs thus: A Nirgrantha begs after deliberation, for a limited ground, not without deliberation. The Kevalin says: If a Nirgrantha begs without deliberation for a limited ground, he might take what is not given. A Nirgrantha, etc. This is the first clause.

2 Now follows the second clause: A Nirgrantha consumes his food and drink with permission (of his superior), not without his permission. The Kevalin says: If a Nirgrantha consumes his food and drink without the superior's permission, he might eat what is not given. A Nirgrantha, etc. This is the second clause.

3 Now follows the third clause: A Nirgrantha who has taken possession of some ground, should always take possession of a limited part of it and for a fixed time. The Kevalin says: If a Nirgrantha who has taken possession of some ground, should take possession of an unlimited part of it and for an unfixed time, he might take what is not given. A Nirgrantha, etc. This is the third clause.

4 Now follows the fourth clause: A Nirgrantha who has taken possession of some ground, should constantly have his grant renewed. The Kevalin says: If a Nirgrantha has not constantly his grant renewed, he might take possession of what is not given. A Nirgrantha, etc. This is the fourth clause.

5 Now follows the fifth clause: A Nirgrantha begs for a limited ground for his co-religionists after deliberation, not without deliberation. The Kevalin says: If a Nirgrantha should beg without deliberation, he might take possession of what is not given. A Nirgrantha, etc. This is the fifth clause.

In this way the great vow, etc. This is, Sir, the third great vow. iii.

4th. The fourth great vow runs thus:

1 I renounce all sexual pleasures, either with gods or men or animals. I shall not give way to sensuality, etc. (all as in the foregoing paragraph down to) exempt myself. There are five clauses.

The first clause runs thus: A Nirgrantha does not continually discuss topics relating to women. The Kevalin says: If a Nirgrantha discusses such topics, he might fall from the law declared by the Kevalin, because of the destruction or disturbance of his peace. A Nirgrantha, etc. This is the first clause.

2 Now follows the second clause: A Nirgrantha does not regard and contemplate the lovely forms of women. The Kevalin says: If a Nirgrantha regards and contemplates the lovely forms of women, he might, etc. A Nirgrantha, etc. This is the second clause.

3 Now follows the third clause: A Nirgrantha does not recall to his mind the pleasures and amusements he formerly had with women. The Kevalin says: If a Nirgrantha recalls to his mind the pleasures and amusements he formerly had with women, he might, etc. A Nirgrantha, etc. This is the third clause.

4 Now follows the fourth clause: A Nirgrantha does not eat and drink too much, nor does he drink liquors or eat highly-seasoned dishes. The Kevalin says: If a Nirgrantha did eat and drink too much, or did drink liquors and eat highly-seasoned dishes, he might, etc. A Nirgrantha, etc. This is the fourth clause.

5 Now follows the fifth clause: A Nirgrantha does not occupy a bed or couch affected [This may mean belonging to, or close by.] by women, animals, or eunuchs. The Kevalin says: If a Nirgrantha did occupy a bed or couch affected by women, animals, or eunuchs, he might, etc. A Nirgrantha, etc. This is the fifth clause.

In this way the great vow, etc. This is, Sir, the fourth great vow. iv.

5th. The fifth great vow runs thus:

1 I renounce all attachments [This means the pleasure in external objects.], whether little or much, small or great, living or lifeless; neither shall I myself form such attachments, nor cause others to do so, nor consent to their doing so, etc. (all down to) exempt myself.

There are five clauses.

The first clause runs thus: If a creature with ears hears agreeable and disagreeable sounds, it should not be attached to, nor delighted with, nor desiring of, nor infatuated by, nor covetous of, nor disturbed by the agreeable or disagreeable sounds. The Kevalin says: If a Nirgrantha is thus affected by the pleasant or unpleasant sounds, he might fall, etc. (see above, IV, I).

If it is impossible not to hear sounds, which reach the ear, the mendicant should avoid love or hate, originated by them. A creature with ears hears agreeable and disagreeable sounds. This is the first clause.

2 Now follows the second clause: If a creature with eyes sees agreeable and disagreeable forms (or colours), it should not be attached, etc., to them.

The Kevalin says, etc. (the rest as in the last clause. Substitute only see and forms for hear and sounds).

This is the second clause.

3 Now follows the third clause: If a creature with an organ of smell smells agreeable or disagreeable smells, it should not be attached to them. (The rest as above. Substitute smell and nose.) This is the third clause.

4 Now follows the fourth clause: If a creature with a tongue tastes agreeable or disagreeable tastes, it should not be attached, etc., to them. (The rest as above. Substitute taste and tongue.)

This is the fourth clause.

5 Now follows the fifth clause: If a creature with an organ of feeling feels agreeable or disagreeable touches, it should not be attached to them. (The rest as above. Substitute feel and touch.) This is the fifth clause. In this way the great vow, etc. (see above, v).

He who is well provided with these great vows and their twenty-five clauses is really Houseless, if he, according to the sacred lore, the precepts, and the way correctly practises, follows, executes, explains, establishes, and, according to the precept, effects them.

End of the Fifteenth Lecture, called the Clauses.

FOURTH PART.

AKARANGA BOOK 2 16TH LECTURE, CALLED THE LIBERATION.

1 The creatures attain only a temporary residence (in one of the four states of being); hearing this supreme truth (i.e. the doctrine of the Tirthakara's) one should meditate upon it. The wise man should free himself from the family bonds; fearless should he give up acts and attachments.

2 A mendicant, living thus, self-controlled towards the eternal (world of living beings), the matchless sage, who collects his alms, is insulted with words by the people assailing him, like an elephant in battle with arrows.

3 Despised by such-like people, the wise man, with undisturbed mind, sustains their words and blows, as a rock is not shaken by the wind. (4) Disregarding (all calamities) he lives together with clever (monks, insensible) to pain and pleasure, not hurting the movable and immovable (beings), not killing, bearing all: so is described the great sage, a good Sramana.

5 As the lustre of a burning flame increases, so increase the austerity, wisdom, and glory of a steadfast sage who, with vanquished desires, meditates on the supreme place of virtue 1, though suffering pain [Dhammapadam].

6 The great vows which are called the place of peace, the great teachers, and the producers of disinterestedness have, in all quarters of the earth, been proclaimed by the infinite Gina, the knowing one, as light, illumining the three worlds, (repels) darkness.

7 The unbound one, living amongst the bound (i.e. householders), should lead the life of a mendicant; unattached to women, he should speak with reverence. Not desiring this or the next world, the learned one is not measured by the qualities of love.

8 The dirt (of sins) formerly committed by a thus liberated mendicant who walks in wisdom (and restraint), who is constant, and bears pain, vanishes as the dirt covering silver (is removed) by fire.

9 He lives, forsooth, in accordance with wisdom (and restraint), and walks free from desire, and with conquered sensuality. As a snake casts off its old skin, so is the Brahmana freed from the bed of pain.

10 As they call the great ocean a boundless flood of water, difficult to traverse with the arms (alone), so should the learned one know (and renounce) it (the samsara): that sage is called 'Maker of the end.'

11 Here amongst men bondage and deliverance have been declared; he who, according to that doctrine (of the church), knows bondage and deliverance: that sage is called 'Maker of the end.' (12) He for whom there is no bondage whatever in this world, and besides in the two (other continents, or heaven and hell), is indeed a (monk needing) no support and no standing place; he has quitted the path of births.

THE KALPA SUTRA OF BHADRABAHU. or The Gospel of Mahavira or Life Of Mahavira or Kalpa Sutra or Lives Of The Ginas

From: Jaina Sutras, Part 1,

Sacred Books of the East, Vol. 22

Editor: F. Max Müller, Oxford

Original language: Prakrit

Translation: Hermann Jacobi, 1884

Estimated Range of Dating: 250 B.C. - 200 A.D.

(The Kalpa Sutra is a Jain text containing the biographies of the Jain Tirthankaras, notably Parshvanatha and Mahavira. Traditionally ascribed to Bhadrabahu, which would place it in the 4th century BC, it was probably put in writing when the Brahmi Script was more widely in use, so perhaps between the 3rd century BC and 2nd century AD.)

Within the six sections of the Jain literary corpus belonging to the Svetambara school, it is classed as one of the Cheda Sutras. This Sutra contains detailed life histories and, from the mid-15th century, was frequently illustrated with miniature painting. The oldest surviving copies are written on paper in western India in the 14th century. The book is read and illustrated in an eight-day-long festival of Paryushan by Jain monks for general people. Only monks can read the scriptures, as in Jainism, this book has very high spiritual values.)

LIFE OF MAHAVIRA, LECTURE 1

1 Obeisance to the Arhats!

Obeisance to the Liberated Ones!

Obeisance to the Religious Guides!

Obeisance to the Religious Instructors! Obeisance to all Saints in the World!

This fivefold obeisance, destroying all sins, is of all benedictions the principal benediction.

In that period, in that age lived the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, the five (most important moments of whose life happened) when the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Uttaraphalguni; to wit, in Uttaraphalguni he descended (from heaven), and having descended (thence), he entered the womb (of Devananda); in Uttaraphalguni he was removed from the womb (of Devananda) to the womb (of Trisala); in Uttaraphalguni he was born; in Uttaraphalguni, tearing out his hair, he left the house and entered the state of houselessness; in Uttaraphalguni he obtained the highest knowledge and intuition, called Kevala, which is infinite, supreme, unobstructed, unimpeded, complete, and perfect. But in Svati the Venerable One obtained final liberation.

LIFE OF MAHAVIRA, LECTURE 2

[Vakana. These vakanas are the parts into which the Kalpa Sutra is generally divided by some commentators. I have adopted the distribution of Samayasundara.]

2 In that period, in that age the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, having on the sixth day of the fourth month of summer, in the eighth fortnight, the light (fortnight) of Ashadha, descended from the great Vimana, the all-victorious and all-prosperous Pushpottara, which is like the lotus amongst the best things, where he had lived for twenty Sagaropamas till the termination of his allotted length of life, of his (divine nature, and of his existence (among gods); here in the continent of Gambudvipa, in Bharatavarsha,--when of this Avasarpini era the Sushama-sushama, the Sushama, and Sushamadushama periods, and the greater part of the Duhshamasushama period (containing a Kodakodi of Sagaropamas, less forty-two thousand years) had elapsed, and only seventy-two years, eight and a half months were left, after twenty-one Tirthakaras of the race of Ikshvaku and of the Kasyapa gotra, and two of the race of Hari and of the Gautama gotra, on the whole twenty-three Tirthakaras had appeared,--the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, the last of the Tirthakaras, took the form of an embryo in the womb of Devananda, of the Galandharayana gotra, the wife of the Brahmana Rishabhadata, of the gotra of Kodala, in the brahmanical part of the town Kundagrama in the middle of the night, when the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Uttaraphalguni, after his allotted length of life, of his (divine) nature, and of his existence (amongst gods) had come to their termination.

3 The knowledge of the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira (about this) was threefold; he knew that he was to descend, he knew that he had descended, he knew not when he was descending 2.

In that night in which the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira took the form of an embryo in the womb of the Brahmani Devananda of the Galandharayana gotra, the Brahmani Devananda was on her couch, taking fits of sleep, in a state between sleeping and waking, and having seen the following fourteen illustrious, beautiful, lucky, blest, auspicious, fortunate great dreams, she woke up. To wit:

4 An elephant, a bull, a lion, the anointing (of the goddess Sri), a garland, the moon, the sun, a flag, a vase, a lotus lake, the ocean, a celestial abode, a heap of jewels, and a flame.

5 When the Brahmani Devananda, having seen these dreams, woke up, she--glad, pleased, and joyful in her mind, delighted, extremely enraptured, with a heart widening under the influence of happiness, with the hair of her body all erect in their pores like the flowers of the Kadamba touched by rain-drops--firmly fixed the dreams (in her mind), and rose from her couch. Neither hasty nor trembling, with a quick and even 3 gait, like that of the royal swan, she went to the Brahmana Rishabhadata, and gave him the greeting of victory. Then she comfortably sat down in an excellent chair of state; calm and composed, joining the palms of her hands so as to bring the ten nails together, she laid the folded hands on her head, and spoke thus:

6 'O beloved of the gods, I was just now on my couch taking fits of sleep, in a state between sleeping and waking, when I saw the following fourteen illustrious, etc., great dreams; to wit, an elephant, etc.

7 'O beloved of the gods, what, to be sure, will be the happy result portended by these fourteen illustrious, etc., great dreams?'

8 When the Brahmana Rishabhadata had heard and perceived this news from the Brahmani Devananda, he, glad, pleased, and joyful (see § 5, down to) rain-drops, firmly fixed the dreams (in his mind), and entered upon considering them. He grasped the meaning of those dreams with his own innate intellect and intuition, which were preceded by reflection, and thus spoke to the Brahmani Devananda:

9 'O beloved of the gods, you have seen illustrious dreams; O beloved of the gods, you have seen beautiful, lucky, blest, auspicious, fortunate dreams, which will bring health, joy, long life, bliss, and fortune! We shall have success, O beloved of the gods, we shall have pleasure; we shall have happiness, O beloved of the gods, we shall have a son! Indeed, O beloved of the gods, after the lapse of nine complete months and seven and a half days you will give birth to a lovely and handsome boy with tender hands and feet, with a body containing the entire and complete five organs of sense, with the lucky signs, marks, and good qualities; a boy on whose body all limbs will be well formed, and of full volume, weight, and length, of a lovely figure like that of the moon!

10 And this boy, after having passed his childhood [That is, having reached his eighth year.], and, with just ripened intellect, having reached the state of youth, will repeat, fully understand, and well retain (in his mind) the four Vedas: the Rig-veda, Yagur-veda, Sama-veda, Atharva-veda--to which the Itihasa [Purana.] is added as a fifth, and the Nigghantu [Dictionary.] as a sixth (Veda)--together with their Angas and Upangas, and the Rahasya 4; he will know the six Angas, he will be versed in the philosophy of the sixty categories 5, and well grounded in arithmetic, in phonetics, ceremonial, grammar, metre, etymology, and astronomy 6, and in many other brahmanical [and monastic] sciences besides.

11 Therefore, O beloved of the gods, you have seen illustrious dreams, etc. (see § 9).'

In this way he repeatedly expressed his extreme satisfaction.

12 When the Brahmani Devananda had heard and perceived this news from the Brahmana Rishabhadata, she--glad, pleased, and joyful, etc. (see § 5)--joining the palms of her hands, etc. (see § 5, down to) and spoke thus:

13 'That is so, O beloved of the gods; that is exactly so, O beloved of the gods; that is true, O beloved of the gods; that is beyond doubt, O beloved of the gods; that is what I desire, O beloved of the gods; that is what I accept, O beloved of the gods; that is what I desire and accept, O beloved of the gods; that matter is really such as you have pronounced it.'

Thus saying, she accepted the true meaning of the dreams, and enjoyed together with Rishabhadata the noble permitted pleasures of human nature.

14 In that period, in that age, Sakra,--the chief and king of the gods, the wielder of the thunderbolt, the destroyer of towns, the performer of a hundred sacrifices, the thousand-eyed one, Maghavan, the punisher of the Daitya Paka, the lord of the southern half of the earth [i.e. of that part of it which lies to the south of mount Meru. The legendary "Mount Meru", also recognised as Sumeru, Sineru or Mahameru, is the sacred five-peaked mountain of Hindu, Jain, and Buddhist cosmology and is considered to be the centre of all the physical, metaphysical and spiritual universes. Many famous Buddhist and similar Jain as well as Hindu temples have been built as symbolic representations of this 5-peaked mythological mountain, for example temple pyramids called Angkor Wat, Ta Keo, Bakong, Bakheng in Angkor, Cambodia,], the lord of the thirty-two thousand celestial abodes, the bestrider of the elephant Airavata, the chief of the Suras, who wears spotless clothes and robes, and puts on garlands and the diadem, whose cheeks were stroked by fine, bright, and trembling earrings of fresh gold [the most prosperous, the most brilliant, the most mighty, the most glorious, the most powerful, and the most happy one], with a splendid body, ornamented with a long down-reaching garland,--this Sakra was in the Sautharma Kalpa, in the celestial abode Sautharma Avatamsaka, in the council-hall Sudharman, on his throne Sakra; he who exercises and maintains the supreme command, government, management, guidance, direction, and sovereign power and generalship over the thirty-two thousand gods of the celestial abodes, the eighty-four thousand gods of a rank equal with that of himself, the thirty-two chief gods, the four guardians of the world, the eight principal queens with their trains, the three courts, the seven armies, and the seven commanders of these armies. He was then enjoying the permitted pleasures of divine nature under the great din of uninterrupted story-telling, dramatical plays, singing, and music, as beating of time, performance on the Vina, the Turya, the great drum, and the Patupataha.
