15 And he viewed this whole continent Gambudvipa with his extensive (knowledge called) Avadhi. There he saw in the continent Gambudvipa, in Bharatavarsha, in the southern half of Bharata, in the brahmanical part of the town Kundagrama, the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira taking the form of an embryo in the womb of the Brahmani Devananda of the Galandharayana gotra, wife of the Brahmana Rishabhadata of the gotra of Kodala; and--glad, pleased, and joyful in his mind, delighted, extremely enraptured, with a heart widening under the influence of happiness, with the hair of his body bristling and erect in their pores like the fragrant flowers of Nipa when touched by rain-drops, with his eyes and mouth open like full-blown lotuses, with his excellent, various, trembling bracelets, with diadem and earrings, his breast lighted up by necklaces, wearing long and swinging ornaments with a pearl pendant--the chief of the gods rose with confusion, hasty and trembling from his throne, descended from the footstool, took off his shoes which were by a clever artist set with Vaidurya and excellent Rishta and Angana, and ornamented with glittering jewels and precious stones, threw his seamless robe over his left shoulder, and, arranging the fingers of his hands in the shape of a bud, he advanced seven or eight steps towards the Tirthakara. Bending his left knee and reposing on the right one, he three times placed his head on the ground and lifted it a little; then he raised his bracelet-encumbered arms, and joining the palms of his hands so as to bring the ten nails together, laid the hands on his head and spoke thus:

16 'Reverence to the Arhats and Bhagavats; to the Adikaras, the Tirthakaras, the perfectly-enlightened ones; to the highest of men, the lions among men, the flowers among mankind 2, the Gandhahastins among men; to the highest in the world, the guides of the world, the benefactors of the world, the lights of the world, the enlighteners of the world; to the givers of safety, to the givers of sight, to the givers of the road, to the givers of shelter, to the givers of life, to the givers of knowledge; to the givers of the law, the preachers of the law, the lords of the law, the leaders of the law, the universal emperors of the best law; to the light, the help, the shelter, the refuge, the resting-place, the possessors of unchecked knowledge and intuition who have got rid of unrighteousness; to the conquerors and the granters of conquest, the saved and the saviours, the enlightened and the enlighteners, the liberated and the liberators, to the all-knowing ones, the all-seeing ones, to those who have reached the happy, stable, unstained, infinite, unperishable, undecaying place, called the path of perfection, whence there is no return; reverence to the Ginas who have conquered fear.

Reverence to the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, the Adikara, the last of the Tirthakaras who was predicted by the former Tirthakaras, etc. [According to the commentary all the epithets from 'the enlightened one' down to 'who has reached' are intended by this etc.] here adore the Revered One yonder, may the Revered One yonder see me here! With these words he adored, he worshipped the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, and sat down on his excellent throne facing the east. Then the following internal, reflectional, desirable idea occurred to the mind of Sakra, the chief of kings and gods:

17 'It never has happened, nor does it happen, nor will it happen, that Arhats, Kakravartins, Baladevas, or Vasudevas, in the past, present, or future, should be born in low families, mean families, degraded families, poor families, indigent families, beggars' families, or brahmanical families.

18 For indeed Arhats, Kakravartins, Baladevas, and Vasudevas, in the past, present, and future, are born in high families, noble families, royal families, noblemen's families, in families belonging to the race of Ikshvaku, or of Hari, or in other suchlike families of pure descent on both sides.

19 Now this is something which moves the wonder of the world: it happens in the lapse of numberless Avasarpinis and Utsarpinis, because the imperishable, indescribable, and undestroyable Karman relating to name and gotra must take effect, that Arhats, etc., in the past, present, and future, descend in (i.e. take the form of an embryo in the womb of a woman belonging to) low families, etc.; but they are never brought forth by birth from such a womb.

20 This Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, now, in the continent Gambudvipa, in Bharatavarsha, in the brahmanical part of the town Kundagrama, has taken the form of an embryo in the womb of the Brahmani Devananda of the Galandharayana gotra, wife of the Brahmana Rishabhadata of the gotra of Kodala.

21 Hence it is the established custom of all past, present, and future Sakras, chiefs and kings of the gods, to cause the Arhats and Bhagavats to be removed from such-like low, mean, etc., families, to such-like high, noble, etc., families.

22 It is, therefore, better that I should cause the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, the last of the Tirthakaras who was predicted by the former Tirthakaras, to be removed from the brahmanical part of the town Kundagrama, from the womb of the Brahmani Devananda of the Galandharayana gotra, wife of the Brahmana Rishabhadata of the gotra of Kodala, to the Kshatriya part of the town Kundagrama, and to be placed as an embryo in the womb of the Kshatriyani Trisala of the Vasishtha gotra, wife of the Kshatriya Siddhartha of the Kasyapa gotra, belonging to the clan of the Gnatri Kshatriya; and to cause the embryo of the Kshatriyani Trisala of the Vasishtha gotra to be placed in the womb of the Brahmani Devananda of the Galandharayana gotra.

Thus he reflected and called Harinegamesi, the divine commander of the foot troops; having called him, he spoke thus:

23-25 Well, now, beloved of the gods, it never has happened, etc. (§§ 17-20 are verbally repeated).

26 'Therefore, go now and remove the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira from the brahmanical part, etc., and place the embryo of the Kshatriyani Trisala, etc. (see § 21). Having done this, return quickly to report on the execution of my orders.'

27 When Harinegamesi, the divine commander of the foot troops, was thus spoken to by Sakra, the chief and king of the gods, he--glad, pleased, and joyful, etc. (see § 15)--laid his folded hands on his head and modestly accepted the words of command, saying, 'Just as your Majesty commands.' After this he left the presence of Sakra, the chief and king of the gods, and descended towards the northeastern quarter; then he transformed himself through his magical power of transformation, and stretched himself out for numerous Yoganas like a staff, (during which he seized) jewels, Vagra, Vaidurya, Lohitaksha, Masaragalla, Hamsagarbha, Pulaka, Saugandhika, Ghyotisara, Angana, Anganapulaka, Gatarupa, Subhaga, Sphatika, and Rishta; (of these precious materials) he rejected the gross particles, and retained the subtle particles.

28 Then for a second time he transformed himself through his magical power of transformation, and produced the definitive form (which gods adopt on entering the world of men); having done so, he passed with that excellent, hasty, trembling, active, impetuous, victorious, exalted, and quick divine motion of the gods right through numberless continents and oceans, and arrived in Gambudvipa, in Bharatavarsha, in the brahmanical part of the town Kundagrama, at the house of the Brahmana Rishabhadata, where the Brahmani Devananda dwelt. Having arrived there, he made his bow in the sight of the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, and cast the Brahmani Devananda, together with her retinue, into a deep sleep; then he took off all unclean particles, and brought forth the clean particles, and saying, 'May the Venerable One permit me,' he took the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira in the folded palms of his hands without hurting him. Thus he went to the Kshatriya part of the town Kundagrama, to the house of the Kshatriya Siddhartha, where the Kshatriyani Trisala dwelt; he cast her and her attendants into a deep sleep, took off all unclean particles, and brought forth the clean particles, and placed the embryo of the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira in the womb of the Kshatriyani Trisala, and the embryo of the Kshatriyani Trisala he placed in the womb of the Brahmani Devananda of the Galandharayana gotra. Having done so, he returned in that direction in which he had come.

29 With that excellent, etc. (see § 28), divine motion of the gods, he flew upwards right through numberless continents and oceans, taking thousands of Yoganas in each motion, and arrived in the Saudharma Kalpa, in the divine abode called Saudharma Avatamsaka, where Sakra, the chief and king of the gods, sat on the throne called Sakra, and reported to Sakra, the chief and king of the gods, on the execution of his orders.

In that period, in that age the knowledge of the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira was threefold; he knew that he was to be removed; he knew that he was removed; he knew not when he was being removed.

30 In that period, in that age, on the thirteenth day of the third month of the rainy season, in the fifth fortnight, the dark (fortnight) of Asvina, after the lapse of eighty-two days, on the eighty-third day current (since his conception), the embryo of the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira was, on the command of Sakra, safely removed by Harinegamesi from the womb of the Brahmani Devananda to that of the Kshatriyani Trisala, in the middle of the night, when the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Uttarahalguni.

[In some Manuscripts the last part of this paragraph is placed at the end of the next one.]

31 In that night in which the embryo of the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira was removed from the womb of the Brahmani Devananda of the Galandharayana gotra to that of the Kshatriyani Trisala of the Vasishtha gotra, the former was on her couch taking fits of sleep in a state between sleeping and waking; and seeing that these fourteen illustrious, beautiful, lucky, blest, auspicious, fortunate, great dreams were taken from her by the Kshatriyani Trisala, she awoke.

32 In that night in which the embryo of the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira was removed from the womb of the Brahmani Devananda of the Galandharayana gotra to that of the Kshatriyani Trisala of the Vasishtha gotra, the latter was in her dwelling-place, of which the interior was ornamented with pictures, and the outside whitewashed, furnished and cleansed, the brilliant surface of the ceiling was painted, the darkness was dispelled by jewels and precious stones, the floor was perfectly level and adorned with auspicious figures; which, moreover, was furnished with offerings of heaps of delicious, fragrant, strewn flowers of all five colours, was highly delightful through curling, scented fumes of black aloe, the finest Kundurukka and Turushka [Different kinds of the resin of Boswellia.], and burning frankincense; was exquisitely scented with fine perfumes, and turned as it were into a smelling-bottle; on a couch with a mattress of a man's length, with pillows at head and foot, raised on both sides and hollow in the middle, soft as if one walked on the sand of the banks of the Ganges, covered with the cloth of a robe of ornamented linen, containing a well-worked towel, and hung with red mosquito curtains, delightful, soft to the touch like fur, wadding, Pura [Name of a tree.], butter, or cotton, with all the comforts of a bed, such as fragrant, excellent flowers and sandal-powder--(in such a room and on such a bed Trisala was) taking fits of sleep between sleeping and waking, and having seen the following fourteen, etc. (see § 3), dreams, viz. an elephant, etc. (see § 4), she awoke.

33 1. Then Trisala saw in her first dream a fine, enormous elephant, possessing all lucky marks, with strong thighs and four mighty tusks; who was whiter than an empty great cloud, or a heap of pearls, or the ocean of milk, or the moon-beams, or spray of water, or the silver mountain (Vaitadha); whose temples were perfumed with fragrant musk-fluid, which attracted the bees; equalling in dimension the best elephant of the king of the gods (Airavata); uttering a fine deep sound like the thunder of a big and large rain-cloud.

34 2. Then she saw a tame, lucky bull, of a whiter hue than that of the mass of petals of the white lotus, illumining all around by the diffusion of a glory of light; (a bull) whose lovely, resplendent, beautiful hump was delightful through the collection of its charms, whose glossy skin (was covered with) thin, fine, soft hairs; whose body was firm, well made, muscular, compact, lovely, well proportioned, and beautiful; whose horns were large, round, excellently beautiful, greased at their tops, and pointed; whose teeth were all equal, shining, and pure. He foreboded innumerable good qualities.

35 3. Then she saw a handsome, handsomely shaped, playful lion, jumping from the sky towards her face; a delightful and beautiful lion whiter than a heap of pearls, etc. (see § 33), who had strong and lovely fore-arms, and a mouth adorned with round, large, and well-set teeth; whose lovely lips, splendid through their proportions, and soft like a noble lotus, looked as if they were artificially ornamented; whose palate I was soft and tender like the petals of the red lotus, and the top of whose tongue was protruding; whose eyes were like pure lightning, and revolved like red-hot excellent gold just poured out from the crucible; (a lion) with broad and large thighs, and with full and excellent shoulders, who was adorned with a mane of soft, white, thin, long hair of the finest quality; whose erect, well-shaped, and well-grown tail was flapping; the tops of whose nails were deeply set and sharp; whose beautiful tongue came out of his mouth like a shoot of beauty.

36 4. Then she, with the face of the full moon, saw the goddess of famous beauty, Sri, on the top of Mount Himavat, reposing on a lotus in the lotus lake, anointed with the water from the strong and large trunks of the guardian elephants. She sat on a lofty throne. Her firmly placed feet resembled golden tortoises, and her dyed, fleshy, convex, thin, red, smooth nails were set in swelling muscles [Literally, elevated and fat.]. Her hands and feet were like the leaves of the lotus, and her fingers and toes soft and excellent; her round and well-formed legs were adorned with the Kuruvindavarta, and her knees with dimples. Her fleshy thighs resembled the proboscis of an excellent elephant, and her lovely broad hips were encircled by a golden zone. Her large and beautiful belly was adorned by a circular navel, and contained a lovely row of hairs (black as) collyrium, bees, or clouds, straight, even, continuous, thin, admirable, handsome, soft, and downy. Her waist, which contained the three folds, could be encompassed with one hand. On all parts of her body she wore ornaments and trinkets, composed of many jewels and precious stones, yellow and red gold. The pure cup-like pair of her breasts sparkled, encircled by a garland of Kunda flowers, in which glittered a string of pearls. She wore strings of pearls made by diligent and clever artists, shining with wonderful strings, a necklace of jewels with a string of Dinars, and a trembling pair of earrings, touching her shoulders, diffused a brilliancy; but the united beauties and charms of these ornaments were only subservient to the loveliness of her face. Her lovely eyes were large and pure like the water lily. She sprinkled about the sap from two lotus flowers which she held in her splendid hands, and gracefully fanned herself. Her glossy, black, thick, smooth hair hung down in a braid.

37 5. Then she saw, coming down from the firmament, a garland charmingly interwoven with fresh Mandara flowers. It spread the delicious smell of Kampaka [Michelia Champaka.], Asoka [Jonesia Asoka.], Naga [Mesua Roxburghii.], Punnaga [Rottleria Tinctoria.], Priyangu [Panicum Italicum.], Sirisha [Acacia Sirisa.], Mudgara [A species of jasmine.], Mallika [Jasminum Zambac.], Gati [Jasminum Grandiflorum.], Yuthika [Jasminum Auriculatum.], Ankolla [Alangium Hexapetalum.], Korantakapatra [Not specialised in our dictionaries.], Damanaka [Artemisia Indica.], Navamalika [The many-flowered Nykanthes or Jasminum Zambac.], Bakula [Mimusops Elenji.], Tilaka [Clarendodum Plomoides or Symplocos Racemosa.], Vasantika [Gaertnera Racemosa.], Nuphar, Nymphaea, Patala. [Bignonia Suaevoleans.], Kunda [Fragrant Oleander.], Atimukta [Diospyros Glutinosa or Dalbergia Ougeinense.], and Mango; and perfumed the ten divisions of the universe with its incomparably delightful fragrance. It was white through wreaths of fragrant flowers of all seasons, and brilliant through splendid, beautiful embellishments of many colours. Towards it came humming swarms of different kinds of bees 16, and filled with their sweet noise the whole neighbourhood.

38 6. And the moon: white as cow-milk, foam, spray of water, or a silver cup, glorious, delighting heart and eyes, full, dispelling the compact darkness of the thickest wilderness, whose crescent shines at the end of the two halves of the month, opening the blossoms of the groups of Nymphaeas, adorning the night, resembling the surface of a well-polished mirror. She was of a white hue, like a flamingo, the stars' head-ornament, the quiver of Cupid's arrows, raising the waters of the ocean, burning as it were disconsolate people when absent from their sweethearts, the large, glorious, wandering headmark of the celestial sphere--beloved in heart and soul by Rohini 1. Such was the glorious, beautiful, resplendent full moon which the queen saw.

39 7. Then she saw the large sun, the dispeller of the mass of darkness, him of radiant form, red like the Asoka, the open Kimsuka, the bill of a parrot, or the Gungardha, the adorning of the lotus groups, the marker of the starry host, the lamp of the firmament, throttling as it were the mass of cold, the illustrious leader of the troop of planets, the destroyer of night, who only at his rising and setting may be well viewed, but (at all other times) is difficult to be regarded, who disperses evil-doers that stroll about at night, who stops the influence of cold, who always circles round Mount Meru, whose thousand rays obscure the lustre of other lights.

40 8. Then she saw an extremely beautiful and very large flag, a sight for all people, of a form attractive to the beholders. It was fastened to a golden staff with a tuft of many soft and waving peacock's feathers of blue, red, yellow, and white colours, and seemed as if it would pierce the brilliant, celestial sphere, with the brilliant lion on its top, who was white like crystal, pearl-mother, Anka-stone, Kunda-flowers, spray of water, or a silver cup.

41 9. Then she saw a full vase of costly metal, splendid with fine gold, filled with pure water, excellent, of brilliant beauty, and shining with a bouquet of water lilies. It united many excellencies and all-auspicious marks, and stood on a lotus-shaped foot, shining with excellent jewels. It delighted the eyes, glittered and illumined all about; it was the abode of happy Fortune, free from all faults, fine, splendid, exquisitely beautiful, entwined with a wreath of fragrant flowers of all seasons.

42 10. Then she saw a lake, called Lotus Lake, adorned with water lilies. Its yellow water was perfumed by lotuses opening in the rays of the morning sun; it abounded with swarms of aquatic animals, and fed fishes. It was large, and seemed to burn through the wide-spreading, glorious beauty of all kinds of lotuses. Its shape and beauty were pleasing. The lotuses in it were licked by whole swarms of gay bees and mad drones. Pairs of swans, cranes, Kakravakas, ducks, Indian cranes, and many other lusty birds resorted to its waters, and on the leaves of its lotuses sparkled water-drops like pearls. It was a sight, pleasing to the heart and the eye.

43 11. Then she whose face was splendid like the moon in autumn, saw the milk-ocean, equalling in beauty the breast of Lakshmi, which is white like the mass of moon-beams. Its waters increased in all four directions, and raged with ever-changing and moving, excessively high waves. It presented a splendid and pleasant spectacle as it rushed to and from the shore with its wind-raised, changeable, and moving billows, its tossing waves, and its rolling, splendid, transparent breakers. From it issued camphor-white foam under the lashing (tails) of great porpoises, fishes, whales, and other monsters of the deep. Its agitated waters were in great uproar, occasioned by the vortex Gangavarta, which the vehemence and force of the great rivers produced; they rose, rushed onwards and backwards, and eddied.

44 12. Then she saw a celestial abode excelling among the best of its kind, like the lotus (among flowers). It shone like the morning sun's disk, and was of a dazzling beauty. Its thousand and eight excellent columns (inlaid with the best gold and heaps of jewels diffused a brilliant light like a heavenly lamp, and the pearls fastened to its curtains glittered. It was hung with brilliant divine garlands, and decorated with pictures of wolves, bulls, horses, men, dolphins, birds, snakes, Kinnaras, deer, Sarabhas, Yaks, Samsaktas, elephants, shrubs, and plants. There the Gandharvas performed their concerts, and the din of the drums of the gods, imitating the sound of big and large rain-clouds, penetrated the whole inhabited world. It was highly delightful through curling, scented fumes of black aloe, the finest Kundurukka and Turushka, burning frankincense and other perfumes. It (shed) continuous light, was white, of excellent lustre, delighting the best of gods, and affording joy and pleasure.

45 13. Then she saw an enormous heap of jewels containing Pulaka, Vagra, Indranila, Sasyaka, Karketana, Lohitaksha, Marakata, Prabala, Saugandhika, Sphatika, Hamsagarbha, Angana, and Kandrakanta. Its base was on the level of the earth, and it illumined with its jewels even the sphere of the sky. It was high and resembled Mount Meru.

46 14. And a fire. She saw a fire in vehement motion, fed with much-shining and honey-coloured ghee, smokeless, crackling, and extremely beautiful with its burning flames. The mass of its flames, which rose one above the other, seemed to interpenetrate each other, and the blaze of its flames appeared to bake the firmament in some places.

46 b After having seen these fine, beautiful, lovely, handsome dreams, the lotus-eyed queen awoke on her bed while the hair of her body bristled for joy.

Every mother of a Tirthakara sees these fourteen dreams in that night in which the famous Arhat enters her womb.

[End of the Third Lecture.]

LIFE OF MAHAVIRA, LECTURE 4

47 When the Kshatriyani Trisala, having seen these fourteen illustrious, great dreams, awoke, she was glad, pleased, and joyful, etc. (see § 5, down to) rose from her couch, and descended from the footstool. Neither hasty nor trembling, with a quick and even gait like that of the royal swan, she went to the couch of the Kshatriya Siddhartha. There she awakened the Kshatriya Siddhartha, addressing him with kind, pleasing, amiable, tender, illustrious, beautiful, lucky, blest, auspicious, fortunate, heart-going, heart-easing, well-measured, sweet, and soft words.

48 Then the Kshatriyani Trisala, with the permission of king Siddhartha, sat down on a chair of state inlaid with various jewels and precious stones in the form of arabesques; calm and composed, sitting on an excellent, comfortable chair, she addressed him with kind, pleasing, etc. (see last paragraph), words, and spoke thus:

49 'O beloved of the gods, I was just now on my couch (as described in § 32), etc. (see § 5), and awoke after having seen the fourteen dreams; to wit, an elephant, etc. What, to be sure, O my lord, will be the happy result portended by these fourteen illustrious, great dreams?'

50 When the Kshatriya Siddhartha had heard and perceived this news from the Kshatriyani Trisala, he glad, pleased, and joyful, etc. (see § 5, down to) firmly fixed the dreams in his mind, and entered upon considering them; he grasped the meaning of those dreams with his own innate intelligence and intuition which were preceded by reflection, and addressing the Kshatriyani Trisala with kind, pleasing, etc., words, spoke thus:

51 'O beloved of the gods, you have seen illustrious dreams, etc. (see § 9, down to) you will give birth to a lovely, handsome boy, who will be the ensign of our family, the lamp of our family, the crown I of our family, the frontal ornament of our family, the maker of our family's glory, the sun of our family, the stay of our family, the maker of our family's joy and fame, the tree of our family, the exalter of our family; (a boy) with tender hands and feet, etc. (see § 9, down to the end).

52 And this boy, after having passed childhood, and, with just ripened intellect, having reached the state of youth, will become a brave, gallant, and valorous king, the lord of the realm, with a large and extensive army and train of waggons.

53 Therefore, O beloved of the gods, you have seen illustrious, etc., dreams, etc. (see § 9)!' In this way he repeatedly expressed his extreme satisfaction. When the Kshatriyani Trisala had heard and perceived this news from king Siddhartha, she glad, pleased, and joyful, etc. (see § 12, down to) and spoke thus:

54 'That is so, O beloved of the gods, etc. (see § 13, down to) as you have pronounced it.' Thus saying she accepted the true meaning of the dreams, and with the permission of king Siddhartha she rose from her chair of state, inlaid with various jewels and precious stones in the form of arabesques. She then returned to her own bed, neither hasty nor trembling, with a quick and even gait like that of the royal swan, and spoke thus:

55 'These my excellent and pre-eminent dreams shall not be counteracted by other bad dreams.' Accordingly she remained awake to save her dreams by means of (hearing) good, auspicious, pious, agreeable stories about gods and religious men.

56 At the time of daybreak the Kshatriya Siddhartha called his family servants and spoke thus:

57 Now, beloved of the gods, quickly make ready, or have made ready, the exterior hall of audience; see that it be sprinkled with scented water, cleaned, swept, and newly smeared, furnished with offerings of fragrant, excellent flowers of all five colours, made highly delightful through curling scented fumes, etc. (see § 32, down to) and turned, as it were, into a smelling box; also erect my throne, and having done this quickly return, and report on the execution of my orders.'

58 When the family servants were thus spoken to by king Siddhartha, they--glad, pleased, and joyful, etc. (see § 12, down to) on their heads, and modestly accepted the words of command, saying, 'Yes, master!' Then they left the presence of the Kshatriya Siddhartha, and went to the exterior hall of audience, made it ready, and erected the throne (as described in the last paragraph). Having done this, they returned to the Kshatriya Siddhartha; joining the palms of their hands so as to bring the ten nails together, laid the folded hands on their heads, and reported on the execution of their orders.

59 Early at the wane of the night, when the bright morning disclosed the soft flowers of the full-blown lotuses and Nymphaeas, rose the sun: he was red like the Asoka, the open Kimsuka, the bill of a parrot or the Gungardha; of an intense redness like that of the Bandhugivaka [Pentapetes Phoenicea], the feet and eyes of the turtle dove, the scarlet eyes of the Indian cuckoo, a mass of China roses, or vermilion. He, the thousand-rayed maker of the day, shining in his radiance, awakened the groups of lotuses. When in due time the god of the day had risen and by the blows of his hands (or rays) the darkness was driven away, while the inhabited world was, as it were, dipped in saffron by the morning sun, the Kshatriya Siddhartha rose from his bed.

60 descended from the footstool, went to the hall for gymnastic exercises, and entered it. There he applied himself to many wholesome exercises, jumped, wrestled, fenced, and fought till he got thoroughly tired: then he was anointed with hundredfold and thousandfold refined different kinds of oil, which nourished, beautified, invigorated, exhilarated, strengthened, and increased all senses and limbs. On an oiled hide he was shampooed by clever men with soft and tender palms of the hands and soles of the feet, who were well acquainted with the best qualities of the practices of anointing, kneading, and stretching; well trained, skilful, excellent, expert, intelligent, and never tiring. When by this fourfold agreeable treatment of the body the king's bones, flesh, skin, and hair had been benefited, and his fatigues banished, he left the hall for gymnastic exercises,

61 and entered the bathing-house. The pleasant bathing-room was very agreeable, and contained many windows ornamented with pearls; its floor was decorated with mosaic of various jewels and precious stones. On the bathing-stool, inlaid with various jewels and precious stones in the form of arabesques, he comfortably sat down and bathed himself with water scented with flowers and perfumes, with tepid water and pure water, according to an excellent method of bathing, combined with healthy exercises. When this healthy excellent bathing under many hundredfold pleasures was over, he dried his body with a long-haired, soft, scented, and coloured towel, put on a new and costly excellent robe, rubbed himself with fresh and fragrant Gosirsha I and sandal, and ornamented himself with fine wreaths and sandal-ointment. He put on (ornaments) of jewels and pearls, hung round his neck fitting necklaces of eighteen, nine, and three strings of pearls, and one with a pearl pendant, and adorned himself with a zone. He put on a collar, rings, and charming ornaments of the hair, and encumbered his arms with excellent bracelets: he was of excessive beauty. His face was lighted up by earrings, and his head by a diadem; his breast was adorned and decked with necklaces, and his fingers were, as it were, gilded by his rings. His upper garment of fine cloth contained swinging pearl pendants. He put on, as an emblem of his undefeated knighthood, glittering, well-made, strong, excellent, beautiful armlets, made by clever artists of spotless and costly jewels, gold, and precious stones of many kinds. In short, the king was like the tree granting all desires, decorated and ornamented; an umbrella, hung with wreaths and garlands of Korinta flowers, was held above him. He was fanned with white excellent chowries, while his appearance was greeted with auspicious shouts of victory. Surrounded by many chieftains, satraps, kings, princes, knights, sheriffs, heads of families, ministers, chief ministers, astrologers, counsellors, servants, dancing masters, citizens, traders, merchants, foremen of guilds, generals, leaders of caravans, messengers, and frontier-guards, he--the lord and chief of men, a bull and a lion among men, shining with excellent lustre and glory, lovely to behold like the moon emerging from a great white cloud in the midst of the flock of the planets and of brilliant stars and asterisms--left the bathing-house.

62 entered the exterior hall of audience and sat down on his throne with the face towards the east.

63 On the north-eastern side he ordered eight state chairs, covered with cloth and auspiciously decorated with white mustard, to be set down. Not too far from and not too near to himself; towards the interior of the palace, he had a curtain drawn. It was adorned with different jewels and precious stones, extremely worth seeing, very costly, and manufactured in a famous town; its soft cloth was all over covered with hundreds of patterns and decorated with pictures of wolves, bulls, horses, men, dolphins, birds, snakes, Kinnaras, deer, Sarabhas, Yaks, Samsaktas, elephants, shrubs, and plants. Behind it he ordered to be placed, for the Kshatriyani Trisala, an excellent chair of state, decorated with arabesques of different jewels and precious stones, outfitted with a coverlet and a soft pillow, covered with a white cloth, very soft and agreeable to the touch. Then he called the family servants and spoke thus:

64 'Quickly, O beloved of the gods, call the interpreters of dreams who well know the science of prognostics with its eight branches, and are well versed in many sciences besides!'

When the family servants were thus spoken to by king Siddhartha, they--glad, pleased, and joyful, etc.--laid the folded hands on their heads and modestly accepted the words of command, saying, 'Yes, master!'

65 Then they left the presence of the Kshatriya Siddhartha, went right through the town Kundapura to the houses of the interpreters of dreams, and called the interpreters of dreams.

66 Then the interpreters of dreams, being called by the Kshatriya Siddhartha's family servants, glad, pleased, and joyful, etc., bathed, made the offering (to the house-gods), performed auspicious rites and expiatory acts, put on excellent, lucky, pure court-dress, adorned their persons with small but costly ornaments, and put, for the sake of auspiciousness, white mustard and Durva grass on their heads. Thus they issued from their own houses and went right through the Kshatriya part of the town Kundapura to the front gate of king Siddhartha's excellent palace, a jewel of its kind.

67 There they assembled and went to the exterior hall of audience in the presence of the Kshatriya Siddhartha. Joining the palms of their hands so as to bring the ten nails together, they laid the folded hands on their heads and gave him the greeting of victory.

68 The king Siddhartha saluted and honoured the interpreters of dreams, made them presents, and received them with respect. They sat down, one after the other, on the chairs of state which had been placed there before.

69 Then the Kshatriya Siddhartha placed his wife Trisala behind the curtain, and taking flowers and fruits in his hands, addressed with utmost courtesy the interpreters of dreams:

70, 71 'O beloved of the gods, the Kshatriyani Trisala was just on her couch, etc. (see § 32, down to the end).

72 What to be sure, O beloved of the gods, will be the result portended by these fourteen illustrious great dreams?

73 When the interpreters of dreams had heard and perceived this news from the Kshatriya Siddhartha, they--glad, pleased, and joyful, etc.--fixed the dreams in their minds, entered upon considering them, and conversed together.

74 Having found, grasped, discussed, decided upon, and clearly understood the meaning of these dreams, they recited before king Siddhartha the dream-books and spoke thus:

75 'O beloved of the gods, in our dream-books are enumerated forty-two (common) dreams and thirty great dreams. Now, O beloved of the gods, the mothers of universal monarchs or of Arhats wake up after seeing these fourteen great dreams out of the thirty great dreams, when the embryo of a universal monarch or an Arhat enters their womb;

viz. an elephant, a bull, etc.

76 The mothers of Vasudevas wake up after seeing any seven great dreams out of these fourteen great dreams, when the embryo of a Vasudeva enters their womb.

77 The mothers of Baladevas wake up after seeing any four great dreams out of these fourteen great dreams, when the embryo of a Baladeva enters their womb.

78 The mother of Mandalikas wake up after seeing a single great dream out of these fourteen great dreams, when the embryo of a Mandalika enters their womb.

79 Now, O beloved of the gods, the Kshatriyani Trisala has seen these fourteen great dreams, etc. (see § 51, down to the end).

80 And this boy, etc. (see § 52, down to) the lord of a realm with a large and extensive army and train of waggons, a universal emperor or a Gina, the lord of the three worlds, the universal emperor of the law.

81 Therefore, O beloved of the gods, the Kshatriyani Trisala has seen illustrious dreams, etc. (see § 9).

82 When king Siddhartha had heard and perceived this news from the interpreter of dreams, he--glad, pleased, and joyful, etc.--spoke to them thus:

83 That is so, O beloved of the gods, etc. (see § 11, down to) as you have pronounced it.'

Thus saying he accepted the true meaning of the dreams, and honoured the interpreters of dreams with praise and plenty of food, flowers, perfumes, garlands, and ornaments. He made them a present in keeping with their station in life [Or a life annuity.] and dismissed them.

84 After this the Kshatriya Siddhartha rose from his throne, went to the Kshatriyani Trisala behind the curtain, and addressed her thus:

85, 86 Now, O beloved of the gods, you have seen these fourteen great dreams, etc. (see §§ 79, 80, down to) emperor of the law.'

87 When the Kshatriyani Trisala had heard and perceived this news, she--glad, pleased, and joyful, etc.--accepted the true meaning of the dreams.

88 With the permission of king Siddhartha she rose from her chair of state which was decorated with arabesques of various jewels and precious stones, and returned to her own apartments, neither hasty nor trembling, with a quick and even gait like that of the royal swan.

89 From that moment in which the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira was brought into the family of the Gnatris, many demons in Vaisramana's service, belonging to the animal world, brought, on Sakra's command, to the palace of king Siddhartha, old and ancient treasures, of which the owners, deponers, and families to whom they originally belonged were dead and extinct, and which were hidden in villages, or mines, or scot-free towns, or towns with earth walls, or towns with low walls, or isolated towns, or towns accessible by land and water, or towns accessible either by land or by water only, or in natural strongholds, or in halting-places for processions or for caravans, in triangular places, or in places where three or four roads meet, or in courtyards, or squares, or high roads, or on the site of villages or towns, or in drains of villages or towns, or in bazaars, or temples, or assembling halls, or wells, or parks, or gardens, or woods, or groves, or burying-places, or empty houses, or mountain caves, or hermits' cells, or secret places between walls, or in houses on an elevation, or houses for audience, or palaces.

90 In the night in which the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira was brought into the family of the Gnatris their silver increased, their gold increased; their riches, corn, majesty, and kingdom increased; their army, train, treasure, storehouse, town, seraglio, subjects, and glory increased; their real valuable property, as riches, gold, precious stones, jewels, pearls, conches, stones, corals, rubies, etc., the intensity of their popularity and liberality highly increased. At that time the following personal, reflectional, desirable idea occurred to parents of the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira:

91 From the moment that this our boy has been begotten, our silver increased, our gold increased, etc. (see § 90, down to) the intensity of our liberality and popularity highly increased. Therefore when this our boy will be born, we shall give him the fit name, attributive and conformable to his quality--Vardhamana.'

92 Now the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, out of compassion for his mother, did not move nor stir nor quiver, but remained quiet, stiff, and motionless. Then the following, etc. (see § 90, down to) idea occurred to the mind of the Kshatriyani Trisala: 'The fruit of my womb has been taken from me, it has died, it is fallen, it is lost. Formerly it moved, now it does not move.' Thus with anxious thoughts and ideas, plunged in a sea of sorrow and misery, reposing her head on her hand, overcome by painful reflections, and casting her eyes on the ground she meditated. And in the palace of king Siddhartha the music of drums and stringed instruments, the clapping of hands, the dramatic performances, and the amusements of the people ceased, and mournful dejection reigned there.

93 Then the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, knowing that such an internal, etc. (see § 90, down to) idea had occurred to the mind of his mother, he quivered a little.

94 Feeling her child quivering, trembling, moving, and stirring, the Kshatriyani Trisala--glad, pleased, and joyful, etc.--spoke thus: 'No, forsooth, the fruit of my womb has not been taken from me, it has not died, it is not fallen, it is not lost. Formerly it did not move, but now it does move.' Thus she was glad, pleased, and joyful, etc.

Then the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, while in her womb, formed the following resolution: 'It will not behave me, during the life of my parents, to tear out my hair, and leaving the house to enter the state of houselessness.'

95 Bathing, making offerings to the house-gods, performing auspicious rites and expiatory acts, and adorning herself with all ornaments, the Kshatriyani Trisala kept off sickness, sorrow, fainting, fear, and fatigue by food and clothing, perfumes and garlands, which were not too cold nor too hot, not too bitter nor too pungent, not too astringent nor too sour nor too sweet, not too smooth nor too rough, not too wet nor too dry, but all just suiting the season. In the proper place and time she ate only such food which was good, sufficient, and healthy for the nourishment of her child. She took her walks in places which were empty and agreeable as well as delightful to the mind; her desires were laudable, fulfilled, honoured, not disregarded, but complied with and executed; she most comfortably dozed, reposed, remained, sat, and laid on unobjectionable and soft beds and seats, and thus most comfortably carried her unborn child.

96 In that period, in that age the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira 1--after the lapse of nine months and seven and a half days, in the first month of summer, in the second fortnight, the dark (fortnight) of Kaitra, on its fourteenth day, (while all planets were in their exaltations, the moon in her principal conjunction, and the sky in all its directions clear, bright, and pure; while a favourable and agreeable low wind swept the earth; at the time when the fields were green and all people glad and amusing themselves) [The passage in round brackets seems to be a later addition; for it is wanting in my oldest Manuscript, and the commentator says that it was not seen in many books. The occurrence of the astrological term exaltation (ukka = ὕψωμα) in this passage proves it to be inserted after 300 A.D. For about that time Greek astrology had been introduced in India, as I have shown in my dissertation: De Astrologiae Indicae 'Hora' appellatae originibus, Bonn, 3872.] in the middle of the night while the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Uttaraphalguni--(Trisala), perfectly healthy herself, gave birth to a perfectly healthy boy.

[End of the Fourth Lecture.]

LIFE OF MAHAVIRA, LECTURE 5

97 In that night in which the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira was born, there was a divine lustre originated by many descending and ascending gods and goddesses, and in the universe, resplendent with one light, the conflux of gods occasioned great confusion and noise.

98 In that night in which the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira was born, many demons in Vaisramana's service belonging to the animal world, rained down on the palace of king Siddhartha one great shower of silver, gold, diamonds, clothes, ornaments, leaves, flowers, fruits, seeds, garlands, perfumes, sandal, powder, and riches.

99 After the Bhavanapati, Vyantara, Gyotishka, and Vaimanika gods had celebrated the feast of the inauguration of the Tirthakara's birthday, the Kshatriya Siddhartha called, at the break of the morning, together the town policemen and addressed them thus:

100 'O beloved of the gods, quickly set free all prisoners in the town of Kundapura, increase measures and weights, give order that the whole town of Kundapura with its suburbs be sprinkled with water, swept, and smeared (with cowdung, etc.) that in triangular places, in places where three or four roads meet, in courtyards, in squares, and in thoroughfares, the middle of the road and the path along the shops be sprinkled, cleaned, and swept; that platforms be erected one above the other; that the town be decorated with variously coloured flags and banners, and adorned with painted pavilions [According to the commentary this may also be translated: smeared (with cowdung) and whitewashed.]; that the walls bear impressions in Gosirsha, fresh red sandal, and Dardara [Dardara is sandal wood brought from Dardara. All who have travelled in India will have noticed on walls the impressions of the hand mentioned in the text.] of the hand with outstretched fingers; that luck-foreboding vases be put on the floor, and pots of the same kind be disposed round every door and arch; that big, round, and long garlands, wreaths, and festoons be hung low and high; that the town be furnished with offerings, etc. (see § 32, down to) smelling box; that players, dancers, rope-dancers, wrestlers, boxers, jesters, story-tellers, ballad-singers, actors, messengers, pole-dancers, fruit-mongers, bag-pipers, lute-players, and many Talakaras be present. Erect and order to erect thousands of pillars and poles, and report on the execution of my orders.'

101 When the family servants were thus spoken to by king Siddhartha, they--glad, pleased, and joyful, etc. (see § 58)--accepted the words of command, saying, 'Yes, master!'

Then they set free all prisoners, etc. (see § 100, down to) pillars and poles. Having done this, they returned to king Siddhartha, and laying their hands on their heads, reported on the execution of his orders.

102 The king Siddhartha then went to the hall for gymnastic exercises, etc. (see §§ 60 and 61 4). (After having bathed) the king accompanied by his whole seraglio, and adorned with flowers, scented robes, garlands, and ornaments, held during ten days the festival in celebration of the birth of a heir to his kingdom; (it was held) under the continuous din and sound of trumpets, with great state and splendour, with a great train of soldiers, vehicles, and guests, under the sound, din, and noise of conches, cymbals, drums, castanets, horns, small drums, kettle drums, Muragas, Mridangas, and Dundubhis 1, which were accompanied at the same time by trumpets. The customs, taxes, and confiscations were released, 1 buying and selling prohibited, no policemen were allowed to enter houses, great and small fines were remitted, and debts cancelled. Numberless excellent actors performed and many Talakaras were present, drums sounded harmoniously, fresh garlands and wreaths were seen everywhere, and the whole population in the town and in the country rejoiced and was in full glee.

103 When the ten days of this festival were over, the king Siddhartha gave and ordered to be given hundreds and thousands and hundred-thousands of offerings to the gods, gifts, and portions (of goods); he received and ordered to be received hundreds, thousands, and hundred-thousands of presents.

104 The parents of the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira celebrated the birth of their heir on the first day, on the third day they showed him the sun and the moon, on the sixth day they observed the religious vigil; after the eleventh day, when the impure operations and ceremonies connected with the birth of a child had been performed, and the twelfth day had come, they prepared plenty of food, drink, spices, and sweetmeats, invited their friends, relations, kinsmen, agnates, cognates, and followers, together with 1 the Gnatrika Kshatriyas. Then they bathed, made offerings (to the house-gods), and performed auspicious rites and expiatory acts, put on excellent, lucky, pure court-dress, and adorned their persons with small but costly ornaments. At dinner-time they sat down on excellent, comfortable chairs in the dining-hall, and together with their friends, relations, kinsmen, agnates, cognates and followers, and with the Gnatrika Kshatriyas they partook, ate, tasted, and interchanged (bits) of a large collation of food, drink, spices, and sweetmeats.

105 After dinner they went (to the meeting hall) after having cleansed their mouths and washed; when perfectly clean, they regaled and honoured their friends, etc. (see § 104, down to) Gnatrika Kshatriyas with many flowers, clothes, perfumes, garlands, and ornaments. Then they spoke thus to their friends, etc.:

106, 107 'Formerly, O beloved of the gods, when we had begotten this our boy, the following personal, reflectional, desirable idea occurred to our mind: "From the moment that this our boy has been begotten, our silver increased, our gold increased, etc. (see § 91, down to) Vardhamana. Now our wishes have been fulfilled, therefore shall the name of our boy be Vardhamana."'

108 The Venerable Ascetic Mahavira belonged to the Kasyapa gotra. His three names have thus been recorded: by his parents he was called Vardhamana; because he is devoid of love and hate, he is called Sramana (i.e. Ascetic); because he stands fast in midst of dangers and fears, patiently bears hardships and calamities, adheres to the chosen rules of penance, is wise, indifferent to pleasure and pain, rich in control, and gifted with fortitude, the name Venerable Ascetic Mahavira has been given him by the gods.

109 The Venerable Ascetic Mahavira's father belonged to the Kasyapa gotra; he had three names: Siddhartha, Sreyamsa, and Gasamsa, etc. (see Akaranga Sutra II, 15, § 15, down to) Seshavati and Yasovati.

110 The Venerable Ascetic Mahavira--clever, with the aspirations of a clever man, of great beauty, controlling (his senses), lucky, and modest; a Gnatri Kshatriya, the son of a Gnatri Kshatriya; the moon of the clan of the Gnatri; a Videha, the son of Videhadatta, a native of Videha, a prince of Videha--had lived thirty years in Videha when his parents went to the world of the gods (i.e. died), and he with the permission of his elder brother and the authorities of the kingdom 2 fulfilled his promise. At that moment the Laukantika gods, following the established custom, praised and hymned him with these kind, pleasing, etc. (see § 47, down to) sweet, and soft words:

111 'Victory, victory to thee, gladdener of the world! Victory, victory to thee, lucky one! Luck to thee, bull of the best Kshatriyas! Awake, reverend lord of the world! Establish the religion of the law which benefits all living beings in the whole universe! It will bring supreme benefit to all living beings in all the world!' Thus they raised the shout of victory.

113 In that period, in that age, in the first month of winter, in the first fortnight, in the dark (fortnight) of Margasiras, on its tenth day, when the shadow had turned towards the east and the (first) Paurushi 4 was full and over, on the day called Suvrata, in the Muhurta called Vigaya, in the palankin Kandraprabha, (Mahavira) was followed on his way by a train of gods, men, and Asuras, (and surrounded) by a swarm of shell-blowers, proclaimers, pattivallas, courtiers, men carrying others on the back, heralds, and bell bearers. They praised and hymned him with these kind, pleasing, etc. (see § 47, down to) sweet and soft words:

114 'Victory, victory to thee, gladdener of the world! Victory to thee, lucky one! Luck to thee! with undisturbed knowledge, intuition, and good conduct conquer the unconquered Senses; defend the conquered Law of the Sramanas; Majesty, conquering all obstacles, live in Perfection; put down with thy devotion Love and Hate, the (dangerous) wrestlers; vigorously gird thy loins with constancy and overcome the eight Karmans, our foes, with supreme, pure meditation; heedful raise the banner of content, O Hero! in the arena of the three worlds gain the supreme, best knowledge, called Kevala, which is free from obscurity; obtain the pre-eminent highest rank (i.e. final liberation) on that straight road which the best Ginas have taught; beat the army of obstacles! Victory, victory to thee, bull of the best Kshatriyas! Many days, many fortnights, many months, many seasons, many half-years, many years be not afraid of hardships and calamities, patiently bear dangers and fears; be free from obstacles in the practice of the law!' Thus they raised the shout of victory.

115 Then the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira--gazed on by a circle of thousands of eyes 1, praised by a circle of thousands of mouths, extolled by a circle of thousands of hearts, being the object of many thousands of wishes, desired because of his splendour, beauty, and virtues, pointed out by a circle of thousands of forefingers, answering with (a salam) of his right hand a circle of thousands of joined hands of thousands of men and women, passing along a row of thousands of palaces, greeted by sweet and delightful music, as beating of time, performance on the Vina, Turya, and the great drum, in which joined shouts of victory, and the low and pleasing murmur of the people; accompanied by all his pomp, all his splendour, all his army, all his train, by all his retinue, by all his magnificence, by all his grandeur, by all his ornaments, by all the tumult, by all the throng, by all subjects, by all actors, by all time-beaters, by the whole seraglio; adorned with flowers, scented robes, garlands, and ornaments, etc. (see § 102, down to) which were accompanied at the same time by trumpets--went right through Kundapura to a park called the Shandavana of the Gnatri and proceeded to the excellent tree Asoka.

116 There under the excellent tree Asoka he caused his palankin to stop, descended from his palankin, took off his ornaments, garlands, and finery with his own hands, and with his own hands plucked out his hair in five handfuls. When the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Uttaraphalguni, he, after fasting two and a half days 1 without drinking water, put on a divine robe, and quite alone, nobody else being present, he tore out his hair and leaving the house entered the state of houselessness.

117 The Venerable Ascetic Mahavira for a year and a month wore clothes; after that time he walked about naked, and accepted the alms in the hollow of his hand. For more than twelve years the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira neglected his body and abandoned the care of it; he with equanimity bore, underwent, and suffered all pleasant or unpleasant occurrences arising from divine powers, men, or animals.

118 Henceforth the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira was houseless, circumspect [Circumspect is samita, guarding gupta; the former relates to execution of good acts, the latter to the abstinence from bad ones.] in his walking, circumspect in his speaking, circumspect in his begging, circumspect in his accepting (anything), in the carrying of his outfit and drinking vessel; circumspect in evacuating excrements, urine, saliva, mucus, and uncleanness of the body; circumspect in his thoughts, circumspect in his words, circumspect in his acts; guarding his thoughts, guarding his words, guarding his acts, guarding his senses, guarding his chastity; without wrath, without pride, without deceit, without greed; calm, tranquil, composed, liberated, free from temptations, without egoism, without property; he had cut off all earthly ties, and was not stained by any worldliness: as water does not adhere to a copper vessel, or collyrium to mother of pearl (so sins found no place in him); his course was unobstructed like that of Life; like the firmament he wanted no support; like the wind he knew no obstacles; his heart was pure like the water (of rivers or tanks) in autumn; nothing could soil him like the leaf of a lotus; his senses were well protected like those of a tortoise; he was single and alone like the horn of a rhinoceros; he was free like a bird; he was always waking like the fabulous bird Bharunda, valorous like an elephant, strong like a bull, difficult to attack like a lion, steady and firm like Mount Mandara, deep like the ocean, mild like the moon, refugent like the sun, pure like excellent gold; like the earth he patiently bore everything; like a well-kindled fire he shone in his splendour.

These words have been summarised in two verses:

1st. A vessel, mother of pearl, life, firmament, wind, water in autumn, leaf of lotus, a tortoise, a bird, a rhinoceros, and Bharunda;

2nd. An elephant, a bull, a lion, the king of the mountains, and the ocean unshaken--the moon, the sun, gold, the earth, well-kindled fire.

There were no obstacles anywhere for the Venerable One. The obstacles have been declared to be of four kinds, viz. with regard to matter, space, time, affects. With regard to matter: in things animate, inanimate, and of a mixed state; with regard to space: in a village or a town or in a wood or in a field or a threshing-floor or a house or a court-yard; with regard to time: in a Samaya or an Avalika or in the time of a respiration or in a Stoka or in a Kshana or in a Lava or in a Muhurta or in a day or in a fortnight or in a month or in a season or in a half year or in a year or in a long space of time; with regard to affects: in wrath or in pride or in deceit or in greed or in fear or in mirth or in love or in hate or in quarrelling or in calumny or in tale-bearing or in scandal or in pleasure or pain or in deceitful falsehood, etc. (all down to) or in the evil of wrong belief. There was nothing of this kind in the Venerable One.

119 The Venerable One lived, except in the rainy season, all the eight months of summer and winter, in villages only a single night, in towns only five nights; he was indifferent alike to the smell of ordure and of sandal, to straw and jewels, dirt and gold, pleasure and pain, attached neither to this world nor to that beyond, desiring neither life nor death, arrived at the other shore of the samsara, and he exerted himself for the suppression of the defilement of Karman.

120 With supreme knowledge, with supreme intuition, with supreme conduct, in blameless lodgings, in blameless wandering, with supreme valour, with supreme uprightness, with supreme mildness, with supreme dexterity, with supreme patience, with supreme freedom from passions, with supreme control, with supreme contentment, with supreme understanding, on the supreme path to final liberation, which is the fruit of veracity, control, penance, and good conduct, the Venerable One meditated on himself for twelve years. During the thirteenth year, in the second month of summer, in the fourth fortnight, the light (fortnight) of Vaisakha, on its tenth day, when the shadow had turned towards the east and the first wake was over, on the day called Suvrata, in the Muhurta called Vigaya, outside of the town Grimbhikagrama on the bank of the river Rigupalika, not far from an old temple, in the field of the householder Samaga, under a Sal tree, when the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Uttaraphalguni, (the Venerable One) in a squatting position with joined heels, exposing himself to the heat of the sun, after fasting two and a half days without drinking water, being engaged in deep meditation, reached the highest knowledge and intuition, called Kevala, which is infinite, supreme, unobstructed, unimpeded, complete, and full.

121 When the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira had become a Gina and Arhat, he was a Kevalin, omniscient and comprehending all objects; he knew and saw all conditions of the world, of gods, men, and demons: whence they come, whither they go, whether they are born as men or animals (kyavana) or become gods or hell-beings (upapada), the ideas, the thoughts of their minds, the food, doings, desires, the open and secret deeds of all the living beings in the whole world; he the Arhat, for whom there is no secret, knew and saw all conditions of all living beings in the world, what they thought, spoke, or did at any moment.

122 In that period, in that age the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira stayed the first rainy season in Asthikagrama, three rainy seasons in Kampa and Prishtikampa, twelve in Vaisali and Vanigagrama, fourteen in Ragagriha and the suburb of Nalanda, six in Mithila, two in Bhadraka, one in Alabhika, one in Panitabhumi, one in Sravasti, one in the town of Papa in king Hastipala's office of the writers: that was his very last rainy season.

123 In the fourth month of that rainy season, in the seventh fortnight, in the dark (fortnight) of Karttika, on its fifteenth day, in the last night, in the town of Papa in king Hastipala's office of the writers, the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira died, went off, quitted the world, cut asunder the ties of birth, old age, and death; became a Siddha, a Buddha, a Mukta, a maker of the end (to all misery), finally liberated, freed from all pains.

124 This occurred in the year called Kandra, the second (of the lustrum); in the month called Pritivardhana; in the fortnight Nandivardhana; on the day Suvratagni, surnamed Upasama; in the night called Devananda, surnamed Nirriti; in the Lava called Arkya; in the respiration called Mukta; in the Stoka called Siddha; in the Karana called Naga; in the Muhurta called Sarvarthasiddha; while the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Svati he died, etc. (see above, all down to) freed from all pains.

125 That night in which the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira died, etc. (all down to) freed from all pains, was lighted up by many descending and ascending gods.

126 In that night in which the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira died, etc. (all down to) freed from all pains, a great confusion and noise was originated by many descending and ascending gods.

127 In that night in which the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira died, etc. (all down to) freed from all pains, his oldest disciple, the monk Indrabhuti of the Gautama gotra, cut asunder the tie of friendship which he had for his master, and obtained the highest knowledge and intuition, called Kevala, which is infinite, supreme, etc., complete, and full.

128 In that night in which the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira died, etc. (all down to) freed from all pains, the eighteen confederate kings of Kasi and Kosala, the nine Mallakis and nine Likkhavis 1, on the day of new moon, instituted an illumination on the Poshadha, which was a fasting day; for they said: 'Since the light of intelligence is gone, let us make an illumination of material matter!'

129 In that night in which the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira died, etc. (all down to) freed from all pains, the great Graha called Kshudratma, resembling a heap of ashes, which remains for two thousand years in one asterism, entered the natal asterism of the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira.

130 From the moment in which the great Graha, etc., entered the natal asterism of the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, there will not be paid much respect and honour to the Sramanas, the Nirgrantha monks and nuns.

131 But when the great Graha, etc., leaves that natal asterism, there will be paid much respect and honour to the Sramanas, the Nirgrantha monks and nuns.

132 In that night in which the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira died, etc. (all down to) freed from all pains, the animalcule called Anuddhari was originated: which when at rest and not moving, is not easily seen by Nirgrantha monks and nuns who have not yet reached the state of perfection, but which when moving and not at rest, is easily seen by Nirgrantha monks and nuns who have not yet reached the state of perfection.

133 On seeing this (animalcule) many Nirgrantha monks and nuns must refuse to accept the offered alms.

'Master, why has this been said?' 'After this time the observance of control will be difficult.'

135-145 In that period, in that age the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira had an excellent community of fourteen thousand Sramanas with Indrabhuti at their head; thirty-six thousand nuns with Kandana at their head; one hundred and fifty-nine thousand lay votaries with Sankhasataka at their head; three hundred and eighteen thousand female lay votaries with Sulasa and Revati at their head; three hundred sages who knew the fourteen Purvas, who though no Ginas came very near them, who knew the combination of all letters, and like Gina preached according to the truth; thirteen hundred sages who were possessed of the Avadhi-knowledge and superior a., qualities; seven hundred Kevalins who possessed the combined 1 best knowledge and intuition; seven hundred who could transform themselves, and, though no gods, had obtained the powers (ridhi) of gods; five hundred sages of mighty intellect who know the mental conditions of all developed beings possessed of intellect and five senses in the two and a half continents and two oceans; four hundred professors who were never vanquished in the disputes occurring in the assemblies of gods, men, and Asuras; seven hundred male and fourteen hundred female disciples who reached perfection, etc. (all down to) freed from all pains; eight hundred sages in their last birth who were happy as regards their station, happy as regards their existence, lucky as regards their future.

146 The Venerable Ascetic Mahavira instituted two epochs in his capacity of a Maker of an end: the epoch relating to generations, and the epoch relating to psychical condition; in the third generation ended the former epoch, and in the fourth year of his Kevaliship the latter.

147 In that period, in that age the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira lived thirty years as a householder, more than full twelve years in a state inferior to perfection, something less than thirty years as a Kevalin, forty-two years as a monk, and seventy-two years on the whole. When his Karman which produces Vedaniya (or what one has to experience in this world), Ayus (length of life), name, and family, had been exhausted, when in this Avasarpini era the greater part of the Duhshamasushama period had elapsed and only three years and eight and a half months were left, when the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Svati, at the time of early morning, in the town of Papa, and in king Hastipala's office of the writers, (Mahavira) single and alone, sitting in the Samparyanka posture, reciting the fifty-five lectures which detail the results of Karman, and the thirty-six unasked questions, when he just explained the chief lecture (that of Marudeva) he died, etc. (see § 124, all down to) freed from all pains.

148 Since the time that the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira died, etc. (all down to) freed from all pains, nine centuries have elapsed, and of the tenth century this is the eightieth year. Another redaction has ninety-third year (instead of eightieth).

LIFE OF PARSVA.

149 In that period, in that age lived the Arhat Parsva, the people's favourite [Purisadaniya, explained: who is to be chosen among men because of his preferable karman.], the five most important moments of whose life happened when the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Visakha: in Visakha he descended (from heaven), and having descended thence, entered the womb (of his mother); in Visakha he was born; in Visakha, tearing out his hair, he left the house and entered the state of houselessness; in Visakha he obtained the highest knowledge and intuition, called Kevala, which is infinite, supreme, unobstructed, unimpeded, complete, and full; in Visakha he obtained final liberation.

150 In that period, in that age, in the first month of summer, in the first fortnight, the dark (fortnight) of Kaitra, on its fourth day, the Arhat Parsva, the people's favourite, descended from the Pranata Kalpa [This is the tenth world of the gods.], where he had lived for twenty Sagaropamas, here on the continent Gambudvipa, in Bharatavarsha, in the town of Benares; and in the middle of the night when the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Visakha, after the termination of his allotted length of life, divine nature, and existence (among the gods), he took the form of an embryo in the womb of the queen Vama, wife of Asvasena, king (of Benares).

151 The knowledge of the Arhat Parsva, the people's favourite, (about this) was threefold, etc. (repeat §§ 3-95 after making the necessary substitutions, and omitting what exclusively applies to Mahavira, all down to) comfortably carried her unborn child.

152 In that period, in that age the Arhat Parsva, the people's favourite--after the lapse of nine months and seven and a half days, in the second month of winter, in the third fortnight, the dark (fortnight) of Paushya, on its tenth day, in the middle of the night when the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Visakha--(Vama), perfectly healthy herself, gave birth to a perfectly healthy boy.

153, 154 In that night in which the Arhat Parsva, the people's favourite, was born, etc. (repeat §§ 97-107 with the necessary alterations, all down to) therefore shall the name of our boy be Parsva [This name was given him because before his birth his mother, lying on her couch, saw in the dark a black serpent crawling about. This is the account given by the commentator, who forgets to tell us how it comes to bear on the name Parsva.].

155 The Arhat Parsva, the people's favourite, clever, with the aspirations of a clever man, of great beauty, controlling his senses, lucky, and modest, lived thirty years as a householder. Then the Laukantika gods, following the established custom, addressed him with these kind, pleasing, etc., sweet, and soft words:

156 'Victory, victory to thee, gladdener of the world!' (see § 111, down to) Thus they raised the shout of victory.

157 Before the Arhat Parsva, the people's favourite, had adopted the life of a householder, etc. (see § 112, down to) indigent persons. In the second month of winter, in the third fortnight, the dark (fortnight) of Paushya, on its eleventh day, in the middle of the night, riding in his palankin called Visala, followed on his way by a train of gods, men, and Asuras, etc. (Parsva) went right through the town of Benares to the park called Asramapada, and proceeded to the excellent tree Asoka. There, etc. (see § 116, down to) five handfuls. When the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Visakha, he, after fasting three and a half days without drinking water, put on a divine robe, and together with three hundred men he tore out his hair, and leaving the house entered the state of houselessness.

158 The Arhat Parsva, the people's favourite, for eighty-three days neglected his body, etc. (see § 117, down to) animals.

159 Thereafter the Arhat Parsva, the people's favourite, was houseless, circumspect, etc. (see §§ 118-120, down to) meditated upon himself for eighty-three days.

During the eighty-fourth day--it was in the first month of summer, in the first fortnight, the dark (fortnight) of Kaitra, on its fourth day, in the early part of the day, when the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Visakha--Parsva, under a Dhataki tree, after fasting two and a half days without drinking water, being engaged in deep meditation, reached the infinite, etc. (see § 120, down to) highest knowledge and intuition called Kevala, etc. (see § 121, down to) moment.

160 The Arhat Parsva, the people's favourite, had eight Ganas and eight Ganadharas (enumerated in a Sloka): Subha and Aryaghosha, Vasishtha and Brahmakarin, Saumya and Sridhara, Virabhadra and Yasas.

161-166 The Arhat Parsva, the people's favourite, had an excellent community of sixteen thousand Sramanas with Aryadatta [Aryadinna in the original.] at their head; thirty-eight thousand nuns with Pushpakula at their head one hundred and sixty-four thousand lay votaries with Suvrata at their head; three hundred and twenty-seven thousand female lay votaries with Sunanda at their head; three hundred and fifty sages who knew the fourteen Purvas, etc. (see § 138); fourteen hundred sages who were possessed of the Avadhi knowledge; one thousand Kevalins; eleven hundred sages who could transform themselves, six hundred sages of correct knowledge, one thousand male and two thousand female disciples who had reached perfection, seven hundred and fifty sages of vast intellect, six hundred professors, and twelve hundred sages in their last birth.

167 The Arhat Parsva, the people's favourite, instituted two epochs in his capacity of a Maker of an end: the epoch relating to generations and the epoch relating to psychical condition; the former ended in the fourth generation, the latter in the third year of his Kevaliship.

168 In that period, in that age the Arhat Parsva, the people's favourite, lived thirty years as a householder, eighty-three days in a state inferior to perfection, something less than seventy years as a Kevalin, full seventy years as a Sramana, and a hundred years on the whole. When his fourfold Karman was exhausted and in this Avasarpini era the greater part of the Duhshamasushama period had elapsed, in the first month of the rainy season, in the second fortnight, the light (fortnight) of Sravana, on its eighth day, in the early part of the day when the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Visakha, (Parsva), after fasting a month without drinking water, on the summit of mount Sammeta, in the company of eighty-three persons, stretching out his hands, died, etc. (all down to) freed from all pains.

169 Since the time that the Arhat Parsva, the people's favourite, died, etc. (all down to) freed from all pains, twelve centuries have elapsed, and of the thirteenth century this is the thirtieth year. End of the Life of Parsva.

LIFE OF ARISHTANEMI.

170 In that period, in that age lived the Arhat Arishtanemi, the five most important moments of whose life happened when the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Kitra. In Kitra he descended from heaven, etc. (see § 149, down to) obtained final liberation.

171 In that period, in that age, in the fourth month of the rainy season, in the seventh fortnight, the dark (fortnight) of Kartika, on its twelfth day, the Arhat Arishtanemi descended from the great Vimana, called Aparagita, where he had lived for thirty-six Sagaropamas, here on the continent Gambudvipa, in Bharatavarsha, in the town of Sauripura [The Prakrit form is Soriyapura, which would correspond to Sanskrit Saurikapura. It is Krishna's town.], and in the middle of the night when the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Kitra, he took the form of an embryo in the womb of the queen Siva, wife of the king Samudravigaya, etc. (the seeing of the dreams, the accumulation of riches, etc., should be repeated here).

172 In that period, in that age the Arhat Arishtanemi--after the lapse of nine months and seven and a half days, in the first month of the rainy season, in the second fortnight, the light (fortnight) of Sravana, on its fifth day, etc.--(Siva), perfectly healthy herself; gave birth to a perfectly healthy boy. (Repeat the account of the birth, substituting the name Samudravigaya, all down to) therefore shall the name of our boy be Arishtanemi [His mother saw in a dream a nemi, the outer rim of a wheel, which consisted of rishta stones flying up to the sky. Hence the name Arishtanemi.]. The Arhat Arishtanemi, clever, etc. (see §§ 155-157, all down to) indigent persons.

173 In the first month of the rainy season, in the second fortnight, the light (fortnight) of Sravana, on its sixth day riding in his palankin called Uttarakura, and followed on his way by a train of gods, men, and Asuras, etc. (Arishtanemi) went right through the town of Dvaravati to the park called Revatika, and proceeded to the excellent Asoka tree. There, etc. (see § 116, down to) five handfuls. When the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Kitra, after fasting two and a half days without drinking water, he put on a divine robe, and together with a thousand persons he tore out his hair, and leaving the house entered the state of houselessness.

174 The Arhat Arishtanemi for fifty-four days neglected his body, etc. (see §§ 117-120). During the fifty-fifth day--it was in the third month of the rainy season, in the fifth fortnight, the dark fortnight of Asvina, on its fifteenth day, in the last part of the day, when the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Kitra--(Arishtanemi) under a Vetasa [Vata in some Manuscripts; it is the Banyan tree.] tree on the summit of mount Girnar [Ugginta in the original.], after fasting three and a half days without drinking water, etc., obtained infinite, etc., highest knowledge and intuition called Kevala, etc. (see § 121, down to) moment.

175-181 The Arhat Arishtanemi had eighteen Ganas and eighteen Ganadharas. The Arhat Arishtanemi had an excellent community of eighteen thousand Sramanas with Varadatta at their head; forty thousand nuns with Arya Yakshini at their head; one hundred and sixty-nine thousand lay votaries with Nanda at their head; three hundred and thirty-six thousand [Read khattisam in the printed text.] female lay votaries with Mahasuvrata at their head; four hundred sages who knew the fourteen Purvas, etc.; fifteen hundred sages who were possessed of the Avadhi knowledge; fifteen hundred Kevalins; fifteen hundred sages who could transform themselves; one thousand sages of vast intellect; eight hundred professors; sixteen hundred sages in their last birth; fifteen hundred male and three thousand female disciples who had reached perfection. The Arhat Arishtanemi instituted, etc. (see § 146, down to) the former ended in the eighth generation, the latter in the twelfth year of his Kevaliship.

182 In that period, in that age the Arhat Arishtanemi lived three centuries as a prince, fifty-four days in a state inferior to perfection, something less than seven centuries as a Kevalin, full seven centuries as a Sramana, a thousand years on the whole. When his fourfold Karman was exhausted and in this Avasarpini era a great part of the Duhshamasushama period had elapsed, in the fourth month of summer, in the eighth fortnight, the light (fortnight) of Ashadha, on its eighth day, in the middle of the night when the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Kitra, (Arishtanemi), after fasting a month without drinking water, on the summit of mount Girnar, in the company of five hundred and thirty-six monks, in a squatting position, died, etc. (all down to) freed from all pains.

183 Since the time that the Arhat Arishtanemi died, etc. (all down to) freed from all pains, eighty-four thousand years have elapsed, of the eighty-fifth millennium nine centuries have elapsed, of the tenth century this is the eightieth year.

[End of the Life of Arishtanemi.]

EPOCHS OF THE INTERMEDIATE TIRTHAKARAS.

[The numbers are given in the same way as in § 183. I have abridged these tedious accounts. All Tirthakaras except Mahavira have the title Arhat, which I have dropped in the sequel.]

184-203 Since the time that the Arhat Nami died, etc. (all down to) freed from all pains, 584,979 years have elapsed, this is the eightieth year. Since the death of Munisuvrata this is the year 1,184,980. Since Malli this is the year 6,584,980. Ara died 10,000,000 years before Malli; Kunthua quarter of a Palyopama before Malli; Santi three-quarters of a Palyopama; Dharma three Sagaropamas before Malli; Ananta seven Sagaropamas before Malli; Vimala sixteen Sagaropamas before Malli; Vasupugya forty Sagaropamas before Malli; Sreyamsa a hundred Sagaropamas before Malli. Sitala died a krore of Sagaropamas, less 42,003 years and eight and a half months, before the death of Vira. Suvidhi, surnamed Pushpadanta, died ten krores of Sagaropamas before Sitala; Kandraprabha a hundred krores of Sagaropamas before Sitala; Suparsva a thousand krores of Sagaropamas before Sitala; Padmaprabha ten thousand krores of Sagaropamas before Sitala; Sumati one hundred thousand krores of Sagaropamas before Sitala; Abhinandana one million krores of Sagaropamas before Sitala; Sambhava two million krores of Sagaropamas before Sitala; Agita five million krores of Sagaropamas before Sitala.

LIFE OF RISHABHA.

204-205 In that period, in that age lived the Arhat Rishabha, the Kosalian [Kosaliya = Kausalika. He is thus called because he was born in Kosala or Ayodhya.], four important moments of whose life happened when the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Uttarashadha; the fifth, when in conjunction with Abhigit: in Uttarashadha he descended from heaven, etc. (all down to) in Abhigit he obtained final liberation.

206 In that period, in that age, in the fourth month of summer, in the seventh fortnight, the dark (fortnight) of Ashadha, on its fourth day, the Arhat Rishabha, the Kosalian, descended from the great Vimana called Sarvarthasiddha, where he had lived for thirty-three Sagaropamas, here on the continent Gambudvipa, in Bharatavarsha, in Ikshvakubhumi, and in the middle of the night, etc., he took the form of an embryo in the womb of Marudevi, wife of the patriarch Nabhi [Kulakara; these Kulakaras were the first kings and founders of families at the time when the rest of mankind were 'Yugalsins.' The first Kulakara was Vimalavahana; the seventh and last of the line Nabhi].

207 The knowledge of the Arhat Rishabha about this, etc. (all as in the case of Mahavira, but note the following differences: the first dream is a bull 'coming forward with his face,' the other (mothers of Tirthakaras see first) an elephant. She (Marudevi) relates them to Nabhi, the patriarch; there are no interpreters of dreams; Nabhi, the patriarch, himself interprets them).

208 In that period, in that age the Arhat Rishabha, the Kosalian,--in the first month of summer, in the first fortnight, the dark (fortnight) of Kaitra, on its eighth day, etc.--(Marudevi), perfectly healthy herself, gave birth to a perfectly healthy boy.

209 (The circumstances connected with the birth of Rishabha are the same as in the case of that of Mahavira, only that the contents of §§ 100 and 101 do not apply to the present case.)

210 The Arhat Rishabha, the Kosalian, belonged to the Kasyapa gotra, and he had five names: Rishabha, First King, First Mendicant, First Gina, and First Tirthakara.

211 The Arhat Rishabha, the Kosalian, clever, with the aspirations of a clever man, of great beauty, controlling (his senses), lucky, and modest, lived two millions of former years [Kosalika = Kausalika. He is thus called because he was born in Kosala or Ayodhya.] as a prince, and six millions three hundred thousand former years as a king. During his reign he taught, for the benefit of the people, the seventy-two sciences, of which writing is the first, arithmetic the most important, and the knowledge of omens the last, the sixty-four accomplishments of women, the hundred arts, and the three occupations of men [The arts, as those of the potter, blacksmith, painter, weaver, and barber, each of which five principal arts is subdivided into twenty branches, are inventions and must be taught; while the occupations, agriculture, trade, etc. have everywhere developed, as it were, of themselves. The accomplishments of women are dancing, singing, etc. The commentator adds to these a detailed list of those questionable accomplishments which Vatsyayana has so curiously described, and refers the reader to the Gayamangala for further details. The latter work, a still extant commentary on the p. 283 Kama Sutra, must therefore be older than 1307, the date of Ginaprabhamuni's commentary on the Kalpa Sutra.]. At last he anointed his hundred sons as kings, and gave each a kingdom. Then the Laukantika god, following the established custom, etc. (see §§ 110-112, down to) indigent persons. In the first month of summer, in the first fortnight, the dark (fortnight) of Kaitra, on its eighth day, in the latter part of the day, riding in his palanquin called Sudarsana, followed on his way by a train of gods, men, and Asuras, etc. (Rishabha) went right through the town Vinita to the park called Siddhartha Vana, and proceeded to the excellent tree Asoka. There, etc. (see § 116, down to) four handfuls. When the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Ashadha, he, after fasting two and a half days without drinking water, put on a divine robe, and together with four thousand of high, noble, royal persons, and Kshatriyas, he tore out his hair, and leaving the house entered the state of houselessness.

212 The Arhat Rishabha, the Kosalian, for one thousand years neglected his body, etc. (see §§ 117-120, down to) meditated upon himself for one thousand years. Thereupon--it was in the fourth month of winter, the seventh fortnight, the dark (fortnight) of Phalguna, on its eleventh day, in the early part of the day, when the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Ashadha, outside of the town Purimatata, in the park called Sakatamukha, under the excellent tree Nyagrodha--(Rishabha) after fasting three and a half days without drinking water, being engaged in deep meditation, reached the infinite, etc. (see § 120, down to) highest knowledge and intuition called Kevala, etc. (see § 121, down to) moment.

213-226 The Arhat Rishabha, the Kosalian, had eighty-four Ganas and eighty-four Ganadharas. The Arhat Rishabha, the Kosalian, had an excellent community of eighty-four thousand Sramanas with Rishabhasena at their head; three hundred thousand nuns with Brahmisundari at their head; three hundred and five thousand lay votaries with Sreyamsa at their head; five hundred and fifty-four thousand female lay votaries with Subhadra at their head; four thousand seven hundred and fifty sages who knew the fourteen Purvas, etc.; nine thousand sages who were possessed of the Avadhi knowledge; twenty thousand Kevalins; twenty thousand six hundred sages who could transform themselves; twelve thousand six hundred and fifty sages of vast intellect, etc.; twelve thousand six hundred and fifty professors; twenty thousand male and forty thousand female disciples who had reached perfection; twenty-two thousand nine hundred sages in their last birth, etc. The Arhat Rishabha, the Kosalian, instituted, etc. (see § 146, down to) the former ended after numberless generations, the latter from the next Muhurta after his Kevaliship.

227 In that period, in that age the Arhat Rishabha, the Kosalian, lived two millions of former years as a prince, six millions three hundred thousand former years as a king, together eight millions three hundred thousand former years as a householder; a thousand (former) years in a state inferior to perfection, nine-and-ninety thousand former years as a Kevalin, together a hundred thousand former years as a Sramana, and eight millions four hundred thousand years on the whole. When his fourfold Karman was exhausted, and in this Avasarpini era the Sushamadhushama period had nearly elapsed, only three years and eight and a half months being left, in the third month of winter, in the fifth fortnight, the dark (fortnight) of Magha, on its thirteenth day, in the early part of the day when the moon was in conjunction with the asterism Abhigit, (Rishabha), after fasting six and a half days without drinking water, on the summit of mount Ashtapada, in the company of ten thousand monks in the Samparyanka position, died, etc. (all down to) freed from all pains.

Since the time that the Arhat Rishabha, the Kosalian, died, etc. (all down to) freed from all pains, three years and eight and a half months elapsed; thereupon one koti of kotis of Sagaropamas, less forty-two thousand and three years and eight and a half months, elapsed. At that time the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira died; after his Nirvana nine centuries elapsed, of the tenth century this is the eightieth year.

[End of the Lives of the Ginas.]

LIST OF THE STHAVIRAS.

1 At that period, at that age the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira had nine Ganas and eleven Ganadharas. 'Why, now, has it been said, that the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira had nine Ganas, but eleven Ganadharas?'

'The oldest monk of the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira was Indrabhuti of the Gautama gotra, who instructed five hundred Sramanas; the middle-aged monk was Agnibhuti of the Gautama gotra, who instructed five hundred Sramanas; the youngest was Vayubhuti of the Gautama gotra, who instructed five hundred Sramanas. The Sthavira Arya-Vyakta of the Bharadvaga gotra instructed five hundred Sramanas; the Sthavira Arya-Sudharman of the Agnivesyayana gotra instructed five hundred Sramanas; the Sthavira Mandikaputra 1 of the Vasishtha gotra instructed two hundred and fifty Sramanas; the Sthavira Mauryaputra of the Kasyapa gotra instructed two hundred and fifty Sramanas; the Sthavira Akampita of the Gautama gotra and Sthavira Akalabhratri of the Haritayana gotra, both Sthaviras instructed together three hundred Sramanas each; the Sthaviras Metarya and Prabhasa, both of the Kaundinya gotra, instructed together three hundred Sramanas each [The sum total of Sramanas is therefore 4711, while in § 134 it is stated to have been 14,000.]. Therefore, Sir, has it been said that the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira had nine Ganas, but eleven Ganadharas:

2 All these eleven Ganadharas of the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, who knew the twelve Angas, the fourteen Purvas, and the whole Siddhanta of the Ganins, died, etc. (all down to) freed from all pains in Ragagriha after fasting a month without drinking water. The Sthaviras Indrabhuti and Arya Sudharman both died after the Nirvana of Mahavira. The Nirgrantha Sramanas of the present time are all (spiritual) descendants of the monk Arya Sudharman, the rest of the Ganadharas left no descendants.

3 The Venerable Ascetic Mahavira was of the Kasyapa gotra. His disciple was:

1. Arya Sudharman of the Agnivesyayana gotra;
 2. Arya Gambunaman of the Kasyapa gotra;
 3. Arya Prabhava of the Katyayana gotra;
 4. Arya Sayyamba, father of Manaka, was of the Vatsa gotra;
 5. Arya Yasobhadra of the Tungikayana gotra.
- 4 In the short redaction the list of Sthaviras after Arya Yasobhadra is the following:
6. Arya Sambhutavigaya of the Mathara gotra and Arya Bhadrabahu of the Prakina gotra;
 7. Arya Sthulabhadra of the Gautama gotra;
 8. 1st. Arya Mahagiri of the Ailapatya gotra and
2nd. Arya Suhastin of the Vasishtha gotra;
 9. Susthita and Supratibuddha, surnamed Kotika and Kakandaka, of the Vyaghrapata gotra;
 10. Arya Indradatta (Indadinna) of the Kausika gotra;
 11. Arya Datta (Dinna) of the Gautama gotra;
 12. Arya Simhagiri Gatismara of the Kausika gotra;
 13. Arya Vagra of the Gautama gotra;
 14. Arya Vagrasena of the Utkrishta gotra.

He had four disciples: Arya Nagila, Arya Padmila, Arya Gayanta, and Arya Tapasa, each of whom founded a Sakha called after his name, viz. the Aryanagila Sakha, the Aryapadmila Sakha, the Aryagayanti Sakha, and the Aryatapasa Sakha.

In the detailed redaction the list of Sthaviras after Arya Yasobhadra is the following:

6. 1st. Arya Bhadrabahu of the Prakina gotra, who had four disciples of the Kasyapa gotra:

a. Godasa, founder of the Godasa Gana, which was divided into four Sakhas:

- a1. The Tamraliptika Sakha,
- a2. The Kotivarshiya Sakha,
- a3. The Pundravardhaniya Sakha, and
- a4. The Dasikharbatika Sakha.

b. Agnidatta,

c. Ganadatta,

d. Somadatta.

2nd. Arya Sambhutavigaya of the Mathara gotra, who had twelve disciples:

7. a. Nandanabhadra,
- b. Upananda,
- c. Tishyabhadra,
- d. Yasobhadra,
- e. Sumanobhadra,
- f. Manibhadra,
- g. Punyabhadra,
- h. Sthulabhadra of the Gautama gotra,
- i. Rigumati,
- k. Gambu,
- l. Dirghabhadra, and
- m. Pandubhadra;

and seven female disciples:

- a. Yaksha,
- b. Yakshadatta (Yakshadinna),
- c. Bhuta,
- d. Bhutadatta (Bhutadinna),
- e. Sena (also Ena),
- f. Vena,
- g. Rena.

8. 1st. Arya Mahagiri of the Ailapatya gotra, who had eight disciples:

- A. Uttara,
- B. Balissaha, who both together founded the Uttarabalissaha Gana, which was divided into four Sakhas
 - a. Kausubhika,
 - b. Sautaptika (Pr. Soittiya),
 - c. Kautumbini (or Kundadhari),
 - d. Kandaganari.
- C. Dhanarddhi (Pr. Dhanaddha),
- D. Sirarddhi (Pr. Siriddha),
- E. Kodinya,
- F. Naga,
- G. Nagaputra,
- H. Khaluka Rohagupta of the Kausika gotra, founder of the Trairasika Sakha.

2nd. Arya Suhastin of the Vasishtha gotra, who had twelve disciples:

9. A. Arya Rohana of the Kasyapa gotra, founder of the Uddeha Gana, which was divided into four Sakhas:

- a. Udumbarika (Pr. Udumbariggiya),
- b. Masapurika,
- c. Matipatrika,
- d. Purnapatrika (Pr. Punnapatiya, Panna°, Sunna°, or Suvanna°); and into six Kulas:

- aa. Nagabhuta,
- bb. Somabhuta,
- cc. Ullagakkha (or Ardrakakkha?),
- dd. Hastipta (Pr. Hatthilgiya),
- ee. Nandika (Pr. Nandigga),
- ff. Parihasaka.

B. Bhadrasyasas of the Bharadvaga gotra, who founded the Uduvatika Gana, which was divided into four Sakhas:

- a. Kampiyika (Pr. Kampiggiya),
- b. Bhadrityika (Pr. Bhaddiggiya),
- c. Kakandika,
- d. Mekhaliyika (Pr. Mehaliiggiya);

and into three Kulas:

- aa. Bhadrasyaska (Pr. Bhaddagasiya),
- bb. Bhadruguptika,
- cc. Yasobhadra (Pr. Gasabhadda).

C. Megha.

D. Kamarddhi (Pr. Kamiddhi) of the Kundala gotra, who founded the Vesavatika Gana, which was divided into four Sakhas:

- a. Sravastika,
- b. Ragvapalika (Pr. Raggapaliya),
- c. Antarangika (Pr. Antariggiya),
- d. Kshemaliptika (Pr. Khemaliggiya);

and into four Kulas:

- aa. Ganika,
- bb. Maighika,
- cc. Kamarddhika,
- dd. Indrapuraka.

E. Srigupta of the Harita gotra, founder of the Karana Gana, which was divided into four Sakhas:

- a. Haritamalakari,
- b. Samkasika,
- c. Gavedhuka,
- d. Vagranagari;

and into seven Kulas:

- aa. Vatsaliya (Pr. Vakkhaligga),
- bb. Pritidharmika,
- cc. Haridra (Pr. Haligga),
- dd. Pushyamitrika (Pr. Pusamittigga),
- ee. Malyaka (Pr. Maligga),
- ff. Aryaketaka,
- gg. Krishnasakha (Pr. Kanhasaha).

F. Rishigupta Kakandaka of the Vasishtha gotra, founder of the Manava Gana, which was divided into four Sakhas:

- a. Kasyapiya (Pr. Kasaviggiya),
- b. Gautamiya (Pr. Goyameggiya),
- c. Vasishthiya (Pr. Vasiitthiya),
- d. Saurashtrika;

and into three Kulas:

- aa. Rishiguptika,
- bb. Rishidattika,
- cc. Abhiyasasa.

G. and H. Susthita and Supratibuddha, surnamed Kautika and Kakandaka, of the Vyaghrapatya gotra, founders of the Kautika Gana, which was divided into four Sakhas:

- a. Ukkanagari,
- b. Vidyadhari,
- c. Vagri,
- d. Madhyamika (Pr. Magghimilla);

and into four Kulas:

- aa. Brahmaliptaka (Pr. Bambhaligga),
- bb. Vatsaliya (Pr. Vakkhaligga),
- cc. Vaniya (Pr. Vanigga),
- dd. Prasnavaanaka.

Both Sthaviras had together five disciples:

10. a. Arya Indradatta (Pr. Indadina) of the Kasyapa gotra,
- b. Priyagantha, founder of the Madhyama Sakha,
- c. Vidyadharagopala of the Kasyapa gotra, founder of the Vidyadhari Sakha,
- d. Rishidatta,
- e. Arhaddatta (Pr. Arihadatta).

11. Arya Datta (Pr. Dinna) of the Gautama gotra, who had two disciples:
12. Ist. Arya Santisenika of the Mathara gotra, founder of the Ukkanagari Sakha, who had four disciples:
 - a. Arya Senika, founder of the Aryasenika Sakha,
 - b. Arya Tapasa, founder of the Aryatapasi Sakha,
 - c. Arya Kubera, founder of the Aryakubera Sakha, and
 - d. Arya Rishipalita, founder of the Aryarishipalita Sakha.
- 2nd. Arya Simhagiri Gatismara of the Gautama gotra, who had four disciples:
 13. a. Dhanagiri,
 - b. Arya Samita of the Gautama gotra, founder of the Brahmadvipika Sakha,
 - c. Arya Vagra of the Gautama gotra, founder of the Aryavagra Sakha,
 - d. Arhaddatta (Pr. Arihadinna).
14. Ist. Arya Vagrasena, founder of the Aryanagila Sakha, 2nd. Arya Padma, founder of the Aryapadma Sakha, 3rd. Arya Ratha of the Vatsa gotra, founder of the Aryagayanti Sakha.
15. Arya Pushyagiri of the Kausika gotra.
16. Arya Phalgumitra of the Gautama gotra.
17. Arya Dhanagiri of the Vasishtha gotra.
18. Arya Sivabhuti of the Kautsa gotra.
19. Arya Bhadra of the Kasyapa gotra.
20. Arya Nakshatra of the Kasyapa gotra.
21. Arya Raksha of the Kasyapa gotra.
22. Arya Naga of the Gautama gotra.
23. Arya Gehila of the Vasishtha gotra.
24. Arya Vishnu of the Mathara gotra.
25. Arya Kalaka of the Gautama gotra.
26. Arya Sampalita and Bhadra, both of the Gautama gotra.
27. Arya Vriddha of the Gautama gotra.
28. Arya Sanghapalita of the Gautama gotra.
29. Arya Hastin of the Kasyapa gotra.
30. Arya Dharma of the Suvrata gotra.
31. Arya Simha of the Kasyapa gotra.
32. Arya Dharma of the Kasyapa gotra.
33. Arya Sandilya.

Bowing down my head, I pay my reverence to the Sthavira Gambu of the Gautama gotra, who possessed steady virtue, good conduct, and knowledge. ix.

I prostrate myself before the Sthavira Nandita of Kasyapa gotra, who is possessed of great clemency and of knowledge, intuition, and good conduct. x.

Then I adore the Kshamasramana Desiganin of the Kasyapa gotra, who, steady in his conduct, possesses the highest righteousness and virtue. xi.

Then I prostrate myself before the Kshamasramana Sthiragupta of the Vatsya gotra, the preserver of the sacred lore, the wise one, the ocean of wisdom, him of great virtue. xii.

Then I adore the Sthavira prince, Dharma, the virtuous Ganin, who stands well in knowledge, intuition, good conduct, and penance, and is rich in virtues. l. xiii.

I revere the Kshamasramana Devarddhi of the Kasyapa gotra, who wears, as it were, the jewel of the right understanding of the Sutras, and possesses the virtues of patience, self-restraint, and clemency. xiv.

End of the List of the Sthaviras.

RULES FOR YATIS.

1. In that period, in that age the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira commenced the Paggusan when a month and twenty nights of the rainy season had elapsed.

Why has it been said that the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira commenced the Paggusan when a month and twenty nights of the rainy season had elapsed?

2. 'Because at that time the lay people have usually matted their houses, whitewashed them, strewn them (with straw), smeared them (with cowdung), levelled, smoothed, or perfumed them (or the floor of them), have dug gutters and drains, have furnished their houses, have rendered them comfortable, and have cleaned them. Hence it has been said that the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira commenced the Paggusan when a month and twenty nights of the rainy season had elapsed.'

3. As the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira commenced the Paggusan when a month and twenty nights of the rainy season had elapsed, so the Ganadharas commenced the Paggusan when a month and twenty nights of the rainy season had elapsed.

4. As the Ganadharas have done, so the disciples of the Ganadharas have done.

5. As they have done, so the Sthaviras have done.

6. As they have done, so do the Nirgrantha Sramanas of the present time.

7. As they do, so our masters, teachers, etc. do.

8. As they do, so do we commence the Paggusan after a month and twenty nights of the rainy season have elapsed. It is allowed to commence the Paggusan earlier, but not after that time.

9. 2. Monks or nuns during the Paggusan are allowed to regard their residence as extending a Yogana and a Krosa all around, and to live there for a moderate time.

10. 3. During the Paggusan monks or nuns are allowed to go and return, for the sake of collecting alms, not farther than a Yogana and a Krosa (from their lodgings).

11. If there is (in their way) an always flowing river which always contains water, they are not allowed to travel for a Yogana and a Krosa.

12. But if the river is like the Eravati near Kunal, such that it can be crossed by putting one foot in the water and keeping the other in the air, there it is allowed to travel for a Yogana and a Krosa.

13. But where that is impossible, it is not allowed to travel for a Yogana and a Krosa.

14. 4. During the Paggusan the Akarya will say, 'Give, Sir!' Then he is allowed to give (food to a sick brother), but not to accept himself.

15. If the Akarya says, 'Accept, Sir!' then he is allowed to accept (food), but not to give.

16. If the Akarya says, 'Give, Sir! accept, Sir!' then the patient is allowed to give and to accept (food).

17. 5. Monks or nuns who are hale and healthy, and of a strong body, are not allowed during the Paggusan frequently to take the following nine drinks: milk, thick sour milk, fresh butter, clarified butter, oil, sugar, honey, liquor, and meat.

18. 6. During the Paggusan a collector of alms might ask (the Akarya), 'Sir, is (anything of the just-mentioned articles) required for the sick man?' he (the Akarya) says, 'Yes, it is.' Then (the sick man) should be asked, 'How much do you require?' The Akarya says, 'So much is required for the sick man: you must take so much as he told you.' And he (the collector of alms) should beg, and begging he should accept (the required food). Having obtained the quantity ordered, he should say, 'No more!' Perchance (the giver of food) might ask, 'Why do you say so, Sir?' (Then he should answer), 'Thus much is required for the sick man.' Perchance, after that answer the other may say, 'Take it, Sir! You may after (the sick man has got his share) eat it or drink it.' Thus he is allowed to accept it, but he is not allowed to accept it by pretending that it is for the sick man.

19. 7. In householders' families which are converted, devoted, staunch adherers (to the law), and honour, praise, and permit (the visits of monks), Sthaviras, during the Paggusan, are not allowed to ask, 'Sir, have you got such or such a thing?' if they do not see it. 'Why, Sir, has this been said?' 'Because a devout householder might buy it or steal it.'

20. 8. During the Paggusan a monk eats only one meal a day, and should at one fixed time frequent the abodes of householders for the sake of collecting alms, except when he does services for the Akarya, the teacher, an ascetic, or a sick man, likewise if he or she be a novice who has not yet the marks of ripe age.

21. To a monk who during the Paggusan eats only one meal on every second day, the following special rule applies. Having gone out in the morning, he should eat and drink his pure dinner, then he should clean and rub his alms-bowl. If his dinner was sufficient, he should rest content with it for that day; if not, he is allowed for a second time to frequent the abodes of householders for the sake of collecting alms.

22. A monk who during the Paggusan eats on every third day, is allowed twice to frequent the abodes of householders for the sake of collecting alms.

23. A monk who during the Paggusan eats one meal on every fourth day, is allowed three times to frequent the abodes of householders for the sake of collecting alms.

24. A monk who keeps still more protracted fasts, is allowed at all (four) times to frequent the abodes of householders for the sake of collecting alms.

25. 9. A monk who during the Paggusan eats one meal every day, is allowed to accept all (permitted) drinks. A monk who during the Paggusan eats one meal on every second day, is allowed to accept three kinds of drinks: water used for watering flour, sesamum, or rice [Cf. Akaranga Sutra 2, 1, 7, § 7. The definitions given in our commentary are the following: the first is water mixed with flour, or water used for washing the hands after kneading flour; the second, water with which squeezed leaves, etc. are sprinkled; the third, water used for washing threshed and winnowed rice (tandula).]. A monk who eats one meal on every third day, is allowed to accept three kinds of drinks: water used for washing sesamum, chaff, or barley [Akaranga Sutra 2, 1, 7, § 8. The first is water used for washing sesamum, or, in Maharashtra, husked sesamum; the second, water used for washing rice, etc. (vrihyadi); the third, water used for washing barley.]. A monk who during the Paggusan eats one meal on every fourth day, is allowed to accept three kinds of water: rain-water, or sour gruel, or pure (i.e. hot) water. A monk who during the Paggusan keeps still more protracted fasts, is allowed to accept only one kind of drink: hot pure water. It must contain no boiled rice. A monk who abstains from food altogether, is allowed to accept only one kind of drink: pure hot water. It must contain no boiled rice; it must be filtered, not unfiltered; it must be a limited quantity, not an unlimited one; it must be sufficient, not insufficient.

26. 10. A monk who during the Paggusan restricts himself to a certain number of donations, is allowed to accept (e. g.) five donations of food, and five of drink; or four of food, and five of drink; or five of food, and four of drink. He may accept one donation of salt for seasoning his meat. He should rest content for that day with the dinner he has brought together, and is not allowed a second time to frequent the abodes of householders for the sake of collecting alms.

27. During the Paggusan monks or nuns who restrict their visits to certain houses may go to a place where rice is cooked, if it is the seventh house from that where they are lodged. According to some, the lodging is included in the seven houses which such a mendicant must pass before he may participate in the festive entertainment; but according to others, it is not included in those seven houses.

28. 11. During the Paggusan a monk who collects alms in the hollow of his hand, is not allowed to frequent the abodes of householders, etc., if rain, even in the form of a fine spray, falls down.

29. During the Paggusan a monk who collects alms in the hollow of his hand, is not allowed to stay anywhere except in a house after having accepted alms, for it might begin to rain. But he should eat a part, and put back the rest (if it then begins to rain), covering his hand with the other hand, and laying it on his bosom or hiding it under his armpit; then he should go to well-covered (places), to a cave or the foot of a tree, where no water or drops of water or spray of water falls in his hand.

30. 12. During the Paggusan a monk who collects alms in the hollow of his hand, is not allowed to collect alms if rain, even in the form of a fine spray, falls down.

31. 13. During the Paggusan a monk who uses an alms-bowl is not allowed to frequent the abodes of householders for the sake of collecting alms if it rains fast, but he is allowed to do so if it rains but little; but they must wear then an under and upper garment.

32. During the Paggusan, a monk who has entered the abode of a householder while there are single showers of rain, is allowed (when the rain ceases for a moment) to stand under a grove, or in his residence, or in the assembling-hall of the village, or at the foot of a tree.

33. If before his arrival a dish of rice was being cooked, and after it a dish of pulse was begun to be cooked, he is allowed to accept of the dish of rice, but not of the dish of pulse.

34 But if before his arrival a dish of pulse was being cooked, and after it a dish of rice was begun to be cooked, he is allowed to accept of the dish of pulse, but not of the dish of rice.

35 If both dishes were begun to be cooked before his arrival, he is allowed to accept of both. If both dishes were begun to be cooked after his arrival, he is not allowed to accept of either. He is allowed to accept of what was prepared before his arrival; he is not allowed to accept of what was prepared after his arrival.

36 During the Paggusan, etc. (see § 32, down to) tree; he is not allowed to pass there his time with the food he had collected before. But he should first eat and drink his pure (food and drink), then rub and clean his alms-bowl, and, putting his things together, he should, while the sun has not yet set, go to the place where he is lodged; but he is not allowed to pass the night in the former place.

37 During the Paggusan, etc. (see § 32, down to) tree.

38 It is not allowed that there at the same place should stand together one monk and one nun, nor one monk and two nuns, nor two monks and one nun, nor two monks and two nuns. But if there is a fifth person, a male or female novice, or if that place can be seen (by those who pass) or doors open on it, then they are allowed to stand there together.

39 During the Paggusan, etc. (see § 32, down to) tree. It is not allowed that there at the same place should stand together a monk and a lay woman, etc. (through the four cases as in § 28). But if there is a fifth person, a Sthavira or a Sthavira, or if that place can be seen (by those who pass) or doors open on it, then they are allowed to stand there together. The same rule applies to a nun and a layman.

40 14. During the Paggusan monks or nuns are not allowed to accept food, drink, dainties, and spices for one who has not asked them, and whom they have not promised to do so.

41 'Why has this been said, Sir?' 'Because one who collects alms for another without being asked for it, might eat them or not, just as he lists.'

42 15. During the Paggusan monks or nuns are not allowed to take their meals as long as their body is wet or moist.

43 'How has this been said, Sir?' 'Seven places which retain the moisture have been declared: the hands, the lines in the hand, the nails, the top of the nails, the brows, the under lip, the upper lip.' But when they perceive that the water on their body has dried up and the moisture is gone, then they are allowed to take their meals.

44 16. There are these eight classes of small things which a mendicant ought diligently to perceive, observe, and inspect, viz. living beings, mildew, seeds, sprouts, flowers, eggs, insects, and moisture.

What is understood by the small living beings? The small living beings are declared to be of five kinds: black, blue, red, yellow, and white ones. There is an animalcule called Anuddhari, which when at rest and not moving is not easily seen by monks and nuns who have not yet reached perfection, which when not at rest but moving is easily seen by monks and nuns who have not yet reached perfection. Monks and nuns who have not yet reached perfection must diligently perceive, observe, and inspect this. Those are the small living beings.

45 What is understood by small mildew? Small mildew has been declared to be of five kinds: black, blue, etc. There is a kind of small mildew which has the same colour as the substance on which it grows. Monks, nuns, etc. (see § 44, down to) inspect this. That is small mildew.

What is understood by small seeds? Small seeds are declared to be of five kinds: black, blue, etc. There is a kind of small seeds of the same colour as grain. Monks and nuns, etc. (see § 44, down to) inspect this. Those are the small seeds.

What is understood by small sprouts? Small sprouts are declared to be of five kinds: black, blue, etc. There is a kind of small sprouts of the same colour as earth. Monks and nuns, etc. (see § 44, down to) inspect them. Those are the small sprouts.

What is understood by small flowers? Small flowers are declared to be of five kinds: black, blue, etc. There is a kind of small flowers of the same colour as the tree (on which they grow). Monks and nuns, etc. (see § 44, down to) inspect them. Those are the small flowers.

What is understood by small eggs? Small eggs are declared to be of five kinds: eggs of biting insects, of spiders, of ants, of lizards (or wasps), and of chameleons. Monks and nuns, etc. (see § 44, down to) inspect them. Those are the small eggs.

What is understood by small caves or lairs? Small caves or lairs are declared to be of five kinds: lairs of animals of the asinine kind, chasms, holes, cavities widening below like the stem of a palm tree, and wasps' nests. Monks and nuns, etc. (see § 44, down to) inspect them. Those are the small caves or lairs.

What is understood by small moisture? Small moisture is declared to be of five kinds: dew, hoarfrost, fog, hailstones, and damps. Monks and nuns, etc. (see § 44, down to) inspect this. That is small moisture.

46 17. During the Paggusan a monk might wish to frequent the abodes of householders for the sake of collecting alms. He is not allowed to go without asking leave of the teacher, or sub-teacher, or religious guide, or Sthavira, or head of the Gana, or Ganadhara, or founder of the Gana, or whom else he regards as his superior; he is allowed to go after having asked leave of one of these persons (in this way): 'I want with your permission to frequent the abodes of householders for the sake of collecting alms.' If he (the superior) grants permission, one is allowed to go; if not, one is not allowed to go.

'Why has this been said, Sir?' 'The teacher knows how to make good what has been done wrong.'

47 The same rule applies concerning the visits to temples and leaving the house for easing nature, or any other business, also the wandering from village to village.

48 18. During the Paggusan a monk might wish to take some medicine; he is not allowed to take it without asking leave of the teacher, etc. (see § 47, down to) founder of the Gana; but he is allowed to take it after having asked leave of one of these persons (in this way): 'I want, Sir, with your permission to take some medicine,' viz. so much or so often. If he, etc. (see § 46, down to) wrong.

49 The same rule applies if a monk wants to undergo some medical cure.

50 Also if he wants to do some exalted penance.

51 Also if he intends, after the last mortification of the flesh which is to end in death, to wait for his last hour without desiring it, in total abstinence from food and drink or in remaining motionless; also if he wants to go out or to enter, to eat food, etc., to ease nature, to learn his daily lesson, to keep religious vigils—he is not allowed to do it without asking leave.

52 19. If during the Paggusan a monk wants to dry or warm (in the sun) his robe, alms-bowl, blanket, broom, or any other utensil, he is not allowed without asking one or many persons to frequent the abodes of householders for the sake of collecting alms, to eat food, etc., to visit temples or leave the house for easing nature, to learn his daily lesson, to lie down with outstretched limbs or stand in some posture. If there is somebody near, one or many persons, then he should say: 'Sir, please mind this (robe, etc.) while I frequent the abodes of householders, etc. (see above, down to) posture.' If that person promises to do it, then he (the monk) is allowed to go; if he does not promise it, then he is not allowed to go.

53 20. During the Paggusan monks or nuns are not allowed to be without their proper bed or bench 1. This is the reason: A mendicant whose bed and bench are not reserved for his own use, are low and rickety, not sufficiently fastened, without a fixed place, and never exposed to the sun, and who is not circumspect in what he does, nor accustomed to inspect and clean the things of his use, will find it difficult to exercise control;

54 but on the contrary, control will be easy to him.

55 21. During the Paggusan monks or nuns must always inspect three spots where to ease nature; not so in the summer and winter, as in the rainy season. 'Why has this been said, Sir?' 'For in the rainy season living beings, grass, seeds, mildew, and sprouts frequently come forth.'

56 22. During the Paggusan monks or nuns must have three pots, one for ordure, one for urine, and a spitting-box.

57 Monks and nuns, who wear after the Paggusan their hair as short as that of a cow, are not allowed to do so during the Paggusan after that night (of the fifth Bhadrpadā); but a monk should shave his head or pluck out his hair. Shaving with a razor every month, cutting with scissors every half-month, plucking out every six months.

This is the conduct chiefly of Sthaviras during the rainy season.

58 23. During the Paggusan monks or nuns should not use harsh words after the commencement of the Paggusan; if they do, they should be warned Reverend brother (or sister), you speak unmannerly.' One who (nevertheless) uses harsh words after the commencement of the Paggusan, should be excluded from the community.

59 24. If, during the Paggusan, among monks or nuns occurs a quarrel or dispute or dissension, the young monk should ask forgiveness of the superior, and the superior of the young monk. They should forgive and ask forgiveness, appease and be appeased, and converse without restraint 1. For him who is appeased, there will be success (in control); for him who is not appeased, there will be no success; therefore one should appease one's self. 'Why has this been said, Sir?' 'Peace is the essence of monachism.'

60 25. During the Paggusan monks or nuns should have three lodging-places; (two) for occasional use, which must be inspected; one for constant use, which must be swept.

61 26. During the Paggusan monks or nuns should give notice of the direction or intermediate direction in which they intend to go forth for the sake of begging alms. 'Why has this been said, Sir?' 'During the Paggusan the reverend monks frequently undertake austerities; an ascetic becoming weak and exhausted might swoon or fall down. (In case of such an accident the remaining) reverend monks will undertake their search in that direction or intermediate direction (which the ascetic had named them).

62 27. During the Paggusan monks or nuns are not allowed to travel farther than four or five Yoganas, and then to return. They are allowed to stay in some intermediate place, but not to pass there (at the end of their journey) the night.

63 Of those Nirgrantha monks who follow, etc. (see Akaranga Sutra 2, 15, 5 end, down to) . . . these (rules regulating) the conduct of Sthaviras in the rainy season, some will reach perfection, etc. (see § 124, down to) be freed from all pains in that same life, some in the next life, some in the third birth; none will have to undergo more than seven or eight births.

64 In that period, in that age the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, in the town of Ragagriha, in the Kaitya Gunasilaka, surrounded by many monks and nuns, by many men and women of the laity, by many gods and goddesses, said thus, spoke thus, declared thus, explained thus; he proclaimed again and again the Lecture called Paryushanakalpa with its application, with its argumentation, with its information, with its text, with its meaning, with both text and meaning, with the examination of the meaning.

Thus I say.

THE UTTARADHYAYANA SUTRA

From: Jaina Sutras, Part 2,

Sacred Books of the East, Vol. 45

Editor: F. Max Müller, Oxford

Original Language: Prakrit

Translation: Hermann Jacobi, 1895

Estimated Range of Dating: 200 B.C. - 500 A.D.

(Uttaradhyayana or Uttaradhyayana Sutra is one of the most important sacred books of the Svetambara Jains. It consists of 36 chapters, each of which deals with aspects of Jain doctrine and discipline. It is believed by some to contain the actual words of Bhagwan Mahavira.

The Uttaradhyayana resembles the Sutrakritanga with regard to its subjects treated; but it is of greater extent than the original part of the Sutrakritanga, and the plan of the work is carried out with more skill. Its intention is to instruct a young monk in his principal duties, to commend an ascetic life by precepts and examples, to warn him against the dangers in his spiritual career, and to give some theoretical information. The heretical doctrines are only occasionally alluded to, not fully discussed; apparently the dangers expected from that quarter grew less in the same measure as time advanced and the institutions of the sect were more firmly established. Of more importance to a young monk seems to have been an accurate knowledge of animate and inanimate things, as a rather long treatise on this subject has been added at the end of the book.—Though there is an apparent plan in the selection and arrangement of the single Lectures, still it is open to doubt whether they were all composed by one author, or only selected from the traditional literature, written or oral, which among the Jainas, as everywhere else, must have preceded the formation of a canon. I am inclined to adopt the latter alternative, because there is a greater variety of treatment and style in the different parts than seems compatible with the supposition of one author, and because a similar origin must be assumed for many works of the present canon.)

UTTARADHYAYANA 1ST LECTURE.

ON DISCIPLINE.

1 I shall explain in due order the discipline of a houseless monk, who has got rid of all worldly ties. Listen to me.

2 A monk who, on receiving an order 1 from his superior*, walks up to him, watching his nods and motions, is called well-behaved. [* The original has the plural instead of the singular. It takes great liberties in this respect, and the commentators constantly call to help a vakanavyataya or lingavyataya, exchange of number or gender, as the case may be. It is impossible in the translation to follow the original in this respect, and useless to note all such grammatical blunders. The conclusion we may draw from them is that in the spoken language many grammatical forms which in the literary language continued to be used, were on the point of dying out or had already actually become obsolete. I am almost sure that the vernacular of the time when the Sutras were composed began to drop the distinction between the singular and plural in the verb. It was, however, artificially revived in the literary Maharashtri of later days.]

3 But a monk who, on receiving an order from his superior, does not walk up to him, being insubordinate and inattentive, is called ill-behaved.

4 As a bitch with sore ears is driven away everywhere, thus a bad, insubordinate, and talkative (pupil) is turned out.

5 As a pig leaves a trough filled with grain to feed on faeces, so a brute (of a man) turns away from virtue, and takes to evil ways.

6 Hearing a man thus compared to a dog and a pig, he who desires his own welfare, should adhere to good conduct.

7 Therefore be eager for discipline, that you may acquire righteousness; a son of the wise*, who desires liberation, will not be turned away from anywhere. [* Buddhaputta. Buddha is here and in the sequel explained by akarya, teacher. The word is in the crude form, not in the inflected form, as the nominative would not suit the metre. Liberties of this kind are frequently met with in our text.]

8 One should always be meek, and not be talkative in the presence of the wise; one should acquire valuable knowledge, and avoid what is worthless.

9 When reprimanded a wise man should not be angry, but he should be of a forbearing mood; he should not associate, laugh, and play with mean men.

10 He should do nothing mean, nor talk much; but after having learned his lesson, he should meditate by himself.

11 If he by chance does anything mean, he should never deny it, but if he has done it, he should say: 'I have done it,' if he has not done it, 'I have not done it.'

12 He should not, in every case, wait for the express command (of the teacher) like an unbroken horse for the whip (of the rider), but like a broken horse which sees the whip (of the rider) he should commit no evil act.

13 Disobedient, rough speaking, ill-behaved pupils will exasperate even a gentle teacher; but those will soon win even a hot-tempered teacher who humour him and are polite.

14 He should not speak unasked, and asked he should not tell a lie; he should not give way to his anger, and bear with indifference pleasant and unpleasant occurrences.

15 Subdue your Self, for the Self is difficult to subdue; if your Self is subdued, you will be happy in this world and in the next.

16 Better it is that I should subdue my Self by self-control and penance, than be subdued by others with fetters and corporal punishment.

17 He should never do anything disagreeable to the wise [Buddhanam, i.e. the superiors.], neither in words nor deeds, neither openly nor secretly.

18 He should not (sit) by the side of the teacher, nor before him, nor behind him; he should not touch (the teacher's) thigh with his own, nor answer his call from the couch.

19 A well-behaved monk should not sit on his hams, nor cross his arms, nor stretch out his legs, nor stand (too) close to his teacher.

20 If spoken to by the superior, he should never remain silent, but should consider it as a favour; asking for his command, he should always politely approach his teacher.

21 If the teacher speaks little or much, he should never grow impatient; but an intelligent pupil should rise from his seat and answer (the teacher's) call modestly and attentively.

22 He should never ask a question when sitting on his stool or his bed, but rising from his seat and coming near, he should ask him with folded hands.

23 When a pupil who observes the above rules of conduct, questions the teacher about the sacred text, its meaning, or both, he should deliver it according to tradition.

24 A monk should avoid untruth, nor should he speak positively (about future things, his plans, etc.); he should avoid sinful speech, and always keep free from deceit.

25 He should not tell anything sinful or meaningless or hurtful, neither for his own sake nor for anybody else's, nor without such a motive.

26 In barbers' shops or houses, on the ground separating two houses, or on the highway a single monk should not stand with a single woman, nor should he converse with her.

27 Any instruction the wise ones [Buddhah.] may give me in a kind or a rough way, I shall devotedly accept, thinking that it is for my benefit.

28 (The teacher's) instruction, his manner of giving it, and his blaming evil acts are considered blissful by the intelligent, but hateful by the bad monk.

29 Wise, fearless monks consider even a rough instruction as a benefit, but the fools hate it, though it produces patience and purity of mind.

30 He should occupy a low, firm seat, which does not rock; seldom rising and never without a cause, he should sit motionless.

31 At the right time a monk should sally forth, and he should return at the right time; avoiding to do anything out of time, he should do what is appropriate for each period of the day.

32 A monk should not approach (dining people) sitting in a row, but should collect alms that are freely given; having begged according to the sanctioned rules, he should eat a moderate portion at the proper time.

33 A monk should wait (for his alms) alone, not too far from other monks, nor too near them, but so that he is not seen by another party; another monk should not pass him to get the start of him.

34 Neither boldly erect nor humbly bowing down, standing neither too close by nor too far off, a monk should accept permitted food that was prepared for somebody else.

35 In a place that is covered above and sheltered on all sides, where there are no living beings nor seeds, a monk should eat in company, restrained and undressed.

36 A monk should avoid as unallowed such food as is well dressed, or well cooked, or well cut, or such in which is much seasoning, or which is very rich, or very much flavoured, or much sweetened.

37 (The teacher) takes delight in instructing a clever (pupil), just as the rider (in managing) a well-broken horse; but he tires to instruct a foolish (pupil), just as the rider (tires to manage) an unbroken horse.

38 (A bad pupil thinks:) 'I get but knocks and boxes on the ear, hard words and blows; and he believes a teacher who instructs him well, to be a malevolent man.

39 A good pupil has the best opinion (of his teacher), thinking that he treats him like his son or brother or a near relation; but a malevolent pupil imagines himself treated like a slave.

40 He should not provoke his teacher's anger, nor should he himself grow angry; he should not offend the teacher nor irritate him by proclaiming his faults.

41 Perceiving the teacher's anger one should pacify him by kindness, appease him with folded hands, and promise not to do wrong again.

42 He who adopts the conduct which the wise ones [Buddha.] have attained by their virtues and always practised, will not incur blame.

43 Guessing the teacher's thoughts and the purport of his words, one should express one's assent, and execute (what he desires to be done).

44 An excellent pupil needs no express directions, or he is (at least) quickly directed; he always carries out his duties as he is told.

45 An intelligent man who has learned (the sacred texts) takes his duties upon himself, and he becomes renowned in the world; as the earth is the dwelling of all beings, so he will be a dwelling of all duties.

46 When the worthy teachers, who are thoroughly enlightened and from early times well versed in conduct, are satisfied (with a pupil), they will make over to him their extensive and weighty knowledge of the sacred texts.

47 His knowledge will be honoured, his doubts will be removed, he will gladden the heart of his teacher by his good acts; kept in safety by the performance of austerities and by meditation, being as it were a great light, he will keep the five vows.

48 Honoured by gods, Gandharvas, and men, he will, on leaving this body which consists of dirt and impurities, become either an eternal Siddha, or a god of great power and small imperfections.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 2ND LECTURE.
ON TROUBLES*.

[Parisaha, that which may cause trouble to an ascetic, and which must be cheerfully borne.]

O long-lived (Gambusvamin!) I (Sudharman) have heard the following Discourse* from the Venerable (Mahavira) [* The commentator (Devendra) says that when Mahavira spoke, he was understood by all creatures, whatever was their language. He quotes the following verse: (deva devim nara narim sabaras kapi sabarim tiryanko pi ka tairaskim menire bhagavadgiram.) The gods, men, Sabaras, and animals took the language of the Lord for their own. See: Acts 2:11.]

Here [i.e. in our creed or religion. This is generally the meaning of the word iha, here, opening a sentence.], forsooth, the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira of the Kasyapa Gotra has declared twenty-two troubles which a monk must learn and know, bear and conquer, in order not to be vanquished by them when he lives the life of a wandering mendicant. These, then, are the twenty-two troubles declared by the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, which a monk must learn and know, bear and conquer, in order not to be vanquished by them when he lives the life of a wandering mendicant:

1. diganka (gugupsa)-parisaha, hunger;
2. pivasa (pipasa)-p., thirst;
3. siya (sita)-p., cold;
4. usina (ushna)-p., heat;
5. damsamasaya (damsamasaka)-p., gad-flies, and gnats;
6. akela-p., nakedness;
7. arati-p., to be discontented with the objects of control.
8. ithi (stri)-p., women;
9. kariya (karya)-p., erratic life;
10. nisihiya (naishedhiki)-p., place for study;
11. se.gga (saya)-p., lodging;
12. akkosa (akrosa)-p., abuse;
13. vaha (vadha)-p., corporal punishment;
14. gayana (yakana)-p., to ask for something;
15. alabha-p., to be refused;
16. roga-p., illness;
17. tana-phasa (trinaspasa), pricking of grass;
18. galla-p., dirt;
19. sakkaparakkara (satkarapurahkara)-p., kind and respectful treatment;
20. panna (pragna)-p., understanding;
21. annana (agnana)-p., ignorance;
22. sammatta (samyaktva)-p., righteousness.

1 The enumeration of the troubles has been delivered by the Kasyapa [i.e. Mahavira, who belonged to the Gotra of Kasyapa.], I shall explain them to you in due order. Listen to me.

2 1. Though his body be weakened by hunger, a monk who is strong (in self-control) and does penance, should not cut or cause another to cut (anything to be eaten), nor cook it or cause another to cook it.

3 Though emaciated like the joint of a crow's (leg) and covered with a network of veins, he should know the permitted measure of food and drink, and wander about with a cheerful mind.

4 2. Though overcome by thirst, he should drink no cold water, restrained by shame and aversion (from forbidden things); he should try to get distilled water.

5 Wandering about on deserted ways, in pain, thirsty, with dry throat, and distressed, he should bear this trouble (of thirst).

6 3. If a restrained, austere ascetic occasionally suffers from cold on his wanderings, he should not walk beyond the (prescribed) time, remembering the teaching of the Gīna.

7 'I have no shelter and nothing to cover my skin, therefore I shall make a fire to warm myself;' such a thought should not be entertained by a monk.

8 4. If he suffers from the heat of hot things, or from the heat of his body, or from the heat of summer, he should not lament the loss of comfort.

9 A wise man, suffering from heat, should not long for a bath, or pour water over his body, or fan himself.

10 5. Suffering from insects a great sage remains undisturbed. As an elephant at the head of the battle kills the enemy, so does a hero (in self-control) conquer the internal foe.

11 He should not scare away (insects), nor keep them off, nor be in the least provoked to passion by them. Tolerate living beings, do not kill them, though they eat your flesh and blood.

12 6. 'My clothes being torn, I shall (soon) go naked,' or 'I shall get a new suit;' such thoughts should not be entertained by a monk.

13 At one time he will have no clothes, at another he will have some; knowing this to be a salutary rule, a wise (monk) should not complain about it.

14 7. A houseless and poor monk who wanders from village to village may become tired of ascetic life: he should bear this trouble.

15 A sage should turn away from this discontent; he should wander about free from sins, guarded in himself, a tabernacle (as it were) of the Law, doing no actions, and perfectly passionless.

16 8. In this world men have a natural liking for women; he who knows (and renounces) them, will easily perform his duties as a Sramana.

17 A wise man who knows that women are a slough, as it were, will get no harm from them, but will wander about searching for the Self.

18 9. Alone, living on allowed food, he should wander about, bearing all troubles, in a village or a town or a market-place or a capital.

19 Different (from other men) a monk should wander about, he should acquire no property; but not being attached to householders, he should live without a fixed residence.

20 10. In a burial-place, or a deserted house, or below a tree he should sit down, alone, without moving, and he should not drive away any one.

21 Sitting there he should brave all dangers; when seized with fear, he should not rise and go to some other place.

22 11. A monk who does penance and is strong (in self-control), will not be affected beyond measure by good or bad lodgings, but an evil-minded monk will.

23 Having obtained a good or bad lodging in an empty house, he should stay there thinking: 'What does it matter for one night?'

24 12. If a layman abuses a monk, he should not grow angry against him; because he would be like a child, a monk should not grow angry.

25 If a monk hears bad words, cruel and rankling ones, he should silently overlook them, and not take them to heart.

26 13. A monk should not be angry if beaten, nor should he therefore entertain sinful thoughts; knowing patience to be the highest good, a monk should meditate on the Law.

27 If somebody strikes a restrained, resigned Sramana somewhere, he should think: 'I have not lost my life.'

28 14. It will always cause difficulties to a houseless monk to get everything by begging, and nothing without begging.

29 The hand (of the giver) is not always kindly stretched out to a monk when he is on his begging tour; but he should not think that it would be better to live as a householder.

30 15. He should beg food from the householder when his dinner is ready; a wise man should not care whether he gets alms or not.

31 'I get nothing to-day, perhaps I shall get something to-morrow;' a monk who thinks thus, will not be grieved by his want of success.

THE GRAND BIBLE

32 16. If any misfortune happens and he suffers pain, he should cheerfully steady his mind, and bear the ills that attack him.

33 He should not long for medical treatment, but he should continue to search for the welfare of his soul; thus he will be a true Sramana by neither acting himself nor causing others to act.

34 17. When a naked, rough, restrained ascetic lies on the grass, his body will be hurt.

35 In the sun his pain will grow insupportable; still a monk, though hurt by the grass, will not use clothes.

36 18. When by the heat of summer his body sweats and is covered with dirt and dust, a wise monk should not lament his loss of comfort.

37 He should bear (all this), waiting for the destruction of his Karman, (and practising) the noble, excellent Law; he should carry the filth on his body till he expires.

38 19. It may be that a gentleman salutes a monk, or rises from his seat on his approach, or invites him (to accept alms in his house): a monk should evince no predilection for men of this sort, who show him such marks of respect.

39 Not resentful, having few wants, begging from strangers, and not being dainty, a wise man should not long for pleasant things, nor be sorry afterwards (for not having got them).

40 20. 'Forsooth, in bygone times I have done actions productive of ignorance, for I do not remember them when asked by anybody anywhere.'

41 'Afterwards, however, actions productive of ignorance take effect.' Therefore comfort yourself, knowing the consequences of actions.

42 21. 'It was of no use to turn away from the lust of the senses and to live restrainedly, for I do not properly recognise good and bad things.'

43 'Though in practising austerities and religious observances I live according to strict rules, still the hindrances to knowledge will not go off.'

44 22. A monk should not think: 'There is, indeed, no life to come, nor an exalted state to be acquired by penances; in short, I have been deceived.'

45 A monk should not think: 'Those lied who said that there were, are, and will be Ginas.'

All these troubles have been declared by the Kasyapa. A monk should not be vanquished by them, when attacked by any anywhere.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 3RD LECTURE.

THE FOUR REQUISITES.

1 Four things of paramount value are difficult to obtain here by a living being: human birth, instruction in the Law, belief in it, and energy in self-control.

2 1. The universe is peopled by manifold creatures, who are, in this Samsara, born in different families and castes for having done various actions.

3 Sometimes they go to the world of the gods, sometimes to the hells, sometimes they become Asuras in accordance with their actions.

4 Sometimes they become Kshatriyas, or Kandalas and Bukkasas, or worms and moths, or (insects called) Kunthu and ants.

5 Thus living beings of sinful actions, who are born again and again in ever-recurring births, are not disgusted with the Samsara, but they are like warriors (never tired of the battle of life).

6 Living beings bewildered through the influence of their actions, distressed and suffering pains, undergo misery in non-human births.

7 But by the cessation of Karman, perchance, living beings will reach in due time a pure state and be born as men.

8 2. And though they be born with a human body, it will be difficult for them to hear the Law, having heard which they will do penances, combat their passions and abstain from killing living beings.

9 3. And though, by chance, they may hear the Law, it will be difficult for them to believe in it; many who are shown the right way, stray from it.

10 4. And though they have heard the Law and believe in it, it is difficult for them to fulfill it strenuously; many who approve of the religion, do not adopt it.

11 Having been born as a man, having heard the Law, believing in it, and fulfilling it strenuously, an ascetic should restrain himself and shake off sinfulness.

12 The pious obtain purity, and the pure stand firmly in the Law: (the soul afterwards) reaches the highest Nirvana, being like unto a fire fed with ghee.

13 Leave off the causes of sin, acquire fame through patience! (A man who acts up to this) will rise to the upper regions after having left this body of clay.

14 The Yakshas who are gifted with various virtues, (live in the heavenly regions, situated) one above the other, shining forth like the great luminaries, and hoping never to descend thence. Intent on enjoying divine pleasures and changing their form at will, they live in the upper Kalpa heavens many centuries of former* years. [* One 'former' (purva) year consists of 7,560 millions of common years. The idea that years were longer when the world was still young, is apparently suggested by the experience which everybody will have made, that a year seemed to us an enormously long time when we were young, and the same space of time p. 17 appears to us shorter and shorter as we advance in life. A similar analogy with our life has probably caused the belief in the four ages of the world, shared by the Hindus and the ancients. For does not childhood to most of us appear the happiest period of our life, and youth better still than the time of full-grown manhood? As in retrospect our life appears to us, so primitive man imagines the life of the world to have been: the first age was the best and the longest, and the following ages grew worse and worse, and became shorter at the same time. This primitive conceit was by the ancients combined with the conceit of the year, so that the four ages were compared with the four seasons of the year. Something similar seems to have happened in India, where, however, there are three or six seasons. For the Jainas seem to have originally divided one Eon into six minor periods. Now the year was frequently compared to a wheel, and this second metaphor was worked out by the Jainas. They named the six minor periods aras, literally spokes of a wheel, and divided the whole Eon into one descending part (of the wheel), avasarpini, and one rising part, utsarpini. These Avasarpini and Utsarpini are probably a later improvement, and the Eon originally contained but six Aras. But if there were indeed twelve Aras from the beginning, they must have been suggested by the twelve months of the year.]

15 The Yakshas, having remained there according to their merit, descend thence at the expiration of their life and are born as men.

16 Men are of ten kinds.

17 Fields and houses, gold, cattle, slaves and servants: where these four goods, the causes of pleasure, are present, in such families he is born.

18 He will have friends and relations, be of good family, of fine complexion, healthy, wise, noble, famous, and powerful.

19 After having enjoyed, at their proper time, the unrivalled pleasures of human life, he will obtain true knowledge by his pure religious merit acquired in a former life.

20 Perceiving that the four requisites are difficult to obtain, he will apply himself to self-control, and when by penances he has shaken off the remnant of Karman, he will become an eternal Siddha.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 4TH LECTURE.

IMPURITY.

1 You cannot prolong your life, therefore be not careless; you are past help when old age approaches. Consider this: what (protection) will careless people get, who kill living beings and do not exert themselves?

2 Men who adhering to wrong principles acquire wealth by evil deeds, will lose it, falling into the snares (of their passions) and being held captive by their hatred.

3 As the burglar caught in the breach of the wall perishes by the work the sinner himself had executed, thus people in this life and the next cannot escape the effect of their own actions.

4 If a man living in the Samsara does an action for the sake of somebody else, or one by which he himself also profits, then, at the time of reaping the fruit of his actions, his relations will not act as true relations (i.e. will not come to his help).

5 Wealth will not protect a careless man in this world and the next. Though he had seen the right way, he does not see it, even as one in the dark whose lamp has suddenly been put out.

6 Though others sleep, be thou awake! Like a wise man, trust nobody, but be always on the alert; for dangerous is the time and weak the body. Be always watchful like a Bharunda I bird!

7 A monk should step carefully in his walk (i.e. in his life), supposing everything to be a snare for him. First he must bestow care on his life till he wins the stake (viz. enlightenment), and afterwards he should despise it, annihilating his sins.

8 By conquering his will, (a monk) reaches liberation, as a well-broken horse which is clad in harness (goes to battle). Be watchful in your young years; for thereby a monk quickly obtains liberation.

9 'If he does not get (victory over his will) early, he will get it afterwards,' such reasoning presupposes the eternity of human life. But such a man despairs when his life draws to its close, and the dissolution of his body approaches.

10 One cannot quickly arrive at discernment; therefore one should exert one's self, abstain from pleasures, understand the world, be impartial like a sage, and guard one's self: (thus) never be careless.

11 A Sramana who again and again suppresses the effects of delusion, and controls himself, will be affected in a rough way by external things; but a monk should not hate them in his mind.

12 External things weaken the intellect and allure many; therefore keep them out of your mind. Keep off delusion, remove pride, do not practise deceit, leave off greed.

13 Heretics who are impure and vain, are always subject to love and hate, and are wholly under the influence (of their passions). Despising them as unholy men, desire virtues till the end of your life.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 5TH LECTURE.

DEATH AGAINST ONE'S WILL.

1 In this ocean (of life) with its currents (viz. births) difficult to cross, one man has reached the opposite shore; one wise man has given an answer to the following question.

2 These two ways of life ending with death have been declared: death with one's will, and death against one's will.

3 Death against one's will is that of ignorant men, and it happens (to the same individual) many times. Death with one's will is that of wise men, and at best it happens but once.

4 Mahavira has (thus) described the first kind in which an ignorant man, being attached to pleasures, does very cruel actions.

5 A man attached to pleasures and amusements will be caught in the trap (of deceit). (He thinks): 'I never saw the next world, but I have seen with my own eyes the pleasures of this life.'

6 'The pleasures of this life are (as it were) in your hand, but the future ones are uncertain I. Who knows whether there is a next world or not?'

7 The fool boasts: 'I shall have the company of (most) men.' But by his love of pleasures and amusements he will come to grief.

8 Then he begins to act cruelly against movable and immovable beings, and he kills living beings with a purpose or without.

9 An ignorant man kills, lies, deceives, calumniates, dissembles, drinks liquor, and eats meat, thinking that this is the right thing to do.

10 Overbearing in acts and words, desirous for wealth and women, he accumulates sins in two ways [Viz. By his acts and thoughts.], just as a young snake gathers dust (both on and in its body).

11 Then he suffers ill and is attacked by disease; and he is in dread of the next world when he reflects on his deeds.

12 I have heard of the places in hell, and of the destination of the sinner, where the fools who do cruel deeds will suffer violently.

13 Then going to the place where he is to be born again according to his deeds, he feels remorse, as I have heard (from my teacher).

14, 15 As a charioteer, who against his better judgement leaves the smooth highway and gets on a rugged road, repents when the axle breaks; so the fool, who transgresses the Law and embraces unrighteousness, repents in the hour of death, like (the charioteer) over the broken axle.

16 Then when death comes at last, the fool trembles in fear; he dies the 'death against one's will,' (having lost his chance) like a gambler vanquished by Kali.

17 Thus has been explained the fools' 'death against one's will,' now hear from me the wise men's 'death with one's will!'

18 Full of peace and without injury to any one is, as I have heard (from my teachers), the death of the virtuous who control themselves and subdue their senses.

19 (Such a death) does not fall to the lot of every monk, nor of every householder; for the morality of householders is of various character, and that of monks is not always good throughout.

20 Some householders are superior to some monks in self-control; but the saints are superior to all householders in self-control.

21 Bark and skin (of a goat), nakedness, twisted hair, baldness--these (outward tokens) will not save a sinful ascetic.

22 A sinner, though he be a mendicant (friar), will not escape hell; but a pious man, whether monk or householder, ascends to heaven.

23 A faithful man should practise the rules of conduct for householders; he should never neglect the Posaha fast in both fortnights, not even for a single night.

24 When under such discipline he lives piously even as a householder, he will, on quitting flesh and bones, share the world of the Yakshas.

25 Now a restrained monk will become one of the two: either one free from all misery or a god of great power.

26-28 To the highest regions, in due order, to those where there is no delusion, and to those which are full of light, where the glorious (gods dwell)--who have long life, great power, great lustre, who can change their shape at will, who are beautiful as on their first day, and have the brilliancy of many suns--to such places go those who are trained in self-control and penance, monks or householders, who have obtained liberation by absence of passion.

29 Having heard (this) from the venerable men who control themselves and subdue their senses, the virtuous and the learned do not tremble in the hour of death.

THE GRAND BIBLE

30 A wise man having weighed (both kinds of death) and chosen the better one (taught in) the Law of Compassion, will become calm through patience, with an undisturbed mind (at the time of death).

31 When the right time (to prepare for death) has arrived, a faithful (monk) should in the presence (of his teacher) suppress all emotions (of fear or joy) and wait for the dissolution of his body.

32 When the time for quitting the body has come, a sage dies the 'death with one's will,' according to one of the three methods.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 6TH LECTURE. THE FALSE ASCETIC.

1 All men who are ignorant of the Truth are subject to pain; in the endless Samsara they suffer in many ways.

2 Therefore a wise man, who considers well the ways that lead to bondage and birth, should himself search for the truth, and be kind towards all creatures.

3 'Mother, father, daughter-in-law, brother, wife, and sons will not be able to help me, when I suffer for my own deeds.'

4 This truth should be taken to heart by a man of pure faith; he should (therefore) cut off greed and love, and not hanker after his former connections.

5 Cows and horses, jewels and earrings, cattle, slaves and servants: all these (possessions) you must give up in order to obtain the power of changing your form at will.

6 Everything that happens to somebody, affects him personally; therefore, knowing the creatures' love of their own self, do not deprive them of their life, but cease from endangering and combating them.

7 Seeing that to accept (presents) leads to hell, one should not accept even a blade of grass; only to preserve one's life one should eat the food that is put in one's own alms-bowl.

8 Here some are of opinion that they will be delivered from all misery by merely attending the teacher, without abstaining from sins.

9 Acknowledging the truth about bondage and liberation, but talking only, not acting (in accordance with these tenets), they seek comfort for themselves in mighty words.

10 Clever talking will not work salvation; how should philosophical instruction do it? Fools, though sinking lower and lower through their sins, believe themselves to be wise men.

11 They are (going) a long way in the endless Samsara; therefore looking out carefully one should wander about carefully.

12 Choosing what is beyond and above (this world, viz. liberation), one should never desire (worldly objects), but sustain one's body only to be able to annihilate one's Karman.

13 Those who reap pains who, in thoughts, words, or acts, are attached to their body, to colours, and to forms.

14 Recognising the cause of Karman, one should wander about waiting for one's death; (knowing) the permitted quantity of food and drink, one should eat (such food as has been) prepared (by the householders for their own consumption).

15 An ascetic should not lay by any store, not even so little as the grease (sticking to his alms-bowl); but as a bird with its plumage, so he with his alms-bowl should wander about without desires.

16 Receiving alms in a manner to avoid faults, and controlling one's self, one should wander about in a village (etc.) without a fixed residence; careful among the careless one should beg one's food.

17 Thus has spoken the Arhat Gnatiputra, the venerable native of Vaisali, who possesses the highest knowledge and who possesses the highest faith, who possesses (at the same time) the highest knowledge and the highest faith.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 7TH LECTURE. THE PARABLE OF THE RAM, ETC.

1 As somebody, to provide for (the arrival of) a guest, brings up a young ram, gives it rice and gram, and brings it up in his yard;

2 Then when it is grown up and big, fat and of a large belly, fattened and of a plump body, it is ready for the guest.

3 As long as no guest comes, the poor (animal) lives; but as soon as a guest arrives, its head is cut off, and it is eaten.

4 As this ram is well treated for the sake of a guest, even so an ignorant, great sinner longs (as it were) for life in hell.

5 An ignorant man kills, tells lies, robs on the highway, steals foreign goods, deceives, (always thinking of some one) whom he could plunder, the villain.

6 He is desirous of women and pleasures, he enters on undertakings and business, drinks liquor, eats meat, becomes strong, a subduer of foes.

7 He eats crisp goats' meat, his belly grows, and his veins swell with blood—but he gains nothing but life in hell, just as the ram is only fed to be killed for the sake of a guest.

8, 9 After having enjoyed pleasant seats, beds, carriages, riches, and pleasures, after having squandered his wealth which he had so much trouble in gaining, and after having committed many sins, he will, under the burden of his Karman, and believing only in the visible world, be grieved in the hour of death like the ram at the arrival of a guest.

10 Then the sinner who has been killing living beings, at the end of his life falls from his state, and against his will he goes to the world of the Asuras, to the dark place.

11 As a man for the sake of one Kakini (risks and) loses a thousand (Karshapanas), or as the king lost his kingdom (and life) by eating a mango-fruit which he was strictly forbidden (by his physician):

12 Even so are human pleasures compared with the pleasures of the gods: divine life and pleasures surpass (the former) a thousand times and more.

13 Those endowed with excellent knowledge live many nayutas* of years; so great a loss suffer the fools in a life of less than a hundred years!

[* A nayuta or nyuta is equal to 49,786,136,000,000,000,000,000,000,000.]

It is derived in the following way:

1 purvanga = 8,400,000

1 purva = 8,400,000 purvangas.

1 nayutanga = 8,400,000 purvas.

1 nayuta = 8,400,000 nayutangas.]

14, 15 Three merchants set out on their travels, each with his capital; one of them gained there much, the second returned with his capital, and the third merchant came home after having lost his capital. This parable [This parable closely corresponds to Matthew 25:14, Luke 19:11.] is taken from common life; learn (to apply it) to the Law.

16 The capital is human life, the gain is heaven; through the loss of that capital man must be born as a denizen of hell or a brute animal.

17 These are the two courses open to the sinner; they consist in misery, as corporal punishment, etc.; for the slave to his lusts has forfeited human life and divine life.

18 Having once forfeited them, he will have to endure these two states of misery; it will be difficult for him to attain an upward course [i.e. birth as a man or a god.] for a long time to come.

19 Considering what is at stake, one should weigh (the chances of) the sinner and of the virtuous man (in one's mind). He who brings back his capital, is (to be compared to) one who is born again as a man.

20 Those men who through the exercise of various virtues become pious householders, will be born again as men; for all beings will reap the fruit of their actions.

21 But he who increases his capital, is (to be compared to) one who practises eminent virtues; the virtuous, excellent man cheerfully attains the state of gods.

22 When one thus knows that a (virtuous) monk or householder will be gladdened (by his gain), how, then, should a man, whilst he is losing (his chance), not be conscious of his losing it?

23 As a drop of water at the top of a blade of Kusa-grass dwindles down to naught when compared with the ocean, so do human pleasures when compared with divine pleasures.

24 The pleasures in this very limited life of men are like (the water at) the top of a blade of Kusa-grass; for the sake of what will a man not care to gain and to keep (so precious a good which he risks to lose)?

25 He who has not renounced pleasure, will miss his aim (i.e. the true end of his soul); for though he has been taught the right way, he will go astray again and again.

26 But he who has renounced pleasure, will not miss his aim; (he will think): I have learned that, by getting rid of this vile body, I shall become a god.

27 He will be born among men where there is wealth, beauty, glory, fame, long life, and eminent happiness.

28 See the folly of the sinner who practises unrighteousness: turning away from the Law, the great sinner will be born in hell.

29 See the wisdom of the wise man who follows the true Law: turning away from unrighteousness, the virtuous man will be born as a god.

30 A wise man weighs in his mind the state of the sinner and that of the virtuous man; quitting the state of the sinner, a sage realises that of the virtuous.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 8TH LECTURE. KAPILA'S VERSES*.

[* This lecture is ascribed to Kapila. According to an old story, told in the commentary, he was the son of Kasyapa, a Brahman p. 32 of Kausambi, and his wife Yasa. When Kasyapa died, his place was given to another man. His wife then sent her boy to Sravasti to study under Indradatta, a friend of his father's. That man was willing to instruct the boy, and procured him board and lodging in a rich merchant's house. Kapila, however, soon fell in love with the servant-girl who was appointed to his service. Once, at a festival kept by her caste, the girl in tears told him that she could not take part in the festivity as she had no money to buy ornaments. To get some she asked him to go to Dhana, a merchant, who used to give two pieces of gold to the man who saluted him first in the morning. Accordingly Kapila set out in the night, but was taken up by the police and brought before the king, Prasenagit. The student made a clear breast before the king, who was so pleased with him that he promised to give him whatever he should ask. Kapila went in the garden to consider what he should ask; and the more he thought about it, the more he raised the sum which he believed he wanted, till it came to be ten thousand millions. But then, all of a sudden, the light came upon him; he began to repent of the sinful life he had led up to that time, and tearing out his hair he became a Svayamsambuddha. Returning to the king, he pronounced verse 17: The more you get, etc., and giving him the Dharmalabha, he went his way. He practised austerities and acquired superior knowledge, by dint of which he came to know that in a wood, eighteen leagues from Ragagriha, lived a gang of five hundred robbers, under a chief Balabhadra. These men, he knew, would become converts to the right faith; accordingly he went to the wood where they lived. He was made prisoner, and brought before the leader of the robbers. To have some fun out of him they ordered him to dance, and on his objecting that there was none to play up, they all clapped their hands to beat the time. He then sang the first stanza of this lecture, by which some robbers were converted, and he continued to sing, repeating this stanza after each following verse (as dhruva), till at last all the robbers were converted.]

1 By what acts can I escape a sorrowful lot in this unstable ineternal Samsara, which is full of misery?

2 Quitting your former connections place your affection on nothing; a monk who loves not even those who love him, will be freed from sin and hatred.

3 Then the best of sages, who is exempt from delusion and possesses perfect knowledge and faith, speaks for the benefit and eternal welfare, and for the final liberation of all beings.

4 All fetters (of the soul), and all hatred, everything of this kind, should a monk cast aside; he should not be attached to any pleasures, examining them well and taking care of himself.

5 A stupid, ignorant sinner who never fixes his thoughts on the soul's benefit and eternal welfare, but sinks down through hatred and the temptation of lust, will be ensnared as a fly is caught on glue.

6 It is difficult to cast aside the pleasures of life, weak men will not easily give them up; but there are pious ascetics (sadhu) who get over the impassable (Samsara) as merchants cross the sea.

7 Some there are who call themselves Sramanas, though they are like the beasts ignorant of (the prohibition of) killing living beings; the stupid sinners go to hell through their superstitious beliefs.

8 One should not permit (or consent to) the killing of living beings; then he will perhaps be delivered from all misery; thus have spoken the preceptors who have proclaimed the Law of ascetics.

9 A careful man who does not injure living beings, is called 'circumspect' (samita). The sinful Karman will quit him as water quits raised ground.

10 In thoughts, words, and acts he should do nothing injurious to beings who people the world, whether they move or not.

11 He should know what alms may be accepted, and should strictly keep these rules; a monk should beg food only for the sustenance of life, and should not be dainty.

12 He should eat what tastes badly, cold food, old beans, Vakkasa Pulaga, and for the sustenance of his life he should eat Manghu (ground badara).

13 Those who interpret the marks of the body, and dreams, and who know the foreboding changes in the body (angavidya), are not to be called Sramanas; thus the preceptors have declared.

14 Those who do not take their life under discipline, who cease from meditation and ascetic practices, and who are desirous of pleasures, amusements, and good fare, will be born again as Asuras.

15 And when they rise (in another birth) from the world of the Asuras, they err about, for a long time, in the Samsara; those whose souls are sullied by many sins, will hardly ever attain Bodhi.

16 And if somebody should give the whole earth to one man, he would not have enough; so difficult is it to satisfy anybody.

17 The more you get, the more you want; your desires increase with your means. Though two mashes would do to supply your want, still you would scarcely think ten millions sufficient.

18 Do not desire (women), those female demons I, on whose breasts grow two lumps of flesh, who continually change their mind, who entice men, and then make a sport of them as of slaves.

19 A houseless (monk) should not desire women, he should turn away from females; learning thoroughly the Law, a monk should strictly keep its rules.

20 This Law has been taught by Kapila of pure knowledge; those who follow it, will be saved and will gain both worlds.

Thus I say.

THE GRAND BIBLE

UTTARADHYAYANA 9TH LECTURE. THE PRAVRAGYA OF KING NAMI*.

[* The Life of king Nami and his Bodhi is told in the commentary. The Prakrit text of this romance is printed in my 'Ausgewählte Erzählungen in Maharashtra,' Leipzig, 1886, p. 41 ff. Nami is one of the four simultaneous Pratyekabuddhas, i.e. one of those saints who reach the highest stage of knowledge by an effort of their own, not through regular instruction and religious discipline. The Pratyekabuddhas or Svayamsambuddhas (Sahasambuddha in Prakrit) do not, however, propagate the true Law, as the Tirthakaras do. As the legend of Nami is not materially connected with our text, I need not give an abstract of it here.]

1 After (Nami) had descended from the world of the gods, and had been born as a man, he put an end to the influence of delusion, and remembered his former birth.

2 Remembering his former birth, king Nami became a Svayamsambuddha in the true Law, and placing his son on the throne he retired from the world.

3 After having enjoyed, in the company of the beautiful ladies of his seraglio, excellent pleasures which match those of the heavens, king Nami became enlightened and gave up his pleasures.

4 Having given up the town and country of Mithila, his army, seraglio, and all his retinue, the venerable man retired from the world and resorted to a lonely place.

5 When the royal Seer Nami retired from the world, at the occasion of his Pravragya there was an uproar in Mithila.

6 To the royal Seer who had reached the excellent stage of Pravragya, Sakra in the guise of a Brahmana addressed the following words:

7 'Why is now Mithila full of uproar? Dreadful noises are heard from palaces and houses.'

8 On hearing this, the royal Seer Nami, pursuing his reasons and arguments, answered the king of the gods thus:

9 'In Mithila is the sacred tree Manorama, full of leaves, flowers, and fruits, which sheds a cool shadow; this tree is always a favourite resort of many (birds).'

10 'Now, as this sacred tree Manorama is shaken by the storm, the birds, suffering, destitute of refuge, and miserable, scream aloud.'

11 On hearing this, the king of gods, pursuing his reasons and arguments, answered the royal Seer Nami thus:

12 'This is fire and storm, your palace is on fire! Reverend sir, why do you not look after your seraglio?'

13 Nami answered (see verse 8):

14 'Happy are we, happy live we who call nothing our own; when Mithila is on fire, nothing is burned that belongs to me.'

15 To a monk who has left his sons and wives, and who has ceased to act, nothing pleasant can occur, nor anything unpleasant.

16 'There is much happiness for the sage, for the houseless monk, who is free from all ties, and knows himself to be single and unconnected (with the rest of the world).'

17 Indra answered (see verse 11):

18 'Erect a wall, gates, and battlements; dig a moat; construct satagnhis: then you will be a Kshatriya.'

19 Nami answered (see verse 8):

20-22 'Making Faith his fortress, Penance and Self-control the bolt (of its gate), Patience its strong wall, so that guarded in three ways it is impregnable; making Zeal his bow, its string Carefulness in walking (iriyā), and its top (where the string is fastened) Content, he should bend (this bow) with Truth, piercing with the arrow, Penance, (the foe's) mail, Karman--(in this way) a sage will be the victor in battle and get rid of the Samsara.'

23 Indra answered (see verse 11):

24 'Build palaces, excellent houses, and turrets; thus you will be a Kshatriya.'

25 Nami answered (see verse 8):

26 'He who builds his house on the road, will certainly get into trouble; wherever he wants to go, there he may take up his lodgings.'

27 Indra answered (see verse 11):

28 'Punishing thieves and robbers, cut-purses and burglars, you should establish public safety; thus you will be a Kshatriya.'

29 Nami answered (see verse 8):

30 'Men frequently apply punishment wrongly: the innocent are put in prison, and the perpetrator of the crime is set at liberty.'

31 Indra answered (see verse 11):

32 'O King, bring into subjection all princes who do not acknowledge you; thus you will be a true Kshatriya.'

33 Nami answered (see verse 8):

34 'Though a man should conquer thousands and thousands of valiant (foes), greater will be his victory if he conquers nobody but himself.'

35 'Fight with your Self; why fight with external foes? He who conquers himself through himself, will obtain happiness.'

36 'The five senses, anger, pride, delusion, and greed--difficult to conquer is one's self; but when that is conquered, everything is conquered.'

37 Indra answered (see verse 11):

38 'Offer great sacrifices, feed Sramanas and Brahmanas, give alms, enjoy yourself, and offer sacrifices: thus you will be a true Kshatriya.'

39 Nami answered:

40 'Though a man should give, every month, thousands and thousands of cows, better will be he who controls himself, though he give no alms.'

41 Indra answered:

42 'You have left the dreadful asrama (that of the householder) and are wanting to enter another; (remain what you were), O King, and be content with observing the Posahadays.'

43 Nami answered:

44 'If an ignorant man should eat but a blade of Kusa-grass every month, (the merit of his penance) will not equal the sixteenth part of his who possesses the Law as it has been taught.'

45 Indra answered:

46 'Multiply your gold and silver, your jewels and pearls, your copper, fine robes, and carriages, and your treasury; then you will be a true Kshatriya.'

47 Nami answered:

48 'If there were numberless mountains of gold and silver, as big as Kailasa, they would not satisfy a greedy man; for his avidity is boundless like space.'

49 'Knowing that the earth with its crops of rice and barley, with its gold and cattle, that all this put together will not satisfy one single man, one should practise austerities.'

50 Indra answered:

51 'A miracle! O king, you give up those wonderful pleasures, in search of imaginary objects; your very hope will cause your ruin.'

52 Nami answered:

53 'Pleasures are the thorn that rankles, pleasures are poison, pleasures are like a venomous snake; he who is desirous of pleasures will not get them, and will come to a bad end at last.'

54 'He will sink through anger; he will go down through pride; delusion will block up his path; through greed he will incur dangers in both worlds.'

55 Throwing off the guise of a Brahmana, and making visible his true form, Sakra saluted him respectfully and praised him with these sweet words:

56 'Bravo! you have conquered anger; bravo! you have vanquished pride; bravo! you have banished delusion; bravo! you have subdued greed.'

57 'Bravo for your simplicity, O saint! bravo for your humility, O saint! bravo for your perfect patience! bravo for your perfect liberation!'

58 'Here (on earth) you are the highest man, Reverend sir, and hereafter you will be the highest; exempt from all blemishes you will reach Perfection, a higher state than which there is none in this world.'

59 Thus praising the royal Seer, Sakra in perfect faith kept his right side towards him and paid reverence to him, again and again.

60 After having adored the best sage's feet marked by the Kakra and the Ankusa, he flew up through the air, with his crown and his earrings prettily trembling.

61 Nami humbled himself; enjoined by Sakra in person, the king of Videha left the house, and took upon him Sramanahood.

62 Thus act the enlightened, the wise, the clever ones; they turn away from pleasures, as did Nami, the royal Seer.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 10TH LECTURE.

THE LEAF OF THE TREE.

1 As the fallow leaf of the tree falls to the ground, when its days are gone, even so the life of men (will come to its close); Gautama, be careful all the while!

2 As a dew-drop dangling on the top of a blade of Kusa-grass lasts but a short time, even so the life of men; Gautama, be careful all the while!

3 As life is so fleet and existence so precarious, wipe off the sins you ever committed; Gautama, etc.

4 A rare chance, in the long course of time, is human birth for a living being; hard are the consequences of actions; Gautama, etc.

5 When the soul has once got into an earth-body, it may remain in the same state as long as an Asamkhyā; Gautama, etc.

6 When the soul has once got into a water-body, etc. (all as in verse 5).

7 When a soul has once got into a fire-body, etc. (all as in verse 5).

8 When the soul has once got into a wind-body, etc. (all as in verse 5).

9 When the soul has once got into a vegetable-body, it remains long in that state, for an endless time, after which its lot is not much bettered; Gautama, etc.

10 When the soul has once got into a body of a Dvindrīya (i.e. a being possessing two organs of sense), it may remain in the same state as long as a period called samkhyeya; Gautama, etc.

11 When the soul has once got into a body of a Trindrīya (i.e. a being possessing three organs of sense), it, etc. (all as in verse 10).

12 When the soul has once got into a body of a Katurindrīya (i.e. a being possessing four organs of sense), it, etc. (all as in verse 10).

13 When the soul has once got into a body of a Pankendrīya (i.e. a being possessing five organs of sense), it may remain in the same state as long as seven or eight births; Gautama, etc.

14 When the soul has once got into the body of a god or of a denizen of hell, it may remain in that state one whole life; Gautama, etc.

15 Thus the soul which suffers for its carelessness, is driven about in the Samsara by its good and bad Karman; Gautama, etc.

16 Though one be born as a man, it is a rare chance to become an Arya; for many are the Dasyus and Mlekkhas; Gautama, etc.

17 Though one be born as an Arya, it is a rare chance to possess all five organs of sense; for we see many who lack one organ or other; Gautama, etc.

18 Though he may possess all five organs of sense, still it is a rare chance to be instructed in the best Law; for people follow heretical teachers; Gautama, etc.

19 Though he may have been instructed in the right Law, still it is a rare chance to believe in it; for many people are heretics; Gautama, etc.

20 Though one believe in the Law, he will rarely practise it; for people are engrossed by pleasures; Gautama, etc.

21 When your body grows old, and your hair turns white, the power of your ears decreases; Gautama, etc.

22 When your body grows old, and your hair turns white, the power of your eyes decreases; Gautama, etc.

23 When your body grows old, and your hair turns white, the power of your nose decreases.

24 When your body grows old, and your hair turns white, the power of your tongue decreases.

25 When your body grows old, and your hair turns white, the power of your touch decreases.

26 When your body grows old, and your hair turns white, all your powers decrease.

27 Despondency, the king's evil, cholera, mortal diseases of many kinds befall you; your body wastes and decays; Gautama, etc.

28 Cast aside from you all attachments, as the (leaves of) a lotus let drop off the autumnal water, exempt from every attachment, Gautama, be careful all the while!

29 Give up your wealth and your wife; you have entered the state of the houseless; do not, as it were, return to your vomit; Gautama, etc.

30 Leave your friends and relations, the large fortune you have amassed; do not desire them a second time; Gautama, etc.

31 There is now no Gina 1, but there is a highly esteemed guide to show the way; now being on the right path, Gautama, be careful all the while!

32 Now you have entered on the path from which the thorns have been cleared, the great path; walk in the right path; Gautama, etc.

33 Do not get into an uneven road like a weak burden-bearer; for you will repent of it afterwards; Gautama, etc.

34 You have crossed the great ocean; why do you halt so near the shore? make haste to get on the other side; Gautama, etc.

35 Going through the same religious practices as perfected saints, you will reach the world of perfection, Gautama, where there is safety and perfect happiness; Gautama, etc.

36 The enlightened [Buddha.] and liberated monk should control himself, whether he be in a village or a town, and he should preach to all the road of peace; Gautama, etc.

37 Having heard the Buddha's* well-delivered sermon, adorned by illustrations, Gautama cut off love and hatred and reached perfection.

Thus I say.

[* Here the word "buddha" is used as a title; but its use is very restricted, scarcely going beyond that of a common epithet. This is just what we otherwise should have to assume in order to explain the use by the Baudhdas of that word to denote the founder of their sect. In the Sutrakritanga 2, 6, 28 Buddha, in the plural, actually denotes the prophets of the Buddhists.]

UTTARADHYAYANA 11TH LECTURE.

THE VERY LEARNED.

1 I shall explain, in due order, the right discipline of a houseless monk who has got rid of all worldly ties. Listen to me.

2 He who is ignorant of the truth, egoistical, greedy, without self-discipline, and who talks loosely, is called ill-behaved and void of learning.

3 There are five causes which render wholesome discipline impossible: egoism, delusion, carelessness, illness, and idleness:

4, 5 For eight causes discipline is called virtue, viz.: not to be fond of mirth, to control one's self, not to speak evil of others, not to be without discipline, not to be of wrong discipline, not to be covetous, not to be choleric, to love the truth; for their influence discipline is called virtue.

6 A monk who is liable to the following fourteen charges, is called ill-behaved, and does not reach Nirvana:

7-9 If he is frequently angry; if he perseveres in his wrath; if he spurns friendly advice; if he is proud of his learning; if he finds fault with others; if he is angry even with friends; if he speaks evil even of a good friend behind his back; if he is positive in his assertions; if he is malicious, egoistical, greedy, without self-discipline; if he does not share with others; if he is always unkind; then he is called ill-behaved.

10-13 But for the following fifteen good qualities he is called well-behaved: if he is always humble, steady, free from deceit and curiosity; if he abuses nobody; if he does not persevere in his wrath; if he listens to friendly advice; if he is not proud of his learning; if he does not find fault with others; if he is not angry with friends; if he speaks well even of a bad friend behind his back; if he abstains from quarrels and rows; if he is enlightened, polite, decent, and quiet: then he is called well-behaved.

14 He who always acknowledges his allegiance to his teacher, who has religious zeal and ardour for study, who is kind in words and actions, deserves to be instructed.

As water put into a shell shines with a doubled brilliancy, so do the piety, fame, and knowledge of a very learned monk. (15)

16 As a trained Kamboga-steed, whom no noise frightens, exceeds all other horses in speed, so a very learned monk is superior to all others.

17 As a valiant hero bestriding a trained horse, with heralds singing out to his right and left, (has no equal), neither has a very learned monk.

18 As a strong and irresistible elephant of sixty years, surrounded by his females, (has no equal), neither has a very learned monk.

19 As a sharp-horned, strong-necked bullock, the leader of the herd, is a fine sight, so is a very learned monk.

20 As a proud lion with sharp fangs, who brooks no assault, is superior to all animals, so is a very learned monk (superior to all men).

21 As Vasudeva, the god with the conch, discus, and club, who fights with an irresistible strength, (has no equal), neither has a very learned monk.

22 As a universal monarch with his fourfold army and great power, the possessor of the fourteen attributes of a king, (has no equal), neither has a very learned monk.

23 As Sakra the thousand-eyed, the wielder of the thunderbolt, the fortress-destroyer, the king of gods, (has no equal), neither has a very learned monk.

24 As the rising sun, the dispeller of darkness, who burns as it were with light, (has no equal), neither has a very learned monk.

25 As the moon, the queen of the stars, surrounded by the asterisms, when she is full at full-moon, (has no equal), neither has a very learned monk.

26 As a well-guarded storehouse of merchants, which is filled with grain of many kinds, (has no equal), neither has a very learned monk.

27 As the best of Gambu trees, called Sudarsana, which is the abode of the presiding deity, (has no equal), neither has a very learned monk.

28 As the best of rivers, the ocean-flowing stream Sita 1 with its dark waters, (has no equal), neither has a very learned monk.

29 As the best of hills, high mount Mandara, on which various plants shed a bright lustre, (has no equal), neither has a very learned monk.

30 As the ocean of inexhaustible water, the delight of Svayambhu [This epithet apparently refers to Vishnu's sleeping on the ocean.], which is full of precious things of many kinds, (has no equal), neither has a very learned monk.

31 Monks who equal the ocean in depth, who are difficult to overcome, are frightened by nobody (or nothing), and are not easily assailed, who are full of extensive learning and take care of themselves, will go to the highest place, after their Karman has been annihilated.

32 Therefore, seeker after the highest truth, study the sacred lore, in order to cause yourself and others to attain perfection.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 12TH LECTURE HARIKESA*.

[* The commentators relate a legend of the principal figure in the following lecture. We may skip his former births and begin with his last. Near the Ganges lived Balakoshta, chief of a Kandala tribe, called Harikesa (the yellow-haired). With his wife Gauri he had a son Bala, who in the course of time became a Jaina monk and a great Rishi. On his wanderings he once stayed in the Tinduga-grove near Benares, the presiding deity of which, a Yaksha, became his most fervent follower.

One day Bhadra, king Kausalika's daughter, came to the Yaksha's shrine and paid homage to the idol. But seeing the dirty monk, she did not conceal her aversion. The Yaksha, however, to punish her for her want of respect for the holy man, possessed her. As no physician or conjurer could cure her madness, the Yaksha, by whom she was possessed, said she would recover only if she were offered as bride to Bala, the monk. The king agreeing, Bhadra became sound as before and went to the monk to choose him for her husband. Bala of course refused her. She was then married by the king to his Purohita, Rudradeva, whose sacrifice-enclosure is the scene of the occurrences related in the Twelfth Lecture.]

1 Harikesa-Bala was born in a family of Svapakas (Kandalas); he became a monk and a sage, possessed of the highest virtues, who had subdued his senses.

2 He observed the rules with regard to walking, begging, speaking, easing nature, and receiving and keeping (of things necessary for a monk) controlled himself, and was always attentive (to his duty).

3 He protected from sin his thoughts, speech, and body, and subdued his senses. Once on his begging tour, he approached the enclosure of a Brahmanical sacrifice.

4 When (the priests) saw him coming up, emaciated by austerities, in a miserable condition, and with the poorest outfit, they laughed at him, the ruffians.

5 Stuck up by pride of birth, those killers of animals, who did not subdue their senses, the unchaste sinners, made the following speech:

6 'Who is that dandy coming there? he is swarthy, dreadful, with a turned-up nose, miserably clad, a very devil 1 of a dirty man, with a filthy cloth put on his neck?

7 'Who are you, you monster? or for what purpose have you come here? you miserably clad devil of a dirty man! go, get away! why stand you there?'

8 At this turn the Yaksha, who lived in the Tinduka-tree, had compassion on the great sage, and making his own body invisible spoke the following words:

9 'I am a chaste Sramana, controlling myself; I have no property, nothing belonging to me, and do not cook my food; I have come for food which is dressed for somebody else at the time when I call.

10 'You give away, eat, and consume plenty of food; know that I subsist by begging; let the mendicant get what is left of the rest.'

11 'The dinner has been prepared for Brahmanas, it has been got ready especially for ourselves and for us exclusively; we shall not give you such food and drink; why stand you there?'

12 'The husbandmen throw the corn on high ground and on low ground 1, hoping (for a return). For the like motive give unto me; I may be the field which may produce merit (as the return for your benevolence).'

13 'All the world knows that we are (as it were) the field on which gifts sown grow up as merit; Brahmanas of pure birth and knowledge are the blessed fields.'

14 'Those who are full of anger and pride, who kill, lie, steal, and own property, are Brahmanas without pure birth and knowledge; they are very bad fields.'

15 'You are only the bearer of words as it were, you do not understand their meaning, though you have learned the Vedas. The saints call at high and lowly (houses); they are the blessed fields.'

16 'Detractor of the learned doctors, how dare you speak thus in our presence! This food and drink should rather rot, than we should give it you, Nirgrantha.'

17 'If you do not give me what I ask for, I who observe the Samitis, who am protected by the Gupitis, who subdue my senses, what benefit, then, will you gain by your sacrifices?'

18 'Are here no Kshatriyas, no priests who tend the fire, no teachers with their disciples, who will beat him with a stick, or pelt him with a nut, take him by the neck, and drive him off?'

19 On these words of the teachers, many young fellows rushed forward, and they all beat the sage with sticks, canes, and whips.

20 At that turn king Kausalika's daughter, Bhadra, of faultless body, saw that the monk was beaten, and appeased the angry youngsters.

21 'He is the very man to whom the king, impelled by the devil (who possessed me), had given me, but who would not think of me; he is the sage whom princes and gods adore, who has refused me.'

22 'He is that austere ascetic, of noble nature, who subdues his senses and controls himself; the chaste man, who would not accept me when my own father, king Kausalika, gave me to him.'

23 'He is the man of great fame and might, of awful piety and power; do not injure him who cannot be injured, lest he consume you all by the fire (of his virtue).'

24 When the Yakshas heard these well-spoken words of (the Purohita's) wife Bhadra, they came to the assistance of the sage, and kept the young men off.

25 Appearing in the air with hideous shapes, the Asuras beat the people. When Bhadra saw them with rent bodies spitting blood, she spoke again thus:

26 'You may as well dig rocks with your nails, or eat iron with your teeth, or kick fire with your feet, as treat contemptuously a monk.'

27 'Like a poisonous snake is a great sage of severe austerities, of tremendous piety and power; like a swarm of moths you will rush into a fire, if you beat a monk on his begging tour.'

28 'Prostrate yourself before him for protection, you together with all of them, if you want to save your life and your property; for in his wrath he might reduce the world to ashes.'

29, 30 When the Brahmana saw the disciples bowing their back and head, and holding out their hands, not minding their occupation; with streaming eyes, spitting blood, looking upwards, their eyes and tongues protruding, like as many logs of wood, he became heartbroken and dejected, and together with his wife he appeased the sage: 'Forgive our injury and abuse, sir!'

31 'Forgive, sir, these ignorant, stupid boys, that they injured you; sages are exceedingly gracious, nor are the saints inclined to wrath.'

32 'There is not the least hatred in me, neither now, nor before, nor in future. The Yakshas attend upon me, therefore they have beaten the boys.'

33 'You know the truth and the Law; you are not angry, compassionate sage; we take refuge at your feet, we together with all of them.'

34 'We worship you, mighty sir; there is nothing in you that we do not worship; eat this dish of boiled rice seasoned with many condiments.'

35 'I have got plenty of food; eat it to do us a favour!' The noble (monk) said 'yes,' and took food and drink after having fasted a whole month.

36 At that moment the gods caused a rain of perfumed water and flowers, and showered down heavenly treasures; they struck the drums, and in the air they praised the gift.

37 'The value of penance has become visible, birth appears of no value! Look at the holy Harikesa, the son of a Svapaka, whose power is so great.'

38 'O Brahmanas, why do you tend the fire, and seek external purity by water? The clever ones say that external purity which you seek for, is not the right thing.'

39 'You (use) Kusa-grass, sacrificial poles, straw and wood, you touch water in the evening and in the morning; thereby you injure living beings, and in your ignorance you commit sins again and again.'

40 'How should we sacrifice, O monk, and how avoid sinful actions? Tell us, ascetic, whom the Yakshas hold in honour, what do the clever ones declare to be the right method of sacrificing?'

41 'Doing no injury to living beings of the six orders, abstaining from lying and from taking what is not freely given, renouncing property, women, pride, and deceit, men should live under self-restraint.'

42 'He who is well protected by the five Samvaras and is not attached to this life, who abandons his body, who is pure and does not care for his body, wins the great victory, the best of offerings.'

43 'Where is your fire, your fireplace, your sacrificial ladle? where the dried cowdung (used as fuel)? Without these things, what kind of priests can the monks be? What oblations do you offer to the fire?'

44 'Penance is my fire; life my fireplace; right exertion is my sacrificial ladle; the body the dried cowdung; Karman is my fuel; self-control, right exertion, and tranquillity are the oblations, praised by the sages, which I offer.'

45 'Where is your pond, and where the holy bathing-place? how do you make your ablutions or get rid of impurity? Tell us, O restrained monk whom the Yakshas hold in honour; we desire to learn it from you!'

46 'The Law is my pond, celibacy my holy bathing-place, which is not turbid, and throughout clear for the soul 1; there I make ablutions; pure, clean, and thoroughly cooled I get rid of hatred* (or impurity). [* Dosa, which means hatred (dvesha) and impurity (dosha).]

47 'The clever ones have discovered such bathing, it is the great bath praised by the seers, in which the great seers bathe, and, pure and clean, they obtain the highest place.'

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 13TH LECTURE.
KITRA AND SAMBHUTA*.

[* The stories about Kitra and Sambhuta and the fate they underwent in many births are common to Brahmanas, Jainas, and Buddhists. The whole subject has been exhaustively dealt with by Prof. Leumann in two learned papers in the Wiener Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes, vol. 5, pp. 1 ff., 111 ff., where an analysis of the various documents which relate this legend is given, and the Prakrit text of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Lectures together with a German translation is published. For all details, therefore, the reader is referred to Prof. Leumann's papers.]

1, 2 Being contemptuously treated for the sake of his birth (as a Kandalā) Sambhuta took, in Hastinapura, the sinful resolution (to become a universal monarch in some later birth); descending from the heavenly region Padmagulma, he was born of Kulani in Kampilya as Brahmadata; Kitra, however, was born in the town Purimatala in the great family of a merchant; when he had heard the Law, he entered the order.

3 In the town Kampilya, both Sambhuta and Kitra (as they were called in a former birth) met again and told each other the reward they had realised for their good and bad actions.

4 The universal monarch Brahmadata, the powerful and glorious king, respectfully addressed the following words to him (who had been) his brother (in a former birth):

5 We were brothers once, kind to each other, loving each other, wishing well to each other.

6 'We were slaves in the country of the Dasarnas, then antelopes on mount Kalangara, then geese on the shore of Mritaganga, and Svapakas in the land of Kasi.

7 'And we were gods having great power, in the regions of the gods. This is our sixth birth, in which we are separated from each other.'

8 'Karman is produced by sinful thoughts, and you have entertained them, O king; it is by the influence of this Karman that we were separated.'

9 'I had done actions derived from truth and purity, and now I enjoy their effect; is this also true in your case, Kitra?'

10 'Every good deed will bear its fruit to men; there is no escape from the effect of one's actions. Through riches and the highest pleasures my soul has got the reward for its virtues.

11 'Know, Sambhuta, that you have got the reward of your virtues in the shape of great wealth and prosperity; but know, O King, that is just so with Kitra; he also obtained prosperity and splendour.

12 'A song of deep meaning condensed in words has been repeated in the midst of a crowd of men, (having heard) which monks of piety and virtues exert themselves in this (religion): I have become a Sramana.'

13 'Renowned are my beautiful palaces Ukka, Udaya, Madhu, Karka, and Brahman: this house, full of treasures and containing the finest products of the Pankalas, O Kitra, regard it as your own!

14 'Surround yourself with women who dance, and sing, and make music; enjoy these pleasures, O monk; I deem renunciation a hard thing.'

15 As the virtuous Kitra, for old friendship's sake, loved the king who was attached to sensual pleasures, and as he had to heart his welfare, he spoke to him the following words:

16 'All singing is but prattle, all dancing is but mocking, all ornaments are but a burden, all pleasures produce but pains.

17 'O king, pleasures which the ignorant like, but which produce pains, do not delight pious monks who care not for pleasure, but are intent on the virtues of right conduct.

18 'Excellent king, the lowest caste of men is that of the Svapakas, to which we twice belonged; as such we were loathed by all people, and we lived in the hamlets of Svapakas.

19 'In that miserable birth we lived in the hamlets of Svapakas, detested by all people; then we acquired the Karman (the fruit of which we now enjoy).

20 'You are now a king of great power and prosperity, enjoying the reward of your good actions; put from you the transitory pleasures, and enter the order for the sake of the highest good!

21 'He who in this life has done no good actions and has not practised the Law, repents of it in the next world when he has become a prey to Death.

22 'As a lion takes hold of an antelope, so Death leads off a man in his last hour; neither mother, nor father, nor brother will, at that time, save a particle (of his life).

23 'Neither his kinsmen, nor his friends, nor his sons, nor his relations will share his suffering, he alone has to bear it; for the Karman follows the doer.

24 'Leaving behind bipeds and quadrupeds, his fields, his house, his wealth, his corn, and everything; against his will, and accompanied only by his Karman, he enters a new existence, either a good or a bad one.

25 'When they have burned with fire on the funeral pile his forlorn, helpless corpse, his wife and sons and kinsfolk will choose another man to provide for them.

26 'Life drags on (towards death) continuously; old age carries off the vigour of man. King of the Pankalas, mark my words: do no fearful actions.'

27 'I, too, know just as well as you, O saint, what you have told me in your speech: pleasures will get a hold on men and are not easily abandoned by such as we are, sir.

28 'O Kitra, in Hastinapura I saw the powerful king (Sanatkumara), and I took that sinful resolution in my desire for sensual pleasures.

29 'And since I did not repent of it, this has come of it, that I still long for sensual pleasures, though I know the Law.

30 'As an elephant, sinking down in a quagmire, sees the raised ground but does not get to the shore, so do we who long for sensual pleasures, not follow the path of monks.

31 'Time elapses and quickly pass the days; the pleasures of men are not permanent; they come to a man and leave him just as a bird leaves a tree void of fruit.'

32 'If you are unable to abandon pleasure, then do noble actions, O king; following the Law, have compassion on all creatures: then you will become a god on entering a new existence.

33 'If you have no intention of abandoning pleasure, and still long for undertakings and property, my long talk has been to no purpose. I go, king, farewell.'

34 'And Brahmadata, king of the Pankalas, did not act on the counsel of the saint; he enjoyed the highest pleasure, and (afterwards) sank into the deepest hell.

35 'But Kitra the great sage, of excellent conduct and penance, was indifferent to pleasure; after he had practised the highest self-control, he reached the highest place of perfection.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 14TH LECTURE. ISHUKARA.

1 Having been gods in a former existence and lived in the same heavenly region, some were born (here below) in the ancient, wealthy, and famous town called Ishukara [In Prakrit Usuyara (or Isuyara). According to the Prakrit legend given in the commentary it was in the Kuru country.], which is beautiful like heaven.

2 By a remnant of the merit they had acquired in their former life, they were born in noble families. Disgusted with the world and afraid of the Samsara, they abandoned (pleasures, etc.) and took refuge in the path of the Ginās.

3 Two males remained bachelors, (the third became) the Purohita (Bhriḡu), (the fourth) his wife Yasa, (the fifth) the widely-famed king Ishukara, and (the sixth) his wife Kamalavati.

4 Overcome by fear of birth, old age, and death, their mind intent on pilgrimage, and hoping to escape the Wheel of Births, they examined pleasures and abandoned them.

5 Both dear sons of the Brahmanical Purohita, who was intent on works, remembered their former birth, and the penance and self-control they had then practised.

6 Averse to human and heavenly pleasures, desiring liberation, and full of faith, they went to their father and spoke thus:

7 'Seeing that the lot of man is transitory and precarious, and that his life lasts not long, we take no delight in domestic life; we bid you farewell: we shall turn monks.'

8 In order to dissuade them from a life of austerities, the father replied to those (would-be) monks: 'Those versed in the Vedas say that there will be no better world for men without sons.

9 'My sons, after you have studied the Vedas, and fed the priests, after you have placed your own sons at the head of your house, and after you have enjoyed life together with your wives, then you may depart to the woods as praiseworthy sages.'

10, 11 The young men perceiving that the Purohita was wholly consumed, as it were, by the fire of grief, which was fed by his individual inclinations and blown into a huge flame by the wind of delusion; that he suffered much and talked a great deal in many ways; that he tried to persuade them by degrees, and that he would even bribe them with money and with objects of desire, (spoke) these words:

12 'The study of the Vedas will not save you; the feeding of Brahmanas will lead you from darkness to darkness, and the birth of sons will not save you. Who will assent to what you said?'

13 'Pleasures bring only a moment's happiness, but suffering for a very long time, intense suffering, but slight happiness; they are an obstacle to the liberation from existence, and are a very mine of evils.

14 'While a man walks about without abandoning pleasures, and grieves day and night, while he is anxious about other people, and seeks for wealth, he comes to old age and death.

15 'I have this, and I have not that; I must do this, and I should not do that! While he talks in this strain, the robbers (viz. time) drag him away. What foolishness is this!'

16 'Great wealth and women, a family and exquisite pleasures: for such things people practise austerities. All this you may have for your asking.'

17 'What avail riches for the practice of religion, what a family, what pleasures? We shall become Sramanas, possessed of many virtues, and wander about collecting alms.'

18 'As fire is produced in the Arani-wood, as butter in milk, and oil in sesamum seed, so, my sons, is the soul I produced in the body; (all these things) did not exist before, they came into existence, and then they perish; but they are not permanent.'

19 '(The soul) cannot be apprehended by the senses, because it possesses no corporeal form, and since it possesses no corporeal form it is eternal. The fetter of the soul has been ascertained to be caused by its bad qualities, and this fetter is called the cause of worldly existence.

20 'Thus being ignorant of the Law, we formerly did sinful actions, and through our wrong-mindedness we were kept back and retained (from entering the order). We shall not again act in the same way.

21 'As mankind is harassed (by the one), and taken hold of (by the other), and as the unfulfilling ones go by, we take no delight in the life of a householder.'

22 'Who harasses the world? who takes hold of it? whom do you call unfulfilling? My sons, I am anxious to learn this.'

23 'Mankind is harassed by Death; it is taken hold of by Old Age; the days are called unfulfilling: know this, Father!

24 'The day that goes by will never return; the days elapse without profit to him who acts contrary to the Law.

25 'The day that goes by will never return; the days elapse with much profit to him who acts up to the Law.'

26 'Having lived together in one place, and both parties having acquired righteousness, we shall, O my sons, afterwards go forth (as monks) and beg alms from house to house.'

27 'He who can call Death his friend, or who can escape him, or who knows that he will not die, might perhaps decide: this shall be done tomorrow.

28 'We will even now adopt the Law, after the adoption of which we shall not be born again. The future has nothing in store for us (which we have not experienced already). Faith will enable us to put aside attachment.'

29 (Bhriḡu speaks to his wife Vasishthi.) 'Domestic life ceases (to have attraction) for one who has lost his sons; Vasishthi, the time has arrived for me to turn mendicant friar. As long as a tree retains its branches, it is really a tree; when they are lopped off, it is called a trunk.

30 'As a bird without its wings, as a king in battle without his followers, as a merchant on a boat without his goods, even so am I without my sons.'

31 'You have brought together all these objects of desire, and have collected many exquisitely pleasant things. Let us, therefore, fully enjoy the pleasures; afterwards we shall go forth on the road of salvation.'

32 'We have finished enjoying pleasures, my dear; our life is drawing to its close. I do not abandon pleasures for the sake of an unholy life; but looking with indifference on gain and loss, on happiness and suffering, I shall lead the life of a monk.'

33 'May you not remember your brothers (when it is too late) like an old goose swimming against the current. Enjoy the pleasures together with me. A mendicant's life is misery.'

34 'My dear, as a snake casts off the slough of its body and goes along free and easy, even so have my sons abandoned pleasure. Why should I, being left alone, not follow them?'

35 'As the fish Rohita [Cyprinus Rohita.] breaks through a weak net, even so wise men of exemplary character and famous for their austerities abandon pleasure and live as mendicants.

36 'As the herons fly through the air and the geese too, who had rent the net, even so my sons and my husband depart. Why should I, being left alone, not follow them?'

37 When the queen had heard that the Purohita with his wife and sons had entered the order, abandoning pleasures and all his large property, she spoke to the king:

38 'A man who returns, as it were, to the vomit, is not praised; but you want to confiscate 1 the property left by the Brahmana.

39 'If the whole world and all treasures were yours, you would still not be satisfied, nor would all this be able to save you.

40 'Whenever you die, O king, and leave all pleasant things behind, the Law alone, and nothing else in this world, will save you, O monarch.

41 'As a bird dislikes the cage, so do I (dislike the world). I shall live as a nun, without offspring, poor, upright, without desire, without love of gain, and without hatred.

42, 43 'As when by a conflagration of a forest animals are burned, other beasts greatly rejoice, being under the influence of love and hate; even so we, fools that we are, being attached to pleasure, do not perceive that the world is consumed by the fire of love and hatred.

44 'Those who have enjoyed pleasures, and have renounced them, move about like the wind, and go wherever they please, like the birds unchecked in their flight.

45 'When they are caught, and held by my hand, sir, they struggle; we shall be like them, if we are attached to pleasures.

46 'As an unbaited (bird) I see a baited one caught in the snare, even so shall we avoid every bait and walk about, not baited by anything.'

47 'Being aware that pleasures are causes for the continuance of worldly existence, as illustrated in (the above) similes of the greedy man, one should be cautious and stir as little as possible, like a snake in the presence of Suparna.

48 'Like an elephant who has broken his fetters, go to your proper destination. O great king Ishukari; this is the wholesome truth I have learned.

49, 50 'Leave your large kingdom and the pleasures which are so dear to all; abandon what pleases the senses, and what attracts; be without attachment and property; learn thoroughly the Law and give up all amusements; then practise famous and severe penance, being of firm energy.'

THE GRAND BIBLE

51 In this way all (these) professors of the Law gradually obtained enlightenment, being frightened by birth and death, and seeking for the end of misery.

52 Their doubts about the true doctrine were dispersed, and they realised the Bhavanas; in a short time they reached the end of misery.

53 The king and the queen, the Brahmanical Purohita, his wife, and his sons, they all reached perfection.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 15TH LECTURE. THE TRUE MONK.

1 He who adopts the Law in the intention to live as a monk, should live in company (with other monks), upright, and free from desire; he should abandon his former connections, and not longing for pleasures, he should wander about as an unknown beggar: then he is a true monk.

2 Free from love he should live, a model of righteousness, abstaining from sins, versed in the sacred lore, protecting his soul (from every wrong), wise, hardy, observing everything; he who is attached to nothing, is a true monk.

3 Ignorant of abuse and injury, a steadfast monk should be a model of righteousness, always protecting his soul (from sins), neither rash nor passionate; when he endures everything, then he is a true monk.

4 He who is content with lowly beds and lodgings, bears heat and cold, flies and gnats, is neither rash nor passionate, and endures everything, he is a true monk.

5 He does not expect respectful treatment, nor hospitality, nor reverence, nor, indeed, praises; he controls himself, keeps the vows, practises austerities, lives together with other monks, meditates on his soul; this is a true monk.

6 If he does not care for his life, or abandons every delusion, if he avoids men and women, always practises austerities, and does not betray any curiosity, then he is a true monk.

7 He who does not profess and live on divination from cuts and shreds, from sounds on the earth or in the air, from dreams, from diagrams, sticks, and properties of buildings, from changes in the body, from the meaning of the cries (of animals)--he is a true monk.

8 Spells, roots, every kind of medical treatment, emetics, purgatives, fumigation, anointing of the eye, and bathing, the patient's lamentation, and his consolation--he who abstains from all these things, is a true monk.

9 He who does not praise, or pay attention to, the warriors, Ugras, princes, Brahmanas, Bhogas, and artists of all sorts, who abstains from this, he is a true monk.

10 He who does not, for earthly gain, improve his acquaintance with householders, with whom he fell in as a monk, or was in friendly relation before that time, he is a true monk.

11 A Nirgrantha is forbidden to take from householders, if they do not give it themselves, bed, lodging, drink, food, or any dainties and spices; he who is not angry at such occasions, he is a true monk.

12 If a monk gets any food and drink, or dainties and spices, and does not feel compassion (on a sick fellow-monk) in thoughts, words, and deeds, (then he is not a true monk); but if he has his thoughts, words, and acts under strict discipline, then he is a true monk.

13 Dish-water, barley-pap, cold sour gruel, water in which barley has been washed: such loathsome food and drink he should not despise, but call at the lowliest houses (for alms); then he is a true monk.

14 There are many voices on the earth, of gods, of men, and of beasts, dreadful, frightful, and awful noises; if he hears them without trembling, then he is a true monk.

15 He who understands all religious disputations, [who lives together with fellow-monks], who practises self-discipline, who meditates on his soul, who is wise, hardy, and observes everything, who is calm, and does not hurt anybody, he is a true monk.

16 He who, not living by any art, without house, without friends, subduing his senses, free from all ties, sinless, and eating but little, leaves the house and lives single, he is a true monk.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 16TH LECTURE. THE TEN CONDITIONS OF PERFECT CHASTITY.

O long-lived (Gambusvamin)! I (Sudharman) have heard the following Discourse from the Venerable (Mahavira):

Here [The word 'here' is explained as meaning 'in this religion of the Jainas.'], indeed, the venerable Sthaviras have declared ten conditions for the realisation of celibacy, by hearing and understanding which the monks will reach a high degree of self-discipline, of Samvara, and of contemplation, will be well protected (by the three Guptis), will guard their senses, guard their chastity, and will thus never be remiss (in the attendance on their religious duties).

What, then, are those ten conditions for the realisation of celibacy as declared by the venerable Sthaviras, by hearing and understanding which the monks will reach a high degree of self-discipline, of Samvara, and of contemplation, will be well protected (by the three Guptis), will guard their senses, guard their chastity, and will thus never be remiss (in the attendance on their religious duties)?

These, then, are the ten conditions for the realisation of celibacy, etc. (all down to) duties.

1. A Nirgrantha may occupy various places for sleep or rest; but a Nirgrantha should not occupy places, for sleep or rest, frequented by women, cattle, or eunuchs. The preceptor has explained the reason for this. If a Nirgrantha occupies places for sleep or rest, frequented by women, cattle, or eunuchs, then, though he be chaste, there may arise a doubt with regard to his chastity, or a sensual desire, or a feeling of remorse, or he will break the rules, or he will become a slave to passion, or he will acquire a dangerous illness of long duration, or he will desert the faith which the Kevalin has proclaimed. Therefore a Nirgrantha should not occupy places, for sleep or rest, frequented by women, cattle, or eunuchs.

2. A Nirgrantha should not converse with women. The preceptor has explained the reason for this. If a Nirgrantha converses with women, etc. (all as above).

3. A Nirgrantha should not sit together with women on the same seat. The preceptor has explained the reason for this. If a Nirgrantha sits on the same seat with women, etc. (all as above).

4. A Nirgrantha should not look at, or contemplate, the charms and beauties of women. (The rest similar as above.)

5. A Nirgrantha should not, behind a screen, or curtain, or wall, listen to the screeching or screaming or singing or laughing or giggling or crying of women. (The rest similar as above.)

6. A Nirgrantha should not recall to his memory the pleasure and amusements which in the past he enjoyed together with women. (The rest similar as above.)

7. A Nirgrantha should not eat well-dressed food. (The rest similar as above.)

8. A Nirgrantha should not eat or drink to excess. (The rest similar as above.)

9. A Nirgrantha should not wear ornaments. The preceptor has explained the reason for this. If he wears ornaments, or adorns his body, he might become an object of desire to women. When he is an object of desire to women, then, etc. (the rest as in).

10. A Nirgrantha should not care for sounds, colours, tastes, smells, and feelings. (The rest similar as above.)

Here are some verses (to the same effect):

1 A monk should take up a detached lodging, free from, and not frequented by women, to preserve his chastity.

2 A chaste monk should avoid talking with women, which delights the mind and foments love and passion.

3 A chaste monk should always avoid the company of, and frequent conversation with women.

4 A chaste monk should avoid observing the body, limbs, and figure of women, their pleasant prattle and oglings.

5 A chaste monk should avoid listening to the screeching, screaming, singing, laughing, giggling, and crying of women.

6 A chaste monk should never recall to his mind how he had laughed and played with women, and had enjoyed them, how they became jealous, and what tricks he played to frighten them.

7 A chaste monk should always avoid well-dressed food and drink which will soon raise his sensuality.

8 A chaste monk should always eat his food, collected according to the rules, for the sustenance of life, in the prescribed quantity, and at the right time; concentrated in his thoughts he should not eat to excess.

9 A chaste monk should abstain from ornaments, he should not adorn his body after the fashion of amorous people.

10 He should always abstain from the five orders of pleasant things: sounds, colours, smells, tastes, and feelings of touch.

11 A lodging frequented by women, their pleasant talk, their company, and looking at their charms;

12 Their screeching, screaming, singing, and laughing, eating and sleeping together with them; well-dressed food and drink, or partaking of them to excess;

13 And ornaments and finery: these pleasant things, which are hard to leave, are like the poison Talaputa, for a man who seeks after the true Self.

14 He should, once for all, abandon pleasant things which are hard to leave; and concentrated in his thoughts he should avoid whatever casts a doubt on his chastity.

15 A monk should be the steadfast charioteer, as it were, of the Law in the park of the Law, a vessel of righteousness, content, restrained, attentive to the duties of a chaste monk.

16 The gods, Danavas, Gandharvas, Yakshas, Rakshasas, and Kinnaras pay homage to a chaste monk who performs his difficult duties.

17 This unchangeable, permanent, and eternal Law has been proclaimed by the Ginis; through it the Siddhas have reached perfection, and others will reach it.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 17TH LECTURE. THE BAD SRAMANA.

1 A Nirgrantha who has entered the order, who has learned the Law, who has received religious discipline, and who has obtained the benefit of Bodhi which is difficult to obtain, may perhaps afterwards begin to live as he likes.

2 (He will say:) I have a good bed and wherewithal to cover me; I obtain food and drink; I know everything that comes to pass, friend; why then should I study, sir?

3 He who, after entering the order, always sleeps, eats, and drinks as much as he likes, and lives comfortably, is called a bad Sramana.

4 The sinner who despises the learning and discipline which his preceptor and teachers have taught him, is called a bad Sramana.

5 He who does not, as he should, strive to please his preceptor and teachers, and does not, in his arrogance, treat them with respect, is called a bad Sramana.

6 He who hurts living beings, seeds, and sprouts, who does not control himself, though he believes himself well-controlled, is called a bad Sramana.

7 He who uses a bed, a plank, a chair, a seat, or his duster, without having well wiped these things, is called a bad Sramana.

8 He who walks with great haste and without care, being overbearing and fierce, is called a bad Sramana.

9 He who carelessly inspects things, throwing down his duster at random, not being attentive to the inspection of things, is called a bad Sramana.

10 He who carelessly respects things, his attention being absorbed by what he hears, who always slights his teachers, is called a bad Sramana.

11 He who is deceitful, talkative, arrogant, greedy, who does not control himself, nor share (his food, etc. with those who are in want), and is not of an amiable disposition, is called a bad Sramana.

12 He who is a controversialist, and ill-behaved, who perverts the truth, and delights in quarrels and contentions, is called a bad Sramana.

13 He who sits down on a weak, shaking seat wherever he lists, and is not careful in sitting down, is called a bad Sramana.

14 He who sleeps with dusty feet and does not inspect his couch, being careless about his bed, is called a bad Sramana.

15 He who eats milk, curds, and other things produced from milk, and does not practise austerities, is called a bad Sramana.

16 He who eats after sunset, and when admonished, makes an angry reply, is called a bad Sramana.

17 He who leaves his own teacher, and follows heretical ones, who continuously changes his school, being of a bad disposition, is called a bad Sramana.

18 He who has left his own house, and busies himself in another's house, who lives by fortune-telling, is called a bad Sramana.

19 He who eats the food of his relations, and does not like living by alms, who reposes on the seat of the householder, is called a bad Sramana.

20 Such a monk, who, like the heretics, does not protect himself from sins, who though having the appearance (of a monk) is the lowest among his worthy brethren, is despised in this world like poison; he is nobody in this world and in that beyond.

21 But he who always avoids these sins, and is pious amongst his brethren, is welcomed in this world like nectar; he conquers this world and the next.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 18TH LECTURE. SANGAYA.

1 In the town of Kampilya there was a king, named Sangaya, who possessed numerous troops and war-chariots; once he went a-hunting.

2 He was surrounded on all sides by a large host of horses, elephants, chariots, and footmen.

3 He chased the deer on horseback in the Kesara-park of Kampilya; and intent on his sport he killed there the frightened deer.

4 Now in the Kesara-park there was a houseless ascetic intent on sacred study and meditating on the Law.

5 Annihilating sinful inclinations, he meditated in the Asphota-bower. But the king killed the deer that fled to him.

6 Now the king on horseback came quickly there; he saw the killed deer and saw the monk there.

7 The king in his consternation (thought) 'I had nearly hurt the monk; ill-fated and cruel me that is mad for the sport.'

8 Having dismissed his horse, the king bowed respectfully to the monk's feet (saying), 'Forgive me this, Reverend sir.'

9 But the venerable monk, being plunged in silent meditation, made no reply to the king, who, therefore, was seized with fear.

10 'I am Sangaya; answer me, Reverend sir; a monk might by the fire of his wrath reduce millions of men to ashes.'

11 'Be without fear, O king; but grant safety to others also; in this transient world of living beings, why are you addicted to cruelty?'

12 'As you must, of necessity, one day part with everything, in this transient world of living beings, why do you cling to kingly power?'

13 'Transient like a stroke of lightning are life and beauty, which you love so much; you do not comprehend what will benefit you in the next life.'

14 'Wives and children, friends and relations, all are dependent on a man during his life; but they will not follow him in death.'

15 'The sons, in great sorrow, will remove the corpse of their father (to the cemetery); and so will parents do with their sons and relations; O king, do penance!'

16 'O king, other men, glad, and pleased, and well attired, will enjoy the riches (the deceased) had amassed, and will dally with the wives he had so well guarded.'

17 'And whatever actions he has done, good or wicked ones, with their Karman he will depart to his next existence.'

18 Then the king was taught the Law by this monk, and was filled with a great desire for purity, and disregard of worldly objects.'

19 Sangaya gave up his kingly power and adopted the faith of the Ginas in the presence of the venerable monk Gardabhali.

20 A Kshatriya, who had abandoned his kingdom and had turned monk, said to him: 'As you look so happy in outward appearance, you must have peace of mind.'

21 'What is your name, to which Gotra do you belong, and why have you become an ascetic? How do you venerate the enlightened ones [Buddhe, explained akaryan, preceptors.], and how did you come to be called a well-behaved (monk)?'

22 'My name is Sangaya; I belong to the Gotra of Gotama; my teacher is Gardabhali, who is conversant with the sacred lore and good conduct.'

23 'O great sage, the man of limited knowledge talks foolishly on these four heads*', viz. the existence of the soul, its non-existence, idolatry, and the inefficiency of knowledge. [* These are the four great heresies: (1st) that of the kriyavadinas, who maintain that the soul exists; (2nd) that of the akriyavadinas, who hold the reverse of the preceding doctrine; (3rd) that of the vainayikas, which seems to be identical with salvation by bhakti; (4th) that of the agnavadinas, who contend that knowledge is not necessary for salvation, but t a p a s; this seems identical with the karmapatha. The commentators explain kriyavadinah 'those who believe the soul or atman to be characterised by the verb to be (i.e. by a permanent and unchangeable existence), and ascribe to it such qualities as ubiquity or non-ubiquity, activity or non-activity.' This they treat as heresy, but from Mahavagga VI, 31, 2 (vol. 17, p. 109) it is evident that the Jainas were considered kriyavadins. The akriyavada is also identified with the kshanikavada or doctrine, usually ascribed to Buddhists, that everything has but a momentary existence and is in the next moment replaced by a facsimile of itself. About these heresies compare the Sutrakritanga I, 12; 2, 2, 77.]

24 'This has been declared by him who is enlightened, wise, liberated, conversant with the sacred lore and good conduct, who is truthful and of right energy.'

25 'Men who commit sins will go to hell; but those who have walked the road of righteousness, will obtain a place in heaven.'

26 'All this delusive talk (of the heretics) is untrue and without any meaning; I live and walk about according to the rules of self-control.'

27 'I know all these heresies to be contemptible; I know that there will be a life hereafter, and I know my Self.'

28 'I was an illustrious god in the Mahaprana heaven, and reached old age as we here would say of a man who is a hundred years old; but in heaven, hundred years consist of as many Mahapalis of Palis.'

29 'Descending from the Brahmaloaka, I was born as a man. I know exactly the length of my life as well as that of other men.'

30 'A monk should abandon the manifold doctrines (of heretics), and his own fancies, and such deeds as are productive of evil everywhere. One should live up to this wisdom.'

31 'I keep clear of the (superstitious) questions and the spells of laymen, exerting myself day and night (in the true religion). Thinking thus, one should practise austerities.'

32 'And what you of a pure mind asked me just now, that has been revealed by the enlightened one [Buddha.]; such knowledge makes part of the creed of the Ginas.'

33 'A wise man believes in the existence of the soul, he avoids the heresy of the non-existence of the soul; possessing true faith one should practise the very difficult Law according to the faith.'

34 'Having learned this pure creed, which is adorned by truth and righteousness, Bharata I gave up Bharatarvarsha and all pleasures, and entered the order.'

35 'King Sagara also gave up the ocean-girt Bharatarvarsha and his unrivalled kingly power, and reached perfection through his compassion.'

36 'After having given up Bharatarvarsha, the famous universal monarch of great power, called Maghavan, entered the order.'

37 'King Sanatkumara, a universal monarch of great power, placed his son on the throne, and then practised austerities.'

38 'Santi, a universal monarch of great power, the bringer of peace to the world, gave up Bharatarvarsha and reached perfection.'

39 'King Kunthu, the bull of the Aikshvaka race, the widely famed lord, reached perfection.'

40 'King Ara, after he had given up the sea-girt Bharatarvarsha, reached perfection on becoming exempt from defilement.'

41 'After having given up his large kingdom, his army and war-chariots, his exquisite pleasures, Mahapadma* practised austerities. [* Mahapadma was the ninth Kakravartin. His elder brother was Vishnukumara, who was ordained by Suvrata, a disciple of Munisuvrata, the twentieth Tirthakara. He wrenched the sovereignty of the world from Namuki, minister of his father Padmottara, who had ascended the throne, by making him promise as much of his territory as he could cover with three strides. This is the Brahmanical story of Vishnu and Bali, for whom the Jainas have substituted Namuki. According to them the minister Namuki was, in a disputation, defeated by the Jaina monks, and to revenge himself on them, he ordered them to quit his kingdom as soon as he got it.--Mahapadma's residence was Hastinapura.]

42 'Having brought the (whole) earth under his sceptre, king Harishena, who humbled the pride (of other kings), reached perfection.'

43 'Gaya, together with thousands of kings, renouncing the world, practised self-restraint. He reached perfection which has been taught by the Ginas.'

44 'Dasarnabhadr, giving up his flourishing kingdom of Dasarna, turned monk; he renounced the world, being directed to do so by Sakra himself.'

45 'Karakandu was king of Kalinga; Dvimukha, of Pankala; Nami, of Videha; Naggati (or rather Nagnagit), of Gandhara.'

46 'Nami humbled himself, being directed to do so by Sakra himself; the king of Videha left the house and became a Sramana.'

47 'These bulls of kings have adopted the faith of the Ginas; after having placed their sons on the throne, they exerted themselves as Sramanas.'

48 'Udayana, the bull of the kings of Sauvira, renounced the world and turned monk; he entered the order and reached perfection.'

49 'And thus the king of Kasi, exerting himself for the best truth, abandoned all pleasures, and hewed down, as it were, his Karman like a forest.'

50 'And thus king Vigaya, whose sins were not quite annihilated, turned monk after he, the famous man, had quitted his excellent kingdom.'

51 'And thus the royal seer Mahabala practised severe penance with an undistracted mind, and took upon himself the glory (of self-control).'

52 'Why should a wise man, for bad reasons, live on earth like a madman, since those persons (mentioned above) who reached eminence, exerted themselves strongly?'

53 'I have spoken true words able to promote virtue; some have been saved, some are being saved, and some will be saved.'

54 'Why should a wise man, for bad reasons, bring affliction upon himself? He who has become free from all ties and sins, will reach perfection.'

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 19TH LECTURE.

THE SON OF MRIGA.

1 In the pleasant town of Sugriva, which is adorned with parks and gardens, there was the king Balabhadr and Mriga, the principal queen.

2 Their son Balasri, also known as Mrigaputra (i.e. son of Mriga), the darling of his father and mother, was crown-prince, a (future) lord of ascetics.

3 In his palace Nandana he dallied with his wives, like the god Dogundaga, always happy in his mind.

4 Standing at a window of his palace, the floor of which was inlaid with precious stones and jewels, he looked down on the squares, places, and roads of the town.

5 Once he saw pass there a restrained Sramana, who practised penance, self-restraint, and self-control, who was full of virtues, and a very mine of good qualities.

6 Mrigaputra regarded him with fixed eyes, trying to remember where he had seen the same man before.

7 While he looked at the saint, and his mind became pure, the remembrance of his former birth came upon him as he was plunged in doubt.

8 When the remembrance of his former birth came upon the illustrious Mrigaputra, he remembered his previous birth and his having been then a Sramana.

9 Being not delighted with pleasures, but devoted to self-control, he went to his father and mother, and spoke as follows:

10 'I have learned the five great vows; (I know) the suffering (that awaits the sinner) in hell or in an existence as a brute; I have ceased to take delight in the large ocean (of the Samsara); therefore, O mother, allow me to enter the order.'

11 'O mother, O father, I have enjoyed pleasures which are like poisonous fruit: their consequences are painful, as they entail continuous suffering.'

12 'This body is not permanent, it is impure and of impure origin; it is but a transitory residence (of the soul) and a miserable vessel of suffering.'

13 'I take no delight in this transitory body which one must leave sooner or later, and which is like foam or a bubble.'

14 'And this vain human life, an abode of illness and disease, which is swallowed up by old age and death, does not please me even for a moment.'

15 'Birth is misery, old age is misery, and so are disease and death, and ah, nothing but misery is the Samsara, in which men suffer distress.'

16 'Leaving behind my fields, house, and gold, my son and wife, and my relations, leaving my body needs must, one day, depart.'

17 'As the effect of Kimpaka-fruit is anything but good, so the effect of pleasures enjoyed is anything but good.'

18 'He who starts on a long journey with no provisions, will come to grief on his way there, suffering from hunger and thirst.'

19 'Thus he who without having followed the Law, starts for the next world, will come to grief on his way there, suffering from illness and disease.'

20 'He who starts on a long journey with provisions, will be happy on his way there, not suffering from hunger and thirst.'

21 'Thus he who after having followed the Law, starts for the next world, will be happy on his journey there, being exempt from Karman and suffering.'

22, 23 'As when a house is on fire, the landlord carries away valuable things and leaves behind those of no value; so when the whole world is on fire, as it were, by old age and death, I shall save my Self, if you will permit me.'

24 'To him his parents said: "Son, difficult to perform, are the duties of a Sramana; a monk must possess thousands of virtues.'

25 'Impartiality towards all beings in the world, whether friends or enemies, and abstention from injury to living beings throughout the whole life: this is a difficult duty.'

26 'To be never careless in abstaining from falsehood, and to be always careful to speak wholesome truth: this is a difficult duty.'

27 'To abstain from taking of what is not given, even of a toothpick, etc.; and to accept only alms free from faults: this is a difficult duty.'

28 'To abstain from unchastity after one has tasted sensual pleasures, and to keep the severe vow of chastity: this is a very difficult duty.'

29 'To give up all claims on wealth, corn, and servants, to abstain from all undertakings, and not to own anything: this is a very difficult duty.'

30 'Not to eat at night any food of the four kinds, not to put away for later use or to keep a store (of things one wants): this is a very difficult duty.'

31, 32 'Hunger and thirst, heat and cold, molestation by flies and gnats, insults, miserable lodgings, pricking grass, and uncleanness, blows and threats, corporal punishment and imprisonment, the mendicant's life and fruitless begging: all this is misery.'

33 'Such a life is like that of pigeons (always afraid of dangers); painful is the plucking out of one's hair; difficult is the vow of chastity and hard to keep (even) for a noble man.'

34 'My son, you are accustomed to comfort, you are tender and cleanly [Literally, well washed or bathed.]; you are not able, my son, to live as a Sramana.'

35 'No repose as long as life lasts; the great burden of duty is heavy like a load of iron, which is difficult to be carried, O son.'

36 'As it is difficult to cross the heavenly Ganges, or to swim against the current, or to swim with one's arms over the sea, so it is difficult to get over the ocean of duties.'

37 'Self-control is unattractive like a mouthful of sand, and to practise penance is as difficult as to walk on the edge of a sword.'

38 'It is difficult (always to observe the rules of) right conduct with one's eyes for ever open like (those of) a snake, O son; it is difficult to eat iron grains, as it were.'

39 'As it is very difficult to swallow burning fire, so it is difficult for a young man to live as a Sramana.'

40 'As it is difficult to fill a bag with wind, so it is difficult for a weak man to live as a Sramana.'

41 "As it is difficult to weigh Mount Mandara in a balance, so it is difficult to live as a Sramana with a steady and fearless mind.

42 "As it is difficult to swim over the sea with one's arms, so it is difficult for one whose mind is not pacified, (to cross) the ocean of restraint.

43 "Enjoy the fivefold human pleasures. After you have done enjoying pleasures, O son, you may adopt the Law."

44 He answered: "O father and mother, it is even thus as you have plainly told; but in this world nothing is difficult for one who is free from desire.

45 "An infinite number of times have I suffered dreadful pains of body and mind, repeatedly misery and dangers.

46 "In the Samsara, which is a mine of dangers and a wilderness of old age and death, I have undergone dreadful births and deaths.

47 "Though fire be hot here, it is infinitely more so there (viz. in hell); in hell I have undergone suffering from heat.

48 "Though there may be cold here, it is of infinitely greater intensity there; in hell I have undergone suffering from cold.

49 "An infinite number of times have I been roasted over a blazing fire in an oven, screaming loud, head down and feet aloft.

50 "In the desert which is like a forest on fire, on the Vagravaluka and the Kadambavaluka rivers, I have been roasted an infinite number of times.

51 "Being suspended upside down over a boiler, shrieking, with no relation to help me, I was cut to pieces with various saws, an infinite number of times.

52 "I have suffered agonies when I was fastened with fetters on the huge Salmali tree, bristling with very sharp thorns, and then pushed up and down.

53 "An infinite number of times have I been crushed like sugar-cane in presses, shrieking horribly, to atone for my sins, great sinner that I was.

54 "By black and spotted wild dogs I have, ever so many times, been thrown down, torn to pieces, and lacerated, screaming and writhing.

55 "When I was born in hell for my sins, I was cut, pierced, and hacked to pieces with swords and daggers, with darts and javelins.

56 "I have been forcibly yoked to a car of red-hot iron full of fuel, I have been driven on with a goad and thongs, and have been knocked down like an antelope.

57 "On piles, in a blazing fire, I have forcibly been burnt and roasted like a buffalo, in atonement for my sins.

58 "An infinite number of times have I violently been lacerated by birds whose bills were of iron and shaped like tongues, by devilish vultures.

59 "Suffering from thirst I ran towards the river Vaitarani to drink its water, but in it I was killed (as it were) by blades of razors [The water of the river Vaitarani consists of a very caustic acid.]

60 "When suffering from the heat, I went into the forest in which the trees have a foliage of daggers; I have, ever so many times, been cut to pieces by the dropping dagger-leaves.

61 "An infinite number of times have I suffered hopelessly from mallets and knives, forks and maces, which broke my limbs.

62 "Ever so many times have I been slit, cut, mangled, and skinned with keen-edged razors, knives, and shears.

63 "As an antelope I have, against my will, been caught, bound, and fastened in snares and traps, and frequently I have been killed.

64 "As a fish I have, against my will, been caught with hooks and in bow-nets; I have therein been scraped, slit, and killed, an infinite number of times.

65 "As a bird I have been caught by hawks, trapped in nets, and bound with bird-lime, and I have been killed, an infinite number of times.

66 "As a tree I have been felled, slit, sawn into planks, and stripped of the bark by carpenters with axes, hatchets, etc., an infinite number of times.

67 "As iron I have been malleated, cut, torn, and filed by blacksmiths, an infinite number of times.

68 "I have been made to drink hissing molten copper, iron, tin, and lead under horrid shrieks, an infinite number of times.

69 "You like meat minced or roasted; I have been made to eat, ever so many times, poisoned meat, and red-hot to boot.

70 "You like wine, liquor, spirits, and honey; I have been made to drink burning fat and blood.

71 "Always frightened, trembling, distressed, and suffering, I have experienced the most exquisite pain and misery.

72 "I have experienced in hell sharp, acute and severe, horrible, intolerable, dreadful, and formidable pain.

73 "O father, infinitely more painful is the suffering in hell than any suffering in the world of men.

74 "In every kind of existence I have undergone suffering which was not interrupted by a moment's reprieve."

75 To him his parents said: "Son, a man is free to enter the order, but it causes misery to a Sramana that he may not remedy any ailments."

76 He answered: "O father and mother, it is even thus as you have plainly told; but who takes care of beasts and birds in the woods?"

77 "As a wild animal by itself roams about in the woods, thus I shall practise the Law by controlling myself and doing penance.

78 "When in a large forest a wild animal falls very sick at the foot of a tree, who is there to cure it?"

79 "Or who will give it medicine? or who will inquire after its health? or who will get food and drink for it, and feed it?"

80 "When it is in perfect health, it will roam about in woods and on (the shores of) lakes in search of food and drink.

81 "When it has eaten and drunk in woods and lakes, it will walk about and go to rest according to the habits of wild animals.

82 "In the same way a pious monk goes to many places and walks about just as the animals, but afterwards he goes to the upper regions.

83 "As a wild animal goes by itself to many places, lives in many places, and always gets its food; thus a monk on his begging-tour should not despise nor blame (the food he gets).

84 "I shall imitate this life of animals." "Well, my son, as you please." With his parents' permission he gave up all his property.

85 "I shall imitate this life of animals, which makes one free from all misery, if you will permit me." "Go, my son, as you please."

86 When he had thus made his parents repeat their permission, he gave up for ever his claims in any property, just as the snake casts off its slough.

87 His power and wealth, his friends, wives, sons, and relations he gave up as if he shook off the dust from his feet, and then he went forth.

88 He observed the five great vows, practised the five Samitis, and was protected by the three Guptis; he exerted himself to do mental as well as bodily penance.

89 He was without property, without egoism, without attachment, without conceit, impartial towards all beings, whether they move or not.

90 He was indifferent to success or failure (in begging), to happiness and misery, to life and death, to blame and praise, to honour and insult.

91 He turned away from conceit and passions, from injurious, hurtful, and dangerous actions, from gaiety and sadness; he was free from sins and fetters.

92 He had no interest in this world and no interest in the next world; he was indifferent to unpleasant and pleasant things, to eating and fasting.

93 He prevented the influx of Karman (asrava) through all bad channels; by meditating upon himself he obtained praiseworthy self-purification and sacred knowledge.

94, 95 Thus he thoroughly purified himself by knowledge, right conduct, faith, penance, and pure meditations, and after having lived many years as a Sramana, he reached perfection after breaking his fast once only every month.

96 Thus act the enlightened ones, the learned, the clever; like Mrigaputra they turn away from pleasures.

97, 98 When you have heard the words of the illustrious and famous son of Mriga, his perfect practise of austerities, and his liberation, famous in the three worlds, you will despise wealth, the cause of misery, and the fetter of egoism, the cause of many dangers, and you will bear the excellent and pleasant yoke of the Law that leads to the great happiness of Nirvana.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 20TH LECTURE.
THE GREAT DUTY OF THE NIRGRANTHAS.

1 Piously adoring the perfected and the restrained saints, listen to my true instruction which (teaches the real) profit (of men), religion, and liberation.

2 King Srenika, the ruler of Magadha, who possessed many precious things, once made a pleasure-excursion to the Mandikukshi Kaitya.

3 It was a park like Nandana, with trees and creepers of many kinds, peopled by various birds, and full of various flowers.

4 There he saw a restrained and concentrated saint sitting below a tree, who looked delicate and accustomed to comfort.

5 When the king saw his figure, his astonishment at that ascetic's figure was very great and unequalled.

6 "O his colour, O his figure, O the loveliness of the noble man, O his tranquillity, O his perfection, O his disregard for pleasures!"

7 Adoring his feet and keeping him on his right side (he sat down), neither too far off nor too close by, and asked him with his hands clasped:

8 "Though a young nobleman, you have entered the order; in an age fit for pleasure you exert yourself as a Sramana, O ascetic; I want to hear you explain this."

9 "I am without a protector, O great king; there is nobody to protect me, I know no friend nor any one to have sympathy with me."

10 Then king Srenika, the ruler of Magadha, laughed: "How should there be nobody to protect one so accomplished as you?"

11 "I am the protector of religious men; O monk; enjoy pleasures together with your friends and relations; for it is a rare chance to be born as a human being."

12 "You yourself are without a protector, Srenika, ruler of Magadha; and as you are without a protector, how can you protect anybody else?"

13 When the saint had addressed this unprecedented speech to the king, who was greatly moved and astonished, and struck with astonishment, (he answered):

14 "I have horses, elephants, and subjects, a town and a seraglio, power and command: enjoy human pleasures.

15 "In possession of so great means, which permit the owner to enjoy all pleasures, how could he be without protection? Reverend sir, you speak untruth."

16 "O king, you do not know the meaning and origin of (the word) 'without protection,' nor how one comes to be without protection or with protection, O ruler of men.

17 "Hear, O great king, with an undistracted mind in what way a man can be said to be 'without protection,' and with what purpose I have said all this.

18 "There is a town Kausambi by name, which is among towns what Indra is (among the gods); there lived my father, who possessed great wealth.

19 "In my childhood, O great king, I caught a very bad eye-disease and a severe burning fever in all my limbs, O ruler of men.

20 "My eyes ached as if a cruel enemy thrust a sharp tool in the hollow of my body.

21 "In the back, the heart, and the head, I suffered dreadful and very keen pains equal to a stroke of lightning.

22 "Then the best physicians came to my help, who cure by their medical art and by spells, who were versed in their science, and well knew spells and roots.

23 "They tried to cure me according to the fourfold science which they had been taught; but they could not rid me of my pains: hence I say that I am without protection.

24 "My father would have spent all he possessed, for my sake; but he could not rid me of my pains, hence I say that I am without protection.

25 "My mother, O great king, was agonized with grief about her son; but she could not, etc.

26 "O great king, my own brothers, the elder and younger ones, could not rid me of my pains, etc.

27 "O great king, my own sisters, the elder and younger ones, could not, etc.

28 "O great king, my loving and faithful wife moistened my breast with the tears of her eyes.

29 "The poor lady did not eat, nor drink, nor bathe, nor use perfumes, wreaths, and anointment, with my knowledge or without it.

30 "O great king, she did not leave my side even for a moment; but she could not rid me of my pains, hence I say that I am without protection.

31 "Then I said: It is very hard to bear pains again and again in the endless Circle of Births.

32 "If I, for once, shall get rid of these great pains, I shall become a houseless monk, calm, restrained, and ceasing to act.

33 "While I thought so, I fell asleep, O ruler of men; and after that night my pains had vanished.

34 "Then in the morning of the next day I took leave of my relations and became a houseless monk, calm, restrained, and ceasing to act.

35 "Thus I became the protector of myself and of others besides, of all living beings, whether they move or not.

36 "My own Self is the river Vaitarani, my own Self the Salmali tree; my own Self is the miraculous cow Kamaduh, my own Self the park Nandana.

37 "My own Self is the doer and undoer of misery and happiness; my own Self, friend and foe, according as I act well or badly.

38 "But there is still another want of protection, O king; hear, therefore, O king, attentively with concentrated thoughts, how some easily discouraged men go astray after having adopted the Law of the Nirgranthas.

39 "If an ordained monk, through carelessness, does not strictly keep the great vows, if he does not restrain himself, but desires pleasure, then his fetters will not be completely cut off.

40 "One who does not pay constant attention to his walking, his speaking, his begging, his receiving and keeping (of things necessary for a monk), and his easing nature [These are the five Samitis], does not follow the road trod by the Lord.

41 "One who for a long time wears a shaven crown and mortifies himself, but who is careless with regard to the vows, and neglects penance and self-control, will not be a winner in the battle (of life).

42 "He is empty like a clenched fist, (of no value) like an uncoined false Karshapana or like a piece of glass resembling turquoise, he is held lightly by men of discernment.

THE GRAND BIBLE

43 "He who has the character of a sinner, though he lays great stress on the outward signs of his calling as a means of living; he who does not control himself, though he pretends to do so; will come to grief for a long time.

44 "As the poison Kalakuta kills him who drinks it; as a weapon cuts him who awkwardly handles it; as a Vetal kills him who does not lay him; so the Law harms him who mixes it up with sensuality.

45 "He who practises divination from bodily marks and dreams, who is well versed in augury and superstitious rites, who gains a sinful living by practising magic tricks 5, will have no refuge at the time (of retribution).

46 "The sinner, always wretched, goes from darkness to darkness, to utter misery; the unholy man who breaks the rules of monks, rushes, as it were, to hell, and to be born again as a brute.

47 "He who accepts forbidden alms, viz. such food as he himself asks for, as has been bought for his sake, or as he gets regularly (as by right and custom), who like fire devours everything, will go to hell from here, after having sinned.

48 "A cut-throat enemy will not do him such harm as his own perversity will do him; the man without pity will feel repentance in the hour of death.

49 "In vain he adopts nakedness, who errs about matters of paramount interest; neither this world nor the next will be his; he is a loser in both respects in the world.

50 "Thus the self-willed sinner who leaves the road of the highest Ginas, who with the appetite of an osprey is desirous of pleasure, will grieve in useless sorrow.

51 "A wise man who hears this discourse, an instruction full of precious wisdom, and who deserts every path of the wicked, should walk the road of the great Nirgranthas.

52 "He who possesses virtuous conduct and life, who has practised the best self-control, who keeps from sinful influences 1, and who has destroyed his Karman, will reach (in the end) the greatest, best, and permanent place (viz. mukti)."

53 Thus the austere and calm, great ascetic and great sage who kept great vows and possessed great fame, preached at great length this great sermon: the great duty of the Nirgranthas.

54 And king Srenika, pleased, spoke thus: 'You have truly shown what it is to be without protection.

55 'You have made the best use of human birth, you have made a true gain, O great sage, you are a protector (of mankind at large) and of your relations, for you have entered the path of the best Ginas.

56 'You are the protector of all unprotected beings, O ascetic; I ask you to forgive me: I desire you to put me right.

57 'That by asking you I have disturbed your meditation, and that I invited you to enjoy pleasures, all this you must forgive me.'

58 When the lion of kings had thus, with the greatest devotion, praised the lion of houseless monks, he, together with his wives, servants, and relations, became a staunch believer in the Law, with a pure mind.

59 The ruler of men, with the hair on his body joyfully erected, bowed his head (to the monk), keeping him on his right side, and departed.

60 And the other, rich in virtues, protected by the three Gupitis, and abstaining from injuring (living beings) in the three ways (viz. by thought, words, and acts), travelled about on the earth, free like a bird, and exempt from delusion.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 21ST LECTURE.

SAMUDRAPALA.

1 In Kampa there lived a Sravaka, the merchant Palita, who was a disciple of the noble and venerable Mahavira.

2 As a Sravaka he was well versed in the doctrines of the Nirgranthas. Once he went by boat to the town of Pihunda on business.

3 A merchant gave him his daughter while he was doing business in Pihunda. When she was big with child, he took her with him on his returning home.

4 Now the wife of Palita was delivered of a child at sea; as the boy was born at sea (samudra), he was named Samudrapala.

5 Our merchant, the Sravaka, went leisurely to Kampa, to his house; in his house the boy grew up surrounded by comfort.

6 He studied the seventy-two arts, and acquired knowledge of the world; he was in the bloom of youth, and had a fine figure and good looks.

7 His father procured him a beautiful wife, Rupini, with whom he amused himself in his pleasant palace, like a Dogundaga god.

8 Once upon a time he saw from the window of his palace a man sentenced to death, dressed for execution, on his way to the place of execution.

9 Agitated by what he saw, Samudrapala spoke thus: 'Of wicked actions this is the bad result.'

10 He became enlightened at once, the venerable man, and he was immensely agitated; he took leave of his parents, and entered the state of houselessness.

11 Abandoning the great distress to which the worldly are liable, the great delusion, and whatever causes fear, one should adopt the Law of monks, the vows, the virtues, and the (endurance of) calamities.

12 One should keep the five great vows, viz. not to kill, to speak the truth, not to steal, to be chaste, to have no property whatever; a wise man should follow the Law taught by the Ginas.

13 A monk should have compassion on all beings, should be of a forbearing character, should be restrained and chaste, and abstaining from everything sinful; he should live with his senses under control.

14 Now and then he should travel in one country, taking into consideration its resources and his own ability; like a lion he should not be frightened by any noise; and whatever words he hears, he should not make an improper reply.

15 In utter indifference he should walk about, and bear everything, be it pleasant or unpleasant; he should not approve of everything everywhere, nor care for 1 respectful treatment or blame.

16, 17 There are many opinions here among men, which a monk places in their true light; there will rise many dangerous and dreadful calamities, caused by gods, men, or animals, which are difficult to be borne and cause easily-discouraged men to sink under them; but a monk who comes in contact with them will not be afraid, like a stately elephant at the head of the battle.

18 Cold and heat, flies and gnats, unpleasant feelings, and many diseases attack the body; without flinching he should bear them, and should not recall to his memory the pleasures he once enjoyed.

19 Giving up love, hatred, and delusion, a monk who is always careful and who is steadfast even as Mount Meru cannot be shaken by the storm, should bear calamities, guarding himself.

20 A great sage should be neither too elevated by pride nor too humble, he should not care for respectful treatment nor blame; an ascetic who has ceased (to act), will by means of his simplicity enter the path of Nirvana.

21 He is neither grieved nor pleased (by anything), he abandons his relations with men, he ceases (to act), is intent on the benefit of his soul, he strives for the highest good (viz. mukti), and uses the means to reach it, free from sorrow, egoism, and any kind of property.

22 A merciful (monk) should use beds distant from others, which are not got ready for his sake 2 nor strewn (with leaves or things considered to be possessed of life); he should sustain such hardships as the sages are accustomed to.

23 The great sage (Samudrapala), understanding the sacred lore and practising completely the best Law, shone forth like the sun in the sky, being possessed of the highest knowledge and glory.

24 Having annihilated his Karman both meritorious and sinful, being steadfast 1, and free from all fetters, Samudrapala crossed the ocean-like Flood of worldly existence and obtained exemption from transmigration.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 22ND LECTURE.

RATHANEMI.

1 In the town of Sauryapura there was a powerful king, Vasudeva by name, who possessed the characteristic marks of a king.

2 He had two wives, Rohini and Devaki; each of them had a beloved son, Rama and Kesava.

3 In the town of Sauryapura there was (another) powerful king, Samudravigaya by name, who possessed the characteristic marks of a king.

4 His wife was Siva by name; and her famous son was the venerable Arishtanemi, the saviour of the world and the lord of ascetics.

5 This Arishtanemi, who was gifted with an excellent voice and possessed the thousand and eight lucky marks of the body, was a Gautama, and his skin was black.

6 His body was strong like that of a bull, and hard like steel; he was well proportioned, and had a belly like that of a fish.

Kesava asked the girl Ragimati in marriage for him.

7 Now this daughter of an excellent king was virtuous and well looking; she possessed all lucky marks of the body, and shone forth like the lightning Saudamani.

8 Her father said to the powerful Vasudeva: 'Let the prince come here that I may give him my daughter.'

9 He had taken a bath containing all (lucky) herbs, and had performed the customary ceremonies; he wore a suit of heavenly clothes and was decked out with ornaments.

10 Riding on the best mast elephant of Vasudeva he looked beautiful, like a jewel worn on the head.

11, 12 He sat under a raised umbrella, fanned by two chowries, and he was surrounded on all sides by a host of Dasarhas and by a complete army drawn up in rank and file, while the heavenly sound of musical instruments reached the sky.

13 With such pomp and splendour the hero of the Vrishnis started from his own palace.

14 On his way he saw animals, kept in cages and enclosures, overcome by fear and looking miserable.

15 Seeing them on the point of being killed for the sake of their flesh, and to be eaten afterwards, the great sage spoke to his charioteer thus:

16 'Why are all these animals, which desire to be happy, kept in cages and enclosures?'

17 Then the charioteer answered: 'Lucky are these animals because at thy wedding they will furnish food for many people.'

18 Having heard these words, which announced the slaughter of many animals, the great sage, full of compassion and kindness to living beings, meditated thus:

19 'If for my sake many living beings are killed, I shall not obtain happiness in the next world.'

20 Then the famous man presented the charioteer with his pair of earrings, his neck-chain, and all his ornaments.

21 When he had formed his resolution, the gods descended (from heaven), according to the established custom, to celebrate, with great pomp together with their retinue, the event of his renunciation.

22 Surrounded by gods and men, and sitting on an excellent palankin, the Venerable One left Dvaraka and ascended mount Raivataka

23 On arriving at the park he descended from his excellent palankin, surrounded by a crowd of thousands, and then his renunciation took place, while the moon was in conjunction with Kitra.

24 Then he himself plucked out his delightfully-perfumed, soft, and curled hair in five handfuls.

25 And Vasudeva said to that subduer of the senses, who had plucked out his hair: 'O lord of ascetics, may you soon obtain what you wish and desire.'

26 'Increase in knowledge, faith, and right conduct, in forbearance and perfection!'

27 In this manner Rama and Kesava, the Dasarhas, and many people paid homage to Arishtanemi and then returned to the town of Dvaraka.

28 When the daughter of the king heard of the ordination of the Gina, laughter and gaiety forsook her, and she was overwhelmed with affliction.'

29 Ragimati thought: 'Shame upon my life, that I have been forsaken by him! it is better I should turn nun.'

30 Firm and decided she cut off her tresses which were black like bees and dressed with a brush and comb.

31 And Vasudeva said to her who had cut off her hair, and subdued her senses: 'Lady, cross the dreadful ocean of the Samsara without difficulty!'

32 When she had entered the order, the virtuous and very learned lady induced through many people, her relations and servants, to enter the order too.

33 On her way to mount Raivataka it began to rain; her clothes being wet, she entered a cave and waited there in the darkness while it was raining.

34 She took off her clothes and was naked as she was born, thus she was seen by Rathanemi, whose (peace of) mind became (thereby) disturbed; and afterwards she saw him.

35 She was frightened when she discovered herself alone with the monk; folding her arms over her breast she sank down trembling.

36 When the prince, Samudravigaya's son, saw her frightened and trembling, he spoke the following words:

37 'I am Rathanemi, O dear, beautiful, sweetly-speaking lady! Do accept me for your lover, O slender one 1, you shall have no cause to complain.

38 'Come, let us enjoy pleasures, for it is a rare chance to be born a human being; after we have enjoyed pleasures, we shall enter on the path of the Ginas.'

39 When Ragimati perceived that Rathanemi's strength of will was broken, and temptation had got the better of him, she did not lose her presence of mind and defended her Self on that occasion.

40 The daughter of the best king, true to self-control and her vows, maintained the honour of her clan and family, and her virtue, and spoke to him:

41 'If you owned the beauty of Vaisramana, the pleasing manners of Nalakubara, if you were like Purandara himself, I should have no desire for you.

42 'Fie upon you, famous knight, who want to quaff the vomited drink for the sake of this life; it would be better for you to die.

43 'I am the daughter of the Bhoga-king, and you are an Andhakavrishti; being born in a noble family let us not become like Gandhana-snakes; firmly practise self-control!'

44 'If you fall in love with every woman you see, you will be without hold like the Hatha-plant, driven before the wind.

45 'As a herdsman or a keeper of goods does not own the things (he has the care of), so you will not truly own Sramanahood.'

46 Having heard these well-spoken words of the virtuous lady, he returned to the Law like an elephant driven by the hook.

47 Protected in thoughts, words, and acts, subduing his senses and keeping the vows, he practised true Sramanahood throughout life.

48 After practising severe austerities both of them became Kevalins, and having completely annihilated their Karman, they reached the highest perfection.

49 Thus act the enlightened, the wise, the clever ones; they turn from pleasures as did this best of men.
Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 23RD LECTURE.
KESI AND GAUTAMA.

1 There was a Gina, Parsva by name, an Arhat, worshipped by the people, who was thoroughly enlightened and omniscient, a prophet of the Law, and a Gina.

2 And there was a famous disciple of this Light of the World, the young Sramana Kesi, who had completely mastered the sciences and right conduct.

3 He possessed the light of Sruta and Avadhi knowledge, and was surrounded by a crowd of disciples; wandering from village to village he arrived in the town of Sravasti.

4 In the district of that town there is a park, called Tinduka; there he took up his abode in a pure place to live and sleep in.

5 Now at that time there lived the Prophet of the Law, the Gina, who in the whole world is known as the venerable Vardhamana.

6 And there was a famous disciple of this Light of the World, the venerable Gautama by name, who had completely mastered the sciences and right conduct.

7 He knew the twelve Angas, was enlightened, and was surrounded by a crowd of disciples; wandering from village to village he too arrived in Sravasti.

8 In the district of that town there is a park Koshtaka; there he took up his abode in a pure place to live and sleep in.

9 The young Sramana Kesi and the famous Gautama, both lived there, protecting themselves (by the Guptis) and being careful.

10 The pupils of both, who, controlled themselves, who practised austerities, who possessed virtues, and who protected their Self, made the following reflection:

11 "Is our Law the right one, or is the other Law 1 the right one? are our conduct and doctrines right, or the other?"

12 "The Law as taught by the great sage Parsva, which recognises but four vows, or the Law taught by Vardhamana, which enjoins five vows?"

13 "The Law which forbids clothes (for a monk), hr that which (allows) an under and upper garment? Both pursuing the same end, what has caused their difference?"

14 Knowing the thoughts of their pupils, both Kesi and Gautama made up their minds to meet each other.

15 Gautama, knowing what is proper and what is due to the older section (of the church), went to the Tinduka park, accompanied by the crowd, his pupils.

16 When Kesi, the young monk, saw Gautama approach, he received him with all becoming attention.

17 He at once offered Gautama the four pure kinds of straw and hay to sit upon.

18 Kesi, the young Sramana, and the famous Gautama, sitting together, shone forth with a lustre like that of sun and moon.

19 There assembled many heretics out of curiosity, and many thousands of laymen;

20 Gods, Danavas, Gandharvas, Yakshas, Rakshasas, and Kinnaras (assembled there), and there came together invisible ghosts too.

21, 22 Kesi said to Gautama, "I want to ask you something, holy man." Then to these words of Kesi Gautama made the following reply: "Sir, ask whatever you like." Then with his permission Kesi spoke to Gautama:

23 "The Law taught by the great sage Parsva, recognises but four vows, whilst that of Vardhamana enjoins five.

24 "Both Laws pursuing the same end, what has caused this difference? Have you no misgivings about this twofold Law, O wise man?"

25 Then to these words of Kesi Gautama made the following reply: "Wisdom recognises the truth of the Law and the ascertainment of true things.

26 "The first saints were simple but slow of understanding, the last saints prevaricating and slow of understanding, those between the two simple and wise; hence there are two forms of the Law [The meaning of this explanation is as follows. As the vow of chastity is not explicitly mentioned among Parsva's four vows, but was understood to be implicitly enjoined by them, it follows that only such men as were of an upright disposition and quick understanding would not go astray by observing the four vows literally, i.e. by not abstaining from sexual intercourse, as it was not expressly forbidden.--The argumentation in the text presupposes a decay of the morals of the monastic order to have occurred between Parsva and Mahavira, and this is possible only on the assumption of a sufficient interval of time having p. 123 elapsed between the last two Tirthakaras. And this perfectly agrees with the common tradition that Mahavira came 250 years after Parsva.]

27 "The first could but with difficulty understand the precepts of the Law, and the last could only with difficulty observe them, but those between them easily understood and observed them."

28 "Well, Gautama, you possess wisdom, you have destroyed my doubt; but I have another doubt which you must explain to me, Gautama.

29 "The Law taught by Vardhamana forbids clothes, but that of the great sage Parsva allows an under and upper garment.

30 "Both Laws pursuing the same end, what has caused this difference? Have you no misgivings about this twofold Law, O wise man?"

31 To these words of Kesi Gautama made the following reply: "Deciding the matter by their superior knowledge, (the Tirthakaras) have fixed what is necessary for carrying out the Law.

32 "The various outward marks (of religious men) have been introduced in order that people might recognise them as such; the reason for the characteristic marks is their usefulness for religious life and their distinguishing character.

33 "Now the opinion (of the Tirthakaras) is that knowledge, faith, and right conduct are the true causes of final liberation, (and not the outward marks)."

34 "Well, Gautama, you possess wisdom, you have destroyed my doubt; but I have another doubt, which you must explain to me, Gautama.

35 "Gautama, you stand in the midst of many thousand (foes) who make an attack on you; how have you vanquished them? [This question does not refer to the difference in doctrines between Parsva and Mahavira, but is discussed here, as the commentator states, for the benefit of the pupils of both sages who are engaged in conversation. I think, however, that this and the following questions are asked and answered here by the disciples of the two Tirthakaras for a better reason than that given by the scholiast. For in them the leading topics of Jainism are treated in a symbolical way. Gautama at once understands the true meaning of the similes and interprets them to the satisfaction of Kesi. In this way the unity in doctrine subsisting between the Law of Parsva and that of Mahavira is demonstrated to the hearers of the dispute, after the differences had been explained away.]

36 "By vanquishing one, five are vanquished; by vanquishing five, ten are vanquished; by this tenfold victory, I vanquish all foes."

37 Kesi said to Gautama: "Whom do you call a foe?" To these words of Kesi Gautama made the following reply:

38 "Self is the one invincible foe, (together with the four) cardinal passions, (viz. anger, pride, deceit, and greed, they are five) and the (five) senses (make ten). These (foes), O great sage, I have regularly vanquished."

39 "Well, Gautama, etc. (as in verse 28).

40 "We see many beings in this world who are bound by fetters; how have you got rid of your fetters and are set free, O sage?"

41 "Having cut off all fetters, and having destroyed them by the right means, I have got rid of my fetters and am set free, O sage."

42 Kesi said to Gautama: "What do you call fetters?" To these words of Kesi Gautama made the following reply:

43 "Love, hatred, etc., are heavy fetters, attachment is a dangerous one; having regularly destroyed them, I live up to the rules of conduct."

44 "Well, Gautama, etc. (as in verse 28).

45 "O Gautama, in the innermost heart there grows a plant which brings forth poisonous fruit; how have you torn it out?"

46 "I have thoroughly clipped that plant, and torn it out together with its roots; thus I have got rid of the poisonous fruit."

47 Kesi said to Gautama, "What do you call that plant?" To these words of Kesi Gautama made the following reply:

48 "Love of existence is that dreadful plant which brings forth dreadful fruit; having regularly torn it out, I live pleasantly."

49 "Well, Gautama, etc. (as in verse 28).

50 "Gautama, there is blazing up a frightful fire [In the original 'fire' is put in the plural because the four kashayas or cardinal passions are denoted by it.] which burns the embodied beings; how have you put it out?"

51 "Taking water, excellent water, from (the river) produced by the great cloud, I always pour it over my body; thus sprinkled the fire does not burn me."

52 Kesi said to Gautama, "What do you call the fire?" To these words of Kesi Gautama made the following reply:

53 "The passions are the fire; knowledge, a virtuous life, and penances are the water; sprinkled with the drops of knowledge the fire of the passions is extinguished and does not burn me."

54 "Well, Gautama, etc. (as in verse 28).

55 "The unruly, dreadful, bad horse, on which you sit, runs about, Gautama! how comes it to pass that it does not run off with you?"

56 "I govern it well in its course by the bridle of knowledge; it does not go astray with me, it keeps to the right path."

57 Kesi said to Gautama, "What do you call this horse?" To these words of Kesi Gautama made the following reply:

58 "The mind is that unruly, dreadful, bad horse; I govern it by the discipline of the Law (so that it becomes a well-) trained Kamboga-steed."

59 "Well, Gautama, etc. (as in verse 28).

60 "There are many bad roads in this world, which lead men astray; how do you avoid, Gautama, going astray as you are on the road?"

61 "They all are known to me, those who are in the right path and those who have chosen a wrong path; therefore I do not go astray, O sage!"

62 Kesi said to Gautama, "What do you call the path?" To these words of Kesi Gautama made the following reply:

63 "The heterodox and the heretics have all chosen a wrong path; the right path is that taught by the Ginas; it is the most excellent path."

64 "Well, Gautama, etc. (as in verse 28).

65 "Is there a shelter, a refuge, a firm ground for the beings carried away by the great flood of water? do you know the island, O Gautama?"

66 "There is a large, great island in the midst of water, which is not inundated by the great flood of water."

67 Kesi said to Gautama, "What do you call this island?" To these words of Kesi Gautama made the following reply:

68 "The flood is old age and death, which carry away living beings; Law is the island, the firm ground, the refuge, the most excellent shelter."

69 "Well, Gautama, etc. (as in verse 28).

70 "On the ocean with its many currents there drifts a boat; how will you, Gautama, on board of it reach the opposite shore?"

71 "A boat that leaks will not reach the opposite shore; but a boat that does not leak, will reach it."

72 Kesi said to Gautama, "What do you call this boat?" To these words of Kesi Gautama made the following reply:

73 "The body is the boat, life is the sailor, and the Circle of Births is the ocean which is crossed by the great sages."

74 "Well, Gautama, etc. (as in verse 28).

75 "In this dreadfully dark gloom there live many beings; who will bring light into the whole world of living beings?"

76 "The spotless sun has risen which illuminates the whole world; he will bring light into the whole world of living beings."

77 Kesi said to Gautama, "What do you call this sun?" To these words of Kesi Gautama made the following reply:

78 "Risen has he who put an end to the Circle of Births, the omniscient Gina, the luminary, who brings light into the whole world of living beings."

79 "Well, Gautama, etc. (as in verse 28).

80 "Do you, O sage, know a safe, happy, and quiet place for living beings which suffer from pains 1 of body and mind?"

81 "There is a safe place in view of all, but difficult of approach, where there is no old age nor death, no pain nor disease."

82 Kesi said to Gautama, "What is this place called?" To these words of Kesi Gautama made the following reply:

83 "It is what is called Nirvana, or freedom from pain, or perfection, which is in view of all; it is the safe, happy, and quiet place which the great sages reach."

84 "That is the eternal place, in view of all, but difficult of approach. Those sages who reach it are free from sorrows, they have put an end to the stream of existence."

85 "Well, Gautama, you possess wisdom, you have destroyed my doubt; obedience to you, who are not troubled by doubts, who are the ocean, as it were, of all Sutras."

86 After his doubt had been solved, Kesi, of enormous sanctity, bowed his head to the famous Gautama.

87 And in the pleasant (Tinduka park) he sincerely adopted the Law of the five vows, which was proclaimed by the first Tirthakara, according to the teaching of the last Tirthakara.

88 In that meeting of Kesi and Gautama, knowledge and virtuous conduct were for ever brought to eminence, and subjects of the greatest importance were settled.

89 The whole assembly was greatly pleased and fixed their thoughts on the right way. They praised Kesi and Gautama: "May the venerable ones show us favour!"
Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 24TH LECTURE.
THE SAMTIS.

1 The eight articles of the creed are the Samitis and the Guptis; there are five Samitis and three Guptis.

2 The Samitis are: 1st. irya-samiti (going by paths trodden by men, beasts, carts, etc., and looking carefully so as not to occasion the death of any living creature); 2nd. bhasha-samiti (gentle, salutary, sweet, righteous speech); 3rd. eshana-samiti (receiving alms in a manner to avoid the forty-two faults that are laid down); 4th. adana-samiti (receiving and keeping of the things necessary for religious exercises, after having carefully examined them); 5th. ukkara-samiti (performing the operations of nature in an unfrequented place).

The three Guptis (which are here included in the term Samiti in its wider application) are: 1st. mano-gupti (preventing the mind from wandering in the forest of sensual pleasures by employing it in contemplation, study, etc.); 2nd. vag-gupti (preventing the tongue from saying bad things by a vow of silence, etc.); 3rd. kaya-gupti (putting the body in an immovable posture as in the case of Kayotsarga).

3 The eight Samitis are thus briefly enumerated, in which the whole creed taught by the Ginas and set forth in the twelve Angas, is comprehended.

4 1. The walking of a well-disciplined monk should be pure in four respects: in respect to 1st. the cause; 2nd. the time; 3rd. the road; 4th. the effort.

5 The cause is: knowledge, faith, and right conduct; the time is day-time; the road excludes bad ways.

6 The effort is fourfold, viz. as regards: 1st. substance, 2nd. place, 3rd. time, and 4th. condition of mind. Hear me explain them.

7 With regard to substance: the (walking monk) should look with his eyes; with regard to place: the space of a yuga (i.e. four hastas or cubits); with regard to time: as long as he walks; and with regard to condition of mind: carefully.

8 He walks carefully who pays attention only to his walk and his body (executing it), whilst he avoids attending to the objects of sense, but (minds) his study, the latter in all five ways [Alambana, literally support; explained: supported by which the mind becomes pure.].

9, 10 2. To give way to: anger, pride, deceit and greed, laughter, fear, loquacity and slander; these eight faults should a well-disciplined monk avoid; he should use blameless and concise speech at the proper time.

11 3. As regards begging, a monk should avoid the faults in the search, in the receiving, and in the use of the three kinds of objects, viz. food, articles of use, and lodging.

12 A zealous monk should avoid in the first (i.e. in the search for alms) the faults occasioned either by the giver (udgama) or by the receiver (utpadana); in the second (i.e. in the receiving of alms) the faults inherent in the receiving; and in the use of the articles received, the four faults*.

[* There are altogether forty-six faults to be avoided. As they are frequently alluded to in the sacred texts, a systematical enumeration and description of them according to the Dipika will be useful.]

There are sixteen udgama-doshas by which food, etc. becomes unfit for a Jaina monk:

1. Adhakarmika, the fault inherent in food, etc., which a layman has prepared especially for religious mendicants of whatever sect.

2. Auddesika, is food, etc., which a layman has prepared for a particular monk.

3. Putika, is food, etc., which is pure on the whole, but contains particles impure on account of the first fault.

4. Unmisra, is food, etc., of which a part only had been especially prepared for the monk in question.

5. Sthapanakarmika, is food, etc., which has been reserved for the monk.

6. Prabhritika, is food, etc., which has been prepared for some festivity.

7. Praduhkarana, when the layman has to light a lamp in order to fetch the alms for the monk.

8. Krita, when he has to buy the things.

9. Pramitya, when he has to fetch a ladle (? uddharaka) in order to draw out the food, etc.

10. Paravrutti, when he replaces bad particles of the food by good ones, and vice versa.

11. Adhyahrita, when he has to fetch the food, etc., from some distance.

12. Udbhinna, when he has to open locks before he gets at the food, etc.

13. Malahrita, when he has to take the food, etc., from some raised or underground place.

14. Akkhidya, when the food, etc., was taken by force from somebody.

15. Anisrishta, when a man gives from a store he possesses in common with other men, without asking their permission.

16. Adhyavapura, when the mendicant calls while the dinner is being cooked, and for his sake more food is put in the pot on the fire.

(Some of these faults are enumerated in the Aupapatika Sutra, § 96, III.)

There are sixteen utpadana-doshas; or such faults as are occasioned by the monk's using some means to make the layman give him alms:

1. Dhatrikarman, when the monk plays with the layman's children.

2. Dutakarman, when he gives him information about what his people are doing.

3. Nimitta, when he speaks in praise of almsgiving.

4. Agivika, when he makes his birth and family known to him.

5. Vapanika, when he expatiates upon his misery.

6. Kikitsa, when he cures sick people.

7. Krodhapinda, when he extorts alms by threats.

8. Manapinda, when he tells the layman that he has laid a wager with other monks that he would get alms from him.

9. Mayapinda, when he employs tricks or buffoonery in order to procure alms.

10. Lobhapinda, when he goes begging from a desire of good fare.

11. Samstava-pinda, when he flatters the layman.

12. Vidypinda, when he makes a show of his learning; or when he conjures a god from whom to get alms.

13. Mantradosha, when he obliges the layman in some way or other.

14. Kurnayogya, when he makes himself invisible and then takes away the food, etc.

15. Yogapinda, when he teaches people spells, tricks, etc.

16. Mulakarman, when he teaches them how to obviate evils by roots, charms, etc.

There are ten faults of grahanaishana:

1. Sankita, when a monk accepts alms from a frightened layman.

2. Mrakshita, when the food is soiled (kharantita) by animate or inanimate matter.

3. Nikshipta, when the food is placed among animate things.

4. Pihita, when animate food is covered with inanimate matter, and vice versa.

5. Samhrita, when the layman has to take out the thing to be given from one vessel and puts it into another.

6. Dayaka, when the condition or occupation of the giver forbids accepting alms from him.

7. Unmisrita, when the layman mixes up pure with impure food.

8. Aparita (?), when one joint possessor gives away from the store against the other's will.

9. Lipta, when the layman gives food, etc., with a ladle or his hand, soiled with milk, butter, etc.

10. Khardita, when in giving alms he spills milk, etc.

There are four faults of paribhogaishana:

1. Samyogana, when the monk puts together the ingredients for a good meal.

2. Apramana, when he accepts a greater than the prescribed quantity of food.

3. Ingala, when he praises a rich man for his good fare, or dhuma, when he blames a poor man for his bad fare.

4. Akarana, when he eats choice food on other occasions than those laid down in the sacred texts.]

13 4. If a monk takes up or lays down the two kinds of things belonging to his general and supplementary outfit, he should proceed in the following way.

14 A zealous monk should wipe the thing after having inspected it with his eyes, and then he should take it up or put it down, having the Samiti in both respects.

15 5. Excrements, urine, saliva, mucus, uncleanness of the body, offals of food, waste things, his own body (when he is about to die), and everything of this description (is to be disposed of in the way to be described).

16 [A place may be not frequented and not seen (by people), or not frequented but seen, or frequented and not seen, or frequented and seen.

17, 18 In a place neither frequented nor seen by other people, which offers no obstacles to self-control, which is even, not covered with grass or leaves [Agghusire = asushire, not perforated, not having holes. I translate according to the author of the Avakuri. The literal p. 135 translation would give a wrong idea, as it would come to the same as the word bilavargita in the next verse.], and has been brought into its present condition not long ago, which is spacious, has an inanimate surface-layer, not too near (the village, etc.), not perforated by holes, and is exempt from insects and seeds--in such a place he should leave his excrements, etc.

19 The five Samitis are thus briefly enumerated, I shall now explain in due order the three Guptis.

20 1. There is, 1st. truth; 2nd. untruth; 3rd. a mixture of truth and untruth; 4th. a mixture of what is not true, and what is not untrue. The Gupti of mind refers to all four.

21 A zealous monk should prevent his mind from desires for the misfortune of somebody else, from thoughts on acts which cause misery to living beings, and from thoughts on acts which cause their destruction.

22 2. The Gupti of speech is also of four kinds (referring to the four divisions as in verse 20).

23 A zealous monk should prevent his speech from (expressing) desires, etc. (as in verse 21).

24, 25 3. In standing, sitting, lying down, jumping, going, and in the use of his organs, a zealous monk should prevent his body from intimating obnoxious desires, from doing acts which cause misery to living beings, or which cause their destruction.

26 These are the five Samitis for the practice of the religious life, and the Guptis for the prevention of everything sinful.

27 This is the essence of the creed, which a sage should thoroughly put into practice; such a wise man will soon get beyond the Circle of Births.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 25TH LECTURE.
THE TRUE SACRIFICE.

1 There was a famous Brahmana, Gayaghosha by name, who was born in a Brahmanical family, but who was pledged to the performing of the yamas.

2 This great sage, who subdued all his senses, and who walked on the right road, came, on his wandering from village to village, to the town of Benares.

3 There outside of Benares he took up his lodgings in a pleasant park; there he took up his abode in a pure place to live and sleep in.

4 At the same time a Brahmana, versed in the Vedas, Vigayaghosha by name, offered a sacrifice in that town.

5 Now this houseless (monk) at the end of a fast of a month's duration, went to the sacrifice of Vigayaghosha to beg alms.

6 The priest wanted to turn the approaching monk off: 'I shall not give you alms, mendicant, beg somewhere else.'

7, 8 'Priests who are versed in the Vedas and are chaste as behoves offerers, who are versed in the Gytoshanga and are well grounded in the sacrificial science, who are able to save themselves. and others, such priests ought to be presented with food and all they desire.'

9 When the great sage was thus refused by the priest, he was neither angry nor pleased, as he always strove for the highest good.

10 Not to obtain food, or drink, or whatever else he wanted, but to save these people he spoke the following words:

11 "You do not know what is most essential in the Vedas, nor in sacrifices, nor in the heavenly bodies, nor in duties.

12 "Nor do you know those who are able to save themselves and others; but if you do, then speak out!"

13 The priest did not make a reply to defend himself against his insinuation; but he and all there assembled joined their hands and questioned the great sage:

14 'Tell us the most essential subject in the Vedas, and tell us what is most essential in the sacrifice; tell us the first of the heavenly bodies, and tell us the best of dharmas.

15 'Who are able to save themselves and others (viz. tell me). I ask you to solve this my doubt, O saint.'

16 "The most essential subject in the Vedas is the agnihotra, and that of the sacrifice is the purpose of the sacrifice 1; the first of the heavenly bodies is the moon, and the best of dharmas is that of Kasyapa (i.e. Rishabha).

17 "The beautiful (gods) with joined hands praise and worship the highest Lord (i.e. the Tirthakara) as the planets, etc., (praise) the moon.

18 "The ignorant (priests) pretend to know the sacrifice, those whose Brahmanical excellence consists in (false) science; they shroud themselves in study and penance, being like fire covered by ashes.

19 "He who is called by people a Brahmana and is worshipped like fire (is no true Brahmana). But him we call a true Brahmana, whom the wise point out as such.

20 "He who has no worldly attachment after entering the order, who does not repent of having become a monk, and who takes delight in the noble words, him we call a Brahmana.

21 "He who is exempt from love, hatred, and fear, (and who shines forth) like burnished gold, purified in fire, him we call a Brahmana.

22 "A lean, self-subduing ascetic, who reduces his flesh and blood, who is pious and has reached Nirvana, him we call a Brahmana.

23 "He who thoroughly knows living beings, whether they move or not, and does not injure them in any of the three ways, him we call a Brahmana.

24 "He who does not speak untruth from anger or for fun, from greed or from fear, him we call a Brahmana.

25 "He who does not take anything that is not given him, be it sentient or not sentient, small or large, him we call a Brahmana.

26 "He who does not carnally love divine, human, or animal beings, in thoughts, words, or acts, him we call a Brahmana.

27 "He who is not defiled by pleasures as a lotus growing in the water is not wetted by it, him we call a Brahmana.

28 "He who is not greedy, who lives unknown, who has no house and no property, and who has no friendship with householders, him we call a Brahmana.

29 "He who has given up his former connections (with his parents, etc.), with his kinsmen and relations, and who is not given to pleasure, him we call a Brahmana.

30 "The binding of animals (to the sacrificial pole), all the Vedas, and sacrifices, being causes of sin, cannot save the sinner; for his works (or Karman) are very powerful.

31 "One does not become a Sramana by the tonsure, nor a Brahmana by the sacred syllable om, nor a Muni by living in the woods, nor a Tapasa by wearing (clothes of) Kusa-grass and bark.

32 "One becomes a Sramana by equanimity, a Brahmana by chastity, a Muni by knowledge, and a Tapasa by penance.

33 "By one's actions one becomes a Brahmana, or a Kshatriya, or a Vaishya, or a Sudra.

34 "The Enlightened One has declared these (good qualities) through which one becomes a (true) Snataka; him who is exempt from all Karma, we call a Brahmana.

35 "The most excellent twice-born men who possess these good qualities, are able to save themselves and others."

36 When thus his doubt had been solved, Vigayaghosha, the Brahmana, assented* to the great sage Gayaghosha and to his (speech). [* Samudaya tayam tam tu. The text is evidently corrupted. Samudaya stands, according to the commentators, for samadaya, but there is no finite verb with which to construe the absolute participle, either expressed or easily supplied. Perhaps we must read samuvaya vayam = samuvaka vakas; for the perfect is retained in some cases. However, if this conjecture be right, the next line would be superfluous.]

37 Vigayaghosha, pleased, folded his hands and spoke as follows: 'You have well declared to me what true Brahmanhood consists in.

38 'You are a sacrificer of sacrifices, you are the most learned of those who know the Vedas, you know the Geyotishanga, you know perfectly the Law.

39 'You are able to save yourself and others; therefore do us the honour to accept our alms, O best of monks.'

40 'I do not want any alms; but, O Brahmana, enter the order at once, lest you should be drifted about on the dreadful ocean of the Samsara, whose eddies are dangers.

41 "There is glue (as it were) in pleasure: those who are not given to pleasure, are not soiled by it; those who love pleasures, must wander about in the Samsara; those who do not, will be liberated.

42 "If you take two clods of clay, one wet, the other dry, and fling them against the wall, the wet one will stick to it.

43 "Thus foolish men, who love pleasure, will be fastened (to Karma), but the passionless will not, even as the dry clod of clay (does not stick to the wall)."

44 When Vigayaghosha had learned the excellent Law from the houseless Gayaghosha, he entered the order.

45 Gayaghosha and Vigayaghosha both annihilated their Karma by self-control and penance, and reached the highest perfection.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 26TH LECTURE.

THE CORRECT BEHAVIOUR.

1 I shall declare the correct behaviour (samakari) which causes freedom from all misery; by practising it the Nirgranthas have crossed the ocean of Samsara.

2-4 The correct behaviour of monks consists of (the following) ten parts: 1st. avasyika; 2nd. naishedhiki; 3rd. aprikkhana; 4th. pratiprikkhana; 5th. khandana; 6th. ikkhakara; 7th. mithyakara; 8th. tathakara; 9th. abhyutthana; 10th. upasampad.

5-7 The avasyika is required when he leaves a room (or the presence of other monks on some necessary business); the naishedhiki, on entering a place; aprikkhana, (or asking the superior's permission) for what he is to do himself; pratiprikkhana, for what somebody else is to do; khandana, (or placing at the disposal of other monks) the things one has got; ikkhakara, in the execution (of one's intention by oneself or somebody else); mithyakara, in the blaming oneself (for sins committed); tathakara, (assent) in making a promise; abhyutthana, in serving those who deserve respect; and upasampad, in placing oneself under another teacher. Thus the twice fivefold behaviour has been declared.

8 After sunrise during the first quarter (of the first Paurushi)* he should inspect (and clean) his things and pay his respects to the superior. [* The southern half of the sky or horizon, between east and west, is divided into four quarters, each of which corresponds in time to a paurushi, the fourth part of a day or a night.]

9 Then, with his hands joined, he should ask him: 'What shall I do now? I want to be employed, sir, in doing some work or in studying.'

10 If he is ordered to do some work, he should do it without tiring; if he is ordered to study, he should do it without allowing himself to be affected by any pains.

11 A clever monk should divide the day into four (equal) parts (called paurushi), and fulfil his duties (uttaraguna) in all four parts.

12 In the first Paurushi he should study, in the second he should meditate, in the third he should go on his begging-tour, and in the fourth he should study again.

13 In the month Ashadha the Paurushi (of the night) contains two feet (pada); in the month Pausha, four; in the months Kaitra and Asvayuga, three. [ A paurushi is the fourth part of a day or a night; about the time of the equinoxes, when the day as well as the night contains twelve hours, the paurushi contains three hours. At the same time, in the months Kaitra and Asvina, as we learn from our verse, the paurushi has three feet, padas. The pada therefore is equal to one hour exactly. The duration of the night at the summer solstice was therefore estimated at eight hours and at the winter solstice at sixteen, just as in the Vedic Geyotisha.]

14 (The Paurushi) increases or decreases a digit* (angula) every week, two digits every fortnight, four digits every month. [* A digit, angula, is apparently the twelfth part of a foot, pada = one hour. The digit is therefore equal to five minutes.]

15 The dark fortnight of Ashadha, Bhadrpada, Karttika, Pausha, Phalgun, and Vaisakha are known as avamaratras [The fortnights, mentioned in the text, consist of fourteen days only, the remaining ones of fifteen days. In this way the lunar year is made to consist of 354 days.]

16 In the quarter of the year comprising the three months Gyeshtamula, Ashadha, and Sravana, the (morning-) inspection is to last six digits (beyond ¼ Paurushi); in the second quarter, eight; in the third, ten; in the fourth, eight [Or thirty, forty, fifty, forty minutes respectively.]

17 A clever monk should divide the night too into four parts, and fulfil his duties (uttaraguna) in all four parts.

18 In the first Paurushi he should study, in the second he should meditate, in the third he should leave off sleep, and in the fourth he should study again.

19 When the nakshatra which leads the night* has reached the first quarter of the heaven, at dawn he should cease to study. [* I.e. the nakshatra which is in opposition to the sun, and accordingly rises at the same time with the setting sun, and sets with the rising sun, compare Ramayana III, 16, 12.]

20 When a small part of the quarter is left [I.e. is about to set.], in which the (leading) nakshatra stands, during that space of time, being considered intermediate* (between two) days, a monk should watch. [* Veratiya, translated vairatrika; but there is no such word in Sanskrit. It apparently stands for dvairatrika, belonging to two days. As the Hindus reckon the day from sunrise, the time immediately preceding it may be considered to belong to two days.]

21 In the first quarter (of the first Paurushi) he should inspect (and clean) his things, pay his respects to his superior, and then begin to study, not allowing himself to be affected by any pains.

22 In the (last) quarter of the first Paurushi, after paying his respect to the Guru, a monk should inspect his almsbowl, without, however, performing the Kala-pratikramana.

23 He should first inspect his mouth-cloth, then his broom, and taking the broom in his hand he should inspect his cloth.

24 Standing upright he holds his cloth firmly and inspects it first leisurely, then he spreads it, and at last he wipes it.

25 (He should spread the cloth) without shaking or crushing it, in such a way as to make the folds shapely, and to avoid friction of its parts against each other; he should fold it up six times in length, and nine times in breadth, and then he should remove living beings with his hand (spreading the cloth on the palm of his hand).

26 He must avoid want of attention: 1st. in beginning his work; 2nd. in taking up the corners of the cloth; 3rd. in folding it up; 4th. in shaking out the dust; 5th. in putting it down (on some other piece of cloth); 6th. in sitting upon the haunches.

27 (One must further avoid) to hold the cloth loosely, or at one corner, or so as to let it flap, or so as to subject it to friction, or so as to shake it in different ways, or if one has made a mistake in the number of foldings (see verse 25) to count (aloud or with the help of the fingers, etc.)

28 There should be neither too little nor too much of inspection, nor an exchange (of the things to be inspected); this is the right way to do (the inspection), all other methods are wrong:--

29 (This is) if one engaged in inspecting his things converses or gossips (with anybody), renounces something, teaches another his lesson, or receives his own lesson from another, (he neglects his inspection).

30 He who is careful in the inspection, protects the six kinds of living beings, viz. the earth-bodies, water-bodies, fire-bodies, wind-bodies, plants, and animals.

31 He who is careless in the inspection, injures the six kinds of living beings (just enumerated).

32 In the third Paurushi he should beg food and drink, (he may do so) for any of the following six reasons:

33 1st. To prevent an illness; 2nd. to serve the Guru; 3rd. to be able to comply with the rules about walking; 4th. to be able to comply with the rules of self-control; 5th. to save one's life; 6th. to be able to meditate on the Law.

34 A zealous Nirgrantha or Nirgranthi may omit to beg food for the following six reasons, when it will not be considered a transgression of his duties:

35 1st. In case of illness; 2nd. in case of a disaster; 3rd. to preserve one's chastity and the Guptis; 4th. out of compassion for living beings; 5th. in the interest of penance; 6th. to make an end of one's life.

36 Taking his whole outfit a monk should inspect it with his eye; he then may walk about, but not beyond half a Yogana.

37 In the fourth Paurushi he should put away his almsbowl (after having eaten his meal), and then begins his study which reveals all existent things.

38 In the last quarter of the fourth Paurushi he should pay his reverence to the Guru, and after having performed Kala-pratikramana, he should inspect his lodging.

39 A zealous monk should also inspect the place where to discharge his excrements and urine, and then (till the sun sets) he should go through Kayotsarga without allowing himself to be affected by any pains.

40 Then he should, in due order, reflect on all transgressions he has committed during the day, with regard to knowledge, faith, and conduct.

41 Having finished Kayotsarga, and paid his reverence to the Guru, he should, in due order, confess his transgressions committed during the day.

42 Then having recited the Pratikramana Sutra, and having annihilated his sins, he should pay his reverence to the Guru (asking absolution), and go through Kayotsarga without allowing himself to be affected by any pains.

43 Having finished Kayotsarga, and paid his reverence to the Guru, he should pronounce the customary (three) praises, and then wait for the proper time.

44 In the first Paurushi (of the night) he should study; in the second he should meditate; in the third he should leave off sleep; and in the fourth he should study again.

45 In the fourth Paurushi he should wait for the proper time and then begin to study without waking the householders.

46 In the last quarter of the fourth Paurushi he should pay his reverence to the Guru, and performing Kala-pratikramana he should wait for the proper time.

47 When the (time for) Kayotsarga has arrived, he should go through it, without allowing himself to be affected by any pains.

48 Then he should, in due order, reflect on all transgressions he has committed during the night with regard to knowledge, faith, and conduct.

49 Having finished Kayotsarga and paid his reverence to the Guru, he should, in due order, confess his transgressions committed during the night.

50 Then having recited the Pratikramana Sutra etc. (see verse 41).

51 He should consider what kind of austerities he will undertake. Having finished his Kayotsarga, he pays his reverence to the Guru.

52 Having finished Kayotsarga and paid his reverence to the Guru, he should practise those austerities which he has decided upon, and praise the perfected saints.

53 Thus has been summarily declared the correct behaviour, by practising which many souls have crossed the ocean of Samsara.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 27TH LECTURE.

THE BAD BULLOCKS.

1 There was a Sthavira and Ganadhara, the learned sage Garga. This leader of the Gana once made the following reflections:

2 'He who rides in a car, crosses a wilderness; he who rides, as it were, in (the car of) religious exercise, crosses the Samsara.

3 'But he who puts bad bullocks before his car, will be tired out with beating them; he will feel vexation, and his goad will be broken (at last).

4 '(A bad bullock) will bite its mate in the tail; it will wound the other; it will break the pin of the yoke, or it will leave the road.

5 'It will fall down on its side, or sit down, or lie down; it will jump up or caper, or it will obstinately make for a young cow.

6 'It will furiously advance with its head lowered for an attack, or angrily go backward; it will stand still as if dead, or run at full speed.

7 'The cursed beast 4 will rend asunder the rope, or in its unreason break the yoke; and roaring it will break loose and run off.

8 'Just as bad bullocks are when put before a car, so are bad pupils when yoked, as it were, to the car of the Law; they break down through want of zeal.

9 'Some attach great importance to their success; some to their good fare; some to their comfort; some nurse their anger.

10 'Some are averse to begging; some are afraid of insults and are stuck up; (how can) I convince them by reasons and arguments?

11 '(A bad pupil) makes objections, and points out (imagined) difficulties; he frequently acts in opposition to the words of the superiors.

12 '(He will say if sent to a lady): "She does not know me, she will give me nothing; I suppose she will be gone out; send some other monk there."

13 'If sent on an errand, they do not do what they were bidden, but stroll about wherever they like; or departing themselves like servants of the king, they knit their brows (when speaking to other people).

14 'After they have been instructed, admitted into the order, and nourished with food and drink, they disperse in all directions like geese whose wings have grown.'

15 Now this driver (viz. Garga), who had to deal with bad bullocks, thought: 'What have I to do with bad pupils? I am disheartened.'

16 'As are bad pupils, so are bad bullocks; I shall leave these lazy donkeys, and shall practise severe austerities.'

17 That noble man, who was full of kindness, grave, and always meditating, wandered about on the earth, leading a virtuous life.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 28TH LECTURE.

THE ROAD TO FINAL DELIVERANCE.

1 Learn the true road leading to final deliverance, which the Ginas have taught; it depends on four causes and is characterised by right knowledge and faith.

2 A. Right knowledge; B. Faith; C. Conduct; and D. Austerities; this is the road taught by the Ginas who possess the best knowledge.

3 Right knowledge, faith, conduct, and austerities; beings who follow this road, will obtain beatitude.

4 A.) Knowledge is fivefold: 1st. Sruta, knowledge derived from the sacred books; 2nd. Abhinibodhika, perception; 3rd. Avadhi, supernatural knowledge; 4th. Manahpariyaya, knowledge of the thoughts of other people; 5th. Kevala, the highest, unlimited knowledge.

5 This is the fivefold knowledge. The wise ones have taught the knowledge of substances, qualities, and all developments.

6 Substance is the substrate of qualities; the qualities are inherent in one substance; but the characteristic of developments is that they inhere in either (viz. substances or qualities).

7 Dharma, Adharma, space, time, matter, and souls (are the six kinds of substances); they make up this world, as has been taught by the Ginas who possess the best knowledge.

8 Dharma, Adharma, and space are each one substance only; but time, matter, and souls are an infinite number of substances.

9 The characteristic of Dharma is motion, that of Adharma immobility, and that of space, which contains all other substances, is to make room (for everything).

10 The characteristic of time is duration, that of soul the realisation of knowledge, faith, happiness, and misery.

11 The characteristic of Soul is knowledge, faith, conduct, austerities, energy, and realisation (of its developments).

12 The characteristic of matter is sound, darkness, lustre (of jewels, etc.), light, shade, sunshine; colour, taste, smell, and touch.

13 The characteristic of development is singleness, separateness, number, form, conjunction, and disjunction.

14 1st. giva, Soul; 2nd. agiva, the inanimate things; 3rd. bandha, the binding of the soul by Karman; 4th. punya, merit; 5th. papa, demerit; 6th. asrava, that which causes the soul to be affected by sins; 7th. samvara, the prevention of asrava by watchfulness; 8th. the annihilation of Karman; 9th. final deliverance: these are the nine truths (or categories).

15 He who verily believes the true teaching of the (above nine) fundamental truths, possesses righteousness.

16 B.) Faith is produced by 1st. nisarga, nature; 2nd. upadesa, instruction; 3rd. agna, command; 4th. sutra, study of the sutras; 5th. biga, suggestion; 6th. abhigama, comprehension of the meaning of the sacred lore; 7th. vistara, complete course of study; 8th. kriya, religious exercise; 9th. samkshepa, brief exposition; 10th. dharma, the Law.

17 1. He who truly comprehends, by a spontaneous effort of his mind, (the nature of) soul, inanimate things, merit, and demerit, and who puts an end to sinful influences, (believes by) nature.

18 He who spontaneously believes the four truths (explicitly mentioned in the last verse), which the Ginas have taught, (thinking) they are of this and not of a different nature, believes by nature.

19 2. But he who believes these truths, having learned them from somebody else, either a Khadmastha 1 or a Gina, believes by instruction.

20 3. He who has got rid of love, hate, delusion, and ignorance, and believes because he is told to do so, believes by command.

21 4. He who obtains righteousness by (the study of) the Sutras, either Angas or other works, believes by the study of Sutras.

22 5. He who by correctly comprehending one truth arrives at the comprehension of more -- just as a drop of oil expands on the surface of water--believes by suggestion.

23 6. He who truly knows the sacred lore, viz. the eleven Angas, the Prakirnas, and the Drishtivada, believes by the comprehension of the sacred lore.

24 7. He who understands the true nature of all substances by means of all proofs (pramana) and nayas, believes by a complete course of study.

25 8. He who sincerely performs (all duties implied) by right knowledge, faith, and conduct, by asceticism and discipline, and by all Samitis and Guptis, believes by religious exercise.

26 9. He who though not versed in the sacred doctrines 1 nor acquainted with other systems, holds no wrong doctrines, believes by brief exposition.

27 10. He who believes in the truth of the realities, the Sutras, and conduct, as it has been explained by the Ginas, believes by the Law.

28 Right belief depends on the acquaintance with truth, on the devotion to those who know the truth, and on the avoiding of schismatical and heretical tenets.

29 There is no (right) conduct without right belief, and it must be cultivated (for obtaining) right faith; righteousness and conduct originate together, or righteousness precedes (conduct).

30 Without (right) faith there is no (right) knowledge, without (right) knowledge there is no virtuous conduct, without virtues there is no deliverance, and without deliverance there is no perfection.

31 (The excellence of faith depends on the following) eight points: 1st. that one has no doubts (about the truth of the tenets); 2nd. that one has no preference (for heterodox tenets); 3rd. that one does not doubt its saving qualities; 4th. that one is not shaken in the right belief (because heretical sects are more prosperous); 5th. that one praises (the pious); 6th. that one encourages (weak brethren); 7th. that one supports or loves the confessors of the Law; 8th. that one endeavours to exalt it.

32-33 C.) Conduct, which produces the destruction of all Karman, is 1st. samayika, the avoidance of everything sinful; 2nd. khedopasthapana, the initiation of a novice; 3rd. pariharavisuddhika, purity produced by peculiar austerities*; 4th. sukshma samparaya, reduction of desire; 5th. akashaya yathakhyata, annihilation of sinfulness according to the precepts of the Arhats, as well in the case of a Khadmastha as of a Gina. [* The Dipika contains the following details. Nine monks resolve to live together for eighteen months. They make one of their number their superior, kalpasthita, four become pariharikas, and the remaining four serve them (anupariharikas). After six months the pariharikas become anupariharikas and vice versa. After another six months the kalpasthita does penance and all the other monks serve him as anupariharikas.]

34 D.) Austerities are twofold: external and internal; both external and internal austerities are sixfold.

35 By knowledge one knows things, by faith one believes in them, by conduct one gets (freedom from Karman), and by austerities one reaches purity.

Having by thought and austerities destroyed their Karman, great sages, whose purpose is to get rid of all misery, proceed to (perfection).

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 29TH LECTURE.

THE EXERTION IN RIGHTEOUSNESS.

O long-lived (Gambusvamin)! I (Sudharman) have heard the following discourse from the venerable (Mahavira).

Here, forsooth, the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, of the Kasyapa Gotra, has delivered this lecture called the exertion in righteousness. Many creatures, who truly believe in the subject (taught in this lecture), put their faith in it, give credence to it, accept it, practise it, comply with it, study it, understand it, learn it, and act up to it according to the precept (of the Ginas) 1--have obtained perfection, enlightenment, deliverance, final beatitude, and have put an end to all misery.

This lecture treats of the following subjects:

1. samvega, longing for liberation;
2. nirveda, disregard of worldly objects;
3. dharmasradhdha, desire of the Law;
4. gurusadharmikasusrushana, obedience to co-religionists and to the Guru;
5. alokana, confession of sins before the Guru;
6. ninda, repenting of one's sins to oneself;
7. garha, repenting of one's sins before the Guru;
8. samayika, moral and intellectual purity of the soul;
9. katurvimsatstava, adoration of the twenty-four Ginas;
10. vandana, paying reverence to the Guru;
11. pratikramana, expiation of sins;
12. kayotsarga, a particular position of the body;
13. prayakhyana, self-denial;
14. stavastutimangala, praises and hymns;
15. kalasya pratyupekshana, keeping the right time;
16. prayaskittakarana, practising penance;
17. kshamapana, begging forgiveness;
18. svadhyaya, study;
19. vakana, recital of the sacred texts;
20. pariprikkhana, questioning (the teacher);
21. paravartana, repetition;
22. anupreksha, pondering;
23. dharmakatha, religious discourse;
24. srutasayaradhana, acquisition of sacred knowledge;

25. ekagramanahsannivesana, concentration of thoughts;
26. samyama, control;
27. tapas, austerities;
28. vyavadana, cutting off the Karman;
29. sukhasata, renouncing pleasure;
30. apratibaddhata, mental independence;
31. vikritasayanasanasevana, using unfrequented lodgings and beds;
32. vivivartana, turning from the world;
33. sambhogapratyakhyana, renouncing collection of alms in one district only;
34. upadhipratyakhyana, renouncing articles of use;
35. aharapratyakhyana, renouncing food;
36. kashayapratyakhyana, conquering the passions;
37. yogapratyakhyana, renouncing activity;
38. sarirapratyakhyana, renouncing the body;
39. sahayapratyakhyana, renouncing company;
40. bhaktapratyakhyana, renouncing all food;
41. sadbhavapratyakhyana, perfect renunciation;
42. pratirupata, conforming to the standard;
43. vaivyavritya, doing service;
44. sarvagunasampurnata, fulfilling all virtues;
45. vitaragata, freedom from passion;
46. kshanti, patience;
47. mukti, freedom from greed;
48. argava, simplicity;
49. mardava, humility;
50. bhavasatya, sincerity of mind;
51. karanasatya, sincerity of religious practice;
52. yogasatya, sincerity of acting;
53. manoguptata, watchfulness of the mind;
54. vag-guptata, watchfulness of the speech;
55. kavaguptata, watchfulness of the body;
56. manahsamadharana, discipline of the mind;
57. vaksamadharana, discipline of the speech;
58. kayasamadharana, discipline of the body;
59. gnanasampannata, possession of knowledge;
60. darsanasampannata, possession of faith;
61. karitasampannata, possession of conduct;
62. srotrendriyanigraha, subduing the ear;
63. kakshurindriyanigraha, subduing the eye;
64. ghranendriyanigraha, subduing the organ of smell;
65. gihvendriyanigraha, subduing the tongue;
66. sparsanendriyanigraha, subduing the organ of touch;
67. krodhavigaya, conquering anger;
68. manavigaya, conquering pride;
69. mayavigaya, conquering deceit;
70. lobhavigaya, conquering greed;
71. premadveshamithyadarsanavigaya, conquering love, hate, and wrong belief;
72. sailesi, stability;
73. akarmata, freedom from Karman.

1 Sir, what does the soul obtain by the longing for liberation? By the longing for liberation the soul obtains an intense desire of the Law; by an intense desire of the Law he quickly arrives at an (increased) longing for liberation; he destroys anger, pride, deceit, and greed, which reproduce themselves infinitely; he acquires no (bad) Karman, and ridding himself of wrong belief which is the consequence of the latter, he becomes possessed of right faith; by the purity of faith some will reach perfection after one birth; nobody, however, who has got this purity, will be born more than thrice before he reaches perfection.

2 Sir, what does the soul obtain by disregard of worldly objects? By disregard of worldly objects the soul quickly feels disgust for pleasures enjoyed by gods, men, and animals; he becomes indifferent to all objects; thereby he ceases to engage in any undertakings, in consequence of which he leaves the road of Samsara and enters the road to perfection.

3 Sir 1, what does the soul obtain by the desire of the Law? By the desire of the Law the soul becomes indifferent to pleasures and happiness to which he was attached; he abandons the life of householders, and as a houseless monk he puts an end to all pains of body and mind, which consist in (the suffering of) cutting, piercing, union (with unpleasant things), etc.; and he obtains unchecked happiness.

4 By obedience to co-religionists and to the Guru the soul obtains discipline (vinaya). By discipline and avoidance of misconduct (towards the teacher) he avoids being reborn as a denizen of hell, an animal, a (low) man, or a (bad) god; by zealous praise of, devotion to, and respect for (the Guru) he obtains birth as a (good) man or god, gains perfection and beatitude, does all praiseworthy actions prescribed by discipline, and prevails upon others to adopt discipline.

5 By confession of sins (before the Guru) the soul gets rid of the thorns, as it were, of deceit, misapplied austerities, and wrong belief, which obstruct the way to final liberation and cause an endless migration of the soul; he obtains simplicity, whereby the soul which is free from deceit does not acquire that Karman which results in his having a carnal desire for a woman or eunuch 4, and annihilates such Karman as he had acquired before.

6 By repenting of one's sins to oneself the soul obtains repentance, and becoming indifferent by repentance he prepares for himself an (ascending) scale of virtues*, by which he destroys the Karman resulting from delusion. [*Karanagnasredhim pratipadyate. It is difficult to render this phrase adequately; the meaning is that by successively destroying moral impurities one arrives at higher and higher virtues.]

7 By repenting of one's sins before the Guru the soul obtains humiliation; feeling humiliated, he will leave off all blameable occupations, and apply himself to praiseworthy occupations, whereby a houseless monk will stop infinite disabling developments.

8 By moral and intellectual purity (literally, equilibrium) the soul ceases from sinful occupations.

9 By the adoration of the twenty-four Ginas the soul arrives at purity of faith.

10 By paying reverence (to the Guru) the soul destroys such Karman as leads to birth in low families, and acquires such Karman as leads to birth in noble families; he wins the affection of people, which results in his being looked upon as an authority, and he brings about general goodwill.

11 By expiation of sins he obviates transgressions of the vows; thereby he stops the Asravas, preserves a pure conduct, practises the eight articles, does not neglect (the practice of control), and pays great attention to it.

12 By Kayotsarga he gets rid of past and present (transgressions which require) Prayaskitta; thereby his mind is set at ease like a porter who is eased of his burden; and engaging in praiseworthy contemplation he enjoys happiness.

13 By self-denial he shuts, as it were, the doors of the Asravas; by self-denial he prevents desires rising in him; by prevention of desires he becomes, as it were, indifferent and cool towards all objects.

14 By praises and hymns he obtains the wisdom consisting in knowledge, faith, and conduct; thereby he gains such improvement, that he will put an end to his worldly existence, (or) be born afterwards in one of the Kalpas and Vimanas.

15 By keeping the right time he destroys the Karman which obstructs right knowledge.

16. By practising Prayaskitta he gets rid of sins, and commits no transgressions; he who correctly practises Prayaskitta, gains the road and the reward of the road, he wins the reward of good conduct.

17 By begging forgiveness he obtains happiness of mind; thereby he acquires a kind disposition towards all kinds of living beings; by this kind disposition he obtains purity of character and freedom from fear.

18 By study he destroys the Karman which obstructs right knowledge. (18)

19 By the recital of the sacred texts he obtains destruction of Karman, and contributes to preserve the sacred lore, whereby he acquires the Law of the Tirtha, which again leads him to the complete destruction of Karman, and to the final annihilation of worldly existence.

20 By questioning (the teacher) he arrives at a correct comprehension of the Sutra and its meaning, and he puts an end to the Karman which produces doubts and delusion.

21 By repetition he reproduces the sounds (i.e. syllables) and commits them to memory.

22 By pondering (on what he has learned) he loosens the firm hold which the seven kinds of Karman, except the Ayushka (have upon the soul); he shortens their duration when it was to be a long one; he mitigates their power when it was intense; (he reduces their sphere of action when it was a wide one); he may either acquire Ayushka-karman or not, but he no more accumulates Karman which produces unpleasant feelings, and he quickly crosses the very large forest of the fourfold Samsara, which is without beginning and end.

23 By religious discourses he obtains destruction of the Karman; by religious discourses he exalts the creed, and by exalting the creed he acquires Karman, which secures, for the future, permanent bliss.

24 By acquisition of sacred knowledge he destroys ignorance, and will not be corrupted by worldliness.

25 By concentration of his thoughts he obtains stability of the mind.

26 By control he obtains freedom from sins.

27 By austerities he cuts off the Karman.

28 By cutting off the Karman he obtains (the fourth stage of pure meditation characterised by) freedom from actions, by doing no actions he will obtain perfection, enlightenment, deliverance, and final beatitude, and will put an end to all misery.

29 By renouncing pleasures he obtains freedom from false longing, whereby he becomes compassionate, humble, free from sorrow, and destroys the Karman produced by delusion regarding conduct.

30 By mental independence he gets rid of attachment, whereby he will concentrate his thoughts (on the Law), and will for ever be without attachment and fondness (for worldly things).

31 By using unfrequented lodgings and beds he obtains the Gupti of conduct, whereby he will use allowed food, be steady in his conduct, be exclusively delighted with (control), obtain a yearning for deliverance, and cut off the tie of the eightfold Karman.

32 By turning from the world he will strive to do no bad actions, and will eliminate his already acquired Karman by its destruction; then he will cross the forest of the fourfold Samsara.

33 By renouncing collection of alms in one district only he overcomes obstacles; unchecked by them he exerts himself to attain liberation; he is content with the alms he gets, and does not hope for, care for, wish, desire, or covet those of a fellow-monk; not envying other monks he takes up a separate, agreeable lodging.

34 By renouncing articles of use he obtains successful study; without articles of use he becomes exempt from desires, and does not suffer misery.

35 By renouncing (the forbidden) food he ceases to act for the sustenance of his life; ceasing to act for the sustenance of his life he does not suffer misery when without food.

36 By conquering his passions he becomes free from passions; thereby he becomes indifferent to happiness and pains.

37 By renouncing activity he obtains inactivity, by ceasing to act he acquires no new Karman, and destroys the Karman he had acquired before.

38 By renouncing his body he acquires the pre-eminent virtues of the Siddhas, by the possession of which he goes to the highest region of the universe, and becomes absolutely happy.

39 By renouncing company he obtains singleness; being single and concentrating his mind, he avoids disputes, quarrels, passions, and censoriousness, and he acquires a high degree of control, of Samvara, and of carefulness.

40 By renouncing all food he prevents his being born again many hundreds of times.

41 By perfect renunciation he enters the final (fourth stage of pure meditation), whence there is no return; a monk who is in that state, destroys the four remnants of Karman which even a Kevalin possesses, viz. vedaniya, ayushka, naman, and gotra; and then he will put an end to all misery.

42 By conforming to the standard of monks he obtains ease, thereby he will be careful, wear openly the excellent badges of the order, be of perfect righteousness, possess firmness and the Samitis, inspire all beings with confidence, mind but few things, subdue his senses, and practise, in a high degree, the Samitis and austerities.

43 By doing service he acquires the Karman which brings about for him the naman and gotra of a Tirthakara.

44 By fulfilling all virtues he secures that he will not be born again; thereby he will become exempt from pains of the body and mind.

45 By freedom from passion he cuts off the ties of attachment and desire; thereby he becomes indifferent to all agreeable and disagreeable sounds, touches, colours, and smells.

46 By patience he overcomes troubles.

47 By freedom from greed he obtains voluntary poverty, whereby he will become inaccessible to desire for property.

48 By simplicity he will become upright in actions, thoughts, and speech, and he will become veracious; thereby he will truly practise the Law.

49 By humility he will acquire freedom from self-conceit; thereby he will become of a kind and meek disposition, and avoid the eight kinds of pride.

50 By sincerity of mind he obtains purity of mind, which will cause him to exert himself for the fulfilment of the Law which the Ginas have proclaimed; and he will practise the Law in the next world too.

51 By sincerity in religious practice he obtains proficiency in it; being proficient in it he will act up to his words.

52 By sincerity of acting he will become pure in his actions.

53 By watchfulness 1 of the mind he concentrates his thoughts; thereby he truly practises control.

54 By watchfulness of speech he keeps free from prevarication; thereby he enables his mind to act properly.

55 By watchfulness of the body he obtains Samvara; thereby he prevents sinful Asravas.

56 By discipline of the mind he obtains concentration of his thoughts; thereby he obtains development of knowledge, which produces righteousness and annihilates wrong belief.

57 By discipline of the speech he obtains development of faith, whereby he acquires facility of becoming enlightened, and destroys preventing causes.

58 By discipline of the body he obtains development of conduct, which causes him to conduct himself according to the regulation; thereby he destroys the four remnants of Karman which even a Kevalin possesses; after that he obtains perfection, enlightenment, deliverance, and final beatitude, and he puts an end to all misery.

59 By possession of knowledge he acquires an understanding of words and their meaning; thereby he will not perish in the forest of the fourfold Samsara; as a needle with its thread will not be lost, thus the soul possessing the sacred lore will not be lost in the Samsara; he performs all prescribed actions relating to knowledge, discipline, austerities, and conduct, and well versed in his own and in heterodox creeds he will become invincible.

60 By possession of faith he annihilates wrong belief which is the cause of worldly existence, and he will not lose his inner light; but he endues his Self with the highest knowledge and faith, and purifies it.

61 By possession of conduct he obtains a stability like that of the king of mountains 2 (viz. Meru), whereby a houseless monk destroys the four remnants of Karman which even a Kevalin possesses; after that he obtains perfection, enlightenment, deliverance, and final beatitude, and puts an end to all misery.

62 By subduing the organ of hearing he overcomes his delight with or aversion to all pleasant or unpleasant sounds, he acquires no Karman produced thereby, and destroys the Karman he had acquired before.

63-66 (All this applies also to his) subduing the organs of sight, of smelling, of tasting, and of touch (with regard to) pleasant colours, smells, tastes, and touches.

67. By conquering anger he obtains patience; he acquires no Karman productive of anger, and destroys the Karman he had acquired before.

68 By conquering pride he obtains simplicity, etc. (as in 67, substituting pride for anger).

69 By conquering deceit he obtains humility, etc. (as in 67, substituting deceit for anger).

70 By conquering greed he obtains content, etc. (as in 67, substituting greed for anger).

71 By conquering love, hate, and wrong belief he exerts himself for right knowledge, faith, and conduct, then he will cut off the fetters of the eightfold Karman; he will first destroy the twenty-eight kinds of Karman, which are productive of delusion; (then) the five kinds of obstruction to right knowledge, the nine kinds of obstruction to right faith, and the five kinds of obstacles (called Antaraya): the last three remnants of Karman he destroys simultaneously; afterwards he obtains absolute knowledge and faith, which is supreme, full, complete, unchecked, clear, faultless, and giving light (or penetrating) the whole universe; and while he still acts, he acquires but such Karman as is inseparable from religious acts; the pleasant feelings (produced by it) last but two moments: in the first moment it is acquired, in the second it is experienced, and in the third it is destroyed; this Karman is produced, comes into contact (with the soul), takes rise, is experienced, and is destroyed; for all time to come he is exempt from Karman.

72 Then when his life is spent up to less than half a muhurta, he discontinues to act, and enters upon the (third degree of) pure meditation, from which there is no relapse (to lower degrees), and which requires most subtle functions only (of his organs); he first stops the functions of his mind, then the functions of speech, then those of the body, at last he ceases to breathe. During the time required for pronouncing five short syllables, he is engaged in the final pure meditation, in which all functions (of his organs) have ceased, and he simultaneously annihilates the four remnants of Karman, viz. vedaniya, ayushka, naman, and gotra.

73 Then having, by all methods, got rid of his audarika, karmana (and taigasa) bodies, the soul takes the form of a straight line, goes in one moment, without touching anything and taking up no space, (upwards to the highest Akasa), and there develops into its natural form, obtains perfection, enlightenment, deliverance, and final beatitude, and puts an end to all misery.

74 This indeed is the subject of the lecture called exertion in righteousness, which the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira has told, declared, explained, demonstrated.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 30TH LECTURE.
THE ROAD OF PENANCE.

1 Now hear with concentrated mind, how a monk destroys by austerities the bad Karman which he had acquired by love and hatred

2 By abstaining 1st. from destroying life; 2nd. from lying; 3rd. from taking anything which is not given; 4th. from all sexual indulgence; 5th. from having any property; and 6th. from eating at night, the soul becomes free from Asravas.

3 By possessing the five Samitis and the three Guptis, by freedom from passions, by subduing the senses, by vanquishing conceit, and by avoiding delusions, the soul becomes free from Asravas.

4 Hear attentively how a monk destroys (the Karman) acquired by love and hatred in the absence of the above-mentioned (virtues).

5, 6 As a large tank, when its supply of water has been stopped, gradually dries up by the consumption of the water and by evaporation, so the Karman of a monk, which he acquired in millions of births, is annihilated by austerities, if there is no influx of bad Karman.

THE GRAND BIBLE

7 Austerities are of two kinds: external and internal; external austerities are of six kinds, and internal are of six kinds.

External austerities are:

8 1st. asana, fasting; 2nd. avamadarika, abstinence; 3rd. bhikshakarya, collecting alms; 4th. rasaparityaga, abstention from dainty food; 5th. kayaklesa, mortification of the flesh; 6th. samlinata, taking care of one's limbs.

9 1. Fasting is of two kinds: a. itvara, temporary, and b. maranakala, fasting which precedes, and ends with death. Temporary fasting is either such in which a desire (for food) is present, or such in which no such desire exists.

10 a. The temporary fasting is briefly of six kinds: 1st. in the form of a line*; 2nd. in the form of a square; 3rd. in the form of a cube; 4th. of a sixth power; 5th. of a twelfth power; 6th. of any arrangement. Temporary fasting (can be practised) for different objects which one has in mind.

[* 175:4 The meaning of this singular statement is as follows. If four fasts of two, three, four, and five days are performed in this order, they form a line. If this set of fasts is four times repeated, each time beginning with a different number, we get sixteen fasts; they form a square, viz.:

1. 2. 3. 4

2. 3. 4. 1

3. 4. 1. 2

4. 1. 2. 3

11 The next class contains 64 fasts, the fourth 4,096, the fifth 16,777,216 fasts. Fasts of the last class require 700,000 years at least, and must be assumed to be restricted to former Tirthakaras, whose lives lasted enormous periods of time.

12 b. Fasting which is to precede death, is of two kinds with regard to the motions of the body: with change (of position) and without change.

13 And again it is twofold: admitting of relief 1, or not; one may either leave the place (which one has chosen to die in), or not leave it; in both cases one may not take any food.

14 2. Abstinence is briefly of five kinds: with regard to a. substance; b. place; c. time; d. state of mind; e. development.

15 a. He who takes less food than he usually does, in the extreme case but one mouthful, performs abstinence with regard to substance.

16 b. (Place means) a village, a scotfree town [Nagara, where no taxes (na kara) are levied, while villages pay eighteen taxes.], a capital, a camp of merchants, a mine, a settlement of a wild tribe, a place with an earth wall, a poor town, a town with a harbour, a large town, an isolated town, and an open town.

17 In a hermitage, a vihara, a halting-place for procession, a resting-place for travellers, a station of herdsmen, a camp on high ground, a caravan's camp, a fortified place of refuge.

18 In gardens, on roads, in houses--all this is meant by place. In these and similar places he may (wander about). In this way he performs abstinence with regard to place.

19 1st. peta, 2nd. ardhapeta, 3rd. gomutrika, 4th. patangavithika, 5th. sambukavarta, 6th. ayatam-gatvatrayagata.

20 c. Abstinence with reference to time (is observed by him) who goes about in that time of the four Paurushis of the day (which he selects for that purpose).

21 Or if he collects alms in a part of the third Paurushi, or in its last quarter, then he observes abstinence with reference to time.

22, 23 d. Abstinence with reference to state of mind (is observed by him) who accepts alms from a woman or man, from an adorned or unadorned person, from one of any age or dress, of any temper or colour: if that person does not change his disposition or condition.

24 e. A monk who observes abstinence according to the particulars which have been enumerated with regard to substance, place, time, and state of mind, observes abstinence with regard to development too.

25 3. With regard to collecting alms there are the eight principal ways how to collect them; the seven eshanas (or modes of begging) and other self-imposed restrictions.

26 4. Abstention from dainty food means abstention from such highly nourishing food and drink as milk, curds, ghee, etc.

27 5. Mortification of the flesh consists in the different postures as Virasana, etc., which benefit the soul, and which are difficult to perform.

28 6. Using unfrequented lodgings and beds consists in living and sleeping in separate and unfrequented places where there are neither women nor cattle.

29 Thus external austerities have been briefly explained; I shall now explain internal austerities in due order.

30 Internal austerities are:

1. prayaskitta, expiation of sins;

2. vinaya, politeness;

3. vaiyavriya, serving the Guru;

4. svadhaya, study;

5. dhyana, meditation;

6. vyutsarga, abandoning of the body.

31 1. Expiation of sins is tenfold, what must be confessed, etc.; this is to be strictly observed by a monk; this is called expiation of sins.

32 2. Politeness consists in rising (from one's seat), folding of the hands, offering of a seat, loving the Guru, and cordial obedience.

33 3. There are ten kinds of service, as serving the Akarya, etc.; doing service consists in giving one's assistance as well as one is able.

34 4. Study is fivefold: 1st. saying or learning one's lesson; 2nd. (questioning the teacher about it); 3rd. repetition; 4th. pondering; 5th. religious discourse.

35 5. Abstaining to meditate on painful and sinful things, one should, with a collected mind, engage in pure meditations on the Law; this the wise call meditation.

36 6. If a monk remains motionless when lying down, sitting, or standing upright, this is called abandoning of the body, which is the sixth kind (of internal austerities).

37 If a sage truly performs these two kinds of austerities, he will soon be thoroughly released from the Circle of Births.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 31ST LECTURE.

MODE OF LIFE.

1 I shall declare the mode of life that benefits the soul; by practising it many souls have crossed the ocean of Samsara.

2 One should desist from one thing, and practise another: desist from neglect of self-control, and practise self-control.

3 Love and hatred are two evils which produce bad Karman; if a monk always avoids them, he will not stand within the circle (of transmigration).

4 A monk who always avoids the thrice threefold hurtful, conceited, and delusive acts, will not stand in the circle (of transmigration).

5 A monk who well bears calamities produced by gods, animals, or men, will not stand, etc.

6 A monk who always avoids the (four) different kinds of praises, passions, expressions (of the emotions), and (of the four) meditations the two sinful ones, will not stand, etc.

7 A monk who always exerts himself with regard to the (five) vows, the (five) objects of sense, the (five) Samitis, and (five) actions, will not stand, etc.

8 A monk who always exerts himself with regard to the six lesyas, the six kinds of bodies, and the six (regular functions as) eating, will not stand, etc.

9 A monk who always exerts himself with regard to the (seven) rules of accepting alms 8, and the seven causes of danger (to other men) will not stand, etc.

10 A monk who always exerts himself with regard to the (eight) objects of pride 1, to that which protects his chastity, and to the tenfold Law of the monks.

11 A monk who always exerts himself with regard to the (eleven) duties of the upasakas, and the (twelve) duties of the bhikshus, will not stand, etc.

12 A monk who always exerts himself with regard to the (thirteen) actions (productive of Karman), to the various (fourteen) kinds of living beings, and the (fifteen) places of punishment of the wicked, will not stand, etc.

13 A monk who always exerts himself with regard to the sixteen Gathas, and to the (seventeen kinds of) neglect of self-control, will not stand, etc.

14 A monk who always exerts himself with regard to the (eighteen kinds of) continence, to the (nineteen) gnatadhyayanas, and the (twenty) cases for not concentrating one's thoughts, will not, etc.

15 A monk who always exerts himself with regard to the twenty-one forbidden 1 actions, and the twenty-two troubles, will not stand, etc.

16 A monk who always exerts himself with regard to the twenty-three (lectures of the) Suttrakritanga, and to the gods whose number exceeds by an unit* (the number of the lectures of the Suttrakritanga), will not stand, etc. [* Rupa. The twenty-four gods are: ten Bhavanapatis, eight Vyantaras, five Gyotishkas, one Vaimanika; or the 24 prophets.]

17 A monk who always exerts himself with regard to the twenty-five clauses, and (to the recitation of the twenty-six) chapters of the Dasas, etc., will not stand, etc.

18 A monk who always exerts himself with regard to the (twenty-seven) virtues of the laity, and the (twenty-eight) lectures of the Prakalpa*, will not stand, etc. [* Rupa. The twenty-four gods are: ten Bhavanapatis, eight Vyantaras, five Gyotishkas, one Vaimanika; or the 24 prophets.]

19 A monk who always exerts himself with regard to the (twenty-nine) causes of wrong knowledge, and the (thirty) causes of delusion, will not stand, etc.

20 A monk who always exerts himself with regard to the (thirty-one) qualities of Siddhas, etc., the (thirty-two) Yogas, and thirty-three Asatanas, will not stand, etc.

21 A clever monk who always exerts himself with regard to the above-mentioned points, will soon be thoroughly released from the Circle of Births

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 32ND LECTURE.

THE CAUSES OF CARELESSNESS.

1 With attentive mind hear me explain for your benefit the deliverance from the beginningless time, together with its causes, and from all misery: a truly wholesome subject.

2 By the teaching of true knowledge, by the avoidance of ignorance and delusion, and by the destruction of love and hatred, one arrives at final deliverance which is nothing but bliss.

3 This is the road to it: to serve the Gurus and the old (teachers), to avoid throughout foolish people, to apply oneself earnestly to study, and to ponder zealously on the meaning of the Sutras.

4 A Sramana engaged in austerities, who longs for righteousness, should eat the proper quantity of allowed food, should select a companion of right understanding, and should live in a place suited to seclusion.

5 If he does not meet with a clever companion who surpasses or equals him in virtue, he should live by himself, abstaining from sins and not devoted to pleasures.

6 As the crane is produced from an egg, and the egg is produced from a crane, so they call desire the origin of delusion, and delusion the origin of desire.

7 Love and hatred are caused by Karman, and they say that Karman has its origin in delusion; Karman is the root of birth and death, and birth and death they call misery.

8 Misery ceases on the absence of delusion, delusion ceases on the absence of desire, desire ceases on the absence of greed, greed ceases on the absence of property.

9 I shall explain in due order the means which must be adopted by him who wants to thoroughly uproot love, hatred, and delusion.

10 Pleasant food should not be enjoyed with preference, for it generally makes men over-strong; and desires rush upon the strong, like birds upon a tree with sweet fruits.

11 As in a forest, full of fuel, a fire fanned by the wind cannot be extinguished, so the fire (as it were) of the senses of him who eats as he lists; it does not benefit any chaste man.

12 The mind of those who always live in unfrequented lodgings, who eat low food, and who subdue their senses, will not be attacked by the foe, Love, who is vanquished as disease is by medicine.

13 As it is not safe for mice to live near the dwelling of a cat, so a chaste (monk) cannot stay in a house inhabited by women.

14 A Sramana, engaged in penance, should not allow himself to watch the shape, beauty, coquetry, laughter, prattle, gestures, and glances of women, nor retain a recollection of them in his mind.

15 Not to look at, nor to long for, not to think of, nor to praise, womankind: this is becoming the meditation of the noble ones, and it is always wholesome to those who delight in chastity.

16 Though those who possess the three Guptis, cannot be disturbed even by well-adorned goddesses, still it is recommended to monks to live by themselves, as this is wholesome in every way.

17 To a man who longs for liberation, who is afraid of the Samsara, and lives according to the Law, nothing in the world offers so many difficulties 1 as women who delight the mind of the ignorant.

18 To those who have overcome the attachment (to women), all others will offer no difficulties; even as to those who have crossed the great ocean, no river, though big like the Ganges, (will offer any difficulty).

19 From desire of pleasure arises the misery of the whole world, the gods included; whatever misery of body and mind there is, the dispassionate will put an end to it.

20 As the fruit of the Kimpaka is beautiful in taste and colour, when eaten; but destroys the life when digested, (being) poison; similar in their effect are pleasures.

21 A Sramana, engaged in austerities, who longs for righteousness, should not fix his thoughts on the pleasant objects of the senses, nor turn his mind from them, if they be unpleasant.

22 'Colour' attracts the eye; it is the pleasant cause of Love, but the unpleasant cause of Hatred*; he who is indifferent to them (viz. colours), is called dispassionate. [Love and Hatred must of course be understood in their widest meaning. The same remark applies to the term 'colour,' which according to Hindu terminology denotes everything that is perceived by the eye. The first three sentences are, in the original, dependent on verbs as vadanti, ahus. I have, here and elsewhere, dropped them in the translation.]

23 The eye perceives 'colour,' and 'colour' attracts the eye; the cause of Love is pleasant, and the cause of Hatred is unpleasant.

24 He who is passionately fond of 'colours,' will come to untimely ruin; just as an impassioned moth which is attracted by the light rushes into death.

25 He who passionately hates (a colour), will at the same moment suffer pain. It is the fault of an undisciplined man that he is annoyed (by a colour); it is not the 'colour' itself that annoys him.

26 He who is very fond of a lovely 'colour,' hates all others; hence a fool will suffer misery, but a dispassionate sage is not affected by it.

27 He who has a passion for 'colours,' will kill many movable and immovable beings; a passionate fool, intent on his personal interest, pains and torments those beings in many ways.

28 How can a man who passionately desires 'colours,' be happy while he gets, keeps, uses, loses, and misses (those things). Even when he enjoys them, he is never satisfied.

29 When he is not satisfied with those 'colours,' and his craving for them grows stronger and stronger, he will become discontented, and unhappy by dint of his discontent; misled by greed he will take another's property.

30 When he is overcome by violent desire, takes another's property, and is not satisfied with those 'colours' and their possession, then his deceit and falsehood increase on account of his greed; yet he will not get rid of his misery.

31 After and before he has lied, and when he is on the point of lying, he feels infinitely unhappy. Thus when he takes another's property, and is (after all) not satisfied by the 'colours' (he has obtained), he becomes unhappy, and nobody will protect him.

32 How, then, can a man who is devoted to 'colours,' ever derive any happiness from anything? He suffers pain at the time of their enjoyment to procure which he had suffered misery.

33 In the same way he who hates 'colours,' incurs a long succession of pains; when his mind is filled with hatred, he accumulates Karman which in the end again produces misery.

34 But a man who is indifferent to 'colours,' is free from sorrows; though still in the Samsara, he is not affected by that long succession of pains, just as the leaf of the Lotus (is not moistened) by water.

* * *

[The whole set of verses 22-34 is, with few alterations, five times repeated in the original in order to apply to the other organs of sense.

Verses 35-47 treat of sounds; 'sound' is to be substituted for 'colour,' 'ear' for 'eye.'

The last line of verse 37, which corresponds to verse 24, runs thus:

As an impassioned deer allured (by a song) rushes into death, without being satisfied with the sound.

In the same way verses 48-60 apply to smells; substitute 'smell' and 'organ of smell.'

Verses 61-73 apply to tastes; substitute 'tastes' and 'tongue.'

Verses 74-86 apply to touches; substitute 'touches' and 'body.'

Verses 87-99 apply to feelings; substitute 'feelings' and 'mind.'

50 The lines corresponding to the comparison in verse 24, run as follows:

Just as an impassioned snake which is allured by the smell of a drug, when it comes out of its hole.

63 Just as an impassioned fish which is eager to swallow the bait, has its body transfixed by a hook.

76 Just as an impassioned buffalo who dives in cold water, is taken hold of by a crocodile and dies.

89 Just as an impassioned elephant who is inflamed by carnal desires, is turned from his way by a female elephant (and is captured and at last killed in battle).]

* * *

100 Thus the objects of the senses and of the mind cause pain to passionate men, but they never in the least cause any pain to the dispassionate.

101 Pleasant things (by themselves) do not cause indifference nor emotions (as anger, etc.); but by either hating or loving them, a man undergoes such a change through delusion.

102, 103 Anger, pride, deceit, greed; disgust, aversion to self-control and delight in sensual things 1; mirth, fear, sorrow, carnal desire for women, men, or both; all these manifold passions arise in him who is attached to pleasures; and so do other emotions produced by those (before mentioned) arise in him who is to be pitied, who (ought to be) ashamed of himself, and who is hateful.

104 A monk should not desire a companion, nor (even) one who is able to perform his religious duties; nor, if he regrets having taken the vows, (should he desire for) a worldly reward of his austerities. Such emotions of an infinite variety arise in one who is the slave of his senses.

105 Desiring happiness and being submerged in the ocean of delusion, he forms many plans for warding off misery; and for their sake an impassioned man exerts himself.

106 But all kinds of objects of the senses, sounds, etc., will cause to the indifferent neither a pleasant nor an unpleasant feeling.

107 He who endeavours to recognise the vanity of all desires, will arrive at perfect indifference. When he ceases to desire the objects (of the senses), his desire for pleasures will become extinct.

108 The dispassionate man who has performed all duties will quickly remove the obstructions to right knowledge and to right faith, and whatever Karman produces obstruction (to righteousness).

109 Then he knows and sees all things, he is free from delusion and hindrances, his Asravas have gone, and he is proficient in meditation and concentration of thoughts, and being pure he will arrive at beatitude when his life is spent.

110 He will get rid of all misery which always afflicts mankind; recovered from the long illness, as it were, and glorious, he becomes infinitely happy, and obtains the (final) aim.

111 We have taught the way how to become exempt from all misery which arises since time without beginning; those beings who follow it will in their time become infinitely happy. Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 33RD LECTURE.

THE NATURE OF KARMAN.

1 I shall now in due order explain the eight kinds of Karman, bound by which the soul turns round and round in the Circle of Births.

2, 3 The eight kinds of Karman are briefly the following:

1. Gnanavaraniya (which acts as an obstruction to right knowledge);

2. Darsanavaraniya (which acts as an obstruction to right faith);

3. Vedaniya (which leads to experiencing pain or pleasure);

4. Mohaniya (which leads to delusion);

5. Ayuhkarman (which determines the length of life);

6. Naman (which determines the name or individuality of the embodied soul);

7. Gotra (which determines his Gotra);

8. Antaraya (which prevents one's entrance on the path that leads to eternal bliss).

4 1. Obstruction of knowledge is fivefold (viz. obstruction to):

a. Sruta, knowledge derived from the sacred books;

b. Abhinibodhika, perception;

c. Avadhigana, supernatural knowledge;

d. Manahpariyaya, knowledge of the thoughts of other people;

e. Kevala, the highest, unlimited knowledge.

5, 6 2. The nine kinds of obstruction to right faith are: 1st. sleep; 2nd. activity; 3rd. very deep sleep; 4th. a high degree of activity; 5th. a state of deep-rooted greed; 6th-9th refer to faith in the objects of the first three and the last kinds of knowledge.

7 3. Vedaniya is twofold, pleasure and pain; there are many subdivisions of pleasure and so there are of pain also.

8 4. Mohaniya is twofold as referring to faith and to conduct; the first is threefold, the second twofold.

9 The three kinds of Mohaniya referring to faith are: 1st. right faith; 2nd. wrong faith; 3rd. faith partly right and partly wrong.

10 The two kinds of Mohaniya referring to conduct are: 1st. what is experienced in the form of the four cardinal passions; 2nd. what is experienced in the form of feelings different from them.

11 The first kind of this Karman is sixteenfold, the second sevenfold or ninefold.

12 5. Ayushka is fourfold as referring to 1st. denizens of hell; 2nd. brute creation; 3rd. men; 4th. gods.

13 6. Naman is twofold, good and bad; there are many subdivisions of the good variety, and so there are of the bad one also.

14 7. Gotra is twofold, high and low; the first is eightfold, and so is the second also.

15 8. Antaraya is fivefold as preventing: 1st. gifts; 2nd. profit; 3rd. momentary enjoyment; 4th. continuous enjoyment; and 5th. power.

16 Thus the division of Karman and the subdivisions have been told.

Now hear their number of atoms, place, time, and development.

17 The number of atoms of every Karman is infinite; it is (infinitely) greater than (the number) of fettered 1 souls, but less than that of the perfected ones.

18 The Karman in the six directions of space* binds all souls, and it binds the whole soul in all its parts in every possible way. [The six directions of space are the four cardinal points, zenith and nadir. The commentators quote scripture that ekendriyas, or beings with one organ of sense, are bound by Karman in three and more directions. The true meaning of this statement is beyond my grasp.--The Dipika explains how Karman acts on the soul. The soul absorbs all material particles of a suitable nature (especially the karmapudgalas) with which it comes into contact, i.e. all that are in the same space with the soul, and assimilates them in the form of gnanavaraniya, etc., just as fire consumes everything within its reach, but nothing beyond it.]

19 The longest duration (of Karman) is thirty Krores of Krores of Sagaropamas, and the shortest a part of a muhurta.

20 This holds good with both Avaraniyas, with Vedaniya and Antaraya.

21 The longest duration of Mohaniya is seventy Krores of Krores of Sagaropamas, and the shortest a part of a muhurta.

22 The longest duration of Ayushka is thirty-three Krores of Krores of Sagaropamas, and the shortest a part of a muhurta.

23 The longest duration of Naman and Gotra is twenty Krores of Krores of Sagaropamas, and the shortest eight muhurtas.

24 The number of perfected souls is infinite, and that of the subdivisions of Karman 1 is also (infinite); the number of atoms in all these (subdivisions) exceeds (the number) of all souls.

25 Therefore a wise man should know the different subdivisions of these Karmans, and should exert himself to prevent and to destroy them.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 34TH LECTURE.

ON LESYA*.

[* The Lesyas (adhyavasaya viseshah) are different conditions produced in the soul by the influence of different Karman; they are therefore not dependent on the nature of the soul, but on the Karman which accompanies the soul, and are, as it were, the reflection of the Karman on the soul, as stated in the following verse from the Avakuri: krishnadidravayasakiviyat parinamayo atmanah | spatikasyeva tatrayam lesyasabdah pravartate |] The alteration produced on the soul, just as on a crystal by the presence of black things, etc., is denoted by the word Lesya.' The Lesya, or, according to the above explanation, what produces Lesya, is a subtle substance accompanying the soul; to it are attributed the qualities described in this lecture.--The word lesa is derived from klesa; this etymology appears rather fanciful, but I think it may be right. For the Lesyas seem to be the Klesas, which affect the soul, conceived as a kind of substance. The Sanskrit term Lesya is of course a hybrid word. It must, however, be stated that lesa occurs also in the meaning 'colour,' e.g. Sutrakrit. 1, 6, 13, and that the Prakrit of klesa is kilesa.]

1 I shall deliver in due order the Lecture on Lesya; hear the nature of the six Lesyas (produced by) Karman.

2 Hear. 1st. names, 2nd. colours, 3rd. tastes, 4th. smells, 5th. touches, 6th. degrees, 7th. character, 8th. variety, 9th. duration, 10th. result, and 11th. life of the Lesyas.

3 1. They are named in the following order: black, blue, grey, red, yellow, and white.

4 2. The black Lesya has the colour of a rain-cloud, a buffalo's horn, (the fruit of) Rishitaka [Sapindus Detergens.], or the eye of the wagtail.

5 The blue Lesya has the colour of the blue Asoka [It is not the common Asoka, Jonesia Asoka, which has red flowers.], the tail of the Kasha [Corarias Indica, blue jay; according to some, a kingfisher.], or of lapis lazuli.

6 The grey Lesya has the colour of the flower of Atasi [Linum Usitatissimum, whose flowers are blue.], the feathers of the Kokila, or the collar of pigeons.

7 The red Lesya has the colour of vermilion, the rising sun, or the bill of a parrot.

8 The yellow Lesya has the colour of orpiment, turmeric, or the flowers of Sana [Crotolaria Juncea.] and Asana [Terminalia Tomentosa.].

9 The white Lesya has the colour of a conch-shell, the anka-stone [Anka, manivishesha.], Kunda-flowers [Jasminum Multiflorum.], flowing milk, silver, or a necklace of pearls.

10 3. The taste of the black Lesya is infinitely more bitter than that of Tumbaka [The gourd Lageraria Vulgaris.], (the fruit of the) Nimb-tree [Azadirachta Indica.], or of Rohini.

11 The taste of the blue Lesya is infinitely more pungent than Trikatuka [The aggregate of three spices, etc., black and long pepper and dry ginger.] and Hastipipali.

12 The taste of grey Lesya is infinitely sourer than that of unripe Mango and Kapittha [Feronia Elephantum.].

13 The taste of red Lesya is infinitely more pleasant than that of ripe Mango and Kapittha.

14 The taste of yellow Lesya is infinitely better than that of excellent wine and various liquors, honey and Mairayaka [A kind of intoxicating drink, extracted from the blossoms of Lythrum Fructicosum, with sugar, etc.].

15 The taste of white Lesya is infinitely better than that of dates, grapes, milk, candied and pounded sugar.

16 The smell of the bad Lesyas (viz. the three first) is infinitely worse than that of the corpse of a cow, dog, or snake.

17 The smell of the three good Lesyas is infinitely more pleasant than that of fragrant flowers and of perfumes when they are pounded.

18 5. The touch of the bad Lesyas is infinitely worse than that of a saw, the tongue of a cow, or leaf of the Teak tree.

19 The touch of the three good Lesyas is infinitely more pleasant than that of cotton, butter, or Sirisha-flowers [Acacia Sirisa.].

20 6. The degrees [The Lesyas may possess their qualities in a low, middle, or high degree; each of these degrees is again threefold, viz. low, middle, and high. In this way the subdivision is carried on up to 243.] of the Lesyas are three, or nine, or twenty-seven, or eighty-one, or two hundred and forty-three.

21, 22 7. A man who acts on the impulse of the five Asravas, does not possess the three Guptis, has not ceased to injure the six (kinds of living beings), commits cruel acts, is wicked and violent, is afraid of no consequences, is mischievous and does not subdue his senses--a man of such habits develops the black Lesya.

23, 24 A man of the following qualities: envy, anger, want of self-control, ignorance, deceit, want of modesty, greed, hatred, wickedness, carelessness, love of enjoyment; a man who pursues pleasures and does not abstain from sinful undertakings, who is wicked and violent--a man of such habits develops the blue Lesya.

25, 26 A man who is dishonest in words and acts, who is base, not upright, a dissembler and deceiver, a heretic, a vile man, a talker of hurtful and sinful things, a thief, and full of jealousy--a man of such habits develops the grey Lesya.

27, 28 A man who is humble, steadfast, free from deceit and inquisitiveness, well disciplined, restrained, attentive to his study and duties 4, who loves the Law and keeps it, who is afraid of forbidden things and strives after the highest good--a man of such habits develops the red Lesya.

29, 30 A man who has but little anger, pride, deceit, and greed, whose mind is at ease, who controls himself, who is attentive to his study and duties, who speaks but little, is calm, and subdues his senses--a man of such habits develops the yellow Lesya.

31, 32 A man who abstains from constant thinking about his misery and about sinful deeds, but engages in meditation on the Law and truth only, whose mind is at ease, who controls himself, who practises the Samitis and Guptis, whether he be still subject to passion or free from passion, is calm, and subdues his senses--a man of such habits develops the white Lesya.

33 8. There are as many varieties of Lesyas as there are Samayas in the innumerable Avasarpinis and Utsarpinis, and as there are countless worlds.

34 9. Half a muhurta is the shortest, and thirty-three Sagaropamas plus one muhurta is the longest duration of the black Lesya.

35 Half a muhurta is the shortest, and ten Sagaropamas plus one Palyopama and a part of an Asamkhyeya is the longest duration of the blue Lesya.

36 Half a muhurta is the shortest, and three Sagaropamas plus one Palyopama and a part of an Asamkhyeya is the longest duration of the grey Lesya.

37 Half a muhurta is the shortest, and two Sagaropamas plus one Palyopama and a part of an Asamkhyeya is the longest duration of the red Lesya.

38 Half a muhurta is the shortest, and ten Sagaropamas plus one muhurta is the longest duration of the yellow Lesya.

39 Half a muhurta is the shortest, and thirty-three Sagaropamas plus one muhurta is the longest duration of the white Lesya.

40 I have described above the duration of the Lesyas generally; I shall now detail their duration in the four walks of mundane existence.

41 The shortest duration of the grey Lesya (of a denizen of hell) is ten thousand years, the longest three Sagaropamas plus one Palyopama and part of an Asamkhyeya.

42 The shortest duration of the blue Lesya (of a denizen of hell) is three Sagaropamas plus one Palyopama and a part of an Asamkhyeya, the longest ten Sagaropamas plus one Palyopama and a part of an Asamkhyeya.

43 The shortest duration of the black Lesya (of a denizen of hell) is ten Sagaropamas plus one Palyopama and a part of an Asamkhyeya, the longest thirty-three Sagaropamas.

44 I have described the duration of the Lesyas of denizens of hell; I shall now describe that of animals, men, and gods.

45 The duration of any of the Lesyas except the best (viz. white one) is less than a muhurta for (the lowest organisms), animals, and men.

46 Half a muhurta is the shortest duration of the white Lesya (of animals and men), and the longest a Krora of former years less nine years.

47 I have described the duration of the Lesyas of animals and men, I shall now describe that of the gods.

48 The shortest duration of the black Lesya is ten thousand years, the longest a Palyopama and (a part of) an Asamkhyeya.

49 The shortest duration of the blue Lesya is equal to the longest of the black one plus one Samaya; the longest is one Palyopama plus a (greater part of) an Asamkhyeya.

50 The shortest duration of the grey Lesya is equal to the longest of the blue one plus one Samaya; the longest is one Palyopama plus (a still greater part of) an Asamkhyeya.

51 I shall now describe the red Lesya as it is with gods, Bhavanapatis, Vyantaras, Gytishkas, and Vaimanikas.

52 The shortest duration of the red Lesya is one Palyopama, the longest two Sagaropamas plus one Palyopama and a part of an Asamkhyeya.

53 The shortest duration of the red Lesya is ten thousand years, the longest two Sagaropamas plus one Palyopama and a part of an Asamkhyeya.

54 The longest duration of the red Lesya plus one Samaya is equal to the shortest of the yellow Lesya; its longest, however, is ten muhurtas longer.

55 The longest duration of the yellow Lesya plus one Samaya is equal to the shortest of the white Lesya; the longest, however, is thirty-three muhurtas longer.

56 10. The black, blue, and grey Lesyas are the lowest Lesyas; through them the soul is brought into miserable courses of life.

57 The red, yellow, and white Lesyas are the good Lesyas; through them the soul is brought into happy courses of life.

58 11. In the first moment of these Lesyas when they are joined (with the soul), the latter is not born into a new existence.

59 In the last moment of all these Lesyas when they are joined (with the soul), the latter is not born into a new existence.

60 While the last muhurta is running and a part of it is still to come, the souls with their Lesyas developed, go to a new birth.

61 A wise man should, therefore, know the nature of these Lesyas; he should avoid the bad ones and obtain the good ones. Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 35TH LECTURE.

THE HOUSELESS MONK.

1 Learn from me, with attentive minds, the road shown by the wise ones, which leads a monk who follows it, to the end of all misery.

2 Giving up the life in a house, and taking Pravragya, a sage should know and renounce those attachments which take hold of men.

3 A restrained monk should abstain from killing, lying, stealing, carnal intercourse, from desire, love, and greed.

4 Even in his thoughts a monk should not long for a pleasant painted house filled with the fragrance of garlands and frankincense, secured by doors, and decorated with a white ceiling-cloth.

5 For in such a dwelling a monk will find it difficult to prevent his senses from increased desire and passion.

6 He should be content to live on a burial-place, in a deserted house, below a tree, in solitude, or in a place which had been prepared for the sake of somebody else.

7 A well-controlled monk should live in a pure place, which is not too much crowded, and where no women live.

8, 9 He should not build a house, nor cause others to erect one; for many living beings both movable and immovable, both subtle and gross, are seen to be killed when a house is being built; therefore a monk should abstain from building a house.

10 The same holds good with the cooking of food and drink, or with one's causing them to be cooked. Out of compassion for living beings one should not cook nor cause another to cook.

11 Beings which live in water, corn, or in earth and wood, are destroyed in food and drink; therefore a monk should cause nobody to cook.

12 There is nothing so dangerous as fire, for it spreads in all directions and is able to destroy many beings; one should therefore not light a fire.

13 Even in his thoughts a monk should not long for gold and silver; indifferent alike to dirt and gold he abstains from buying and selling.

14 If he buys, he becomes a buyer; if he sells, he becomes a merchant; a monk is not to engage in buying and selling.

15 A monk who is to live on alms, should beg and not buy; buying and selling is a great sin; but to live on alms is benefitting.

16 He should collect his alms in small parts according to the Sutras and so as to avoid faults; a monk should contentedly go on his begging-tour, whether he get alms or not.

17 A great sage should not eat for the sake of the pleasant taste (of the food) but for the sustenance of life, being not dainty nor eager for good fare, restraining his tongue, and being without cupidity.

18 Even in his thoughts he should not desire to be presented with flowers, to be offered a seat, to be eloquently greeted, or to be offered presents, or to get a magnificent welcome and treatment.

19 He should meditate on true things only, committing no sins and having no property; he should walk about careless of his body till his end arrives.

20 Rejecting food when the time of his death arrives, and leaving the human body, he becomes his own master, and is liberated from misery.

21 Without property, without egoism, free from passions and the Asravas, he obtains absolute knowledge, and reaches eternal beatitude.

Thus I say.

UTTARADHYAYANA 36TH LECTURE.

ON LIVING BEINGS AND THINGS WITHOUT LIFE.

1 Now learn from me with attentive minds the division of Living Beings and Things without life, which a monk must know who is to exert himself in self-control.

2 The Living Beings and the Things without life make up this world (Loka); but the space where only Things without life are found is called the Non-world (Aloka).

3 The Living Beings and the Things without life will be described with reference to 1st. substance, 2nd. place, 3rd. time, and 4th. development.

4 A. Things without life.

Things without life are 1st. possessing form, 2nd. formless; the formless things are of ten kinds, those possessing form are of four kinds.

5, 6 (1) The ten kinds of formless things: 1st. Dharma, 2nd. its divisions, 3rd. its indivisible parts; 4th. Adharma, 5th. its divisions, 6th. its indivisible parts; 7th. space, 8th. its divisions, 9th. its indivisible parts, and 10th. time.

7 Dharma and Adharma are co-extensive with the World (Loka); space fills the World and the Non-world (Aloka); time exists in what is called the place of time.

8 Dharma, Adharma, and Space are ever without beginning and end.

9 And time also, if regarded as a continuous flow, is called so (i.e. without beginning and end); but with regard to an individual thing it has a beginning and an end.

10 (2) The four kinds of things possessing form are 1st. compound things, 2nd. their divisions, 3rd. their indivisible parts, and 4th. atoms.

11 Compound things and atoms occur as individual things and apart (or different from others), in the whole world and in parts of the world; this is their distribution with regard to place.

12 Subtle things occur all over the world, gross things only in a part of it. I shall now give their fourfold division with regard to time.

13 With regard to the continuous flow (or development of a thing) it is without beginning and without end; but with regard to its existence (as an individual thing) it has both a beginning and an end.

14 The longest duration of Things without life possessing form is an immeasurable period; the shortest one Samaya.

15 The longest interruption in the existence of Things without life possessing form is an endless time; the shortest one Samaya.

16 Their development is fivefold: with regard to 1st. colour, 2nd. smell, 3rd. taste, 4th. touch, and 5th. figure.

17 Those which develop with regard to colour are of five kinds: 1st. black, 2nd. blue, 3rd. red, 4th. yellow, 5th. white.

18 Those which develop with regard to smell are of two kinds: 1st. sweet-smelling substances, and 2nd. of bad smell.

19 Those which develop with regard to taste are of five kinds: 1st. bitter, 2nd. pungent, 3rd. astringent, 4th. sour, and 5th. sweet.

20, 21 Those which develop with regard to touch are of eight kinds: 1st. hard, 2nd. soft, 3rd. heavy, 4th. light, 5th. cold, 6th. hot, 7th. smooth, and 8th. rough.

In this way the substances have been declared, which develop with regard to touch.

22 Those which develop with regard to figure are of five kinds: 1st. globular, 2nd. circular, 3rd. triangular, 4th. square, and 5th. long.

23 Things of black colour are subdivided with regard to smell, taste, touch, and figure.

24-27 The same subdivision holds good with blue, red, yellow, and white things.

28, 29 Things of sweet smell are subdivided with regard to colour, taste, touch, and figure; things of bad smell are similarly subdivided.

30 Things of bitter taste are subdivided with regard to colour, smell, touch, and figure.

31-34 The same subdivision holds good with pungent, astringent, sour, and sweet things.

35 Things of hard touch are subdivided with regard to colour, smell, taste, and figure.

36-42 The same subdivision holds good with soft, heavy, light, cold, hot, smooth, and rough things.

43 Things of globular figure are subdivided with regard to colour, smell, taste, and touch.

44-47 The same subdivision holds good with circular, triangular, square, and long things.

48 Thus the division of Things without life has briefly been told.

B. Living Beings.

I shall now, in due order, deliver the division of living beings.

49 Living beings are of two kinds: 1st. those still belonging to the Samsara, and 2nd. the perfected souls (siddhas). The latter are of many kinds; hear me explain them.

50 (1) The perfected souls are those of women, men, hermaphrodites, of orthodox, heterodox, and householders.

51 Perfection is reached by people of the greatest, smallest, and middle size, on high places, underground, on the surface of the earth, in the ocean, and in water (of rivers, etc.).

52, 53 Ten hermaphrodites reach, at the same time, perfection, twenty women, one hundred and eight men; four householders, ten heterodox, and one hundred and eight orthodox monks.

54 Two individuals of the greatest size reach perfection (simultaneously), four of the smallest size, and one hundred and eight of the middle size.

55 Four individuals reach perfection (simultaneously) on high places, two in the ocean, three in water, twenty underground, and one hundred and eight on the surface of the earth.

56 From where are the perfected souls debarred? Where do the perfected souls reside? Where do they leave their bodies, and where do they go, on reaching perfection?

57 Perfected souls are debarred from the non-world (Aloka); they reside on the top of the world; they leave their bodies here (below), and go there, on reaching perfection.

58 Twelve Yoganas above the (Vimana) Sarvartha is the place called Ishatpragbhara, which has the form of an umbrella; (there are the perfected souls go).

59 It is forty-five hundred thousand Yoganas long, and as many broad, and it is somewhat more than three times as many in circumference.

60 Its thickness is eight Yoganas, it is greatest in the middle, and decreases toward the margin, till it is thinner than the wing of a fly.

61 This place, by nature pure, consisting of white gold, resembles in form an open umbrella, as has been said by the best of Ginas.

62 (Above it) is a pure blessed place (called Sita), which is white like a conch-shell, the anka-stone, and Kunda-flowers; a Yogana thence is the end of the world.

63 The perfected souls penetrate the sixth part of the uppermost Krosa of the (above-mentioned) Yogana.

64 There at the top of the world reside the blessed perfected souls, rid of all transmigrating, and arrived at the excellent state of perfection.

65 The dimension of a perfected soul is two-thirds of the height which the individual had in his last existence.

66 The perfected souls, considered singly, (as individuals) have a beginning but no end; considered collectively (as a class) they have neither a beginning nor an end.

67 They have no (visible) form, they consist of Life throughout, they are developed into knowledge and, faith, and they possess paramount happiness which admits of no comparison.

68 They all dwell in one part of the world, and have developed into knowledge and faith, they have crossed the boundary of the Samsara, and reached the excellent state of perfection.

69 (2) Living beings which still belong to the Samsara, are of two kinds: a. movable, and b. immovable ones: the immovable ones are of three kinds:

70 A. Earth Lives, B. Water Lives, and C. plants; these are the three kinds of immovable living beings; now learn from me their subdivision.

71 A. The Earth Lives are of two kinds: subtle and gross; and both of them are either fully developed or undeveloped.

72 The gross and fully developed are of two kinds: viz. smooth or rough. The smooth ones are of seven kinds:

73 Black, blue, red, yellow, white, pale dust, and clay.

The rough ones are of thirty-six kinds:

74 Earth, gravel, sand, stones, rocks, rock-salt, iron, copper, tin, lead, silver, gold, and diamond;

75 Orpiment, vermilion, realgar, Sasaka, antimony, coral, Abhrapatala, Abhravaluka; these are varieties of gross (Earth-) bodies and kinds of precious stones.

76 Hyacinth, natron, Anka, crystal, Lohitaksha, emerald, Masaragalla, Bhugamokaka, and sapphire;

77 Kandana, red chalk, Hamsagarbha, Pulaka, and sulphur; Kandraprabha, lapis lazuli, Galakanta, and Suryakanta.

78 These thirty-six kinds of 'rough earth' have been enumerated. The 'subtle earth' is but of one kind, as there is no variety.

79 The subtle species is distributed all over the world, but the gross one (is found) in a part of the world only.

I shall now give their fourfold division with regard to time.

80 With regard to the continuous flow (or development of an earth-body) it is without a beginning and end; but with regard to its existence in its present form it has both a beginning and end.

81 Twenty-two thousand years is the longest duration of the Earth Lives; its shortest is less than a muhurta.

82 The longest duration of the body of Earth Lives, if they do not leave that (kind of) body, is an immeasurable time; the shortest is less than one muhurta.

83 The longest interval between an Earth Life's leaving its body (till its return to it), is an endless time; the shortest less than one Muhurta.

84 Their varieties, caused by (difference of) colour, smell, taste, touch, figure, and place, are (counted) by thousands.

85 B. The Water Lives are of two kinds: subtle and gross ones; and both of them are either fully developed or undeveloped.

86 The gross and fully developed ones are of five kinds: pure water, dew, exudations, fog, and ice.

87 The 'subtle water' is of one kind, as there is no variety. The subtle species is distributed all over the world, but the gross one (is found) in a part of the world only.

88-92 With regard to the continuous flow, etc. (as in verse 80).

Seven thousand years is the longest duration of the life of Water Lives, etc. (as in verse 81). (All that has been said of Earth Lives in verses 82-84 is verbally repeated here of 'Water Lives.')

93 γ. Plants are of two kinds: subtle and gross ones; and both of them are either fully developed or undeveloped.

94 The gross and fully developed plants are of two kinds: either many have one body in common, or each has its own body.

95 Those who severally have their own body are of many kinds: trees, shrubby plants, shrubs, big plants, creeping plants, grass;

96 Palms, plants of knotty stems or stalks, mushrooms, water-plants, annual plants, and herbs. These are called plants possessing severally their own body.

97 Those plants of which many have one body in common are of many kinds: Aluya, Mulaya, ginger;

98 Harili, Sirili, Sassirili, Gavai, Keyakandali, onion, garlic, plantain-tree, Kuduvvaya;

99 Lohinihuya, Thihuya, Tuhaga, Kanha, Vaggakanda, Suranaya;

100 Assakanni, Sihakanni, Musundhi, turmeric, and many others besides.

101 The subtle plants are of one kind, as there is no variety. Subtle plants are distributed all over the world, gross plants (are found) in a part of the world only.

102 With regard to the continuous flow, etc. (as in verse 80).

103-106 Ten thousand years is the longest duration of the life of plants, etc. (All as in verses 81-84. Substitute plants, which are here called vanaspati and panaka, for Earth-bodies.)

107 Thus the three kinds of immovable living beings have briefly been told. I shall now explain in due order the three kinds of movable living beings.

108 B. The movable beings are α. the Fire Lives, A. the Wind Lives, and C. those with an organic body; these are the three kinds of movable beings. Learn from me their subdivision.

109 A. The Fire Lives are of two kinds: subtle and gross ones; and both of them are either fully developed or undeveloped.

110 The gross and fully developed ones are of many kinds: coal, burning chaff, fire, and flame of fire;

111 Meteors, and lightning, and many other kinds besides. The subtle Fire Lives are but of one kind, as there is no variety.

112-117 The subtle species, etc. (see verses 79-84. Substitute Fire Lives for Earth Lives. In verses 114 f., corresponding to verses 81, 89, and 103, read: 'the longest duration of the life of Fire Lives is three days,' etc.; the rest as above).

118 B. The Wind Lives are of two kinds, etc. (as in verse 109).

119 The gross and fully developed ones are of five kinds: squalls, whirlwinds, thick winds [According to the comm. these winds blow on the oceans which are situated below the Ratnaprabha-hell, or which support the heavenly Vimanas, and have the density of snow. Perhaps the notion is similar to that of the Hindu astronomers, who fancied that the heavenly bodies were set in motion by cords of wind called pravaha. See Surya Siddhanta II, 3.], high winds, low winds;

120 And the Samvartaka* wind, etc.; thus they are of many kinds. [This seems to be the Hurricane which causes the periodical destruction of the world. But Devendra says: Samvartaka is a wind which carries grass, etc., from the outside into a particular place.; which sounds more like the action of a Tornado]

The subtle Wind Lives are but of one kind, as there is no variety.

121-126 The subtle species, etc. (as above 79-84. Substitute Wind Lives for Earth Lives. In verse 123, corresponding to 114, read: 'the longest duration of the life of Wind Lives is three thousand years;' the rest as above).

127 C. Movable beings with organic bodies (i.e. animals) are of four kinds: i. those possessing two organs of sense, ii. those with three organs, iii. those with four organs, iv. those with five organs.

128 1.) Beings with two organs of sense are of two kinds: subtle and gross ones. Both are either fully developed or undeveloped. Learn from me their subdivision.

129 Worms, Somangala, Alasa, Maivahaya, Vasimuha, shells, conches, Sankhanaga; 130 Palloya, Anullaya, cowries, leeches, Galaga, and Kandana.

131 These and others are the many kinds of beings with two organs of sense. All of them live in a part of the world only, they do not live everywhere.

132 With regard to the continuous flow, etc. (as in verse 80).

133 The duration of the life of beings with two organs of sense is twelve years at the utmost; the shortest is less than a muhurta.

134 The longest duration of the body of beings with two organs of sense is a Samkhyeya (or measurable time) if they do not leave that (kind of) body; the shortest is less than one muhurta.

135, 136 = 83, 84. Substitute 'beings with two organs of sense' for Earth Lives.

137 2.) Beings with three organs of sense are of two kinds: subtle and gross ones. Both are either fully developed or undeveloped. Learn from me their subdivision.

138 Kunthu, ants, bugs, Ukkala, white ants, Tanahara, Kattahara, Maluga, Pattaharaga;

139 Duga shining like lead, which originate in the kernel of the cotton-seed, Sadavari, centipedes, Indagaiya;

140 Cochineal, etc. Thus they are of many kinds. All of them live in a part of the world only, they do not live everywhere.

141-145 = 132-136. (Substitute 'beings with three organs of sense.' The longest duration, etc., is forty-nine days, verse 142 = 133.)

146 3.) Beings with four organs of sense are of two kinds: subtle and gross ones. Both are either developed or undeveloped. Learn from me their subdivision.

147 Andhiya, Pottiya, flies, mosquitoes, bees, moths, Dhinkana and Kankana;

148 Kukkuda, Singiridi, Nandavatta, scorpions, Dola, crickets, Virali, Akkhihaya; 149 Akkhila, Sahaya Akkhirodaya, Vikitta, Vikittapattaya, Uhlimgaliya, Galakari, Niya, and Tantavagaiya.

150-155 These and others are the beings with four organs of sense. All of them, etc. (the rest as in verses 131-136. Substitute 'beings with four organs of sense.' The longest duration, etc., is six months, verse 152 = 133.)

156 4.) Beings with five organs of sense are of four kinds: denizens of hell, animals, men, and gods.

157 A. Denizens of hell are of seven kinds according to the seven hells; they are called Ratnabha, Sarkarabha, Valukabha; 158 Pankabha, Dhumabha, Tama, and Tamatama. Thus the seven kinds of denizens of hell have been enumerated.

159, 160 All the (denizens of hell) live in a part of the world only; they do not live everywhere, etc. (as in verses 79 and 80).

161 In the first hell the longest duration of their life is one Sagaropama; the shortest is ten thousand years.

162 In the second hell the longest duration of their life is three Sagaropamas; the shortest is one Sagaropama.

163 In the third hell the longest duration of their life is seven Sagaropamas; the shortest is three Sagaropamas.

164 In the fourth hell the longest duration of their life is ten Sagaropamas; the shortest is seven Sagaropamas.

165 In the fifth hell the longest duration of their life is seventeen Sagaropamas; the shortest is ten Sagaropamas.

166 In the sixth hell the longest duration of their life is twenty-two Sagaropamas; the shortest is seventeen Sagaropamas.

167 In the seventh hell the longest duration of their life is thirty-three Sagaropamas; the shortest is twenty-two Sagaropamas.

168 The length of the life of denizens of hell is also that of their continuance in the same kind of body, with regard both to the longest and shortest duration of it.

169, 170 = 83, 84. (Substitute, denizens of hell.)

171 B. The animals which possess five organs of sense are of two kinds, those which originate by generatio aequivoeca, and those which are born from the womb.

172 Either of them are again of three kinds: 1. aquatic, 2. terrestrial, and 3. aerial animals. Learn from me their subdivision.

173 1. Fishes, tortoises, crocodiles, Makaras, and Gangetic porpoises are the five kinds of aquatic animals.

174, 175 = 159, 160.

176 The longest duration of the life of aquatic animals is one Krose of former years 2; the shortest is less than one muhurta.

177 The longest duration of the aquatic animals' continuance in the (same kind of body) is from two to nine Krores of former years.

178 = 83.

179 2. Quadrupeds and reptiles are the two kinds of terrestrial animals. The quadrupeds are of four kinds; listen to my description of them:

(1st) Solidungular animals, as horses, etc.;

(2nd) Biungular animals, as cows, etc.;

(3rd) Multiungular animals, as elephants, etc.;

(4th) Animals having toes with nails, as lions, etc. (180)

181 The reptiles are of two kinds: 1st. those which walk on their arms, as lizards, etc., and 2nd. those which move on their breast, as snakes, etc. Both are again of many kinds.

182, 183 = 159, 160.

184 The longest duration of the life of terrestrial animals is three Palyopamas; the shortest is less than one muhurta.

The longest duration of the terrestrial animals' continuance in the (same kind of) body is three Palyopamas plus from two to nine Krores of former years; the shortest is less than one murhuta. (185)

187 3. Winged animals are of four kinds: those with membranous wings, those with feathered wings, those with wings in the shape of a box, and those (which sit on) outspread wings.

188, 189 = 159, 160.

190 The longest duration of the life of aerial animals is an Asamkhyeya-part of a Palyopama; the shortest is less than one murhuta.

191 The longest duration (of the aerial animals' continuance in the same kind of body) is an Asamkhyeya-part of a Palyopama plus from two to nine Krores of former years; the shortest is less than one murhuta.

192, 193 = 159, 160.

194 C. Men are of two kinds; listen to my description of them: men originating by generatio aequivoeca, and men born from the womb.

195 Those who are born from the womb are of three kinds: those living in the Karmabhumi, those living in the Akarmabhumi, and those living on the minor continents [These are seven groups of islands situated off the eastern and western ends of the Himalaya, which are inhabited by fabulous races].

196 They have, in the same order, fifteen, thirty, and twenty-eight subdivisions. These are the numbers handed down.

197 Men originating by generatio aequivoeca are of as many kinds. They all live but in a part of the world.

203 Verses 198-202 = 183-186. (Substitute, 'men' for 'terrestrial animals'.)

d. Gods are of four kinds; listen to my description of them: 1. Bhaumeiyakas; 2. Vyantaras; 3. Gyotishkas; 4. Vaimanikas.

204 There are ten kinds of Bhavanavasin (= Bhaumeiyakas), eight of those who live in woods (= Vyantaras), five of Gyotishkas, and two of Vaimanikas.

205 1. The Bhavanavasin are: the Asura-, Naga-, Suvarna-, Vidyut-, Agni-, Dvipa-, Udadhi-, Vata-, and Ghanika-(Kumaras 5).

206 2. The eight kinds of Vyantaras are: Pisakas, Bhutas, Yakshas, Rakshasas, Kinnaras, Kimpurushas, Mahoragas, and Gandharvas.

207 3. The moons, the suns, the Nakshatras, the planets, and the hosts of stars are the fivefold dwellings of the Gyotishkas.

208 4. The Vaimanika gods are of two kinds: A. those who are born in the heavenly Kalpas, and B. those who are born in the regions above them.

209 A. The former are of twelve kinds: those who live in (the following) Kalpas, after which they are named): Sautharma, Isana, Sanatkumara, Mahendra, Brahmaloaka, and Lantaka;

210 Mahasukla, Sahasrara, Anata, Pranata, Arana, and Akyuta. These are the gods who are born in Kalpas.

211 B. The gods who are born in the regions above the Kalpas are of two kinds: α'. The Graiveyakas, and β'. the Anuttaras. The Graiveyakas are of nine kinds.

212 A. The lowest of the lowest, the middle of the lowest, the highest of the lowest, the lowest of the middle;

213 The middle of the middle, the highest of the middle, the lowest of the highest, the middle of the highest;

214 The highest of the highest. These are the Graiveyaka gods.

B. The Vigayas, the Vaigayantas, the Gayantas, the Aparagitas

And the Sarvarthasiddhas: these are the five kinds of Anuttara gods.

215-217 = 159-160 These and others besides are the many kinds of Vaimanika gods.

218 The longest duration of the life of the Bhaumeiyaka gods is somewhat more than a Sagaropama, the smallest ten thousand years.

219 The longest duration of the life of the Vyantaras is one Palyopama, the shortest is ten thousand years.

220 The longest duration of the life of the Gyotishkas is one Palyopama plus one hundred thousand years, the shortest is the eighth part of a Palyopama.

221 The longest duration of life in the Sautharmakalpa is two Sagaropamas, the shortest is one Palyopama.

(In the same way (a) the longest, and (b) the shortest duration of life in the remaining Kalpas and heavenly regions is given in the original. I give in the sequel the substance only of each verse.)

222 In Isana Kalpa (a) is somewhat more than a Sagaropama, (b) somewhat more than a Palyopama.

223 In Sanatkumara Kalpa (a) is seven, (b) two Sagaropamas.

224 In Mahendra Kalpa (a) is somewhat more than seven Sagaropamas, (b) somewhat more than two.

225 In Brahmaloaka Kalpa (a) is ten Sagaropamas, (b) seven.

226 In Lantaka Kalpa (a) is fourteen Sagaropamas, (b) ten.

227 In Mahasukla Kalpa(a) is seventeen Sagaropamas, (b) fourteen.

228 In Sahasrara Kalpa (a) is eighteen Sagaropamas, (b) seventeen.

229 In Anata Kalpa (a) is nineteen Sagaropamas, (b) eighteen.

230 In Pranata Kalpa (a) is twenty Sagaropamas, (b) nineteen.

231 In Arana Kalpa (a) is twenty-one Sagaropamas, (b) twenty.

232 In Akyuta Kalpa (a) is twenty-two Sagaropamas, (b) twenty-one.

233 In the first (Graiveyika region) (a) is twenty-three Sagaropamas, (b) twenty-two.

234 In the second (Graiveyika region) (a) is twenty-four Sagaropamas, (b) twenty-three.

235 In the third (Graiveyika region) (a) is twenty-five Sagaropamas, (b) twenty-four.

236 In the fourth (Graiveyika region) (a) is twenty-six Sagaropamas, (b) twenty-five.

237 In the fifth (Graiveyika region) (a) is twenty-seven Sagaropamas, (b) twenty-six.

238 In the sixth (Graiveyika region) (a) is twenty-eight Sagaropamas, (b) twenty-seven.

239 In the seventh (Graiveyika region) (a) is twenty-nine Sagaropamas, (b) twenty-eight.

240 In the eighth (Graiveyika region) (a) is thirty Sagaropamas, (b) twenty-nine.

241 In the ninth (Graiveyika region) (a) is thirty-one Sagaropamas, (b) thirty.

242 In the four heavens (of the Anuttara gods), beginning with Vigaya, (a) is thirty-three Sagaropamas, (b) thirty-one.

243 In the great Vimana Sarvartha(siddha) there is no difference between the longest and shortest duration of life, but it is always thirty-three Sagaropamas.

244, 245, 246 = 159, 160 The longest and shortest duration of the gods' (continuance in the same kind of) body is equal to that which has been given for their life.

247 We have described the Living Beings, the worldly and the perfected ones, and we have described the Lifeless Things, those possessing form and those without form.

248 Having thus learned (the nature of) living beings and lifeless things which is in accordance with the principles of reasoning, and believing in it, a sage should delight in self-control.

249 After having lived as a Sramana many years, a sage should mortify himself by the following religious exercises.

250 The longest duration of the mortification is twelve years; the middle, one year; and the shortest, six months.

251 In the first four years he should abstain from dressed food, in the second four years he should keep various fasts.

252 During two years he should eat Akamla at the end of every second fast; in the following half year he should keep not too long fasts.

253 In the second half of the year he should keep long fasts. During the whole year he should eat but small portions of Akamla.

254 During the (last) year a sage should make the ends of two consecutive fasts meet, and should break his fast after half a month or a whole month, (till he dies).

255 The following (Bhavanas), Kandarpa-, Abhiyogika-, Kilvisha-, Moha-, and Asuratva-(Bhavanas), will lead to evil ways (i.e. bad births); they are obnoxious at the time of death.

256 Those souls who cherish heretical opinions, commit sins, and kill living beings, will not reach Bodhi at the time of death.

257 Those souls who cherish orthodox opinions, do not commit sins, and are enveloped in white Lesya, will reach Bodhi at the time of death.

258 Those souls who cherish heretical opinions, commit sins, and are enveloped in black Lesya, will not reach Bodhi at the time of death.

259 Those who love the creed of the Ginas and piously practise it, will be pure and free from the soil (of passions), and will (in due time) get out of the Circle of Births.

260 The miserable men who do not know the creed of the Ginas, will many times commit unholy suicide and die against their will.

261 Those who are well versed in the sacred lore and possess much knowledge, who awaken piety (in others) and appreciate their good qualities, are for this very reason worthy to hear the doctrine of salvation.

262 He who by ribaldry and buffoonery, by his comical habits and appearance, by jests and words amuses other people, realises the Kandarpa-Bhavana.

263 Those who practise spells and besmeared their body with ashes for the sake of pleasure, amusement, or power, realise the Abhiyogika-Bhavana.

264 The deceitful man who reviles the sacred lore, the Kevalins, the teacher of the Law, the Satigha, and the monks, realises the Kilvishika-Bhavana.

265 He who is continuously angry, and who puts his faith in prognostics, realises the Asuratva-Bhavana.

266 Those who use weapons, eat poison, throw themselves into fire or water, and use things not prescribed by the rules of good conduct, are liable to be born and to die again and again. (Such persons realise the Moha-Bhavana.)

267 The enlightened and liberated Gnatrī(putra) has thus delivered Thirty-six Lectures of the Uttaradhyayana, which the pious approve of.

THE SUTRAKRITANGA

The Sutrakritanga Sutra

The Sutyagadanga Sutra

Prakrit text by Gandhara Sudharmasvami

From: Jaina Sutras, Part 2,

Sacred Books of the East, Vol. 45

Editor: F. Max Müller, Oxford

Original Language: Prakrit

Translation: Hermann Jacobi, 1895

Estimated Range of Dating: 4th-2nd century B.C.

(Sutrakritanga (also known in Prakrit as Sutyagadanga is the second agama of the 12 main angas of the Jain Svetambara canon. According to the Svetambara tradition it was written by Gandhara Sudharmasvami in Ardhamagadhi Prakrit. The following three topics are covered:

- Jain doctrine – Causes of bondage, description of hells, destruction of karmas etc.

- Conduct of Monks – Injunctions and prohibitions, difficulties faced, avoiding temptation of women etc.

- Heretical Doctrines and errors – Materialists, Fatalists and other wrong beliefs

The text is in two main parts: the first in verse and the second in prose. It is written using techniques including narration and questions and answers, and the chapters start with Sudharmasvami explaining the various doctrines to his chief disciple Jambuswami and answering his questions. According to Jain the text dates c. 4th-3rd century BC. Among scholarship, a tie between the 4th and the 2nd centuries BC are discussed.

This agama [scripture, holy text] describes nonviolence, Jain metaphysics, and the refutation of other religious theories such as Kriyavada, Akriyavada, Ajnanavada, and Vinayavada. Sanskrit commentary has been done by Silanka who lived in the second half of the ninth century AD. The agama is divided into two parts consisting of 16 lectures and 7 lectures respectively. The agama is also called sutra. [Etymology on Sutra: In Indian literature, a sutra is any short rule, a theorem condensed in few words. A collection of sutras becomes a text, and this is also called sutra (often capitalised in Western literature). The Sanskrit word Sutra (Pali: sutta, Ardha Magadhi: suya) means "string, thread". The root of the word is siv, "that which sews and holds things together". The word is related to suci (Sanskrit: meaning "needle, list", and suna (Sanskrit: for "woven"). In the context of literature, sutra means a distilled collection of syllables and words, any form or manual of "aphorism, rule, direction" hanging together like threads with which the teachings of ritual, philosophy, grammar, or any field of knowledge can be woven.]

FIRST BOOK 1.

[Srutaskandha. Its Sanskrit title mentioned by Silanka is Gathashodasaka, i.e. the book whose Sixteenth Lecture is called Gatha. It is mentioned in the Uttaradhyayana 31,13 by the name of the sixteen Gathas; see above, p. 182.]

SUTRAKRITANGA 1ST LECTURE,

CALLED THE DOCTRINE

[Samaya. This title is not found in Manuscripts at the end of the lecture, but it is given by the author of the Nirukti (verse 29). The subject of this lecture is more fully treated in §§ 15-33 of the First Lecture of the Second Book.]

1ST CHAPTER.

1 One should know what causes the bondage of Soul, and knowing (it) one should remove 3 it.

(Gambusvamin asked Sudharman):

What causes the bondage (of Soul) according to Mahavira? and what must one know in order to remove it?

2 (Sudharman answered):

He who owns even a small property in living or lifeless things, or consents to others holding it, will not be delivered from misery.

3 If a man kills living beings, or causes other men to kill them, or consents to their killing them, his iniquity will go on increasing.

4 A sinner who makes the interests of his kinsmen and companions his own, will suffer much; for the number of those whose interest he takes to heart constantly increases.

5 All this, his wealth and his nearest relations, cannot protect him (from future misery); knowing (this) and (the value of) life, he will get rid of Karman.

6 Some men, Sramanas and Brahmanas, who ignore and deny these true words 3, adhere (to their own tenets), and are given to pleasures.

THE GRAND BIBLE

7 Some profess (the exclusive belief in) the five gross elements: earth, water, fire, wind, and air.

8 'These five gross elements (are the original causes of things), from them arises another (thing, viz. atman) [In other words: the Atman is produced by the elements. But there is, it would seem, but one Atman, for in verses 11, 12, we have another heretical philosophy which acknowledged a plurality of transient atmans;] for on the dissolution of the (five elements) living beings cease to exist.

9 'And as the Earth, though it is but one pile, presents many forms, so the intelligent (principle, viz. the atman) appears under various forms as the universe.'

10 Thus say some fools. (But how can they explain on their theory that) the man engaging in undertakings, who has committed a sin, will himself suffer severe pain.?

11 'Everybody, fool or sage, has an individual soul. These souls exist (as long as the body), but after death they are no more; there are no souls which are born again.

12 'There is neither virtue nor vice, there is no world beyond; on the dissolution of the body the individual ceases to be.'

13 'When a man acts or causes another to act, it is not his soul (atman) which acts or causes to act.' Thus they (viz. the adherents of the Sankhya philosophy) boldly proclaim.

14 How can those who hold such opinions explain (the variety of existence in) the world? They go from darkness to utter darkness, being fools and engaged in works.

15 Some say that there are five elements and that the soul is a sixth (substance), but they contend that the soul and the world (i.e. the five elements) are eternal.

16 'These (six substances) do not perish neither (without nor with a cause); the non-existent does not come into existence, but all things are eternal by their very nature.'

17 Some fools say that there are five skandhas of momentary existence. They do not admit that (the soul) is different from, nor identical with (the elements), that it is produced from a cause (i.e. the elements), nor that it is without a cause (i.e. that it is eternal).

18 The Ganayas* say that there are four elements: earth, water, fire, and wind, which combined form the body (or soul?). [* Ganaya, which is explained in the Dipika by gnanaka = panditamanya, denotes the Bauddhas. I think that the word may be derived from yana 'vehicle,' which the Buddhist used to designate the two sections of the church, viz. the Hinayana and Mahayana schools. The commentator quotes a various reading: avare for ganaya, and explains it as referring to another sect of Bauddhas than those spoken of in the preceding verse. Silanka comments on the reading avare first, and then on ganaya.]

19 (All these heretics say): 'Those who dwell in houses, in woods, or on hills, will be delivered from all misery if they adopt our creed.'

20 But they do not cross the Flood of Life, who, ignoring the true relation of things, and not versed in the true Law, hold the above heretical opinions.

21 They do not reach the end of the Samsara, who, ignoring, etc.

22 They do not reach the end of transmigration, who, etc.

23 They do not put an end to birth, who, etc.

24 They do not put an end to misery, who, etc.

25 They do not put an end to death, who, etc.

26 They will again and again experience manifold pains in this ring of the earth, which is full of death, disease, and old age.

27 The highest Gina, Mahavira the Gnatiputra, has said that they will undergo births without number, being placed in all sorts of existences.

Thus I say.

2ND CHAPTER.

1 Again some* say: 'It is proved that there are individual souls; they experience pleasure and pain; and (on dying) they lose their state of life. [* They are the fatalists whose peculiar opinions are stated in verses 2 and 3.]

2, 3 'But misery (and pleasure) is not caused by (the souls) themselves; how could it be caused by other (agents, as time, etc.)? Pleasure and misery, final beatitude and temporal (pleasure and pain) are not caused by (the souls) themselves, nor by others; but the individual souls experience them; it is the lot assigned them by destiny.' This is what they (i.e. the fatalists) say.

4 Those who proclaim these opinions, are fools who fancy themselves learned; they have no knowledge, and do not understand that things depend partly on fate, and partly on human exertion.

5 Thus (say) some heretics; they are very bold men; if they act up to their principles, they will never be delivered from misery.

6 As the swift deer who are destitute of protection, are frightened where there is no danger, and not frightened where there is danger;

7 (As) they dread safe places, but do not dread traps; they are bewildered by ignorance and fear, and run hither and thither;

8 If they did jump over the noose or pass under it, they would escape from the snare; but the stupid animal does not notice it;

9 The unhappy animal, being of a weak intellect, runs into the dangerous (place), is caught in the snare, etc., and is killed there;

10 So some unworthy Sramanas who hold wrong doctrines are afraid of what is free from danger, and are not afraid of real dangers.

11 The fools dread the preaching of the Law, but they do not dread works, being without discernment and knowledge.

12 Shaking off greed, pride, deceit, and wrath, one becomes free from Karman. This is a subject (which an ignorant man, like) a brute animal, does not attend to.

13 The unworthy heretics who do not acknowledge this, will incur death an endless number of times, like deer caught in a snare.

14 All Brahmanas and Sramanas contend that they possess the knowledge (of the truth), but the creatures in the whole world do not know anything.

15, 16 As a Mlekkha repeats what an Arya has said, but does not understand the meaning, merely repeating his words, so the ignorant, though pretending to possess knowledge, do not know the truth, just as an uninstructed Mlekkha.

17 The speculations of the Agnostics cannot lead to knowledge; they cannot reach the truth by themselves, still less teach it to other men.

18 As when a man in a wood who does not know it, follows a guide who also does not know it, both being unacquainted (with the place), come to great trouble;

19 As when one blind man is the guide of another, the man walks a great distance, loses his way, or follows a wrong way;

20 Thus some who search after salvation and pretend to practise the (true) Law, follow the false Law and do not arrive at the thoroughly right (thing, viz. self-control).

21 Thus some (wrong philosophers) do not apply to others for arguments, but they continue to err because they believe their own arguments to be right [The last part of the verse might also be translated: 'because these fools believe the subject to be cleared up (mangu) by their own arguments.']

22 Thus arguing according to their light, and ignorant about what is right and wrong, they do not get out of misery as birds do not get out of their cage.

23 They praise their own creed and blame that of their opponents, but those who act in this respect the part of philosophers, will be kept confined in the Circle of Births.

24 There is the doctrine of the Kriyavadins, which has been previously explained; it augments the misery of worldly existence of those who do not well consider the nature of acts.

25 'He who intends (to kill) a living being but does not do it by (an act of) his body, and he who unknowingly kills one, both are affected by that act through a slight contact (with it) only, but the demerit (in their case) is not fully developed [An intentional killing of a living being must actually take place in order to induce the Karman on the soul. If one of the essential conditions which constitute the guilt of slaughter (himsa), p. 243 is wanting the Karman is still produced; however, it does not take a firm hold of the soul, but merely 'touches' it. This is of course the opinion of the Kriyavadins.]'

26 'There are three ways of committing sins: by one's own activity, by commission, by approval (of the deed).

27 'These are the three ways of committing sins. Thus by purity of the heart one reaches Nirvana.

28 'A layman may kill his son (during a famine) and eat him; a wise (monk) who partakes of the meat, will not be defiled by the sin [According to Silanka the father too would not be guilty; but this interpretation is against good sense and grammar.]'

29 The mind of those who sin in thoughts is not pure; they are wrong, they do not conduct themselves carefully.

30 Men attached to pleasure, who think that the above-mentioned doctrines will save them, commit sins.

31, 32 As a blind-born man getting into a leaky boat, wants to reach the shore, but is drowned during the passage, so some unworthy, heretical Sramanas wish to get beyond the Circle of Births, but they are whirled round in it.

Thus I say.

3RD CHAPTER.

1 If a monk should eat forbidden food which a pious (layman) has prepared for some guest, and which food has been mixed up with even thousand (times more pure food) 1, he would be neither monk nor layman.

2-4 Sramanas who do not comprehend this and do not know what is dangerous, who care for the pleasures of the moment only, will suffer death an endless number of times, like big 2 fishes who when the water rises are by the water (deposited) on dry land and are killed (there), poor things, by hungry dhankas and herons.

5 We hear also of another error of some (philosophers): some say that the world has been created (or is governed) [Devautte. This is either devair uptah, sown, i.e. produced by the gods, or devair guptah, governed by the gods.] by the gods, others, by Brahman.

6 Some say that it has been created by the Isvara, others that it was produced from chaos, etc., this world with living beings and lifeless things, with its variety of pleasure and pain.

7 The great Rishi* said, that the world has been created by Svayambhu; Mara originated Maya, therefore the world (appears to be) uneternal. [* The commentators unfortunately have not preserved the name of the great Rishi; they identify Svayambhu with Vishnu 'or some one else.' This Svayambhu, afraid that the earth should become overcrowded, called to help Yama, alias Mara, who with the help of Maya makes the creatures appear to die.]

8 Some Brahmanas and Sramanas say that the universe was produced from the (primeval) egg, and He (Brahman) created the things. These ignorant men speak untruth.

9 Those who on arguments of their own maintain that the world has been created, do not know the truth. Nor will (the world) ever perish.

10 Know that misery arises from wicked deeds [It is not given us by any of the above-mentioned agents whom the opponents believe to have created the world.]. How can those who do not know the origin (of misery) know its prevention?

11 Some say that the soul (of him who is) pure will become free from bad Karman (on reaching beatitude), but that in that state it will again become defiled through pleasant excitement or hate.

12 (According to them [According to Silanka the followers of Gosala and the Trairasikas are meant. The latter are the Jaina followers of the Vaiseshika philosophy. The Trairasika Sakha was founded by Khaluka Rohagupta, see part I, p. 290. The name Trairasika is said to have been given to these philosophers because they admit a third state besides those of the bound and of the liberated.]) he who has lived on earth as a restrained monk, will afterwards become free from Karman. As clear water which was free from defilement becomes again defiled, so (will be) the soul.

13 A wise man should consider that these (heretics) do not lead a life of chastity, and that all these disputants proclaim their own creed in opposition (to the others).

14 (Others maintain that) perfection can only be reached by their method of religious life, not otherwise; and that even before (that time) they have their senses under control and possess everything to be wished for.

15 Some say that they will be perfected and sound.

On the head of Perfection some men are infatuated with their own doctrines.

16 But these uncontrolled (men) will whirl round in the beginningless (Circle of Births); after a Kalpa they will rise from their sphere to become the lowest of Asuras.

Thus I say.

4TH CHAPTER.

1 These (philosophers) who are vanquished (by their passions) cannot help you in cases where a sinner perishes [A various reading first commented upon by Silanka is: bala panditamanio, being ignorant men who fancy themselves learned.]; though having given up their former occupations they will give advice in worldly matters.

2 A wise monk who fully appreciates this, should not mix with those (heretics); without conceit and not attached to them a sage should lead a life equally removed (from love and hate).

3 Some say that those who own possessions and engage in undertakings (may reach perfection); but a monk should take his refuge to those who neither own possessions nor engage in undertakings.

4 A wise man should beg food which has been prepared (for somebody else), and he should accept what is freely given him, without greed and passions; he should abstain from overbearing behaviour.

5 He should know the talk of people: some say things which are the outcome of a wrong understanding and are but opinions of others repeated.

6 'The world is boundless and eternal, it exists from eternity and does not perish [According to Silanka the eternity of things means, with these philosophers, that one thing always retains the same genus or gati, e.g. that he who was a man in this life will again be a man in the next.]; (another) bold philosopher says that the world is limited, but eternal.

7 'Some say that the knowledge (of the highest authority) is unlimited; but the same bold philosopher says that it is limited in every way [The commentators interpret this verse as if not two philosophical opinions but only one was spoken of. Unlimited knowledge is according to them different from omniscience; in the second part of the sentence 'limited' refers to the sleep of Brahman during which he is unconscious.]'

8 Some beings have motion, others not; it depends on certain conditions whether they are in the one state or in the other.

9 (E. g. big creatures) have one form of bodily existence and then another [Men are some time embryos, then young men, then old men.]. But all are subject to pain; hence they should not be killed.

10 This is the quintessence of wisdom: not to kill anything. Know this to be the legitimate conclusion from the principle of the reciprocity with regard to non-killing [That clearly refers to the Golden Rule: Ahimsasamayam = ahimsasamatam, viz. as you do not wish to be killed, so others do not wish to be killed. The last part of the sentence might also be translated: know this to be the real meaning of the Law (samaya) of ahimsa. The same verse recurs I, 11, 10.]

11, 12 Living (according to the rules of conduct), and without greed, one should take care of the highest good [Adana, right knowledge, right faith, and right conduct.]

In walking, in sitting and lying down, and in food and drink: with regard to these three points a monk should always control himself.

And he should leave off pride, wrath, deceit, and greed.

13 Possessing the Samitis and being protected by the five Samvaras, a pious monk should live, till he reaches perfection, as a man free from fetters among those bound in fetters (viz. the householders).

Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 2ND LECTURE,

CALLED THE DESTRUCTION OF KARMAN.

[The name of this lecture, which occurs in its last line, is veyaliya, because, as the author of the Niryukti remarks, it treats on vidarika, destruction (of Karman), and because it is composed in the Vaitaliya metre. For either word, vaidarika (or rather vaidalika, cf. karmavidalana) and vaitaliya may, in Jaina Prakrit, become veyaliya or vetaliya. A play of words was apparently intended; it would have been impossible, if both words had not become identical in sound. We may, therefore, conclude that the language of the author obeyed the same phonetic laws as the Jaina Prakrit exhibited in our MSS., or in other words, that the text has been written down in about the same language in which it was originally composed. The name of the Fifteenth Lecture leads to the same inference; for it is called gamaiya (yamakiya) because each of its verses contains the verbal ornament called yamaka, and because it opens with the words gam aiyam (yad atitam).]

1ST CHAPTER.

(Rishabha said to his sons):

1 Acquire perfect knowledge of the Law! why do you not study it? It is difficult to obtain instruction in it after this life. The days (that are gone by) will never return, nor is it easy a second time to obtain human birth.

2 See, young and old men, even children in the mother's womb die. As a hawk catches a quail, so (life) will end when its time is spent.

3 (A man) may suffer for the sake of his parents; he will not easily obtain happiness after this life. A pious man should consider these causes of danger and cease to act.

4 For in this world living beings suffer individually for their deeds; for the deed they have done themselves, they obtain (punishment), and will not get over it before they have felt it.

5 Even gods, Gandharvas, Rakshasas, and Asuras; animals who live on earth, and snakes; kings, common people, merchants, and Brahmanas: they all must leave their rank and suffer.

6 Notwithstanding their pleasures and relations, all men must suffer in due time the fruit of their works; as a cocoa-nut detaching itself from its stalk (falls down), so (life) will end when its time is spent.

7 Even a very learned or virtuous man, or a Brahmana or an ascetic, will be severely punished for his deed when he is given to actions of deceit.

8 See, those (heretics) who search for the knowledge of truth, but who do not cross the Samsara, talk only about the highest good (without reaching it).

How will you understand what is near you and what is beyond [According to Silanka, this world and the next, or domestic life and monachism, or the Samsara and Moksha are meant by the expression 'what is near you and what is beyond.']* In the meanwhile you suffer for your deeds.

9 He who walks about naked and lean, he who eats only once after a month, if he is filled with deceit, will be born an endless number of times.

10 Man, cease from sins! For the life of men will come to an end. Men who are drowned (in lust, as it were), and addicted to pleasure will, for want of control, be deluded.

11 Exert and control yourself! For it is not easy to walk on ways where there are minutely small animals. Follow the commandments which the Arhats have well proclaimed.

12 Heroes (of faith) who desist (from sins) and exert themselves aright, who subdue wrath, fear, etc., will never kill living beings; they desist from sins and are entirely happy.

13 It is not myself alone who suffers, all creatures in the world suffer; (such a wise man should consider, and he should patiently bear (such calamities) as befall him, without giving way to his passions.

14 As a wall covered with a plastering (of dried cowdung) is by a shock made thin, so (a monk) should make his body lean by fasting, etc. He should abstain from slaughter of living beings. This is the Law proclaimed by the Sage.

15 As a bird covered with dust removes the grey powder by shaking itself, so a worthy and austere Brahmana, who does penance, annihilates his Karman.

16 Young and old people claim a houseless Sramana as their own, though he begs according to the Law, observes the rules of conduct, and performs austerities. People will even cry themselves hoarse, but they will not captivate him.

17 Whatever they will do to move his pity, however they will cry about their son, they will not captivate a worthy and virtuous monk or make him return to domestic life.

18 Though they tempt him with pleasures, and though they should bind him and carry him home, if he does not care for a (worldly) life, they will not captivate him or make him return to domestic life.

19 His father and mother, his children and wife who claim him, will admonish him: 'See, you are our supporter; care not for the next world in order to support us.'

20 Some people are (foolishly) attached to others, and are thereby deluded; the unrighteous make them adopt unrighteousness, and they exult in their wickedness.

21 Therefore a worthy and wise man should be careful, ceasing from sin and being entirely happy. The virtuous heroes of faith (have chosen) the great road, the right and certain path to perfection.

22 He who has entered the road leading to the destruction (of Karman), who controls his mind, speech, and body, who has given up his possessions and relations and all undertakings, should walk about subduing his senses.

2ND CHAPTER.

1 A sage thinks that he should leave off sins just as (a snake) leaves its slough; and he is not proud of his Gotra and other advantages; or is there any use in blaming others?

2 A man who insults another will long whirl in the Circle of Births; to blame others is not good. Considering this a sage is not conceited.

3 He who is independent, and he who is the servant of a servant, if they but observe the Vow of Silence, they have no reason to be ashamed; (therefore a monk) should behave equally towards all.

4 Indifferent and pure with regard to every kind of control, a Sramana should walk about; he who entertains pure thoughts during his whole life, dies as a worthy and wise man.

5 The sage who sees the far-off (goal, viz. liberation), past and future things, will practise indifference, though he suffer corporal punishment and be beaten.

6 Possessing perfect wisdom, a sage always vanquishes (his passions); he correctly expounds the Law; he never neglects even the smallest (duty); he is neither angry nor proud.

7 A man who controls himself according to (the Law), which is praised by many people, and is not bound by any worldly ties, who is always pure like a lake, proclaims the Law of Kasyapa.

8 Seeing that numerous living beings lead an individual life, and that every one feels (pleasure and pain) just as the others, a wise man who observes the Vow of Silence, leaves off (injuring them).

9 A sage has completely mastered the Law, and has ceased to do actions; but the selfish grieve, they will not (thereby) recover their (lost) property.

10 Know that it (viz. property) entails pains in this world, and very great pains in the next. Who will lead a domestic life when he knows that everything must perish?

11 One should know (and renounce) the great attachment (to the world), and respect and honours on earth; (for conceit) is a very thin thorn difficult to pull out. A wise man, therefore, should abandon worldliness [This is a rather dark verse. Silanka, after explaining it, quotes the verse as it was read by the Nagarguniyas, which may be rendered thus: Respect and honours are a great obstacle, this he should know; be the thorn small (or) difficult to pull out, a wise man should remove it by the (means we are about to describe).]

12 A monk should perform postures (as Kayotsarga, etc.) alone on his seat, and alone on his couch he should meditate; excelling in the performance of austerities, guarded in words, and restrained in thoughts.

13 An ascetic does not shut the door of a deserted house (where he puts up), nor does he open it; when asked he returns no (rude) answer; he cuts no grass, nor does he strew it (on the ground for a couch).

14 Where (he is) at sunset, there he calmly (performs his duties); a sage bears pleasant and unpleasant things, be there insects, or wild beasts, or snakes.

15 He bears the three kinds of calamities arising from beasts, men, and gods. A great sage will not be seized with a shivering, etc. [Literally, horripilation. By the 'etc.' the other outward signs of horror are indicated.], when he stays in a deserted house.

16 He should not fear for his life, nor should he desire to be praised (for his courage). Fearful things will frighten the mind of a monk who stays in a deserted house.

17 They say that he who is very well disciplined, who protects others, who lives in a place removed from other people, who is not frightened by dangers, possesses right conduct, etc.

18 A monk who uses warm or hot water [It should be kept in mind that Jaina monks are forbidden to use cold water, because it is considered to possess life.], who follows the Law, and loathes (wrong conduct), will by intercourse with bad kings become deficient in his devotion though he be ever so virtuous.

19 When a monk quarrels and uses very bad language, he will suffer great spiritual loss; therefore a wise man should not quarrel.

20 He who abstains from cold water, who plans (or undertakes) nothing, and has ceased from even the smallest actions, who does not eat food out of the dish of a householder, possesses right conduct, etc.

21 Though life cannot be prolonged, as the saying is, still foolish people sin recklessly; a foolish man is filled to the brim (as it were) with sins. Considering this a sage is not conceited.

22 By self-invented rites common people seek holiness, they are full of deceit and shrouded (as it were) in delusion. But a monk is holy through his innocence, he allows no troubles [Literally, cold and heat.] to influence his words, (thoughts, and acts).

23 As a clever gambler, playing at dice, is not vanquished, since he casts the Krita, but not Kali, nor Treta, nor Dvapura;

24 So adopt for your welfare the best and highest Law which has been proclaimed in this world by the Saviour, as the clever (gambler casts) the Krita, and avoids the other casts.

25 I have heard that sensual pleasures are said to have the strongest hold on men; but those who abstain from them follow the Law of Kasyapa.

26 Those who follow the Law that has been proclaimed by Gnatrika, the great seer, are virtuous and righteous; they confirm each other in the Law.

27 Take no heed of the seductive (pleasures), endeavour to shake off delusion. Those who are not subdued by the wicked (pleasures), know meditation to be their duty.

28 A monk should not tell stories, nor ask idle questions, nor gossip. But, knowing the highest Law, he should perform his religious duties, and regard nothing his own.

29 A monk should not indulge deceit, greed, pride, and wrath. Those are virtuous who have arrived at the right understanding of these passions, and who have well practised control.

30 (A monk) should be free from attachment, wise, controlling himself, seeking the Law, earnest in the performance of austerities, and subduing his senses. It is difficult to obtain the soul's benefit.

31 Right conduct, etc., which has been taught by the Gnatrika, the sage who knew everything in the whole world, has either not been learned or not been truly practised (by creatures now in distress).

32 Many men who thought this Law to be the highest good and conducive to their spiritual welfare, obeyed their preceptors, ceased from works, and have crossed the great flood (of worldly existence).

Thus I say.

3RD CHAPTER.

1 If a monk who abstains from actions, suffers pain (for acts done) through ignorance, that Karman will be annihilated through control. The wise reach (perfection) getting rid of death.

2 Those who resist the seductions are placed on a line with those who have crossed the Samsara. Therefore look up (at beatitude as the end in view). Those (virtuous men) regard pleasures as equal to diseases.

3 Men of princely rank wear precious things imported by merchants; likened (to these precious things) are the excellent great vows together with (the prohibition of) eating at night.

4 Pleasure-seeking men who are greedy and are absorbed by amusements, are reckless and like the wretched; they do not know that meditation (has been enjoined as) a duty.

5 As a bullock which is hurt and urged on by the driver [Instead of 'driver' and 'bullock' we might translate 'hunter' and 'deer.']. becomes weak, and at last, when its strength is exhausted and it is unable to move, sinks down;

6 So he who knows the pursuit of pleasures, must sooner or later give up their enjoyment (lest they drag him down). He who is still surrounded by pleasant things, should not love pleasures, whether he obtains them, or for some reason or other does not obtain them.

7 Lest the lot of the wicked should fall to you, escape (the influence of the senses), and discipline yourself! The wicked will much and strongly grieve, groan, and wail.

8 See, life in this world (is transient); though your life lasts a hundred years, you die as a short-lived man; mind that (your) years swiftly pass. Nevertheless greedy men are attached to pleasures.

9 Those who engage in undertakings, who work the perdition of their souls, and who kill (living beings), will go to the world of the wicked, to the abode of the Asuras for a long time (to dwell there).

THE GRAND BIBLE

10 Though life cannot be prolonged, as the saying is, still foolish people sin recklessly (thinking): 'We are only concerned with the present time; who has seen the next world and returned thence?'

11 Believe in the words of him who sees (everything), you who are blind, as it were, you whose sight is blinded, ah, whose sight is obstructed by your works which result in delusion!

12 The unhappy again and again suffer from delusion; therefore have done with praise and honours! A wise ascetic should consider that living beings are like himself (as regards love of life, aversion to pain, etc.).

13 The man also who still lives in the house, should, in accordance with his creed, be merciful to living beings; we are bidden to be fair and equal with all; (thereby even a householder) goes to the world of the gods.

14 Being instructed in the creed of the Lord, exert yourself in the truth (i.e. in control)! A monk who has thoroughly subdued his selfishness should collect pure alms.

15 Knowing the truth, one should live up to it, seeking the Law, earnest in the performance of austerities, possessing the Gupitis, being accomplished, one should always exert oneself, intent on the soul's benefit, and desiring the highest good (viz. liberation).

16 The fool thinks that his wealth, cattle, and relations will save him; they him, or he them. But they are no help, no protection.

17 When calamity befalls him, or the end of his life draws near, he must go and come alone; the wise believe that there is nothing to protect him.

18 All living beings owe their present form of existence to their own Karma; timid, wicked, suffering latent misery, they err about (in the Circle of Births), subject to birth, old age, and death.

19 He should know that the present time is the best opportunity to mend, and that an awakening is difficult to obtain. A wise man should be aware of this. The (first) Gina has said this, and so the remaining ones (will) say it.

20 O ye monks, the virtuous (Ginas) that have been and will be, the followers of the Law of Kasyapa, they all have commended these virtues.

21 Do not kill living beings in the threefold way [i.e. by your own acts, by order, and by assent; or by thoughts, words, and acts.], being intent on your spiritual welfare and abstaining from sins. In this way numberless men have reached perfection, and others, who live now, and who are to come, (will reach it).

Thus spoke the Arhat Gnatiputra, the reverend, famous native of Vaisali [This passage in prose appended to the metrical text seems to contradict the supposition of the commentators that the whole lecture was pronounced by Rishabha.], who possessed the highest knowledge and the highest faith, who possessed (simultaneously) the highest knowledge and faith.

Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 3RD LECTURE.

CALLED THE KNOWLEDGE OF TROUBLES

1ST CHAPTER.

1 A man believes himself a hero as long as he does not behold the foe, as did Sisupala (before he beheld) the valorously-fighting, great warrior [Viz. Krishna. Krishna's victory over Sisupala is told in the Mahabharata, Sabhaparvan, Sisupalavadha (eighth parvan). It forms the subject of Magha's famous poem Sisupalavadha.].

2 They go forward to the head of the battle; but when the fight has begun the mother will not recognise her son, and he will be mangled by his foe.

3 So a novice, who as yet has not suffered pains and is not yet used to a mendicant's life, believes himself a hero till he practises austerities.

4 When during the winter they suffer from cold and draughts, the weak become disheartened like Kshatriyas who have lost their kingdom.

5 When they suffer from the heat of summer, sad and thirsty, the weak become disheartened like fish in shallow water.

6 It is painful never to take anything but what is freely given, and begging is a liard task. Common people say that (men become monks) because they will not work and are wretched.

7 Weak men who are unable (to bear) these insults in villages or towns, become disheartened like cowards in the battle.

8 Perchance a snarling dog will bite a hungry monk; in that case the weak will become disheartened like animals burnt by fire.

9 Some who hate (the monks), revile them: 'Those who lead such a (miserable) life (as monks do), atone but (for their sins in a former life).'

10 Some call them names, as 'naked, lowest of beggars, baldhead, scabby, filthy, nasty.'

11 Those who behave in this way and do not know better, go from darkness to utter darkness, being fools and shrouded in delusion.

12 When bitten by flies and gnats, and unable (to bear) the pricking of grass, (they will begin to doubt), 'I have not seen the next world, all may end with death!'

13 Some weak men who suffer from the plucking out of the hair, and who are unable to preserve their chastity, will become disheartened like fish transfixed by a spear [Ketana, perhaps 'caught with the hook'.].

14 Some low people who lead a life of iniquity, and entertain heretical opinions, being subject to love and hatred, injure a monk.

15 Some fools in outlying countries take a pious monk for a spy or a thief, bind him, and insult him with angry words.

16 A weak monk being hurt with a stick or a fist or a fruit, remembers his (kind) relations, just as a woman who in a passion has left (her husband and house).

17 All these hardships are difficult to bear; the weak return to their house (when they cannot bear them), like elephants covered with arrows (break down).

Thus I say.

2ND CHAPTER.

1 There are some tender affections which monks cannot easily overcome. On their account some become disheartened, and are unable to practise control.

2 His relations on seeing him will surround him and cry: 'Child, we have brought you up, (now) support us! O dear! why will you leave us?'

3 'Child, your father is an old man; your sister is still very young; (and here), O dear, are your own brothers from the same mother; why will you leave us?'

4 'Support your mother and father, thus you will win this world; it is a duty in this world to protect one's mother.'

5 'The old people are kind-spoken; your sons, child, are very young; you have married your wife; (take care) that she will not go to another man.'

6 'Come, child, let us go home; we can do all the work, you need not (do it); the next time we shall take care (that you will not be overburdened with work); child, let us meanwhile go to our house.'

7 'Afterwards you may go again; by this (visit of yours) you will not cease to be a Sramana; who will hinder you to practise control when you have done with worldly desires? [Akamagam. Another explanation is, if you are not willing (to do domestic work).]

8 'All your outstanding debts we have divided between us, and we shall give you the money (required for) business.'

9 In this way (his relations) come to him, lamenting, and try to persuade him. Held fast by his attachment for his relations, he quickly returns to his house.

10 As a creeper encircles a tree growing in the forest, so his relations press him hard that he should leave off control.

11 He is held fast by his attachment for his relations. So the keepers always follow a newly-caught elephant, and a cow which has just calved never goes far (from the calf).

12 Men do not (easily) get over this attachment, as (they do not get over) the ocean. For its sake the weak suffer pains, being engrossed by their attachment for their relations.

13 But a monk should renounce it; for every attachment is but a cause of sin. He should not desire life, having been instructed in the best Law.

14 There are these whirlpools which have been pointed out by Kasyapa: the wise keep clear of them, but the ignorant go down in them.

15 Kings and ministers of kings, Brahmanas and Kshatriyas try with pleasant things to seduce a monk who leads a holy life.

16 (They try to seduce him) with elephants, horses, chariots, and cars, with pleasure-trips (saying to him): 'Enjoy these excellent pleasures, great sage, we worship you!'

'Clothes, perfumes, ornaments, women, and beds: enjoy these pleasures, friend, we worship you! (17)

18 'All the vows which you, holy man, have kept while a monk, are compatible with your living in a house.'

19 'It will be no sin, for you have wandered about long (enough). In this way they try to tempt him, as men decoy a pig with wild rice.'

20 Weak men who are exhorted to live as monks, but who are unable to practise control, break down like weak (bullocks carrying a heavy burden) uphill.

21 Unable to practise the rough (i.e. control), and harassed by the austerities, weak men break down, like old oxen in going uphill.

22 When men who are greedy, attached to women, and who love pleasures, are tempted in the way described above, they return to their houses.

Thus I say.

3RD CHAPTER.

1 As at the time of the battle the coward looks behind him for a ditch, thicket, or other hiding-place 1, (thinking that nobody knows who will win);

2 'A moment's moment will bring the decision [Literally, a moment of a moment of moments will be such.]; when we lose, we shall fly.' Thus thinks the coward.

3 So some Sramanas, knowing themselves to be weak, have recourse to worldly sciences [As grammar, astrology, medicine, etc.] when they see that they will suffer want.

4 (They say): 'Who knows what will cause my loss of sanctity, woman or water? When we are questioned, we shall speak out (i.e. show our knowledge). We have no (other) resource (in case of need)!'

5 They are cautious, like those who look out for a ditch, etc. Those who doubt (their ability for control) are like men ignorant of the way.

6 But famous warriors, leaders of heroes at the time of the battle, do not look behind them; (they think) what if all end with death?

7 A monk who exerts himself in a similar way, should slip off the ties that bind him to his house. Putting aside all undertakings, he should wander about for the welfare of his soul.

8 Some revile a monk who leads a holy life. But these revilers are far off from perfection.

9 (The revilers say), 'You live just as the laymen do, being attached to one another, for (e.g.) you beg alms for a sick man and give it him.'

10 'Therefore you still have an attachment, being obedient to the will of one another; you have not the purity produced by the right path, and have not got beyond the Circle of Births.'

11 Now a monk who knows (the truth about) Moksha should answer them: 'You speak thus, wavering between two ways of life (viz. that of householders and monks).'

12 'You eat out of the vessels* (of householders, and make them) bring food for a sick brother; you eat seeds and drink cold water, and what has been especially prepared (for you when sick). [* For these heretics carry the principle of absolute poverty so far as to reject even the use of almsbowls.].

13 'You are infected by great faults, you are void of discrimination, and your resolutions are bad. It is not good to scratch a wound too much, for it will grow worse [The meaning is that the overdoing of the principle of poverty is just] as harmful as the scratching of a wound.'

14 They should be instructed in the truth by one who knows it and is free from passions: 'Yours is not the right way, you speak and act without consideration.'

15 'This your talk is weak, like the top of a bamboo, (when you say: a sick brother) may eat the food brought by a householder, but not that brought by a monk!'

16 '(And when you say that) our religious precepts are wholesome only for householders (not for monks, we reply that our prophet had) no such (inconsistent) ideas when he taught (his Law).'

17 When (these heretics) cannot prove (their assertion) by any arguments they give up the discussion, and fall back on their bold (assertion).

18 Overcome by their passions and infected by untruth, (these men) have recourse to bad language, as the (savage) Tankana* (when beaten) have recourse to their hills. [* This hill tribe lived somewhere in the north-east of Madhyadesa, see Petersburg Dictionary, sv. The Brockhaus and Efron Encyclopedic Dictionary (Russian: Энциклопедический словарь Брокгауза и Ефрона, abbr. ЭСБЕ, tr. Entsiklopedicheskiy slovar' Brokgauza i Yefrona; 35 volumes, small; 86 volumes, large) is a comprehensive multi-volume encyclopedia in Russian. It contains 121,240 articles, 7,800 images, and 235 maps. It was published in Imperial Russia in 1890–1907, as a joint venture of Leipzig and St Petersburg publishers.]

19 The argumentation of a monk whose mind is at rest should possess many good qualities. He should proceed in such a way as not to exasperate his opponent.

20 Following this Law which has been proclaimed by the Kasyapa, a sound monk should carefully attend a sick brother.

21 Knowing the beautiful Law, a wise and thoroughly restrained monk should bear all hardships and wander about till he reaches final liberation.

Thus I say.

4TH CHAPTER.

1 Some say that in old times great men, rich in religious penance, have reached perfection though they drank (cold) water (and ate fruits and roots). Ignorant men (who hear such assertions) are led astray (by them).

2 'Nami, the king of Videha, ate nothing, Ramagupta did eat, Bahuka drank (cold) water, and so did Taragana [Instead of Taragana, Silanka writes Narayana.], the seer.'

3 Asila, Devala, the great sage Dvipayana, and Parasara did drink (cold) water, and did eat seeds and sprouts [Asila is not known from other sources; perhaps Asita is meant, and Asila Davila stands for Asita Devala. Concerning Dvipayana, the Parasara, compare Journal of the German Oriental Society, vol. 42, p. 495. But in the Aupapatika Sutra (ed. Leumann, § 76) Parasara and Dvipayana are two distinct persons.].

4 'I have heard that in old times these renowned and well-known great men ate seeds and drank water, and have reached perfection.'

THE GRAND BIBLE

5 When weak (monks hear such assertions) they become disheartened, as donkeys break down under their burden; in case of danger they retreat (and perish) like men who walk on crutches.

6 Some* say: Pleasant things are produced from pleasant things. (They are those who disdain) the noble path and the renowned highest good. [* According to the commentators the Buddhists are intended. They quote some verses in illustration of the pushtimarga of the Buddhists, one of which is not yet known I believe. It runs thus: 'Having enjoyed a pleasant dinner, and a pleasant seat and bed, a muni in a pleasant house meditates on pleasant things.'

7 Do not, by disdaining it, lose much for the sake of little. If you do not give up this (wrong law), you will repent of it as the man did who carried iron (a long way) believing it to be silver.

8 (And so will) those who kill living beings, who do not abstain from untrue speech, who take what is not freely given them, who enjoy sexual pleasures, and who own property.

9 Some unworthy heretics, slaves of women, ignorant men who are averse to the Law of the Ginas, speak thus:

10 'As the squeezing of a blister or boil (causes relief) for some time, (and has no dangerous consequences), so it is with (the enjoyment of) charming women. How could there be any sin in it?'

11 'As a ram drinks the quiet water, so, etc. (the rest as in verse 10).'

12 'As the bird Pinga drinks the quiet water (flying), etc. (the rest as in verse 10).'

13 So say some unworthy heretics who entertain false doctrines, and who long for pleasures, as the ewe* for her kid. [* Puyana (putana, who is ever desirous of young), explained either by sakini hog' or gaddarika 'ewe.' The commentators relate the following anecdote. In order to find out which animal loved its young ones best, their young ones were placed at the bottom of a well. Their mothers assembled round the brink and howled, but the ewe threw herself recklessly into the well. Therefore the ewe excels the other animals in maternal love.]

14 Those who do not think of the future, but only enjoy the present, will repent of it afterwards when their life or their youth is gone.

15 But those who exert themselves at the proper time, feel no remorse afterwards; these heroes who have got rid of their fetters, do not long for life.

16 As Vaitarami, the river (of hell), is difficult to pass, so in this world women are to the unwise (a temptation) difficult to overcome.

17 Those who have given up intercourse with women and have left off adorning themselves, are well established in control, because they have renounced everything.

18 As merchants go over the sea, so they will cross the flood (of Samsara), where living beings despond and suffer pains because of their own deeds.

19 A monk who knows this, will live as a virtuous man guarded by the Samitis; he will abstain from untrue speech, and not take what is not freely given him.

20 He should cease to injure living beings whether they move or not, on high, below, and on earth. For this has been called the Nirvana, which consists in peace.

21, 22 = 1, 3, 3, 20 and 21.

Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 4TH LECTURE, CALLED KNOWLEDGE OF WOMEN. 1ST CHAPTER.

1 A monk who has left his mother and father and all worldly ties, (determines) to walk about alone and wise, to abstain from sexual pleasures, and to ask for a secluded place (where to lodge).

2 With clever pretences women make up to him, however foolish they be; they know how to contrive that some monks will become intimate with them.

3 They will often sit down at his side; they always put on fine clothes; they will show him the lower part of their body, and the armpit, when lifting up their arms, so that he will follow them about.

4 And occasionally a woman will tempt him to a comfortable couch or bed. But he should know these things to be as many traps under various disguises.

5 He should not look at them, nor should he consent to anything inconsiderate, nor walk together with them; thus he will well guard himself.

6 Inviting a monk and winning his confidence, they offer themselves to him. But he should know, and fly from these temptations in their various forms.

7 Meekly and politely they approach him with their manifold arts to win his heart; and talking sweetly in confidential conversation they make him do (what they like).

8 As (men by baiting) with a piece of flesh a fearless single lion get him into a trap, so women may capture an ascetic though he be careful.

And then they make him do what they like, even as a wheelwright gradually turns the felly of a wheel.

9 As an antelope caught in a snare, so he does not get a out of it, however he struggles.

10 Afterwards he will feel remorse like one who has drunk milk mixed with poison; considering the consequences, a worthy monk should have no intercourse with women.

11 Therefore he should avoid women, knowing them to be like a poisoned thorn. He is no Nirgrantha who without companion (goes into) houses, being a slave (to passion) and preaches (his religion).

12 Those who are attached to this sinful (intercourse) must be reckoned among the wicked. Even a monk who practises severe austerities should avoid the company of women.

13 A monk should have no intercourse with his daughters and daughters-in-law, with nurses or female slaves, or with grown-up girls.

14 When the relations and friends see (the intimacy of a monk with a girl), they become angry (saying): 'All creatures love pleasures; you are a man, protect and support her.'

15 But some become angry even when they see an innocent Sramana, and suspect the fidelity of their wives because of the dishes they serve up [There is a saying in German: Eine verliebte Köchin versalzt den Brei, 'a cook in love spoils the soup.' The commentators put different constructions on the last part of the sentence,].

16 Those who have intercourse with (women) have already ceased to practise meditation; Sramanas, therefore, for the benefit of their souls, do not go to the apartments (of women).

17 Though many leave the house, some (of them) arrive but at a middling position (between householder and monk); they merely talk of the path to perfection. The force of sinners is talking.

18 In the assembly he pronounces holy (words), yet secretly he commits sins; but the wise know him to be a deceiver and great rogue.

19 The sinner does not confess his wrong, but rather boasts of it when reprimanded. Though he is admonished not to act as most men do, he becomes weak again and again.

20 Some men of great intelligence who perform their duties as supporters of women, get into their power, though they be well acquainted with the Striveda.

21 (The adulterers') hands and feet are cut off, their skin and flesh are torn off, they are roasted alive, and acid is poured into their wounds.

22 Their ears and nose are cut off, and their throats cut; (all this) they will suffer, but though suffering here for their sins they will not promise not to do the same again.

23 All this some have learned, and it has been well demonstrated in the Striveda. Though (people) know it, they do wrong (impelled) by Karman.

24 One man (women) have in their heart, another in their words, and another still in their actions. Therefore a monk should not trust women, knowing that they are full of deceit.

25 A young woman, putting on fine ornaments and clothes, will say to a Sramana: 'I shall give up (my former way of life) and practise the rough (viz. control). Reverend sir, teach me the Law!'

26 Or by professing herself a lay-disciple and co-religionist of the Sramanas, (she will try to make a friend of him). As a pot filled with lac (will melt) near the fire, so even a wise (monk) will fall through intercourse with women.

27 A pot filled with lac thrown into the fire melts quickly and is destroyed; so monks are lost through intercourse with women.

28 Some commit sins (with a girl), but when questioned about it, they say: 'I have done no sin; she only slept in my lap (like my daughter).'

29 This is a second folly of the sinner that he obstinately denies what he has done. He commits a twofold sin, since, for the sake of his reputation, he falls again.

30 (Some women) will say, by way of invitation, to a good-looking, self-knowing monk: 'Holy man, accept a robe, an almsbowl, food or drink (at our house)!'

31 He should regard their words like wild rice, and should not desire to call at (their) house; for a fool who is bound in the fetters of sensuality will be subject to delusion again and again.

Thus I say.

2ND CHAPTER.

1 A monk, living single [Oe = ekah, explained: free from love and hate,], should not fall in love; if he loves pleasures, he should again become indifferent. Now hear the pleasures of Sramanas, which some monks enjoy.

2 When a monk breaks the law, dotes (on a woman), and is absorbed by that passion, she afterwards scolds him, lifts her foot, and tramples on his head.

3 'O monk, if you will not live with me as a woman who has still her hair, I shall tear it out; but do not live separated from me.'

4 But when they have captured him, they send him on all sorts of errands [The following verses are interesting as they afford us a glimpse of a Hindu household some 2,000 years ago. We find here a curious list of domestic furniture and other things of common use.]: 'Look (for the bodkin to) carve the bottle-gourd [Alabukhegga = alabukhedam pippalakadi sastram,], fetch some nice fruit.

5 (Bring) wood to cook the vegetables, or that we may light a fire at night; paint my feet [Or, scour my pots,], come and meanwhile rub my back!

6 'Look after my clothes, bring food and drink, get me some perfume, a broom, a barber* (to shave my head)! [*Kasavaga = kasyapa, explained napita. The word is probably derived from the root kash 'to scrape.' According to Silanka verses 5-6 refer to things used by monks and nuns.]

7 'Give me the collyrium-box, my ornaments, the lute, Lodhra-powder [Symlocos Racemosa, the bark of which is used in dyeing,], a Lodhra-flower, the Venupalasika-lute [This is a thin piece of bamboo or bark held between the teeth and with the left hand, and played by the right hand just like a Vina. (Silanka,)], a pill!

8 'A Utpalakushta [Probably Costus Speciosus,], Tagara-powder [Tabernaemontana Coronaria,], and aloe pounded together with Usira [Andropogon Muricatus,], oil for anointing the face, baskets of bamboo wickerwork to put my things in!

9 'Reach me the lip-salve, fetch the umbrella and slippers, the knife to cut the string, have my robe dyed bluish!

10 'Give me the pot to cook the vegetables in, Myrobalans [They are used in bathing,], the jar to fetch water in, the stick to paint the mark upon the forehead, the pin to apply collyrium (to the eyelids), or the fan when it is hot!

11 'Fetch me the pincers [To tear out the hair growing in the nose,], the comb, the ribbon to bind up the hair, reach me the looking-glass, put the tooth-brush near me!

12 'Fetch me areca-nut and betel, needle and thread, the chamber-pot, the winnowing basket, the mortar, the pot for liquefying natron [Used in India instead of soap for cleaning linen.].

13 'Give me the vessel (used in worshipping the gods [Kandalaka, a copper vessel used in worship. The name was current in Mathura at the time when Silanka wrote or the author from whose work he copied this remark,]), the water-pot, Friend, dig a privy. Fetch the bow for our son, the bullock for the Sramanera!

14 'The small pot, the drum, and the ball of cloth for the boy (to play with), Sramana, the rainy season is at hand, look after the house and the stores!

15 'Fetch the chair with woven twine seat, the wooden shoes to walk on! Pregnant women order their husbands about like slaves to fulfil their craving.

16 When a son, the reward (of their wedded life), is born, (the mother bids the father) to hold the baby, or to give it her. Thus some supporters of their sons have to carry burdens like camels.

17 Getting up in the night they lull the baby asleep like nurses; and though they are ashamed of themselves, they wash the clothes like washermen.

18 This has been done by many men who for the sake of pleasures have stooped so low; they become the equals of slaves, animals, servants, beasts of burden--mere nobodies.

19 One should not mind the entreaties of women, but abstain from their friendship and company. These pleasures which are derived therefrom are called causes of blamable actions.

20 Restraining himself by the thought that these dangerous (pleasures) will not be to his benefit, a monk should abstain from women, and commit no unnatural crime.

21 A wise and learned monk whose soul is in a pure condition (Lesya), will abstain from doing work for others; in thoughts, words, and actions he will bear all troubles.

22 The hero (of faith) who has vanquished sin and delusion, has said all this. A monk, therefore, whose soul is pure (and free from sins) should wander about till he reaches final liberation.

Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 5TH LECTURE, CALLED DESCRIPTION OF THE HELLS. 1ST CHAPTER.

1 I once asked the Kevalin, the great sage: What is the punishment in the hells? Knowing it, O sage, tell it me who do not know it! How do sinners go to hell?

2 When I thus questioned the illustrious Kasyapa, the omniscient one [Asupanna-asupragna 'quickly comprehending.' I usually render this word 'intelligent,' when it is used of common monks.] spoke as follows: I shall describe the truly insupportable pains where there is distress and (the punishment of) evil deeds.

3 Those cruel sinners who, from a desire of (worldly) life, commit bad deeds, will sink into the dreadful hell which is full of dense darkness and great suffering.

4 He who always kills movable and immovable beings for the sake of his own comfort, who injures them, who takes what is not freely given, who does not learn what is to be practised (viz. control);

5 The impudent sinner, who injures many beings without relenting, will go to hell; at the end of his life the will sink to the (place of) darkness; head downwards he comes to the place of torture.

6 They hear the cries of the punishers: Beat, cut, split, burn him! The prisoners in hell lose their senses from fright, and do not know in what direction to run.

7 Going to a place like a burning heap of coals on fire, and being burnt they cry horribly; they remain there long, shrieking aloud.

8 Have you heard of the horrible (river) Vaitarani, whose cutting waves are like sharp razors? They cross the horrible Vaitarani, being urged on by arrows, and wounded with spears.

9 The punishers pierce them with darts; they go in the boat, losing their memory; others pierce them with long pikes and tridents, and throw them on the ground.

10 Some, round whose neck big stones are tied, are drowned in deep water. Others again roll about in the Kadambavaluka (river) 2 or in burning chaff, and are roasted in it.

11 And they come to the great impassable hell, full of agony, called Asurya (i.e. where the sun does not shine), where there is great darkness, where fires, placed above, below, and all around, are blazing.

12 There, as in a cave, being roasted on the fire, he is burned, having lost the reminiscence (of his sins) and consciousness of everything else; always suffering (he comes) to that miserable hot place that is ever ready (for the punishment of evildoers).

13 There the cruel punishers have lighted four fires, and roast the sinners; they are roasted there like fishes put on the fire alive.

14 The prisoners in hell come to the dreadful place called Santakshana (i.e. cutting), where the cruel punishers tie their hands and feet, and with axes in their hands cut them like wooden planks.

15 And they turn the writhing victims round, and stew them, like living fishes, in an iron caldron filled with their own blood, their limbs covered with ordure, their heads smashed.

16 They are not reduced to ashes there, and they do not die of their enormous pains; undergoing this punishment, the miserable men suffer for their misdeeds.

17 And there in the place, where there is constant shivering, they resort to a large burning fire; but they find no relief in that place of torture; the tormentors torture them still.

18 There is heard everywhere the noise of painfully uttered cries even as in the street of a town. Those whose bad Karman takes effect (viz. the punishers), violently torment again and again those whose bad Karman takes effect also (viz. the punished).

19 They deprive the sinner of his life; I shall truly tell you how this is done. The wicked (punishers) remind by (similar) punishment (their victims) of all sins they had committed in a former life.

20 Being killed they are thrown into a hell which is full of boiling filth. There they stay eating filth, and they are eaten by vermin.

21 And there is an always crowded, hot place, which men deserve for their great sins, and which is full of misery. (The punishers) put them in shackles, beat their bodies, and torment them (by perforating) their skulls with drills.

22 They cut off the sinner's nose with a razor, they cut off both his ears and lips; they pull out his tongue a span's length and torment (him by piercing it) with sharp pikes.

23 There the sinners dripping (with blood) whine day and night even as the dry leaves of a palm-tree (agitated by the wind). Their blood, matter, and flesh are dropping off while they are roasted, their bodies being besmeared with natron.

24 Have you heard of the large, erected caldron of more than man's size, full of blood and matter, which is extremely heated by a fresh fire, in which blood and matter are boiling?

25 The sinners are thrown into it and boiled there, while they utter horrid cries of 'Agony; they are made to drink molten lead and copper when they are thirsty, and they shriek still more horribly.

26 Those evildoers who have here forfeited their souls' (happiness) for the sake of small (pleasures), and have been born in the lowest births during hundred thousands of 'former years,' will stay in this (hell). Their punishment will be adequate to their deeds.

27 The wicked who have committed crimes will atone for them, deprived of all pleasant and lovely objects, by dwelling in the stinking crowded hell, a scene of pain, which is full of flesh (etc.).

Thus I say.

2ND CHAPTER.

1 I shall now truly tell you another kind of perpetual suffering, how the sinners who have committed crimes suffer for the deeds they have done in their former lives.

2 Tying their hands and feet the (punishers) cut open their belly with razors and knives; taking hold of the mangled body of the sinner, they forcibly tear the skin off his back.

3 They cut off his arms at the armpits; they force his mouth wide open and scald it; they yoke the sinner to a car and drive him, and growing angry I they pierce his back with a goad.

4 The (sinners) walk over ground burning and glowing like red-hot iron; scorched they shriek horribly, being urged on with arrows and put to a red-hot yoke.

5 The sinners are driven over slippery ground which is like a road of red-hot iron; in this dreadful place (the ministers of hell) make them go forward like slaves (beating them) with sticks.

6 Proceeding in this intolerable (hell) they are crushed by rocks tumbling down. There is the (caldron) Santapani, where evildoers suffer for a long time.

7 They throw the sinners into caldrons and boil them; scalded they rise thence again; devilish crows feed on them and (so do) other beasts having claws devour them.

8 There is a place of smokeless fire in the form of a pile where (the sinners) greatly distressed shriek horribly; head downwards they are lacerated and cut into pieces with iron knives.

9 Tied up and skinned they are devoured by steel-nibbed birds; it is the hell called Samgivani, where life is long, and where men of an evil mind are tortured.

10 The (punishers) pierce them with sharp pikes as people do with a captured pig. Transfixed by a pike the (sinners) shriek horribly; suffering both (bodily and mentally) they feel nothing but pains.

11 There is a great place always on fire, where fires burn without fuel; there for a long time stay the evildoers shrieking aloud.

12 Setting on fire large piles, they thrust into them (a sinner) who will cry horribly; as butter thrown in the fire melts, so does the evildoer there.

13 And there is an always crowded, hot place which one deserves for one's great sins, and which is full of misery. There (the punishers) tie (the sinner's) hands and feet, and belabour him with sticks like an enemy.

14 They break the sinner's back with a weapon, and smash his skull with iron clubs; their bodies are split and sawn like a plank; and tortured with red-hot awls (the sinners) are subjected (to cruelties).

15 Cruel evildoers, urged on with arrows, and put to work (by the punishers), carry burdens in the way of elephants; two or three (punishers) get on one (victim) and growing angry hurt his vital parts.

16 The sinners are driven over the large, slippery, and thorny ground; tightly bound with straps they lose their senses; the revenging (punishers) cut them into pieces 4, and throw them about like a bali-sacrifice.

17 There is a dreadful mountain towering high up in the air, called Vaitalika*, where the evildoers are tortured for more than a thousand hours. [* Vetaliya. The commentators render it vaikriya 'produced by magic,' and moreover explain the word as an epithet, not as a proper name.]

18 Tortured, the sinners shriek, suffering day and night; in this horrid, great hell, which is full of implements of torture, they are put to a cruel death.

19 Full of wrath, like their enemies in a former life, (the punishers) crush them with hammers and clubs. With mangled bodies, and vomiting blood, they fall to the ground, head foremost.

20 There are the ever hungry, savage, always wrathful, great jackals by whom the evildoers bound with shackles are devoured.

21 There is the dreadful, slimy river, which is always flowing and full of molten iron; in this very dreadful river (the sinners) must descend one by one.

22 These pains are suffered without interruption by the sinner who stays there for a long time. There is no escape from the torture; he must, himself and alone, suffer the pains.

23 Whatever cruelty he has done in a former birth, the same will be inflicted on him in the Circle of Births. Having been born in an extremely miserable state of life, the sufferer experiences infinite pain.

24 A wise man hearing of these hells should not kill any living being in the whole world; believing in true doctrines and renouncing all property he should know the world, but not become a slave to it.

25 Knowing the endless Circle of Births with regard to animals, men, and gods, and the reward they will get; knowing all this, (a wise man) should wait for his decease, practising meanwhile self-control.

Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 6TH LECTURE, CALLED PRAISE OF MAHAVIRA.

1 Sramanas and Brahmanas, householders and heretics, have asked (me): Who is he that proclaimed this unrivalled truly wholesome Law, which was (put forward) with true knowledge?

2 What was the knowledge, what the faith, and what the conduct of the Gnatriputra? If you know it truly, O monk, tell us as you have heard it, as it was told you!

3 This wise and clever great sage possessed infinite knowledge and infinite faith. Learn and think about the Law and the piety of the glorious man who lived before our eyes?!

This wise man had explored all beings, whether they move or not, on high, below, and on earth, as well as the eternal and transient things. Like a lamp he put the Law in a true light. (4)

5 He sees everything; his knowledge has got beyond (the four lower stages) [Concerning the five stages or kinds of knowledge,]: he has no impurity; he is virtuous, of a fixed mind, the highest, the wisest in the whole world; he has broken from all ties; he is above danger and the necessity to continue life.

6 Omniscient, wandering about without a home, crossing the flood (of the Samsara), wise, and of an unlimited perception, without an equal, he shines forth (or he does penance) like the sun, and he illumines the darkness like a brilliant fire,

7 The omniscient sage, Kasyapa, has proclaimed this highest Law of the Ginas; he, the illustrious one, is prominent (among men) like the thousand-eyed Indra among the gods of heaven.

8 His knowledge is inexhaustible like the (water of the) sea; he has no limits and is pure like the great ocean; he is free from passion, unfettered, and brilliant like Sakra, the lord of the gods.

9 By his vigour he is the most vigorous; as Sudarsana (Meru), the best of all mountains, or as heaven, a very mine of delight, he shines forth endowed with many virtues.

10 (Meru) a hundred thousand yoganans high, with three tiers 3, with the Pandaga (-wood) as its flag, rising ninety-nine thousand yoganans above the ground, and reaching one thousand below it;

11 It touches the sky and is immersed in the earth; round it revolve the suns; it has the colour of gold, and contains many Nandana (parks); on it the Mahendras enjoy themselves.

12 This mountain is distinguished by (many) names; it has the colour of burnished gold; it is the greatest of all mountains, difficult to ascend on account of its rocks; this excellent mountain is like a part of the earth on fire.

13 The king of mountains, standing in the centre of the earth, is seen in a pure light I like that of the sun. With such beauty shines forth this many-coloured, lovely (mountain), which is crowned with radiance.

14 Thus is described the glory of mount Sudarsana, the great mountain; similar to it is the Sramana Gnatriputra, who is noble, glorious, full of faith, knowledge, and virtue.

15 As Nishadha is the best of long-stretched mountains, and Rukaka of circular ones, so is he (Mahavira) among sages the wisest in the world, according to the declaration of the wise ones.

16 After having taught the highest Law he practised the highest contemplation, which is the purest of pure, pure without a flaw, thoroughly white (as it were) like mother-of-pearl and the moon.

17 Having annihilated all his Karman, the great sage by his knowledge, virtue, and faith reached the insurpassable, highest perfection, a state which has a beginning but no end.

18 As the Salmali, in which the Suparna gods take their delight, is most famous among trees, as Nandana is among parks, so is the Omniscient most famous through his knowledge and virtue.

19 As thunder is the loudest of sounds, as the moon is the most glorious of heavenly bodies, as sandal is the best of perfumes, so of monks is he who had renounced all wishes or plans.

20 As (the ocean on which sleeps) Svayambhu is the best of seas, as Dharanendra is the best of Nagas, as the juice of sugarcane is, as it were, the flag of juices, so is he (Mahavira) the flag of monks by his austerities.

21 As Airavana is the best of elephants, the lion of beasts, Ganga of rivers, as Garuda, Venudeva, is the best of birds, so is Gnatriputra the best of those who have taught the Nirvana.

22 As Vishvakshena is the most famous of warriors, as the lotus is the best of flowers, as Dantavakra is the best of Kshatriyas, as Vardhamana is the best of sages.

23 As giving safety is the best of gifts, as the best of true speeches is that which causes no distress, as chastity is the highest of austerities, so is the Sramana Gnatriputra the highest of men.

24 As the Lavasaptamas are the highest of those gods who live very long, as the palace Sautharman is the best of heavenly abodes, as Nirvana is the chief object of the Law, so there is no wiser man than Gnatriputra.

25 He (bears everything) like the earth; he annihilates (his Karman); he is free from greed; he, the Omniscient, does not keep store (of anything); he has crossed the ocean of life like the sea; he, the Hero, who grants protection to all, and whose perception is infinite.

26 Having conquered the passions which defile the soul: wrath, pride, deceit, and greed, the Arhat, the great sage, does not commit any wrong, nor does he cause it to be committed.

THE GRAND BIBLE

27 He understood the doctrines of the Kriyavadins, of the Akriyavadins, of the Vainayikas, and of the Agnanavadins; he had mastered all philosophical systems, and he practised control as long as he lived.

28 He abstained [Vairya, literally 'forbade.'] from women, and from eating at night, he practised austerities for the removal of pain, he knew this world and that beyond; the lord renounced everything at every time.

29 Having heard and believing in the Law, which has been proclaimed and taught by the Arhat, and has been demonstrated with arguments, people will either make an end of their mundane existence, or they will become like Indra, the king of gods.

Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 7TH LECTURE, CALLED DESCRIPTION OF THE WICKED.

1 Earth, water, fire, wind; grass, trees, and corn; and the movable beings, (viz.) the oviparous, viviparous, those generated from dirt, and those generated in fluids;

2 These classes (of living beings) have been declared (by the Ginas); know and understand that they (all desire) happiness; by (hurting) these beings (men) do harm to their own souls, and will again and again be born as one of them.

3 Every being born high or low in the scale of the living creation, among movable and immovable beings, will meet with its death. Whatever sins the evildoer commits in every birth, for them he must die.

4 In this world or in the next (the sinners suffer themselves what they have inflicted on other beings), a hundred times, or (suffer) other punishment. Living in the Samsara they ever acquire new Karman, and suffer for their misdeeds.

5 Some leave their mother and father to live as Sramanas, but they use fire; (the prophet) says: 'People are wicked who kill beings for the sake of their own pleasure.'

6 He who lights a fire, kills living beings; he who extinguishes it, kills the fire. Therefore a wise man who well considers the Law, should light no fire.

7 Earth contains life, and water contains life; jumping (or flying) insects fall in (the fire); dirt-born vermin (and beings) living in wood: all these beings are burned by lighting a fire.

8 Sprouts are beings possessed of natural development, their bodies (require) nourishment, and all have their individual life. Reckless men who cut them down out of regard for their own pleasure, destroy many living beings.

9 By destroying seeds, when young or grown up, a careless man does harm to his own soul. (The prophet) says: 'People are wicked who destroy seeds for the sake of their own pleasure.'

10 Men die as embryos, or as babies who do not yet talk, or who do so already; other men, as boys wearing five tufts of hair 1, or as youths, or in middle age: at the expiration of their life all leave the body and die.

11 Wake up, men! If we look at the dangers (to which he is exposed) a fool has not much chance to obtain human birth; always suffering like men in fever, people will go to utter misery.

12 Some say that perfection is reached by abstaining from the seasoner of food (viz. salt), others by the use of cold water (i.e. by ablutions), others again by (tending) a fire.

13 Perfection is not reached by bathing in the morning, nor by abstention from acids and salt; but by drinking liquor or eating meat or garlic men obtain another state of existence (than perfection).

14 Those who, touching water in the morning and evening, contend that perfection is obtained through water (are easily refuted). For if perfection could be obtained by contact with water, many beings living in water must have reached perfection:

15 Fishes, tortoises, aquatic snakes, cormorants, otters, and demons living in water. The clever ones declare those to be wrong who maintain that perfection may be obtained through water.

16 If water did wash off the impure Karman, it must take off merit too. But this (assertion of the heretics) has no foundation but their wish. As a blind man follows a guide (and misses his goal), so a fool (who makes ablutions, etc. as a means of reaching Moksha) kills living beings.

17 If water did wash off the sins of him who committed them, some would have obtained perfection who killed water-beings. Therefore he is wrong who maintains the attainment of perfection through water.

18 Those who, lighting fire in the morning and evening, contend that perfection is obtained through fire (are easily refuted). For if thereby perfection could be obtained, mechanics also, who use fire, would be liberated.

19 Perfection cannot be established by such gratuitous assertions; those who have not learned the truth will come to harm. A wise man, who knows the truth, should know and understand that all beings desire happiness.

20 All creatures who have committed sins wail, suffer, and tremble. Considering this a wise monk who has ceased to sin, and guards his own self, should abstain from violence with regard to movable and (immovable) beings.

21 He who keeps a store of rightly-obtained food and eats it; he who makes ablutions with pure water, contracting his limbs; he who washes and adorns his clothes, is far from being a naked monk.

22 A wise man, seeing that it is sinful (to use) water, should live of pure water, till he is liberated from the Samsara; not eating seeds and bulbs, he abstains from bathing, etc., and from women.

23 He who, after having left father, mother, house, sons, cattle, and wealth, visits houses where he gets nice food, is far from being a Sramana.

24 He who visits houses where he gets nice food, who professes the Law, desirous only of filling his belly, and brags (of himself) for the sake of food, is not equal to the hundredth part of an Arya.

25 A miserable man, who becomes a monk in order to get food from others, and a flatterer by the desire of filling his belly, will, in no remote future, come to harm, even as a boar greedy of wild rice.

26 The servile man says pleasing things for the sake of food, drink, and other things: but wrong belief and bad conduct are worthless like chaff.

27 He should beg where he is unknown, and maintain himself by it; he should not seek fame and respect by his austerities; he should not desire (pleasant) sounds and colours, but conquer his longing for all kinds of pleasures.

28 A monk should avoid every attachment and bear every pain, be full (of wisdom), not greedy, wander about homeless, give assurance of safety (to all beings), and be free from passions.

29 (In order to be able) to practise control a monk should eat; he should desire to get rid of sin; if he suffers pain, he should have recourse to control, and subdue the foe at the head of the battle, as it were.

30 Though beaten he should be like a plank; he should wait for the advent of death; having annihilated his Karman he should not again mix with the world, but be rather like a car whose axle is broken.

Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 8TH LECTURE, CALLED ON EXERTION*.

[* Virya; it is the power or virtue of a thing.]

1 It is said that two definitions of exertion are given; but in what does the exertion of the virtuous consist, and how is it defined?

2 Some say that it consists in works, and the pious (say that it consists) in abstention from works. Men appear divided into two classes from this point of view.

3 Carelessness is called (the cause of) Karman, carefulness that of the contrary (viz. absence of Karman); when the one or the other is predicated (of a man, he is called) either a fool or a wise man.

4 Some learn sciences [Sattha = sastra or sastra. On the latter alternative we must translate ('practice of) arms.')] which teach the destruction of living beings, others study spells for killing all sorts of creatures.

5 Deceivers practise deceit in order to procure themselves pleasures and amusement; they kill, cut, and dismember (beings) for the sake of their own comfort.

6 The careless (commit sins) by thoughts, words, and acts, with regard to this and the next world, both (by doing the act themselves and by making others do it).

7 A cruel man does cruel acts and is thereby involved in other cruelties; but sinful undertakings will in the end bring about misery.

8 Sinners, subject to love and hate and doing wrong, acquire Karman arising from passions and commit many sins.

9 Thus the 'exertion leading to works' of the sinners has been described; now learn from me the wise men's exertion not leading to works.'

10 A pious monk, who is free from bonds and has severed all fetters, annihilates his bad Karman, and removes definitely the thorn (of sin).

11 Following the right doctrine he exerts himself; as one becomes more and more the receptacle of misery, so his bad thoughts (or sinfulness) increase.

12 Those who have good places (in heaven, etc.) must surely leave them (some time). We live together with relations and friends but a limited time.

13 Considering this, a wise man should conquer his greed, and enter upon the noble (path), which contains all virtues and is not blamed.

14 Whether he know the pith of the Law by intuition or through instruction, a houseless (monk) should exert himself and abstain from sins.

15 When a wise man, in whatever way, comes to know that the apportioned space of his life draws towards its end, he should in the meantime quickly learn the method (of dying a religious death).

16 As a tortoise draws its limbs into its own body, so a wise man should cover, as it were, his sins with his own meditation.

17 He should draw in, as it were, his hands and feet, his mind and five organs of sense, the effect of his bad Karman, and every bad use of language.

18 The virtuous exert themselves with regard to the distant end (viz. Liberation [Silanka quotes and comments upon four different readings of the first line of this verse, the last of which is rendered above as it is the textus receptus of the Dipika. (1st) Abstaining from even small pride and from deceit, one, etc. (2nd) 'Great' for 'even small.' (3rd) I have heard from some men: This is the valour of the virtuous man, that, etc. After this verse Silanka quotes another which, he says, is not found in MSS. of the text, but p. 300 is found in the Tika. It is, however, the identical verse I, 3, 4, 20, see above, p. 271, which occurs again I, 11, 11.]). One should live indifferent to one's own happiness, calm, and without any attachment.

19 Do not kill living beings, do not take what is not freely given, do not talk false, treacherous speech! This is the Law of him who is rich in control.

20 Do not desire by words or thoughts what is a transgression (of the Law); guarding yourself in all ways, and subduing (the senses), practise control.

21 A man who guards his self and subdues his senses, abhors all sins, past, present, and future ones.

22 Benighted men of wrong faith, (though) they be renowned as heroes, exert themselves in a bad way, which will have, in all respects, evil consequences for them.

23 Wise men of right faith, who are renowned heroes, exert themselves in a good way which will have no (evil) consequences whatever for them.

24 Penance is of no good if performed by noble men who have turned monks (for the sake of fame); but that penance of which nobody else knows anything (is meritorious). Do not spread your own fame [Compare Matthew 6:1-6.]

25 A pious man should eat little, drink little, talk little; he should always exert himself, being calm, indifferent, a subduer (of his senses), and free from greed.

26 Meditating and performing religious practices, abandoning his body, regarding forbearance as the paramount duty, a monk should wander about till he obtains liberation.

Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 9TH LECTURE, CALLED THE LAW.

1 What is the Law that has been preached by the wise Brahmana (i.e. Mahavira [The word brahmana (mahana) is here, as in many other passages, a mere honorific title which could be rendered by 'ascetic.'])? Learn from me the noble Law of the Ginas as it is.

2 Brahmanas, Kshattriyas, Vaisyas, Kandalas, Vukkasas, hunters, merchants, Sudras, and others who are accustomed to do acts;

3 The iniquity of all these men who cling to property goes on increasing; for those who procure themselves pleasures by sinful acts will not get rid of misery.

4 After a man has done acts which cause the death of living beings, his pleasure-seeking relations take possession of his wealth, whilst the doer of the acts must suffer for them.

5 'Mother, father, daughter-in-law, brother, wife, and sons will not be able to help me, when I suffer for my own deeds.'

6 Taking to heart this truth from which flow the most important truths, a monk, without property and without egoism, should follow the teaching of the Ginas.

7 Leaving his wealth, sons, relations, and property, leaving sorrow that never ceases, (a monk) should wander about without any worldly interests.

8 Earth, water, fire, and wind; grass, trees, and corn; oviparous animals, the two kinds of viviparous 1 animals; beings engendered in fluids and in dirt, and plants;

9 These six classes of living beings a wise man should know and treat tenderly, in thoughts, words, and acts; he should neither do actions nor desire property whereby he might do them any harm.

10 Untrue speech, sexual intercourse, personal property, taking things that are not freely given: all these causes of injury to living beings a wise man should abstain from.

11 Deceit, greed, anger, and pride: combat these causes of sin; a wise man should abstain from them.

12 Washing, dyeing, making urine, evacuation of the bowels, vomiting, anointing of the eyes, and whatever is contrary to the rules of conduct: from all this a wise man should abstain.

13 Perfumes, wreaths, bathing, cleansing of the teeth, property, actions referring to women: from all this a wise man should abstain.

14 Alms that have been prepared, or bought, or stolen, or brought for the sake of a monk, or alms that contain particles of the above mentioned, or such alms as are unacceptable (for one cause or other), from all these a wise man should abstain.

15 Invigorating food, anointing of the eyes, greed, damaging others, washing (one's limbs), (rubbing them with) Lodhra-powder, etc.: from all this a wise man should abstain.

THE GRAND BIBLE

16 Deliberating with laymen, praising their work, answering their questions, eating the householder's meals: from all this a wise man should abstain.

17 He should not learn to play chess, he should not speak anything forbidden by the Law; a wise man should abstain from fights and quarrels.

18 Shoes, an umbrella, dice, chowries, working for another, helping each other: from all this a wise man should abstain.

19 A monk should not void his excrements or urine among plants; he should never rinse his mouth (even with distilled water after having removed (everything endowed with life).

20 He should never eat or drink out of a householder's vessel; nor wear his clothes, especially if he is a naked monk: from all this a wise man should abstain.

21 A stool or bed or a seat in a house, asking of news and recollection (of past sports): from all this a wise man should abstain.

22 Fame, glory, and renown; honours and respectful treatment; all pleasures in the whole world: from all this a wise man should abstain.

23 A monk (should be content) with such food and drink as will sustain his life; he should give a portion of it to others: [from all this a wise man should abstain.]

24 Thus spoke the Nirgrantha, the great sage Mahavira: he who possesses infinite knowledge and faith has taught the Law and the sacred texts.

25 In speaking (a monk) should use as few words as possible; he should not delight in another's foibles; he should avoid deceiving speech, and should answer after ripe reflection.

26 One will repent of having used the third kind of speech [The four kinds of speech are (1st) true speech, (2nd) untrue speech, (3rd) speech partly true and partly untrue, (4th) speech which is neither true nor untrue.--Inaccurate statements are intended here.]; a secret should not be made known. This is the Nirgrantha's commandment.

27 (A monk) should not call one names, nor 'friend,' nor by his Gotra; 'thou, thou' is vulgar; never address one by 'thou!'

28 A virtuous monk should never keep company (with the wicked); for thereby he incurs dangers (for his conduct) disguised as pleasures. A wise man should be aware of them.

29 (A monk) should not stay in the house of a householder except by constraint; nor should he amuse himself too long (by looking) at the sports of the children of the village.

30 Not desirous of fine things, he should wander about, exerting himself; not careless in his conduct, he should bear whatever pains he has to suffer.

31 If beaten, he should not be angry; if abused, he should not fly into a passion; with a placid mind he should bear everything and not make a great noise.

32 He should not enjoy pleasures though they offer themselves; for thus he is said (to reach) discernment. He should always practise what is right to do in the presence of the enlightened ones.

33 He should obey and serve a wise and pious teacher, (such teachers) as are heroes (of faith), who search for the benefit of their souls, are firm in control, and subdue their senses.

34 These men, who do not see the light (as it were) in domestic life, are the beloved of the people; these heroes, free from bondage, do not desire life.

35 They do not long for sensual pleasures, they do not engage in works. All that (the heretics) always talk about, is opposed to the right faith.

36 Excessive pride and deceit, all worldly vanities: all this a wise man knows and renounces, and thus brings about his final Liberation.

Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 10TH LECTURE, CALLED CAREFULNESS.

1 The wise (Arhat) having pondered on the Law proclaimed it; learn from me correctly what is carefulness. A monk who forms no resolutions and is possessed of carefulness, should wander about, giving no offence to any creature;

2 To no living beings, whether they move or not, whether above or below or on earth, by putting a strain upon them by his hands or feet. Nor should he take from householders anything that is not freely given.

3 Having mastered the Law and got rid of carelessness, he should live on allowed food 3, and treat all beings as he himself would be treated; he should not expose himself to guilt by his desire for life; a monk who performs austerities should not keep any store.

4 Restraining his senses from women, a sage should wander about free from all worldly ties. See, every creature and every being suffers pain and is afflicted.

5 Doing harm to these beings, an ignorant man becomes involved in sins. Sin is committed by injuring (beings), and one sin also by employing others (in such acts).

6 He too who leads a miserable life, commits sin. Therefore (the Ginas) have enjoined thorough carefulness. One should know the truth, delight in control and sound judgement, cease from injuring beings, and be of a settled mind.

7 Looking at all people with an impartial mind, one should not do anything to please or to harm them. After a virtuous beginning some become miserable and lose heart, (since) they desire honour and fame.

8 Desiring unallowed food and accepting such, the sinner, careless in his conduct, is attached to women, and tries to acquire property.

9 Given to violent deeds he accumulates (Karma); on his decrease he (meets with) really distressing misery. Therefore a wise man considers well the Law; a sage wanders about free from all worldly ties.

10 He should not expose himself to guilt by his desire for life, but he should wander about without any attachment. Speaking after due consideration, and combating his worldly desires, he should say nothing that involves slaughter of living beings.

11 He should not desire unallowed food, and he should not mix with people who desire such; he should mortify his flesh, thinking (of his duty), and giving up his sorrows without regard (to worldly interests).

12 Try to realise that you are single and alone; thereby you will obtain Liberation; mind, this is no false assertion! This Liberation is not anything unreal, but the best thing. An ascetic is free from anger, and delights in the truth.

13 Abstain from sexual intercourse with women, do not acquire property; a man possessed of carefulness will, beyond doubt, be a saviour (to others) in all circumstances.

14 A monk (having conquered aversion to control and delight in sensual objects) should bear all troubles caused by (pricking) grass, cold, heat, and insects; he should endure pleasant and unpleasant smells.

15 Guarding his speech and possessed of carefulness, acquiring (pure) Lesya, he should wander about; he should not thatch a house for himself or for others, nor behave towards other people like a householder.

16 Questioned by somebody who maintains the unchangeable character of the soul 3, he should expound the true (doctrine); those who engage in works and are held in worldly bondage, do not know the Law which leads to Liberation.

17 Men here have various opinions; (they adhere) to the doctrine of the Kriyavadins and Akriyavadins. The iniquity of an unrestrained sinner, who after having been born injures the body (of beings to procure his own happiness), goes on increasing.

18 Forgetting that his life will have an end, a rash and foolish man is full of selfishness; he toils day and night, greedy of wealth, as if he never should grow old or die.

19 Leave wealth and cattle, all relations and dear friends! (A man) always talks (about these things), and he is infatuated with them; but other people will take away his wealth.

20 As smaller beasts keep at a distance from a lion, being afraid of him, so a wise man keeps aloof from sin, well considering the Law.

21 A wise man who has become awakened should turn away from sin, when he considers the evils arising from slaughter and the great dangers entailed by his cruel disposition.

22 A sage setting out for the real good (viz. Liberation), should not speak untruth; this (rule, they say,) comprises Nirvana and the whole of carefulness. He should not do works, nor cause others to do them, nor assent to others doing them.

23 When he gets pure (food), he should not be affected (by love or hate), and he should not be too fond (of such food) nor long for it. A pious monk, free from bonds, should wander about desiring neither honours nor fame.

24 A monk who has left the house and is free from desires should abandon his body, annihilating his sins; he should not desire life nor death, and walk about, having got beyond the Circle (of Births) [Or, the fetter of sin.].

Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 11TH LECTURE, CALLED THE PATH.

1 What is the Path that has been preached by the wise Brahmana (i.e. Mahavira), having correctly entered upon which path a man crosses the flood (of Samsara) which is difficult to pass?

2 O monk and great sage, tell us this best path which leads to liberation from all misery, as you know it!

3 Tell us how we should describe that path, if somebody, a god or a man, should ask us about it!

4 If somebody, a god or a man, ask you about it, tell them the truth about the path. Listen to me!

5, 6 The very difficult (path) explained by the Kasyapa, following which some men from this earth have formerly passed over. (the Samsara) like traders over the ocean, pass over it (even now), and will pass over it in future; (this path which) I have learned, I shall explain in due order; men, listen to me!

7 Earth-lives are individual beings, so are water-lives, fire-lives, and wind-lives; grass, trees, corn;

8 And the remaining, (viz.) the movable beings; thus are enumerated the six classes of living beings; these are all the living beings, there are no more besides.

9 A wise man should study them with all means of philosophical research. All beings hate pains; therefore one should not kill them.

10 This is the quintessence of wisdom: not to kill anything. Know this to be the legitimate conclusion from the principle of the reciprocity with regard to non-killing.

11 He should cease to injure living beings whether they move or not, on high, below, and on earth. For this has been called the Nirvana, which consists in peace.

12 Master (of his senses) and avoiding wrong, he should do no harm to anybody, neither by thoughts, nor words, nor acts.

13 A wise man who restrains his senses and possesses great knowledge, should accept such things as are freely given him, being always circumspect with regard to the accepting of alms, and abstaining from what he is forbidden to accept.

14 A true monk should not accept such food and drink as has been especially prepared for him along with slaughter of living beings.

15 He should not partake of a meal which contains but a particle of forbidden food: this is the Law of him who is rich in control. Whatever (food a monk) suspects (to be impure), he may not eat.

16 A man who guards his soul and subdues his senses, should never assent to anybody killing beings.--In towns and villages cases (will occur, which place) the faithful (in a dilemma).

17 Hearing the talk of people, one should not say, 'this is a good action,' nor 'this is a bad action.' For there is an objection (to either answer).

18 He should not say that it is meritorious, because he ought to save those beings, whether they move or not, which are killed there for the sake of making a gift.

19 Nor should he say that it is not meritorious, because he would then prevent those for whose sake the food and drink in question is prepared, to get their due.

20 Those who praise the gift, are accessory to the killing of beings; those who forbid it, deprive (others) of the means of subsistence.

21 Those, however, who give neither answer, viz. that it is meritorious, or is not so, do not expose themselves to guilt, and will reach Beatitude.

22 Knowing that Beatitude is the best thing as the moon is among the stars, a sage always restrained and subduing his senses brings about Beatitude.

23 A pious man shows an island to the beings which are carried away (by the flood of the Samsara) and suffer for their deeds. This place of safety has been proclaimed (by the Tirthakaras).

24 He who guards his soul, subdues his senses, puts a stop to the current (of the Samsara), and is free from Asravas, is (entitled to) expound the pure, complete, unparalleled Law.

25 Those who do not know this (Law), are not awakened, though they fancy themselves awakened; believing themselves awakened, they are beyond the boundary of right faith.

26 Eating seeds and drinking cold water and what has been especially prepared for them, they enter upon meditation, but are ignorant of the truth, and do not possess carefulness.

27, 28 As dhankas, herons, ospreys, cormorants, and pheasants meditate upon capturing fish, (which is) a sinful and very low meditation, so some heretical, unworthy Sramanas contemplate the pursuit of pleasures; (they are) sinful and very low like herons.

29 Here some weak-minded persons, abusing the pure path, enter upon a wrong path. They thereby will go to misery and destruction.

30, 31 As a blind-born man getting into a leaky boat wants to reach the shore, but is drowned during the passage; so some unworthy, heretical Sramanas, having got into the full current (of the Samsara), will incur great danger.

32 But knowing this Law which has been proclaimed by the Kasyapa, (a monk) crosses the dreadful current (of the Samsara), and wanders about intent on the benefit of his soul.

33 Indifferent to worldly objects, a man should wander about treating all creatures in the world so as he himself would be treated.

34 A wise man knowing (and renouncing) excessive pride and deceit, (in short) giving up all (causes of worldly existence), brings about his Liberation.

35 He acquires good qualities, and leaves off bad qualities; a monk, who vigorously practises austerities, avoids anger and pride.

36 The Buddhas [Here Buddha is a synonym for Tirthakara.] that were, and the Buddhas that will be, (they as it were) have Peace as their foundation, even as all things have the earth for their foundation.

37 And if any accidents whatever befall him who has gained that (foundation), he will not be overpowered by them as a mountain by the storm [Silanka says that by exercise the power of resistance will be increased, and in confirmation of this he relates the well-known story of the herdsman who daily carried a calf from its birth till it was two years old.].

38 A restrained, very learned, and wise (monk) should accept such alms as are freely given him, being free from passions and waiting for his end. This is the doctrine of the Kevalin.

Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 12TH LECTURE, CALLED THE CREED.

[Samosarana = samavasarana. This word and the verb samasarai are commonly used when Mahavira preaches to a meeting (melapaka) gathered round him.]

1 There are four (heretical) creeds which the disputants severally uphold: 1st. the Kriyavada, 2nd. the Akriyavada, 3rd. the Vinayavada, and 4th. the Agnavada.

2 The agnostics, though they (pretend to) be clever, reason incoherently, and do not get beyond the confusion of their ideas. Ignorant (teachers) speak to ignorant (pupils), and without reflection they speak untruth.

3 Believing truth to be untruth, and calling a bad man good, the various upholders of Vinaya, asked about it, explain their tenet.

4 Without perceiving the truth they speak thus: this object (viz. Moksha) is realised by us thus (viz. by Vinaya). The Akriyavadins who deny Karman, do not admit that the action (of the soul is transmitted to) the future moments [The meaning is that as everything has but a momentary existence, there is no connection between the thing as it is now, and as it will be in the next moment. This is a doctrine of the Bauddhas. But the Sankhyas are also reckoned among the Akriyavadins, because, according to them, the atman does not act.].

5 They become involved in contradiction in their own assertions; they falter in their speech and are unable to repeat what is said to them 4. This (their opinion) has a valiant counter-opinion, this (our opinion) has no valiant counter-opinion; and Karman has six sources.

6 The Akriyavadins who do not understand the truth, bring forward various opinions; many men believing in them will whirl round in the endless Circle of Births.

7 There rises no sun, nor does it set; there waxes no moon, nor does it wane; there are no rivers running, nor any winds blowing; the whole world is ascertained to be unreal.

8 As a blind man, though he have a light, does not see colours, etc., because he is deprived of his eye(sight), so the Akriyavadin, having a perverted intellect, does not recognise the action (of the soul) though it does exist.

9 Many men in this world who have studied astrology, the art of interpreting dreams, divination from diagrams, augury, divination from bodily marks, and from portents, and the eight branches (of divination from omens), know the future [This would be impossible if the whole world was unreal.].

10 (The opponents say that) some forecasts are true, and the prophecies of others prove wrong; therefore they do not study those sciences, but they profess to know the world, fools though they be.

11 The (Kriyavadins) Sramanas and Brahmanas understanding the world (according to their lights), speak thus: misery is produced by one's own works, not by those of somebody else (viz. fate, creator, etc.). But right knowledge and conduct lead to liberation.

12 The (Tirthakaras), being (as it were) the eyes of the world and its leaders, teach the path which is salutary to men; they have declared that the world is eternal inasmuch as creatures are (for ever) living in it, O ye men!

The Rakshasas and the dwellers in Yama's world, the troops 1 of Asuras and Gandharvas, and the spirits that walk the air, and individual beings: they will all be born again and again. (13)

(The Samsara) which is compared to the boundless flood of water, know it to be impassable and of very long duration on account of repeated births. Men therein, seduced by their senses and by women, are born again and again both (as movable and immovable beings). (14)

15 The sinners cannot annihilate their works by new works; the pious annihilate their works by abstention from works; the wise and happy men who got rid of the effects of greed, do not commit sins.

16 They know the past, present, and future ways of the world; they are leaders of other men, but follow no leader; they are awakened, and put an end to mundane existence.

17 Averse to injury of living beings, they do not act, nor cause others to act. Always restraining themselves, those pious men practise control, and some become heroes through their knowledge.

18 He regards small beings and large beings, the whole world as equal to himself; he comprehends the immense world, and being awakened he controls himself among the careless.

19 Those who have learned (the truth) by themselves or from others, are able (to save) themselves and others. One should always honour a man, who is like a light and makes manifest the Law after having well considered it.

20 He who knows himself and the world; who knows where (the creatures) go, and whence they will not return; who knows what is eternal, and what is transient; birth and death, and the future existences of men;

21 He who knows the tortures of beings below (i.e. in hell); who knows the influx of sin and its stoppage; who knows misery and its annihilation,—he is entitled to expound the Kriyavada.

22 Being not attached to sounds and colours, indifferent to tastes and smells, not desiring life nor death, guarded by control, and exempt from the Circle (of Births).

Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 13TH LECTURE, CALLED THE REAL TRUTH.

1 I shall now expound, in accordance with truth, the various qualities of men; I shall explain the virtue and peace of the good, the vices and the unrest of the wicked.

2 Having learned the Law from men who exert themselves day and night, from the Tathagatas, they neglect the conduct in which they had been instructed, and speak rudely to their teacher.

3 Those who explain the pure doctrine according to their individual opinion, falsify it in repeating (it after their teachers); those who speak untruth from pride of knowledge, are not capable of many virtues.

4 Those who on being questioned conceal the truth, defraud themselves of the real good. These bad men who believe themselves good and are full of deceit, will go to endless punishment.

5 He who is of a wrathful disposition and calls everything by its true name, who renews a composed quarrel, will, like a blind man groping his way with a stick, do harm to himself, being still subject to passion and possessing evil Karman.

6 He who is quarrelsome and talks improperly, is not impartial nor beyond the reach of deceit 1; but he who executes the commands (of his teacher) and controls himself, sees nothing but the truth and is exempt from deceit.

7 He who conforms to admonitions however many he receives, is kindly spoken, subtle, manly, noble, and a well-doer; (such a man) is impartial and beyond the reach of deceit.

8 He who believes himself rich in control, or inconsiderately vaunts his knowledge, or fancies himself purified by austerities, will look upon other men as shadows.

9 He is always turned round by delusion, and has no place in the Gotra where the Vow of Silence is practised (viz. in the Jaina church), who not being awakened puts himself forward in order to gain honours through something different from control.

10 A Brahmana or Kshatriya by birth, a scion of the Ugra race or a Likkhavi, who enters the order eating alms given him by others, is not stuck up on account of his renowned Gotra.

11 His pedigree on his mother's and on his father's side will be of no use to him, nothing will but right knowledge and conduct: when after becoming a monk he acts like a householder, he will not succeed in obtaining final Liberation.

12 If a poor monk subsisting on the meanest food is attached to vanities, desires fame, and not being awakened, (makes his monkhood) a means of subsistence, he will suffer again and again (in the Circle of Births).

13 A monk, who is eloquent, speaks very well, has bright ideas, is clever, possesses a fine intellect, and has purified his soul, may (perhaps) despise other men on account of his intellect.

14 Thus an intelligent monk who puts himself forward, has not yet realised carefulness; or rather he is a weak-minded man who elated by his success blames other men.

15 A monk should combat pride of genius, pride of sanctity, pride of birth, and (pride of good) living, which is enumerated as the fourth; such a man is wise and of the right stuff.

16 The wise leave off these kinds of pride, the pious do not cultivate them; the great sages are above all such things as Gotra (etc.), and they ascend to the place where there is no Gotra at all (viz. to Moksha).

17 A monk who looks upon his body as on a corpse and fully understands the Law, will on entering a village or a town distinguish between what may be accepted and what may not, and will not be greedy of food or drink.

18 A monk having conquered aversion to control and delight in sensual objects, living in company with many brethren or leading a single life, should silently repeat to himself: 'A man must come and go (according to his Karman) alone' (i.e. without deriving any help from others).

19 Knowing it by intuition or having learned it from others, one should teach the Law which is a benefit to men; the pious are not given to blameable sinful practices.

20 If (a monk preaches the Law to some one) whose disposition he has not ascertained, that man, not believing (what he is taught), will become angry, and may wound him in a way that will shorten or end his life. When he knows their disposition, he (may teach) others the truth.

21 A wise man by suppressing his Karman and his will should renounce his interest in everything else. (For) through the objects of sight (i.e. senses) which are causes of danger, men come to harm. Knowing the truth with regard to movable and immovable beings (a monk should exert himself) [The commentators make out the following meaning: A wise (preacher) should ascertain (his hearers') occupations and inclinations, and then (try to) better their evil disposition. Through the objects of sight which are causes of danger, men are led astray. A wise man knowing (the disposition of his hearers should preach the Law which is wholesome) to all living beings whether they move or not.].

22 Not desiring honour or fame, he should say nothing to anybody either to please or to irritate him. Avoiding all evils, a monk should without embarrassment and passion (preach the Law).

23 Well considering (his duties) in accordance with truth, abstaining from doing injury to living beings, not desiring life nor death, he should wander about released from the Circle (of Births).

Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 14TH LECTURE, CALLED THE NIRGRANTHA.

1 He who has given up all worldly ties and is instructed in our creed, should practise chastity, exerting himself; obeying the commands (of his teacher) he should make himself well acquainted with the conduct; a clever (monk) should avoid carelessness.

2 As (birds of prey), e.g. Dhankas, carry off a fluttering young bird whose wings are not yet grown, when it attempts to fly from the nest, but is not able to do so, because it is too young and its wings are not yet grown;

3 Just as they carry off a young bird whose wings are not yet grown, so many unprincipled men will seduce a novice who has not yet mastered the Law, thinking that they can get him in their power, when they have made him leave (the Gakkha).

4 A good man should long to live with his teacher in order to perform his duties, knowing that he who does not live with his teacher will not put an end to his mundane existence. Making manifest the conduct of the virtuous, an intelligent (monk) should not leave the (company of his teacher).

5 (A monk) who complies with the rules for Yatis 1 as regards postures, lying down, sitting, and exertions, who is thoroughly acquainted with the Samitis and Guptis, should in teaching others explain each single (point of conduct).

6 Whether he hears (pleasant) sounds or dreadful ones, he should not allow himself to be influenced by them, and persevere in control; nor should a monk be sleepy or careless, but by every means he should get rid of doubts.

7 If admonished by a young or an old monk, by one above him or one of equal age, he should not retort against him, being perfectly free from passion; for one who is (as it were) carried away (by the stream of the Samsara), will not get to its opposite shore.

8 (He should not become angry) if (doing anything wrong) his own creed is quoted against him by a heretic, or if he is corrected by (somebody else) be he young or old, or by a female slave engaged in low work or carrying a jar, or by some householder.

9 He should not be angry with them nor do them any harm, nor say a single hard word to them, but he should promise not to commit the same sin again; for this is better than to do wrong.

10 As to one who has lost his way in the wood, others who have not, (show it, thus some) teach the path which is salutary to men. Therefore (he should think): this is for my good that those who know put me right.

11 Now he who has lost his way should treat with all honour him who has not. This simile has been explained by the Prophet. Having learned what is right one should practise it.

12 As a guide in a dark night does not find the way since he cannot see it, but recognises the way when it has become light by the rising of the sun;

13 So a novice who has not mastered the Law, does not know the Law, not being awakened; but afterwards he knows it well through the words of the Ginas, as with his eye (the wanderer sees the way) after sunrise.

14 Always restrained with regard to movable and immovable beings which are on high, below, and on earth, (a monk) should wander about entertaining no hostile thoughts (towards them) and being steadfast (in control).

15 At the right time he may put a question about living beings to a well-conducted (monk), who will explain the conduct of the virtuous; and what he hears he should follow and treasure up in his heart, thinking that it is the doctrine of the Kevalins.

16 Living in this (company of the teacher) and protecting (himself or other beings) in the three ways (viz. in thoughts, words, and acts), he (gets) peace and the annihilation (of sins) as they say. Thus speak those who know the three worlds, and they do not again commit faults!

17 A monk by hearing the desired Truth gets bright ideas and becomes a clever (teacher); desiring the highest good and practising austerities and silence, he will obtain final Liberation (living on) pure (food).

18 Those who have investigated the Law expound it, are awakened and put an end to mundane existence; able to liberate both (themselves and others), they answer the well-deliberated questions.

THE GRAND BIBLE

19 He does not conceal (the truth) nor falsify it; he should not indulge his pride and (desire for) fame; being wise he should not joke, nor pronounce benedictions.

20 Averse to injury of living beings, he does not disgrace his calling by the use of spells; a good man does not desire anything from other people, and he does not give utterance to heretical doctrines.

21 A monk living single should not ridicule heretical doctrines, and should avoid hard words though they be true; he should not be vain, nor brag, but he should without embarrassment and passion (preach the Law).

22 A monk should be modest though he be of a fearless mind; he should expound the Syadvada; he should use the two (permitted) kinds of speech [The first and fourth kinds of speech are here intended.], living among virtuous men, impartial and wise.

23 He who follows (the instruction) may believe something untrue; (one should) kindly (tell him) 'It is thus or thus.' One should never hurt him by outrageous language, nor give long-winded explanations of difficult passages.

24 (If the pupil does not understand his short explanation), he should explain at greater length. When the pupil has heard it, he will correctly understand the Truth. A monk should utter pure speech, which is in accordance with the creed (of the Ginas), and should declare the distinction of sin.

25 He should well learn the (sacred texts) as they have been revealed; he should endeavour (to teach the creed), but he should not speak unduly long. A faithful man who is able to explain the entire creed I will not corrupt the faith.

26 He should not pervert nor render obscure (the truth); he should fabricate neither text nor meaning, being a saviour; being devoted to the Teacher and considering well his words, he delivers faithfully what he has learned.

27 He who correctly knows the sacred texts, who practises austerities, who understands all details of the Law, who is an authentic interpreter, clever, and learned—such a man is competent to explain the entire creed.

Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 15TH LECTURE, CALLED THE YAMAKAS*.

[This lecture has been named from its opening words gamaiyam, which also means, consisting of yamakas (compare Journal of the German Oriental Society, vol. 11, p. 101). For in this lecture each verse or line opens with a word repeated from the end of the preceding one. This artifice is technically called srinkhala-yamaka, or chain-yam aka, a term which seems to be contained in another name of our lecture, mentioned by the author of the Nirukti (verse 28), viz. adaniya-sankaliya. For sankaliya is the Prakrit for srinkhala (e.g. in our text I, 5, 2, 20), though Silanka here renders it wrongly sankalita; and adaniya by itself is used as a name of our lecture.]

1 What is past, present, and to come, all this is known to the Leader, the Saviour, who annihilates the hindrances to right faith.

2 The annihilator of doubt knows the incomparable (Law); he, the expounder of the incomparable (Law), is not inclined towards this or that (heretical doctrine).

3 On this or that (article of the creed he has) the correct opinion; hence he is rightly called a true (man); he who always possesses the truth, is kind towards his fellow-creatures.

4 Towards your fellow-creatures be not hostile: that is the Law of him who is rich in control; he who is rich in control renounces everything, and in this (world meditates on the) reflections on life.

5 He whose soul is purified by meditating on those reflections is compared to a ship in water; like a ship reaching the shore he gets beyond misery.

6 A wise man gets beyond it who knows the sins of this world; sinful acts are got rid of by him who does not undertake any new acts.

7 He who does not undertake new acts does not acquire Karman, and he verily understands (Karman); understanding it he becomes a Great Hero, who is not born (again) and does not die.

8 A Great Hero, who has no Karman, does not die.—As the wind extinguishes a light, (so he puts down) the lovely women in this world.

9 Those men whom women do not seduce, value Moksha most; those men are free from bondage and do not desire life.

10 Turning from worldly life, they reach the goal by pious acts; by their pious acts they are directed (towards Liberation), and they show the way to others.

11 The preaching of the Law (has different effect) on different creatures; he who is rich in control, is treated with honour, but does not care for it; he exerts himself, subdues his senses, is firm, and abstains from sexual intercourse.

12 (He should not yield to temptations as a pig which) is decoyed by wild rice, being proof against sins, and free from faults. Being free from faults he always subdues his senses, and has reached the incomparable cession of Karman.

13 Knowing the incomparable (control), he should not be hostile towards anybody, in thoughts, words, or deeds, having eyes (to see everything).

14 He truly is the eye of men who (dwells so to speak) on the end of desire; on its end (i.e. edge) glides the razor, on its end (i.e. rim) rolls the wheel.

15 Because the wise use the ends (of things, i.e. bad food, etc.), they are called 'makers of an end' here. Here in the world of men we are men to fulfil the Law.

16 In this creed which surpasses the world, (men) become perfected saints or gods, as I have heard; and I have heard that outside the rank of men this is not so [Perfection cannot be obtained by other creatures than men.].

17 Some (heretics) have said that they (viz. the gods) put an end to misery [i.e. reach final beatitude.]; but others (Jainas) have repeatedly said that this (human) body is not easily obtained.

18 To one whose soul has left (human life), it is not easy again to obtain instruction (in the Law), nor is such a mental disposition which they declare appropriate for adopting the Law.

19 How can it even be imagined that he should be born again, who professes the pure, complete, unparalleled Law, and is a receptacle of the unparalleled Law?

20 How could the wise Tathagatas be born again, the Tathagatas who engage in no undertakings, the supreme, the eyes of the world?

21 And there has been declared by the Kasyapa the supreme condition, by realising which some happy and wise men reach excellence.

22 A wise man who has gained strength (in control) which leads to the expiation of sins, annihilates his former works, and does not do new ones.

23 The Great Hero does no actions which are the effects of former sins. By his actions he is directed (towards Moksha), abstaining from works which are entailed by birth.

24 That which all saints value highly (viz. control), destroys the thorn (viz. Karman); practising it some have been liberated, and others have become gods.

25 There have been wise men, and there will be pious men, who having come to the end and made manifest the end of the incomprehensible path, have been liberated.

Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 16TH LECTURE, CALLED THE SONG.

1 Now the Venerable One said: He who thus subdues his senses, who is well qualified (for his task) and abandons his body, is to be called a Brahmana, a Sramana, a Bhikshu, a Nirgrantha. (The pupil) replied: Why is he who thus subdues his senses, who is well qualified (for his task) and abandons his body, to be called a Brahmana, a Sramana, a Bhikshu, a Nirgrantha? Tell this, O great sage!

2 He is a Brahmana for this reason that he has ceased from all sinful actions, viz. love, hate, quarrel, calumny, backbiting, reviling of others, aversion to control, and love of pleasures, deceit, untruth, and the sin of wrong belief; that he possesses the Samitis, always exerts himself, is not angry, nor proud.

3 He is a Sramana for this reason that he is not hampered by any obstacles, that he is free from desires, (abstaining from) property, killing, telling lies, and sexual intercourse; (and from) wrath, pride, deceit, greed, love, and hate: thus giving up every passion that involves him in sin, (such as) killing of beings. (Such a man) deserves the name of a Sramana, who subdues (moreover) his senses, is well qualified (for his task), and abandons his body.

4 He is a Bhikshu for this reason that he is not conceited, but modest, and obedient (to his Guru), that he subdues his senses, is well qualified (for his task), and abandons his body, that he sustains all troubles and calamities, that he practises with a pure mind the (prescribed) conduct, exerts himself well, is steadfast, and eats but a moderate quantity of food which is given him by others. (Such a man) deserves the name of a Bhikshu.

5 He is a Nirgrantha for this reason that he is single, knowing the absolute (atman), awakened, proof against sins, well disciplined; that he possesses the Samitis and equanimity, knows the true nature of the Self, is wise, has renounced the causes of sin both (objectively and subjectively), does not desire honour, respect, and hospitality, but searches and knows the Law, endeavours to gain Liberation, and lives restrained. (Such a man) deserves the name of a Nirgrantha, who subdues his senses, is well qualified (for his task), and abandons his body.

6 Know this to be thus as I have told you, because I am the Saviour.

Thus I say.

2ND BOOK.

SUTRAKRITANGA 1ST LECTURE, CALLED THE LOTUS.

1 O long-lived (Gambusvami)! I (Sudharman) have heard the following Discourse from the Venerable (Mahavira). We now come to the Lecture called 'the Lotus.' The contents of it are as follows:

2 There is a lotus-pool containing much water and mud, very full and complete, answering to the idea (one has of a lotus-pool), full of white lotuses, delightful, conspicuous, magnificent, and splendid.

3 And everywhere all over the lotus-pool there grew many white lotuses, the best of Nymphaeas, as we are told, in beautiful array, tall, brilliant, of fine colour, smell, taste, and touch, (etc., all down to) splendid.

4 And in the very middle of this lotus-pool there grew one big white lotus, the best of Nymphaeas, as we are told, in an excellent position, tall, (etc., all down to) splendid.

5 §§ 3 and 4 are to be repeated with the word 'all' or 'whole' added to 'lotus-pool'.

6 Now there came a man from the Eastern quarter to the lotus-pool, and standing on the bank of it he saw that one big white lotus, (etc., as above). Now this man spoke thus: 'I am a knowing, clever, well-informed, discerning, wise, not foolish man, who keeps the way, knows the way, and is acquainted with the direction and bent of the way. I shall fetch that white lotus, the best of all Nymphaeas.' Having said this the man entered the lotus-pool. And the more he proceeded, the more the water and the mud (seemed to) extend. He had left the shore, and he did not come up to the white lotus, the best of Nymphaeas, he could not get back to this bank, nor to the opposite one, but in the middle of the lotus-pool he stuck in the mud.

7 This was the first man. Now (we shall describe) the second man. There came a man from the Southern quarter to the lotus-pool, and standing on the bank of it he saw that one big white lotus (etc., all as above). There he saw one man who had left the shore, but had not come up to the white lotus, the best of Nymphaeas, who could not get back to his bank, nor to the opposite one, but stuck in the mud in the middle of the lotus-pool. Now the second man spoke of the first man thus: 'This man is not knowing, not clever, (etc., see above, all down to) not acquainted with the direction and bent of the way.' For that man said: 'I am a knowing, (etc., all down to) I shall fetch that white lotus, the best of Nymphaeas.' But this white lotus, the best of Nymphaeas, cannot be got in the way this man tried.

8, 9 'However, I am a knowing, clever, (etc., all down to the end of the paragraph) he stuck in the mud.' This was the second man. (The same thing happened to a third and a fourth man, who came from the Western and Northern quarters respectively, and saw two and three men respectively sticking in the mud. Some Manuscripts give the story at length, others abbreviate it.)

10 Now a monk living on low food and desiring to get to the shore (of the Samsara), knowing, clever, (etc., all down to) acquainted with the direction and bent of the way, came to that lotus-pool from some one of the four quarters or from one of the intermediate points (of the compass). Standing on the bank of the lotus-pool he saw the one big white lotus, (etc., as above). And he saw there those four men who having left the shore, (etc., all as above) stuck in the mud. Then the monk said: 'These men are not knowing, (etc., all down to) not acquainted with the direction and bent of the way; for these men thought: We shall fetch that white lotus, the best of Nymphaeas. But this white lotus, the best of Nymphaeas, cannot be got in the way these men tried. I am a monk living on low food, (etc., all down to) acquainted with the direction and bent of the way. I shall fetch that white lotus, the best of Nymphaeas.' Having said this the monk did not enter the lotus-pool; but standing on the bank of it he raised his voice: 'Fly up, O white lotus, best of Nymphaeas!' And the white lotus, the best of Nymphaeas, flew up.

11 I have told you, O long-lived Sramanas, a simile I; you must comprehend the meaning of it. The Nirgrantha monks and nuns worshipped and praised the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, and then spoke thus: 'You have told, O long-lived Sramana, the simile, but we do not comprehend its meaning, O long-lived Sramana!' The Venerable Ascetic Mahavira addressed the crowd of Nirgrantha monks and nuns, and spoke thus: Ah, you long-lived Sramanas! I shall tell, declare, explain, expound, and demonstrate it with its meaning, reasons, and arguments. Thus I say:

12 O long-lived Sramanas, meaning the world I spoke of the lotus-pool. Meaning Karman I spoke of the water. Meaning pleasures and amusements I spoke of the mud. Meaning people in general I spoke of those many white lotuses, the best of Nymphaeas. Meaning the king I spoke of the one big white lotus, the best of Nymphaeas. Meaning heretical teachers I spoke of those four men. Meaning the Law I spoke of the monk. Meaning the church I spoke of the bank. Meaning the preaching of the Law I spoke of (the monk's) voice. Meaning Nirvana I spoke of (the lotus) flying up. Meaning these things, O long-lived Sramanas, I told this (simile).

13 Here in the East, West, North, and South many men have been born according to their merit, as inhabitants of this our world, viz. some as Aryas, some as non-Aryas, some in noble families, some in low families, some as big men, some as small men, some of good complexion, some of bad complexion, some as handsome men, some as ugly men. And of these men one man is king, who is strong like the great Himavat, Malaya, Mandara, and Mahendra mountains, (etc., all down to) who governs his kingdom in which all riots and mutinies have been suppressed.

And this king had an assembly of Ugras and sons of Ugras, Bhogas and sons of Bhogas, Aikshvakas and sons of Aikshvakas, Gnatriis and sons of Gnatriis, Kauravas and sons of Kauravas, warriors and sons of warriors, Brahmanas and sons of Brahmanas, Likkhavis and sons of Likkhavis, commanders and sons of commanders, generals and sons of generals.

14 And of these men some one is full of faith. Forsooth, the Sramanas or Brahmanas made up their mind to go to him. Being professors of some religion (they thought) 'We shall teach him our religion.' (And they said): 'Know this, dear sir, that we explain and teach this religion well.'

11 'Upwards from the soles of the feet, downwards from the tips of the hair on the head, within the skin's surface is (what is called) Soul, or what is the same, the Atman. The whole soul lives; when this (body) is dead, it does not live. It lasts as long as the body lasts, it does not outlast the destruction (of the body). With it (viz. the body) ends life. Other men carry it (viz. the corpse) away to burn it. When it has been consumed by fire, only dove-coloured bones remain, and the four bearers return with the hearse to their village. Therefore there is and exists no (soul different from the body). Those who believe that there is and exists no (such soul), speak the truth. Those who maintain that the soul is something different from the body, cannot tell whether the soul (as separated from the body) is long or small, whether globular or circular or triangular or square or hexagonal or octagonal or long, whether black or blue or red or yellow or white, whether of sweet smell or of bad smell, whether bitter or pungent or astringent or sour or sweet, whether hard or soft or heavy or light or cold or hot or smooth or rough. Those, therefore, who believe that there is and exists no soul, speak the truth. Those who maintain that the soul is something different from the body, do not see the following (objections):

16 'As a man draws a sword from the scabbard and shows it (you, saying): "Friend, this is the sword, and that is the scabbard," so nobody can draw (the soul from the body) and show it (you, saying): "Friend, this is the soul, and that is the body." As a man draws a fibre from a stalk of Munga grass and shows it (you, saying): "Friend, this is the stalk, and that is the fibre;" or takes a bone out of the flesh, or the seed of Amalaka from the palm of his hand, or a particle of fresh butter out of coagulated milk, and shows you both things separately; or as he presses oil from the seed of Atasi, and shows the oil and oil-cake separately, or as he presses the juice from the sugar-cane, and shows the juice and the molasses separately, so nobody can show you the soul and the body separately. The same applies also when fire is churned from Arani-wood. Those who believe that there is and exists no soul, speak the truth. Those who say that the soul is different from the body, are wrong.'

17 This murderer says: 'Kill, dig, slay, burn, cook, cut or break to pieces, destroy! Life ends here; there is no world beyond.' These (Nastikas) cannot inform you on the following points: whether an action is good or bad, meritorious or not, well done or not well done, whether one reaches perfection or not, whether one goes to hell or not. Thus undertaking various works they engage in various pleasures and amusements for their own enjoyment.

18 Thus some shameless men becoming monks propagate a Law of their own. And others believe it, put their faith in it, adopt it, (saying): 'Well, you speak the truth, O Brahmana, (or) O Sramana! We shall present you with food, drink, spices, and sweetmeats, with a robe, a bowl, or a broom.' Some have been induced to honour them, some have made (their proselytes) to honour them.

19 Before (entering an order) they were determined to become Sramanas, houseless, poor monks who would have neither sons nor cattle, to eat only what should be given them by others, and to commit no sins. After having entered their order they do not cease (from sins), they themselves commit sins, they cause others to commit sins, and they assent to another's committing sins. Thus they are given to pleasures, amusements, and sensual lust; they are greedy, fettered, passionate, covetous, the slaves of love and hate; therefore they cannot free themselves (from the Circle of Births), nor free anybody else from it, nor free any other of the four kinds of living beings from it. They have left their former occupations, but have not entered the noble path. They cannot return (to worldly life), nor get beyond it; they stick (as it were) in pleasures and amusements. Thus I have treated of the first man (as one who believes that) soul and body are one and the same thing.

20 Now I shall treat of the second man I (as one who believes that) everything consists of the five elements.

Here in the East, (etc., see §§ 13, 14, all down to) teach this religion well.

21 'There are five elements through which we explain whether an action is good or bad, (etc., see § 18, all down to) hell or not. Everything down to a blade of grass (consists of them).

22 'And one should know the intermixture of the elements by an enumeration of them. Earth is the first element, water the second, fire the third, wind the fourth, and air the fifth. These five elements are not created, directly or indirectly, nor made; they are not effects nor products; they are without beginning and end; they always produce effects, are independent of a directing cause or everything else; they are eternal. Some, however, say that there is a Self besides the five elements. What is, does not perish; from nothing nothing comes.

23 All living beings, all things, the whole world consists of nothing but these (five elements). They are the primary cause of the world, even down to a blade of grass.

24 'A man buys and causes to buy, kills and causes to kill, cooks and causes to cook, he may even sell and kill a man. Know, that even in this case he does not do wrong.'

These (Nastikas) cannot inform you, (etc., see §§ 15-18, all down to) they stick (as it were) in pleasures and amusements.

Thus I have treated of the second man (who believes that) everything consists of the five elements.

25 Now I shall treat of the third man (who believes that) the Self is the cause of everything. Here in the East, (etc., see §§ 12, 13, all down to) teach this religion well.

26 'Here all things have the Self for their cause and their object, they are produced by the Self, they are manifested by the Self, they are intimately connected with the Self, they are bound up in the Self.

'As, for instance, a tumour is generated in the body, grows with the body, is not separate from the body, but is bound up in the body: so all things have the Self for their cause, (etc., all as above).

'As, for instance, a feeling of indisposition is generated in the body, grows with the body, is never separate from the body, but is bound up in the body: so all things have the Self for their cause, (etc., all as above).

'As, for instance, an anthill is made of earth, grows through earth, is not separate from earth, but is bound up in earth: so all things, (etc., all as above).

'As, for instance, a tree springs up on earth, grows on earth, is not separate from earth, but is bound up in earth: so all things, (etc., all as above).

'As, for instance, a lotus springs up in earth, grows on earth, is not separate from earth, but is bound up in earth: so all things, (etc., all as above).

'As, for instance, a mass of water is produced by water, grows through water, is not separate from water, but is bound up in water: so all things, (etc., all as above).

'As, for instance, a water-bubble is produced in water, grows in water, is not separate from water, but is bound up in water: so all things, (etc., all as above).

27 'And the twelve Angas, the Canon of the Ganins I, which has been taught, produced, and declared by the Sramanas, the Nirgranthas, viz. the Akaranga (all down to) the Dristivada, is wrong, not true, not a representation of the truth; but this (our doctrine) is correct, is true, is a representation of the truth.'

The (heretics in question) make this assertion, they uphold this assertion, they (try to) establish this assertion.

Therefore they cannot get out of the misery produced by this (error), even as a bird cannot get out of its cage.

28 These (heretics) cannot inform you, (etc., see §§ 16-19, all down to) they stick, as it were, in pleasures and amusements.

Thus I have treated of the third man (who believes that) the Self is the cause of everything.

Now I shall treat of the fourth man who believes that Fate is the cause of everything.

29 Here in the East, (etc., see §§ 12, 13, all down to) teach this religion well.

30 'There are two (kinds of) men. One man admits action, another man does not admit action. Both men, he who admits action, and he who does not admit action, are alike, their case is the same, because they are actuated by the same force.

31 'An ignorant man thinks about the cause as follows: "When I suffer, grieve, blame myself, grow feeble I, am afflicted, or undergo great pain, I have caused it; or when another man suffers, etc., he has caused it." Thus an ignorant man thinks himself or another man to be the cause of what he or the other man experiences.

'A wise man thinks about the cause as follows: "When I suffer, etc., I did not cause it; and when another man suffers, etc., he did not cause it."

'A wise man thinks thus about the cause of what he himself or another man experiences. I say this: "Movable or immovable beings in all the four quarters thus (i.e. by the will of Fate) come to have a body, to undergo the vicissitudes of life, to lose their body, to arrive at some state of existence, to experience pleasure and pain."

32 Entertaining such opinions these (heretics) cannot inform you, (etc., as in § 17, down to the end).

33 These worthless men entertain such opinions, and believe in them till they cannot return, (etc., as in § 19 down to) amusements. I have treated of the fourth man who believes that Fate is the cause of everything.

34 These four men, differing in intellect, will, character, opinions, taste, undertakings, and plans, have left their former occupations, but have not entered the noble path. They cannot return (to worldly life) nor get beyond it; they stick (as it were) in pleasures and amusements.

35 I say: here in the East, West, North, and South there are some men, viz. Aryas, non-Aryas, (etc., as in § 13, all down to) ugly men. They own small or large houses and fields, they own few or many servants and peasants. Being born in such-like families, they renounce (their possessions) and lead a mendicant's life. Some leave their kinsmen and their property to lead a mendicant's life; others, who have no kinsmen nor property, lead a mendicant's life. Whether they have kinsmen and property or not, they renounce them and lead a mendicant's life.

37 A wise man, previously, should thus think to himself: 'Here, indeed, some painful illness or disease might befall me, unwished for, unpleasant, disagreeable, nasty, painful and not at all pleasant. O ye dear pleasures, take upon you this painful illness or disease, unwished for, unpleasant, disagreeable, nasty, painful and not at all pleasant, that I may not suffer, grieve, blame myself, grow feeble, be afflicted, and undergo great pain. Deliver me from this painful illness or disease, (etc., all as above).' But this desire of his has never yet been fulfilled.

38 Here, in this life, pleasures and amusements are not able to help or to save one. Sometimes a man first forsakes pleasures and amusements, sometimes they first forsake him. Pleasures and amusements are one thing, and I am another. Why then should we be infatuated with pleasures and amusements which are alien (to our being)? Taking this into consideration, we shall give up pleasures and amusements. A wise man thinks them alien to himself.

39 There are things more intimately connected with me, viz. my mother, father, brother, sister, wife, children, grandchildren, daughters-in-law, servants, friends, kinsmen, companions, and acquaintances. These my relations belong to me, and I belong to them. A wise man, previously, should think thus to himself: 'Here, indeed, some painful illness or disease might befall me, (etc., all as in § 37 down to the end, but substitute "relations" for "pleasures").'

40 'Or some painful illness or disease, unwished for, (etc., all down to) not at all pleasant might befall my dear relations. I will take upon me this painful illness or disease, etc., that they may not suffer, (all down to) undergo great pain. I will deliver them from this painful illness or disease.' But this desire of his has never yet, been fulfilled. For one man cannot take upon himself the pains of another; one man cannot experience what another has done.

41 Individually a man is born, individually he dies, individually he falls (from this state of existence), individually he rises (to another). His passions, consciousness, intellect, perceptions, and impressions belong to the individual exclusively. Here, indeed, the bonds of relationship are not able to help nor save one. (All as in § 38 down to the end; substitute 'bonds of relationship' for 'pleasures and amusements'.)

42 There are things more intimately connected with me, viz. my hands, feet, arms, legs, head, belly, character, life, strength, colour, skin, complexion, ear, eye, nose, tongue, and touch; they are part and parcel of me. But I grow old with regard to life, strength, (all down to) touch. The strong joints become loose, the body is furrowed with wrinkles, the black hair turns white, even this dear body which has grown with food, must be relinquished in due time. Making such reflections, a monk should lead a mendicant's life and know that all things are divided into living beings and things without life, (and living beings again into) movable and immovable ones.

43 Here, indeed, householders are killers (of beings) and acquirers of property, and so are even some Sramanas and Brahmanas. They themselves kill movable and immovable living beings, have them killed by another person, or consent to another's killing them.

44 Here, indeed, householders are killers (of beings) and acquirers of property, and so are even some Sramanas and Brahmanas. They themselves acquire sentient or senseless objects of pleasure, have them acquired by another person, or consent to another's acquiring them.

45 Here, indeed, householders are killers (of beings) and acquirers of property, and so are even some Sramanas and Brahmanas. But I am no killer (of beings) nor an acquirer of property. Relying upon I householders and such Sramanas and Brahmanas as are killers (of beings) and acquirers of property, we shall lead a life of chastity. (He should, however, part company with them.) (The pupil asks): What is the reason thereof? (The teacher answers): As before (their ordination they were killers of beings), so (they will be) afterwards, and vice versa. It is evident that (householders) do not abstain (from sins) nor exert themselves (in control); and (as monks) they will relapse into the same (bad habits).

46 The householders and those Sramanas and Brahmanas, who are killers (of beings) and acquirers of property, commit sins both (from love and hatred). But a monk who takes this into consideration, should lead a life subject to neither (love nor hatred).

47 I say: in the East, West, North, and South (a true monk) will have renounced works, be exempt from works, will have put an end to them. This has been taught (by the prophets, etc.).

48 The Venerable One has declared that the cause (of sins) are the six classes of living beings, earth-lives, etc. As is my pain when I am knocked-of-struck with a stick, bone, fist, clod, or potsherd; or menaced, beaten, burned, tormented, or deprived of life; and as I feel every pain and agony from death down to the pulling out of a hair: in the same way, be sure of this, all kinds of living beings feel the same pain and agony, etc., as I, when they are ill-treated in the same way I. For this reason all sorts of living beings should not be beaten, nor treated with violence, nor abused, nor tormented, nor deprived of life 2.

49 I say: the Arhats and Bhagavats of the past, present, and future, all say thus, speak thus, declare thus, explain thus: all sorts of living beings should not be slain, nor treated with violence, nor abused, nor tormented, nor driven away. This constant, permanent, eternal, true Law has been taught by wise men who comprehend all things. Thus a monk abstains from (the five cardinal sins) slaughter of living beings, etc. He does not clean his teeth with a tooth-brush 1, he does not accept collyrium, emetics, and perfumes.

50 A monk who does not act, nor kill, who is free from wrath, pride, deceit, and greed, who is calm and happy, should not entertain the following wish: May I, after my departure from this world, by dint of my intellect, knowledge, memory, learning, or of the performance of austerities, religious duties, chastity, or of this habit to eat no more than is necessary to sustain life, become a god at whose command are all objects of pleasure, or a perfected saint who is exempt from pain and misery. (Through his austerities) he may obtain his object, or he may not obtain it.

51 A monk should not be infatuated with sounds, colours, smells, tastes, and feelings of touch; he should abstain from wrath, pride, deceit, and greed, from love, hate, quarrel, calumny, reviling of others, aversion to control and delight in sensual things, deceit and untruth, and the sin of wrong belief. In this way a monk ceases to acquire gross Karman, controls himself, and abstains from sins.

52 He does not kill movable or immovable beings, nor has them killed by another person, nor does he consent to another's killing them. In this way a monk ceases to acquire gross Karman, controls himself, and abstains from sins.

53 He does not acquire sentient or senseless objects of pleasure, nor has them acquired by another person, nor does he consent to another's acquiring them. In this way, (etc., all as above).

54 He does no actions arising from sinful causes, nor has them done by another person, nor does he consent to another's doing them. In this way (etc., all as above).

55 A monk should not take food, drink, dainties, and spices when he knows that (the householder) to satisfy him, or for the sake of a co-religionist, has bought or stolen or taken it, though it was not given nor to be taken, but was taken by force, by acting sinfully towards all sorts of living beings; nor does he cause another person to eat it, nor does he consent to another's eating it. In this way (etc., all as above).

56 A monk may think as follows: The (householders) have the means (to procure food for those) for whose sake it is prepared; viz. for himself 3, his sons, daughters, daughters-in-law, nurses, relations, chiefs, male and female slaves, male and female servants; for a treat of sweetmeats, for a supper, for a breakfast the collation has been prepared. This food is to be eaten by some people, it is prepared by some one else, it is destined for some one else, it is free from the faults occasioned either by the giver or by the receiver or by the act of receiving it, rendered pure, rendered free from living matter, wholly free from living things, it has been begged, has been given to the monk on account of his profession, it has been collected in small bits, it is food fit for a learned monk, it is lawful to eat it at the present occasion, it is of the prescribed quantity, it greases, as it were, the axle of the carriage and anoints the sore, being just sufficient to enable one to practise control and to carry the burden of it; he should consume that food (without delay) even as the snake returning to its hole; that is to say: one should eat when it is time for eating, drink when it is time for drinking, dress when it is time for dressing, seek cover when it is time for seeking cover, and sleep when it is time for sleeping.

57 A monk who knows the proper measure (in all things) travelling in one direction or other, should teach, explain, and praise (the Law), preach it unto those who exert themselves well, and to those who do not, to all who come to listen. (He should preach to them): indifference for the peace of mind, cessation of passion, Nirvana, purity, simplicity, humility, freedom from bonds. He should preach the Law which prohibits to kill any living being, after having well considered it.

58 When a monk preaches the Law, he should preach it not for the sake of food, drink, clothes, resting-place, or lodging, nor for any objects of pleasure; but he should preach the Law indefatigably, for no other motive than the annihilation of Karman.

59 Those heroes of faith who are instructed in the Law by such a monk and exert themselves well, are possessed of all (virtues), abstain from all (sins), cease from all (passions), conduct themselves well in every way, and reach final beatitude.

60 Such a monk searches the Law, knows the Law, and endeavours to gain Liberation; as it has been said: 'He may get the white lotus, the best of Nymphaeus, or he may not get it.' Such a monk knows and renounces actions, worldly occupations, and the life of a householder; he is free from passions, possesses the Samitis, is wise, always exerts himself; he is to be called: a Sramana, a Brahmana, calm, a subduer of his senses, guarding himself, liberated, a seer, a sage, virtuous, wise, a monk, living on low food, desiring to get to the shore (of the Samsara), fulfilling the general and particular virtues.

Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 2ND LECTURE, CALLED ON ACTIVITY.

1 O long-lived (Gambusvamin)! I (Sudharman) have heard the following Discourse from the Venerable (Mahavira). We now come to the Lecture called 'on Activity.' The contents of it are as follows: It treats, briefly, of two subjects: merit and demerit.

(The former is when the Self is) at rest, (the latter, when it is) in disturbance.

2 Now the explanation of the first subject, viz. demerit, is as follows. Here in the East, West, North, and South, (etc., all as in II, I, 12, down to) ugly men.

3 And as regards committing of sin, among denizens of hell, brute animals, gods, men, and whatever other suchlike beings there be, the sentient beings feel 4 the pain.

4 And these beings practise the following thirteen kinds of activity--

- 1st. sinning for one's interest;
- 2nd. sinning without a personal interest;
- 3rd. sinning by slaying;
- 4th. sinning through accident;
- 5th. sinning by an error of sight;
- 6th. sinning by lying;
- 7th. sinning by taking what is not freely given;
- 8th. sinning by a mere conceit;
- 9th. sinning through pride;
- 10th. sinning through bad treatment of one's friends;
- 11th. sinning through deceit;
- 12th. sinning through greed;
- 13th. actions referring to a religious life.

[1st] The First Kind Of Committing Sins is that prompted by a motive. This is the case when a man for his own sake, for the sake of his relations, his house, his family, his friends, for the sake of Nagas, Bhutas, or Yakshas does injury to movable or immovable beings, or has it done by another person, or consents to another's doing it. Thereby the, bad Karman accrues to him. This is the first kind of committing sins, that prompted by a motive. (5)

6 [2nd] We now treat of the Second Kind Of Committing Sins, viz. that which is not prompted by personal interest. This is the case when a man slays, kills, cuts, pierces, hacks, mangles, or puts to death movable living beings, not because he wants their body, skin, flesh, blood, bile, feathers of their tail, tail, big or small horns, teeth, tusks, nails, sinews, bones, or marrow; nor because he has been wounded by them, or is wounded, or will be wounded; nor in order to support his children, or to feed his cattle, or to enlarge his houses, nor for the maintenance of Sramanas and Brahmanas, nor for the benefit of his body; setting aside reason a fool acquires the habit of cruelty, being a wanton killer.

7 This is the case when a man slays, etc. (see above) immovable living beings as Ikkata-reed, Kathina, Gantuka-grass, Para-grass, Moksha-trees, grass, Kusa-grass, Kukkhaka, Pappaka, or straw, not in order to support his children, (etc., all down to) wanton killer.

8 Or when a man on a marsh, a lake, a sheet of water, a pasture-ground, a place surrounded by a ditch, a moat, a thicket, stronghold 1 in a thicket, forest, stronghold in a forest, [mountain, stronghold on a mountain], piles up grass and lights a fire, or has it lighted by another person, or consents to another's lighting it. Thereby the bad Karman accrues to him. This is the second kind of committing sins, that prompted by no personal interest.

9 [3rd] We now treat of the Third Kind Of Committing Sins, called slaying. This is the case when a man thinking that some one has hurt, hurts, or will hurt him, or one of his people, or somebody else, or one of that person's people, kills movable and immovable beings, has them killed by another person, or consents to another's killing them. Thereby the bad Karman accrues to him. This is the third kind of committing sins, called slaying.

10 [4th] We now treat of the Fourth Kind Of Committing Sins, called accidental. This is the case when in marshes (etc., all as above, down to) strongholds in a forest, a man who lives on deer, who likes deer, who dotes on deer, goes a hunting deer. Fancying to see deer, he takes aim with his arrow to kill the deer. Thinking that he will kill the deer, he kills a partridge, or a duck, or a quail, or a pigeon, or a monkey, or a francoline partridge. Here instead of one (being) he hurts another, (therefore he is called) an accidental killer.

11 This is the case when a man weeding rice, Kodrava, panic seed, Paraka, or Ralaka, uses his knife to cut some weeds. Fancying that he is cutting some weed-grasses, he cuts rice (etc., down to) Ralaka. Here instead of one (plant) he hurts another; (therefore he is called) an accidental killer. Thereby the bad Karman accrues to him. This is the fourth kind of committing sins, called accidental.

12 [5th] We now treat of the Fifth Kind Of Committing Sins, viz. by an error of sight. This is the case when a man living together with his mother, father, brothers, sisters, wives, sons, daughters, or daughters-in-law, and mistaking a friend for an enemy, kills the friend by mistake.

13 This is the case when during a riot in a village, or a scot-free town, or a town with an earth wall, or a poor town, or an isolated town, or a large town, or a sea-town, or a mine, or a hermitage, or a halting-place of processions or caravans, or a capital, a man mistaking for a robber one who is not, kills him by mistake. Thereby the bad Karman accrues to him. This is the fifth kind of committing sins, viz. by an error of sight.

14 [6th] We now treat of the Sixth Kind Of Committing Sins, viz. by lying. This is the case when a man for his own sake, or for the sake of his relations, his house, or his servants tells lies, causes another person to tell lies, or consents to another's telling lies. Thereby the bad Karman accrues to him. This is the sixth kind of committing sins, viz. by lying.

15 [7th] Now we treat of the Seventh Kind Of Committing Sins, viz. by taking what is not freely given. This is the case when a man for his own sake (etc., as above) takes himself what is not freely given, has it taken by another person, or consents to another's taking it. Thereby the bad Karman accrues to him. This is the seventh kind of committing sins, viz. by taking what is not freely given.

16 [8th] Now we treat of the Eighth Kind Of Committing Sins, viz. by a mere conceit. This is the case when a man, without being disappointed by anybody in any way, meditates, melancholy, sorry, angry, downcast, anxious in thoughts and ideas, plunged in a sea of sorrow and misery, reposing his head on the palm of his hand, overcome by painful reflections, and casting his eyes on the ground. There are four mental, but real, conditions (of this kind), viz. wrath, pride, deceit, and greed; for wrath, pride, deceit, and greed are mental conditions. Thereby the bad Karman accrues to him. This is the eighth kind of committing sins, viz. by a mere conceit.

17 [9th] Now we treat of the Ninth Kind Of Committing Sins, viz. through pride. This is the case when a man drunk (as it were) with pride of caste, family, beauty, piety, knowledge, success, power, intelligence, or any other kind of pride, slights, blames, abuses, reviles, despises somebody else and extols himself, (thinking:) 'he is my inferior, I am of better caste or family, and possess greater power and other advantages.' When he leaves this body and is only accompanied by his Karman, he, without a will of his own, goes forth from womb to womb, from birth to birth, from death to death, from hell to hell. He is cruel, stubborn, fickle, and proud. Thereby the bad Karman accrues to him. This is the ninth kind of committing sins, viz. through pride.

18 [10th] We now treat of the Tenth Kind Of Committing Sins, consisting in bad treatment of one's friends. This is the case when a man living together with his mother, father, brothers, sisters, wives, sons, daughters, or daughters-in-law, severely punishes even the smallest offence of theirs; e.g. he ducks the offender in cold water, or pours hot water over him, or scalds him with fire, or lashes his sides sore with a halter, reed, rope, strap of leather, whip, or thong of a whip, or he beats the offender with a stick, bone, fist, clod, or potsherd. When such a man is at home, (his people) are miserable; but when he is abroad, they rejoice. Such a man, who is for ever punishing, severely punishing, is hateful in this world and the next, irritable, passionate, an extortioner. Thereby the bad Karman accrues to him. This is the tenth kind of committing sins, consisting in bad treatment of one's friends.

19 [11th] We now treat of the Eleventh Kind Of Committing Sins, viz. through deceit. Those who conceal their thoughts, who are shrouded in darkness, who are light as the feather of an owl or heavy like a mountain, use unworthy speech though they be Aryas. They believe themselves different from what they really are; asked one thing, they answer another, they speak different from what is to be spoken.

20 As a man in whose body sticks an arrow, does not extricate it (fearing the pain), nor has it extricated by somebody else, nor destroys it, but hides it; and the arrow, being not removed, goes deeper and deeper (in the flesh); so a deceitful man, having practised deception, does not confess it, expiate it, blame the deed to himself or others, does not remove it, annihilate it, and endeavour not to do it again, does not practise the prescribed austerities and penance. A deceitful man is generally not trusted in this world, a deceitful man is not trusted in the next world. He blames and reviles (the person whom he has deceived), he praises himself, and rejoices, and does not desist (from his vile practices); he conceals the wrong he has done to others, and does not acquire a pure Lesya. Thereby the bad Karman accrues to him. This is the eleventh kind of committing sins, viz. through deceit.

21 [12th] We now treat of the Twelfth Kind Of Committing Sins, viz. through greed. Those (heretical monks) who live in woods, in huts, about villages, or practise some secret rites, are not well controlled, nor do they well abstain (from slaying) all sorts of living beings. They employ speech that is true and untrue at the same time: 'do not beat me, beat others; do not abuse me, abuse others; do not capture me, capture others; do not torment me, torment others; do not deprive me of life, deprive others of life.' And thus they are given to sensual pleasures, desire them, are held captive by them, passionately love them for four or five years, for six or ten years--(the period) may be shorter or longer. After having enjoyed these pleasures, and having died at their allotted time, they will be born in some places inhabited by Asuras and evil-doers. And when they are released therefrom, they will be born deaf and dumb, or blind 3, or dumb by birth. Thereby the bad Karman accrues to him. This is the twelfth kind of committing sins, viz. through greed.

22 These twelve kinds of committing sins should be well understood by a pious Sramana or Brahmana.

23 [13th] We now treat of the Thirteenth Kind Of acquiring Karman, that having reference to religious life. A monk who controls himself for the benefit of his soul, who in walking carefully avoids to cause the death of any living creature, who uses gentle and righteous speech, who receives alms in a manner to avoid the forty-two faults, who is careful in receiving and keeping of things necessary for religious exercises, who performs the operations of nature (excrements, urine, saliva, corporal impurities and mucus) in an unfrequented place, who is careful with regard to mind, speech, and body, who guards his mind, speech, and body so as to protect his soul from passions, who guards his senses, who leads a chaste life regulated by the three Gupitis, who carefully walks, stands, sits down, lies down, and speaks, who carefully takes up and lays down his cloth, alms-bowl, blanket, broom,--(even) such a monk performs various subtle actions called iryapathika (if it did but consist in moving an eyelash). This Karman is acquired and comes in contact (with the soul) in the first moment, in the second moment it is experienced, in the third it is destroyed; thus it is acquired, comes in contact (with the soul), takes rise, and is destroyed. For all time to come (the person in question) is exempt from Karman. Thereby the bad Karman accrues to him. This is the thirteenth kind of acquiring Karman, that inseparable from a religious life.

24 All the Arhats and Bhagavats of the past, present, and future have told, tell, and will tell, have declared, declare, and will declare the above thirteen kinds of acquiring Karman. They have practised, practise, and will practise the thirteenth kind of acquiring Karman.

25 As a supplement to the above (discussion) will now be told the subject of men's success by occult sciences. Some men differing in intellect, will, character, opinions, taste, undertakings, and plans, study various evil sciences;

26 viz. (the divination) from terrestrial accidents, from strange phenomena, from dreams, from phenomena in the air, from changes in the body, from sounds, from mystical signs, from seeds; (the interpretation of the) marks of women, men, elephants, cows, partridges, cocks, ducks, quails, of wheels, parasols, shields, sticks, swords, precious stones, jewels;

27 the art to make one happy or miserable, to make a woman pregnant, to deprive one of his wits; incantations, conjuring; oblations of substances; the martial arts; the course of the moon, sun, Venus, and Jupiter; the falling of meteors; great conflagration; divination from wild animals, the flight of crows, showers of dust, rain of blood, the Vaitali and Ardhavaitali arts, the art of casting people asleep, of opening doors, the art of Kandalas, of Sabaras, of Dravidas, of Kalingas, of Gaudas, of Gandharas; the spells for making somebody fall down, rise, yawn; for making him immovable, or cling to something; for making him sick, or sound; for making somebody go forth, disappear, (or come). These and similar sciences are practised (by some men) for the sake of food, drink, clothes, a lodging, a bed, and various objects of pleasure. They practise a wrong science, the unworthy, the mistaken men. After having died at their allotted time, they will be born in some places inhabited by Asuras and evil-doers. And when they are released therefrom, they will again be born deaf and dumb, or night-blind.

28 Some man for his own sake or for the sake of his relations, family, or servants, or entering the service of an acquaintance or neighbour of his, becomes his companion or his helpmate, or he goes to meet him, or he becomes a burglar, or a cut-purse, or he tends sheep, or he becomes a hunter, or he catches birds, or he uses nets (for catching deer), or he becomes a fisherman or a cowherd or a slayer of cows or a dog-keeper or he hunts with dogs.

29 A man, becoming the companion of another man, will follow him everywhere, (and having inspired him with confidence) beats, cuts, pierces; tears, thrashes, or puts him to death, and thereby gets his food. By these very evil deeds he degrades himself.

30 A man, becoming the helpmate of another man, always attends on him, (and having inspired him with confidence) beats, etc. (all down to) degrades himself.

31 A man, going to meet somebody, on the road, beats, etc. (all down to) degrades himself.

32 A man, becoming a burglar, breaks into a house and beats, etc. (all down to) degrades himself.

A man, becoming a cut-purse, cuts the purse and beats, etc. (all down to) degrades himself. (33)

34 A man, becoming a tender of sheep, beats, cuts, pierces, tears, thrashes, or puts to death a ram or some other animal. (The rest as above.)

35 A man, becoming a hunter, beats, etc. (all down to) puts to death a buffalo or some other animal. (The rest as above.)

36 A man, using nets (for catching deer), beats, etc., an antelope or some other animal. (The rest as above.)

37 A man, catching birds, beats, etc., a bird or some other animal. (The rest as above.)

38 A man, becoming a fisherman, beats, etc., a fish or some other animal. (The rest as above.)

39 A man, becoming a cowherd, beats, etc., a cow or some other animal. (The rest as above.)

40 A man, slaying cows, beats, etc., a cow or some other animal. (The rest as above.)

41 A man, becoming a dog-keeper, beats, etc., a dog or some other animal. (The rest as above.)

42 A man, becoming the helpmate of a dog-keeper, beats, etc., a dog or some other animal. (The rest as above.)

43 A man, rising in an assembly, may promise to kill some (animal) and he will beat, etc., a partridge, duck, quail, pigeon, monkey, a francoline partridge, or some other animal. (The rest as above.)

44 A man, being angry for some reason, e.g. because his granary or his liquor-cask runs short, sets fire to the cornfields of the householders or their sons, has the fire set by another person, or consents to another's setting fire to them. (The rest as above.)

45 A man, being angry for some reason, e.g. because his granary or liquor-cask runs short, makes a deep cut in the strong limbs of the camels, cows, horses, or donkeys of the householders or their sons, has it made by another person, or consents to another's making the cut. (The rest as above.)

46 A man, being angry for some reason, e.g. because his granary or his liquor-cask runs short, covers with brambles or twigs the householders', or their sons', stable for the camels, cows, horses, or donkeys, and burns them, or has them burnt by another person, or consents to another's burning them. (The rest as above.)

47 A man, being angry for some reason, etc. (as above), steals a householder's or his sons' earrings (or girdle), or jewels, or pearls, has them stolen by another person, or consents to another's stealing them. (The rest as above.)

48 A man, being angry, etc. (as before), robs Sramanas or Brahmanas of their umbrella, stick, staff, small property, pot, chair, clothes, blanket, leather boots, knife, or scabbard, has it done by another person, or consents to another's robbing them. (The rest as above.)

49 A man, without consideration (and without any provocation), sets fire to the cornfields of the householders, etc. (All as in § 44.)

50 A man, without consideration, makes a deep cut in the strong limbs of the camels, etc. (All as in § 45)

51 A man, without consideration, covers with brambles and twigs the stables for the camels, etc., and burns them, etc. (All as in § 46.)

52 A man, without consideration, steals the earrings, etc. (All as in § 47.)

53 A man, without consideration, robs Sramanas or Brahmanas of their umbrella, etc. (All as in § 48.)

54 A man, on seeing Sramanas or Brahmanas (whom he detests), degrades himself by various evil deeds. Either he gives them a slap with the open hand to turn them away 1, or he abuses them. And when the monk at the proper time calls (at his house on the begging-tour), he does not give him alms (but says): those who become Sramanas are the meanest workmen, men unable to support (their family), low-caste men, wretches, idlers!

55 Such men praise this life, this miserable life; they do nothing on behalf of the next world; they suffer, grieve, blame themselves, grow feeble, are afflicted, and undergo great pain; they do not cease to cause others to suffer, grieve, etc., to slay and to put men in fetters; and while they make suffer or kill, or make suffer and kill (beings), and do various evil deeds, they enjoy the excellent pleasures of human life; viz. such a man eats at dinner-time, he drinks at drinking-time, he dresses himself at dressing-time, he goes to bed at the proper time, and sleeps at sleeping-time. Doing everything in its turn, he bathes, makes the offering (to the house-gods) 1, performs auspicious rites and expiatory acts, washes his head, hangs a wreath round his neck, adorns himself with precious stones and golden (trinkets), puts on (his head) a chaplet of flowers; with his body strengthened, with a wreath hanging down to the girdle of his loins, dressed in new clothes, his limbs and body anointed with sandal, (sitting) on a large throne in a lofty upper room (of his house), surrounded by women and a troop of followers, in the light (of torches) burning the whole night, under the great din of uninterrupted storytelling, dramatical plays, singing, and music, as beating of time, performing on the Vina, Turya, the great drum, and Patupataha, he enjoys the excellent pleasures of human life.

56 When he gives an order to one man, even four or five men will, without being asked, go up to him (and say): 'Speak, beloved of the gods, what shall we do? what shall we fetch? what shall we give you? what (trinket) shall we put on you? what is your heart's desire? what relishes your mouth?'

Unworthy men who see him will say: 'Forsooth, this man is a god; this man is the anointed of the gods, this man will support (us), as he supports others.' But noble men who see him will say: 'This man does cruel actions, and maintains himself by them. His is the southern region, the hell, the dark fortnight 1. In the future he will not easily obtain enlightenment.'

57 (The conduct described in the preceding) part 2 is agreeable to some (heretical) monks, to some householders, to men governed by love of life. This conduct is unworthy, impure, void (of virtues), not holy, not right, not eradicating sins; it is not the road to perfection, liberation, Nirvana, final delivery, not the road of those who are freed from all misery; it is thoroughly untrue, and bad.

This is the explanation of the first subject, viz. demerit.

58 Now the explanation of the second subject, viz. merit, is as follows:

Here in the East, West, North, and South there are some men, viz. Aryas, non-Aryas, (all down to) ugly men. They own fields and houses, (etc., all as in II, 1, §§ 34-59, down to) reach final beatitude.

59 (The conduct described in this) part is holy, right, (all just the reverse of what was said in § 58, down to) thoroughly true, and good. This is the explanation of the second subject, viz. merit.

60 Now the explanation of the third subject, viz. the mixed state, is as follows:

Those who live in woods, in huts, near villages, (etc., all as above, § 21, down to) or blind. (The conduct described in this) part is not holy, (etc., all as in § 57, down to) thoroughly untrue, and bad.

This is the explanation of the third subject, viz. the mixed state.

61 Now the explanation of the first subject, viz. demerit, is as follows:

Here in the East, West, North, and South live some men; they are householders, men of great desires, great undertakings, great possessions, unrighteous men, men practising unrighteousness, very unrighteous men, men speaking unrighteously, living unrighteously, thinking unrighteously, given to unrighteousness, men of unrighteous character and conduct, men gaining an unrighteous livelihood.

62 They beat, cut, pierce, skin, are bloody-handed, violent, cruel, wicked, rash; they habitually practise bribery, fraud, deceit, imposture, dishonesty, and trickery; they are of bad character and morals, they are difficult to please, they do not abstain from killing living beings; as long as they live they do not abstain from wrath, (etc., all as in II, 1, 51, down to) the sin of wrong belief; nor from bathing, rubbing, painting, anointing themselves; from sounds, touches, tastes, colours, smells; from wreaths and ornaments; from cars, carriages, vehicles, litters, swings, coach and pair, palankins, beds, seats; from enjoying a ride or drive; from having many followers; from buying, selling, doing business with Mashas, half Mashas, and Rupees; from silver, gold, riches, corn, precious stones, pearls, conches, stones, and corals; from using wrong weights and measures; from undertakings and slaughter; from working and making others work; from cooking and making others cook; from cutting, pounding, threatening, beating, binding, killing, and causing pain; and whatever other suchlike wicked and sinful actions of worthless men there be, that cause pains to other beings: these men do not abstain from them as long as they live.

As some idle, cruel men wantonly injure Kalama [A sort of rice.], Masura [A sort of pulse or lentil.], sesamum, Mudga [A sort of kidney-bean.], beans, Nishpava [Probably Dolichos Sinensis.], Kulaththa [A sort of pulse, Dolichos Uniflorus.], Alisanda [cannot be identified.], Elamikkha [cannot be identified.], so an idle, cruel man wantonly hurts partridges, ducks, quails, pigeons, francoline partridges, deer, buffaloes, boars, iguanas, tortoises, and snakes.

63 A man will (occasionally) severely punish even the smallest offence of his domestics, viz. a slave or messenger or hired servant or vassal or parasite; e.g. punish him, pull out his hair, beat him, put him in irons, in fetters, in stocks, into prison, screw up in a pair of shackles (his hands and feet) and break them, cut off his hands or feet or ears or nose or lips or head or face (?), pierce his feet, tear out his eyes, teeth, tongue, hang him, brush him, whirl him round, impale him, lacerate him, pour acids (in his wounds), belabour him with cutting-grass, bind him to a lion's tail (!), or a bull's tail, burn him in a wood on fire, let him be devoured by crows and vultures, stop his food and drink, keep him a prisoner for life, let him die any of these horrid deaths.

64 A man will (occasionally) severely punish even the smallest offence of his next of kin, viz. his mother or father or brother or sister or wife or sons or daughters or daughters-in-law; e.g. he ducks the offender in cold water, (etc., all as in § 18, down to) hateful in this world and the next. They suffer, grieve, blame themselves, grow feeble, are afflicted, and undergo great pain; they do not cease to cause others to suffer, grieve, etc., to slay and to put men in fetters.

65 And thus they are given to sensual pleasures, desire them, are held captive by them, passionately love them for four or five years, for six or ten years --the period may be shorter or longer. Having enjoyed pleasures, having produced the effects of iniquity, having acquired the Karman of many sinful actions which generally bear him downwards, (he goes to the bottom of the hell). As a ball of iron or stone, when thrown in the water, sinks below the surface of the water till it stops at the bottom, so a man of the sort we are treating of, who is full of Karman, full of sin, full of demerit, full of disgrace, full of iniquity, full of wicked thoughts, deceit, imposture, and fraud, and, as a rule, kills animals, having died at the allotted time, will sink below this earth, and go to the bottom of the hell.

66 These hells are round inside, square outside, on their floor razorlike are thick-set (and covered with flowers), they are filled with perpetual darkness, never lighted up by the planets, moon, sun, Nakshatras, and stars; their floor is slippery with a coating of marrow, fat, flesh, blood, and matter, and besmeared with grease; these hells are impure, smelling detestably, black, of the colour of fire, very rugged, difficult to pass, horrid. And horrid are the pains in these hells.

67 And those who are condemned to live in these hells, do not sleep nor slumber, nor do they get any consolation or comfort or recreation or encouragement; but the denizens of hell there suffer exquisite, great, deep, hard, rough, violent, painful, sharp, intolerable agonies.

68 As a tree growing on a hill falls by its weight when its roots are cut, on a low, rugged, inaccessible place, so a man of the sort we are treating of wanders from womb to womb, from birth to birth, from death to death, from hell to hell, from pain to pain. His is the southern region, the hell, the dark fortnight. In the future he will not easily obtain enlightenment. (The . conduct described in the preceding) part is unworthy, impure, (etc., see § 57, all down to) it is thoroughly untrue, and bad. This is the explanation of the first subject, viz. demerit.

69 Now the explanation of the second subject, viz. merit, is as follows:

Here in the East, West, North, and South there are some such men as abstain from undertakings and possessions, righteous men, men practising righteousness, (etc., all as in § 58, but substitute 'righteous' for 'unrighteous' down to) men gaining a righteous livelihood. They are of good character and morals, they are easy to please and good. They abstain from killing living beings as long as they live, (etc., all just the reverse of what was said in § 62, down to) whatever other suchlike wicked actions there be, that cause pains to other beings: these men abstain from them as long as they live.

70 There are such monks as in walking carefully avoid to occasion the death of any living creature, (etc., all as in § 23, down to) as lead chaste lives regulated by the three Guptis, as are free from anger, pride, deceit, and greed, as are calm, tranquil, passionless, happy, free from the Asravas, and bondage, without sorrow; as water does not adhere to a copper vessel, or collyrium to mother-of-pearl (so sins find no place in them); their course is unobstructed like that of Life; like the firmament they want nothing to support them; like the wind they know no obstacles; their heart is pure like the water (of rivers or tanks) in autumn; like the leaves of a lotus they cannot be soiled by anything; their senses are well protected like the limbs of a tortoise; they are single and alone like the horn of a rhinoceros; they are free like birds; they are always waking like the fabulous bird Bharunda; they are valorous like elephants, strong like bulls, difficult to attack like lions, steady and firm like Mount Mandara, deep like the ocean, mild like the moon, refulgent like the sun, pure like excellent gold; like the earth they patiently bear everything; like a well-kindled fire they shine in their splendour.

71 There are no obstacles anywhere for these reverend men. The obstacles have been declared to be of four kinds, viz. animals born from eggs, viviparous animals, things belonging to somebody, articles necessary for religious exercises. In whichever direction they want to go, there they meet with no obstacle; but being pure and free, full of learning, control, and austerities, they purify themselves.

72 These reverend men practise the following mode of living which just suffices for their existence; they eat but one meal in two, three, four, five, six, seven days, in half a month, in one, two, three, four, five, six months; they (have vowed to) live on such food only as has been taken out of the cooking-vessel, or as is still in it, or the first kind of food in one place and the second in another, or on low food, or bad food, or food collected in small bits, or food given with a dirty hand, or the reverse, or food given with a hand, etc. soiled by it; they (have vowed to) accept such alms only as are within sight (when they beg), or are out of sight, as they are asked whether they would accept, or as they are not asked about, as are given with contempt, or the reverse; they beg (in houses where they are) unknown, or when food is scarce; they accept only such things as are at hand, or only a limited number of gifts, or only a fixed quantity of food; they beg according to the rules (laid down for begging); they eat low food or bad food or tasteless food or badly tasting food or rough food or disagreeable food; they lead a low or mean life; they drink sour gruel, they eat nothing seasoned with ghee or similar materials; they do not drink liquors or eat meat, they do not eat highly-flavoured food; they eat standing, or supported by something, or sitting on a stool or an armchair; they lie down stretched out like a stick, or curved like a bent piece of wood; they sit in the sun, they go naked; they do not scratch themselves; they do not spit; they do not cut their beard, hair, and nails, they do not take any care of their person.

73 Living in this way they practise many years Sramanahood, and if then they fall sick, or even if they do not, they refuse food and omit many meals by abstaining from food. When they have attained that for whose sake they went about naked and bald-headed, did not bathe, nor clean their teeth, nor protect their head from the sun, nor wear shoes; they slept on the bare ground or a plank or a piece of wood, plucked out their hair, led a life of chastity, entered the houses of strangers, and bore, with indifference, success, failure, honour, disgrace, slights, blame, reviling, threatening, beating, all sorts of hardships, and the twenty-two calamities and troubles; (when they have attained their end), they reach, while they are breathing their last, the highest knowledge and faith, called Kevala, which is infinite, supreme, unobstructed, unimpeded, complete and full; and then they obtain absolute perfection, enlightenment, deliverance, final beatitude, and put an end to all misery.

74 Some become liberated without assuming another body (after quitting the last). But others, having died at the allotted time, are, on account of a residue of (good) Karman, born in one of the regions of the gods. Among very beautiful, very splendid, very excellent, very glorious, very strong, very powerful, very happy (gods), they become very beautiful, very splendid, etc., gods 1; their breasts shining with necklaces; their arms encumbered with bracelets and armings; wearing ear-ornaments which play on their cheeks, and earrings which hang down to the bracelets on their upper arms; wearing various ornaments on their hands; their crowns adorned with gay wreaths; putting on highly perfumed, excellent clothes; using beautiful, excellent garlands and ointments; their splendid body ornamented with a long down-reaching garland; having divine colours, touches, constitution (of the body), and rank; lighting up and illumining all ten quarters (of the universe) with their divine beauty, splendour, lustre, brightness, brilliancy, and light; beautiful when they go, beautiful when they rest, and happy also in the time to come.

(The conduct described in the preceding) part is worthy, pure, (etc., see § 57, all down to) it is thoroughly true, and good.

This is the explanation of the second subject, viz. merit.

75 Now the explanation of the third subject, viz. the mixed state, is as follows:

Here in the East, West, North, and South there are some such men as have few desires, few undertakings, few possessions, righteous men, men practising righteousness, (etc., all as in § 69, down to) men gaining a righteous livelihood. They are of good character and morals, easy to please, and good. They abstain, as long as they live, from one kind of killing living beings, but they do not abstain from another, (etc., similar as in § 62, all down to) whatever suchlike wicked actions there be, that cause pains to other beings, from some of them these men abstain as long as they live, from others they do not abstain.

76 There are, for instance, followers of the Sramanas, who comprehend (the doctrine about) living beings and things without life, who understand (the difference between) virtues and sins, who are well grounded in (the knowledge of) the Asravas, Samvara, the realisation and annihilation (of Karman), the subject of actions, bondage, and final liberation; who, without anybody to back them, cannot be seduced from the creed of the Nirgranthas by hosts of gods, Asuras, Nagas, Suvarnas, Yakshas, Rakshasas, Kinnaras, Kimpurushas, Garudas, and snake-gods; who have no doubts, scruples, or misgivings about this creed of the Nirgranthas, but have grasped its meaning, got hold of its meaning, got information about its meaning, ascertained its meaning, and understood its meaning; whose very marrow* of the bones has been penetrated by their love (for the Nirgrantha creed), avowing that it alone is true, and all others futile [* Here the commentator inserts the following story: In Ragagriha lived a friar versed in magic arts; he carried off every woman he saw. On the citizens complaining about the rape, the king resolved to find out and punish the man. Catching sight of him at last on the fifth day, the king went after him till the friar disappeared in a hollow tree of the park, which led to an underground room. There the king followed and killed him. He released all the women whom the friar had captured. But one of them would not return to her husband, being desperately smitten with love for her seducer. On the advice of some wise men she was made to drink the friar's (pounded) bones mixed up with milk. This took the spell off her and cured her of her strange passion.]. They keep the bar (of their gates) raised and their door open, having no desire to enter a stranger's house or his seraglio. They strictly keep the Posaha-fast on the fourteenth and eighth days of the month, on certain festivals 3, and on full-moon days. They provide the Nirgrantha Sramanas with pure acceptable food, drink, dainties and spices, with clothes, alms-bowls, blankets and brooms, with drugs and medicines, with stools, planks, beds, and couches. They purify themselves by practising the Silavratas and Gunavratas 4, the Viramana, the Pratyakhyana, the Posaha-fasts, and austerities which they have vowed to perform.

77 Living in this way they are for many years followers of the Sramanas, and if then they fall sick, or even if they do not, they refuse food and omit many meals by abstaining from food. Having confessed their sins and expiated them, and having attained perfection, they die at their allotted time, to be born again as gods in one of the regions of the gods, (etc., all as in § 74, down to) it is thoroughly true, and good.

This is the explanation of the third subject, viz. the mixed state.

78 He who does not practise cessation (from sin), is called a foolish man; he who practises cessation (from sin), is called a wise man; he who in one regard practises cessation (from sin) and in another does not, is said to be in a state partaking of that of a wise man and that of a foolish man.

The conduct of him who does not practise cessation from all (sins), is that of a man who kills living creatures; it is unworthy, (etc., all down to) thoroughly untrue, and bad.

The conduct of him who practises cessation from all (sins), is that of a man who does not kill living creatures; it is worthy, pure, (etc., all down to) thoroughly true, and good.

The conduct of a man who in one regard practises cessation from all (sins) and in another does not, is that of a man who kills some living creatures and does not kill others; it is worthy, pure, (etc., all down to) thoroughly true, and good.

79 Those whom we have been treating of, fall under the two heads: merit and demerit; (the former is when the Self is) at rest, (the latter, when it is) in disturbance.

Now the explanation of the first subject is as follows:

There are enumerated three hundred and sixty-three philosophical schools 1: those of the Kriyavada, those of the Akriyavada, those of the Agnanikavada, and those of the Vainayikavada. These (philosophers) teach final beatitude, they teach final deliverance, they speak as Sravakas, they speak as teachers of Sravakas.

80 All these philosophers, founders of systems of their own, differing in intellect, will, character, opinions, taste, undertakings, and plans, formed one large circle, and every one of them stood in his place.

One man took hold of a vessel quite full of burning coals by an iron pair of tongs, and addressed those philosophers, founders of systems of their own, differing in intellect, (etc., all down to) undertakings and plans, in the following way: 'Heighho! ye philosophers, (etc., all down to) undertakings and plans! take this vessel full of burning coals and hold it for a minute in your hands! But do not take hold of it by a pair of tongs, nor put out the fire, nor come to the help of one of your own creed or of an alien creed (by putting out the fire, etc.); but fair and honest 1, without using any trick, stretch out your hands.' Having thus spoken, the man took hold of the vessel quite full of burning coals by an iron pair of tongs, and (offered to) put it in the hands of those philosophers. But the philosophers, (etc., all down to) undertakings and plans, held back their hands. On this the man addressed all the philosophers, (etc., all down to) undertakings and plans, in the following way: 'Heighho, ye philosophers, (etc., all down to) undertakings and plans! why do you hold back your hands?' 'Our hand will be burned.' 'What then, if it is burned?' '(We shall suffer) pain.' 'Because you are afraid of pain, you hold back your hands! (So are all creatures averse to pain). This is a maxim of general application, it is a true principle, a religious reflection; this maxim, this principle, this religious reflection holds good with regard to every (living being). Therefore those Sramanas and Brahmanas who say that all sorts of living beings may be beaten or treated with violence or abused or tormented or deprived of life, will in the time to come suffer cutting or piercing, will experience birth, old age, death, conception in the womb, the Circle of Births, regeneration, existence as a foetus, the whole scale of mundane existences, and suffer a variety of pains.

81 They will many times undergo punishment, pulling out of the hair, threatening, putting in irons, (etc., similar as in § 63, all down to) whirling round; (they will witness) the death of their mothers, fathers, brothers, sisters, sons, daughters, and daughters-in-law; (they will experience) poverty, bad luck, company of hated people, separation from those whom they love, misery, and despair; they will again and again wander about in the beginningless and endless, immense wilderness of the fourfold Samsara. They will not reach perfection, (etc., all down to) not put an end to all misery.-- This is a maxim of general application, (etc., all down to) holds good with regard to every (living being).

82 But those Sramanas and Brahmanas who say that all sorts of living beings should not be beaten, etc., will in the time to come not suffer cutting, etc. They will not undergo many punishments, (etc., all just the reverse of what has been said in §§ 80, 81, down to) put an end to all misery.

83 Thus those beings who practise the first twelve kinds of actions, have not attained perfection, (etc., all down to) have not, nor do, nor will put an end to all misery.

84 But those beings who practise the thirteenth kind of action, have attained perfection, (etc., all down to) have put, or put, or will put an end to all misery.

85 Thus a monk who obtains his soul's good and benefit, who guards himself, who (well directs the functions) of his soul, who well exerts himself, who protects himself (from evil), who is careful of himself, who saves himself (from the Samsara), should withhold his soul (from the twelve kinds of committing sins).

Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 3RD LECTURE, CALLED KNOWLEDGE OF FOOD.

O long-lived (Gambusvamin!) I (Sudharman) have heard the following discourse from the Venerable (Mahavira). We now come to the Lecture called 'Knowledge of Food.' The contents of it are as follows:

1 Here in the East, West, North, and South there are, all in all, in the world four kinds of seed: seeds generated at the top (of the plant), at its root, at its knots, at its stem [The commentators here give the reading of the Nagarguniyas: 'the growth of seeds of the plants is fivefold, viz. they grow from the top (of the plant), its root, its knots, its stem, and its beads; p. 389 and some are of a sixth kind called sammurkhima' (i.e. those plants which are believed to be originated by the coalescing particles of the substance in which they grow, e.g. grass springing up on ground lately cleared by fire).--The various readings of the Nagarguniyas are occasionally quoted in commentaries (see e.g. part i, p. 32, note 2). But I do not think that it has been satisfactorily made out who these Nagarguniyas were.]. According to the seed and place (of growth) of these plants some beings--born in earth, originated in earth, and grown in earth, having in it their birth, origin, and growth, being impelled by their Karman, and coming forth in it on account of their Karman, growing there in particles of earth, the origin of various things--come forth as trees.

2 These living beings feed on the liquid substance of these particles of earth, the origin of various things; these beings consume earth-bodies, water-bodies, fire-bodies, wind-bodies, bodies of plants; they deprive of life the bodies of manifold movable and immovable beings; the destroyed bodies which have been consumed before, or absorbed by the rind, (are) digested and assimilated (by them). And the bodies of these (trees) which bring forth their different parts, are of manifold colours, smells, tastes, touches, forms, and arrangement of corporeal particles. These beings (animating trees) come into existence because of their Karman; so we are taught (by the Tirthakaras, etc.)

3 And again it has been said of old: some beings born in trees, originated by trees, sprung from trees, (etc., as in § 1, down to) springing from trees that originated in earth, come forth as trees originated by trees. These beings feed on the sap of the trees originated in earth, (etc., all as in § 2, down to the end).

4 (In the same way, and in nearly the same words, the offshoots of the trees mentioned in the preceding paragraph are treated of.)

5 And again it has been said of old: some beings born in trees, (etc., all as above, down to) growing in trees, that are originated by trees, come forth as their roots, bulb, stem, branches, twigs, leaves, flowers, fruits, and seeds. These beings feed on the sap of those trees originated by trees, (etc., all as in § 2, down to) and the bodies of the roots, bulb, stem, etc. are of manifold colours, (etc., all as in § 2, down to the end).

6-9 (The four paragraphs that come next, 6-9, are identical with the preceding ones, except that 'creeper' is substituted for 'tree'.)

10-15 (In the same way 'grass [Trina.]' is treated in four paragraphs, but the whole is much abridged; then it is said that 'herbs' [Osahi = Oshadhi.] and 'plants' [Hariya = harita.] are to be treated in four paragraphs each.)

16 And again it has been said of old: some beings born in earth, (etc., all as in § 1, down to) growing there in particles of earth that are the origin of various things, come forth as Aya, Kaya, Kuhana, Kandu, Uvvehalaya, Nivvehalaya, Esava, Sakkha, Khattaga, Vasaniya [All the commentators say about the words Aya, etc. (which offer some various readings in the MSS.), is that they denote particular plants (vanaspativishesha) which must be learned from people (who know them). I give the words in their Prakrit form, and do not attempt to transpose them into Sanskrit.]. (The rest as in § 2, but substitute the words Aya, etc. for 'trees.')] Here there is only one paragraph, the remaining three do not apply here [For there are no Ayas originated by Aya except through their seed.].

17 And again it has been said of old: some beings born in water, (etc., all as in §§ 1-11, substitute only 'water' for 'earth.' Thus we have four paragraphs for trees, four for creepers, four for grass, four for herbs, four for plants).

18 Now it has been said of old: some beings born in water, (etc., all as above, down to) growing in particles of water that are the origin of various things, come forth as Udaga, Avaga [Avaka, a grassy plant growing in marshy land, Blyxa Octandra.], Panaga, Sevala [Saivala, the aquatic plant Vallisneria.], Kalambuya [Kadamba, Nauclea Kadamba.], Kaseruya [Kaseru, Scirpus Kysoor.], Kakkhabhaniya, Uppala, Pauma, Kumuya, Nalina [The last four are well-known varieties of lotus, called in Sanskrit: utpala, padma, kumuda, nalina.], Subhagasoniya, Pondariya, Mahapondariya, Sayavatta, Sahassavatta, Kalhara, Kokanada, Tamarasa [The Sanskrit of the last seven items is: pundarika, mahapundarika, satapattra, sahasrapattra, kahlara, kokanada, and tamarasa; they are all varieties of lotus.], as stalks and fibres of lotus, as Pukkhalā [Pushkara.], and Pukkhalatthibhaga. (The rest similar as in § 2.)

19 And again it has been said of old: some beings come forth as movable beings from trees born in earth, from trees originated by trees, from the roots, (etc., down to) seeds produced by trees, originated by creepers born on trees, from creepers born on creepers, from the roots, etc. of creepers born on creepers, from grass*, from herbs*, from plants*, from Aya, [* This is to be detailed in the same way as with trees and creepers.] (etc., all down to) Kura born in earth; from trees born in water (the rest similar as with trees born in earth), from Udaga, (etc., all down to) Pukkhalatthibhaga born in water.

20 These creatures feed on the sap of the trees, creepers, grass, herbs, plants, be they born in earth or water, on trees or creepers or grass or herbs or plants; (the sap) of their roots, (etc., all down to) seeds, of Ayas, etc., of Udakas, etc. And these creatures consume earth-bodies, (etc., all as in § 2, down to) assimilated by them. And the bodies of these beings born of trees, creepers, grass, herbs, plants, their roots, etc., of Ayas, etc., of Udagas, etc., are of manifold colours, (etc., the rest as in § 2, down to the end).

21 And again it has been said of old: a man and a woman combine in cohabitation in a cunnus, which was produced by their Karman, and there they deposit their humours. Therein are born the souls of different men, viz. of those born in Karmabhumi, or in Akarmabhumi, or in the minor continents, of Aryas and barbarians, as women or men or eunuchs, according to the semen and blood of the mother and the other circumstances (contingent on their coming into existence). These beings at first feed on the menses of the mother and the semen of the father, or both combined into an unclean, foul (substance). And afterwards they absorb with a part (of their bodies) the essence of whatever food the mothers take. Gradually increasing and attaining to the proper dimensions of a foetus they come forth from the womb, some as males, some as females, some as neutrals. As long as they are babies, they suck the mother's milk; but when they grow older, they eat boiled rice, or gruel, or both movable and immovable beings. These beings consume earth-bodies, (etc., all as before, down to) assimilated by them. And the bodies of these men, viz. those born in Karmabhumi, or Akarmabhumi, or in the minor continents, of Aryas and barbarians, are of manifold colours, (etc., all as in § 2, down to the end).

22 (This paragraph is nearly identical with the preceding one, but substitute 'aquatic animals of five organs of sense, viz. fishes, (all down to) porpoises,' for 'different men' in the beginning and the end. The following sentence in the middle is slightly different; it runs thus: 'as long as they are young, they feed on the mothers' humours, but when they grow older they eat plants, or both movable and immovable beings.')

23 (This paragraph treats of) quadrupeds, terrestrial animals with five organs of sense, viz. solidungular animals, biungular animals, multiungular animals, and animals having toes with nails. (All as in the last paragraph, only 'as long as they are young, they feed on their mothers' milk.')

24 (This paragraph treats of) reptiles moving on the breast, (being) terrestrial animals with five organs of sense, viz. snakes, huge snakes, Asalika, and dragons. (All as before, but the following passage is different.) Some bring forth eggs, some bring forth living young ones; some come out of the egg as males, some as females, some as neutrals. As long as they are young, they live on wind. (The rest as above.)

25 (This paragraph treats of) terrestrial animals with five organs of sense, walking on their arms, viz. iguanas, ichneumons, porcupines, frogs, chameleons, Khoras, Gharakoillas, Vissambharas, rats, man-geese, Pailaiyas, cats, Gohas, Kauppaiyas. (The rest as in the last paragraph.)

26 (This paragraph treats of) aerial animals with five organs of sense: birds with membranous wings, birds with feathered wings, birds with wings in the shape of a box, and birds (which sit on) outspread wings. (All as before; only the following passage is different): 'As long as they are young, they are hatched by their mothers' warmth.' (The rest as above.)

27 And again it has been said of old: there are beings of manifold birth and origin, (§§ 1, all as in § 1, down to) growing there on the animate or inanimate bodies of manifold movable or immovable creatures, come forth as parasites. These beings feed on the humours of various movable and immovable creatures, etc. And the bodies of these movable and immovable parasites are of manifold colours, (etc., as above).

28, 29 In the same way vermin generated in filthy substances and in the skin of living animals are to be treated of.

30 And again it has been said of old: there are some beings of manifold birth and origin, (etc., all as in § 1, down to) growing thereon (or in) the animate or inanimate bodies of manifold movable or immovable creatures as that (water-)body, which is produced by wind, condensed by wind, and carried along by wind; it goes upwards, when there is an upward wind; it goes downwards, when there is a downward wind; it goes in a horizontal direction, when there is a horizontal wind; (its varieties are) hoar-frost, snow, mist, hailstones, dew, and rain. These beings feed on the humours of these manifold movable and immovable creatures, etc. And the bodies of these (water-lives, viz.) hoar-frost, etc., produced by manifold movable or immovable creatures, are of manifold colours, (etc., as above).

31 And again it has been said of old: some beings, born in water, (etc., all similar as in § 1, down to) come forth in water(-bodies) in the water produced by manifold movable or immovable beings. These beings feed on the humours of the water(-bodies) produced by manifold movable and immovable creatures. (The rest similar as above.)

32 And again it has been said of old: some beings, born in water, (etc., all similar as in § 1, down to) come forth in water-bodies produced by other water-bodies. These beings feed on the humours of those other water-bodies produced by water-bodies. (The rest similar as above.)

33 And again it has been said of old: some beings, born in water, (etc., all similar as in § 1, down to) come forth as movable creatures in the water produced by water-bodies. These beings feed on the humours of the water(-bodies) produced by water. (The rest similar as before.)

34 And again it has been said of old: some beings, of various birth and origin, (etc., all as in § 1, down to) come forth as fire-bodies in the manifold animate or inanimate bodies of movable or immovable creatures [E.g. when two bulls or elephants rush upon one another, sparks of fire are seen issuing from their horns or teeth. Fire is produced when two pieces of wood or stone are rubbed one against the other.]. These beings feed on the manifold movable or immovable creatures. The rest similar as before.)

The remaining three paragraphs are similar (to those treating of) water-bodies.

35 (This paragraph treats of wind-bodies in the same way as the preceding ones treated of fire-bodies; like it, it consists of four paragraphs).

36 And again it has been said of old: some beings, of various birth and origin, (etc., all as in § 1, down to) come forth, in the manifold animate and inanimate bodies of movable and immovable creatures, as earth, gravel, etc. Here the following verses (from the Uttaradhyayana XXXVI, 74-77) are to be made use of:

1. Earth, gravel, sand, stones, rocks, rock-salt, iron, copper, tin, lead, silver, gold, and diamond;
2. Orpiment, vermilion, realgar, Sasaka, antimony, coral, Abhrapatata, Abhravaluka; these are varieties of gross (earth-)bodies, and precious stones.
3. Hyacinth, natron, Anka, crystal, Lohitaksha, emerald, Masaragalla, Bhugamokaka, and sapphire;

4. Kandana, red chalk, Hamsagarbha, Pulaka, and sulphur; Kandraprabha, lapis lazuli, Galakanta, and Suryakanta.

These beings feed on the humours of these manifold movable and immovable beings. (The rest as above.)

The remaining three paragraphs are similar (to those treating of) water-bodies.

37 And again it has been said of old: all sorts of living beings, of manifold birth, origin, and growth, born in bodies, originated in bodies, grown in bodies, feeding on bodies, experience their Karman, are actuated by it, have their form and duration of life determined by Karman, and undergo changes through the influence of Karman. This you should know, and knowing it you will be careful and circumspect with regard to your food, and always exert yourself.

Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 4TH LECTURE,
CALLED RENUNCIATION OF ACTIVITY.

O long-lived (Gambusvamin)! I (Sudharman) have heard the following Discourse from the Venerable (Mahavira). We now come to the Lecture called 'Renunciation of Activity.' The contents of it are as follows:

It is the Self that may not renounce (activity), that may be accustomed to act, that may adhere to errors, that may be prone to sin, that may be thoroughly ignorant, that may be thoroughly stolid, that may not consider the operations of mind, speech, and body, that may not avoid and renounce sins.

1 The Venerable One has said, 'He (i.e. the Self) is uncontrolled, unresigned, does not avoid and renounce sins, is active, careless, prone to sin, thoroughly ignorant, thoroughly stolid. Though a fool does not consider the operations of his mind, speech, and body, nor does see even a dream 5; still he commits sins [The doctrine of the Jainas is that Karman is the result of the action of every being, even of those whose intellect or consciousness is not developed, as with the ekendriyas or beings who possess but one organ of sense. The opponent, however, maintains that only conscious actions of intelligent beings bring about Karman. This question is discussed in the following paragraphs.].

2 The opponent says to the teacher: 'There can be no sin, if (the perpetrator of an action) does not possess sinful thoughts, speech, and functions of the body, if he does not kill, if he has no internal organ, if he does not consider the operations of mind, speech, and body, if he does not see even a dream.' What is the meaning of the opponent in making this statement? 'When there is a sinful mind, there is sin of the mind; when there is sinful speech, there is sin of the speech; when there is a sinful body, there is sin of the body. When one kills, possesses an internal organ, and considers the operations of mind, speech, and body, when one sees even a dream, then there is sin. Only he who has these qualities can commit sin.' The opponent goes on to say, 'Those who say: There is sin, though (the perpetrator of an action) does not possess sinful thoughts, speeches, and functions of the body, though he does not kill, though he does not possess an internal organ, though he does not consider the operations of mind, speech, and body, and though he does not see even a dream,--those who say this, are wrong.'

3 Here the teacher says to the opponent: 'It is true what I have just said: there is sin, though (the perpetrator of the action) do not possess sinful thoughts, (etc., all as above, down to) though he do not see even a dream.' 'What is the reason thereof?' (The Akarya says): 'The Venerable One has assigned the six classes of living beings as the reason: the earth-lives, (etc., all down to) movable beings. With regard to these six classes of living beings, the Self does not avoid and renounce sins, he is wicked and does harm through cruelty: (this holds good with regard to the five cardinal sins) killing of living beings, etc. (and the passions): anger, etc. (down to) the sin of wrong belief.'

4 (The Akarya says): 'The Venerable One has illustrated this by the example of a murderer: a murderer (who hates) a householder or his son or the king or his servant, resolves, on an occasion offering, to enter (the victim's house) and to kill him when he finds an opportunity [The Nagarguniyas have another reading (where, is not stated by Silanka): If he sees no opportunity, or his proposed victim is always on his guard, he does not kill him, but he resolves in his mind: If I get an opportunity, or I find that man off his guard, I shall certainly kill him.]. Is not this murderer who has formed this resolution, (a man) who, day and night, whether sleeping or waking, is full of hostility and wrong; who is wicked and does harm through cruelty? An unbiased opponent before whom this is laid, will answer: Indeed, he is!'

5 (The Akarya says): 'As this murderer who has formed the above resolution is a man who (etc., all as in § 4, down to) does harm through cruelty--(and this holds good with regard to the five cardinal sins) killing of living beings, etc. (and the passions): anger, etc., (down to) the sin of wrong belief--so it has been said of him by the Venerable One: he is uncontrolled, unresigned, he does not avoid and renounce sins, he is active, careless, prone to sins thoroughly ignorant, thoroughly stolid. Though a fool does not consider the operations of his mind, speech, and body, nor does see even a dream, still he commits sins.

6 As a murderer who entertains (murderous) intentions towards a householder, etc., is a man who (etc., all as in § 4, down to) does harm through cruelty; so an ignorant man who entertains (cruel) intentions towards all sorts of living beings, is a man who (etc., all as in § 4, down to) does harm through cruelty.

7 (An opponent might object): This is no good reasoning. (For) there are many living beings which one, during one's whole life, never saw, nor heard of, nor cared for, nor took notice of. Towards these beings, therefore, one cannot (be said to) entertain (murderous) intentions, nor to be one who, day and night, whether sleeping or waking, is full of hostility and wrong, (etc., the rest as in § 4).

8 (The Akarya says): The Venerable One has refuted this by two illustrations, one of a sentient being, the other of a senseless being. The first is as follows: A sentient being, possessing five organs of sense and a developed internal organ, may with regard to the six classes of living beings, viz. earth-bodies, (all down to) movable beings, impose some restriction upon himself; (e.g.) that he will meet his wants, or have them met by others, by means of earth-bodies only. His intention is: I shall meet my wants, or have them met by others, by means of earth-bodies in general. With regard to them, therefore, he is uncontrolled, unrestrained, does not avoid and renounce sins. The same applies to the remaining five classes of living beings.--Some one may meet his wants, or have them met by others, by means of the six classes of living beings. His intention is: I shall meet my wants, or have them met by others, by means of the six classes of living beings; it is not: by means of some particular beings. He meets his wants, (etc.) by means of living beings in general. With regard to them, therefore, he is uncontrolled, etc. (This holds good with the five cardinal sins): killing of living beings, etc., (and with the passions): anger, (etc., all down to) the sin of wrong belief. The Venerable One has said that such a creature, (etc., all as in § 1, down to) commits sins.

9 The illustration of senseless beings is as follows: Senseless beings, viz. earth-bodies, (etc., all down to) plants, to which must be added, as a sixth item, some movable beings, which have no reason nor consciousness, nor intellect, nor mind, nor speech, in order to do something, or to have it done by others, or to consent to others' doing it; these benighted creatures (are to be considered as murderers), are full of hostility and wrong (all as in § 4) [If the passage were printed in full, the most glaring contradictions would stare the reader in the face. The cause hereof is not that the passage cannot correctly be rendered, but that the authors of the Sutras always make use of set phrases whether all parts of them suit the case in hand or not. Sometimes we can avoid downright nonsense by selecting a somewhat different rendering from what was given in another part of the book; and so I do in the last sentence of this paragraph. But this is only a makeshift.] against all sorts of living beings. (This holds good with the five cardinal sins) killing of living beings, etc., (and with the passions, all down to) the sin of wrong belief. Know this: though these beings have neither mind nor speech, yet as they cause pain, grief, damages, harm, and injury, they must be regarded as not abstaining from causing pain, etc.

10 Thus even senseless beings are reckoned instrumental in bringing about slaughter of living beings, (etc., all down to) the sin of wrong belief. Beings, whatever their origin, who were sentient (in one existence) will become senseless ones (in another) and vice versa. Not getting rid of, nor shaking off, nor annihilating, nor destroying their Karman, the thoroughly wicked and ignorant wander from the body of a senseless being into that of sentient ones, or from the body of a sentient being into that of senseless ones, or from the body of a sentient being into that of another, or from the body of a senseless being into that of another. The sentient beings and the senseless ones, both are wrong in their conduct and commit sins through cruelty. The Venerable One has said that such a (creature) is uncontrolled, (etc., all as in I, down to) commits sins.

11 (The opponent asks): 'What must one do or cause to be done, in order to become controlled and restrained, to avoid and renounce sins?' (The Akarya answers): The Venerable One has declared that the cause (of sins) are the six classes of living beings, earth-lives, etc. As I feel pain, so they do. Therefore they should not be injured or killed.

This constant, permanent, eternal, true Law has been taught by wise men who comprehend all things. Thus a monk abstains from (the five cardinal sins): slaughter of living beings, etc., (and of vices, all down to) the sin of wrong belief. He does not clean his teeth with a tooth-brush, he does not accept collyrium, emetics, and perfumes. Such a monk does not act nor kill, he is free from wrath, pride, deceit, and greed, he is calm and happy. The Venerable One says that such a (monk) is well controlled and restrained, does avoid and renounce sins, is not active, but careful and thoroughly wise.

Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 5TH LECTURE,
CALLED FREEDOM FROM ERROR.

1 A very clever (monk) who practises the vow of chastity, should not adopt the following (heretical) doctrines, nor behave badly in this religion.

2 He should not believe that (this world) is without beginning or without end, eternal or not eternal, according to the argumentation (of heretics).

3 From these alternatives you cannot arrive at truth; from these alternatives you are, certainly, led to error.

4 One should not say: that there will be an end of beings who (know and) teach the truth*; nor that all beings are not alike, nor that they shall be in (perpetual) bondage, or (that the prophets are) eternal. [* Sastarah, teachers, here those who reach perfection. The meaning is that the world would become empty if all beings should reach perfection. This should not be maintained, nor the opposite opinion, that some beings are qualified for Nirvana and others not.]

5 From these alternatives you cannot arrive at the truth, etc. (see verse).

7 One should not say: the guilt of killing small and great animals is the same, or not the same. (6) From these alternatives, etc.

8 One should know that those who accept things especially prepared for them, will be affected by demerit (in some cases), or will not be affected (where it is allowed by scripture).

9 From these alternatives, etc.

10 One should not maintain the identity of the audarika, aharika, and karmana bodies, nor that everything cannot everywhere come into existence, nor that it can.

11 From these alternatives, etc.

12 Do not maintain that the world does not exist, maintain that it exists.

13 Do not maintain that Giva and Agiva do not exist, but that they exist.

14 Do not maintain that Dharma and Adharma do not exist, but that they exist.

15 Do not maintain that bondage and liberation do not exist, but that they exist.

16 Do not maintain that virtue and vice do not exist, but that they exist.

17 Do not maintain that Asrava and the stoppage of Asrava do not exist, but that they exist.

18 Do not maintain that the experiencing of the effect, and the annihilation of Karman do not exist, but that they exist.

19 Do not maintain that activity and non-activity do not exist, but that they exist.

20 Do not maintain that anger and pride do not exist, but that they exist.

21 Do not maintain that deceit and greed do not exist, but that they exist.

22 Do not maintain that love and hate do not exist, but that they exist.

23 Do not maintain that the fourfold Circle of Births does not exist, but that it exists.

24 Do not maintain that there are no gods and goddesses, but that there are.

25 Do not maintain that there is no such thing as perfection and non-perfection, but that there is such a thing.

26 Do not maintain that there is no place exclusively reserved for those who attain to perfection, but that there is such.

27 Do not maintain that there are no pious and wicked men, but that there are.

28 Do not maintain that there is no such thing as good and bad, but that there is good and bad.

29 The theory will not work that (a man is always) good, or (always) bad. The wrongly instructed Sramanas do not comprehend the (soul's) bondage (through Karman).

30 (Do not assert) that everything is imperishable, or full of pains, nor that criminals should be put to death or not be put to death; one should not speak in this way.

31 Do not assert that those men are well-behaved monks who lead a pure life, and that those others lead an impure life.

32 A wise monk should not say: we get alms (from this householder) or we do not; but he should improve his chances for final liberation.

33 A monk should conform himself to these opinions taught by the Ginas, and wander about till he reaches final liberation. Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 6TH LECTURE,
CALLED ARDRAKA

[The commentators relate a romantic story about prince Ardraka, which need not be repeated here. Suffice it to say that he became monk, and after many adventures held the disputation which forms the subject of our lecture. After having vanquished his opponents, he was about to join Mahavira, when a newly-tamed elephant broke his chain, rushed on him, but just in front of him went down on his knees and paid him reverence. King Srenika witnessed this scene, and wondered how the elephant could have broken his chains. Ardraka replied that it was still more strange that a man could break the fetters which worldliness had fastened upon him. The whole story must be very old, for it is epitomised in ten gathas by the author of the Niryukti. -The names of the opponents not stated in the text of the verses are supplied from the commentaries.]

1 Gosala. 'Listen, Ardraka [This name is spelt either Ardra or Ardraka, Adda in Prakrit.], to what (Mahavira) has done. At first he wandered about as a single monk; but now he has surrounded himself by many monks, and teaches every one of them the Law at length.

2 'The inconstant man has decided upon this mode of life [According to the commentators, Gosala intimates that Mahavira had found it very inconvenient to live alone, because he was then exposed to many injuries; so he set up as a Tirthakara.]; to stand up in a crowd of men, surrounded by monks, and to teach his doctrines for the benefit of many people. Therefore his former and his present life are not of a piece.

'Either to live as a single mendicant (was right conduct) or his present life; therefore both do not agree with each other.'

3 Ardraka. "His past, present, and future lives agree with each other; for he is really always single and alone (though he be now surrounded by many followers).

4 "For if a Sramana or Brahmana who causes peace and security, comprehends the nature of movable and immovable living beings and explains it in a crowd numbering thousands, he realises singleness, remaining in the same mental condition as before.

5 "It is no sin to teach the Law, if (he who teaches it) is patient and resigned, subdues his senses, avoids bad speech, and uses virtuous speech.

6 "He who (teaches) the great vows (of monks) and the five small vows (of the laity, the laymen), the five Asravas and the stoppage of the Asravas, and control, who avoids Karman in this blessed life of Sramanas, him I call a Sramana."

7 Gosala. ('As your Law makes it no sin for Mahavira to surround himself by a crowd of disciples), so according to our Law an ascetic, who lives alone and single, commits no sin if he uses cold water, eats seeds, accepts things prepared for him, and has intercourse with women.'

8 Ardraka. "Know this: those who use cold water, eat seeds, accept things especially prepared for them, and have intercourse with women, are (no better than) householders, but they are no Sramanas.

9 "If those who eat seeds, use (cold) water, and have intercourse with women, are admitted to be Sramanas, then householders too are Sramanas; for they do the same things.

10 "Monks who eat seeds and use cold water, who beg alms as a means of living, will, though they leave their relations, be born again and again, and will not put an end to mundane existence."

Gosala. 'In making this statement you blame all philosophers alike!'

11 Ardraka. "Every philosopher praises his own doctrines and makes them known.

12 "Sramanas and Brahmanas blame one another when they teach (their doctrines). (The truth, they say,) is all on their side; there is none on that of the opponents. But we blame only the (wrong) doctrines and not at all (those who entertain them).

13 "We do not detract from anybody because of his personal qualities; but we make known the path pointed out in our creed. I have been taught the supreme, right path by worthy, good men.

14 "If a well-controlled man, afraid of injuring any movable or immovable living beings, above, below, or on earth, condemns (evil deeds), he does not at all blame (anybody) in this world."

15 Gosala. 'Out of fear your Sramana will not stay in houses for travellers or in public garden-houses; for in such places he would meet with many clever people, with lower or nobler men, with talkative or silent ones.

16 'He will not stay there because he fears lest some monks, wise, well instructed, learned men, who are well versed in the sacred texts and their meaning, should put questions to him.'

17 Ardraka. "Doing nothing without a purpose, nor without consideration, neither on the behest of the king nor from fear of anybody, he answers questions or not (according to the circumstances); but he (answers) worthy people with a definite purpose (in his mind).

18 "He, the wise man, impartially teaches (the Law) whether he goes (to his pupils) or not; because unworthy men have fallen from the true faith, he does not go to places (frequented by them)."

19 Gosala. 'As a merchant desirous of gain (shows) his wares and attracts a crowd to do business, in a similar way (acts) the Sramana Gnatriputra. This is what I think and calculate about it.'

20 Ardraka. "(Mahavira) acquires no new (Karman), he annihilates the old, avoiding wrong opinions; and thus the saviour said to others: Herein is contained the vow (leading to) Brahman (i.e. Moksha); this is the gain which a Sramana is desirous of. Thus I say.

21 "A merchant kills living beings and desires property; not leaving his kinsmen, he attracts a crowd in order to do business.

22 "Desiring riches and addicted to sensuality, merchants wander about to earn their living. But we (say) that they are passionately fond of pleasures, unworthy, and desiring the enjoyment of love.

23 "They do not abstain from slaughter and the acquirement of property, they are in bondage and full of wickedness; and their gain of which you spoke, will be the endless Circle of Births and pains manifold.

24 "They do not always make profit, nor does it last for ever; they meet with both results (success and failure) in their quest of gain. The profit (of the teacher), however, has a beginning, but no end; the saviour and sage shares his profit (with others).

25 "Him who kills no (living beings), who has compassion on all creatures, who is well grounded in the Law, and causes the truth of the Law to be known, him you would equal to those wicked men! This is the outcome of your folly."

26 A Buddhist. 'If (a savage) thrusts a spit through the side of a granary, mistaking it for a man; or through a gourd, mistaking it for a baby, and roasts it, he will be guilty of murder according to our views.

27 'If a savage puts a man on a spit and roasts him, mistaking him for a fragment of the granary; or a baby, mistaking him for a gourd, he will not be guilty of murder according to our views.

28 'If anybody thrusts a spit through a man or a baby, mistaking him for a fragment of the granary, puts him on the fire, and roasts him, that will be a meal fit for Buddhas to break fast upon.

29 "Those who always feed two thousand worthy monks, acquire great merit and become powerful gods in Arupa (dhatu)."

30 Ardraka. "Well-controlled men cannot accept (your denial of) guilt incurred by (unintentionally) doing harm to living beings. It will cause error and no good to both who teach such doctrines and who believe them.

31 "A man who knows the nature of movable and immovable living beings, above, below, and on earth, who is afraid of injuring them and abstains from wicked deeds, may speak and act (in accordance with our Law); he will not be guilty of any (sin).

32 "It is impossible to mistake (a fragment of the granary) for a man; only an unworthy man can say it. How can (the idea of a man) be produced by a fragment of the granary? Even to utter this is an untruth.

33 "Do not use such speech by means of which you do evil; for such speech is incompatible with virtues. No ordained (monk) should speak empty words.

34 "Oh! you have explored this subject; you have thoroughly examined the consequences of acts of living beings; your (fame) reaches the Eastern and Western oceans; you view (the universe as if) it stood on the palm of your hands!

35 "Thoroughly examining the consequences of acts of living beings, (our monks) have found out a pure way of sustaining life. It is a maxim of the monks of our creed 3, that nobody who lives by secret sins, should lay down the Law.

36 "A man who always feeds two thousand worthy monks, does not control himself, and will be blamed in this world like a man with bloody hands.

37 "They kill a fattened sheep, and prepare food for the sake of a particular person; they season the meat with salt and oil, and dress it with pepper.

38 "You are irreligious, unworthy men, devoted to foolish pleasures, who say that partaking heartily of this meat you are not soiled by sin.

39 "All who partake of such food, commit sins in their ignorance; but the wise do nothing of the kind. Even to utter it is an untruth.

40 "In compassion to all beings, the seers, the Gnatriputras, avoid what is sinful; afraid of it, they abstain from food especially prepared for them.

41 "They abstain from wicked deeds, afraid of injuring living beings, and do no harm to any creature; therefore they do not partake of such food. This is a maxim of the monks of our creed.

42 "(Having reached) this perfection in the Law of the Nirgrantha and standing firm in it, one should live without deceit. The awakened sage who is endowed with all virtues thereby obtained very great fame."

43 A Vedic Priest. "Those who always feed two thousand holy mendicants, acquire great merit and become gods. This is the teaching of the Veda."

44 Ardraka. "He who always feeds two thousand holy cats (i.e. Brahmanas), will have to endure great pains in hell, being surrounded by hungry (beasts).

45 "He who despises the Law that enjoins compassion, and praises the Law that permits slaughter, and who feeds but a single unprincipled man, even if he be a king, will go to darkness, and not to the gods."

46 A Vedantin. 'Both of us follow (very much the same) Law; we stood firm in it, and shall do so in the time to come;

(we believe that) virtue consists in good conduct, and that knowledge (is necessary for liberation); and with regard to the Circle of Births there is no difference between us.

47 '(But we assume) an invisible, great, eternal, imperishable, and indestructible Soul, who excels all other beings in every respect, as the moon excels the stars.'

48 Ardraka. "(If there were but one Soul common to all beings) they could not be known (from one another), nor could they experience different lots; there would not be Brahmanas, Kshatriyas, Vaishyas, and Sudras 1, insects, birds, and snakes; all would be men and gods.

49 "Those who do not know all things by Kevala (knowledge), but who being ignorant teach a Law (of their own), are lost themselves, and work the ruin of others in this dreadful, boundless Circle of Births.

50 "Those who know all things by the full Kevala knowledge, and who practising meditation teach the whole Law, are themselves saved and save others.

51 "You have, in your mind, made equal both those who lead a blameable life, and those who in this world practise right conduct. Friend, you are deluded."

52 A Hastitapasa. 'Every year we kill one big elephant with an arrow, and live upon it in order to spare the life of other animals.'

53 Ardraka. "If every year you kill but one animal without abstaining from sin, though you are not guilty of the slaughter of other creatures, there is little difference between you and a householder.

54 "If a man kills every year but one animal, and lives (in other respects) as a Sramana, he is unworthy, and works his perdition. Such men will not become Kevalins."

55 A (monk) who has achieved his religious perfection through the instruction of the Awakened One [Buddhassa anai.], and stands firm in it, who guards himself in the threefold way (i.e. with regard to thoughts, words, and acts), and who possesses the things requisite for crossing the immense ocean of existence, may preach the Law.

Thus I say.

SUTRAKRITANGA 7TH LECTURE, CALLED NALANDA.

1 At that time, at that period, there was a town of the name Ragagriha: it was rich, happy, thriving, etc. Outside of Ragagriha, in a north-eastern direction, there was the suburb Nalanda; it contained many hundreds of buildings, etc.

2 In that suburb Nalanda there was a householder called Lepa; he was prosperous, famous; rich in high and large houses, beds, seats, vehicles, and chariots; abounding in riches, gold, and silver; possessed of useful and necessary things; wasting plenty of food and drink; owning many male and female slaves, cows, buffaloes, and sheep; and inferior to nobody.

3 This householder Lepa, a follower of the Sramanas, comprehended (the doctrine of) living beings and things without life, (etc., all as in II, 2, 76, p. 382, down to the end of the paragraph).

4 This householder Lepa possessed, in a northeastern direction from the suburb Nalanda, a bathing-hall, called Seshadravya; it contained many hundreds of pillars, was beautiful, etc. In a northeastern direction from this bathing-hall Seshadravya, there was a park called Hastiyama. (Description of the park 3.)

5 And there in some house the Venerable Gautama was staying. The venerable (man) was in the garden, and so was Udaka, the son of Pedhala, a Nirgrantha and follower of Parsva 4, of the Medarya Gotra. He went there where the Venerable Gautama was, and said: 'O long-lived Gautama, I want to ask you about a point (of faith); O long-lived one, please explain it to me so as it has been taught (by the Tirthakara)!' And the Venerable Gautama spoke thus to Udaka, the son of Pedhala: "Well, long-lived one, I shall see about it, when I have heard and understood (your question)." And Udaka, the son of Pedhala, spoke thus to the Venerable Gautama:

6 'O long-lived Gautama, there are Nirgrantha Sramanas, called Kumaraputras, who profess your creed; they make a zealous householder, a follower of the Sramanas, renounce injury to movable beings except on the order (from an established authority), as the householder caused one of the captured thieves to be set free. Those who make this renunciation, make a bad renunciation; those who cause this renunciation to be made, cause a bad renunciation to be made; in causing another to make this renunciation, they annul their own allegation [Viz. that by abstaining from slaughter of living beings they kill no living beings.]. Why do I say this? Beings belong to the Circle of Births; though they be (now) immovable beings, they will (some time) become movable ones, or though they be (now) movable beings, they will become immovable ones; when they leave the bodies of immovable beings, they will be born in bodies of movable ones, and when they leave the bodies of movable beings, they will be born in bodies of immovable ones. When they are born in bodies of immovable beings, it is no sin to kill them.

7 '(But if they make him renounce) injury to creatures which are, for the time being, movable beings, except on the order (from an established authority)--as the householder caused one of the captured thieves to be set free--(if they take this vow), those who make this renunciation, make a good renunciation; those who cause this renunciation to be made, cause a good renunciation to be made; in causing another to make this renunciation, they do not annul their own allegation. Though in this way a correct expression is found, some (monks) from anger or greed cause the householder to make the renunciation (without the necessary restriction). Is not this our interpretation right? O long-lived Gautama, do you approve of it?'

8 And Gautama spoke thus to Udaka, the son of Pedhala: "O long-lived Udaka, we certainly do not approve of it. The Sramanas or Brahmanas who say thus, speak thus, declare thus, and explain thus, do not speak as Sramanas or Nirgranthas, they speak noxious speech. They mislead laymen. They make void all vows undertaken for sparing particular living beings [E.g. if a man vows to kill no Brahmana (and does not add the restriction 'for the time being'), he may kill no man or animal whatever; for the soul of that man or animal may, in the past, have been embodied in a Brahmana.]. Why do I say this? Beings belong to the Circle of Births; though they be (now) immovable beings, they will (some time) become movable ones, (etc., all as in § 6, down to) when they leave the bodies of movable beings, they will be born in the bodies of immovable ones. When they are born in the bodies of movable beings, it is a sin to kill them."

And Udaka, the son of Pedhala, spoke thus: 'Which beings do you call movable beings? movable ones or others?'

9 And Gautama spoke thus to Udaka, the son of Pedhala: "O long-lived Udaka, what you call beings which are, for the time being, movable ones, we call movable beings; and what we call movable beings, you call beings which are, for the time being, movable ones. Both expressions are equal, and mean the same thing. O long-lived one, why do you think it more correct to say: beings which are, for the time being, movable ones; and why do you think it incorrect to say: movable beings, that you censure the one expression, and applaud the other? This your interpretation is not right."

10 "And the Venerable One has spoken thus: Some men there are who say: we cannot, submitting to the tonsure, renounce the life of a householder and enter the monastic state, but we shall gradually conform to the Gotra (i.e. community of the monks). Accordingly they make known the limits, fix the limits, determine the limits (beyond which they will not go in the enjoyment of worldly goods); and renounce injury to movable beings, except on the order 1 (of an established authority)--as the householder caused one of the captured thieves to be set free. And this turns out to their benefit."

11 "Movable beings are called so, when they get this character 2 through the taking effect of the Karman relating to movable beings. But when their duration of life as movable beings comes to its close, (the soul), embodied in a movable being, leaves its life as such and becomes embodied in an immovable being. Immovable beings are called so, when they get this character through the taking effect of the Karman relating to immovable beings. But when their duration of life as an immovable being comes to its close, (the soul), embodied in an immovable being, leaves its life as such and takes again a new form of existence; they are (then) called* animated beings, (animals) of large bodies, or of long life." [* They are called (vukkanti = ukyaunte) is apparently equivalent with: they get the name (nama); 'name,' however, means in Jaina and Buddha terminology as much as 'the nature of the thing.' The words of the text, therefore, come to mean: 'they become or are animated beings,' etc.]

12 And Udaka, the son of Pedhala, spoke thus to the Venerable Gautama: 'Is there not a chance, that a follower of the Sramanas, though he has renounced slaughter of but one class of living beings, ceases altogether to injure any? [The question discussed in the following paragraphs is whether, at some future time, all movable beings in the Samsara might not die out, and none but immovable beings be left. This idea is combated at great length by Gautama.] Why do I say this? Beings belong to the Circle of Births, though they be (now) immovable beings, they will (some time) become movable ones, and though they be movable beings, they will become immovable ones. When they leave the bodies of immovable beings, all are born in bodies of movable ones, and when they leave the bodies of movable beings, all will be born in bodies of immovable ones. When they are born in bodies of immovable beings, they may be killed [The meaning is, that at some future time movable beings may have ceased to exist, since they are all born as immovable beings, and vice versa. If the latter is the case, a layman, who abstains from killing animals, practically does injury to no being whatever; if the former is the case, he cannot transgress his vow even if he would.]'

13 And the Venerable Gautama spoke thus to Udaka, the son of Pedhala: "O long-lived one, we do not admit what you say; viz. that there is a chance that a follower of the Sramanas should cease to do injury to any kind of living beings. Why do we say this? Beings belong to the Circle of Births, (etc., all as above, down to) when they are born in bodies of movable beings, it is a sin to kill them. They are called animated beings, (animals) of large bodies, or of long life. There are always a great many animate beings, (the slaughter of) which a follower of the Sramanas must renounce, there are none, (the slaughter of) which he need not renounce. If he ceases, or has done with, or has given up (injuring) the large class of movable beings, his renunciation is good. What you or somebody else says, that there is a chance of a layman's ceasing to do an injury altogether, by renouncing slaughter of one kind of beings; this interpretation of yours is not right."

14 The Venerable One 1 gave an illustration: "I put a question to the Nirgranthas: O long-lived ones, (suppose) there be some men who have made the following declaration: 'I shall not inflict punishment on those who, submitting to the tonsure, renounce the life of a householder and enter the monastic state; but I shall inflict punishment on those who lead a domestic life.' Some Sramana, who for four or five years, or for six or ten years--the period may be shorter or longer--has wandered about in the land, returns to domestic life. Now answer me: does the man break his word when he puts to death this (renegade) householder?" 'Certainly not!' "It is just the same with a follower of the Sramanas, who has renounced injury to movable beings, but not to immovable ones. If he kills immovable beings, he does not transgress his vow. This you acknowledge, O Nirgranthas, this you must acknowledge!"

15 The Venerable One gave another illustration: "I put a question to the Nirgranthas. O long-lived Nirgranthas, (suppose) there be householders or sons of householders, born in respectable families, who come to you for instruction in the Law. Ought they to be instructed in the Law?" 'Yes, they should.' "When they have learned and understood this Law, will they say: this creed of the Nirgranthas is true, supreme, excellent, full of virtues, right, pure, it removes doubts, it is the road to perfection, liberation, Nirvana; it is free from error and doubts, it is the road of those who are free from all misery; those who adopt it will reach perfection, (etc., all down to) put an end to all misery; exerting ourselves we shall control ourselves with regard to all kinds of living beings.--Will they speak thus?" 'Yes.' "Should such men be admitted to the order?" 'Yes, they should.' "Should such men be instructed in the discipline and kept to attend to religious instruction?" 'Yes, they should.' "Do they renounce injury to every living being?" 'Yes, they do.' "Now (suppose) one of these men who lead such a life, after wandering about in the land for four or five years, or for six or ten years--the period may be shorter or longer--returns to domestic life. Will this man (still) abstain from doing injury to every living being?" 'No.' "The same man who at first (as a householder) had not renounced injury to every living being, who afterwards has renounced, and who now does not renounce injury to every living being, did at first not control himself, did so afterwards, and does not so now. As long as he does not control himself, he does not renounce injury to every living being. This you acknowledge, O Nirgranthas, this you must acknowledge!"

16 The Venerable One gave (another) illustration: "I put a question to the Nirgranthas. O long-lived Nirgranthas, (suppose) there be monks or nuns of other sects, who come to you for instruction in the Law, (all as before, down to) attend to religious instruction." 'Yes, they should.' "Is it lawful to eat with such men?" 'Yes, it is.' "Now (suppose) some of these people who lead such a life, (etc., all as before, down to) return to domestic life. Is it lawful to eat with them then?" 'No, it is not.' "The same man with whom to eat was not lawful at first, was lawful afterwards, and is not lawful now, was no Sramana at first, was a Sramana afterwards, and is no Sramana now. It is not lawful for Nirgrantha Sramanas to eat together with him. This you acknowledge, O Nirgranthas; this you must acknowledge!"

17 And the Venerable One spoke thus: "There are some followers of the Sramanas, who have made this declaration: we cannot, submitting to the tonsure, renounce the life of a householder and enter the monastic state, but we shall strictly observe the Posaha on the fourteenth and the eighth days of each fortnight, (on the new-moon, and) full-moon days, we renounce gross ill-usage of living beings, grossly lying speech, gross taking of things not given, (unlawful) sexual intercourse, (unlimited) appropriation of property; we shall set limits to our desires in the two forms and in the three ways. They will also make the following renunciation: 'neither do nor cause anything (sinful) to be done for my sake.' Having (on Posaha-days) abstained from eating, drinking, bathing, and using beds or chairs, may they, on their decease, be said to make a (righteous) end of their life?" 'Certainly, they do make such an end of their life.' "They are called animated beings, (etc., all as in § 13, down to) this interpretation of yours is not right."

18 The Venerable One spoke thus: "There are some followers of the Sramanas, who have made this declaration: we cannot, submitting to the tonsure, renounce the life of a householder and enter the monastic state; we also cannot strictly observe the Posaha on the fourteenth and the eighth days of each fortnight, (on the days of new-moon) and full-moon; but while we are preparing ourselves for death by fasting, we shall abstain from food and drink without longing for the end; we shall renounce all ill-usage of living beings, all lying speech, all taking of things not given, all sexual intercourse, all property, (saying): 'neither do nor cause anything (sinful) to be done for my sake.' (All the rest as in the preceding paragraph)"

19 And the Venerable One spoke thus: "There are some men of great desires, great undertakings, etc., who do not abstain from all ill-usage of living beings, (etc., down to) from all property. During the whole time, from their taking the vows of a follower of the Sramanas till their death, they abstain from injury to living beings. Then they die; in their next existence they experience their Karman, and receive an evil lot. (The rest as before)"

20 And the Venerable One spoke thus: "There are some men of no desires, no undertakings, who abstain from all ill-usage of living beings, (etc., down to) from all property. During the whole time, from their taking the vows of a follower of the Sramanas till their death, they abstain from injury to living beings. Then they die; in their next existence they experience their Karman, and receive a happy lot. (The rest as before)"

21 And the Venerable One spoke thus: "There are some men of few desires, few undertakings, who abstain from ill-usage of one sort of living beings, (etc., down to) from one sort of property. During the whole time, (etc., the rest as in the last paragraph)"

22 And the Venerable One spoke thus: "There are some men who live in woods, in huts, near villages, or practise some secret rites, who are not well controlled, do not well abstain (from slaying) all sorts of living beings. They employ speech that is true and untrue at the same time: do not beat me, beat others, (etc., all as in II, 2, 21, down to) having died at their allotted time, they are born in some places inhabited by Asuras 1 and evil-doers. And when they are released therefrom, they will be born deaf and dumb or blind. They are called animated beings, (etc., the rest as in § 13)."

23 And the Venerable One spoke thus: "There are some beings of a long life, which a follower of the Sramanas abstains from injuring through life. They die after him. They are called animated beings, (etc., the rest as in § 13)."

24, 25 (The two next paragraphs treat in exactly the same way of beings of an equally long life, which die simultaneously with him, and of beings of a short life, which die before him.)

And the Venerable One spoke thus: "There are some followers of the Sramanas, who have made this declaration: we are not able to strictly observe the Posaha-days, but we are able, when preparing ourselves for death by fasting, to abstain from food and drink without longing for the end. The vow of such a man is the Samayika Desavakasika: (he declares) in the morning: (I shall travel) only thus or thus far in an eastern, western, southern, northern direction. He renounces injury to all beings: I shall cause peace and security to all sorts of living beings."

26 "Within those (limits) the movable living beings, which the follower of the Sramanas abstains from injuring till his death, will leave their life, and will then be born, within the same limits, as movable living beings, which the follower of the Sramanas abstains from injuring till his death. With regard to them the follower of the Sramanas has made a good renunciation. They are called animated beings, (etc., the rest as before)."

27 "The movable beings within those limits, etc, will, after their death, be born within the same limits as immovable beings, from injuring which without a purpose the follower of the Sramanas abstains till death, but not with a purpose, (etc., the rest as before)."

28 "The movable beings within those limits, etc., will, after their death, be born, beyond those limits, as movable or immovable beings, (etc., the rest as before)."

29 "The immovable beings within those limits, etc., will, after their death, be born, within the same limits, as movable beings, (etc., the rest as before)."

30 "The immovable beings within those limits, etc., will, after their death, be born, within the same limits, as immovable beings, (etc., the rest as before)."

31 "The immovable beings within those limits, etc., will, after their death, be born, beyond those limits, as immovable beings, (etc., the rest as before)."

32 "The movable and immovable beings beyond those limits, etc., will, after their death, be born, within those limits, as movable beings, (etc., the rest as before)."

33 "The movable and immovable beings beyond those limits, etc., will, after their death, be born, within those limits, as immovable beings, (etc., the rest as before)."

34 "The movable and immovable beings beyond those limits, etc., will, after their death, be born, beyond those limits, as movable and immovable beings, (etc. the rest as before)."

35 The Venerable One spoke thus: "It has never happened, it does not happen, nor will it ever happen, that all movable beings will die out and become immovable ones, nor that all immovable beings die out and become movable ones. Since movable and immovable beings never die out, there is no chance, as you or somebody else say, that a layman ceases to do injury altogether by renouncing slaughter of one kind of beings; this interpretation of yours is not right."

36 And the Venerable One spoke thus: "If (a man) who has been instructed in right knowledge, faith, and conduct for the avoidance of sins, blames a (righteous) Sramana or Brahmana though he is well disposed towards them, he effects the loss of his merit for another world; but if he does not blame them, he heightens the purity of his merit for another world." On this Udaka, the son of Pedhala, took no further notice of the Venerable Gautama and was about to return in the direction in which he had come.

37 And the Venerable One spoke thus: "O long-lived Udaka, he who has learned from a Sramana or Brahmana whomsoever even one noble religious truth, and considers himself thereby furthered with regard to his peace and happiness, will respect, acknowledge, praise, salute, honour, reverence, and worship him even as a blessed and holy deity or sacred shrine."

38 Then Udaka, the son of Pedhala, spoke thus to the Venerable Gautama: 'As I had not before known, heard, understood, and comprehended these words, I did not believe in the meaning (of your words), which I had never perceived nor heard nor understood nor appreciated, and which were never explained nor defined nor delivered nor made clear to me, nor pondered over by me. But now, Reverend Sir, as I do know, etc., these words which I have perceived, heard, etc., I believe, accept, and approve of their meaning. It is just as you say!'

39 Then the Venerable Gautama spoke thus to Udaka, the son of Pedhala: "Believe it, sir; accept it, sir; approve of it, sir; it is just as we have said." Then Udaka, the son of Pedhala, spoke thus to the Venerable Gautama: 'I desire, Reverend Sir, in your presence to pass from the creed which enjoins four vows I, to the creed which enjoins the five great vows and the Pratikramana.'

40 Then the Venerable Gautama went with Udaka, the son of Pedhala, to the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira. Then Udaka, the son of Pedhala, solemnly circumambulated the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira three times from the left to the right, and having done so he praised and worshipped him, and then he spoke thus: 'I desire, Reverend Sir, in your presence to pass from the creed which enjoins four vows, to the creed which enjoins the five great vows and the Pratikramana. May it so please you, beloved of the gods, do not deny me!' Then, in the presence of the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira, Udaka, the son of Pedhala, passed from the creed which enjoins four vows, to the creed which enjoins the five great vows and the Pratikramana.

Thus I say.

THE NALADIYAR

The Instructions of the Tamil Jains

From: Indian Antiquary, Vol.2

Bombay, Education Society's Press, 1873

Edited by Jas. Burgess

Translation: F. J. Leeper, 1873

Estimated Range of Dating: 100 and 500 A.D.

(The Nalatiyar is a Tamil poetic work of didactic nature belonging to the Eighteen Lesser Texts (Patiyenkilkanakku) anthology of Tamil literature. This belongs to the post Sangam period corresponding to between 100 and 500 AD. The term "Naladiyar" is derived from the Tamil terms Naalu, a colloquial form of Naangu meaning "four", adi meaning metrical feet or poetic metre, and aar referring to a honorific suffix. Thus Naladiyar refers to the work that contains four-lined verse. The work is also termed Naaladi Naanooru, meaning "four hundred quatrains," since it has 400 verses in total.

Nalatiyar was composed by Jain monks in the Tamil language. The Nalatiyar contains 400 poems, each containing four lines. Every poem deals with morals and ethics, extolling righteous behaviour, pretty much like the Instructions of Shuruppak, Mesopotamia, 2600 BC and subsequent teachings that we can find in the Torah of the Bible or in the 613 Mitzvot. It is divided into three sections, the first section focusing on the importance of virtuous life, second section on the governance and management of wealth, and the third smaller section on the pleasures. The Nalatiyar is unique in the employment of similes, which help to teach the moral codes using simple examples from daily life. For example, one of the poems states that just like a calf placed in front of a vast herd of cows seeks out its mother unerringly and attaches itself, the deeds of the past home in on the doer and exact their price unfliningly.

The Naladiyar is one of the few original works we have in Tamil. It contains altogether forty chapters, of ten stanzas each, on moral subjects. The origin of the name is thus told in the introduction of Father Beschi's Shen Tamil Grammar:-- "Eight thousand poets visited the p. 219 court of a certain prince, who, being a lover of the Muses, treated them with kindness and received them into favour; this excited the envy of the bards who already enjoyed the royal patronage, and in a short time they succeeded so completely in their attempt to prejudice their master against the new comers that the latter found it necessary to consult their safety by flight, and, without taking leave of their host, decamped in the dead of night. Previous to their departure each poet wrote a venba on a scroll, which he deposited under his pillow. When this was made known, the king, who still listened to the counsels of the envious poets, ordered the scrolls to be collected and thrown into a river, when four hundred of them were observed to ascend, for the space of four feet, naladi, against the stream. The king, moved by this miraculous occurrence, directed that these scrolls should be preserved, and they were accordingly formed into a work, which from the foregoing circumstance received the name of Naladiyar." I append a few chapters as specimens of the work.)

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 1 - Unstable Wealth

1. Even those who have eaten of every variety of food of six flavours laid before them by their wives with anxious attention, not taking a second portion from any dish, may yet become poor and go and beg somewhere for pottage. Verily riches are but seeming, not to be considered as actually existing.

2. When by blameless means thou hast acquired great wealth, then eat with others rice imported by oxen, for wealth never remaineth in the centre with anyone, but changes its position like a cart-wheel.

3. Even those who have marched as generals, mounted on the back of an elephant and shaded by the umbrella, when the effect of evil deeds works their ruin, will suffer a change of state, and while their wives are enjoyed by their foes, will fall for ever.

4. Understand that these things are unstable which thou deemest stable. Therefore do quickly the duties in thy power to perform if thou wouldst do thom at all, for the days of life are gone, are gone, and even now death is come, is come.

5. Those who give alms at once without keeping it back, when anything, however small, has come into their hands, and do not say, Oh, this can be given hereafter, will escape from the forest path in which the cruel but just Yama drags those whom he has bound fast with the rope.

6. The day appointed passes not its bourne; there are none in this world who, escaping it and passing by, have leaped over death and lived. Be liberal, then, ye who have laid up abundant and exceeding wealth. Your funeral drum may beat to-morrow.

7. Death devours your days, using the sun from which they originate as the measure by which he metes them. Practise therefore virtue and be compassionate, for such as do not act thus, though they are born, must be esteemed as unborn.

8. Men of but small attainments in virtue, not tconsidering their natural tendency, say, We are wealthy. The greatest wealth may be utterly destroyed and vanish, like a flash of lightning darting in the night from a thunder-cloud.

9. If a man will not eat sufficiently, will not dress becomingly, does nothing worthy of commendation, will not wipe away the distress of relatives, who are with difficulty to be obtained, and is not liberal, but keeps his wealth to himself, of such a one it must surely be supposed that he is lost.

10. They who, vexing their own bodies by stinting them in food and raiment, perform not acts of that goodly charity which never faileth, but avariciously hoard up what they have gathered together, will lose it all. O Lord of the mountain land which toucheth the sky! the bees which are driven from the honey they have collected bear witness.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 2 - Unstable Youth

1. Those who are truly wise, mindful that grey hairs will come, have become ascetics in youth. Those who rejoice in unstable youth, never free from vice, leaning on a staff will rise up with difficulty.

2. The bonds of friendship are broken, wives have become cold in love, or few, the cords of love are loosened. Consider the matter well. What profit is there in the married state? Oh, it is come, the wail of distress, as when a ship founders!

3. Those foolish men who give themselves up to lust and cling to the marriage state until their body is an object of disgust to all, their teeth falling out, their gait unsteady, and compelled to lean for support on a staff, while they are indistinct in speech, walk not in the path of virtue, which is a fortress to its possessor.

4. To those men who conceive useless desires towards her who is ready to die, stooping, staggering, shaking her head, leaning on a staff and stumbling, shall trouble come; when the staff she holds in her hand becomes her mother's, i.e. when she exchanges her own staff for her mother's, on account of age.

5. She who was my mother, having borne me in this world, had departed seeking a mother for herself, if this be the case also with her mother, one mother seeking after another mother, then is this world wretched indeed.

6. Unstable joy like that of a sheep, which when the fragrant garland, thick with leaves, is waved in front of it, in the hands of the priest in the horrid place where he exorcises devils, eats thereof as though it were fodder, such joy wise men have not.

7. Since the season of youth is like the ripe fruit, which being loosed falls from the trees in the cool grove, desire ye not greatly the damsel, saying she has eyes like a lance, for she will hereafter stoop in her gait and have to use a staff in lieu of her eyes.

8. How old are you? What is the state of your teeth? Do you eat twice a day? Thus with one question after another do they inquire about the state of the body. The wise, who understand its nature, care not about it.

9. Say not, We will look to virtue bye-and-bye, we are young; but do good while you have wealth, without concealing it. Not only does the ripe fruit which has come to maturity, but strong green fruit also falls down during a storm.

10. Truly relentless death wanders about seeking after men, Oh, take ye the shoulder wallet betimes and be ready. He even thrusts forth the fetus and takes away the child amidst the cries of its mother. So it is well always to remember his subtlety.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 3 - The Unstable Body

1. Even of the lords of the umbrella held over the head of the elephant, like the moon when seen over the hills, none are left in this world without its being proclaimed upon earth that they have died.

2. The orb of shining light rises as the measure of the day of life without one day's omission. Therefore perform your duty before the day of life be finished. No person will abide in the earth beyond it.

3. The mind of the excellent will urge them along the path of safety by the suggestion that the marriage drum that is beaten in their house may that very day become the funeral drum for the inmates and sound accordingly.

4. Once they go and beat the drum, they beat a little and beat it again; behold how brave it is. And in beating it the third time, they rise and cover up the corpse and take the funeral fire, the dying carrying the dead.

5. To him who though he has seen the relatives assemble together and with loud lamentations take the corpse and convey it to the burning-place, does nevertheless marry, and say to himself this is happiness, It is, It is the funeral drum speaking out in warning tones.

6. When the soul which carries the skin bag, i.e. the body, to experience joy and sorrow; and dwelling in it operates secretly but perfectly, has left the body, what does it matter whether it be dragged about with a rope, or be buried in some carefully selected place, or whether it be cast into any hole dug in the centre, or whether it is left to be contemned by all?

7. Who are they upon this wide world who can be compared with the men of profound wisdom, who look upon the body as nothing more than a thing which is like the bubbles caused by the falling rain, appearing for a moment and then vanishing; and who say, We are the persons who will remove this evil of births?

8. Let those who have got a vigorous body enjoy the benefit which is to be derived from it; for the body is like a cloud which quivers on the mountain--it appears for a time and almost directly vanishes.

9. Practise virtue even now, acknowledging the instability of the body, which is like the drop of dew on the point of grass; for it is daily said, This very moment he stood, he sat down, he reclined, and amidst the cries of relations he died.

10. Men come into the world unasked for, appear in the house as relations and quietly depart, as the bird which goes far off, its nest-tree being forsaken, leaving their body without saying a word to relatives.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 4 - The source of the power of virtue

1. Those who, relying on penance done in a former birth, do not exercise penance now, will be greatly afflicted, for they shall stand at the threshold, not being allowed to enter, and looking in will say, How flourishing is this family! i.e. they shall be homeless.

2. Say not, foolish heart, While here let us pursue our interests and forget virtue; for although thou mayest live long and prosper, say, what wilt thou do when the days of thy life are past?

3. When the ignorant receives the fruit of former evil deeds, he sighs bitterly and grieves within himself. The wise, reflecting that it is the destined consequence of their sins, hasten to pass the limit of metempsychosis and to depart from it.

4. Having obtained a human body, so difficult of attainment, so act as to procure great merit by it, for in the next birth charity will profit thee as the juice of the sugarcane when pressed, while thy body will decay like the refuse cane.

5. Those who have pressed the cane and extracted the sugar will not be grieved when they see the flame arising from the refuse cane while burning; nor will they who have acquired the merit arising from the mortification of the body mourn when death approaches.

6. Think not whether it will be this day, or that day, or what day, but, reflecting that death even now stands behind thee, eschew evil, and as far as possible practise the good prescribed to thee by the excellent.

7. Since upon inquiry it will be found that the benefits that arise from being born in human shape are great and various, it is proper to practise virtue in order to obtain heavenly bliss, and to walk circumspectly, avoiding evil desires.

8. The seed of the banyan tree, though exceedingly small, grows into a large tree and affords abundant shade; in like manner, however small may be the benefit of a virtuous act, it covers as it were the face of heaven.

9. Although they daily see the passing away of days, yet they think not of it, and daily rejoice over the present day, as if it would last for ever, for they do not consider the past day to be one day added to the portion of their life that has expired.

10. Shall I put away the precious jewel of honour, and by the ignoble practice of mendicancy shall I live? I will do so if this body can endure permanently though fed by meanness.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 5 - The impure body

1. Do they look on a perishable body, i.e. the wise? and are they loud in praise of woman's beauty? If only a piece of skin, small as the wing of a fly, be grazed on the body, a stick will be required to drive away the crows.

2. Since the beauty of the body consists in a covering which hides its inward filth, a covering of skin in which are many orifices, encourage not these sensual desires which are excited by this external covering of the body, which hides its filth. It is proper to look upon it as the inside of a (dirty) bag.

3. The ancients noticing that by the process of eating, the body always emits a stench, and on account of this bundle of dry and worthless sticks, (i.e. the body), chewed betel, crowned the head with many flowers, and adorned the body with meretricious ornaments. Is the inward filth thereby done away with?

4. Shall I forsake asceticism because the senseless crowd would excite me, saying, Woman's eye is like the lotus in clear water, the Gyal fish, and the battle-spear? I will conduct myself as one who sees that the nature of the eye is like a palmyra nut, from which the pulp has been taken and the water poured out.

5. Shall I forsake asceticism because foolish, vain, and despicable persons trouble me, saying foolish things about teeth white as pearls or the jessamine buds? No; I will conduct myself as if I saw the jawbone fallen from the head in the burning-ground, in the presence of all men.

6. Tell me what is the nature of the damsel adorned with cool garlands, who is composed of flesh and fat, which are placed in the skin with the sinews which bind together the bowels and marrow, the blood and the bones.

7. By reason of the beautiful skin causing it to appear lovely to the eye, and which is the external covering of the body, which is like a pot ejecting liquid freces and seething filth abominable, from nine orifices which ooze out with excrementitious matter, the foolish will say of this body, Oh, thou who hast wide shoulders! Oh, thou who art adorned with bracelets! etc. etc.

8. Have they not seen the powerful vulture, p. 222 both cock and hen, close to the carcase, overturning and pecking at the stinking vehicle, the axle (i.e. life) being broken--they who, not comprehending the true nature of the body, commend it because they see it adorned with sandal powder and garlands?

9. The skulls of the dead appearing with deep and hollow eyes, that alarm the minds of those who see them, look at the living and working, will abundantly testify and say, Stand in the way of virtue, this is the nature of the body.

10. The whitened skull of the dead will correct the faults of the proud, alarming and mocking at them. Those whose faults are corrected by seeing the skulls, acknowledge that such is the quality of the body; they will not therefore be anxious to hold themselves as things that have any real existence.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 6 - Asceticism

1. Like as when a lamp is brought into a room darkness disappears, so sin cannot stand before the effects of former good deeds. And like as darkness approaches and spreads over the room when the oil in the lamp is decreasing, so when the effect of the good deeds is exhausted, the effect of evil deeds will take its place.

2. Those who are preëminent in learning, knowing that youth is unstable and that sickness, old age, and death are certainties, perform their duty now. There are no men so foolish as those, or fools so foolish as those who rave about the indestructible treatises of grammar and astrology.

3. Those who are greatly wise, seeing that, on careful examination, all such things as youth, complexion, form, dignity, and strength, are unstable, will without delay endeavour to save themselves by becoming ascetics.

4. The poor, though they endure many days' affliction, will desire one day's pleasure; the self-controlled, knowing the changeableness of domestic happiness, and having regard to its attendant misery, have renounced the domestic state.

5. Youth is gone in vain, and now old age with sickness comes. Therefore, oh my soul! take courage and rise up with me without hesitation--wilt thou not go? Let us walk in the way of asceticism or virtue.

6. Since it is a hard thing for a husband to part with his wife, though she may neither have borne children, nor have a good disposition,-- therefore on account of the misery which matrimony causes, the wise have long ago called it kerdy,-- that is, the thing to be eschewed.

7. Those earnest men who, when troubles hard to be borne and enough to prostrate the mind come upon them, to frustrate the austerities which they have resolutely undertaken, put them aside, and, confining themselves steadfastly, observe their rules, are ascetics indeed.

8. It is the duty of the excellent not only to forgive despite, but also to pity those who, on account of the despite they have done them, will in the next birth fall into the fire of hell.

9. He who has power to observe the rule of virtue which he has laid down, and to keep himself undisturbed by the five organs of sense from which arise lust and desire--or the body, mouth, nose, ears, and eyes--shall unflinching obtain beatitude.

10. The mean, though they see afflictions come thronging upon them, never think of asceticism, and long only for gratification; but the excellent, though pleasures come crowding in; upon them, having regard to their attendant miseries, cherish not the desire of any pleasure.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 7 - Placidity

1. Let the respectful honour, and let despising trampers trample: good is the freedom from abusive anger in those who know that all is as the treading of a fly upon their heads.

2. Will those renounce their precious life of indestructible excellence, not caring to preserve it when they find any cause of offence (or when their penance is hindered), who, not removing from the place in which they stand, are able perseveringly to complete their penance, even when they experience great reproach.

3. As the angry words which a man speaks, opening his mouth unguardedly, continually burn him, so those who possess that knowledge which arises from oral instruction and incessant search after truth will never be angry and utter burning words of fury.

4. The excellent will not be hot and angry when their inferiors oppose them and utter bad words. The base, turning it over in their minds will speak of it and chafe in the hearing of everybody in the place, and jump with rage and knock their heads against a post.

5. The self-control exhibited by youth is self-control indeed. Liberality manifested by one p. 223 who has no increasing riches is liberality that is profitable for all things. The patience shown by one who has the power and ability to oppress others is patience indeed.

6. They who are noble will, in the sight of all men, take patiently and regret the evil words that issue from the mouth of the vulgar like stones that are thrown, being influenced by the consideration of their high birth, as the cobra quickly closes its hood when ashes are thrown upon it.

7. To be unresisting to those who would oppose them as enemies, the wise call not imbecility. When others have impatiently opposed them and done them evil, it is good if they do not evil in return.

8. The wrath of the vulgar will continue to spread though it run on a long time; the anger of the excellent in disposition will cool of itself, like the heat of boiling water.

9. Having done them a kindness they mind it not; do them never so much unkindness they will do what is kind; but to do unjustly, even through inadvertence, is not proper for those who are born in a high family.

10. There are none here who, though they see a dog snap angrily at them, will in return snap at the dog again with their mouth. When baseborn persons mischievously utter base things, will the noble repeat such words with the . . . [text missing] . . .

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 8 - Patience

1. Good lord of the cool hills festooned with springs! speak not at all with a fool. If a fool speak, he will speak only to injure you. To slip away from him, and to avoid him by any means in your power, is good.

2. When inferiors speak improper words, the patient hearing these words is patience indeed. The earth, surrounded with swelling waves, will not regard impatient behaviour as praiseworthy, but baseness only.

3. Will the hard words uttered (in reproof) by friends be more evil than the sweet words of strangers speaking with joy, O lord of the cool shore of the mighty ocean, where the beautiful winged insects turn over all the flowers, if they get men who understand the consequence thereof?

4. Knowing what ought to be known, and submitting thereunto, fearing what ought to be feared, performing every duty so as to satisfy the world, and living in the enjoyment of pleasure according to their means; they who are thus disposed never experience the evils of life.

5. When two persons are friends, mixing without variance, should there be misconduct on the part of one, let the other be patient, as far as he can bear it. If he cannot take it patiently, let him not speak evil, but withdraw to a distance.

6. Though another do one evil, if he say, Well, let it pass, and blame himself, it is good: To give up intimate associates, O lord of the forests! is hard even to brutes.

7. O king of the fair hills abounding with hollow-sounding streams! does not close intimacy with the great arise from the idea that they forgive the grievous faults that are committed against them? Will friends be wanting to them who do what is good?

8. Those who are gifted with patience, and who are not so rash as to destroy themselves though withered and famished with hunger, will not declare their misery to those who love them not. They will make it known only to those who have the power to help them.

9. Let pleasure alone, when thou canst enjoy it, if disgrace attends it, O Lord of the hill country abounding in waters! though pleasure only be constantly regarded, it is preferable to enjoy it in a harmless way.

10. Although he himself be ruined, let not a man think of injuring the worthy; let him not eat with whom he should not eat, even though the flesh of his body waste away; let him not speak words intermingled with falsehood, although he get the whole world canopied by the heavens for his reward.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 9 - Not coveting another's wife

1. Let not the modest man covet another's wife, since the fear attending that sin is great, the pleasure is of short duration, and if you daily reflect, it renders one liable to the punishment of death by the king, and it is a sin that daily leads men to hell.

2. To those who covet their neighbours' wives these four things,--virtue, praise, friendship, and dignity,--will not accrue. To those who covet their neighbours' wives these four things,--hatred, vengeance, and sin accompanied with fear,--will accrue.

3. What benefit arises from the shamelessly desiring one's neighbour's wife? Since in the going to her there is fear, in going away there is fear, in the enjoyment itself there is fear, in case the sin be not known there is fear,--it is always productive of fear.

4. Of what matter is that enjoyment, O wicked one, which you regard? Say. Since if you are discovered your family will be dishonoured, if you are caught your leg will be cut off; while in the act you are in dread, and it will cause ever-enduring anguish in hell.

5. Those who are destitute of everything that is good, and companions of the vile, have habitually sinned with damsels with mole-spotted breasts, and in a former birth have violated by force the wives of others, shall in the next birth be born hermaphrodites and live by dancing.

6. Why should he look with desire upon his neighbour's wife who, after inquiring about a propitious day, and having the drum beaten that all may know, has celebrated his marriage, who has a wife tender and loving in his own house, who then placed herself under his care?

7. The enjoyment of the man of unstable mind possessed with delusion, who desires and embraces the wife of his neighbour, while his neighbours reproach him and his relations fear and are troubled, is of the nature of that pleasure which is caused by licking a serpent's head.

8. Since the desire which arises in the minds of the wise increases not, nor shows itself (by actions), nor extends beyond their own family, the pain which it causes being very grievous, and they, fearing lest by it they should be put to shame before their foes, speak not of it at all. Therefore it dies away of itself in the mind.

9. An arrow, or fire, or the sun with shining beams, though they wound and burn, scorch only the body. But desire,--since it wounds, grieves, and burns the soul,--is much more to be feared than any of these things.

10. If he plunge overhead in the water, a man may escape from the fearful red flames which have sprung up in, and are ravaging a town. But though he plunge in many holy rivers, desire will still be unquenched; yea, though he live like an anchorite on the mountain top, it will still burn.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 10 - Liberality

1. To those men the gates of heaven shall never be closed, who with tender hearts and with a mind in accordance with their alms, greatly rejoicing, give even in poverty according to their ability, even as they did in the day of prosperity.

2. Before you is disgusting old age, and your dying day also: these are pains destructive of greatness. Run not vainly here and there. Covet not. Give alms, then eat. Hide not any of it when you possess wealth.

3. The wealth of him who in this birth wipes not away the tears of those who, trembling with poverty, betake themselves to him, by reason of his merit in a former birth, of not eating till he had given a portion to others, shall go on increasing while the time of increase lasts. But when the effect of these good deeds is exhausted, that wealth shall altogether leave him, let him hold it never so firmly.

4. Give what you are able, even though you have not the thousandth part of a measure of rice in the house, and then eat your meal; the wise call those in this birth wandering beggars whose chimneys smoke not in this earth, surrounded by the deep sea, who gave not alms in a former birth.

5. Let a man who regards both this world and the next, give what he can as he gets it; and if, through poverty, giving be impossible, to abstain from begging will be to give twice.

6. Those who give are like the female palm tree surrounded by the terrace in the midst of the village, they live beloved by many. Men who eat without giving to others, though their family be flourishing, are like the male palm in a burning-ground.

7. When the rain that should fall falls not, and when mankind omit to do the things they ought to do, O lord of the cool shore beaten by the waves where the Punnei-flower repels the noisome odour or the fish! in what way does the world get on!

8. Man's duty is to give to those who are unable to bear (their distresses), not driving them away, nor turning away from the extended hands, O lord of the cool shore of ocean, full of rivers! to give to those who will pay it back again--has the name of a loan at interest.

9. Not saying they have very little, not saying they have not anything, let them ever exercise fruitful charity to all. Like the pitcher of the mendicant who enters the house-door for alms, it will, in due course, gradually become full.

10. Those who are ten miles distant can hear the sound of the wide drum beaten with the stick; those a yojana distant, can hear the hoarse thunder; but all who live in the three worlds piled up will hear the report that some of the excellent have given alms.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 11 - The effect of actions done in a former birth

1. As a young calf when let loose among a number of cows naturally seeks out and attaches itself to its own mother, so does the act of a former state of existence seek out and attach itself to him who has performed it.

2. The prosperity of him who knows that beauty, youth, glittering wealth, and honour remain not stable in one birth to any one, and yet in one birth performs not a single good deed--has the nature of a thing that takes a body, remains for a time, and then utterly perishes.

3. There are none at all who are not anxious to acquire wealth. Each one's experience of happiness or misery is measured by the deeds of a former birth. None can make the wood-apple round, none can dye the Karla-fruit black.

4. To avoid those things which are to happen, or to detain those who are to depart, is alike impossible even to saints, even as there is none who can give rain out of season, or prevent its falling in season.

5. Those who were once in dignity as tall as the Palmyra, live on, daily losing their greatness, and becoming small as a grain of millet, hide within them their glory. On enquiry it will appear that that which has happened is nothing but the effect of deeds done in a former birth.

6. If you wish to know how it is that those perish, who know the benefits accruing from the sciences which they have acquired by oral instruction, while the unlearned prosper: it is because Yama looks upon the unlearned as refuse cane, since they are destitute, as to their minds, of the sap of knowledge, and therefore he cares not to take them away.

7. Behold all those whose bosoms are goaded by distress and who wander forlorn through the long streets, know--O lord of the cool shore of the billowy ocean where the playful swans tear in pieces the water-flowers!--that this proceeds from the acts of former births.

8. When those who, besides being not ignorant, have learned that which they ought to know and do that which is blameable, O king of the cool shore of the broad ocean, where the lotus flings its odours to the winds! this proceeds from the acts they have formerly done.

9. All who dwell in the world surrounded by the surging ocean desire to be exempt from the afflictive effects of former evil deeds, and to experience the effect of former good deeds; but, whether men wish or do not wish, it is impossible p. 270 to prevent that from affecting them which is ordained to happen.

10. The effect of the act of former births does not fall below nor exceed its due proportion, nor doth it fail to come in its turn, neither does it assist out of season, but when it ought to be there it is. Of what use therefore is sorrow when it afflicts you?

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 12 - Truth

1. To say he has not that which he does not really possess is no harm to any one. It is the usage of the world. To lie standing or running, that the desire (of others) may fail, O thou who hast rows of bracelets! hath evil more than that of those who have destroyed a good thing done.

2. The excellent and the vile never change their respective natures: though a man should eat sugar it will not taste bitter, and though the gods themselves should eat of the Margosa fruit, it will still taste bitter.

3. In time of prosperity a man's near relations will be as numerous as the stars which sport over the sky. When any one is subjected to intolerable sorrow, O lord of the cool mountain! those who will say "We are related to him" are few indeed.

4. He who secures the middle one of these three things, virtue, wealth and happiness, which have a hold on men's minds in this faithless world, shall secure the other two also; whilst he who obtains not the middle one shall be afflicted like the tortoise put into the pot and boiled.

5. If it be the calf of a good cow, the heifer also will fetch a good price. Though they be unlearned, the words of the rich will pass current. Like ploughing when there is little moisture, touching the surface only, the words of the poor will go for nothing.

6. Although deeply instructed in the knowledge of truth, those who have not accustomed themselves to restraint can never be restrained. Thus, O large-eyed beauty! though the wild gourd be dressed with salt, ghee, milk, curds, and various condiments, its natural bitterness will never be removed.

7. O lord of the shores of the swelling ocean covered with forests, scented by the perfume of the Punnei flowers! since that which is fated to happen will happen, let persons never utter reproachful words behind the backs of those who revile them, but only before their faces.

8. Though cows be of different colours, the milk which the cows produce is not of different colours. Like milk, the fruit of virtue is of one nature, though virtue itself take many colours in this world, like the cows.

9. Has any one lived entirely without praise in the world? Has any one failed through exertion to prosper? Has any one died without being reproached? Has anyone, even to the end of his life, collected (what he deems) sufficient wealth? If you inquire, you will not find even one.

10. If they every way consider there is nothing else that goes with them but the actions they have done, there (in the other world) even the body which (here) they cherished and adorned is useless when death takes them away.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 13 - The fear of misconduct

1. A burning-ground is the proper place for the bodies of those who, though plunged in the sea of domestic cares, betake not themselves to asceticism as a refuge. The stomach of the possessors of little wisdom is a burning-place for beasts and birds without number, i.e. he eats them.

2. They should have their legs bound with iron, become slaves to their enemies, and go to the field of gloomy soil, who keep in a cage the partridge or the quail, which live in the woods resounding with the sound of winged insects.

3. He who in a former birth desiring crabs broke off their legs and ate them, when the effect of that sin shall take place, he shall wander about afflicted with leprosy, the palms of his hands excepted; all his fingers like Chank-shell beads will rot away.

4. Even such a thing as ghee when approached by the flame of fire will cause intolerable pain by fierce burning; of many bad actions will they become guilty who, though not crooked, become so, and associate with those who are bad.

5. Friendship with the wise will daily increase in regular gradation, like the crescent moon. Friendship with the base will daily decrease, like the full moon which rides through the sky.

6. Thinking them good thou didst associate with them. If in those with whom thou hast associated there be no good intent towards thee who hast associated with them. O thou who didst associate (with such)! listen: It is like a man opening a box believing that there is an unguent in it and seeing a snake inside.

7. O lord of the land resplendent with mountains on whose declivities geni abound! since a man's actions differ so much from his mind, who is there that is capable of searching out so as to understand the resources of another's mind?

8. O lord of the fair hills over which slowly roll streams that cast up gems! the great friendship of those who love with deceit, making a pretence of steadfast attachment but not loving with the heart, will only afflict the mind.

9. Like as when the glittering spear that he cast is caught by his enemy's hand, the thief's courage is destroyed, so since the gains of sin follow after and destroy the acquirer of these gains in two births, it is good to leave the ignorant altogether.

10. Wilt thou not cease to long for a family? How long wilt thou live in sorrow saying, It is for children? O my heart! there is no advantage that accrues to the soul except the good thou doest, though it be but little.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 14 - Learning

1. The beauty of the hair, and the beauty of the encircling garment, and the beauty of saffron is no beauty; the beauty of learning is (real) beauty, for it is decisive of our mental excellence.

2. Since learning even in this life will be beneficial, since when it is imparted to others it is not diminished, since it renders its possessors illustrious, since they who have it during life suffer no loss, we see no medicine like it which destroys delusion.

3. Wise people take the salt produced in a barren soil to be more valuable than the rice of a fertile soil. Though they be of the lowest station, people who have acquired learning will be put in the chief place.

4. From the place in which it is stored up it cannot be stolen. It can suffer no harm, though to that place fire should come. Though very glorious kings rage, they cannot sear it. Therefore wisdom, and nothing else, is what one who intends to lay up an inheritance for his children should acquire.

5. Learning has no bounds; the students' days are few. Would they calmly reflect, diseases are many. Let them carefully investigate and make themselves acquainted with those things which are essential, making a good choice like the swan, which drinks the milk and leaves the water.

6. They will not despise the boatman because he is at the lower end among the old castes. Lo, by his assistance they pass the river! And like this is getting advantage through the help of a man who has learned books.

7. Let me see whether the joy of associating with those who possess the qualities which are derived from indestructible ancient learning, who are without hatred and also very acute, be not as sweet as dwelling in Amravuti, the city of the gods, in the wide expanse of heaven.

8. Lord of the cool shore of the roaring ocean! the friendship of those who have acquired learning is like eating sugar-cane from the top (downwards). Attachment to those who are graceless and destitute of good qualities is like eating it from the root (upwards), having rejected the top.

9. Though unlearned, if they walk in the society of the learned they will daily acquire good understanding, as a new (earthen) vessel by contact with the bright-coloured Padiri flower gives (its scent) to the water itself.

10. If a man learn ever so much, instead of studying the books of wisdom, the reading of worldly books is all of the nature of mere noise: there are none who can discover from them the way to rid themselves of sorrow.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 15 - High Birth

1. A noble family will not decrease in (good) qualities, even when their clothes are torn and their body wasted. Even when trouble comes, upon him, will the lion devour the long grass?

2. Manliness, goodness, right conduct, these three belong to those who are born in a sky-touching family. But, O lord of the hill-country covered by the clouds which touch the sky! they fall not to the share of others, even though they have acquired great riches.

3. Rising from their seat and going to meet (a stranger), leaving others, these the high-born have assumed as their unflinching rule of conduct. It is not their nature to be reckoned one with the mean.

4. If he do good things, it is conformable to (his) nature; if bad, it will be a fault despicable in the eyes of many; and in this case what is the profit to him of being born in a family known to all?

5. (To those born in a good family) there is fear of ignorance, fear of doing the deeds of the base, fear that anything which ought not to be spoken may escape from them, fear of not giving anything to those who beg for all. Brutish are they who are born in a family destitute of these graces.

6. Goodness of relatives, pleasant words, liberality, and every other good quality of the mind, all these, O lord of the cool shore of the roaring ocean, where the large gems and pearls shed their lustre! meet in those who are born in a good family.

7. Though the building be decayed, and the white ants have collected together, a large house may nevertheless have a wing not fallen. So those who are born in a high family, even when they suffer distress, will do the things they ought to do.

8. Like the moon, which enlightens the beautiful wide and extended earth on one side, though the serpent (athishesha) hold it in the other, those who are born in a good family will not slacken in well-doing, though poverty be against them.

9. The things which even in poverty those will do who are born in a high family, the vulgar will not do, even though they be rich. The deer, though it should be harnessed (for war), is not strong enough to fight like the charger.

10. The high-born, even when they have not anything, will approach those who are in want, and be a prop when they totter. When the broad river (bed) is dug up, though it be dry, yet clear water will soon appear.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 16 - The Good

1. The moon, which sheds its beams abroad over the beautiful and wide-spread sky, and the good, are like each other. But the moon bears spots, the good bear them not. They would be confused and waste away should a blemish befall them.

THE GRAND BIBLE

2. Whether successful or otherwise, the good will be held blameless. Is the dart which glanced from the lion inferior to the arrow that pierced the heart of the jackal?

3. The good, though they be poor and emaciated, will not guiltily ascend and rise over the bounds (of duty); binding their courage, as much as in them lies, with the cords of a mind free from anxiety, they will do the things that ought to be done.

4. The good, though they should meet with a person in the way, only for one day, will cleave to him with affection, as if (there subsisted between them) an ancient friendship. O lord of the goodly hills! a path will be made even upon a rock if one walk upon it for a few days.

5. If an unlearned person in the assembly speak what is destitute of meaning, like unconnected letters, the good will listen kindly, though with pain, even feeling pity that he should be put to shame before a multitude.

6. Though you bite the sugar-cane, or take its juice by beating and bruising it till the joints be broken, it will only be pleasant as far as it is tasted. Though people abuse them injuriously, the highborn will not speak faultily with the mouth.

7. The faultless virtuous steal not, drink not spirits; these things the good reject and leave altogether. Neither do they mock or reproach others; though confused in speech they will not lie with their mouths; and though in declining circumstances, they grieve not about it.

8. If one be deaf to the secrets of others, blind to the wife of his neighbour though well acquainted with her excellencies, and dumb in calumniating others, to him it is not necessary to inculcate virtue.

9. When people go day after day to those who are destitute of good qualities, they will despise them as beggars. The excellent, whenever they see (such), will say (if they want anything). Well, and will do them honour.

10. The base will live in obsequious attendance on the rich. Is it not like falling in a cave full of everything, when thou hast fallen upon a good family?

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 17 - Against reproaching the great

1. O lord of the fair hill-land resounding with streams! we should not, thinking they will forgive us, do what is hateful to the guiltless, for none can remove their anger when once they are provoked.

2. What though those who know not good and right feelings obtain the privilege of associating without expense with those who cannot be approached though gold be offered to them, yet they do but vainly waste their time.

3. These two things, the esteeming of any person, or the depreciation of any person, fall within the province of the excellent (alone). Deeply learned sages regard as nothing the contempt or praise of those who know not how to conduct themselves aright.

4. Like as the golden-coloured serpent trembles, though in Patala, if he hear the sound of the fierce anger of the thunder in the heavens, so enemies, though they have shut themselves up in a fort difficult of access, will not be able to escape when the great are angry.

5. The estimation which they form (of others) who say, Ye know us not, there are none like us, is no true estimation. But the estimation formed by the excellent; who know what virtue is, and consider themselves as not to be at any one's beck and call, is a correct estimation.

6. O lord of the shore of the cool broad ocean! friendship with the mean, like the shadow of the morning, will continually decrease, while friendship with those who have long been famous will increase more and more, like the shadow of the afternoon.

7. Like as the cool budding umbrageous trees afford shelter alike to all who approach them, so the wealth of kings and the excellences of the beauty of women may be enjoyed by all who may venture to approach them, no worthiness being required at their hands.

8. Since separation even from those who possess not the power of investigating what they have, causes great and unceasing pain, O lord of the wide-spread, mighty, and exhaustless backwaters! the not contracting friendship with any one is a karor of times the best.

9. When the matter is spoken of, (it will be found) that with the excellent such days as these are not, viz. days which have not been spent in study, days in which the great have not been visited, or days in which alms have not been given according to ability.

10. The glory of the great consists in humility; the acquirements of the learned appear in his self-control. The rich are rich indeed if they remove the afflictions of their dependants, when acquainted with them.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 18 - Good Society

1. The habitual sins which they, contrary to right conduct, commit, associating in the time of ignorance with those who know the way of virtue, vanish as the dewdrops do from the blades of grass as soon as the sun has become hot.

2. Know ye the way of virtue. Fear ye death. Bear with the harsh words of others. Restrain deceitfulness. Hate ye the friendship of the wicked. Ever obtain instruction at the mouth of the great.

3. Since separations from friends, grievous disease, and death are close at hand to all who possess a body, let my soul unite with the truly learned, who are convinced that the metempsychosis, which commenced ages ago, is a great evil.

4. If one can obtain the privilege of living always with men of good disposition in friendship, who constantly perform acts of virtue through a succession of births, though that succession is affliction, no one will despise it when they have considered the matter.

5. The water that runs from the sink when it reaches great waters will become a Tirtha, even its name being changed. Thinking of this, even those who have not family greatness will stand as a rock associating: with the good, who have virtue and greatness.

6. Even the hare in the wide, beautiful, and sublime heavens, since it is seen in the moon with refulgent beams, will be adored (by men). And in like manner even those who are without any dignity (of their own), if they obtain the love of the good, who are as mountains of virtue, will have dignity.

7. Water when mixed with milk will become milk, not remaining water. Will it exhibit the appearance of water? In like manner, if you consider it, the meanness of the mean when united with the dignity of the excellent will utterly vanish.

8. The grass near the stump of the tree will not shake with the plough of the ploughman. Feeble though they be, the anger of enemies will not come on those who have joined the society of the good.

9. Like paddy multiplied through the goodness of the soil, persons will become good through the goodness of their respective families. Like the destruction of a good ship on the approach of a strong gale, goodness will be destroyed by bad company.

10. Though innocent in intention, persons will be despised on account of the (bad) company they have joined. In the forest both the scent-giving sandal and the teak tree will be burned when the brushwood, which has been cut, has caught fire.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 19 - Greatness

1. It is no longer in our power to give alms. Youth for ever has fled away. Those damsels who before loved us care no more for us; (therefore,) no longer desiring (to continue in) the domestic state, and renouncing the arbitrary desire of becoming great, this is now the one thing needful.

2. In the household state we have enjoyed pleasure, here we are rich. Fools so thinking, will behave inconsiderately. Those who understand the household state, that it, though seeming to last, lasts not, will never have sorrow.

3. Lay up seed for heaven without delusion of mind; and, void of all distress, enjoy life like the wise, maintaining your proper station, remembering always that there are various things that change their nature without efficient cause.

4. They say that in the time of drought the well of spring-water will preserve the inhabitants, though by drawing its water they subsist. So the duty of liberality is found with the great, even when in declining circumstances; with others, even when they are rich, it is rare.

5. As the river which springs up in the place where they dug for a spring, even when it is dry, yielding much water supports the people, (the great) even when exhausted and wasted by giving of their riches to many, will do the things they ought to do, giving to a few.

6. O lord of the mighty mountains! a crime committed by the worthy will appear like a brand-mark on a white ox. Though the base commit sins as heinous as that of killing an ox, no blot will appear upon those base ones, their guilt will be wholly invisible (being wholly guilt, and nothing else).

7. Connexion with those who are destitute of a disposition fitted to their mean condition, as far as it extends, will produce sorrow; while even enmity on the part of the excellent wise, who will not do what is wrong even in sport, will bring with it greatness.

8. Desire ye that honour should accrue to the good and merciful in disposition; alarm your enemies with terror, enough to alarm Yama himself. Decide then who endeavour to deceive you, and render unto the good their just measure of beneficence.

9. Those who are imperturbable and without any change of mind, even though they be confused by any one hastening and uttering evil calumny, are truly pure-minded, like the bright light in a lamp.

10. The excellent expend the food first prepared in charity (or a first portion of food), and eat what food is left. That food will deliver the eater from these three crimes—lust, anger, and delusion, and will serve him in all his afflictions even to the end.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 20 - Perseverance

1. Let those branches of a family who subsist on what their relations give them, like the rice-plants nourished beneath the bank of a tank which holds but little water, perish. Is want known by those persevering people who (constantly) change their position, like the eye of the juggler watching the motion of the sword?

2. Even that which stood a trembling stick by the wayside, when it has acquired strength, may become fit for a post to tie an elephant to. Life also is similar to this if a man free himself from a base nature.

3. The strong tiger, if it be without prey for a single day, will even catch a small frog and eat it. Do not despise small things; even great matters will become greater by exertion.

4. O lord of the cool shore of the breakwaters, where the waves dash against the calderia bushes! though a person think within himself that the matter will not succeed, yet, if he still go on with it, and unwaveringly labour, this is perseverance. When all things around them are prosperous, will not even women succeed in their undertakings?

5. There is neither limit nor use in talking thus. He is of low-caste, and, He is of good caste. Good caste is constituted by those things alone, viz. ancient, glorious, and resplendent wealth; penance; learning and perseverance.

6. The wise, who know their own ability (to complete a work), until it is completed keep their knowledge to themselves, and speak not of it to others. The world lies at the beck of those men, illustrious ill wisdom, who can ascertain by the expression (of their faces) the ability of others.

7. The hanging root supports the banyan-tree like a son, when it is eaten away by white ants. Even so if imbecility appear in the father, it will not be apparent when the son he begat conceals it.

8. Though they should die meanly, not having anything in their house, will they do things fitted to bring down disgrace upon their own heads who have the strength of the lion possessed of powerful paw and sharp claws, which make sore the livid face of the elephant?

9. The hair-like, round-stalked flower produced by the sugar-cane is destitute of sweet honey and fragrant odour. Even so, what will be the good of being born in a high and lofty family, if there be no manly courage to carve out for one's self a name?

10. The base will eat the curry and boiled rice given with much pleasure by the great and rich. Even water procured by the earnest perseverance of those who do not know the name of curry will be as ambrosia.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 21 - The union of relations

1. As a mother forgets the pain and trouble she suffered during pregnancy and childbirth when she sees her infant in her lap, so the distress a man suffers from poverty and other misfortune disappears when he sees his relatives inquiring for him.

2. Supporting his relatives without partiality (like a tree which gives shade to all those who approach it at the time when the hot season is nigh), taking pains himself that many may eat the fruit of these exertions, is like a tree whose fruit is ripe. So to live is the duty of a good man.

3. Lord of the piled-up hills! the great will not say of their relatives; We cannot bear them. Though very many large unripe fruits be produced (upon a tree) very closely, there is not one branch which does not bear its (share of the) fruit.

4. Though they contract very close friendship in the sight of the world, yet the friendship of the base will not endure; (while) the amity of the stable-minded will be as enduring as the perseverance of the unswerving great, (which endures) till they have realized their hopes of heaven.

5. Those who, making no distinctions between persons and conditions, relatives and strangers, actuated by their natural feelings alone, seek all who are in poverty or affliction and relieve their distress, will be regarded by every one as preëminently worthy.

6. It is sweeter to take a heap of grass-seed without salt, and in any kind of dish, in the house of a relative dear as life, than to eat on a golden dish rice white as the tiger's claws, and mixed with sugar and milk from the hands of an enemy.

7. The desirable fried curry of politeness, though had at due-time in the house of those who are not one's friends, will be (bitter) as margosa-seed. Hear, A curry of vegetables, though served up at sunset, by those who are relatives, is pleasant.

8. Even those who have been pleasantly entertained by another as frequently as a hammer strike the anvil, will forsake him, just as the tongs leave the iron in the forge; but those who are truly worthy of being called friends will adhere to him in distress, as the rod by which it is turned adheres to the metal in the furnace.

9. O thou who art adorned by a cool and fragrant garland! when relations have partaken of the prosperity of their relatives, if they partake not also of their adversity until death, is there anything they can do for them in the other world?

10. Delicious curry (yellow as the cat's eye), when eaten alone in the house of those who love us not, will be as the margosa. When living in the house of those who are like us and love us, cold water and grass-seed will be as nectar.

THE GRAND BIBLE

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 22 - The choice of friends

1. Friendship with the wise, whose intelligence divines our thoughts, is like eating a sugar-cane from the top (as its sweetness increases more and more); connexion with persons without sweetness of disposition is like eating it from the opposite end (the flavour decreasing by degrees).

2. Some accept (the highborn as friends) merely on the ground that such, remembering their high birth, will not act inconsistently—not, O lord of the fair hills, from which the birds flee on the approach of the gold-coloured torrent! because the minds of such are known.

3. Avoiding the friendship of those who resemble elephants, seek the friendship of those who resemble dogs; for an elephant will kill his driver whom he has known for a long time, but a dog will wag his tail while the spear thrown at him is still in his body.

4. Men cleave not to those to whom their hearts cleave not, within a short space of time; but will the friendship which cherishes the memory of those who are intertwined with one's heart be abandoned, though they are absent from us for a long time?

5. When affection continues affection, then is friendship preserved, like the flower on the stalk, which, being full-blown, closes not again. Those who resemble the lotus, which, having once blown, closes again its petals, know neither affection nor friendship.

6. Those who are at the bottom in (the scale of) friendship are like the areca-tree; those others who are in the middle are like the cocoanut-tree. The friendship of those who have experience of, the past is like the palmyra-tree, (whose uses are) difficult to reckon. Such are at the top (in the scale).

7. Even vegetable curry served in the water that rice has been boiled in will be as nectar if a man accept it kindly. To eat the abundance of the unfriendly, though it be white rice flavoured with meat and rich seasoning is (to eat) the kanjira-fruit.

8. Though they adhere to one in friendship as closely as the small toes of a dog to one another, yet of what benefit is the love of those who do not help one even to the extent of the leg of a fly? Therefore, though the friendship of those who, like the channel which fructifies the rice-field, be ever so far away, we must nevertheless go to obtain it.

9. It is better to be without the love of those who are without sincerity. Death is preferable to an incurable disease. To kill him at once is more desirable than to vex a man so that he becomes sore at heart, and to abuse is better than to praise one for that which we do not possess.

10. To join oneself to many, and strive many days and examine dispositions, and take (for friends) those who are worthy, is proper. Even with a deadly serpent, to associate and afterwards to part from it will be painful.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 23 - The bearing with the faults of others

1. When those we love greatly, and esteem as virtuous, prove otherwise, this ought carefully to be concealed, for rice in the grain has a husk, water, foam, and flowers some unseemly leaves.

2. Though it burst the bank whenever they would stop it, they will not be angry with good water. Those who live desiring good water will repeatedly draw it up. Men will not be angry, but be patient concerning the friendship of those whom they themselves have courted, though these persons act towards them with constant hate.

3. Though they do evil exceedingly, is it not fitting to be patient with one's friend? O lord of the lofty hills where the beautiful winged insects hum over the variegated konju-flowers! the forbearance of one is the friendship of both.

4. O lord of the wave-resounding shore where bright-rayed pearls are thrown up by the rolling billows, and where float swift-sailing ships! if friends from whom it is difficult to separate, possess not virtuous dispositions, they are as a fire kindled to burn our hearts.

5. Even though they do what is disagreeable, one should preserve as gold those who ought not to be forsaken. Daily do men seek for fire and keep it in their house, though it has consumed both their good house and gold.

6. Is it right utterly to abandon friends, who ought not to be forsaken though guilty of evil deeds? O lord of the renowned mountains, which, covered by the long-stemmed bamboo, pierce the sky! will men cut off their hand because it has struck the eye?

7. Lord of the cool land where the waters brightly shine! the good will not look upon the faults of others after mixing with them (in friendship), though they act disagreeably. Persons destitute of strength of mind who take up evil things and speak of them after mixing (in friendship), are themselves inferior to those of whom they speak.

8. In a thing done by strangers, though in itself exceeding bad, what is there fitted to give pain? Considered rightly, it is the acts of those who are affectionately attached; which, O lord of the land where the waterfalls murmur! will be esteemed excellent, abiding in the mind.

9. If persons become aware that those whom they have taken into friendship, supposing them to be their friends, are not their friends, let them nevertheless esteem them better than their friends, and conceal the discovery in their own breasts.

10. If after contracting a firm friendship with any one, I set myself to note his good and bad qualities, may I be cast into the hell where the traitor who discovers the secrets of his friend is punished, and may I be scoffed at by the whole world!

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 24 - Improper Friendship

1. O lord of the fair and well-watered mountains, where abundance of cascades fall down from the black crags! men will remain until they have done their work in an old house the thatch of which is untied, keeping out the water by a dam, and being drenched with the rain falling down upon them. Thus will friends! remain with one until their business is finished.

2. The friendship of illustrious men is eminently valuable, and is productive of benefit as timely rain. But the Friendship of the mean, even in the time of their prosperity, resembles, O lord of the land of clear water! the failure of rain in its due season.

3. The enjoyment of the friendship of men of acute understanding is desirable as the joys of heaven. But connexion with unprofitable men uninstructed in science and literature is a very hell.

4. Our intimacy with those to whom we are not bound by the chain of friendship, O king of the hills, the sides of which are covered with groves of tall sandal-trees! though it seem day by day to increase, will be dissolved as instantaneously as fire catches straw.

5. The presumptuously saying, We are those who will do what should not be done, and the deferring and putting aside that which ought to be done at once, verily these two things will cause affliction instantly, even to ascetics, who have renounced the pleasures of the domestic state.

6. Though born in the same pool and grown up together, the ambel-flower will never be like the expanded kuverlei. The actions of those who are destitute of excellence, though they obtain the friendship of people of high excellence, will never attain the actions of such persons.

7. A little monkey breaking into a fruit with its finger, will strike and seize its own father, though coming to meet it. Lord of the hills! the friendship of those who are without unity (of mind) is not pleasant.

8. If I stretch not out my hand and deliver my whole soul without hesitation to my friend who is in distress, may I be cast into the hell where the wretch is punished who has violated the chaste wife of his friend, and may I be scoffed at throughout the far-famed earth!

9. Like pouring margosa-oil into a pot into which ghee has been poured and taken out again, O lord of the fragrant and goodly mountains! is the acquisition of the favour of those who are acquainted with evil, after the renunciation of the favour of those who are acquainted with good.

10. The absence of benevolence of disposition in him whose form is beautiful is like water mixed with milk, that is pleasant to drink. For those who are wise, to become companions of the wicked is like the naga playing with the female cobra.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 25 - The possession of understanding

1. When the excellent behold their enemies in adverse circumstances, being themselves confused on that account, they will not come near to invade them. In like manner the invincible and mighty serpent (Rhagu) will not draw near to afflict the moon in her first quarter.

2. Lord of the cool shore of the broad ocean! self-control is the ornament of the poor. Should they behave without respect and without any measure of propriety, their lineage will be published by (the inhabitants of) the village they live in.

3. Let the seed of the wormwood be sown in the best of soils, it will never become a cocoanut-tree. So even the Southern (Yama's subjects) have, by performing acts of virtue, attained heaven; while the Northern, having derived no advantage from their privileges, very many of them have perished. A happy new birth depends upon a person's virtuous conduct.

4. Though the fruit of the plantain be ripened in the bitter season of the margosa, it will not lose its sweetness. Thus, although those who are naturally good, associate with the bad, their friendship with them will not corrupt their minds.

5. Sweet water may be produced even on the brink of the sea-shore, and salt water on the side of a mountain. O lord of the cool shore washed by the waves of the ocean! it is truly said that sensible men will not imitate those with whom they consort, but will preserve their own minds.

6. O lord of the cool shore of the ocean where the thick-bowed punnei-trees flourish! will those who are virtuous and impartial towards all, first contract and then dissolve friendship? (Sooner) than this, it is better that friendship should never be contracted.

7. To be united in friendship with the prudent, who think of that of which they ought to think, is productive of the highest felicity, and affliction is avoided by separating from fools, who know not what belongs to friendship.

8. Whether an individual establish himself in a good situation, or whether, spoiling that condition, he debase himself, or whether he exalt himself to a much higher condition, or whether he make himself superior to all, he does so entirely by his own exertions.

9. In the way of business, even for the great to follow after the ignorant is not folly, but wisdom, O nobly-born king of the cool shore resounding with ocean-waves!

10. Having undertaken a profitable business, having experienced enjoyment, having performed acts of charity to the excellent! if any one in any one birth is able to do all this, such a consummation may well be compared to a merchant-ship that has reached her port.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 26 - The want of understanding

1. Poverty consists in the being destitute of accurate learning. Great wealth, which has been accumulated by acquisition, consists in the possession of that learning. Will not the hermaphrodite, who is destitute of manliness, adorn itself with every jewel which is desirable in its eyes?

2. Would you know why affliction and loss of dignity befall those who know the benefits of knowledge derived from many books? It is this: when Sarasvati, of ancient renown, takes up her abode with them, Lakshmi, being coy, will flee away.

3. He that receives not, but despises as mere talk the command of his father to study, on a letter being gently held out to him in the presence of many, calls out to the person who presented it and seizes the rod of offence.

4. If one who has grown up in ignorance enter the assembly of the excellent in learning, in the earth, and sits down, it will be like the sitting down of a dog; and though, not remaining quiet, he should say anything, it will be like the barking of a dog.

5. The vulgar will repair to the learned and speak of what they know nothing of; the good, though asked of all they know, display it not, knowing that it will be thrown away.

6. Those whose tongues are adorned with learning and knowledge fear the disgrace of evil speaking. The unwise indulge therein. Thus on the palm-tree the dry leaves maintain a perpetual rustling, whilst the green leaves make no noise.

7. When speaking of the way of virtue to those who comprehend not what is good, it is like pressing the sweet mango into a bowl of hogwash. Like a stick driven against a rock,—the point is broken, it will not enter in at the ear.

8. Though they wash it with milk and put it to dry many days, charcoal has not the property of becoming white. Though they strike with a stick, and thrust too, understanding will not enter into the body void of virtue.

9. Like the fly, which batters on filth, instead of feasting on the sweet-smelling and (honey) dropping flower, so to those whose minds are inherently base, what pleasure is there in words that come from the mouth of the worthy, though clean and sweet as honey?

10. The acute and faultless instruction uttered by the wise, strikes on the mind of the mean without laying hold of it. A mean man will look on the face of one like himself, and with him hold converse.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 27 - Riches without goodness

1. The bat will not go to the rough-stemmed wood-apple tree, though near and fruitful. So the riches of those who, though they be very near to one, have no greatness of soul, have not the excellence of being considered as profitable.

2. Though there be handfuls of small buds on the milk-hedge, men will not put out their hand to gather them, for its flowers are not fit for wearing. (Even so,) the wise will not form friendship with the mean, though they have much wealth.

3. Though they live on the shore of the rolling ocean, they repair to the saltless well of a running spring and drink. Though wealthy men be nigh, they will go afar off and fix their desire upon the liberal.

4. In the seagirt earth merit is various. The sensible should be great. Those who are foolish, and are like unbeaten steel and the thorny brinjal, will flourish in silk and gay apparel.

5. If you ask what is the reason why, while the good and just are in poverty, the unjust and unlearned are wealthy, O thou who hast eyes elongated like a lance! when one investigates the matter, it is nothing else but the effect of deeds done in, a former birth.

6. (O Lakshmi,) who like a golden image sits upon that fair flower whose leaves are like scentless plates of gold, die and become ashes upon the ground! you connect yourself with the mean of all sorts, leaving the good who resemble gold.

7. O thou who hast eyes like a lance! is not shame attached to the poverty of the just? Is not the wealth of the miser like painters'-green? (i.e. it so cleaves to him that he will not give alms.) When thou hast investigated these two states thou wilt not approve or desire either of them.

8. Those who are honest (when they become poor), going to distant lands, and eating various kinds of food, will spend their days; while those who are dishonest (when they become poor) will sit in their houses and eat curry and rice while the perspiration streams from their bodies, and will not go to distant lands.

9. When the ear of the golden-red paddy is scorched, the heaven bright with lightning will vomit and pour forth (rain) in to the sea. The liberality of those who are simple, even when they are possessed of riches, is of like character.

10. Those are the senseless who, though they read, understand not. The sensible, though they read not, resemble the learned. Those who, though utterly poor, will not beg, are the truly rich. Even the rich are poor if they give not.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 28 - Illiberality

1. To give a part of their meal to the extent of their ability, both to the friendly and unfriendly, and after that to eat, is truly to eat a meal. To those who refuse their food to the needy, and so live and eat and pass on, the door of heaven will be closed.

2. Those who have, to the best of their ability, practised to any extent trifling acts of charity, will in another birth become great; while those who, when they have become wealthy, say, We will give alms some time or other, shall be punished and shall perish from all the sea-surrounded earth.

3. He who employs not his time in enjoying his property, or gives not of it to ascetics, but lays it up (like a miser)--at him, the foolish one, about to perish, his hoarded wealth shall mock, and the favour of the world shall mock.

4. The great wealth which the miserly-minded have attained, who neither know how to give it away nor to use it themselves, shall be like the beautiful damsels of a family, who when they have arrived at puberty are enjoyed by others; i.e. others than its owner shall enjoy it.

5. Though they live near the mighty ocean whose waters overflow, men look on the spring of a small well whose water is almost dried up and live. The poverty of the great is better than the riches of those who know not of the next birth.

6. If you ask why I say, It is mine, It is mine, concerning the property of that ignorant man who gives not to others, saying, It is mine, It is mine,--while it belongs to that wretched man he gives it not in alms, neither does he himself enjoy it, neither do I give it away in alms or enjoy it myself.

7. The poor are more exempt from trouble than the niggardly rich. They are exempt from the labour of guarding that wealth. They are exempt from the trouble of bringing it. They are exempt from the pain of having their hands bound. In many ways are they exempt from trouble.

8. While the property is his own, he gives it not away; when it becomes the property of his partners, they also give it not away in alms. If he gives it away before his death, the partners will find no fault with him; if after death they give it away, he will not find fault with them.

9. Comparing beggars to a calf, and benefactors to a cow, such a spontaneous benevolence is true benevolence. Forced charity is as when a cow will only give its milk when coerced by strong men, who push it about and apply various instruments to its limbs. Such benevolence is the mark of a base mind.

10. The seeking to accumulate wealth is a cause of vexation. The guarding that collected shining wealth causes vexation. Again, if any of that wealth which is so guarded be diminished, there is vexation. If it be lost, how great the vexation! Truly this said wealth is the very abode of vexation.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 29 - Poverty

1. Although a man live wearing a patched cloth round his loins, yet the possession of eight or ten pieces of money will gain him great honour among many persons. Those who have nothing at all, though born of a respectable family, are considered (by such) as more despicable than a dead carcass.

2. It is said that ghee is more subtle than water, and all know that smoke is more subtle than ghee. If you inquire, you will find that the afflicted mendicants will creep in through crevices through which even smoke cannot permeate.

3. O king of the woodlands where they chase the parent from the cultivated field with stones, where the Kantharla (November-flower plant) growing upon the mountains lofty and abounding with rocks, is out of flower the swarms of red-spotted winged insects will not even approach near it (to extract its honey): thus the destitute have no relations.

4. In the day of prosperity thousands are very slaves, as crows will collect together at the mangled carcass (i.e. the dead crow); but in the day when this is changed, like the insect (which wanders about for food), there is not one single person in the world who will ask you, Are you well?

5. O lord of the fair hills crowded together, where the streams fall upon the rocks and wash them! the high birth of those who are environed by poverty will disappear, their great dignity will disappear, and their illustrious learning will also disappear.

6. Scorn those who, though they live in the same town, give no alms to those who came to them tormented in mind by sharp hunger, and asking for somewhat with great desire. It would be far better to go away to some distant place and live as guests in other houses, than to remain fruitlessly spending their days in that place.

7. O thou who hast sharp teeth causing envy to the buds of the jessamine! those who are mendicants (or those who have the affliction of begging) will lose, together with their right-mindedness, abundant accurate learning, and all other good qualities which they may have at any time possessed.

8. It is better for him who once was charitable, i.e. who stood in the way of giving, but who now cannot give aught to beggars, to spend his life in the afflictive way of stretching out his hands for alms in every house in the far land to which he has gone, than to remain in his own land,--than living in his native town, standing in the way of poverty, trying to mend his circumstances.

9. When wealth has gone, in the time of adversity, the poor, with those arms once adorned with bracelets, bend the branches of trees, pluck off the leaves and eat them, using as a dish an earthen pot, and live on with discontented minds eating leaf-curry (or that which is (cooked) without salt.

10. O lord of the hill-country, cool and very beautiful and lofty, where the streams of water fall down (from the rocks)! the swarms of shining and beautiful winged beetles crowded with red spots crawl not on the branch which has ceased to blossom; in like manner the unfortunate have no friends.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 30 - Innocence

1. The minds of the honourable, when they see the disgraceful things or excesses perpetrated by the ignorant who rely upon their wealth, will burn in one compact flame as the fire burns the jungle on which it has seized.

2. The honourable, though they become through destitution mere bones and skin, will they follow those who are destitute of proper dispositions, to make known their afflictions to them? Or will they refrain from telling the trouble which they endure to the great (or wise), who are beforehand intuitively acquainted with them?

3. If it be that they are like those who say, as soon as others see their wives, Alas, the chastity of our wives is in danger! being afraid, place us outside and give us rice,--on this account forsake associating with the rich.

4. The estimation of the excellent will bestow on us good in this life. It will stand unwaveringly in the way of goodness, and it will afford benefits to be enjoyed in the next birth; That estimation is good indeed. O thou who sheddest a delicious scent from thy hair!

5. The excellent will not do the things which will bring upon them the effects of sin in another birth, or disgrace in this birth, though it should cost them their lives. Death will cause trouble for only a moment in one day; there is nothing like sin, which will cause grievous and long-enduring misery.

6. Among all those who live in this fertile and wide world, those who give not alms to others, amongst the rich, though exceeding rich, are poor indeed; while those who go not to beg alms of the rich, though they have become exceedingly poor, are indeed illustrious.

7. All who are in the lowest grade of virtue dread pinching hunger; all who are in the middle grade will fear affliction. O thou with long lance-shaped eyes, whose brows are spread like a bow on each side! the highest grade of all will fear the reproach uttered against them by others.

8. These are the good, these are the liberal givers, but they are now become poor. When the rich, thus reviling them, cast upon them a contemptuous smile, the minds of the eminently excellent will burn, like the fire in the smith's forge when excited by the bellows.

9. The shame which is caused by not giving alms to those who desire of us, is not modesty. Nor is the shame which one feels every day who flees from battle, modesty. But true modesty is that shame which will not suffer us to declare the wrongs inflicted on us by our enemies in the day of our distress.

10. The tiger of the forest having slain an elk, will not eat it, but will leave it if it fall on the left side. In like manner, could the excellent by a sacrifice of principle obtain all the wealth that exists under the wide-extended heavens, they would not even desire it.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 31 - Dread of mendicity

1. Will those who possess clear understanding follow after such men as constantly revile them, saying, These poor men will become rich through our means; they cannot acquire wealth of themselves?

2. Does not a man's death and his birth take place (frequently) in the twinkling of an eye? Is it, therefore, a reproach to a man if he starve and keep his integrity inviolate, rather than fill his stomach by the disgraceful practice of mendicity?

3. There are none who, using poverty as a pretext, venturing on beggary, do not go to others for assistance in the way of meanness. Will the excellent then go for alms to any others but to those who will embrace them and say, Come to my house and eat?

4. Though Lakshmi withdraw from them and God be angry, the excellent will not stand with bended neck before the ignorant who bury their money in the earth, and who contemplate not heavenly things with constant minds.

5. Living without begging from friends, strong in affection and who are like the apple of our eyes, who withhold not their assistance from us, is life indeed. Since one's mind melts with anguish when one reflects on a life of mendicity, what must their feelings be who receive alms!

6. Since it is a means of removing the affliction of poverty for one to beg for himself, then let affliction be my portion, and let precious wealth depart from me. Of what use is it for him to ask alms of his neighbour with a mind rocked with covetous desires and eyes dimmed with tears?

7. O lord of the mountains from whose sides fall streams which throw up gold! though a person be born again and again in the world who will not allow himself to reproach beggars, yet (so few are such persons) it must be said he belongs not to this world.

8. If a person being tormented with poverty, rejecting true wisdom and allowing ignorance to abide in his mind, goes to a person and says, Give me alms, and if the person so asked refuse to give, will he not die from very shame at that moment?

9. Is the gently walking in the way of asceticism more grievous than the saying to others, Give me at least something, thus debasing one's dignity of the custom of doing homage to others, to whom he has attached himself by making their acquaintance?

10. Let a person, on the ground of old acquaintance, do that benevolence which is fitting in the way of affection to others if they be unworthy of that benevolence. A fire unquenchable pressed down in their minds will consume them (till they perish).

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 32 - Experience in (conducting of) assemblies

1. Before the learned men who are confused in mind, who conduct themselves according to their so-called wisdom, smiting with their hands, reiterating again and again their foolish observations, and who disturb the proper order of the assembly, gently desist from uttering words of wisdom.

2. The eminently wise will not consort with the evil poet who comes into the assembly as if he were a learned man, reciting some poem of another's which he has learned; that evil poet entering into the assembly will reproach the people who are there, or if not, to disgrace them, will smite his own shoulder and rise up to commence strife.

3. There are many men who speak many words, who love to commence strife with others, esteeming their own words unanswerable (or overpowering in speech), who understand not how to argue convincingly with their opponents, and who know not (how to acknowledge themselves) beaten.

4. The simpleton, not being able to acquire any learning for himself, goes into the assembly of the learned, and reciting as his own a stanza which he has learned from some schoolboy, exposes thereby his own ignorance.

5. Those who rise up to show the wisdom or the power of their words, and consort with angry persons who, opposing others with wrathful minds, receive not what is truth, but contend alone for victory, like wild beasts, shall see their own teeth, like the seeds of the gourd, in their hands.

6. When the ignorant recite a poem without understanding its meaning, speak anger-exciting words, the excellent of imperishable renown, being greatly ashamed of them, will stand grieving much for her who bare them.

7. Science is easily acquired by all obedient students, like the shoulders of courtzeans who take all they can get. But the substance of acquired learning is as difficult to be understood as are the inward instructions of those courtzeans beautiful in body as flower-buds.

8. Those learned men who collect plenty of books bring them and fill up every room in their houses, and yet understand them not, are of one kind, while those learned men who both understand their purport and are able to explain them to others are of another kind.

9. O lord of the extended hills where the wild oxen resort in herds! Can the works of these persons be called excellent and faultless commentaries who construct them not in these four methods--concisely, copiously, catechetically, and paraphrastically?

10. Will those who are not born of a good family, no matter how much learning they have acquired, will they become sufficiently wise to pass over, without censuring, the faults which occur in the speech of others? The truly learned make as if they knew not the despicable learning of those who understand not their exposition of science.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 33 - Defective knowledge

1. The learned will esteem as precious the speech of those friends who declare to them the gracious way of wisdom. The base, who are esteemed as worthless, will abuse and revile them. The ladle appreciates not the flavour of the milk-porridge.

2. Though men destitute of rectitude listen to those who are destitute of envy, when they declare the way of virtue, yet they give no heed, just as the chakler's dog, which seizes and devours leather, knows not how to appreciate the taste of rice and milk.

3. Although they see by numerous examples the way by which their precious life may depart in the twinkling of an eye, yet they do not good even to the extent of a grain of millet. What does it matter whether such stupid, shameless (persons) live, or whether they die?

4. Since the days of life are few, and to our life there is no continuing stay, and since it is reviled (or contemned) by many, why should any one nourish fierce hatred in his heart in secret, and not be friendly with those he may meet.

6. If a person going before a public assembly abusively reproach another, and the reproached reviles not in turn but remains quiet, if the reviler thereafter live on and prosper, he will indeed be an object of astonishment to all (who see him).

6. The hard words, Get out and go away, will be uttered by the female slave in his own house, while she pushes him out, to him who, before old age comes upon him, perseveres not in performing deeds of virtue.

7. Men of small understanding fruitlessly spend their day of life; since they themselves enjoy not their wealth, they bestow no benefit on the good. They attain not the excellent way of life, which would be a strong fortress for them, and with confused minds do they rely on their wealth.

8. The foolish man who in the time of youth binds not up as a vitium the rice needful for the road on which he travels, but binds up his money (like an orange) and says, Hereafter we will do the requisite acts of charity,--when with the hand he makes a sign that he wishes a bag of gold to be brought, the relations will say he wants a sour wood-apple.

9. Men of small understanding who in time of adversity and dangerous sickness anxiously think of another world, in the time of prosperity think not of another birth, even to the extent of a grain of mustard-seed.

10. Alas! though men of defective understanding see Yama surrounding with his rope to take away those precious ones, immeasurably beloved, dear as their own lives, what is it? Though they have acquired these children, they think not of virtue, but fruitlessly waste their days of life.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 34 - Ignorance

1. The quality of those who greatly rejoice in the act of domestic joy in this life, while they continually behold Yama slaughtering their lives, even Yama the great and mighty in slaughter, is like that of a tortoise which its captors have put in a pot of water, while they kindle a fire (to boil it), which sports in the water, being ignorant of its real condition.

2. The quality of those who have resolved, saying, After we have performed all the duties incumbent upon us in the domestic state, we will learn the way of virtue, is like the speech of those who having gone down to the sea to bathe, said, We will begin to bathe as soon as the noise has altogether ceased.

3. The ignorance of the customs of the world anciently renowned, faultless and full of excellence, in one who has obtained without let or hindrance these five things,--caste, penance, learning, high birth, and preëminence, --is like rice-milk destitute of butter (therefore tasteless).

4. Though great stones do not understand the speech of men, yet since they do what is required of them, as standing, sitting, lying down, or moving, they are far more useful than a fool (as it is impossible to induce a fool to act as we wish him).

5. If a fool, when angry with others, with any cause for anger,--like one who supposes he has made an acquisition, without having really obtained anything--bewildered by passion, cannot crowd together abusive words, his tongue tingles all over.

6. The worthless friendships of those who say, We will make them our own, while they follow those who have no friendship for them, O lord of the sea-shore where the punnei with fair blossoms grows! is as it were losing one's arm in striking another with a stone.

7. As the ants without intermission walk round and round the outside of the pot in which there is butter, though it be impossible to get at it, so men of the world will never learn, but cleave to those rich men who never give them anything.

8. Will they not abhor the days of life who daily enjoy not good, who practise not virtue, who give not to the destitute, who enjoy not their own wives (but seek to dishonour others'), and who live not a life commended by others?

9. Friendship with those who say, We care not for their commendation, when those who love them praise them, and who are destitute of all tried good qualities, although by it one should be able to obtain the whole earth surrounded by the sea with rolling harsh-resounding waves, will be only affliction.

10. When a man's neighbours commend one on account of his learning, wide-extended fame, and high birth, he shall obtain glory. But if he himself speak of these things, his brother-in-law will mock him, saying, He is a lunatic who cannot be cured by any medicine.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 35 - Meanness

1. Though one every morning, as a necessary duty, put bruised grain into the mouth of the fowl, it desists not from turning up the dunghill; so though one explain books of science of great importance, yet the mean man will the more follow the path most agreeable to his mind.

2. When one proposes, saying, Let us go at once to the abode of the perfect, who have acquired learning which establishes the mind, the base will rise up and say, Let us go to sleep, or if not, they will say something else equally foolish and refuse to go altogether.

3. Though the excellent obtain great honour, they swerve not from their former disposition, but follow one line of conduct. O lord of the fair land of copious streams! though the base obtain great honour, they too alter not their line of conduct.

4. If one confer a benefit upon them even as small as a grain of millet, the excellent will consider it to be as large as a palmyra-tree. O lord of the fair land of sparkling steams! though a benefit as large as a palmyra be daily conferred upon him, the ignorant mean man has no gratitude (it is considered as no benefit at all by those who are ungrateful for the good done to them).

5. Though the dog be delicately nourished and fed from a golden dish, yet it will ever be earnestly looking out for the leavings of others. Thus the acts of the base-minded, though they are esteemed as honourable persons, will not correspond with their rank in life.

6. The worthy, though they have attained the wealth of the world, will at no time indulge in haughty speech, but if the mean have acquired the wealth of one cani (1/80 part) added to one muntheri (1/320) they will regard themselves as great as Indra king of heaven.

7. Though the shoe be wrought with excellent gems set in the purest gold, yet it is intended for the foot of its owner. In like manner, though the mean-minded be very rich, yet he will be found out by his deeds.

8. O lord of the fair and victorious land of mighty hills! the base man is mighty in speaking harsh words. He regards no one, laughs at the misery of others, grows more and more enraged and will continually reproach others.

9. O lord of the cool shores of the sea where the honey-producing Nay (a water-flower) grows, resounding with waves! if persons remain with them many days, the excellent will say, These are old friends, and will show kindness to them, whereas the base-minded will hate and revile them.

10. Though men take away the plucked-up grass from the bullock and give it to the heifer, and thus feed it up for many days, yet it will never be strong enough to be yoked to a cart. O king, hear! Though the base are very rich, yet their deeds will betray them.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 36 - Baseness or Envy

1. Those who have knowledge bound up in their minds, though young in years, watch over, keep, and restrain themselves. The ignorant, though old in years, go on obstinately practising evil deeds, and, like the reed, never lose their hollowness.

2. Though the frog dwells always in the beauteous and wide pool it never divests itself of its slime; and though those who have no sound knowledge learn faultless and illustrious sciences, yet they have not ability to understand them.

3. O good lord of the heaped-up mountain land! while it is indecorous to extol the good qualities of persons before their faces, what are those wretches' tongues made of, who, standing in the presence of those persons, declare their faults, for the purpose of destroying their reputation?

4. O beauteous and fair matron! women of high birth will not set off their beauty by ornaments as slave-girls. Courtesans who thus pride themselves on their dress will pass away (fruitlessly) or despised by all, just like the sudden swelling of a river, which soon passes off altogether.

5. Those mean persons are of the nature of the chisel, which without being struck will not even penetrate a tender leaf, though resting upon it; they will give nothing to the kind-hearted, but will give anything to those who employ force, if they meet them.

6. The mountaineer thinks of his mountains, the husbandman of his productive lands, the wise think of the special benefits they have received from others, and the fool thinks only of the abuse he has received.

7. For one good turn they have received from another the wise will endure a hundred evils afterwards inflicted. But if they have received a hundred good turns and have suffered only one evil turn, fools will consider the hundred good turns as evil.

8. The base in prosperity will not do these things which those who are of high birth will do even in adversity. Though one place rings (of gold) upon the tusks of a hog, O thou who hast eyes like a lance! it will never become a warlike elephant.

9. Many persons fade away like the lotus-leaf (having been obliged to alter their tone of speech) after they exultingly boasted of their intention to others, saying, To-day we will grow rich; yea, this very day we will grow rich; after a time we will grow rich.

10. The serdel-plant, though growing in water and green in colour, has no moisture in it. so the world has in it persons who are as useless as the great stony rocks, though they abound in great wealth.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 37 - Miscellanies

1. Though it be a building on which the clouds creep, a fort exceeding strong, shining; resplendent with the gems stored up in it, of what benefit is it? The house of him who has no beloved and excellent wife is to the view a dreadful forest.

2. Though they be guarded (as it were) with naked swords, with unrelaxing vigilance, should there be the smallest possible relaxation of that vigilance, the period will be short indeed before they begin to act ignominiously. And long indeed will that period last during which softly speaking females will not desire to return to proper conduct.

3. The woman who bold in opposition threatens blows is as death. She who resorts not to her kitchen betimes in the morning is an incurable disease, and she who gives grudgingly the food she has prepared is a household devil. Women of these three kinds are a destroying weapon to their husbands.

4. Though he is advised to eschew marriage, he eschews it not; though the sound of the dead-drum pierces his ear he heeds it not. Moreover the wise say that the delusion which leads him to think that matrimony is indeed a pleasant state is a crime worthy to be punished by stoning.

5. The highest grade of virtue is living in persevering austerities. The middle grade of virtue is living in marriage with wives who are dear to us. The lowest grade of all is, thinking that money does not come in fast enough, covetously to follow after and abide with those persons who know us not.

6. The chiefest of the learned are those who spend their time in learning many sciences. The next in rank are those who give to the worthy the goods acquired by merit in a former birth, and thus pass their time. The lowest of all are those who cannot sleep for envy, arising from the feeling that they have not fared luxuriously or obtained sufficient wealth.

7. As the fruitful shoot of the red-grained rice becomes afterwards itself red rice and flourishes, O lord of the city (Indra) surrounded by fruitful fields which are covered by red rice! in the same manner the learning of the father becomes the learning of the son.

8. The wealthy and the excellent perish, while the sons of concubines and the base wax great, the lower place becoming the upper place. Thus the world subsists, the lower part becoming the upper part of an umbrella.

9. O good lord of the victorious mountain-land where the falling streams sweep along gems! it were better that those who when they hear their dear friends declaring the affliction of their minds, have no desire to alleviate their sorrows, should die by casting themselves down from a mountain top than that they should live.

10. If we impartially examine the two things, it will be found that the inundation of the river and the love of beauteous and desirable courtesans are alike. If the rains fail, the inundation will cease; and if their lovers' money is expended, those courtesans' love for them will fail also.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 38 - Courtesans

1. If you impartially investigate the two things, it will be found that there is no difference between the shining light of a lamp and the love of courtesans. When the oil is exhausted, the light of the lamp vanishes, and when the money of their lovers is gone, their love also evaporates.

2. The fair and beautiful matron who is adorned with chosen jewels (a courtesan) said, I will go with you to the top of the mountain and cast myself down from it for your sake. But when he said, My money is gone, she came weeping, stating that her foot was painfully swollen and she could not go up the mountain, and left altogether.

3. Let them (i.e. their lovers) be even as fair as Indra the red-eyed, who is worshipped by the gods in the beauteous and wide-spread heavens,--courtesans, like freshly plucked mango-leaves, will politely dismiss them, and send them away as soon as their money is exhausted.

4. Those who have no property are as poison to the lotus-eyed beautiful courtesans, who are destitute of all goodness of mind; while those who in the sight of all have acquired their wealth by working the oil-mill will be as delicious as sugar.

5. (Only) those fools who like wild beasts will come near courtesans, who act as the vilanga-fish, which shows its one end to the shark and its other end to the fish in the clear pool, filled with honey-producing flowers.

6. If the golden-braceleted one who has affirmed, saying, As the perforated bead leaves not the thread on which it is strung, and as the andril-bird which never leaves its mate, I will never separate from you,--if she becomes, like the horn of the ram, turned away from its fellow, O my poor heart! will you still remain with her, or will you come away with me?

7. They shall be derided by many who are delighted with the love of courtesans (thinking that they are their friends), who, like the wild cow, lick the hands of men, at the same time poisoning them, and who are like the ghyal in jumping and running away when they have spoiled their lovers of their property, and yet imagine that they are their friends!

8. Courtesans rejoice and appear as friends while their lovers have aught to give; but when they have exhausted their wealth, then they show themselves as enemies and become (estranged from them), as the horn of a ram twisted from its fellow. Those who come not near the full-breasted courtesans whose eyes roll like the deer, yet leave not off their way of sin, may well say, We have attained the right way.

9. Those who imagine the beautiful courtesans who hide within them the disposition that will afterwards injure them, even when they speak lowly words in order to create confidence, and who, believing these words to be true; imagine them to be their friends, possess their own bodies for themselves alone, and not for any benefit to be done to others.

10. Even at the time when those who have bodies laden with sin have by inquiry found out all the crafty intentions which beautiful-browed courtesans whose minds are fixed upon others have conceived against them, they walk as though they knew them not.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 39 - Chaste Women

1. Though women be high in reputation and equal to the goddess Ayra in conjugal fidelity, they must carefully avoid those who love them, and follow them in hopes of gratification, for such caution is the safeguard of the virtue of matrons with perfumed foreheads.

2. If in time of distress, when the meal of the whole family is cooked by the water of a small pot, if a host of relatives sufficient to consume the water of the sea should come all at once, the softly-speaking woman, who shows herself as bounteous as the ocean, is the glory of her house.

3. Though her house be open on the four quarters, though it be exceedingly small, and though the rain pour in on every side, a chaste and virtuous woman will be honoured in the place where she resides, and her habitation respected.

4. She who is pleasing to the eye, who in all things gratifies her husband according to his desire, and at all times stands in awe of him, whose modesty is so conspicuous as to shame her sex, and in all her love-quarrels with him acts with such prudence that reconciliation affords him increased delight, this mildly-speaking matron is truly a woman.

5. Whenever our husbands embrace our shoulders, we feel ashamed as if we saw them for the first time. What pleasure, then, can these women enjoy who from the desire of money endure daily the embraces of many?

6. Riches in the possession of a generous man resemble in their effects the learning acquired by a man of great natural ability. The chastity of a modest woman is like a sharp sabre in the hands of a courageous man.

7. As if when we had by us red and black gram at the same rate of six measures for a fanam, his breast, which is like a hill, after having embraced many fair women altogether inferior to me, comes unwashed to embrace me also. My husband comes to embrace me with his unwashed breast like a hill, after having embraced the bosoms of fair-browed ones who are not like me.

8. O poet, speak not harshly to me! for if you so speak I shall be to my husband like the left side of the tambour, which gives no sound. Wherefore lift up thy feet and gently retire from me; speak to those (strange women) who are to him like the right side of the tambour, which gives forth sound.

9. I am she who was afflicted when flies flew around my husband, who possesses the cool field, where the reeds being plucked up, the waters shine. I am she who when sparks of fire fly about him and (courtesans) fight against it with their opposing breasts; still endure life, though I look upon his wide bosom adorned with sandal-powder.

10. O singer, utter not that gross falsehood, saying, He who wears a garland of buds loosely strung together will be kind to me. I am not dear to him, but am like the flower of the sugarcane (which is destitute of sweetness). Speak these words to them who are like the middle joints of the cane and sweet to him.

NALATIYAR CHAPTER 40 - De Amore [Of Love]

1. O lord of the cool shore of the wide-extended backwaters, whose pellucid waves dash along with unceasing noise! if one live not in matrimony the body will suffer in health. If there are no love-quarrels between man and wife, marriage will be tame indeed.

2. The sound of the approaching monsoon booming in every quarter of the heavens from the rain-fraught clouds is like that of the death-drum to a wife separated from her husband, for he promised to return before the rains set in. They are setting in, and therefore she fears that he is no more, or else he would have returned.

3. At eventide, when darkness prevents mechanics from distinguishing their tools, the wife will select blooming flowers, and after having strung them on a thread, will cast away the garland from her weeping, and will say, Of what use will this garland be to me, whose husband is absent?

4. Does not my wife, while reclining on her couch and counting with her taper fingers the days I had appointed for my absence, reproach me for my absence, while she wipes away one by one the tears which fall from her eyes, red with weeping as she beholds the setting sun?

5. The kingfisher, mistaking my wife's eyes for a gyal-fish, will fly after her, but when it sees her beautiful eyebrow it will forbear to strike, afraid and supposing it a bow.

6. When the henna-dyed cotton was applied to the foot of my daughter of beautiful form, and whose mouth is perfumed like the red lotus, she would say, Gently, gently, and withdraw her foot lest it should be hurt by the cotton. How then will that foot be able to travel the gravelly paths of the forest?

7. In the golden and ruddy-tinted eventide, when the sound of the stylus on the palm-leaves is hushed, the wife separated from her husband, while she thinks of his absence, will tear off her garland and cast it from her, wiping off the sandal paste which adorns her beautiful form.

8. O thou with shining bracelets! you asked me saying, Will you be able to follow him through the paths of the forest difficult to be traversed? As a person who has bought a horse immediately learns to ride, if I, did not previously know how to do so, so will I learn to follow him.

9. I understood not yesterday what she meant when she so closely embraced me [the... mother is speaking]. Now I do understand, what she meant, viz. that to-day she would leave me and follow her husband through the forest-paths by which the timid deer flee away from the tiger.

10. I upbraid not the three-eyed Siva, nor the crow, nor the hooded serpent,—they have not sinned against me. Nor do I upbraid my mother who bore me—O thou who hast breasts like the buds of the golden-coloured congon-flower! But I do complain of the path which has taken away my husband from me,—who, has left me for the sake of gain.

DRAVYASAMGRAHA

by Acarya Nemicandra,

Translation: Sarat Chandra Ghoshal, 1917

Estimated Range of Dating: 10 th century A.D.

(The Dravyasamgraha is a 10th century Jain work of Acarya Nemicandra (Also known as Nemicandra Siddhanta Cakravartin) that gives a lucid exposition of the six reals or substances as per the Jain cosmology: sentient (jīva), non-sentient (ajīva), principle of motion (dharma), of rest (adharma), space (akasa) and time (kala). A clear knowledge of what they are and their role in this universe is one of the prerequisites to enlightenment and ultimately to salvation, the reaching of which is the ultimate goal of any soul.)

1. I always salute with my head that eminent one among the great Jinās, who is worshipped by the host of Indras and who has described the Dravyas (substances) Jiva and Ajiva.

2. Jiva is characterized by upayoga, is formless and an agent, has the same extent at its own body, is the enjoyer (of the fruits of Karma), exists in samsara, is Siddha and has a characteristic upward motion.

3. According to Vyavahara Naya, that is called Jiva, which is possessed of four Pranas, viz., Indriya (the senses), Bal (force), Ayu (life) and Ana-prana (respiration) into the three periods of time (viz., the present, the past and the future), and according to Nischaya Naya that which has consciousness is called Jiva.

4. Upayoga is of two kinds, Darshana and Jnana. Darshana is of four kinds, Darshana is known to be (divided into) Chaksu, Achuksu; Avadhi and Kevala.

5. Jnana is of eight kinds, viz., Jnana and Ajnana of Mati, Sruta and Avadhi, manah-paryaya and Kevala. (It is also divided into Pratyaksha and Paroksa (from another point of view).

6. According to Vyavahara Naya, the general characteristics of Jiva are said to be eight kinds of Jnana and four kinds of Darshana. But according to Suddha Naya, (the characteristics of Jiva) are pure Jnana and Darshana.

7. According to Nischaya Naya, Jiva is without form; because the five kinds of colour and taste, two kinds of smell, and eight kinds of touch are not present in it. But according to Vyavahara Naya [Jiva] has form through the bondage [of Karma.]

8. According to Vyavahara Naya is the doer of the Pudgala Karmas. According to Nischaya Naya (Jiva is the doer of) Thought Karmas. According to Suddha Naya (Jiva is the doer) of Suddha Bhavas.

9. According to Vyavahara Naya, Jiva enjoys happiness and misery the fruits of Pudgala karmas, According to Nischaya Naya, Jiva has conscious Bhavas only.

10. According to Vyavahara Naya, the conscious Jiva, being without Samudghata, becomes equal in extent to a small or a large body, by contraction and expansion; but, according to Nischaya, Naya (it) is existent in innumerable Pradesas.

11. The earth, water, fire, air and plants are various kinds of Sthavara possessed of one sense. The Trasa Jivas, conches, etc., are possessed of two, three, four and five senses.

12. Jivas possessing five senses are known (to be divided into) those having mind and those without mind. All the rest are without mind. [Jivas] having one sense (are divided into two classes) Badara and Suksma. All (of these have again to varieties each) Paryapta and its opposite.

13. Again, according to impure (Vyavahara) Naya, Samsari Jivas are of fourteen kinds according to Margana and Gunasthana. But according to pure Naya, all Jivas should be understood to pure.

14. The Siddhas (or liberated Jivas) are void of karmas, possessed of eight qualities, slightly less than the final body, eternal, possessed of Utpada (rise) and Vyaya (fall), and existent at the summit of Loka.

15. Again, Ajivas should be known to be Pudgala, Dharma, Adharma, Akasa and Kala. Pudgala has form and the qualities, Rupa, etc. But the rest are without form.

16. Sound, union, fineness, grossness, shape, division, darkness and image, with lustre and heat (are) modifications of the substance (known as) Pudgala.

17. As water assists the movement of moving fish, so Dharma (assists the movement of moving) Pudgala and Jiva. (But) it does not move (Pudgala and Jiva which are) not moving.

18. As shadow (assists the staying of) the travellers, (so) Adharma assists the staying of the Pudgalas and Jivas which are stationary, But that (i.e. Adharma) does not hold back moving (Pudgalas and Jivas).

19. Know that which is capable of allowing space to Jiva etc. to be Akasa, according to Jainism Lokakasa and Alokakasa, thus (Akasa is) of two kinds.

20. Lokakasa is that in which Dharma, Adharma, Kala, Pudgala and Jiva exist. That which is beyond (this Lokakasa) is called Alokakasa.

21. Vyavahara Kala (Time from the ordinary point of view) is that which helps to produce changes in substances and which is known from modifications (produced in substances), while Parmarthika (i.e. real) Kala is understood from continuity.

22. Those innumerable substances which exist one by one in each Pradesa of Lokakasa, like heaps of jewels, are points of time.

23. In this manner this Dravya is said to be of six kinds, according to the subdivisions of Jiva and Ajiva. The five, without Kala, should be understood to be Astikayas.

24. As these exist, they are called "Asti" by the great Jinās, and because (they have) many Pradesas, like bodies, therefore (they are called) Kayas. (Hence these are called) Astikayas.

25. In Jiva and in Dharma and Adharma, the Pradesas are innumerable, in Akasa (The Pradesas are) infinite and in that which has form (viz., Pudgala) (these are) of three kinds, (viz., numerable, innumerable and infinite). Kala (Time) has one (Raradesha). Therefore it is not (called) Kaya.

26. An atom (of Pudgala), though having one Pradesa, becomes of many Pradesas, through being Pradesa in many Skandhas. For this reason, from the ordinary point of view, the omniscient ones call (it to be) Kaya.

27. Know that (to be) surely Pradesa which is obstructed by one indivisible atom of Pudgala and which can give space to all particles.

28. We shall describe briefly those varieties of Jiva and Ajiva also which are (known as) Asrava, Bandha, Samvara. Nirjara and Moksha with Punya and Papa.

29. That modification of the soul by which Karma gets into (it) is to be known as Bhavasrava, as told by the Jina, and the other (kind of Asrava) is the influx of Karma.

30. Then, it should be known that of the former (i.e., Bhavasrava) (the subdivisions are) Mithyatva, Avirati, Pramada, Yoga, Anger, etc., (which are again of) five, five fifteen, three and four classes, respectively.

31. That influx of mater which causes Jnanavaraniya etc., it to be known as Dravyasrava as called by the Jina and possessing many varieties.

32. That conscious state by which Karma is bound (with the soul) is called Bhava-bandha, while the interpenetration of the Pradesas of Karma and the soul is the other (i.e., Dravyabandha).

33. Bandha is of four kinds, according to the (subdivisions, viz.,) Prakriti, Sthiti, Anubhaga and Pradesa, Prakirti and Pradesa are (produced) from Yoga, but Sthiti and Anubhaga are from Kasaya.

34. That modification of consciousness which is the cause of checking Asrava (influx) of Karma, is surely Bhavasamvra, and the other (known as Dravyasamvra is known from) checking Dravyasrava.

35. That Vratas (Vows), Samitis (attitudes of carefulness), Guptis (Restraints), Dharmas (Observances), Anuprekasas (Meditations), Parisaha-jayas (the victories over troubles) and various kinds of Charitra (Conduct) are to be known as varieties of Bhava-samvara.

36. That Bhava (modification of the soul) by which the mater of Karma disappears in proper time after the fruits [of such Karma] are enjoyed [is called Bhava-Nirjara], also [the destruction of Karmic matter] through penances [is known as Bhava-Nirjara.] And that destruction [itself] [is known as Dravya-Nirjara] Thus Nirjara should be known of two kinds.

37. That modification of the soul which is the cause of the destruction of all Karmas, is surely to be known as Bhava-moksha and (actual) separation of the Karmas [is] Dravya-moksha.

38. The Jivas consist of Punya and Papa surely having auspicious and inauspicious Bhavas (respectively). Punya is Satavedaniya, auspicious life, name and class, while Papa is (exactly) the opposite (of these).

39. Know that from the ordinary point of view, perfect faith, knowledge and conduct are the cause of liberation, while really one's own soul consisting of these three (is the cause of liberation).

40. The three jewels (i.e., Perfect Faith, Perfect Knowledge and Perfect Conduct) do not exist in any other substance excepting the soul. Therefore, the soul surely is the cause of liberation.

41. Samyaktva (perfect faith) is the belief in Jiva, etc. That is a quality of the soul, and when this arises, Jnana (knowledge), being free from errors, surely becomes perfect.

42. Samyak Jnana (Perfect Knowledge) is the detailed cognition of the real nature of the ego and non-ego, is freed from Samsaya (Doubt), Vimoha (Perversity) and Vibhrama (Indefiniteness), and is of many varieties.

43. That perception of the generalities of things without particularities in which there is no grasping of details, is called Darsana in (Jaina) scriptures.

44. In Samsati Jivas, Jnana is preceded by Darshana. For this reason [in him], the two Upayogas (viz. Jnana and Darshana) do not (arise) simultaneously. But in Kevalis, both of these two (arise) simultaneously.

45. Know Charitra to be refraining from what is harmful and engagement in what is beneficial. But according to Vyavahara Naya, Charitra (Conduct) has been mentioned by the Jina to consist of Vrata, Samiti and Gupta.

46. That checking of external and internal actions by one who has knowledge, in order to destroy the causes of Samsara, is the excellent samyak Charitra (Perfect Conduct) mentioned by the Jina.

47. Because by the rule a sage gets both the (Vyavahara and Nischaya) causes of liberation by meditation, therefore (all of) you practise meditation with careful mind.

48. If you wish to have your mind fixed in order to succeed in various kinds of meditation, do not be deluded by or attached to beneficial objects and do not be averse to harmful objects.

49. Repeat and meditate on (the Mantras), signifying the Paramesthis and consisting of thirty-five, sixteen, six, five four, two and one (letter) and other (mantras) taught by the Guru (preceptor).

50. That pure soul existing in an auspicious body, possessed of (infinite) faith, happiness, knowledge and power which has destroyed the four Ghatiya Karmas, is to be meditated on as an Arhat.

51. Meditate on the Siddha - the soul which is bereft of the bodies produced by eight kinds of Karmas, which is the seer and knower of Loka and Aloka, which has a shape like a human being and which stays at the summit of the universe.

52. That sage who attaches himself and others to the practice of Virya (Power), Charitra (Conduct) and Tapa (Penance) in which faith and knowledge are eminent is to be meditated as Acharya (Preceptor).

53. That being, the greatest of the great sages who being possessed of the three jewels, is always engaged in preaching the religious truths, is (known as) Upadhyaya (Teacher). Salutation to him.

54. That sage who practices well conduct which is always pure and which is the path of liberation with perfect faith and knowledge is a Sadhu. Obeisance to him.

55. When a Sadhu attaining concentration becomes void of conscious effort by meditation on anything whatever, that state is called real meditation.

56. Do not act, do not talk do not think, so that the soul may be attached to and fixed in itself. This only is excellent meditation.

57. As a should which (practises) penances, (holds) vows and (has knowledge of) scriptures, becomes capable of holding the axle of the chariot of meditation, so to attain that (meditation) be always engaged in these three (i.e. penances, vows and Sastras).

58. Let the great sages, full of the (knowledge) of Sastras and freed from the collection of faults, correct this Dravya-samgraha which is spoken by the sage Nemichandra who has little (knowledge) of the Sastras.

(PROLOGUE:

Ashoka, sometimes Ashoka the Great, was an Indian emperor of the Maurya Dynasty, who ruled almost all of the Indian subcontinent from c. 269 to 232 BC. He was a grandson of the founder of the Maurya Dynasty, Chandragupta Maurya. Emperor Ashoka wanted to spread of Buddhism as the unifying belief system of his Indian empire. Considered to be one of India's greatest emperors, Ashoka expanded Chandragupta's empire to reign over a realm stretching from present-day Afghanistan in the west to Bangladesh in the east. It covered the entire Indian subcontinent except for parts of present-day Tamil Nadu, Karnataka and Kerala. The empire's capital was Pataliputra (in Magadha, present-day Patna), with provincial capitals at Taxila and Ujjain.

Emperor Ashoka's story of conversion to Buddhism goes like this: Ashoka waged a destructive war against the state of Kalinga (modern Odisha), which he conquered in about 260 BC. In about 263 BC, he converted to Buddhism after witnessing the mass deaths of the Kalinga War, which he had waged out of a desire for conquest and which reportedly directly resulted in more than 100,000 deaths and 150,000 deportations.

Ashoka is remembered for the inscriptions (called "edicts") on rocks and pillars, for sending Buddhist monks to Sri Lanka and Central Asia, and for establishing monuments marking several significant sites in the life of Gautama Buddha. The inscriptions belong to the oldest properly written texts in India as well as the oldest written records of Buddhism and lots of its ethics and virtues. The inscriptions were created after the similar design of Persia's King Darius inscriptions and they revolve around a few recurring themes: Ashoka's conversion to Buddhism, the description of his efforts to spread Buddhism, his moral and religious precepts, and his social welfare programme and even animal protection. The edicts were based on Ashoka's ideas on administration and behaviour of people towards one another and religion. Ashoka was called "the Great" not only for making Buddhism a state religion but much more for the absolute unusual act of renouncing military force as political tool, except self-defence.

The Edicts of Ashoka are a collection of more than thirty inscriptions on the pillars as well as boulders and cave walls. Ashoka used the expression Dhamma Lipi (meaning: "Inscriptions of the Dharma") to describe his own Edicts. The inscriptions show his efforts to develop the Buddhist dharma (or dhamma), which are the ethic laws or the right way of living, throughout his empire. Although Buddhism as well as Gautama Buddha are mentioned, the edicts focus on social and moral precepts rather than specific religious practices or the philosophical dimension of Buddhism. This is the reason why these texts are called edicts. These were located in public places and were meant for people to read. Each edict exists in several identical copies spread throughout the whole empire (We will mention here only one location each.).

These inscriptions were dispersed throughout the areas of modern-day Afghanistan, Pakistan, India, Nepal, and, Bangladesh, and provide the first real evidence of Buddhist scripture. The edicts describe in detail Ashoka's view about dhamma, an earnest attempt to solve some of the problems that a complex society faced. According to the edicts, the extent of Buddhist proselytism during this period reached as far as the Mediterranean, and many Buddhist monuments were created.

In these inscriptions, Ashoka refers to himself as "Beloved of the Gods" (Devanampiya). The identification of Devanampiya with Ashoka was confirmed by an inscription discovered in 1915 by C. Beadon, a British gold-mining engineer, at Maski, a village in Raichur district of Karnataka. Another minor rock edict, found at the village Gujjarra in Datia district of Madhya Pradesh, also used the name of Ashoka together with his titles: "Devanampiya Piyadasi Asokaraja". The inscriptions found in the central and eastern part of India were written in Magadhi Prakrit using the Brahmi script, while Prakrit using the Kharoshthi script, Greek and Aramaic were used in the northwest. These edicts were deciphered by British archaeologist and historian James Prinsep.

Most of the edicts were composed in a language called Prakrit which is related to the much older Sanskrit. Brahmi script, and sometimes in the Kharoshthi script in the northwest, were the two Indian writing systems used for the inscriptions. They had both become extinct around the 5th century AD. The ancient Brahmi script was deciphered by Norwegian scholar Christian Lassen and James Prinsep, a British archaeologist, philologist, and official of the East India Company. The edicts in Brahmi script mentioned a King Devanampriya Piyadasi which Prinsep was able to associate this title with Emperor Ashoka. He published the results in March 1838.

In the 20th century then, archaeologists were surprised to find inscriptions in Greek (the language of the New Testament) and Aramaic (the language of Jesus). These discoveries threw new light on the true relationship between people of the Holy Land and Persia or India.

The Edicts are divided into four categories, according to their size (Minor or Major) and according to their medium (Rock or Pillar). Chronologically, the minor inscriptions tend to precede the larger ones, while rock inscriptions generally seem to have been started earlier than the pillar inscriptions:

• Minor Rock Edicts: Edicts inscribed at the beginning of Ashoka's reign; in Prakrit, Greek and Aramaic.

• Minor Pillar Edicts: Schism Edict, Queen's Edict, Rummidei Edict, Nigali Sagar Edict; in Prakrit.

• Major Rock Edicts: 14 Edicts (termed 1st to 14th) and 2 separate ones found in Odisha; in Prakrit and Greek.

• Major Pillar Edicts: 7 Edicts, inscribed at the end of Ashoka's reign; in Prakrit.

Basically, there are two different kinds of information inscribed:

1. The Minor Rock Edicts (in which Ashoka is sometimes named in person, as in Maski and Gujjarra) as well as the Minor Pillar Edicts are very religious in their content: they mention extensively the Buddha (and even previous Buddhas as in the Nigali Sagar inscription), the Samgha, Buddhism and Buddhist scriptures (as in the Bairat Edict).

2. The Major Rock Edicts and Major Pillar Edicts are essentially moral and political in nature: they never mention the Buddha or explicit Buddhist teachings, but are preoccupied with order, proper behaviour and non violence under the general concept of "Dharma" (virtues, precepts and compassion in life), and they also focus on the administration of the state and positive relations with foreign countries as far as the Hellenistic Mediterranean of the mid-3rd century BC.)

MINOR ROCK EDICTS

Maski Minor Rock Edict of Ashoka.

Location: town of Maski on the River Maski, tributary of the Tungabhadra, Raichur district, State of Karnataka, southern India.

(Association of Emperor Ashoka with the title "Devanampriya" ("Beloved-of-the-Gods"). The Maski inscription confirmed the association of the title "Devanampriya" with "Asoka", both readable in the first line. "Devanampiyasa Asoka", honourific Devanampriya ("Beloved of the God", in the adjectival form -sa) and name of Ashoka, in Brahmi script, in the Maski Edict of Ashoka.)

[A proclamation] of Devanampriya Asoka.

Two and a half years [and somewhat more] (have passed) since I am a Buddha-Sakya.

[A year and] somewhat more (has passed) [since] I have visited the Samgha and have shown zeal.

Those gods who formerly had been unmingled (with men) in Jambudvipa, have now become mingled (with them).

This object can be reached even by a lowly (person) who is devoted to morality.

One must not think thus, — (viz.) that only an exalted (person) may reach this.

Both the lowly and the exalted must be told : "If you act thus, this matter (will be) prosperous and of long duration, and will thus progress to one and a half.

Minor Rock Edict No. 1 (conflated versions)

Location: Srinivasपुरi near Kalkaji Temple, Kailash Colony, near the Bahapur area, South Delhi, India. Adapted from Romilla Thapar translation

(In this Edict, Emperor Ashoka describes himself as a Buddhist layman (Upasaka) /a Buddha-Sakya /a Sakya, and also explains he has been getting closer to the Samgha and has become more ardent in the faith.)

From Suvarnagiri, on the order of His Highness the Prince, and the officers: good health to the officers of Isila who are to be instructed thus:

Thus speaks the Beloved of the Gods, Asoka:

I have been a Buddhist layman (Upasaka) /a Buddha-Sakya /a Sakya for more than two and a half years, but for a year I did not make much progress. Now for more than a year I have drawn closer to the Order (Samgha) and have become more ardent. The gods, who in India up to this time did not associate with men, now mingle with them, and this is the result of my efforts.

Moreover this is not something to be obtained only by the great, but it is also open to the humble, if they are earnest and they can even reach heaven easily.

THE GRAND BIBLE

This is the reason for this announcement that both humble and great should make progress and that the neighbouring peoples also should know that the progress is lasting.

And this investment will increase and increase abundantly, and increase to half as much again.

This matter must be inscribed here and elsewhere on the hills, and wherever there is a stone pillar it is to be engraved on that pillar. You must go out with this document throughout the length and breadth of your district.

This announcement has been proclaimed while on tour; 256 nights have been spent on tour.

Minor Rock Edict No. 2 (conflated versions)

Location: Siddapur, Brahmagiri, Chitradurga district, State of Karnataka, India.

Adapted from Romilla Thapar translation

(Only appears in a few places, in conjunction with Minor Edict No.1)

Thus says the Beloved of the Gods. Whatever the Beloved of the Gods orders must be carried out in every respect. The rajuka [rural officer] is to be instructed and he will instruct the people of the countryside, assembling them with the sound of the drum; likewise the local chiefs. Obey mother and father, obey the teachers, have mercy on living beings; speak the truth. These virtues of Dhamma should be followed.

Thus you will instruct them on the orders of the Beloved of the Gods, and also you will ensure that elephant trainers, clerks, fortune-tellers, and Brahmins instruct their apprentices according to ancient tradition, that they should honour their masters... righteous masters. In a family relatives must treat each other with respect.

This is the ancient custom, conducive to long life, and thus it must be carried out.

Carved by the engraver Capada.

Minor Rock Edict No. 3

Location: town of Bairat (ancient Viratnagar), north of Jaipur, district of Rajasthan, India.

(Only appears at Bairat, where it was discovered in front of the Bairat Temple, possibly the oldest free-standing temple in India. The Edict is now located in the Museum of The Asiatic Society, Calcutta. Also known as the Bhabru Edict. Ashoka claims "great is my reverence and faith in the Buddha, the Dharma (and) the Samgha", and makes a list of recommended Buddhist scriptures that Buddhist monks as well as the laity should repeatedly study.)

The Magadha king Priyadarsin, having saluted the Samgha hopes they are both well and comfortable.

It is known to you, Sirs, how great is my reverence and faith in the Buddha, the Dharma (and) the Samgha.

Whatsoever, Sirs, has been spoken by the blessed Buddha, all that is quite well spoken.

But, Sirs, what would indeed appear to me (to be referred to by the words of the scripture): "thus the true Dharma will be of long duration", that I feel bound to declare:

The following expositions of the Dharma, Sirs, (viz.) the Vinaya-Samukasa ("The Exaltation of Discipline"), the Aliyavasas ("The Ideal Mode of Life"), the Anagata-bhayas ("Fears to Come"), the Muni-gathas ("The Songs of the Hermit"), the Moneya-Suta ("Discourse on the Hermit Life"), the Upatisapina ("The Questions of Upatishya"), and the Laghulovada ("The Sermon to Rahula") which was spoken by the blessed Buddha concerning falsehood, — I desire, Sirs, that many groups of monks and (many) nuns may repeatedly listen to these expositions of the Dharma and may reflect (on them).

In the same way both laymen and laywomen (should act).

For the following (purpose), Sirs, am I causing this to be written, (viz.) in order that they may know my intention.

Minor Rock Edict No. 4

The Kandahar Inscription in Greek and Aramaic
Location: Chehel Zina, Kandahar, Afghanistan.

(The Kandahar Bilingual Rock Inscription, (also called Kandahar Edict of Ashoka, or "Chehel Zina Edict"), was discovered in 1958. It was found on a rock on the mountainside of Chehel Zina (also Chilzina, or Chil Zena, "Forty Steps"), in the vicinity of Kandahar (Afghanistan), which forms the western natural bastion of Old Kandahar, or Alexandria Arachosia, Kandahar's Old City. Once it belonged to the north-eastern edge of the Indian empire, near the border with the Greco-Bactrian kingdom and Ai-Khanoum It is a text in Greek and Aramaic, proclaimed and carved in stone by Emperor Ashoka around 260 BC. It is known as the very first inscription of Ashoka, written in the 10th year of his reign, preceding all other inscriptions. This first inscription was written in Classical Greek and Aramaic exclusively. It is sometimes considered as one of the several "Minor Rock Edicts" of Ashoka (named "Minor Rock Edict No.4).

Background and Implications

Ashoka proclaims his faith, 10 years after the violent beginning of his reign, and affirms that living beings, human or animal, cannot be killed in his realm. In the Greek part of the text, he translates the Dharma he advocates by "Piety" Eusebeia, in Greek. The usage of Aramaic reflect the fact that Aramaic had been considered the official language of the first Persian Empire which had ruled in those parts until the conquests of Alexander the Great. The Aramaic is not an exact translation of the Greek, and it seems rather that both texts were translated separately from an original text in Magadhi, the common official language of India at the time, used on all the other Edicts of Ashoka in Indian language, even in such linguistically distinct areas as Kalinga. It is written in Aramaic alphabet. This inscription is actually rather short and general in content, compared to most Major Rock Edicts of Ashoka, including the other inscription in Greek of Ashoka in Kandahar, the Kandahar Greek Edict of Ashoka, which contains long portions of the 12th and 13th edicts, and probably contained much more since it was cut off at the beginning and at the end.

With Alexander the Great, Greek language became dominant in all conquered territories, closely followed by the language of the Jews, Aramaic. The Edict shows the presence of a sizable Greek and Jewish population in the area, as it shows the lingering importance of Aramaic, several decades after the fall of the (Achaemenid or First) Persian Empire, in which it had an almost official position. At the same epoch, the Greeks were firmly established in the newly created Greco-Bactrian kingdom under the reign of Diodotus I, and particularly in the border city of Ai-Khanoum, not far away in the northern part of Afghanistan. The usage of Greek in the Edict indeed means that the message was intended for the Greeks and Jews living in Kandahar. Greek communities lived in the northwest of Ashoka's Mauryan empire (today Afghanistan and Pakistan), following the conquest and the colonisation efforts of Alexander the Great around 323 BC. These communities therefore seem to have been still significant in the area of Afghanistan during the reign of Ashoka, about 70 years after Alexander. The proclamation of this Edict in Kandahar is usually taken as proof that Ashoka had now control over that part of the (Seleucid or Second) Persian Empire, presumably after General Seleucus (Alexander's successor in Persia) had ceded this territory to Chandragupta Maurya in their 305 BC peace agreement.

The Greek and Aramaic versions vary somewhat, and seem to be rather free interpretations of an original text in Prakrit. The Aramaic text clearly recognises the authority of Ashoka with expressions such as "our Lord, king Priyadasin", "our lord, the king", suggesting that the readers were indeed the subjects of Ashoka, whereas the Greek version remains more neutral with the simple expression "King Ashoka".)

English translation of the Greek text:

1. Ten years (of reign) having been completed, King
2. Piodasses (Ashoka) made known (the doctrine of)
3. Piety* to men; and from this moment he has made
4. men more pious, and everything thrives throughout
5. the whole world. And the king abstains from (killing)
6. living beings, and other men and those who (are)
7. huntsmen and fishermen of the king have desisted
8. from hunting. And if some (were) intemperate, they
9. have ceased from their intemperance as was in their
10. power; and obedient to their father and mother and to
11. the elders, in opposition to the past also in the future,
12. by so acting on every occasion, they will live better
13. and more happily."

* the Greek text uses the word "Eusebeia", meaning Buddhism.

English translation of the Aramaic text:

1. Ten years having passed. It so happened that our lord, king Priyadasin, became the institutor of Truth,
2. Since then, evil diminished among all men and all misfortunes lie caused to disappear; and [there is] peace as well as joy in the whole earth.
3. And, moreover, [there is] this in regard to food: for our lord, the king, [only] a few [animals] are killed; having seen this, all men have given up [the slaughter of animals]; even those men who catch fish (i.e. the fishermen) are subject to prohibition.
4. Similarly, those who were without restraint have ceased to be without restraint.
5. And obedience to mother and to father and to old men [reigns] in conformity with the obligations imposed by fate on each [person].
6. And there is no Judgement for all the pious (Buddhist) men,
7. This [i.e. the practice of Law of Buddhism] has been profitable to all men and will be more profitable [in future].

MINOR PILLAR EDICTS

(The Minor Rock Edicts of Ashoka are exclusively inscribed on some of the Pillars of Ashoka, at Sanchi, Sarnath, Allahabad, Rummindai and Nagali Sagar.)

Sarnath Schism Edict of Ashoka

Location: Sarnath, Bihar.

"..... [cannot] be divided. The Samgha both of monks and of nuns is made united as long as (my) sons and great-grandsons (shall reign, and) as long as the moon and the sun (shall shine). The monk or nun who shall break up the Samgha, must be caused to put on white robes and to reside in a non-residence. For my desire is that the Samgha may be united (and) of long duration."

Sanchi Schism Edict of Ashoka; or Edict of Ashoka on the Sanchi pillar.

Location: Sanchi, Madhya Pradesh.

"... path is prescribed both for the monks and for the nuns. As long as (my) sons and great-grandsons (shall reign ; and) as long as the Moon and the Sun (shall endure), the monk or nun who shall cause divisions in the Sangha, shall be compelled to put on white robes and to reside apart. For what is my desire ? That the Sangha may be united and may long endure."

The Allahabad Pillar

Location: (originally in Kosambi, Bihar)

Akbar's Allahabad Fort in Prayagraj, Uttar Pradesh.

The Allahabad pillar carries edicts of Emperor Ashoka but also later inscriptions attributed to the Gupta emperor Samudragupta (4th century AD). Also engraved on the stone are inscriptions by the Mughal emperor Jahangir, from the 17th century. At some point of time, the pillar was moved from its original location and installed within Akbar's Allahabad Fort in Prayagraj, Uttar Pradesh. As the fort is now occupied by the Indian Army, the public are only allowed limited access to the premises and special permission is required to view the pillar.

The pillar is a single shaft of polished sandstone standing 35 feet (10.7 m) high. It has a lower diameter of 35 inches (0.9 m) and an upper diameter of 26 inches (0.7 m). The capital of the pillar is shown in a photograph from 1870 but is now lost. The capital of the pillar had a surrounding frieze with palmettes that looked like small rosette flowers. An almost identical frieze was found in Delphi (Greece).

The Ashokan inscriptions suggest that the pillar was first erected at Kaushambi, an ancient town some 30 kilometres west of its current location which was then the capital of the kingdom of Koshala. It was moved to Allahabad much later when the region came under Muslim rule. The presence of another broken pillar at Kaushambi near the ruins of the Ghoshitarama monastery has led some to believe that the Allahabad Pillar might have been one of a pair, not unlike the ones discovered at Rampurva.

When James Prinsep of the Asiatic Society came across the broken pillar just inside the gates of the Allahabad Fort in c. 1834 and made a complete copy of its several inscriptions. There are three sets of inscriptions on the column from the three emperors, Ashoka Maurya, Samudragupta and Jahangir. They are accompanied by some minor inscriptions by pilgrims and others, which are derided as a mass of modern scribbles by Cunningham. Some of these are, however, dated and coupled with the style of scripts used, are useful to establish the periods when the pillar was in an erect position, and when it was lying prone on the ground. An analysis by Prinsep and later by Cunningham indicated that the Allahabad Pillar was very likely erect from the time of Samudragupta until the mid-13th century AD.

The Ashokan inscriptions on the Allahabad Pillar (along with inscriptions elsewhere) was pivotal to the decipherment of the Brahmi script by James Prinsep. It led to the rediscovery of the Mauryan emperor Ashoka and the unearthing of the full extent of his empire. It led to the rediscovery of the Mauryan emperor and the unearthing of the full extent of his empire. The inscription is engraved in continuous lines around the column in Brahmi and contains the same six edicts that can be seen on the other pillars. However, much of the third and fourth edicts have been "ruthlessly destroyed by the cutting of the vain-glorious inscription of Jahangir, recording the names of his ancestors". Besides the six edicts, the Allahabad pillar also includes what are known as the Schism edict and the Queen's edict. THE GRAND BIBLE

Allahabad Schism Edict of Ashoka:

(The Schism Edict, referred to as the Kaushambi edict by Cunningham, is a command from the emperor addressing the senior officials (Mahamatras) of Kaushambi urging them to avoid dissension and stay united. The following is a conflation of various fragmented versions of the edict:)

Devanampriya (Ashoka, the Beloved of the Gods) commands the Mahamatras (officers) of Kosambi or Kausambi/Pataliputra thus:

No one is to cause dissension in the Order. The Order of monks and nuns has been united, and this unity should last for as long as my sons and great grandsons, and the moon and the sun.

Whoever creates a schism in the Order, whether monk or nun, is to be dressed in white garments, and to be put in a place not inhabited by monks or nuns. For it is my wish that the Order should remain united and endure for long. This is to be made known to the Order of monks and the Order of nuns. Thus says the Beloved of the Gods: You must keep one copy of this document and place it in your meeting hall, and give one copy to the laity. The laymen must come on every uposatha day [day of confession and penance] to endorse this order. The same applies to special officers who must also regularly attend the uposatha, and endorse this order, and make it known. Throughout your district you must circulate it exactly according to this text. You must also have this precise text circulated in all the fortress districts [under military control].

Queen's edict

(The Queen's Edict refers to the charitable deeds of Ashoka's queen, Karuvaki, the mother of Prince Tivala.)

On the order of the Beloved of the Gods, the officers everywhere are to be instructed that whatever may be the gift of the second queen, whether a mango-grove, a monastery, an institution for dispensing charity or any other donation, it is to be counted to the credit of that queen ... the second queen, the mother of Tivala, Karuvaki.

(Major Pillar Edicts 1-6: The pillar also contains the so-called Major Pillar Edicts, from 1 to 6 which we do not display here as they have nothing to do with Ashoka. They are inscriptions from a much later time, attributed to the 4th century AD Gupta emperor, Samudragupta.)

Rummindei Edict of Ashoka

Location: Lumbini (Buddha's place of birth), Nepal.

Estimated Range of Dating: 250 BC.

When King Devanampriya Priyadarsin had been anointed twenty years, he came himself and worshipped (this spot) because the Buddha Shakyamuni was born here. (He) both caused to be made a stone bearing a horse and caused a stone pillar to be set up, (in order to show) that the Blessed One was born here. (He) made the village of Lummini free of taxes, and paying (only) an eighth share (of the produce).

Nigali Sagar Edict of Ashoka

Location: Nigali Sagar, Nepal.

Estimated Range of Dating: 250 BC.

"Devanam piyena piyadasin lajina- chodasavasa bhisitena Budhasa Konakamanasa thube-dutyam vadhite Visativa sabhisitena -cha atana-agacha-mahiyyite silathabe-cha usa papite"

"His Majesty King Priyadarsin in the 14th year of his reign enlarged for the second time the stupa of the Buddha Kanakamuni and in the 20th year of his reign, having come in person, paid reverence and set up a stone pillar".

MAJOR ROCK EDICTS

(The Major Rock Edicts of Ashoka are inscribed on large rocks, except for the Kandahar version in Greek (Kandahar Greek Edict of Ashoka), written on a stone plaque belonging to a building. The Major Edicts are not located in the heartland of Mauryan territory, but on the frontiers of the territory controlled by Ashoka. These texts existed in identical copies and were spread all over the Empire. Examples: Empire West: Old Kandahar, Afghanistan, and Girnar, Gujarat, India; Empire South: Gooty, near Guntakal, Anantapur, Andhra Pradesh, India; Empire North: Shahbazgarhi, Mardan, Pakistan, and Khalsi, Dehradun District, Uttarakhand, India; Empire East: Dhaul, Khordha district, Odisha, and Jaugada, Ganjam district, Odisha, India.

Content of the Edicts: There are altogether 14 Major Rocks Edicts, forming a group which is duplicated with only slight variations in 10 known locations, and two Separate Major Rock Edicts, in Dhaul and Jaugada.)

Major Rock Edict No. 1

(Ashoka prohibits animal slaughter. Bans festive gatherings and killings of animals. Only two peacocks and one deer were killed in Ashoka's kitchen. He wished to discontinue this practice of killing two peacocks and one deer as well.)

This rescript on morality has been caused to be written by Devanampriya Priyadarsin. Here no living being must be killed and sacrificed. And also no festival meeting must be held. For king Devanampriya Priyadarsin sees much evil in festival meetings. And there are also some festival meetings which are considered meritorious by king Devanampriya Priyadarsin.

Formerly in the kitchen of king Devanampriya Priyadarsin many hundred thousands of animals were killed daily for the sake of curry. But now, when this rescript on morality is caused to be written, then only three animals are being killed (daily), (viz.) two peacocks (and) one deer, but even this deer not regularly.

But even these three animals shall not be killed (in future).

Major Rock Edict No. 2

(Provides for care for man and animals, describes recipients as the Chola, Pandyas, Satyapura and Keralputra Kingdoms of South India, and the Greek king Antiochos II and his neighbours.)

Everywhere in the dominions of king Devanampriya Priyadarsin and (of those) who (are his) borderers, such as the Cholas, the Pandyas, the Satiyaputa, the Kelalputa, Tamraparni, the Yona (Greek) king named Antiyoga (Antiochos), and the other kings who are the neighbours of this Antiyoga, everywhere two (kinds of) medical men were established by king Devanampriya Priyadarsin, (viz.) medical treatment for men and medical treatment for cattle.

Wherever there were no herbs beneficial to men and beneficial to cattle, everywhere they were caused to be imported and to be planted. Likewise, wherever there were no roots and fruits, everywhere they were caused to be imported and to be planted.

On the roads trees were planted, and wells were caused to be dug for the use of cattle and men.

Major Rock Edict No. 3

(Rules of morality and their implementation through Civil Servants. Generosity to Brahmins. Issued after 12 years of Ashoka's coronation. It says that the Yuktas (subordinate officers) and Pradesikas (district Heads) along with Rajukas (Rural officers) shall go to the all areas of kingdom every five years and spread the Dhamma Policy of Ashoka.)

King Devanampriya Priyadarsin speaks thus. (When I had been) anointed twelve years, the following was ordered by me. Everywhere in my dominions the Yuktas, the Rajukas, (and) the Pradesika shall set out on a complete tour (throughout their charges) every five years for this very purpose, (viz.) for the following instruction in morality as well as for other business.

Meritorious is obedience to mother and father. Liberality to friends, acquaintances, and relatives, and to Brahmanas and Sramanas is meritorious. Abstinence from killing animals is meritorious. Moderation in expenditure (and) moderation in possessions are meritorious.

And the councils (of Mahamatras) also shall order the Yuktas to register (these rules) both with (the addition of) reasons and according to the letter.

Major Rock Edict No. 4

(Rules of morality. Dhammaghosa is ideal to the mankind and not the Bherighosa. Impact of Dhamma on society.)

In times past, for many hundreds of years, there had ever been promoted the killing of animals and the hurting of living beings, discourtesy to relatives, (and) discourtesy to Sramanas and Brahmanas.

But now, in consequence of the practice of morality on the part of king Devanampriya Priyadarsin, the sound of drums has become the sound of morality, showing the people representations of aerial chariots, elephants, masses of fire, and other divine figures.

Such as they had not existed before for many hundreds of years, thus there are now promoted, through the instruction in morality on the part of king Devanampriya Priyadarsin, abstinence from killing animals, abstinence from hurting living beings, courtesy to relatives, courtesy to Brahmanas and Sramanas, (and) obedience to mother and father.

Both in this and in many other ways is the practice of morality promoted. And king Devanampriya Priyadarsin will ever promote this practice of morality.

And the sons, grandsons, and great-grandsons of king Devanampriya Priyadarsin will ever promote this practice of morality until the aeon (of destruction of the world), (and) will instruct (people) in morality, abiding by morality and by good conduct

For this is the best work, viz. instruction in morality. And the practice of morality also is not (possible) for (a person) devoid of good conduct. Therefore promotion and not neglect of this object is meritorious.

For the following purpose has this been written, (viz. in order that) they should devote themselves to the promotion of this practice, and that they should not approve the neglect (of it).

(This rescript) was caused to be written by king Devanampriya Priyadarsin (when he had been) anointed twelve years.

Major Rock Edict No. 5

(Establishment and role of the Mahamatras. Concerns about the policy towards slaves. He mentions in this rock edict "Every Human is my child". Appointment of Dhammamahamatras is mentioned in this edict.)

King Devanampriya Priyadarsin speaks (thus).

It is difficult to perform virtuous deeds. He who starts performing virtuous deeds accomplishes something difficult.

Now, by me many virtuous deeds have been performed. Therefore (among) my sons and grandsons, and (among) my descendants (who shall come) after them until the aeon (of destruction of the world), those who will conform to this (duty) will perform good deeds.

But he who will neglect even a portion of this (duty) will perform evil deeds. For sin indeed steps fast.

Now, in times past (officers) called Mahamatras of morality did not exist before. Mahamatras of morality were appointed by me (when I had been) anointed thirteen years. These are occupied with all sects in establishing morality, in promoting morality, and for the welfare and happiness of those who are devoted to morality (even) among the Yona, Kambojas, and Gandharas, and whatever other western borderers (of mine there are).

They are occupied with servants and masters, with Brahmanas and Ibhias, with the destitute; (and) with the aged, for the welfare and happiness of those who are devoted to morality, (and) in releasing (them) from the fetters (of worldly life). They are occupied in supporting prisoners (with money), in causing (their) fetters to be taken off, and in setting (them) free, if one has children, or is bewitched, or aged, respectively. They are occupied everywhere, here and in all the outlying towns, in the harems of our brothers, (of our) sisters, and (of) whatever other relatives (of ours there are). These Mahamatras of morality are occupied everywhere in my dominions with those who are devoted to morality, (in order to ascertain) whether one is eager for morality or properly devoted to charity.

For the following purpose has this rescript on morality been caused to be written, (viz. that) it may be of long duration, and (that) my descendants may conform to it.

Major Rock Edict No. 6

(Ashoka's management of government affairs. Describes Emperor's desire to get informed about the conditions of the people constantly. Talks about welfare measures.)

King Devanampriya Priyadarsin speaks thus.

In times past neither the disposal of affairs nor the submission of reports at any time did exist before. But I have made the following (arrangement).

Reporters have to report to me the affairs of the people at any time (and) anywhere, while I am eating, in the harem, in the inner apartment, at the cowpen, in the palanquin, (and) in the park. And everywhere I shall dispose of the affairs of the people.

And also, if in the council (of Mahamatras) a dispute arises, or an amendment is moved, in connexion with any donation or proclamation which I am ordering verbally, or (in connexion with) an emergent matter which has been delegated to the Mahamatras, it must be reported to me immediately, anywhere, (and) at any time.

Thus I have ordered. For I am never content in exerting myself and in dispatching business. For I consider it my duty (to promote) the welfare of all men. But the root of that (is) this, (viz.) exertion and the dispatch of business. For no duty is more important than (promoting) the welfare of all men. And whatever effort I am making, (is made) in order that I may discharge the debt (which I owe) to living beings, (that) I may make them happy in this (world), and (that) they may attain heaven in the other (world).

Now, for the following purpose has this rescript on morality been caused to be written, (viz. that) it may be of long duration, and (that) my sons and wives may display the same zeal for the welfare of all men.

But it is difficult to accomplish this without great zeal.

Major Rock Edict No. 7

(The importance of self-control, purity of mind, gratitude, and firm devotion. Requests tolerance for all religions - "To foster one's own sect, depreciating the others out of affection for one's own, to exalt its merit, is to do the worst harm to one's own sect.")

King Devanampriya Priyadarsin desires (that) all sects may reside everywhere.

For all these desire self-control and purity of mind.

But men possess various desires (and) various passions. They will fulfil (either) the whole (or) only a portion (of their duties). But even one who (practises) great liberality, (but) does not possess self-control, purity of mind, gratitude, and firm devotion, is very mean.

Major Rock Edict No. 8

(The "Diamond Throne" built by Ashoka in Bodhi [Buddha] Gaya. Describes Asoka's first Dhamma Yatra to Bodhgaya & Bodhi Tree.)

Morality tours by Ashoka. This Edict is remarkable in that it describes the visit of the king to Sambodhi (Sambodhi inscription.jpg Sa?+bodhi, "Complete Enlightenment"), another name of Bodhi Gaya. It is thought that Ashoka built in Bodhi Gaya the Diamond Throne, in order to mark the place where the Buddha reached enlightenment.

According to tradition, Ashoka was profoundly grieved when he discovered that the sacred pipal tree was not properly being taken care of and dying out due to the neglect of Queen Ti'yarak?ita. As a consequence, Ashoka endeavoured to take care of the Bodhi Tree, and built a temple around it. This temple became the center of Bodhi Gaya. A sculpture at Sanchi, southern gateway of Stupa No1, shows Ashoka in grief being supported by his two Queens. Then the relief above shows the Bodhi Tree prospering inside its new temple. Numerous other sculptures at Sanchi show scenes of devotion towards the Bodhi Tree, and the Bodhi Tree inside its temple at Bodhi Gaya.

The Kalsi version also uses the title "Devampriyas" to describe previous kings (whereas the other versions use the term "Kings"), suggesting that the title "Denampriya" had a rather wide usage.)

In times past the Devanampriyas (Kings) used to set out on so-called pleasure-tours.

On these (tours) hunting and other such pleasures were (enjoyed).

When king Devanampriya Priyadardin had been anointed ten years, he went out to Sambodhi.

Therefore tours of morality (were undertaken) here.

On these (tours) the following takes place, (viz.) visiting Sramanas and Brahmanas and making gifts (to them), visiting the aged and supporting (them) with gold, visiting the people of the country, instructing (them) in morality, and questioning (them) about morality, as suitable for this (occasion).

This second period (of the reign) of king Devanampriya Priyadarsin becomes a pleasure in a higher degree.

Major Rock Edict No. 9

(Morality rather than ceremonies. Condemns popular ceremonies. Stress in ceremonies of Dhamma.)

King Devanampriya Priyadarsin speaks (thus).

Men are practising various ceremonies during illness, at the marriage of a son or a daughter, at the birth of a child, (and) when setting out on a journey; on these and other such (occasions) men are practising many ceremonies.

But in such (cases) mothers and wives are practising many and various vulgar and useless ceremonies.

Now, ceremonies should certainly be practised. But these (ceremonies) bear little fruit indeed. But the following bears much fruit indeed, viz. the practice of morality.

Herein the following (are comprised), (viz.) proper courtesy to slaves and servants, reverence to elders, gentleness to animals, (and) liberality to Sramanas and Brahmanas; these and other such (virtues) are called the practice of morality.

Therefore a father, or a son, or a brother, or a master, (or) a friend or an acquaintance, or even a (mere) neighbour ought to say : "This is meritorious. This practice should be observed until the (desired) object is attained, (thinking): "I shall observe this".

For other a ceremonies are of doubtful (effect). One may attain his object (by them), but he may not (do so). And they (bear fruit) in this world only.

But that practice of morality is not restricted to time. Even if one does not attain (by it) his object in this (world), then endless merit is produced in the other (world).

But if one attains (by it) his object in this (world), the gain of both (results) arises from it; (viz.) the (desired) object (is attained) in this (world), and endless merit is produced in the other (world) by that practice of morality.

Major Rock Edict No. 10

(Condemns the desire for fame and glory. Strive for Dhamma, meaning moral and virtues.)

King Devanampriya Priyadarsin does not think that either glory or fame conveys much advantage, except whatever glory or fame he desires (on account of his aim) that in the present time, and in the future, men may (be induced) by him to practise obedience to morality, or that they may conform to the duties of morality.

On this (account) king Devanampriya Priyadarsin is desiring glory and fame.

And whatever effort king Devanampriya Priyadarsin is making, all that (is) only for the sake of (merit) in the other (world), (and) in order that all (men) may run little danger.

But the danger is this, viz. demerit. But it is indeed difficult either for a lowly person or for a high one to accomplish this without great zeal (and without) laying aside every (other aim). But among these (two) it is indeed (more) difficult to accomplish just for a high (person).

Major Rock Edict No. 11

(Morality, courtesy, meritorious deeds.)

King Devanampriya Priyadarsin speaks thus, There is no such gift as the gift of morality, the distribution of morality, (and) kinship through morality.

Herein the following (are comprised), (viz.) proper courtesy to slaves and servants, obedience to mother and father, liberality to friends, acquaintances, and relatives, to Sramanas and Brahmanas, (and) abstention from killing animals.

Concerning this a father, or a son, or a brother, or a master, (or) a friend or an acquaintance, (or) even a (mere) neighbour, ought to say "This is meritorious. This ought to be done".

If one is acting thus, (happiness) in this world is attained, and endless merit is produced in the other (world) by that gift of morality.

Major Rock Edict No. 12

(Respect other sects and not take pride in one's own. Also written in Greek in the Kandahar Greek Edict of Ashoka [last portion])

King Devanampriya Priyadarsin is honouring all sects: ascetics or house holders, with gifts and with honours of various kinds.

But Devanampriya does not value either gifts or honours so (highly) as (this), (viz.) that a promotion of the essentials of all sects should take place. This promotion of the essentials (is possible) in many ways. But its root is this, viz. guarding (one's) speech, (i.e.) that neither praising one's own sect nor blaming other sects should take place on improper occasions, or (that) it should be moderate in every case. But other sects ought to be honoured in every way.

If one is acting thus, he is promoting his own sect considerably and is benefiting other sects as well.

If one is acting otherwise than thus, he is both hurting his own sect and wronging other sects as well.

For whosoever praises his own sect or blames other sects, — all (this) out of pure devotion to his own sect, (i.e.) with the view of glorifying his own sect, — if he is acting thus, he rather injures his own sect very severely.

But concord is meritorious, (i.e.) that they should both hear and obey each other's morals.

For this is the desire of Devanampriya, (viz.) that all sects should be both full of learning and pure in doctrine.

And those who are attached to their respective (sects), ought to be spoken to (as follows). Devanampriya does not value either gifts or honours so (highly) as (this), (viz.) that a promotion of the essentials of all sects should take place.

And many (officers) are occupied for this purpose, (viz.) the Mahamatras of morality, the Mahamatras controlling women, the inspectors of cowpens, or other classes (of officials).

And this is the fruit of it, (viz.) that both the promotion of one's own sect takes place, and the glorification of morality.

Major Rock Edict No. 13

(A Greek translation of Edicts 13 and 14, the Kandahar Greek Edict of Ashoka, was also discovered in Kandahar, Afghanistan. It is the largest inscription from the edict. It talks about the Ashoka's victory over Kalinga and also mentions about the high number of casualties in that war. King considered the victory by "Dhamma" to be the foremost victory; mentions the victory of "Dhamma" where the Greek being named Antiyoga or Amtiyaka, identified with Antiochus II Theos of the Seleucid Empire, rules; it also mentions the victory of Dhamma where rule the following Greek kings beyond Antiochus: Tulamaya = Ptolemy III Evergetes of Egypt; Antekina = Antigonus Gonatus of Macedonia; Maka = Magas of Cyrene; Alikyashudala = Alexander I of Epirus. It also mentions the victory of Dhamma in south India among the Cholas and Pandyas, as far as Ceylon. This edict was also written in Greek (probably together with all the other Major Rock Edicts 1-14 originally) in the Kandahar Greek Edict of Ashoka (first portion recovered).

Content: Ashoka's victory in the Kalinga war followed by remorse. Victory of morality in India and among the Greeks (Yonas), as far as where the Greek kings Antiochus, Ptolemy, Antigonus, Magas and Alexander rule.

The kings mentioned in Edict 13 as following the Dharma have been identified with the major Hellenistic rulers of the period:

When king Devanampriya Priyadarsin had been anointed eight years, (the country of) the Kalingas was conquered by (him). One hundred and fifty thousand in number were the men who were deported thence, one hundred thousand in number were those who were slain there, and many times as many those who died.

After that, now that (the country of) the Kalingas has been taken, Devanampriya (is devoted) to a zealous study of morality, to the love of morality, and to the instruction (of people) in morality. This is the repentance of Devanampriya on account of his conquest of (the country of) the Kalingas. For, this is considered very painful and deplorable by Devanampriya, that, while one is conquering an unconquered (country), slaughter, death, and deportation of people (are taking place) there,

But the following is considered even more deplorable than this by Devanampriya. (To) the Brahmanas or Sramanas, or other sects or householders/ who are living there, (and) among whom the following are practised: obedience to those who receive high pay, obedience to mother and father, obedience to elders, proper courtesy to friends, acquaintances, companions, and relatives, to slaves and servants, (and) firm devotion, to these then happens injury or slaughter or deportation of (their) beloved ones. Or if there are then incurring misfortune the friends, acquaintances, companions, and relatives of those whose affection (for the latter) is undiminished, although they are (themselves) well provided for, this (misfortune) as well becomes an injury to those (persons) themselves.

This is shared by all men and is considered deplorable by Devanampriya.

There is no country where these (two) classes, (viz.) the Brahmanas and the Sramanas, do not exist, except among the Yona; and there is no (place) in any country where men are not indeed attached to some sect.

Therefore even the hundredth part or the thousandth part of all those people who were slain, who died, and who were deported at that time when (the country of) the Kalingas was taken, (would) now be considered very deplorable by Devanampriya.

.....desires towards all beings self-control, impartiality, (and) kindness.

But this by Devanampriya, viz. the conquest by morality.

And this (conquest) has been won repeatedly by Devanampriya both [here] and among all (his) borderers, even as far as at (the distance of) six hundred yojanas where the Yona king named Antiyoga (is ruling), and beyond this Antiyoga, (where) four kings (are ruling), (viz. the king) named Tulamaya, (the king) named Antekina, (the king) named Maka, (and) the king named Alikyashudala, (and) likewise towards the south, (where) the Chodas and Pandyas (are ruling), as far as Tamraparni.

Likewise here in the king's territory, among the Greeks (Yonas) and Kambojas, among the Nabhakas and Nabhapantkis, among the Bhojas and Pitinikyas, among the Andhras and Paladas, everywhere (people) are conforming to Devanampriya's instruction in morality.

Even those to whom the envoys of Devanampriya do not go, having heard of the duties of morality, the ordinances, (and) the instruction in morality of Devanampriya, are conforming to morality and will conform to (it).

This conquest, which has been won by this everywhere; causes the feeling of satisfaction. Firm becomes this satisfaction, (viz.) the satisfaction at the conquest by morality.

But this satisfaction is indeed of little (consequence). Devanampriya thinks that only the fruits in the other (world) are of great (value).

And for the following purpose has this rescript on morality been written, (viz.) in order that the sons (and) great-grandsons (who) may be (born) to me, should not think that a fresh conquest ought to be made; (that), if a conquest does please them, they should take pleasure in mercy and light punishments; and (that) they should regard the conquest by morality as the only (true) conquest.

This (conquest bears fruit) in this world (and) in the other world. And let all (their) pleasure be the pleasure in exertion. For this (bears fruit) in this world (and) in the other world.

Major Rock Edict 14

(Describes objectives and modalities of inscriptions in different parts of the Empire.)

These rescripts on morality have been caused to be written by king Devanampriya Priyadarsin either in an abridged (form), or of middle (size), or at full length.

For the whole was not suitable everywhere. For (my) dominions are wide, and much has been written, and I shall constantly cause still (more) to be written.

And (some) of this has been stated again and again because of the charm of certain topics, (and) in order that men should act accordingly.

But some of this may have been written incompletely, either on account of the locality, or because (my) motive was not liked, or by the fault of the writer.

First Separate Major Rock Edict (Dhauli version)

(In Dhauli and Jaugada, on the east coast of India, in the recently conquered territory of Kalinga, Major Rock Edicts 11 to 13 were omitted from the normal complement of Edicts from 1 to 14, but two separate Edicts were put in their place. The First Separate Major Rock Edict mainly addresses local officials (from Tosali in the Dhauli Separate Edicts and from Somapa in the Jaugada versions) referring to the requirements of a fair judicial system, and the system of control established by Ashoka through the Mahamatras, sent from Pataliputra, Ujjain and Taxila.

Chronologically, it seems that the First Separate Rock Edict was actually engraved after the Second Separate Rock Edict. The first and second separate edicts seem to have been inscribed at about the same time as the other Major Rock Edicts, in the 13th and 14th years of Ashoka's reign.)

At the word of Devanampriya, the Mahamatras at Tosali, (who are) the judicial officers of the city, have to be told (thus).

Whatever I recognise (to be right), that I strive to carry out by deeds, and to accomplish by (various) means. And this is considered by me the principal means for this object, viz. (to give) instruction to you. For you are occupied with many thousands of men, with the object of gaining the affection of men.

All men are my children. As on behalf of (my own) children I desire that they may be provided with complete welfare and happiness in this world and in the other world, the same I desire also on behalf of [all] men. And you do not learn how far this (my) object reaches. Some single person only learns this, (and) even he (only) a portion, (but) not the whole. Now you must pay attention to this, although you are well provided for.

It happens in the administration (of justice) that a single person suffers either imprisonment or harsh treatment. In this case (an order) cancelling the imprisonment is (obtained) by him accidentally, while [many] other people continue to suffer. In this case you must strive to deal (with all of them) impartially. But one fails to act (thus) on account of the following dispositions: envy, anger, cruelty, hurry, want of practice, laziness, (and) fatigue. (You) must strive for this, that these dispositions may not arise to you. And the root of all this is the absence of anger and the avoidance of hurry. He who is fatigued in the administration (of justice), will not rise; but one ought to move, to walk, and to advance. He who will pay attention to this, must tell you: "See that (you) discharge the debt (which you owe to the king); such and such is the instruction of Devanampriya".

The observance of this produces great fruit, (but its) non-observance (becomes) a great evil. For if one fails to observe this, there will be neither attainment of heaven nor satisfaction of the king. For how (could) my mind be pleased if one badly fulfils this duty? But if (you) observe this, you will attain heaven, and you will discharge the debt (which you owe) to me.

And this edict must be listened to (by all) on (every day) of the constellation. And it may be listened to even by a single (person) also on frequent (other) occasions between (the days of) Tishya. And if (you) act thus, you will be able to fulfil (this duty). For the following purpose has this rescript been written here, (viz.) in order that the judicial officers of the city may strive at all times (for this), [that] neither undeserved fettering nor undeserved harsh treatment are happening to [men]. And for the following purpose I shall send out every five years a Mahamatra who will be neither harsh nor fierce, (but) of gentle actions, (viz. in order to ascertain) whether (the judicial officers), paying attention to this object, are acting thus, as my instruction (implies).

But from Ujjayini also the prince (governor) will send out for the same purpose a person of the same description, and he will not allow (more than) three years to pass (without such a deputation). In the same way (an officer will be deputed) from Takhasila also. When these Mahamatras will set out on tour, then, without neglecting their own duties, they will ascertain this as well, (viz.) whether (the judicial officers) are carrying out this also thus, as the instruction of the king (implies).

Second Separate Major Rock Edict (Dhauili version)

(In Dhauili and Jaugada, on the east coast of India, in the recently conquered territory of Kalinga, Major Rock Edicts 11 to 13 were omitted, but another separate Edict was put in their place, the Second Separate Major Rock Edict, addressed to the officials of Tosali in the Dhauili Separate Edicts and of Somapa in the Jaugada versions. The Second Separate Edict asks the local officials to try to convince "unconquered bordering tribes" that the intentions of Ashoka towards them are benevolent.)

At the word of Devanampriya, the prince (governor) and the Mahamatras at Tosali have to be told (thus).

Whatever I recognize (to be right), that, and to accomplish by (various) means my

As on behalf of (my own) children I desire that they may be provided with complete welfare and happiness in this world and in the other world, thus . . . It might occur to (my) unconquered borderers (to ask): What does the king desire with reference to us? [This] alone is my wish with reference to the borderers, that they may learn that Devanampriya f . . . , that they may not be afraid of me, but may have confidence (in me); that they may obtain only happiness from me / not misery; that they may [learn] this, that Devanampriya -will forgive them what can be forgiven; that they may (be induced) by me (to) practise morality; (and) that they may attain (happiness in) this world and (in) the other world. . .

For the following purpose I am instructing you, (viz. that) I may discharge the debt (which I owe to them) by this, that I instruct (you) and inform (you) of (my) will, my unshakable resolution and vow. Therefore, acting thus, (you) must fulfil (your) duty and must inspire confidence to them, in order that they may learn that Devanampriya is to them like a father, that Devanampriya loves them like himself, and that they are to Devanampriya like (his own) children. Therefore, having instructed (you), and having informed you of (my) will, I shall have (i. e. entertain) officers in (all) provinces for this object. For you are able to inspire confidence to those (borderers) and (to secure their) welfare and happiness in this world and in the other world. And if (you) act thus, you will attain heaven, and will discharge the debt (which you owe) to me.

And for the following purpose has this rescript been written here, (viz.) in order that the Mahamatras may strive at all times to inspire confidence to those borderers (of mine) and (to induce them) to practise morality.

And this rescript must be listened to (by all) every four months on (the day of) the constellation Tishya. But if desired, it may be listened to even by a single (person) also on frequent (other) occasions between (the days of) Tishya. If (you) act thus, you will be able to carry out (my orders).

MAJOR PILLAR EDICTS

(The Major Pillar Edicts of Indian Emperor Ashoka refer to 7 separate major Edicts of Ashoka inscribed on columns, the Pillars of Ashoka, which are significantly detailed and are among the earliest dated inscriptions of any Indian monarch. These texts existed in identical copies and were spread all over the Empire. Examples: Location in the North: today in Delhi, but originally from Topra in Yamunanagar district, Haryana, India. Location in the East: in Lauriya near Areraj, Bethia, Bihar, India.)

Major Pillar Edict No. 1

(Asoka's principle of protection of the people.)

King Devanampriya Priyadarsin speaks thus. This rescript on morality was caused to be written by me (when I had been) anointed twenty-six years.

(Happiness) in this (world) and in the other (world) is difficult to secure without great love of morality, careful examination, great obedience, great fear (of sin), (and) great energy.

But indeed by my instruction this regard for morality and love of morality have been promoted day by day and will progress still (more).

And my agents also, both the high ones and the low ones and those of middle rank, are conforming to and practising (morality), (and are thus) able to stir up fickle (persons).

In the same way the Mahamatras of the borderers also (are acting). For (their) instruction (is) this, viz. to protect according to morality, to dispose according to morality, to cause pleasure according to morality, (and) to guard (their speech) according to morality.

Major Pillar Edict No. 2

(Defines dhamma as a minimum of sins, many virtues, compassion, liberality, truthfulness and purity.)

King Devanampriya Priyadarfiin speaks thus.

(To practise) morality is meritorious; but what does morality include? (It includes) few sins, many virtuous deeds, compassion, liberality, truthfulness, (and) purity.

The gift of spiritual insight also has been bestowed by me in many ways.

On bipeds and quadrupeds, on birds and aquatic animals various benefits have been conferred by me, (even) to the boon of life. And many other virtuous deeds also have been performed by me.

For the following purpose was this rescript on morality caused to be written by me, (viz.) in order that (men) might conform to it, and that it might be of long duration. And he who will act thus will perform good deeds.

Major Pillar Edict No. 3

(Abolishes sins of harshness, cruelty, anger, pride etc.)

King Devanampriya Priyadarsin speaks thus.

(Men) regard only (their) virtuous deeds, (thinking): "This virtuous deed has been performed by me". They do not at all regard (their) evil deeds, (thinking) : "This evil deed has been performed by me". This very (act) is called a sin.

Now this is indeed difficult to recognise. But indeed this ought to be regarded thus: these (passions), viz. fierceness, cruelty, anger, pride, envy, are called sinful. Let me not ruin (myself) by (these) very (passions).

The following ought to be specially regarded: "This (action) conduces to my (happiness) in this (world), that other (action) to my (happiness) in the other (world).

Major Pillar Edict No. 4

(Deals with duties of Rajukas.)

King Devanampriya Priyadarsin speaks thus.

This rescript on morality was caused to be written by me (when I had been) anointed twenty-six years.

My Lajukas are occupied with the people, with many hundred thousands of men.

I have ordered that either rewards or punishments are left to their discretion, in order that the Lajukas should perform (their) duties confidently (and) fearlessly, that they should bestow welfare and happiness on the people of the country, and that they should confer benefits (on them).

They will know how to cause pleasure and to cause pain (to them), and will exhort the people of the country through those who are devoted to morality, in order that they may attain (happiness) both in this (world) and in the other (world).

The Lajukas also must obey me. They will also obey the agents who know (my) wishes. And these (agents) will also exhort those (people), in order that the Lajukas may be able to please me.

For, as one feels confident after having entrusted (his) child to an intelligent nurse, (thinking): "The intelligent nurse will be able to keep my child well", so the Lajukas were appointed by me for the welfare and happiness of the country-people.

In order that they should perform (their) duties, being fearless, confident, (and) unperturbed, for this (purpose) I have ordered that either rewards or punishments are left to the discretion of the Lajukas.

For the following is to be desired, (viz.) that there should be both impartiality in judicial proceedings and impartiality in punishments.

And my order (reaches) even so far (that) a respite of three days is granted by me to persons lying in prison on whom punishment has been passed, (and) who have been condemned to death.

(In this way) either (their) relatives will persuade those [Lajukas] to (grant) their life, or, if there is none who persuades (them), they will bestow gifts or will undergo fasts in order to (attain happiness) in the other (world).

For my desire is this, that, even when the time (of respite) has expired, they should attain (happiness) in the other (world).

And various moral practices, self-control, (and) the distribution of gifts are (thus) promoted among the people.

Major Pillar Edict No. 5

(A list of animals and birds which should not be killed on some days, and another list of animals which have not to be killed at all occasions. Describes the release of 25 prisoners by Asoka.)

King Devanampriya Priyadarsin speaks thus.

(When I had been) anointed twenty-six years, the following animals were declared by me inviolable, viz. parrots, mainas, the aruna, ruddy geese, wild geese, the nandimukha, the gelata, bats, queen-ants, terrapins, boneless fish, the vedaveyaka, the Ganga-puputaka, skate-fish, tortoises and porcupines, squirrels (?), the srimara, bulls set at liberty, iguanas (?), the rhinoceros, white doves, domestic doves, (and) all the quadrupeds which are neither useful nor edible.

Those [she-goats], ewes, and sows (which are) either with young or in milk, are inviolable, and also those (of their) young ones (which are) less than six months old.

Cocks must not be caponed.

Husks containing living animals must not be burnt.

Forests must not be burnt either uselessly or in order to destroy (living beings).

Living animals must not be fed with (other) living animals.

Fish are inviolable, and must not be sold, on the three Chaturmasis (and) on the Tishya full-moon during three days, (viz.) the fourteenth, the fifteenth, (and) the first (tithi), and invariably on every fast-day.

And during these same days also no other classes of animals which are in the elephant-park (and) in the preserves of the fishermen, must be killed.

On the eighth (tithi) of (every) fortnight, on the fourteenth, on the fifteenth, on Tishya, on Punarvasu, on the three Chaturmasis, (and) on festivals, bulls must not be castrated, (and) he-goats, rams, boars, and whatever other (animals) are castrated (otherwise), must not be castrated; (then).

On Tishya, on Punarvasu, on the Chaturmasis, (and) during the fortnight of (every) Chaturmasis, horses (and) bullocks must not be branded.

Until (I had been) anointed twenty-six years, in this period the release of prisoners was ordered by me twenty-five (times).

Major Pillar Edict No. 6

(Dhamma Policy.)

King DavanaApriya Priyadarsin speaks thus.

(When I had been) anointed twelve years, rescripts on morality were caused to be written by me for the welfare and happiness of the people, (in order that), not transgressing those (rescripts), they might attain a promotion of morality in various respects.

(Thinking): "Thus the welfare and happiness of the people (will be secured)" I am directing my attention not only to (my) relatives, but to those who are near and far, in order that I may lead them to happiness, and I am instructing (them) accordingly.

In the same manner I am directing my attention to all classes. And all the sects have been honoured by me with honours of various kinds.

But this is considered by me (my) principal (duty), viz. visiting (the people) personally.

(When I had been) anointed twenty-six years, this rescript on morality was caused to be written by me.

Major Pillar Edict No. 7

(Works done by Asoka for Dhamma Policy. He says that all sects desire both self-control and purity of mind.)

King Devanampriya Priyadarsin speaks thus. The kings who were in times past, had this desire, that men might (be made to) progress by the promotion of morality; but men were not made to progress by an adequate promotion of morality.

Concerning this, king Devanampriya Priyadarsin speaks thus. The following occurred to me. On one hand, in times past kings had this desire, that men might (be made to) progress by an adequate promotion of morality; (but) on the other hand, men were not made to progress by an adequate promotion of morality. How then might men (be made to) conform to (morality)? How might men (be made to) progress by an adequate promotion of morality? How could I elevate them by the promotion of morality?

Concerning this, king Devanampriya Priyadarsin speaks thus. The following occurred to me. I shall issue proclamations on morality, (and) shall order instruction in morality (to be given). Hearing this, men will conform to (it), will be elevated, and will (be made to) progress considerably by the promotion of morality. For this purpose proclamations on morality were issued by me, (and) manifold instruction in morality was ordered (to be given). [In order that those agents] (of mine) too, who are occupied with many people, will exhort (them) and will explain (morality to them) in detail. The Lajukas also, who are occupied with many hundred thousands of men, —these too were ordered by me: "In such and such a manner exhort ye the people who are devoted to morality".

Devanampriya Priyadarsin speaks thus. Having in view this very (matter), I have set up pillars of morality (Dhamma tambhāni, ie "pillars of the Dharma"), appointed Mahamatras of morality (Dhamma Mahāmātā, the "Inspectors of the Dharma"), (and) issued [proclamations] on morality.

King Devanampriya Priyadarsin speaks thus. On the roads banyan-trees were caused to be planted by me, (in order that) they might afford shade to cattle and men, (and) mango-groves were caused to be planted. And (at intervals) of eight kos wells were caused to be dug by me, and flights of steps (for descending into the water) were caused to be built. Numerous drinking-places were caused to be established by me, here and there, for the enjoyment of cattle and men. [But] this so-called enjoyment (is) [of little consequence]. For with various comforts have the people been blessed both by former kings and by myself. But by me this has been done for the following purpose: that they might conform to that practice of morality.

Devanampriya Priyadarsin speaks thus. Those my Mahamatras of morality too are occupied with affairs of many kinds which are beneficial to ascetics as well as to householders, and they are occupied also with all sects. Some (Mahamatras) were ordered by me to busy themselves with the affairs of the Sangha; likewise others were ordered by me to busy themselves also with the Brahmanas (and) Ajivikas; others were ordered by me to busy themselves also with the Nirgranthas; others were ordered by me to busy themselves also with various (other) sects; (thus) different Mahamatras (are busy themselves) specially with different (congregations). But my Mahamatras of morality are occupied with these (congregations) as well as with all other sects.

King Devanampriya Priyadarsin speaks thus. Both these and many other chief (officers) are occupied with the delivery of the gifts of myself as well as of the queens, and among my whole harem [they are reporting] in divers ways different worthy recipients of charity both here and in the provinces. And others were ordered by me to busy themselves also with the delivery of the gifts of (my) sons and of other queens' sons, in order (to promote) noble deeds of morality (and) the practice of morality. For noble deeds of morality and the practice of morality (consist in) this, that (morality), viz. compassion, liberality, truthfulness, purity, gentleness, and goodness, will thus be promoted among men.

King Devanampriya Priyadarsin speaks thus. Whatsoever good deeds have been performed by me, those the people have imitated, and to those they are conforming. Thereby they have been made to progress and will (be made to) progress in obedience to mother and father, in obedience to elders, in courtesy to the aged, in courtesy to Brahmanas and Sramanas, to the poor and distressed, (and) even to slaves and servants.

King Devanampriya Priyadarsin speaks thus. Now this progress of morality among men has been promoted (by me) only in two ways, (viz.) by moral restrictions and by conversion. But among these (two), those moral restrictions are of little consequence; by conversion, however, (morality is promoted) more considerably. Now moral restrictions indeed are these, that I have ordered this, (that) certain animals are inviolable. But there are also many other moral restrictions which have been imposed by me. By conversion, however, the progress of morality among men has been promoted more considerably, (because it leads) to abstention from hurting living beings (and) to abstention from killing animals.

Now for the following purpose has this been ordered, that it may last as long as (my) sons and great-grandsons (shall reign and) as long as the moon and the sun (shall shine), and in order that (men) may conform to it. For if one conforms to this, (happiness) in this (world) and in the other (world) will be attained.

This rescript on morality was caused to be written by me (when I had been) anointed twenty-seven years.

Concerning this, Devanampriya says. This rescript on morality must be engraved there, where either stone pillars or stone slabs are (available), in order that this may be of long duration.

The Aramaic inscription of Laghman

Location: Laghman, Afghanistan.

Translation by André Dupont-Sommer

(The Aramaic inscription of Laghman, also called the Laghman II inscription, is an inscription on a slab of natural rock in the area of Laghman, Afghanistan, written in Aramaic by the Indian emperor Ashoka about 260 BC, and often categorized as one of Minor Rock Edicts of Ashoka. This inscription was published in 1970 by André Dupont-Sommer. Since Aramaic was an official language of the Achaemenid Empire, and reverted to being just its vernacular tongue in 320 BC with the conquests of Alexander the Great, it seems that this inscription was addressed directly to the populations of this ancient empire still present in northwestern India, or to border populations for whom Aramaic remained the language used in everyday life.

The Aramaic Inscription of Laghman is the oldest of the known Ashoka inscriptions, with the Kandahar Bilingual Inscription, both dated to the year 10 of Ashoka's reign.

Another Aramaic inscription, almost identical, was discovered nearby in the Laghman Valley, and published in 1974.)

In the year 10, behold, the king Priyadasi expelled vanity from among prosperous men, friends of that which is vain, friends of those who fish fish creatures.

At 200 "bows", there is over there the place called Tadmor.

This is the KNPTY road, that is to say (the road) of the Garden: more than 120 ("bow"). At TRT', here: 100. Above: 80. Done with Wasu The Judge

(EPILOGUE:

The translation is slightly incomplete but brings some valuable indications. It first mentions the propagation of moral rules, which Ashoka will call "Dharma" in his Edicts of Ashoka, consisting of the abandonment of vanity and respect for the life of the people and animals (here, urging people to give up fishing).

Then, according to semitologist André Dupont-Sommer, who made a detailed analysis of the script observed in multiple rock inscriptions in the Laghman valley as well as in other Aramaic inscriptions of Ashoka, the inscription mentions the city of Tadmor (Tdmr in the Aramaic script in the inscription, ie Palmyra), destination of the great commercial road leading from India to the Mediterranean basin, located at a distance of 3800 km. According to the reading of Dupont-Sommer, Palmyra is separated by two hundreds "bows" from Laghman. In the inscription, the word used to indicate bow is "QSTN", and Dupont-Sommer asserted that it is an Aramaic word denoting a unit to measure a distance of 15 to 20 kilometres, which could represent a day on the road for an archer. Other distances are then given, which makes it possible to interpret Laghman's inscription as a kind of information terminal on the main trade route with the West.

Other texts: The discovery of this inscription follows that of several other inscriptions in Aramaic or Greek (individually, or both languages together), written by Ashoka. The most famous are the Kandahar Bilingual Inscription, written in Greek and Aramaic, or the Greek Edicts of Ashoka, also found in Kandahar. Previously, in 1915, Sir John Marshall had discovered the Aramaic Inscription of Taxila, and in 1932 another inscription in Aramaic was discovered in the Laghman Valley in Pul-i-Darunteh, also called "Laghman I", the Aramaic inscription of Pul-i-Darunteh, then in 1963 an "Indo-Aramaic" inscription alternating Indian Prakrit and the Aramaic language, but using only Aramaic characters, with the Aramaic parts translating the Indian parts transcribed in the Aramaic alphabet, was also discovered in Kandahar: the Aramaic Inscription of Kandahar.)

THE LALITA-VISTARA SUTRA

The Gospel of the Buddha

The Play in Full or The Extensive Play

The Noble Great Vehicle Sūtra

The Story of Siddharta Gautama Buddha

Source: Toh 95, Degé Kangyur, vol. 46

(mdo sde, kha), folios 1b–216b

Translation: Dharmachakra Translation Committee, 2013

Estimated Range of Dating: 2nd century A.D.

(The Lalitavistara Sūtra is a Sanskrit Mahayana Buddhist sutra that tells the story of Gautama Buddha from the time of his descent from Tushita until his first sermon in the Deer Park near Varanasi. The term Lalitavistara has been translated "The Play in Full" or "Extensive Play," referring to the Mahayana view that the Buddha's last incarnation was a "display" or "performance" given for the benefit of the beings in this world.

"The Play in Full" is without a doubt one of the most important sutras within Buddhist Mahayana literature. In some ways, it has similarities with Christian gospels with one significant difference: It does not claim to be history, although it contains some historical facts. With parts of the text dating from the earliest days of the Buddhist tradition, this story of the Buddha's awakening has captivated the minds of devotees, both ordained and lay, as far back as the beginning of the common era.

In brief, The Play in Full tells the story of how the Buddha manifested in this world and attained awakening. The sutra, which is structured in twenty-seven chapters, begins with the Buddha being requested to teach the sutra by several gods, as well as the thousands of bodhisattvas and sravakas in his retinue.

Concerning the origins of the text, the Dharmachakra Translation Committee states: In the early 20th century, P. L. Vaidya believed that the finished Sanskrit text dated to the 3rd century A.D. The text is also said to be a compilation of various works by no single author and includes materials from the Sarvastivada and the Mahayana traditions. . . . This scripture is an obvious compilation of various early sources, which have been strung together and elaborated on according to the Mahāyāna worldview. As such this text is a fascinating example of the ways in which the Mahāyāna rests firmly on the earlier tradition, yet reinterprets the very foundations of Buddhism in a way that fit its own vast perspective. The fact that the text is a compilation is initially evident from the mixture of prose and verse that, in some cases, contains strata from the very earliest Buddhist teachings and, in other cases, presents later Buddhist themes that do not emerge until the first centuries of the common era. Previous scholarship on The Play in Full (mostly published in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries) devoted much time to determining the text's potential sources and their respective time periods, although without much success. [...] Although this topic clearly deserves further study, it is interesting to note that hardly any new research on this sūtra has been published during the last sixty years. As such the only thing we can currently say concerning the sources and origin of The Play in Full is that it was based on several early and, for the most part, unidentified sources that belong to the very early days of the Buddhist tradition.

As an example of how widely the sutra was disseminated, the Lalitavistara Sutra was known to the Mantranaya (Vajrayana) practitioners of Borobudur, who had the text illustrated by stonemasons. The massive Borobudur Temple-Pyramid in Java, Indonesia, is decorated with reliefs contain a series of panels depicting the life of the Buddha as described in the Lalitavistara Sutra. In these reliefs, arranged on 460 panels, the story starts from the glorious descent of the Buddha from the Tushita heaven, and ends with his first sermon in the Deer Park.

The translation of the verses in this document is primarily based on the best preserved original in Sanskrit and another original in Tibetan. This text was translated by the Dharmachakra Translation Committee 85000 under the supervision of Chökyi Nyima Rinpoche. Cortland Dahl, Catherine Dalton, Hilary Herdman, Heidi Koppl, James Gentry, and Andreas Doctor translated the text from Tibetan into English. Andreas Doctor and Wiesiek Mical then compared the translations against the original Tibetan and Sanskrit, respectively.)

The Noble Great Vehicle Sutra - The Play in Full

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 1 — The Setting

[In the first chapter of the sutra, the Buddha is staying at Jetavana with a large gathering of disciples. One evening, a group of divine beings visit the Buddha and request him to tell the story of his awakening for the benefit of all beings. The Buddha consents.]

Homage to all buddhas and bodhisattvas!

Thus have I heard at one time. The Blessed One was staying in Sravasti at Jetavana Grove, in the park of Anāpindada, along with a great saṅgha of twelve thousand monks.

Among them were venerable Jānakaundīyā, venerable Asvajit, venerable Baspa, venerable Mahanama, venerable Bhadrīka, venerable Yasodeva, venerable Vimala, venerable Subahu, venerable Purṇa, venerable Gavāṃpati, venerable Urubīlva Kasyapa, venerable Nadikasyapa, venerable Gayakasyapa, venerable Sariputra, venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, venerable Mahakasyapa, venerable Mahakatyayana, venerable Mahāphila, venerable Kaundīyā, venerable Cūnanda, venerable Purnamaitrayanīputra, venerable Aniruddha, venerable Nandika, venerable Kāphila, venerable Subhūti, venerable Revata, venerable Khadiravanika, venerable Amogharaja, venerable Mahāparanika, venerable Vakkula, venerable Nanda, venerable Rāhula, venerable Svagata, and venerable Ananda.

Along with these monks were 32,000 bodhisattvas, all of whom had only a single birth remaining and were adept in all the perfections of the bodhisattvas. They enjoyed all the superknowledges of the bodhisattvas and had attained all the dharanis and all the confidence of the bodhisattvas. They had completed all the aspirations of the bodhisattvas, understood and realized all discriminating knowledges of the bodhisattvas, and gained mastery over all the absorptions of the bodhisattvas. They had obtained all the powers of the bodhisattvas and dwelt with all the patience of the bodhisattvas. Indeed each of them had completed all the bodhisattva grounds.

Foremost among them were the bodhisattva great being Maitreya, the bodhisattva great being Dhāraṇīsvārāja, the bodhisattva great being Sīṃhaketu, the bodhisattva great being Siddharthamati, the bodhisattva great being Prasāntacarītramati, the bodhisattva great being Pratisamvitprapta, the bodhisattva great being Nīdyoyukta, and the bodhisattva great being Mahākaruṇācāndrīnī.

At that time the Blessed One dwelt in the city of Sravasti, where he was revered by his fourfold retinue, as well as by kings, princes, royal ministers, vassal kings, and attendants. Likewise his followers among the military, the priests, the merchants, the householders, and the royal court revered him. Both city dwellers and those who lived in the countryside, as well as the adherents of non-Buddhist philosophies, spiritual seekers, priests, logicians, and wandering hermits, also revered him. He was treated as their master and showed great respect.

Presented with offerings, the Blessed One received abundant savory food and drink, robes, alms bowls, bedding, healing medicines and remedies, and other appropriate necessities. Yet the great wealth and renown he enjoyed were like drops of water rolling off the petals of a lotus flower. The Blessed One remained detached and untainted by it all.

As the Blessed One's fame spread throughout the world, he became known by various names and epithets, such as the Blessed One, the Worthy One, the Perfectly and Completely Awakened One, He Who Is Both Wise and Virtuous, the Bliss-Gone One, the Knower of the World, the Peerless Guide Who Tames Beings, the Teacher of Gods and Men, and the Blessed Buddha.

Endowed with the fivefold vision, the Blessed One taught the inhabitants of this and other worlds, each with its gods, Mara, Brahma, monks, nuns, and priests.

To all these beings, gods and humans alike, he taught what he himself had realised, and what he had thereby actualized and accomplished.

The teachings he gave were virtuous in the beginning, virtuous in the middle, and virtuous in the end. Sublime in both word and meaning, the Dharma he taught was at once distinct, complete, pure, and wholesome. He taught all these beings how to live a life of purity.

One evening during his midnight session, the Blessed One entered a state of deep absorption known as the array of the Buddha's adornments. The moment he entered into this state of absorption, the ray of light known as the light of wisdom free from attachment that arouses the memory of the buddhas of times past shone forth from the protuberance on the crown of his head. Illuminating all the pure heavenly realms, the light attracted Mahesvara and innumerable other divine sons. From the mass of light that radiated from the Thus-Gone One, the following verses of exhortation arose:

"Come commune with the Sage, the Lion of the Sakyas.

Sublime, supremely brilliant, and pure,

The light of wisdom he radiates dispels darkness.

Peaceful in form, his mind is virtuous and tranquil.

"Take as your master the one with natural mastery of the Dharma,

An ocean of wisdom, with power both vast and pure,

The sovereign of the Dharma, the all-knowing lord of sages, A god of gods, revered by gods and humans alike.

"Go before the Peaceful One, the One Who Is Liberated,

He who has mastered those minds that are difficult to tame

And whose own mind is free from the snares of Mara,

For seeing him and hearing him is not without benefit.

"With supreme devotion, go, all of you,

Before the One Who Is Peerless in Illuminating the Dharma,

Who dispels darkness and shows the sublime way

With peaceful conduct and knowledge infinite in scope.

"As the king of doctors, he dispenses divine nectar,

Conquering the evil hordes with his courageous eloquence.

He is a friend of the Dharma and knows the ultimate.

He is a peerless guide who illuminates the path."

Struck by the light of wisdom free from attachment, which arouses the memory of the buddhas of times past, the divine sons of the pure heavenly realms were inspired by these verses and immediately arose from their tranquil absorptions. Through the power of the Buddha, they recalled the blessed buddhas of innumerable and incalculable eons, remembering the qualities of the buddha realms of each blessed buddha, as well as the retinue that surrounded the buddhas and the teachings they gave.

That night, just as people went to bed, the divine sons of the pure heavenly realms visited the Blessed One. Among them were Isvara, Mahesvara, Nanda, Sunanda, Candana, Mahita, Prasanta, Prasantavinitesvara, and many other divine sons of the pure heavenly realms. With their brilliant colours, they illuminated the entire Jetavana Grove with a divine light. Placing their heads at his feet, they prostrated [Koutou, that is the act of deep respect for or submission to deities and saints shown by prostration, that is, kneeling and bowing so low as to have one's head touching the ground. This is practised by Buddhist, Jainists, Sikhs, Christians (mainly of the Oriental Orthodox churches), and on occasions by Jews, Muslims, Catholic Christians and some Protestant Christians] to the Blessed One and then stood to one side, supplicating him with the following words:

"Blessed One, there is an extensive collection of discourses on the Dharma that bears the name Lalitavistara (The Play in Full). This teaching illuminates the basic virtues of the bodhisattvas, showing how the Bodhisattva descended from the sublime palace in the Heaven of Joy, intentionally entered the womb, and sojourned in the womb. It shows the power of the place where he was born to a noble family, and how he surpassed others through all the superior special qualities that he demonstrated through his actions as a youth. It shows his many unique qualities, such as his skills in craftsmanship, activity, writing, arithmetic, calculations, astrology, fencing, archery, feats of physical strength, and wrestling, demonstrating his superiority to all other beings in these areas. It shows how he enjoyed his retinue of consorts and the pleasures of his kingdom.

"This teaching proclaims how he attained the result brought about by the concordant cause of all the bodhisattva activities, showing how he manifested as a bodhisattva and destroyed the legions of Mara. It explains the ten powers, the four fearlessnesses, and the other innumerable qualities of a thus-gone one, and presents the infinite teachings taught by the thus-gone ones of times past, including the blessed Padmottara, Dharmaketu, Dipamkara, Gunaketu, Mahakara, Rsideva, Sritejas, Satyaketu, Vajrasamhata, Sarvabhīhu, Hemavarna, Atyuccagamin, Prabalasagara, Puspaketu, Vararupa, Sulocana, Rśigupta, Jinavakra, Unnata, Puspita, Urnatejas, Puskara, Surasmi, Maṅgala, Sudarsana, Mahasīṃhatejas, Sthitabuddhidatta, Vasantagandhin, Satyadharmavipulakīrti, Tīśya, Pūśya, Lokasundara, Vīśtirābheda, Ratnakīrti, Ugratejas, Brahmatejas, Sughosa, Supūśa, Sumanojāghosa, Sucestarupa, Prahasitanetra, Gunarasi, Meghasvara, Sundaravarna, Ayustejas, Salilagajagamin, Lokabhīlasita, Jitasatru, Sampujita, Vipasyin, Sikhin, Vīśvabhu, Krakucchanda, Kanakamuni, and the thus-gone one, the worthy one, the perfectly and completely awakened Kasyapa.

"Blessed One, please teach this now to heal the multitude of beings. Teach it to bring them happiness. Teach it out of love for the world, to benefit a great multitude of beings, gods and humans alike. Teach it to be our doctor and to bring us happiness. Teach it to propagate this Great Vehicle. Please teach it to defeat our opponents and overpower all demonic forces; to instruct all the bodhisattvas and inspire all those who follow the Bodhisattva Vehicle to arouse diligence; to embrace the true Dharma and ensure the continuity of the Three Jewels. Please teach it to illuminate all the enlightened activities of the Buddha."

Out of love for these divine sons, and indeed for the entire world including the gods, the Blessed One remained silent, thereby offering his consent. Seeing that this silence indicated the Blessed One's consent, the divine sons were overjoyed and content. With happiness and delight, they prostrated at his feet and circled him three times, scattering sandalwood powder, aloewood powder, and mandarava flowers. Then they vanished.

At dawn the next day, the Blessed One proceeded to a circular bamboo grove. Surrounded by the assembly of bodhisattvas, and with the Saṅgha of listeners gathered before him, he sat down on the seat they had prepared and addressed the monks:

"Monks, this evening a group of divine sons from the pure heavenly realms came before me. Among them were Isvara, Mahesvara, Nanda, Sunanda, Candana, Mahita, Prasanta, Vinitesvara, and many others."

The Blessed One then continued to recount the events of the previous evening, up to the point where the divine sons disappeared. Bowing before the Blessed One with palms joined, the bodhisattvas and great listeners then made the following request:

"Blessed One! Please grant us the teaching entitled The Play in Full. Please teach this now to heal the multitude of beings and bring them happiness. Please teach it out of love for the world and to benefit the myriad of beings, gods and humans alike. Please teach it to benefit the great bodhisattvas of the present and to benefit future generations. Please teach it so that you can be our doctor and bring us happiness."

Out of love for the great bodhisattvas, for the great listeners, for gods, humans, and demigods, and indeed for the entire world, the Blessed One remained silent, thereby offering his consent. He then addressed the assembly:

"Monks, last night as I rested here,

Comfortable and free from afflictions,

And dwelling evenly with one-pointed concentration,

A group of divine sons arrived before me.

"With great miraculous powers and brilliant colours,

They were pristine, blazing with magnificence.

Illuminating Jetavana Grove with their splendour,

They joyfully approached me.

"There were millions of gods,

Including Mahesvara, Candana, Isvara, Nanda,

Prasantacitta, Mahita, Sunanda,

And a divine son called Santa.

"They prostrated at my feet, circumambulated me,

And gathered here before me.

They joined their palms with respect

And offered me this request:

"To heal all the worlds,

This vast sutra, this great discourse,

Was taught by all the victorious ones of times past.

Today as well, O Sage, since you have dispelled attachment,

"Consider the assembly of bodhisattvas,

Defeat opponents and tame all demons,

By teaching us this supreme Great Vehicle.

Thus, Able One, please grant us your lucid explanations."

"The assembly of gods thus offered their request,

And with my silence, I indicated my consent.

This brought them joy and satisfaction,

And with delight they scattered flower petals.

"Thus listen here, monks, to this vast sutra,

Taught in times past by all the thus-gone ones

For the welfare of all the worlds.

Listen, one and all, to this great discourse."

This concludes the first chapter on the setting.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 2 — The Inspiration

[The following morning, the Buddha tells his story to the gathered disciples. He begins the story by telling of his previous life, in which the future Buddha was living in the heavenly realms surrounded by divine pleasures. In this previous life, he was known as the Bodhisattva. The Bodhisattva is enjoying the immense pleasures of his heavenly life, but due to his past aspirations, one day the musical instruments of the heavenly palace call out to him, reminding him of his prior commitment to attain awakening.]

Now, monks, what is this extensive discourse on the Dharma known as The Play in Full?

Monks, the Bodhisattva dwelt in the supreme realm of the Heaven of Joy, where he received offerings, empowerments, and was praised and revered by one hundred thousand gods. He had achieved his goal and was elevated by his former aspirations.

His intelligence was such that he had attained the entire range of the Buddhadharmā. Indeed his eye of wisdom was at once both vast and utterly pure. Radiating with mindfulness, intelligence, realisation, modesty, and joyfulness, his mind was extremely powerful. He had mastered the perfections of generosity, discipline, patience, diligence, concentration, knowledge, and skillful means, and was adept in the fourfold path of Brahma: great love, great compassion, great joy, and great equanimity. With great awareness, he was free of obscurations and had manifested the vision of wisdom free from attachment. Likewise he had perfected each and every quality of awakening: the applications of mindfulness, the thorough relinquishments, the bases of miraculous power, the faculties, the powers, the branches of awakening, and the path.

Sublime signs and marks, indicating his boundless accumulation of merit and wisdom, beautifully adorned the body of the Bodhisattva, who had engaged in proper conduct for a long time. Acting in perfect accordance with his words, his unerring statements were always genuine. At once honest, straightforward, and free from guile, his mind was invincible.

Free of pride, conceit, arrogance, fear, and timidity, he was impartial toward all beings.

The Bodhisattva had paid homage to countless awakened beings, to billions upon billions of buddhas. His loving gaze was revered by billions upon billions of bodhisattvas. Likewise Sakra, Brahma, Mahesvara, the guardians of the world, gods, nagas, gandharvas, demigods, garudas, kinnaras, and yaksas, in their multitudes, rejoiced in his glory.

Having perfectly discerned their every word, the Bodhisattva's learned understanding of the teachings was at once unimpeded, discerning, and perfect. He was an unerring vessel of mindfulness, able to recall the teachings of all the buddhas. The number of dharanis he had received was infinite. The Bodhisattva was the great captain of the vessel of the Dharma, which he had perfectly accomplished through the applications of mindfulness, the thorough relinquishments, the bases of miraculous power, the faculties, the powers, the branches of awakening, the path, the perfection of knowledge, the precious quality of skillful means, and merit. With the intention to travel beyond the four rivers, he conquered Mara, subdued hostile forces, and defeated all of his opponents. Indeed he set himself at the frontlines and destroyed the enemy hordes of the afflictions with the firm vajra weapon of supreme wisdom.

This great being was like a lotus. Having a stem of great compassion deeply rooted in the mind of awakening, this lotus was born of superior intention. It was sprinkled with the water of profound diligence and had skillful means as its centre, branches of awakening for its anthers, and mental stability for its stamen. This lotus arose from an immaculate ocean of a vast accumulation of virtues. Its blossoming petals, illuminated by moonlight free from the torment of pride and arrogance, were pristine.

Emitting the scent of discipline, study, and conscientious speech unhindered throughout the ten directions, this lotus was foremost throughout the world in terms of knowledge, yet untainted by the eight worldly concerns. It radiated the sweet fragrance of the accumulation of merit and wisdom, while the sunlight of knowledge and wisdom warmed it, causing the hundred petals of its pure vision to blossom. The Bodhisattva was a lion among men. Swift and strong were his four bases of miraculous power, just as the claws and fangs of the four noble truths were extremely sharp. He bared the fangs of the four communions with Brahma and gathered others through the four ways of attraction with his head. With a well-proportioned body, due to having understood the twelve links of dependent origination, and a flowing mane of the complete perfection of the thirty-seven branches of awakening, along with awareness and wisdom, his mouth opened with the three gateways to liberation, while his eyes indicated the utter purity of tranquility and insight. He dwelt in the mountain caves of mental stability, complete liberation, absorption, and deep meditation.

Born of the jungles of the four activities and discipline, he was endowed with the ten powers, the fourfold fearlessness, and perfect might. The hairs on his body did not bristle with the fear of creation and destruction, nor did his valor ever diminish. He subdued the masses of non-Buddhists, who are like rabbits and deer, letting out the great lion's roar of no self.

As the sun of great beings, light rays of knowledge radiated from the orb of his liberation and concentration, dispelling the light of the swarms of non-Buddhists, who are like fireflies, and eliminating the darkness and obscuring film of ignorance. Indeed, with brilliant strength and diligence, the radiant majesty of his merit shone brightly among gods and humans.

As the light of the moon, there was no darkness within him; he perfectly embodied all that is wholesome. The sight of him was beautiful to behold and pleasing to the mind, and his eye faculty was unobstructed. Adored by the constellations of one hundred thousand gods, the moonlight of the soothing branches of awakening radiated from this sphere of concentration, liberation, and wisdom, causing the lilies among humans and gods to bloom.

The Great Bodhisattva was followed by a fourfold retinue, like the moon by the four continents, and he was endowed with the jewels of the seven branches of awakening. He engaged all beings equally and possessed an unimpeded analytical capacity.

His intention was enhanced by the sublime and perfectly complete austerities and spiritual practices that he observed on the path of the ten virtuous activities. As the king of Dharma, he turned the precious wheel of the supreme Dharma without hindrance, having been born into a line of universal monarchs.

Filled with all the precious teachings, including that of dependent origination, so profound and difficult to fathom, he never tired of study. Thus his boundless wisdom had become vast and all-encompassing. His discipline was beyond measure as well.

Indeed his mind was as vast as the oceans and the earth. Equal to earth, water, fire, and air, his mind was as firm and unmoving as Mount Meru. He was free from attachment and aversion, with a mind as pristine and open as the centre of space; it was vast and unlike any other. His superior intent was utterly pure. His acts of generosity were done well, as were his previous endeavors and his superior deeds.

He sought out all basic virtues and had formed positive habitual tendencies. Ascertaining the basic virtues, he practiced all such virtues for seven incalculable eons. He practiced the seven forms of generosity and engaged in the five types of action that create merit, just as he tread the path of the ten virtues—the three physical, the four verbal, and the three mental wholesome actions—and practiced the forty kinds of correct application. Likewise did he make the forty kinds of correct aspiration, immerse himself in the forty kinds of right intention, perfect the forty kinds of liberation, and erect the forty kinds of right interest.

He took ordination with 4 million buddhas and presented 5.5 million buddhas with offerings. Similarly the Bodhisattva served 1.54 billion solitary buddhas. Establishing innumerable sentient beings on the paths to the higher realms and liberation, he desired to become perfectly and completely awakened, to attain supreme, genuine, and complete awakening.

With only one lifetime remaining, he passed away and was reborn in the supreme realm of the Heaven of Joy as a supreme divine child named Svetaketu. The assembly of gods showed him great reverence, honouring him as one who would leave their midst and take birth in the human world, where before long he would become the Buddha, attaining perfect, complete, and unexcelled awakening.

He dwelt in a celestial palace with 32,000 floors, adorned with verandas, domes, architraves, skylights, cool pavilions, multiple stories, and courtyards. This palace was filled with parasols, flags, and streaming banners; it was covered by canopies of tiny jeweled bells and strewn with mandarava and mahamandarava flowers.

The songs of millions upon millions of celestial maidens could be heard throughout. Its enchanting, even grounds were covered with golden canopies and filled with various trees, such as mountain ebonies, magnolias, trumpet vines, orchids, muchalindas, mahamuchalindas, asokas, banyans, persimmon trees, narras, karnikaras, kesaras, salas, and coral trees. In every direction there were flowered canopies, overflowing with jyotis, malikas, barasikas, taranis, sumanas, bali, kotaranis, and other sweet-smelling flowers. Likewise there were danukari flowers, celestial flowers, blue lotuses, pink lotuses, water lilies, and white lotuses. Various birds flew through the air, singing out their beautiful melodies. Among them were parrots, sarikas, cuckoos, geese, peacocks, ducks, pheasants, snipe, partridge, and many others.

Millions upon millions of gods turned their eyes toward the palace and gazed at it in awe. The great and vast Dharma was proclaimed throughout, and thereby the force of their enthusiastic desire subdued all the afflictions, eliminating pride, conceit, arrogance, aggression, rage, and anger, and bringing about happiness, well-being, joy, and mindfulness on a vast scale.

The Bodhisattva dwelt comfortably in this great celestial palace, where a discourse on the genuine Dharma emerged amid a symphony of 84,000 musical instruments. From their sound, the following verses of inspiration arose, telling of the many virtuous deeds that the Bodhisattva carried out in times past:

"Recall the power of your vast store of merit
And the illuminating knowledge of your boundless intelligence,
Peerless strength, and great power.

Recall the prophecy of Dipamkara.
"With a mind free from the vast range of impurities,
You have pacified conceit and flaws, relinquishing the three stains,

While your virtuous heart is at once pristine and free from fault.
Bring to mind your generous deeds of times past.

"You have cultivated tranquility and discipline,
Practiced austerities and patience, subdued and diligent.
With concentration and the strength of knowledge,
Bring to mind all the deeds you engaged in over billions of eons.

"You developed love for all sentient beings
And made offerings to billions of buddhas.
Remember, do not forget, you who are of infinite renown!
Now the time has come—do not let it slip away!

"Immaculate One—destroyer of the afflictions, birth, and death—

Gods, nagas, yaksas, gandharvas,
And the powerful demigods await you.
You who know the way of death and passing away, take rebirth.

"Even enjoying pleasurable things for thousands of eons
Will not satisfy them, just as saltwater will not slake one's thirst.

Now that you yourself are sated, be kind;
Please satisfy those who have thirsted for so long.

"Are you not one of untarnished reputation
Who takes delight in the Dharma, not desire?
And furthermore your eyes are unblemished,
So now please look with love upon the world with its gods.
"Were the millions of gods not satisfied
Upon hearing the Dharma from you?
So now please cast your gaze upon those who dwell
In the lower realms, those who have no freedom.
"With your mighty, unblemished gaze, have you not observed

The buddhas throughout the ten directions of the world,
Listening to them as they teach the Dharma?
Please therefore reveal this supreme Dharma to the world.
"Glorious One, do you not adorn the palace in the Heaven of Joy

With the splendour of your merit?
So please, with the heart of compassion,
Rain down upon the victory banner of Jambudvipa.

"Many gods of the realm of form,
Who have transcended the realm of desire,
Are all rejoicing in you, saying,
'Reach awakening through your austerities!'

"Protector, you are to conquer the works of Mara
And bring defeat to the non-Buddhists.
Has awakening not been placed in the palm of your hand?
The time has now come—do not let it slip away!

"Courageous One, like a great bank of clouds,
You cover this world that blazes with the fire of afflictions.
Please send down a shower of nectar
And soothe the afflictions of gods and humans.

"Like a skilled doctor who knows the constitutions of his patients,

You dispense medicine to those who are chronically ill.
With the healing salve of the threefold liberation,
Bring these beings swiftly to the blissful state of nirvana.
"Not hearing the lion's roar,
Jackals yelp without fear.

Let forth the lion's roar of the buddhas,
Striking fear into the hearts of the jackal-like non-Buddhists.

"Holding the lamp of knowledge in your hand,
You have a power of strength and diligence unique upon the earth.

Now you must defeat Mara,
Touching the earth with the perfect palm of your hand.
"The four guardians of the world are present,
Waiting to offer you an alms bowl.

Sakra, Brahma, and millions of others are present as well,
Waiting to receive you when you take birth.
"You with sublime wisdom, you whose line is great indeed,
Cast your gaze upon the great family with whom you will live.

Observe the precious, exalted family among whom you will take birth,
For this is where you will manifest the conduct of a bodhisattva.

"When a precious jewel is placed in the right vessel,
It makes the jewel even more glorious.
Likewise let your pristine mind, like a precious jewel,
Rain down upon the victory banner of Jambudvipa."

Thus did the melodious sounds
Of many verses such as these spring forth,
Exhorting the Compassionate One with the words:
"The time is now—do not let it slip away!"

This concludes the second chapter on the inspiration.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 3 — The Purity of the Family

[Upon being reminded of his previous commitments, the Bodhisattva announces, to the despair of the gods in this realm, that he will abandon his divine pleasures in order take birth in the human realm and there attain complete awakening.]

Monks, in this way the Bodhisattva was exhorted that the time for the Dharma had come. Emerging from that great celestial palace, the Bodhisattva went to the great Dharmocaya Palace, where he taught the Dharma to the gods in the Heaven of Joy. In the palace, he seated himself upon a lion throne known as Sublime Dharma. He was joined in the palace by a group of divine sons whose good fortune equaled that of the Bodhisattva, and who had entered the same vehicle. Bodhisattvas with similar conduct to the Bodhisattva gathered from throughout the ten directions. Retinues with equally pure intentions accompanied the divine sons, without the assembly of divine maidens and even without ordinary divine sons. Altogether a retinue of 680 million entered the palace, each sitting on a lion throne according to rank. The Bodhisattva then spoke: "Monks, in twelve years the Bodhisattva shall enter the womb of his mother."

At that time the divine sons from the pure realms ventured to Jambudvipa. Hiding their divine forms, they took on the guise of priests and taught the Vedas to other priests. They made it known that one who entered the womb in this manner would be a great being possessed of thirty-two marks: "Someone with such marks would become one of two things. There would be no third option," they said. "If such an individual were to live as a householder, he would become a universal monarch with a fourfold army. He would become a conqueror, a righteous Dharma king. Such a king would have the seven treasures: the precious wheel, the precious elephant, the precious horse, the precious jewel, the precious wife, the precious steward, and the precious minister.

"How is it that a universal monarch comes to possess the precious wheel? Such a wheel can only belong to a king who has been appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class. On the fifteenth day of the lunar month, while observing a posadha fast, the king will first wash his head and then go to the top terrace of the palace, surrounded by the women of the female quarters. Then a precious, divine wheel with one thousand spokes will appear from the east. As high as seven tala trees, the wheel, which is not made by a smith, is round with a central hub and made entirely of gold.

"This precious, divine wheel will now belong to the king, who is appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class. As he sees it, he will think to himself, 'I have heard that if a precious, divine wheel appears from the east when a king, who has been appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class, ascends to the top floor of the palace surrounded by a gathering of women while observing a posadha fast on the fifteenth day of the lunar month, then he shall become a universal monarch. Since I can now clearly perceive this precious, divine wheel, I must certainly be a universal monarch!'

"The king appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class will then draw his cloak back from one shoulder and lower his right knee to the ground. Turning the precious, divine wheel with his right hand, he will proclaim, 'Precious wheel, noble and divine, please turn in harmony with the Dharma, rather than that which is not the Dharma.'

"The precious, divine wheel, set in motion by the king appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class, will magically travel through space to the east, followed by the universal monarch and his four battalions. Wherever the wheel comes to rest, there the king appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class and his four battalions will set up their camp.

"As he travels, the provincial kings of the eastern lands will come to greet him, carrying silver vessels filled with gold dust, and gold vessels filled with fragments of silver. 'Welcome lord,' they will say. 'Please come. This kingdom is yours. It is extremely vast and prosperous. With bountiful harvests, it is both delightful and populous. Indeed it is filled with people. Now that you have arrived in this land, lord, it is yours. We beseech you to stay.'

"Replying to the provincial kings, the king appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class will respond, 'May you rule your respective kingdoms according to the Dharma, and not by what is not Dharma. Do not take the lives of living beings, do not take what is not given, and do not engage in sexual misconduct. Likewise you should refrain from telling lies, sowing discord, speaking harshly, and talking frivolously.

Do not let your mind be overcome by covetousness, malice, or misguided beliefs. Do not befriend those who take life or those with misguided beliefs. Should non-Dharma arise in my dominion, do not applaud those who practice it.' In this way the king, who is appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class, will conquer the east.

"Having conquered the east, the precious wheel will then move toward the eastern seas. Crossing over them, it will travel magically through space to the south, accompanied by the universal monarch and his four battalions. As before he will conquer the south, and then move on to conquer the west and the north.

"Once the king has conquered the north, the wheel will move toward the northern seas and, traveling magically through the sky to the royal palace, it will come to rest unharmed at the entrance to the quarters of the queen's retinue. In this manner the king appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class comes to possess the precious wheel. "How is it that a universal monarch comes to possess the precious elephant?"

The precious elephant of the king appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class appears in the same way that the precious wheel appeared. Completely white in colour, the precious elephant has four limbs, two tusks, and a trunk. Its head is ornamented with gold, and it bears a gold victory banner. Likewise it is bedecked with gold ornaments and covered with gold netting. Its magical powers enable it to fly through the sky and transform itself. This king of elephants is known as Bodhi. "When the king appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class wishes to examine the precious elephant, he will mount it at daybreak and travel throughout this great earth, which is surrounded by oceans. After returning to the royal palace, he will fondly resume his governance. In this manner the universal monarch comes to possess the precious elephant.

"How is it that a universal monarch comes to possess the precious horse? The precious horse of the king appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class appears just as before. The precious horse has a blue body and a black head with a braided mane. It is bridled, bearing a gold victory banner and gold ornaments, and it is covered with gold netting. With its magical powers, it can fly through the sky and transform itself. This king of horses is known as Balahaka.

"When the king appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class wishes to examine the precious horse, he will mount it at daybreak and travel throughout this great earth, which is surrounded by oceans. After returning to the royal palace, he will fondly resume his governance. In this manner the universal monarch comes to possess the precious horse.

"How is it that a universal monarch comes to possess the precious jewel? The precious jewel of the king appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class appears just as before. It is a lapis lazuli gem of pure blue colour, with eight facets and very fine craftsmanship. With the light emitted from the precious jewel, the entire female quarters are bathed in light.

"When the king appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class wishes to examine the precious jewel, then, at midnight, in complete darkness, he will affix it to the tip of a victory banner and venture out in the gardens to observe the sublime grounds. The light emitted by the precious jewel will illuminate the surrounding area for an entire league, including all four battalions of the king's army. The people who dwell in the vicinity of the precious jewel will be illuminated by its radiance. Seeing and recognising each other, they will say to one another, 'Wake up, friends. Start your work and get to the market. The sun is up and the day has begun.' In this manner the universal monarch appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class comes to possess the precious jewel.

"How is it that the universal monarch appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class comes to possess the precious wife? The precious wife of the king appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class appears just as before. In accord with tradition, the precious wife has been born into the warrior class. She is not too tall or short, too fat or thin, too dark or fair. Indeed she is beautiful in form, pleasant in manner, and pleasing to the eye. In the full bloom of life, every pore of her body emits the scent of sandalwood, while her mouth smells with the fragrance of a lotus flower. Her body is as soft to the touch as the finest cloth; in cold weather her body is warm to the touch, and in warm weather it is cool. Her mind, let alone her body, desires no one other than the universal monarch. In this manner the universal monarch comes to possess the precious wife.

"How is it that the universal monarch appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class comes to possess the precious steward? The precious steward of the king appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class appears just as before. Learned, lucid, and intelligent, the precious steward's divine sight will enable him to perceive treasures—both those that are owned and those that are not—in the surrounding area for up to an entire league. With those treasures that do not belong to anyone, he will cater to the material needs of the universal monarch. In this manner the universal monarch comes to possess the precious steward. "How is it that the universal monarch appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class comes to possess the precious minister? The precious minister of a king appointed to the highest rank of the ruling class appears just as before. The precious minister is learned, lucid, and intelligent. The universal monarch merely has to think of commissioning an army and it is done. In this manner the universal monarch comes to possess the precious minister. The universal monarch thus possesses these seven treasures.

"The universal monarch will also have one thousand sons. Brave, heroic, and supremely able in body, these sons will attain nothing but victory over the forces that oppose them. Without resorting to punishment or acts of violence, the king will rule with the Dharma, bringing peace and order to the entire vast kingdom that extends all the way to the oceans.

"If, however, he leaves his family behind and becomes a monk, he will become a buddha. Relinquishing the attachment of desire, and without relying on anyone else as a guide, he will become the teacher of gods and humans."

With these words, the divine sons inspired the priests to recite the Vedas. In a similar manner, other divine sons arrived in Jambudvīpa to exhort the solitary buddhas. "Noble ones," they said. "Give up this buddha realm. In twelve years' time, the Bodhisattva will enter the womb of his mother."

Monks, at that time there was a solitary buddha named Mataṅgawho dwelt on Mount Goḷaṅgulaparivartana in the city of Rajagrha. Hearing the exhortation of the gods, he became as still as mud resting upon a boulder, then rose up into the sky to the height of seven tala trees. Merging with the fire element, like a torch he passed into nirvana. His bile and phlegm, ligaments and bones, and flesh and blood were completely consumed by fire, leaving nothing but a few spherical relics on the ground. Even today, they are known as the footprints of the sage.

Monks, at this same time five hundred solitary buddhas were assembled in a deer park outside Varanasi. They too heard the exhortation of the gods, rose up into the sky to the height of seven tala trees and, turning into fire, passed into nirvana like a torch. Their bile and phlegm, ligaments and bones, and flesh and blood were completely consumed by fire. Nothing was left behind, save a few spherical relics that fell to the ground. From this point on, the area came to be known as Rṣipātana, or the Hill of the Fallen Sages. The area also came to be known as Mrgadava, or the Deer Park, since deer frolicked there without fear.

Monks, in this manner the Bodhisattva dwelt in the supreme realm of the Heaven of Joy, where he beheld four great visions. What were these four? He beheld the time of his birth, the continent of his birth, the country of his birth, and the family of his birth.

And why, monks, did the Bodhisattva behold the time of his birth? Because a bodhisattva does not enter his mother's womb at the beginning of time when sentient beings are evolving. Rather it is when the world has formed and when birth, old age, sickness, and death have become known that a bodhisattva enters his mother's womb.

And why, monks, did the Bodhisattva behold the continent of his birth? Because a bodhisattva is not born in an outlying continent, nor is he born on the eastern continent of Purvavideha, on the western continent of Aparagodaniya, or on the northern continent of Uttarakuru. Rather a bodhisattva is born on the southern continent of Jambudvīpa.

And why, monks, did the Bodhisattva behold the country of his birth? Because a bodhisattva is not born in outlying lands where people are as stupid as sheep, with dull faculties, ignorant, and incapable of distinguishing right from wrong. Rather a bodhisattva is born in a central land. And why, monks, did the Bodhisattva behold the family of his birth? Because a bodhisattva is not born into an inferior family, like a family of outcastes, flute makers, cartwrights, or servants. A bodhisattva is only born into one of two families—a priestly family or a family of the ruling class. When the priestly families are dominant in the world, the bodhisattva is born into a priestly family. When the ruling-class families are dominant in the world, the bodhisattva is born into a ruling-class family. Thus, monks, at this time the ruling-class families were dominant in the world, so bodhisattvas were born into such families.

Relying on his superior ability, the Bodhisattva beheld these four great visions as he dwelt in the supreme realm of the Heaven of Joy. Having seen them, he remained silent.

Monks, the divine sons and bodhisattvas then asked one another: "Into what precious family will the Bodhisattva be born? In what mother's womb will he be conceived?"

Some said, "The Vaideha family in the land of Magadha is wealthy, prosperous, and happy. This is a fitting place for the Bodhisattva to be conceived."

"This is not a worthy place for the Bodhisattva to be conceived," others responded, "for the mother's family is not pure, nor is the father's. The family's fortunes have come about from little merit, not a vast store of merit. They are impetuous, unstable, and fickle. The surrounding environs of their land are like a desert, with few groves, lakes, and ponds. This is a primitive land, like a remote village. Hence this is not a worthy place for the Bodhisattva to take birth."

Some said, "The Kosala family has a large retinue, many mounts, and great wealth. This is a fitting place for the Bodhisattva to be conceived."

"This is not a worthy place, either," others replied. "The Kosala family descends from outcastes. Neither the father's nor the mother's families are pure. Their interests are base and their line is ignoble. Moreover, they have no limitless store of wealth and treasures. Hence this is not a worthy place for the Bodhisattva to take birth." Some said, "The family of the king of Vatsa is wealthy, prosperous, and happy. This is a fitting place for the Bodhisattva to be conceived."

To this, others replied, "This is not a worthy place. The family of the king of Vatsa is base, violent, and lacking in nobility. They are illegitimate by birth, and their accomplishments have not resulted from the noble deeds of their parents. The king is a nihilist. Hence this is not a worthy place for the Bodhisattva to take birth, either."

Some suggested, "The city of Vaisali is wealthy, prosperous, and happy. Delightful and teeming with people, it is like a heavenly palace, with terraces, balconies, architraves, skylights, cool pavilions, multistoried buildings, and palaces. This city is filled with blooming flowers, ringed with gardens, and encircled by forests. This is a worthy place for the Bodhisattva to be conceived."

"This is not a worthy place, either," others replied. "They do not speak to one another with decorum. They have no Dharma practice, nor do they respect their superiors, elders, leaders, or those in between. Each thinks that he is king, never taking on the role of a student or accepting the Dharma. Hence this city is not worthy of the Bodhisattva, either."

Others said, "The Pradyota family in the city of Ujjayini has a great army and many mounts. They have emerged victorious in battle over their foes. This is a fitting place for the Bodhisattva to be conceived."

To this the response came, "This is not a worthy place, for these people are malicious and violent. They are uncivilized, wild, and impetuous, without any heed for the consequences of their actions. Hence this is not an appropriate place for the Bodhisattva to be conceived."

Some said, "The city of Mathura is rich, prosperous, and happy. It is populous, filled with people. The royal palace of King Subahu, who commands an army of brave warriors, is a fitting place for the Bodhisattva to be conceived."

"This is not a worthy place," others replied. "This king was born into a family with wrong views. Indeed he is like a savage, so it is inappropriate for the Bodhisattva to take his final existence in a family with wrong views. Hence this as well is not an appropriate place for the Bodhisattva to be conceived."

Some suggested, "The king of the city of Hastinapura was born in the family descended from Pandu. This king is brave, courageous, and handsome. He has conquered opposing armies. Thus it is fitting for the Bodhisattva to be conceived in this family."

To this, others responded, "This family is also not worthy of the Bodhisattva. Those born into the Pandava family have confused their genealogy. They say that Yudhishtira is the son of Dharma, that Bhimasena is the son of Vayu, that Arjuna is the son of Indra, and that Nakula and Sahadeva are the sons of the two Asvins. Hence it is not proper for the Bodhisattva to be conceived in this family."

Some said, "The city of Mithila is extremely beautiful and prosperous. This is the land ruled by King Sumitra, who has many elephants, horses, chariots, infantry, and troops. He also has great material wealth, with great stores of gold, silver, jewels, pearls, lapis lazuli, conchs, crystals, corals, fine gold, and many other riches and belongings. He is powerful, with an army unafraid of the kings from surrounding lands. He has many friends, and he delights in the Dharma. This family is a fitting place for the Bodhisattva to be conceived."

"This is not appropriate," others replied. "King Sumitra does indeed have these qualities. Yet he is extremely aged, so he does not even possess the ability to produce a son. Moreover, he already has many sons. It is not proper for the Bodhisattva to be conceived in this family."

In this manner the bodhisattvas and gods observed all the illustrious royal families to be found throughout the sixteen kingdoms of Jambudvīpa, and found them all to be inadequate.

As they considered this, a divine son named Jñānaketudhvaja, who was firmly established in the Great Vehicle and could not be turned away from awakening, spoke to the great assembly of gods and bodhisattvas: "Come, my friends. Let us go before the Bodhisattva himself and ask him what sublime qualities a precious family must have in order for a bodhisattva to take his final birth there."

"Excellent!" they replied. With palms joined, they all went before the Bodhisattva and asked him, "Sublime Being, what sublime qualities must a precious family have for a bodhisattva to take his final birth there?"

Looking upon the great assembly of bodhisattvas and the great assembly of gods, the Bodhisattva then addressed the gathering: "Friends, the family into which a bodhisattva takes his final birth must have sixty-four excellent qualities. What are these sixty-four qualities?"

"This family must be noble and it must be known by all. It must not be petty or prone to violence. It must be of a good caste and good clan. It must have excellent marital unions, with excellent marital unions in the past, and marital unions between individuals who are pure. These marital unions must be between people who are both pure, well-known by all, and renowned for their great power. This family must have many men and women. It must be fearless, not base or cowardly. It must not be greedy, but disciplined. It must be wise and watched over by ministers. This family must be creative and thereby enjoy worldly pleasures. This family should be steadfast in its friendships and safeguard the lives of all the beings throughout the animal kingdom. They must have gratitude and know how to conduct themselves appropriately.

They must not be moved by ambition, anger, ignorance, or fear. They must be afraid of engaging in negative deeds. They must not dwell in ignorance. This family must be benevolent and industrious. It must be inspired to give, be generous, and remember the kindness of others. They must be physically strong, with great power and strength, indeed supreme strength. They must make offerings to the sages, to the gods, and to stupas, and also pay homage to their ancestors. They must not hold grudges.

"This family must be renowned throughout the ten directions and have a vast retinue. It must not be divided. It must be peerless. This family must be the most senior and the most illustrious among all families. It must be powerful, and renowned as such. They must respect their fathers, mothers, mendicants, and priests. They must have great stores of treasure and grain. They must have a great deal of gold, and many jewels, gems, pearls, lapis lazuli, conchs, crystals, corals, fine gold, silver, and many other riches and belongings. They must have many elephants, horses, camels, oxen, and sheep. They must have many male servants, female servants, officials, and workers. This family must be difficult to defeat. It must accomplish all of its aims. It must be a family of universal monarchs. It must be aided, in great measure, by the root virtues accumulated in the past. It must be descended from a noble family, a family of bodhisattvas. Indeed this family must be impeccable when it comes to any accusations of faults related to one's birth, such as those found in this entire world with its gods, demons, and brahmas, mendicants and priests. Friends, the family of a bodhisattva in his final existence must have these sixty-four qualities.

"Friends, the woman in whose womb a bodhisattva is conceived in his final existence must have thirty-two qualities. What are these thirty-two qualities? A bodhisattva in his final existence must be conceived in the womb of a woman known by all and steadfast in conduct. She must come from a good caste and a good family. She must have an excellent figure, an excellent name, and excellent proportions. She must not have given birth previously, and she must have excellent discipline. She must be generous, cheerful, and adroit. She must also be clear minded, calm, fearless, learned, wise, honest, and without guile. She must be free from anger, jealousy, and greed. She must not be coarse, easily distracted, or prone to gossip. She must be patient and good-natured, with a good conscience and sense of modesty. She should have little attachment, anger, and ignorance. She should be free from the faults of womankind and be a devoted wife. In his final existence, a bodhisattva must be conceived in the womb of a woman with all of these excellent qualities.

"Friends, a bodhisattva is not conceived in his mother's womb while the moon is waning. A bodhisattva in his final existence must be conceived during a full moon.

On the fifteenth day of the waxing moon, and in conjunction with the constellation Pūṣya, the Bodhisattva will be conceived in the womb of a mother who is observing the pośadhā fast."

The bodhisattvas and divine sons, having heard the Bodhisattva explain the attributes of the pure family and the pure mother, thought to themselves, "Where can a family with the qualities described by this holy being be found?"

Pondering this question, they then thought, "The seat of the Sakyas is wealthy, prosperous, agreeable, and pleasant. It has bountiful harvests and is teeming with people. Its king, Suddhodana, descends from pure families on both his mother's and father's side. His wife as well is pure. His deeds are not swayed by the afflictions, and he bears excellent physical characteristics. Extremely wise and endowed with brilliant merit, the king comes from an illustrious family and is descended from a line of universal monarchs. He has incalculable wealth and treasures and innumerable precious jewels. He believes in karma and does not hold negative views. He rules over all the lands of the Sakya clan and is honoured and revered by all the merchants, householders, ministers, and people in his court. He is kind and handsome, neither too old nor too young. He has a fine body and every excellent quality. He is knowledgeable concerning crafts, astrology, the self, the Dharma, the truth, the world, and signs. Indeed he is a Dharma king who guides according to the Dharma.

"The city of Kapilavastu is the abode of sentient beings who have generated basic virtues. All those who are born there are equal in fortune to the king. The wife of King Suddhodana is Mayadevi, the daughter of Suprabuddha, a ruler of the Sakya clan. She is wealthy and youthful. Indeed she is in the prime of life. She has an excellent figure and has not given birth. She has no sons or daughters. With a beautiful form, as pleasing to the eye as a finely drawn picture, she is bedecked with jewellery like a celestial maiden, free from the faults of womankind. She speaks the truth, with words that are soft, gentle, dependable, and altogether beyond reproach. Her voice is like that of the cuckoo; she is demure and speaks only sweet and pleasant words.

"Mayadevi is reserved, free from anger, pride, conceit, and arrogance. She does not get indignant or jealous; rather what she says is timely, and she gives generously. She is disciplined and devoted to her husband, unconcerned with other men. Her head, ears, and nose are perfectly symmetrical. Her hair, as black as a bee, frames a fine forehead and a beautiful brow. Always smiling, she speaks with sincerity, her words measured and pleasing to the ear. She is quick to learn, honest and straightforward, free from guile, artifice, and deceit. She is modest and decent, constant and dependable, and not prone to idle or frivolous chatter. She has little attachment, anger, and ignorance; rather she is patient and of good character, carefully guarding her limbs, eyes, and mind. The movement of her limbs is gentle, and her skin is as soft as kacalindi cloth. Her eyes are as pure as the petals of a newly blossomed lotus flower. Her nose is well formed with a beautiful complexion. Her limbs are firm and gently curved like the arch of a rainbow. Every part of her body is beautiful and free from faults. She is attractive, with lips as red as the bimba fruit, a tapered neck bedecked with jewellery, and teeth as white as jasmine and sumana flowers. She has sloping shoulders, tapering arms, a waist curved like the arch of a bow, perfect sides, and a deep navel. Her hips are smooth, wide, round, and firm. Her body is as firm as a vajra. She has thighs that are as well proportioned as an elephant's trunk, and calves like an antelope's. The palms of her hands and the soles of her feet are like liquid lac. She is attractive to others, with faultless eyes. Alluring to the mind and pleasing to the eye, her form is superior even when compared with other beautiful women. Indeed she is without peer. Since her form is like a magical emanation, the word maya, meaning 'magically emanated,' was included in her name.

She is also skilled in all the arts. Like a celestial maiden in the garden of Indra, Mayadevi lives in King Suddhodana's female quarters. She is fit to be the mother of the Bodhisattva. Thus it appears that the purity of the family described by the Bodhisattva can be seen only in the Sakya clan." On this topic, it is said:

In the Dharmocaya Palace, the Pure Being Sat upon the lion throne called Sublime Dharma. Bodhisattvas of great renown and gods Equal in fortune to himself gathered around the Sage. Seated there, they entertained this thought:

"What family is known to be pure And fitting for the Bodhisattva to take birth in? And where are the father and mother with pure qualities?" Looking throughout all Jambudvīpa, All the major royal families and royal lines Were found to be flawed. Considering this, The Sakya clan alone was seen to be free of faults. "King Suddhodana belongs to a royal family. He descends from a pure line of monarchs, Wealthy, prosperous, and free from conflicts. A holy being, he is righteous and has gained respect. "All the other beings in the city of Kapilavastu Are righteous and pure in mind. The city is filled with gardens, groves, and palaces; The beautiful city of Kapilavastu is the most suitable birthplace.

"All its inhabitants are mighty and powerful, With the strength of two or even three elephants. They have perfected their training in archery and weapons And do not harm others, even to protect their own lives.

"King Suddhodana's wife is supreme Among one thousand other sublime women. Enchanting in appearance, like a magical emanation, She is aptly named Mayadevi, 'Magically Emanated Goddess.'

"Her body is as beautiful as a celestial maiden, With a shapely silhouette and perfectly formed limbs. Any being, whether a god or a human, Could never see enough of Maya.

"She harbors no attachment or hatred; She is gentle and tender, and her speech honest and mellifluous.

Neither harsh nor abrasive, she is extremely tranquil, Never frowning and always with a smile on her face. "With a good conscience and a sense of modesty, she observes the Dharma.

She is free from pride and conceit, and not prone to overexuberance, Just as she has no envy and is free from guile and artifice. She delights in giving and is always loving in her thoughts.

"Believing in karma and abandoning misguided deeds, She adheres to what is true, controlled in body and mind. She is free from the multitude of faults That are commonly found in women the whole world over.

"Indeed Mayadevi is without rival, For no other woman in the realm of humans can match her, Nor so in the realm of gandharvas, or even in the heavenly realms.

She is worthy of being the mother of the Great Sage. "For five hundred lifetimes, she alone Has been the mother of the Bodhisattva, Just as King Suddhodana has been his father. She thus has all the qualities of a worthy mother.

"As disciplined as an ascetic, she follows a strict code of conduct, And while following her own conduct, she shares in her husband's duties.

She has fulfilled her vow, given to her by the king, For she has abstained from sexual activity for thirty-two months.

"Wherever she may be, whether sitting or standing, Lying down or in motion, those places Become filled with the brilliant light Given off by her dedication to virtuous deeds.

"No being, whether god, demigod, or human, Is able to look upon her with a lustful mind. They all look upon her as a mother or a daughter, For she follows the right conduct and is endowed with noble qualities.

"Due to the virtuous deeds of Mayadevi, The king's vast empire increases in prosperity. Unmatched by the neighbouring kings,

The ruler's renown and fame also continue to increase.
 "In this way Maya is a suitable vessel;
 In this way the Holy Being is supremely beautiful.
 Thus, since these two are endowed with supreme qualities,
 One will be the son, and one is worthy to be the mother.
 "Other than Devi, who is endowed with the most supreme of qualities
 And has the strength of ten thousand elephants,
 No woman would be able to carry
 The supreme man of Jambudvipa."
 With these words of praise, the divine sons
 And bodhisattvas, with their vast knowledge,
 Proclaimed the sublime Maya to be the mother, Saying, "She is fit to give birth to the joy of the Sakya family."
 This concludes the third chapter on the purity of the family.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 4 — The Gateways to the Light of the Dharma
 [Before leaving the heavenly realms, the Bodhisattva delivers one final teaching to the gods.]

Monks, while the Bodhisattva was seeing the family of his birth, he dwelt in the Heaven of Joy in Uccadhvaja, a great celestial palace measuring sixty-four leagues around, where he taught the Dharma to the gods of the Heaven of Joy. The Bodhisattva had come to this great celestial palace where he now addressed all the divine sons of the Heaven of Joy: "Come, gather here," he said. "Come listen to the Bodhisattva's final teaching on the Dharma, a recollection of the Dharma entitled 'The Application of Passing.'"

Hearing these words, all the divine sons in the Heaven of Joy, along with the assembly of divine maidens, gathered together in the great celestial palace.

There the Bodhisattva blessed the surrounding area, which was as vast as the entire world with its four great continents.
 The area was so splendid, so beautiful to behold, so filled with ornaments, and so enchanting that all the divine sons of the desire and form realms came to think that their own homes seemed like charnel grounds in comparison.

The Bodhisattva was seated upon a lion throne that was utterly resplendent as a result of the ripening of his merit. The base of the throne was bedecked with various precious jewels, and piles of cushions covered in celestial cloth sat upon it.
 Scented with the fragrant smells of various celestial perfumes and the finest of incense, the throne was covered with colourful and fragrant flowers. It was magnificent indeed, glittering with the light of many hundreds of thousands of precious jewels, draped with nets of priceless gems, and giving off the sound of strings from jeweled chimes. Delightful to behold, the throne radiated the sounds of hundreds of thousands of jeweled bells, and it was covered with many hundreds of thousands of nets made of precious jewels.
 Hanging from it were many hundreds of thousands of silk streamers, and it was ornamented with many hundreds of thousands of silk tassels and garlands.

Hundreds of thousands of divine maidens sang, danced, and played instruments, proclaiming hundreds of thousands of sublime qualities. Hundreds of thousands of guardians of the world stood watch, while hundreds of thousands of Sakras offered prostrations, and hundreds of thousands of Brahmas bowed down before the throne. Billions upon billions of bodhisattvas surrounded it, and billions upon billions of buddhas from the ten directions, infinite in number, focused their attention on it. This throne came about due to the force of the ripening of merit amassed through the perfections carried out over billions upon billions of eons, indeed incalculable eons.

Monks, in this way the Bodhisattva sat upon a grand lion throne with these qualities and spoke to the great gathering of gods. "Friends," he said. "Look upon the body of the Bodhisattva, adorned as it is with the signs of a hundred merits. Look upon those innumerable and uncountable bodhisattvas who dwell in the ten directions, in the east, south, west, and north, above, below, and all around, and who are now in the sublime realm of the Heaven of Joy. They are all approaching their final existence and, surrounded by an assembly of gods, they each delight the gods with the appearance of their passing, demonstrating the gateway to the light of Dharma. Look upon them, countless, innumerable, and incalculable such as they are."

Then, through the blessings of the Bodhisattva, the entire assembly of gods saw all these bodhisattvas. Observing them, they faced the Bodhisattva, joined their palms, and bowed down before him. Prostrating with their entire bodies, they exclaimed, "How wondrous! The blessings of the Bodhisattva are indeed inconceivable, for we can see all these bodhisattvas by merely directing our gaze."

The Bodhisattva then addressed the great assembly of gods with the following words: "Friends, please listen to the gateways to the light of the Dharma that delight the gods with the form of their passing, which these bodhisattvas teach the divine sons. There are 108 gateways [commandments, precepts or instructions] to the light of the Dharma, and they must be taught without fail to a gathering of gods by a bodhisattva at the time of his passing. What are these one hundred and eight gateways? They are as follows:

1. Faith, my friends, is a gateway to the light of Dharma, for with it one's mind is unshakable.
2. Inspiration is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for with it the mind is divested of impurities.
3. Supreme joy is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for with it the body becomes extremely pliable.
4. Contentment is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for with it the mind becomes pure.
5. Physical restraint is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for with it the three physical faults are purified.
6. Verbal restraint is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for with it the four verbal faults are relinquished.
7. Mental restraint is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for with it covetousness, malice, and misguided views are abandoned.
8. Recollection of the Buddha is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it leads to the pure perception of the Buddha.
9. Recollection of the Dharma is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it leads to the pure teaching of the Dharma.
10. Recollection of the Saṅgha is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it stops one from transgressing the rules.
11. Recollection of giving is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it leads one to let go of all material things.
12. Recollection of discipline is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it leads to the fulfillment of aspirations.
13. Recollection of the divine is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it leads to a vast mindset.
14. Love is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it surpasses all things created by merit based on material things.
15. Compassion is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it leads one to take up nonviolence.
16. Joy is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it clears away all displeasure.
17. Equanimity is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it leads to contempt for desire.
18. Investigating impermanence is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it leads to the transcendence of the attachment of the desire, form, and formless realms.
19. Investigating suffering is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it leads to the cessation of misguided goals.
20. Investigating the absence of self is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it eliminates overt fixation on the self.
21. Investigating peace is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it dampens the flames of passion.
22. Having a good conscience is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it brings complete inner peace.
23. Modesty is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it brings complete peace in others.
24. Truth is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for with it gods and humans are not deceived.
25. The authentic is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for with it one is not deceived.
26. Dharma practice is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for with it one relies upon the Dharma.
27. Going to the Three Jewels for refuge is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it enables one to transcend the three lower realms.
28. Acknowledging the kindness of others is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it ensures that the basic virtues one has engaged in do not go to waste.
29. Gratitude is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it leads one to not condemn others.
30. Knowing oneself is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it leads one to not praise oneself.
31. Knowing sentient beings is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it leads one to not belittle others.
32. Knowing the Dharma is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it leads one to apply the Dharma assiduously and in the correct manner.
33. Knowing the right time is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it ensures that seeing will be meaningful.
34. Conquering pride is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it leads to the perfection of wisdom.
35. A mind free from vindictiveness is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it allows one to protect both oneself and others.
36. Not holding grudges is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it allows one to be free from regret.
37. Sincere interest is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it enables one to make great effort and be free from doubt.
38. Investigating repulsiveness is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it enables one to dispense with thoughts about what one desires.
39. Absence of malice is a gateway to the light of the

108. The wisdom that evolves from ground to ground is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it leads to being empowered with the wisdom of omniscience. The ground of empowerment is a gateway to the light of the Dharma, for it leads one to be conceived in the womb, to be born, to manifest in the world, to undergo austerities, to go to the seat of awakening, to tame Mara, to attain complete awakening, to turn the wheel of Dharma, and to manifest great parinirvana.

"These, friends, are known as the 108 gateways to the light of the Dharma, which a bodhisattva must teach to the assembly of gods at the time of his passing."

Monks, when the Bodhisattva taught this chapter, "The Gateways to the Light of the Dharma," out of the assembly of gods, 84,000 divine sons gave rise to the mind of unexcelled, perfect and complete awakening. The 32,000 divine sons who had previously been trained gained acceptance that phenomena are nonarising. The 360 million divine sons gained the pure eye regarding phenomena, unblemished and untainted. The entire fine realm of the Heaven of Joy was covered in celestial flowers up to one's knees.

Monks, at that time the Bodhisattva uttered these verses in order to bring even more joy to the assembly of gods:

At the time that the Guide, the Lion of Men, passes away,
And descends from the supreme realm of the Heaven of Joy,
He proclaims these words to the gods:

"Abandon all forms of mindlessness!
"The multitude of divine pleasures,
All wonderful things conjured up by the mind,
All of this is caused by virtuous actions.
So listen now to learn about these actions.

"Acknowledge the kindness done to you.
Do not fall back into the three lower realms
After exhausting your previous stores of merit;
There is only unhappiness and suffering there.
Once you develop respect for me,
Apply yourselves earnestly to practicing
The teachings that you have heard,
And you will inevitably attain boundless joy.

"All desirable things are impermanent and unstable;
Nothing is eternal, not even the eons.
Everything is like a mirage or an illusion,
And as fleeting as lightning or a water bubble.
"The pleasure brought about by the qualities
Of desirable things is as unsatisfying as drinking saltwater,
But those with noble pristine knowledge
That transcends the world are satisfied.
"Goddesses, companions, and beautiful songs
Are like the audience of a play.
They are like a crowd of people who assemble
And then go their own separate ways.
"In the realm of the conditioned, there are no allies,
No friends, no relatives, and no retinue.
And besides, the karma that results from good deeds
Also binds one, and ever follows behind one's back.

"Therefore be harmonious with one another;
Act with a loving and benevolent mind.
Engage in wholesome activities,
For actions done well bring no torment.
"Please recall the Buddha, Dharma, and Saṅgha,
And do not slip into heedlessness.
Those who delight in study, discipline, and generosity
Are endowed with patience and gentleness.
"Investigate suffering, impermanence, and lack of self;
Examine these three phenomena thoroughly.
They occur in connection to causes and conditions;
They are void of life and have no owner.
"Whatever miraculous powers you see in me,
And whatever eloquence, wisdom, and qualities I may have,
All of this is caused by virtuous deeds
Arising from study, discipline, and conscientiousness.
"For the welfare, benefit, and love of sentient beings,
You should emulate me with your discipline, study,
Conscientiousness, generosity,
Restrain, and self-control.

"For you will not be able to accomplish the auspicious teachings
By the mere sound of your voice and speech.
Please adopt the right conduct
And practice what you teach.
"Do not simply follow what other people say;
Exert yourself with continuous concentration.
When acting, one takes the opportunity;
Without acting, one does not accomplish anything.
"Recall all the suffering you have experienced
Circling through cyclic existence until now.
If you fall prey to distortions,
Nirvana and freedom from attachment will not be achieved.
"Therefore, having now obtained freedom,
A spiritual guide, and a conducive environment,
And having met with the superior teaching of Dharma,
You should pacify attachment and the other afflictions.
"Freed from pride, arrogance, and conceit,
Always flexible, upright, and honest,
Dedicate yourself to reaching the transcendence of suffering
And apply yourself to realizing the path.
"Disperse all the darkness and turbidity of ignorance
With the lamp of knowledge.
Tear the net of error, with its latencies,
Using the vajra of wisdom.
"What need is there to say many things?"

It is in your interest to follow this teaching.

If you do not abide by this teaching,

Then it is not the fault of the teaching.

"When I attain awakening

And shower down the teaching that leads to immortality,

You, who have pure minds, should come

And listen to the true Dharma."

This concludes the fourth chapter on the gateways to the light of the Dharma.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 5 — Setting Out

[The Bodhisattva installs Maitreya as his regent in the heavenly realms and sets out for the human realm accompanied by great displays of divine offerings and auspicious signs.]

Monks, in that way the Bodhisattva revealed this Dharma discourse to the large retinue of gods. Thus they understood his message and became excited, delighted, and forbearing. At that point he spoke to the retinue of fortunate gods: "Friends, I will now proceed to Jambudvīpa. In the past when I practiced the conduct of a bodhisattva, I attracted sentient beings through the four activities of giving, pleasant speech, beneficial activity, and demonstrating consistency in speech and aims. But friends, if I now do not achieve unexcelled, perfect and complete awakening, I would be ungrateful and irrational."

Hearing that, the divine sons of the Heaven of Joy wept and embraced the feet of the Bodhisattva. They said, "Virtuous One, if you do not remain, this Heaven of Joy will be without splendour."

To this, the Bodhisattva replied to the great retinue of gods, "The bodhisattva Maitreya will teach you the Dharma." Then the Bodhisattva took the crown from his own head and placed it on the head of the bodhisattva Maitreya, saying, "Virtuous one, you shall awaken to perfect and complete buddhahood after me."

In that way the Bodhisattva enthroned the bodhisattva Maitreya in the Heaven of Joy. Then he again spoke to the great retinue of gods: "Friends, in what type of form should I enter the womb of a mother?"

Some replied, "As a human in the form of a priest." But other gods suggested, "In the form of Sakra, or Brahma, or a great king, or Vaisravana, or a gandharva, or a kimnara, or a mahoraga, or Mahesvara, or the moon god, or the sun god, or a garuda."

There was also one of the divine sons of the Brahma realm present, who was called Ugrateja. Having been a sage in his previous life, he had taken rebirth among the gods, where he had become irreversible from unexcelled and perfect awakening. He now spoke:

"The priests' mantras and the treatises of the Vedas mention the proper form for a bodhisattva to take when descending into the womb of his mother. It should be in the form of an excellent, great elephant with six tusks, covered with golden netting. Its head should be very red and exceedingly handsome. It should ooze fragrant fluids from its temples and have a glorious body. Someone who is learned in the Vedas and scriptures of the priests will then recognize such features and use them to predict the arrival of a person endowed with the thirty-two marks of a great man."

Monks, while the Bodhisattva was still residing in the sublime Heaven of Joy, he considered the time for his birth. At that time he manifested eight omens at the sublime residence of King Suddhodana. What were these eight?

The residence was immaculate since all weeds, stumps, brambles, small pebbles, and gravel had been removed. It was well watered and very clean. It was undisturbed by wind and free from soot and dust. There were no mosquitoes, flies, bees, or snakes. It was covered with flowers, and the area became level, like the palm of a hand. This was The First Omen.

Flocks of birds came to the palace from the Himalayan mountains, the king of mountain ranges. There were patraguptas, parrots, mynas, cuckoos, swans, curlews, peacocks, wild geese, painted snipe, nightingales, pheasants, and many others. The birds had beautiful and delightful wings in many colours and sang in melodious sounds. They perched upon the verandas, turrets, doorways, pavilions, and upper terraces of King Suddhodana's sublime residence. The birds were joyful and content, and they each sang happily. This was The Second Omen.

In all of King Suddhodana's delightful parks, woodlands, and gardens, the various trees blossomed and carried fruits of all seasons. This was The Third Omen.

In each of King Suddhodana's lotus ponds and reservoirs, there appeared lotuses the size of cartwheels, each with many trillions of petals. This was The Fourth Omen.

In that sublime residence of King Suddhodana, all the provisions of butter, sesame oil, honey, raw sugar, and sugarcane juice were never depleted and appeared to be full even though they were used abundantly. This was The Fifth Omen.

Inside the women's quarters of King Suddhodana's excellent residence, all the instruments, such as the great kettledrums, the clay and wooden kettledrums, the flutes, lutes, reed pipes, three-stringed lutes, bells, and cymbals suddenly emitted wonderful music by themselves without being played. This was The Sixth Omen.

In that most excellent residence of King Suddhodana, all the containers of different types of precious substances, such as gold, silver, jewels, pearls, beryl, shells, crystals, and corals, opened their lids and displayed their flawless perfection and abundance. This was The Seventh Omen.

A pure and immaculate light, much brighter than those of the sun and the moon, appeared and produced mental and physical pleasure. This was The Eighth Omen.

Queen Maya bathed and applied perfumes to her body. She ornamented her arms with many bracelets and dressed in the softest and most beautiful garments. Joyful, happy, and rapturous, accompanied and encircled by ten thousand women, she went to where King Suddhodana was seated comfortably in the music hall. She seated herself to his right side on the fine, precious throne draped with jeweled latticework. With a smiling and trusting face free from anger, she spoke to King Suddhodana in these verses:

"Your Majesty, master of the earth, good lord, I pray that you hear me!

Your Highness, please grant me a favour!

Please listen and rejoice in your heart

Concerning these wishes on which my mind is set.

"Lord, out of love for all beings, I will adopt the eight precepts,

Which include disciplined and moral conduct, as well as fasting.

Without harming any living creature and always with pure feelings,

I will love others in the same way that I love myself.

"I have renounced any thievish thoughts and given up attachment and arrogance;

Your Majesty, I will not act immorally.

I will remain truthful, not slander others, and abandon harsh words;

I will never use idle or nonvirtuous words.

"I renounce all anger, aggression, stupidity, and conceit;

Renouncing all covetousness, I will be content with my own wealth.

I will act properly and renounce flattery, hypocrisy, and envy;

I will travel this path of the ten virtuous actions.

"I am joyfully engaged in strict disciplined conduct;

So, sovereign master of men, do not act lustfully because of attraction to me.

Your Majesty, may nonvirtue not arise in you for a long time;

Please rejoice as I am nearby you in strict discipline.

"Your Highness, I beseech you, quick, say yes today!

Inside the cool pavilion at the top of the palace where the swans roost,

On a soft and sweetly scented bed scattered with flowers,

I would like to live happily, always surrounded by my female friends.

"May no male servants, boys,

Or even common women attend me.

May I hear only pleasant and harmonious talk,

And may there be nothing unpleasant to hear or see.

"I ask that you release all those held in prisons

And that you endow the poor with wealth.

For one week, for the sake of people's happiness,

Please give food, drink, clothing, chariots, palanquins, and horses.

"May each and every man, woman, and child in this palace

Be free from quarreling and angry words.

May their minds be full of mutual affection,

And may they enjoy themselves together, like gods in pleasure groves.

"May no persecution, beating, or malicious threats take place.

May there be no royal retribution or unjust punishment.

Lord, please look upon all beings as if upon an only child;

Think benevolently and lovingly with a composed mind."

When the king heard this speech, he rejoiced and proclaimed:

"Let everything you wish come to pass!

Whatever you seek and wish,

That request I shall grant you."

The excellent king commanded his entourage:

"Make the finest preparations in the upper quarters of the palace.

Decorate them with beautiful flowers and use the best incense and perfume;

Adorn them with parasols, banners, and rows of palm trees.

"Place on guard twenty thousand brave fighting men in armour,

Brandishing swords, arrows, spears, and lances.

Let them guard the quarters where the swans call out melodiously;

Let them guard the queen with loving care so that she is not afraid." [44]

Bathed, perfumed, well dressed, and with her arms bejeweled,

Surrounded by her female attendants, like a divine maiden, Accompanied by the pleasant sounds of thousands of cymbals,

The queen ascends and rests like a divine maiden.

The legs of her bed are embellished with costly divine jewels;

It is a pleasing bed strewn with flowers.

There she unfastens her tiara of precious jewels, [F.26.b]

Like a divine maiden in the Misraka Garden.

Monks, in the meantime the gods were gathering. There were the four great kings;

Sakra, lord of the gods; and the divine sons of Suyama, Santusita, Sunirmita, and Paranirmitavasavartin.

There were also Sarthavaha, the officer son of Mara; Brahma, the lord of Saha; the divine priest Brahmottara; the divine priest Subrahma; and Prabhavyuha, Abhasvara, Mahesvara, and the gods living in the pure realms of Nisthagata and the Highest Heaven, as well as many hundreds of thousands of others as well. They spoke to one another in these words:

"Friends, if we were to allow the Bodhisattva to depart alone, without expressing our gratitude to him, it would be dishonourable of us. Friends, who among us will have the courage to serve the Bodhisattva constantly and ceaselessly as he travels to the womb of his mother? Who will serve him as he is in the womb, when he is born, as he grows and plays as a young child? Who will serve him when he is in the female quarters watching the musical performances, and when he renounces his home and is practicing austerities? Who will serve him as he proceeds to the seat of awakening, tames the demons, attains perfect and complete awakening, and turns the wheel of the Dharma? Who will serve him until he demonstrates passing into great parinirvana?

Who can keep him company with a kind, affectionate, friendly, loving, and noble attitude?"

Then they sang these verses:

"Who among us has the courage to follow joyfully

This being, one with such perfect appearance?

Who would like to increase

His merit, splendour, power, and renown?

"Whoever lives in these divine palaces

And wishes to enjoy the divine pleasures

Of the goddesses and the divine delights,

Let him serve the one with a face like an immaculate moon.

"Whoever wishes to enjoy the charming Misraka Garden,

With the celestial palace, the birthplace of the gods,

Full of golden-hued flowers,

Let him serve the immaculate brilliant one.

"Whoever wishes to frolic together with goddesses

In a splendid chariot, or in the pleasure groves

Carpeted with petals of mandarava flowers,

Let him serve this great being.

"Whoever aspires to be the ruler of the Heaven Free from Strife

Or to be the lord of the Heaven of Joy,

Someone worthy of worship by all beings,

Let him serve the one of unlimited renown.

"Whoever desires to enjoy himself in a beautiful mansion

In the Heaven of Delighting in Emanations

And wants to enjoy all the mentally created illusions,

Let him serve this one possessing excellent qualities.

"Whoever is a master over demons, but whose mind has no hatred,

Who has attained complete mastery of all types of power,

Who is the master of his senses and has surpassed others,

Let him go with this benefactor.

"Similarly whoever wishes to pass beyond the desire realm

And reside in the realm of Brahma,

Let him serve today the great being

Resplendent with the four immeasurables.

"Whoever longs to take birth among humans

In the vast realm of a supreme universal monarch,

Let him serve the One with Abundant Merit,

The Jewel Mine, the One Who Bestows Fearlessness and Bliss.

"Whoever wants to be a ruler or the son of a wealthy merchant,

Rich and happy with great wealth,

Surrounded by an army able to conquer enemies,

Let him go with this benefactor.

"Whoever desires beauty, luxuries, and power,

And wishes for fame, courage, and good qualities,

And would like to speak agreeably with words that are heeded,

Let him attend upon that learned lord who speaks with the voice of Brahma.

"Whoever desires the divine and human enjoyments,

Or all the happiness of the three realms of existence,

Or the bliss of concentration and the happiness in solitude,

Let him follow the Dharma Lord.

"Whoever yearns to abandon attachment and anger,

And wants to clear away the darkness of the afflictions, Let him, with his mind calm, tranquil, and totally at peace, Quickly follow the One Who Has Tamed His Mind.

"Whoever wishes for the wisdom of learners, masters, and solitary buddhas,

As well as the wisdom of omniscience,

And hopes to roar like a lion through the ten powers,

Let him follow the learned one with an ocean of qualities.

"Whoever desires to close the path to the lower realms,

And open the path to the fortune of deathlessness,

And travel on the eightfold path,

Let him follow the One Who Has Completed All Paths.

"Whoever wishes to make offerings to the Thus-Gone One,

And listen to the Dharma from that lord of compassion,

And attain the qualities of the saṅgha,

Let him follow this ocean of qualities.

"Whoever hopes to exhaust the sufferings of birth, old age, sickness, and death,

And be free from the shackles of cyclic existence,

And enjoy purity equal to limitless space,

Let him follow this pure being.

"Whoever wishes to liberate himself as well as others,

Desiring beauty that is pleasing to all,

Supreme bodily marks, and the blossoming of qualities,

Let him attend the learned one who is beautiful to behold.

"The learned one who wishes for Discipline, absorption, and knowledge,

Who wants liberation that is profound, hard to see, and difficult to fathom,

Let him quickly follow the king of physicians.

"Whoever desires many such qualities,

And the happiness of existence as well as nirvana,

And wants to utterly perfect all qualities,

Let him follow the learned one who masters disciplined conduct."

When they heard these verses, the gods assembled. There were 84,000 gods from the Heaven of the Four Great Kings, 100,000 gods from the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, 100,000 gods from the Heaven Free from Strife, 100,000 gods from the Heaven of Joy, 100,000 gods from the Heaven of Delighting in Emanations, 100,000 gods from the Heaven of Making Use of Others' Emanations, 60,000 gods from the realm of Mara who were born there because of their former virtuous actions, 68,000 gods from the realm of Brahma, and many hundreds of thousands of gods assembled from all the realms up to the highest heaven.

Moreover, many hundreds of thousands of divine sons came together from the east, the south, the west, and the north. The foremost among the divine sons then spoke these verses to the great assembly of gods:

"Immortal lords, please listen to these words

That express what is on our minds!

We give up our sensual enjoyments and the perfect bliss of concentration

In order to serve this sublime pure being.

"As he enters the womb, abides in the womb, and is born, We will make offerings to the Great Being, so worthy of worship.

We shall protect the Sage, who is well guarded by merit;

No one shall cause him any problems through a hostile mind.

"In songs and with the melodious sounds of cymbals,

We will praise the qualities of the one with an ocean of qualities.

Whoever hears this will engender the excellent mind of awakening

And thus delight all gods and humans.

"We shall fill the king's palace with flower petals

And light the finest incense of black aloes.

With that aroma, gods and humans will become very content;

It will free them from sickness and fever and make them happy.

"We will fill the entire city of Kapilavastu

With blossoms of mandarava flowers, beautiful jasmine, and hibiscus,

In order to make offerings to him,

Who appears due to virtuous activities.

"As long as he is in his mother's womb, untainted by the three stains,

And until he is born in order to bring an end to aging and death,

We will serve him devotedly.

Our wish is to make offerings to the great intelligent one. [48]

"It will be a great blessing for gods and humans

To witness the newborn taking seven steps,

To see him received by Sakra and Brahma,

And to see the Pure Being bathed with perfumed water.

"While he behaves in accord with the world, And conquers the afflictions of desire inside the women's quarters,

And as he abandons his entire kingdom,

Throughout that time, we will serve him devotedly.

"When he acquires grass and travels to the seat of awakening,

And as he conquers the demons and gains awakening, [F.28.b]

And is entreated to turn the wheel of the Dharma by a billion Brahma gods, Throughout that time, we will make vast offerings to the Bliss-Gone One.

"While he tames trillions of beings for the deathless state, Performing enlightened activity in the trichilocosm, And until he passes into cool and peaceful nirvana, For that long, none of us will abandon the greatly renowned sage."

Monks, the divine maidens who sport in the desire realms saw the perfection of the Bodhisattva's bodily form and wondered, "What is she like, that maiden who will conceive this sublime and supreme pure being?"

Filled with curiosity, they gathered the finest and best flowers, incense, lamps, perfumes, garlands, ointments, powders, and cloths. Then, blessed as they were with supernatural powers from the ripening of merit and with divine bodies that are mentally created, they instantaneously disappeared from that celestial palace.

By means of their celestial powers, they traveled to Kapilavastu, that sublime city with a hundred thousand gardens, and arrived at King Suddhodana's residence, known as Home of the Swans, the great mansion that resembled the palaces of the ruler of the gods.

The divine maidens, wearing loose gowns, were well adorned by the splendour of their immaculate merit, and their arms and hands were full of divine ornaments. They saw Queen Maya resting on her fine bed. They pointed her out to each other and, hovering in midsky, they sang these verses to one another:

"We divine maidens who live in divine abodes
Saw the attractive body of the Bodhisattva.

At that time we considered,

"What will the mother of the Bodhisattva be like?"

"Our curiosity aroused, we approached the royal palace
With garlands of flowers in our hands.

Bearing aloft flowers as well as ointments,

We bowed with folded hands.

"We beauties with revealing garments

Stretched our hands and pointed out

Queen Maya resting in her bed,

Saying, 'Oh! Behold the beauty of that human woman!'

"Because of pride we thought

That divine maidens had the most attractive bodies.

Yet when we saw the body of the king's wife,

We saw that her splendour outshines our divine bodies.

"She will be the mother of the Supreme Being;

Full of charms, she is like Rati herself.

Just as a precious jewel rests within a fine vessel,

This queen will be such a vessel for the god of gods.

"From the palms of her hands and the soles of her feet,

Her attractive limbs surpass the divine.

When you look at her, your eyes will not be sated,

And she will only thrill your heart and mind more and more.

"Her attractive face and body

Shine like the beautiful moon in the sky

And blaze like the stainless fire of the sun.

Her body shines with an excellent light.

"The complexion of this queen is resplendent,

Shining like the purest gold.

Her hair is soft, clean, and sweetly scented,

Black like the excellent bee and arranged in braids.

"Her eyes are like lotus petals;

Her teeth are like stars in the sky.

Her waist is curved like a bow and her hips are ample;

Her shoulders are raised and her joints are smooth.

"Her thighs and calves are like the trunk of an elephant,

And her knees have a shapely form.

The palms of her hands and the soles of her feet are smooth and red;

Surely she can only be a divine maiden."

Thus they examined her in many ways,

Tossed flowers and circumambulated her.

Then, praising the renowned mother of the Victorious One,

They instantly returned to the divine realm.

The four guardians of the four directions,

Sakra, the gods free from strife, the gods enjoying emanations,

Other gods, demigods, kumbhandas, raksasas,

Kimnaras, and mahoragas spoke:

"Go before the Supreme Being;

Protect him, the best of men.

Do not be hostile to beings;

Do no harm to any person."

As Queen Maya resided in the palace,

They all assembled with their retinues.

Holding bows and arrows, swords, spears, and weapons,

They remained in the middle of the sky, keeping watch.

The divine sons, who know the time of passing,

Came joyfully before Queen Maya.

They held flowers as well as ointments;

With folded hands, they paid homage.

"Lion of Speech, your time is now!

Generate compassion and kindness for the entire world;

Lord of Men, Pure Being, demonstrate passing away.

We pray that you grant the gift of the Dharma."

Monks, as the Bodhisattva was about to pass away and take rebirth, many hundreds of thousands of bodhisattvas, who were bound by just one more birth, came to him from the east of the sacred abode of the Heaven of Joy. They approached the Bodhisattva in order to make offerings to him. Likewise many hundreds of thousands of bodhisattvas, all of them bound by just one more birth, came from all ten directions within the sacred abode of the Heaven of Joy, also approaching the Bodhisattva in order to make offerings to him.

There were 8.4 million divine maidens from the Heaven of the Four Great Kings who approached the Bodhisattva, making offerings to him accompanied by music and singing. Similarly, 8.4 million divine maidens from each of the realms of the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, the Heaven Free from Strife, the Heaven of Joy, the Heaven of Delighting in Emanations, and the Heaven of Making Use of Others' Emanations approached the Bodhisattva. Singing songs and playing musical instruments of all types, they made offerings to the Bodhisattva.

At that time the Bodhisattva had taken his seat on the Glorious Essence Lion throne inside his great palace. This throne had come about through all his merit and was visible to all the gods and nagas. Then, as the bodhisattvas and many millions of gods, nagas, and yakas assembled around him, he began his departure from the sublime realm of the Heaven of Joy.

Monks, as he started to move, the Bodhisattva's body began to shine with a brilliant and dazzling light that surpassed any other celestial light. This unprecedented light illuminated all the vast and enormous realms of the great trichilocosm. Even the darkest regions of the world, filled with negativity and obscurity, where even the renowned great power and magical ability of the sun and the moon are unable to produce light, colours, or heat, were bathed in light. In those realms, the unfortunate beings normally cannot even see their own hands.

But even there, the dazzling light shone. Due to the light, the beings in those realms now recognized one another and remarked: "Listen, friends! Other beings have also been born here!"

Then the whole billionfold world system became distorted in six ways and exhibited eighteen great signs. It began to quiver, tremble, quake, move, make sound, and roar, each in three degrees of intensity. The world shook so violently that its centre and edge, east and west, as well as north and south, all bounced around, so that when one side was up, the other was down.

At that point one could hear all sorts of pleasant and cheerful sounds. There were sounds that inspired love and made everyone serene. There were inviting and refreshing sounds that were impossible to describe or imitate, agreeable sounds that do not produce fear. At that moment there was not a single being anywhere that felt hostile, frightened, or anxious. At that moment even the light of the sun and moon and the splendour of the gods, such as Sakra, Brahma, and the worldly protectors, could not be perceived anymore. All beings who were living in the hells, along with those born as animals and all those in the world of the lord of death, became instantaneously free from suffering and filled with every happiness. No being had any painful emotion, such as anger, delusion, envy, jealousy, pride, hypocrisy, arrogance, wrath, malice, or burning anguish. At that moment all sentient beings felt love for each other, wished each other well, and saw each other as parents and children.

Trillions of divine and human musical instruments played sweet sounds without even being touched or played. Hundreds of millions of gods also lifted and carried that great mansion using their hands, shoulders, and the crowns of their heads.

Hundreds of thousands of divine maidens also sang their individual songs. From all around they praised the Bodhisattva with the sounds of their tunes:

"You previously accumulated virtuous actions;

You have appeared through virtue gathered over a long time.

You have purified the mode of all phenomena;

Today we bring forth a great offering to you.

"In the past, for billions of eons,

You gave up your dear sons and daughters.

This shower of celestial flowers

Is the fruition of that generosity.

"Lord, you cut off your own flesh,

Kindheartedly weighing it on a scale to release a bird.

The fruition of that practice of giving

Is that worldly pretas obtain food and drink.

"In the past, for billions of eons,

You preserved unbroken, uncorrupted discipline.

By the fruition of the practice of that discipline,

The unfree lower realms are purified.

"In the past, for billions of eons,

You cultivated patience as the basis for attaining awakening.

The result of your practice of patience

Is that gods and humans develop loving minds.

"In the past, for billions of eons,

You cultivated supreme and unwavering diligence.

The result of your practice of diligence

Is that your body is beautiful like Mount Meru.

"In the past, for billions of eons,

You trained in concentration to purify the afflictions.

The result of your practice of concentration

Is that beings are not harmed by afflictions.

"In the past, for billions of eons,

You trained in knowledge that destroys the afflictions.

The result of your practice of knowledge

Is that you emit sublime and beautiful light.

"With the armour of love, you have destroyed the afflictions

And developed great compassion for all beings.

You have attained perfect delight and excellent equanimity;

Bliss-Gone One, Great Being, homage be to you!

"You are exalted by the splendour of the light of the lamp of knowledge

And have cleared all darkness of delusion.

Homage to you, Able One Who Shows the Path—

The leader, the eye in the trichilocosm.

"Skilled in the higher knowledge of the bases of miraculous powers,

You see the truth and have trained in the sacred meaning.

Having crossed over, you liberate others;

Homage to you, the Bliss-Gone One Who Liberates.

"Skilled in means and higher knowledge,

You show a passing away that is devoid of death and rebirth.

Although you act harmoniously in accord with worldly law,

You are in no way attracted to the world.

"Inconceivably excellent gains come to anyone

Who merely comes to hear or see you.

So how about those who actually listen to the Dharma

And develop faith and joy?

"The entire realm of the Heaven of Joy is gloomy,

But the sun has risen in Jambudvipa.

You will awaken inconceivable trillions of creatures

Who are asleep due to their afflictions.

"Today the palace will be filled with wonders:

It will be crowded with trillions of deities;

It will resound with the music played by divine maidens;

In the king's mansion, sweet music will be heard.

"The lady is endowed with supreme beauty,

Nourished by the brilliance of her merit and virtuous actions.

This perfect son of hers will outshine

The three worlds with his splendour.

"The splendourous appearance of this perfect man

Will henceforth prevent any greed and quarrels

Among beings in this sublime palace.

All shall be lovingly reverential.

"When a king from a lineage of universal monarchs is born,

Into the lineage of a king, that lineage will become greatly exalted.

Likewise the city of Kapilavastu shall become perfect

And filled with treasures.

"Yaksas, raksasas, kumbhandas, guhyakas,

Gods, and kimnaras with their forces—

All those who guard the supreme man

Shall attain liberation before long.

"Guide, whatever merit accumulates

As we praise you with respect and reverence,

We dedicate it all to awakening.

Best of Men, may we quickly become like you!"

This concludes the fifth chapter on setting out.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 6 — Entering the Womb

[The Bodhisattva enters into the human world via the womb of Queen Māyā, where he resides for the duration of the pregnancy within a beautiful temple, enjoying the happiness of absorption.]

Monks, the cold season had passed and it was the third month of spring. It was the finest season, when the moon enters the constellation Visakha. The leaves of trees unfurled and the most exquisite flowers blossomed. It was neither cold nor hot, and there was no fog or dust in the air. Fresh green grass covered the grounds everywhere.

THE GRAND BIBLE

The Lord of the Three Worlds, revered by all the worlds, now judged that the time had come. On the fifteenth day, during the full moon, while his future mother was observing the posadha precepts during the constellation of Pusa, the Bodhisattva moved, fully conscious and aware, from the fine realm of the Heaven of Joy to the womb of his mother.

He entered through his mother's right side in the form of a baby elephant, white in colour with six tusks. His head was the colour of a reddish insect, and the tusks were blazing gold. He had all his limbs intact and his full faculties. As he entered, he stayed only at the right side of the womb and never on the left. As this occurred, Queen Maya was sleeping on her pleasant bed and saw the following in her dream:

A snowy-silver coloured elephant with six tusks,
Beautiful feet, exquisite trunk, and a pretty red head,
Moving in a fine gait with joints as stable as a diamond—
That perfect elephant entered her womb.
She had never seen, heard of, or experienced
Such a rare happiness.

Feeling this physical and mental bliss,
She became absorbed in concentration.

As she awoke, Queen Maya first adorned herself with ornaments and flowing garments. Refreshed in body and mind, she felt affectionate, joyful, and calm. She then arose from her bed and made her way down from the upper floors of the palace, surrounded by her female attendants. She proceeded to the asoka-tree forest, where she felt at ease. Once there, she sent a message to King Suddhodana: "Your Majesty, please come, the queen would like to see you."

When King Suddhodana heard this message, he became very elated, and immediately he rose from his throne. Surrounded by his ministers and townspeople, attendants and relatives, he went to the asoka forest. However, as he arrived, his body suddenly felt very heavy and he was unable to enter the forest. In this way he just stood at the entrance to the asoka forest. Reflecting a little, he then spoke these verses:

"I do not remember my body ever feeling this heavy,
Even as I led my army of warriors into battle.
Now I cannot even enter my own property;
Can anyone tell me what has happened?"

Some gods of the pure realms had settled in the middle of the sky. Now they revealed half their bodies and spoke these verses to King Suddhodana:

"Your Majesty, a bodhisattva, a great being,
With qualities of austerity and discipline, honoured by the three worlds,

Loving and compassionate, and empowered by merit and wisdom,

Has left the Heaven of Joy for the womb of Queen Maya in order to become your son."

Then, joining his palms and bowing his head,

The king went into the forest, overwhelmed by reverence and awe.

Without pride or arrogance, he looked at Queen Maya
And asked, "What may I do for you? Tell me what to do."
The queen replied:

"A fine and beautiful elephant, white as snow or silver,
More dazzling than the sun and the moon, well proportioned,

With beautiful legs, six great tusks, and joints as firm as diamond,

Entered my womb—please listen to this story.

"In my sleep I saw this trichilocosm illuminated, its darkness gone,

While ten million gods were praising me.

I felt no anger, aggression, hatred, or confusion;

I felt peaceful and full of the bliss of concentration.

"I wonder if this dream of mine shows happiness or sorrow for our family?"

Is my dream a genuine prediction?

Your Majesty, quickly summon the priests

Who are specialists in the Vedic treatises on dreams."

Hearing these words, the king instantly summoned the priests

Who were experts in the Vedas and their treatises.

When the priests stood before Queen Maya, she said,

"Listen to my story; this is what I dreamed."

The brahmins replied, "Your Majesty, please speak. When we hear what you saw in your dream, we will explain."

The queen replied:

"A fine and beautiful elephant, white as snow or silver,

More dazzling than the sun and the moon, well proportioned,

With beautiful legs, six great tusks, and joints as firm as diamond,

Entered my womb—please listen to this story."

As they heard these words, the priests remarked:

"Your clan shall meet no sorrow but only extensive delight.

A son will be born to you, his limbs adorned with the marks;
He will belong to the lineage of kings, a great universal monarch.

"If he renounces his pleasures, his kingdom, and his palace,

And goes forth as a monk, unattached, full of compassion and love for the world,

He will become a buddha worthy of offerings in the three worlds.

He will satisfy the world with the supreme taste of the nectar of immortality."

Following this positive prediction,

The priests had their meal in the royal palace,

Accepted an offering of gifts,

And subsequently departed.

Monks, when King Suddhodana heard that message from the priests who understood how to analyse marks and signs and who knew the scriptures related to dreams, he was satisfied. Impressed, delighted, and joyful, he felt blissful and happy. He pleased the priests by offering them delicious food and drink. When they were all full, he entertained them and presented them with gifts before they departed.

At the same time, as an offering to the Bodhisattva, alms were distributed at the four gates of the city of Kapilavastu and at all its crossroads and junctions. The king offered food to those who were hungry, and drink to those who were thirsty. He offered clothes to those who needed clothing, carriages to those who required transportation, perfumes to those who desired perfume, garlands to those who wished for garlands, oils to those who wanted ointments, sheets to those who longed for bedding, shelter to the homeless, and necessities to those who yearned for provisions.

Then, monks, King Suddhodana considered, "I wonder in which residence Queen Maya can stay happily and without affliction?"

At that very instant the four great kings approached King Suddhodana and spoke to him: "Your Majesty, do not worry; remain happily in equanimity. We will prepare a palace for the Bodhisattva."

Then Sakra, lord of the gods, approached King Suddhodana and spoke to him:

"The palaces of the protectors are no good;

Those of the Heaven of the Thirty-Three are better.

I will give the Bodhisattva a palace

Equal to my Vaijayanta."

Then a divine son from the Heaven Free from Strife approached King Suddhodana and spoke to him:

"When ten million gods of Sakra's realm

See my mansion, they marvel.

This glorious house, the best of the Heaven Free from Strife,

I give to the king's son."

Then a divine son from the Heaven of Joy approached King Suddhodana and spoke to him:

"Previously this renowned being

Dwelt in a delightful palace

When he was in the Heaven of Joy.

That palace I will now offer to the Bodhisattva."

Then a divine son from the Heaven of Delighting in Emanations approached King Suddhodana and spoke to him:

"A glorious, mentally created mansion

That is made of jewels,

I will give to the Bodhisattva, king,

As an act of worship."

Then a divine son from the Heaven of Making Use of Others' Emanations approached King Suddhodana and spoke to him:

"The resplendence of my mansion

Eclipses the light and colours

Of any beautiful mansion

Anywhere in the desire realm.

"So let me give that glorious mansion

As an offering to the Bodhisattva.

Your Majesty, I will bring

My beautiful jewel palace.

"It is strewn with divine flowers

And scented with divine perfumes.

I will offer this spacious palace;

There the queen may remain."

Monks, in this way each of the eminent gods of the desire realm individually presented their respective residences as an offering to the Bodhisattva, right there in the fine city of Kapilavastu. King Suddhodana also provided an excellent mansion. It far surpassed those built by other humans, although it could not match the divine palaces. However, by the power of the Bodhisattva resting in the absorption known as the great array, Queen Maya appeared in all of those residences. During the period when the Bodhisattva stayed in Queen Maya's womb, he remained on the right side of the womb, seated in a cross-legged posture. In addition all the chief gods believed that the mother of the Bodhisattva remained only in the residence they had given her, and not anywhere else. On this topic, it is said:

While the Bodhisattva remained in the absorption known as the great array,

He emanated inconceivable magical displays,

Which perfectly fulfilled the wishes of all the gods.

The wishes of the king, too, became fulfilled.

Then some divine sons among the assembly began to wonder: "Even the gods in the Heaven of the Four Great Kings turn back when they approach human habitations.

So what about the gods of the highest order—those in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, the Heaven Free from Strife, or the Heaven of Joy? How could the pure Bodhisattva, who is free from bad-smelling odours, superior to the entire world, a jewel among beings, transmigrate from the divine realm of the Heaven of Joy and remain for ten months in the foul-smelling human body inside his mother's womb?"

Then at that time, by the power of the Buddha, venerable Ananda asked the Blessed One: "O Blessed One, the Thus-Gone One has taught how the female body is inferior and enjoys desire. That was astonishing. But, Lord, it is even more astonishing that when you, who are superior to all worlds, were a bodhisattva in the past, you moved from the divine realm of the Heaven of Joy and entered your mother, remaining in a human body on the right side of the womb! Blessed One, you have mentioned how it all happened, and yet it is simply beyond me!"

The Blessed One replied: "Ananda, would you like to see the jeweled structure that the Bodhisattva delighted in? The one that became the Bodhisattva's delight as he stayed in his mother's womb?"

Ananda replied: "Yes please, Blessed One, right away. Bliss-Gone One, now would be a perfect time! If the Thus-Gone One should reveal the Bodhisattva's delight, it would be a great pleasure to witness it."

Then, through the Blessed One's doing, Brahma, lord of the Fearless Realm, disappeared from the Brahma realm together with 6.8 million gods of that same realm.

They all appeared in the presence of the Blessed One, where they prostrated at the feet of the Blessed One and circled him three times. Then Brahma stood to one side, bowing to the Blessed One.

Although the Blessed One knew already, he asked Brahma, the lord of the Saha world: "Brahma, did you remove the structure that delighted me in the past when I was a bodhisattva and stayed for ten months in my mother's womb?" Brahma replied: "Yes, Blessed One. Indeed, Bliss-Gone One." "Well, Brahma," the Blessed One said, "where is it now?"

Brahma responded, "Blessed One, it is in the Brahma realm."

"Brahma," the Blessed One remarked. "In that case, fetch this structure that delighted me as a bodhisattva for ten months and show it to everyone so they can know how it was constructed."

Brahma, lord of the Fearless Realm, now spoke to the gods of the Brahma realm, saying: "Please wait here until I bring the jeweled structure that delighted the Bodhisattva."

Then Brahma, lord of the Fearless Realm, prostrated with his head at the feet of the Blessed One before disappearing from the presence of the Blessed One. In that very instant he reached the Brahma realm. There he spoke these words to the divine son Subrahma:

"Friend, go from this Brahma realm up to the Heaven of the Thirty-Three and tell them: 'We are bringing the jeweled structure that delighted the Bodhisattva and we are taking it into the presence of the Blessed One. Those among you who would like to see it should come quickly!'"

Brahma, lord of the Fearless Realm, together with 84 trillion gods, lifted the jeweled structure that had delighted the Bodhisattva and placed it atop a great mansion in the Brahma realm that was three hundred leagues high. Surrounded by all these many trillions of gods, he then descended back down to Jambudvīpa.

At that time there was a great gathering of divine sons from the desire realm who wished to serve the Bodhisattva. These gods further embellished the jeweled structure that had delighted the Bodhisattva, using divine fabrics, garlands, perfumes, flowers, music, and other divine delights. The most eminent among the gods all surrounded the structure.

At the same time Sakra, lord of the gods, was standing far away on top of Mount Sumeru in the middle of the ocean. Shielding his face with his palm, he turned his head and stared out unblinking and completely transfixed, but he was unable to see the jeweled structure. Why was that? Among the gods, those of the Brahma realm have the greatest ability, and the gods in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, the Heaven Free from Strife, the Heaven of Joy, the Heaven of Delighting in Emanations, and the Heaven of Making Use of Others' Emanations are inferior in comparison to them. So what need is there to speak of Sakra, master of the gods?

At that moment the Blessed One quieted the divine music because the humans in Jambudvīpa would all go insane merely from hearing such music. The four great kings now came before Sakra, lord of the gods, and asked him:

"Lord of the gods, what can we do? We are unable to see this jeweled structure that delighted the Bodhisattva."

Sakra responded: "Friends, what can I do? I also cannot see it right now. Nevertheless, friends, when it is brought into the presence of the Blessed One, we should be able to see it."

The four great kings pleaded: "Lord of the gods, for that reason let us quickly do whatever is necessary to see it!"

Sakra replied: "Friends, wait until the best of the superior divine sons come into the presence of the Blessed One and delight him."

Thus they stood aside, turned their heads, and gazed intently at the Blessed One.

Suddenly Brahma, lord of the Fearless Realm, arrived together with 84 trillion gods, carrying the jeweled structure that had delighted the Bodhisattva and bringing it in front of the Thus-Gone One.

The jeweled structure that had delighted the Bodhisattva was finely shaped, exquisite and beautiful to behold. It was square in form and had four pillars. At the top was a beautifully adorned upper floor scaled to fit a six-month-old fetus. Inside that upper chamber was a throne with a sitting area that was likewise scaled to fit a sixmonth-old fetus.

There is nothing whatsoever in the world, including the realms of gods and Brahma gods, that is similar in colour and shape to the jeweled structure that delighted the Bodhisattva. When the gods saw it, their eyes were dazzled and they were amazed.

When it was placed in the presence of the Thus-Gone One, it gleamed, radiated heat, and shone brightly. This multistoried structure was as resplendent as gold that has been smelted twice by an expert goldsmith so that it has become perfectly refined and free from any impurity.

Likewise nothing whatsoever in all the divine realms can compare to the size and shape of the throne inside the structure that had delighted the Bodhisattva, except perhaps the neck of the Bodhisattva, which resembles a conch in shape and colour.

Even the garments worn by the great Brahma lost their beauty in front of the Bodhisattva's throne, causing them to resemble cast-off black blankets that have been beaten by wind and rain. The temple was made from uruga sandalwood, which is so precious that a single mote of its dust is equal in value to a thousand universes. Furthermore the temple was surrounded on all sides by more such uruga sandalwood. Inside that temple hovered an identical second structure, which did not touch the first structure. Inside this second temple hovered an identical third structure, which also did not touch the second structure. Within that third temple made of incense was a throne with cushions. The colour of the uruga sandalwood was like the finest blue beryl. Around the temple of incense were all types of flowers that surpassed even those of the gods. They had not been planted there, but appeared solely because of the maturation of the Bodhisattva's previous basic virtue.

That precious structure that delighted the Bodhisattva was like a diamond—solid, firm, and indestructible. Yet it was also pleasant to the touch, like kacalindi cloth. Moreover, the precious structure that delighted the Bodhisattva clearly reflected all that is found within the abodes of the gods of the desire realm.

On the evening in which the Bodhisattva entered the womb, a lotus appeared from below the waters, piercing the earth and rising up 6.8 million leagues, as far as the Brahma realm. Only the best of charioteers and the great Brahma, who is master of a thousand powers, were able to see that flower. To everyone else, it was invisible. In that great lotus appeared a drop of nectar, which embodied the extracted essence and vitality of the entire great trichiliocosm. The great Brahma placed this drop into a beautiful vessel of beryl and offered it to the Bodhisattva. The Bodhisattva accepted the gift and, out of affection for the great Brahma, he drank it. Apart from a bodhisattva in his final existence, who has completed all the bodhisattva stages, no other being is able to digest such a drop of vital energy.

What were the previous actions that prepared the Bodhisattva for digesting this drop of vital energy? When the Bodhisattva was practicing the conduct of a bodhisattva for extended periods in the past, he gave medicine to the sick, fulfilled the wishes of those who had aspirations, and never abandoned those who came to him for refuge. He always offered the finest flowers, the best fruits, and the most delicious foods first to the thus-gone ones, the memorials of the thus-gone ones, the sangha of hearers of the thus-gone ones, and his parents. Only then would he cater to his own needs. It was as a result of this activity that the great Brahma offered the Bodhisattva this drop of nectar. Within that temple all the most excellent and exquisite pleasures and amusements came together, manifesting due to the maturation of the Bodhisattva's previous actions.

Moreover, within the precious structure that delighted the Bodhisattva, a set of garments appeared, known as the ornament of a hundred thousand. Apart from a bodhisattva in his final existence, no other being anywhere could ever receive such garments. In fact all possible sublime and perfect forms, sounds, smells, tastes, and textures were present within that peaked structure.

In this way the temple that delighted the Bodhisattva was completely perfect and finely constructed both inside and outside. It was also pleasant to touch, like silk from the Kacalindi region. This is merely an example, for in reality nothing could compare to it.

Because of the previous aspirations of the Bodhisattva, his intentions were accomplished. It is the nature of things that a great bodhisattva is born into the human world. Having renounced his home, he attains perfect and complete awakening and turns the wheel of Dharma. Yet before he enters his mother's womb, a temple of precious materials is manifested on the right side of the mother's womb. Then as a bodhisattva transmigrates from the Heaven of Joy, he remains seated in a cross-legged position in that tiered chamber. The body of a bodhisattva in his last existence is free from the four stages of embryonic development. Instead he appears seated, with all his limbs, organs, and characteristics fully formed. As such Queen Maya saw the arrival of an elephant in her dream.

Now Sakra, lord of the gods, as well as the four great kings, the twenty-eight great commanders of the yakas, and the master of the guhyakas, who are the type of yaksa from which Vajrapani came, all knew that the Bodhisattva had entered the womb of his mother, and they constantly stayed close to him. The Bodhisattva also had four goddesses named Utkhali, Samutkhali, Dhvajavati, and Prabhavati serve him. When these four goddesses knew that the Bodhisattva had entered the womb of his mother, they kept a constant guard over him. In addition, when Sakra, lord of the gods, discovered that the Bodhisattva had entered the womb of his mother, he brought along five hundred divine sons to constantly follow the Bodhisattva.

The body of a bodhisattva who has entered the womb of his mother develops certain features. For example, it is like a great fire burning on a mountaintop during the darkest night, visible from a league or even five leagues away. The body of the Bodhisattva as he entered the womb of his mother was just this way. It was radiant, well formed, handsome, and pleasing to see. As he sat with crossed legs inside that peaked structure, he was exceedingly beautiful. He appeared to have a golden hue, shining like refined gold adorned with precious beryl. The mother of the Bodhisattva could also see the Bodhisattva within her womb.

In the same way that a lightning bolt illumines everything as it emerges from a mass of clouds, so the Bodhisattva dwelling in his mother's womb also illuminated the innermost chamber of the precious temple through his splendour, brilliance, and colour. When that was illuminated, he illuminated the middle chamber of the fragrant temple. When the second level of the fragrant temple was illuminated, the light went farther and illuminated the outer chamber of the fragrant temple. Then, as the third level of the fragrant temple was bathed in light, his mother's entire body became filled with light. The light then went farther and illuminated the seat upon which his mother was seated. Gradually the light streamed forth and brightened the entire palace. The light rays rose beyond the palace and illuminated the east. Likewise, while the Bodhisattva was residing in the womb of his mother, the glory, brilliance, and colour of the Bodhisattva illuminated the south, the west, and the north, below and above. In fact all the ten directions were bathed in light for several miles in each direction.

Monks, in the early morning the four great kings and the twenty-eight great commanders of the yakas together with five hundred yakas arrived to meet the Bodhisattva and to offer him their respect and veneration, and also to listen to the Dharma. At that time the Bodhisattva, who was aware of their arrival, extended his right hand and pointed out their seats. The guardians of the world and the other guests sat down on the arranged seats. They perceived the Bodhisattva, who was in the womb of his mother, in the form of a child who has already taken birth, extending his hand and moving it in various positions. Upon seeing this they prostrated to the Bodhisattva and were filled with joy, devotion, and well-being.

When the Bodhisattva saw that they were settled, he offered them a Dharma teaching and made sure that they understood, became inspired, and were filled with joy. When they wished to go, the Bodhisattva, who knew full well their thoughts, extended his right hand as a farewell greeting. As he retracted his hand, there was no harm done to his mother. The four great kings understood the greeting and thought: "We have been dismissed by the Bodhisattva." Then they circled around the Bodhisattva and his mother three times before departing. This was the circumstance and the reason why the Bodhisattva, in the quiet of the night, would extend his right hand and draw it back. Finally he would let the hand rest while maintaining mindfulness and carefulness.

At other times when people came to see the Bodhisattva, be they women or men, boys or girls, he would first joyfully welcome them, and then his mother would do the same. Monks, in this way the Bodhisattva became very skilled at initiating delightful salutations as he dwelt in his mother's womb. There was no one, whether god, naga, yaksa, human, or nonhuman, who was ever able to greet the Bodhisattva first with a delightful salutation. Instead the Bodhisattva would initiate the salutations, and afterward the mother of the Bodhisattva would joyfully welcome the guests.

When the morning had passed and the noon hour arrived, Sakra, the lord of the gods, along with the most eminent divine sons of the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, came to meet the Bodhisattva and to offer him their respect and veneration, and also to listen to the Dharma. The Bodhisattva, who saw them coming from a distance, extended his golden-coloured right hand and, to the delight of Sakra, lord of the gods, and the gods of the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, pointed out their seats. Monks, at that moment Sakra, lord of the gods, was unable to resist the Bodhisattva's request, and so he and the divine sons all settled down on the seats that had been arranged for them.

When the Bodhisattva knew that they were settled, he offered them a Dharma teaching and made sure that they understood, became inspired, and were filled with joy. In whichever direction the Bodhisattva would extend his hand, the mother of the Bodhisattva would turn to face that way. Then the gods reflected: "The Bodhisattva is having a heartwarming conversation with us." And each one of them thought:

"The Bodhisattva is speaking directly to me; to me alone he extends a friendly welcome." All the while the images of Sakra, lord of the gods, and those of the gods of the Heaven of the Thirty-Three were reflected within the temple. Thus nowhere else were the Bodhisattva's enjoyments as perfectly pure as in the womb of his mother.

Monks, when Sakra, lord of the gods, and the other divine sons wished to depart, the Bodhisattva, who knew full well their thoughts, extended his right hand as a farewell greeting. As he retracted his hand, there was no harm done to his mother. At that time Sakra, lord of the gods, and the other divine sons of the Heaven of the Thirty-Three reflected: "We have been dismissed by the Bodhisattva." Then they circled around the Bodhisattva and his mother three times before departing.

Monks, noontime passed, and it was now evening when Brahma, lord of the Fearless Realm, surrounded by many hundreds of thousands of divine sons, approached the Bodhisattva carrying a drop of the vital force of the divine realms. They came to meet the Bodhisattva and to offer him their respect and veneration, and also to listen to the Dharma.

Monks, the Bodhisattva knew that Brahma, lord of the Fearless Realm, was arriving together with his retinue, and again he raised his golden-coloured right hand. He cordially greeted Brahma, lord of the Fearless Realm, and those divine sons of the pure realms, and pointed out their seats to them. Monks, again it was not possible for Brahma, lord of the Fearless Realm, to resist the Bodhisattva's command.

Thus Brahma, lord of the Fearless Realm, as well as the other divine sons of the pure realms, settled on those seats that had been arranged. When the Bodhisattva knew that they were settled in, he offered them a Dharma teaching and made sure that they understood, became inspired, and were filled with joy. In whichever direction the Bodhisattva would extend his hand, the mother of the Bodhisattva would turn to face that way. Then the gods reflected: "The Bodhisattva is having a heartwarming conversation with us." And each one of them thought: "The Bodhisattva is speaking directly to me; to me alone he extends a friendly welcome."

Monks, when Brahma, lord of the Fearless Realm, and those divine sons of the pure realms wished to depart, the Bodhisattva, who knew full well their thoughts, extended his right hand as a farewell greeting. As he retracted his hand with mindfulness and carefulness, there was no harm done to his mother. Then Brahma, lord of the Fearless Realm, and those gods of the pure realms reflected: "We have been dismissed by the Bodhisattva." Then they circled around the Bodhisattva and his mother three times before departing. Finally the Bodhisattva let his hand rest while maintaining mindfulness and carefulness.

Monks, from everywhere, such as the east, the south, the west, the north, above and below, many hundreds of thousands of bodhisattvas came to meet the Bodhisattva and to offer him their respect and veneration, and also to listen to the Dharma and correctly proclaim that Dharma. Once they had arrived, the Bodhisattva's body began emitting light, which manifested into lion thrones. The Bodhisattva then indicated to the bodhisattvas to take their seat on these thrones. When he knew that they were settled in, the Bodhisattva questioned and examined the bodhisattvas regarding the divisions pertaining to the Great Vehicle. However, with the exception of the gods who were of equal fortune, no one else perceived this. Monks, this was the circumstance and the reason why the Bodhisattva projected light from his body in the quiet of the night.

Monks, while the Bodhisattva was dwelling in the womb of his mother, Queen Maya did not feel any heaviness in her body. On the contrary she felt light, supple, and happy, and she did not experience any uncomfortable pains in her belly. She was not afflicted by attachment, anger, or delusion. She did not entertain any desirous thoughts, nor any thoughts of ill will or harm. She neither experienced nor witnessed any heat, cold, hunger, thirst, gloom, uncleanness, nor fatigue. No unpleasant forms, sounds, smells, tastes, or textures appeared to her, and she also had no bad dreams. There were no female deception, guile, envy, or feminine disturbing emotions to trouble her.

At that time the mother of the Bodhisattva observed the five basic precepts. She was disciplined and followed the path of the ten virtuous actions. The mother of the Bodhisattva never desired any man whomsoever, and neither did any man feel lust in the presence of the mother of the Bodhisattva.

Merely by seeing the mother of the Bodhisattva, any woman, man, boy, or girl in the city of Kapilavastu and its surrounding areas who had been possessed was cured and regained consciousness immediately, regardless of whether they had been possessed by gods, nagas, yakshas, gandharvas, demigods, garudas, or bhutas. Those nonhuman beings quickly departed for other places.

All those who had been struck by illness were freed from their disease as soon as the mother of the Bodhisattva placed her right hand on the top of their head. In this way she would cure those who suffered from any illness or ailment that arises from disharmony among wind, bile, or phlegm. She would cure illnesses related to the eyes, ears, nose, tongue, and lips, as well as toothaches, throat diseases, goiters, lumps, various forms of leprosy, tuberculosis, madness, dementia, fevers, swellings, boils, rashes, scabs, and other illnesses. Once they were freed from their disease, these people could then return to their homes. Queen Maya would also pick herbs and distribute them to the sick, who would immediately regain their health and vigour.

When Queen Maya looked inside her belly, she saw the Bodhisattva resting on the right side of her womb. She could see this as clearly as if she was looking at her own face in a spotless mirror. Seeing him in that way, she was satisfied, elated, and delighted. She felt extremely happy, buoyant, and joyful.

Monks, through the blessings of the Bodhisattva staying in his mother's womb, the sounds of divine musical instruments arose constantly without interruption both day and night, and a rain of divine flowers fell. The gods sent timely rains, and the winds blew at appropriate moments. The seasons and the stars all moved in a balanced manner. The kingdom was joyful and the harvests were bountiful. There were no disturbances or animosity anywhere.

In the city of Kapilavastu, the clan of the Sakyas and everyone else had plenty to eat and drink, and they enjoyed themselves with various amusements. They were generous and created merit. They happily amused themselves just as one does during the autumn festival at the end of the fourth month. King Suddhodana devoted himself purely to religious practice. Setting aside all his kingly work, he lived in complete purity as if he had entered an ascetic's grove. With great delight, he followed the Dharma. Monks, such were the miraculous marvels that occurred while the Bodhisattva remained in his mother's womb.

At this time the Blessed One asked venerable Ananda: "Ananda, would you like to see the jeweled structure that delighted the Bodhisattva when he stayed in his mother's womb?"

Ananda replied: "Yes, Blessed One. I would love to, Bliss-Gone One!"

The Blessed One then showed the jeweled structure to venerable Ananda as well as to Sakra, lord of the gods; the four guardians of the world; and many other gods and humans. As they saw the structure, they were satisfied, uplifted, and full of rejoicing.

In a joyful mood, they were happy and delighted.

Then once again, Brahma, lord of the Fearless Realm, lifted up the jeweled structure and brought it with him to the Brahma realm, where he installed it as an object of worship.

Then the Blessed One again addressed the monks: "Monks, in this way, while the Bodhisattva dwelt in his mother's womb, he ripened 36 million gods and humans within the Three Vehicles."

On this topic, it is said:

When the Victors' Son, the Great Being, settled in his mother's womb,

The earth with its forests shook in six ways.

Golden light shone forth and all the lower realms were purified;

All the gods joyfully proclaimed, "He will be a Dharma king!"

Well shaped and resplendent with many jewels is the great mansion

Where the Hero, the Perfect Guide, has ascended and remains.

It is resplendent, filled with exquisitely fragrant sandalwood,

A few grams of which is worth the whole trichiliocosm filled with jewels.

Bursting forth from beneath the great trichiliocosm,

A lotus, which is a mine of good qualities, emerged with a drop of vital energy.

Within seven days, it reached the world of Brahma through the power of merit;

Brahma collected the vital drop and offered it to the Victors' Son.

Apart from the Bodhisattva, a mighty hero,

No being anywhere could digest the drop.

This drop of vital energy is imbued with the merit of many eons;

Whoever consumes it becomes pure in body, mind, and consciousness.

Sakra, Brahma, and the guardians of the world paid the Bodhisattva three visits

In order to make offerings to the Guide.

They prostrated, made offerings, and listened to the sublime Dharma,

Then they circled around him and returned to their abodes.

From all worlds and realms came bodhisattvas desiring the Dharma;

Sitting on seats of light, they illumined each other.

Because they heard the sacred Dharma of the Supreme Vehicle,

They all could leave with joy, proclaiming songs of praise.

Any woman or child afflicted by suffering,

Possessed by spirits, with troubled mind, naked and covered with dust,

Recovered their senses upon seeing Queen Maya.

With intelligence and mindfulness restored, they returned to their homes.

Those afflicted by illness caused by disorders of wind, bile, or phlegm,

And those with body and mind tormented by diseases of the eyes and ears,

And all those stricken by many different kinds of ailments,

Were freed from illness when Queen Maya placed her hand on their heads.

Moreover, gathering herbs from the ground,

Maya gave them to the sick, who all became cured.

Happy and healthy, they returned to their homes,

While the King of Physicians, the remedy itself, dwelt in the womb.

Whenever Queen Maya examined her body,

She saw the Bodhisattva in her womb.

Like the moon in the sky encircled by stars,

The Bodhisattva was ornamented by marks.

She was untroubled by attachment, anger, or delusion,

Had no sexual desires, nor envy or ill will.

With a joyful and elated mind, she was blissful,

Never bothered by hunger and thirst, or heat and cold.

The sounds of divine instruments constantly arose without being played.

Excellent sublime flowers, fragrant with divine perfumes, fell like rain.

Gods and humans behold this, and none of them

Feel any resentment or ill will toward each other.

Beings rejoiced and played, and made offerings of food and drink;

They uttered cries of joy, content and delighted as they were.

The kingdom was at peace, undisturbed and with well-timed rain;

Grasses, medicinal herbs, and flowers grew in a timely manner.

Over the royal palace, a rain of jewels fell for seven days;

Impoverished beings brought them home and enjoyed the bounty.

At that time there were no impoverished or suffering beings; Everyone was as joyful as the beings in the pleasure grove atop Mount Meru.

The king of the Sakyas observed the mending and purification ritual;

Leaving his royal duties, he only practiced the Dharma.

He went into the grove of the ascetics and said to Mayadevi,

"How blissful your body must be, bearing the Perfect Being!"

This concludes the sixth chapter on entering the womb.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 7 — The Birth

[The Bodhisattva takes birth at the grove in Lumbini and declares his intention to attain complete awakening.]

Monks, in this way ten months passed, and the time came for the Bodhisattva to take birth. At that time thirty-two omens occurred in King Suddhodana's parks: All flowers budded and blossomed. In the ponds, all the blue, red, and white lotus flowers also budded and blossomed. New fruit and flower trees sprung from the earth, budded, and came into blossom. Eight trees of precious gems appeared. Twenty thousand great treasures emerged and remained on the grounds. Inside the women's quarters, jeweled shoots sprouted forth. Scented water, saturated with fragrant oils, flowed forth. Lion cubs descended from the snow mountains. They joyfully circled the sublime city of Kapilavastu and then rested by the gates without harming anyone. Five hundred young white elephants arrived, stroking King Suddhodana's feet with the tips of their trunks, and then settling down next to him.

Divine children, wearing sashes, were seen moving back and forth between the laps of the women in the retinue of King Suddhodana's queen.

Naga girls could be seen holding aloft various offerings, revealing the upper half of their bodies as they moved about in the sky. Ten thousand celestial maidens were seen hovering in the sky, holding up peacock feathers. Ten thousand full vases appeared in a ring around the city of Kapilavastu. Ten thousand celestial maidens appeared with vases of scented water on their heads. Ten thousand celestial maidens appeared holding up parasols, flags, and banners. Many hundreds of thousands of celestial maidens appeared holding conch shells, drums, clay drums, and cymbals adorned with bells.

The winds became still and ceased to blow. All streams and rivers stopped their flow. The sun, the moon, the celestial chariots, the planets, and the stars all stood still. The constellation of Pusa appeared. King Suddhodana's residence became adorned with a net of jewels. All fires were extinguished. The palace, temples, gateways, and doorways were decorated with tassels of jewels and gems. The doors to the storehouses of cloths and gems appeared wide open. The calls of crows, owls, vultures, wolves, and jackals ceased to be heard. Instead many delightful sounds were heard. All people stopped their work. The ground became level without any bumps or hollows. All crossroads, junctions, roads, and marketplaces became as even and smooth as the palm of a hand and were beautifully bestrewn with flower petals. All pregnant women birthed their babies with comfort and ease. All the gods in the sala forest revealed half their bodies from among the trees' leaves and remained there, bowing. Such were the thirty-two omens that occurred.

Then Mayadevi, due to the magnificence and strength of the Bodhisattva, knew that it was time for her to give birth. During the first watch of the night, she came to King Suddhodana and spoke these words:

"Lord, please listen to what is on my mind;

For a long time now, I have thought about the pleasure grove.

If you will not be upset, displeased, or envious,

I should quickly go to that pleasure grove.

"You are also weary from austerities and diligently contemplating the Dharma;

I myself have carried a pure being within me for a long time now.

The sala, that most wonderful of trees, is now in blossom; O Lord, it is therefore fitting for us to go to the pleasure grove!

"Spring, that excellent season, is a joyous time for women;

The bees are humming and the cuckoos singing.

Fresh and sweet, the fragrance of flowers drifts through the air;

Please issue an order, and let us go there right away!"

The king heard Mayadevi's words, and then,

Delighted and elated, he spoke to his retinue:

"Arrange my horses, elephants, and chariots!

Decorate the excellent garden at Lumbini!

"Quick, prepare twenty thousand elephants,

Dark blue like mountains or storm clouds.

Ornament the lordly six-tusked elephants with bells attached to their flanks;

Decorate them with gold and gems and cover them with lattices of gold.

"Quick, harness twenty thousand royal steeds,

Fast as the wind, strong and excellent steeds,

With silvery snow-coloured tails, manes that are beautifully plaited,

And lattices of golden bells hung on their flanks.

"Quick, gather twenty thousand brave men,

Heroes who long for the battlefield and combat.

Let them brandish sharp weapons—bows and arrows, swords, spears, and lassos—

To carefully guard Mayadevi and her retinue.

"Have Lumbini bestrewn with gold and jewels;

Adorn all the trees with many types of cloths and jewels.

Quick, plant many flowers, like in the gardens of the gods;

Arrange all of this, and then swiftly report to me."

Hearing this, the retinue immediately arranged

All the conveyances and ornamented Lumbini.

They then called out, "Victory! Victory! Long live the king!

Your command is fulfilled and all is ready. Please look, O lord!"

The sublime lord of men, with a joyous mind,

Entered the palace and spoke thus to the women:

"Those of you to whom I am dear and who would like to bring me joy,

Follow my command and adorn yourselves.

"With colourful clothes, beautiful and soft,

And fragrant with enchanting perfume,

Adorn your chests with necklaces of pearls;

Today everyone should wear all their ornaments!

"Bring hundreds of thousands of delightful instruments:

Hand drums, flutes, lutes, clay drums, and cymbals.

Hearing the melodious sound of these instruments, even the gods will be pleased!

You make the goddesses similarly joyful!

"In the supreme chariot, only Mayadevi shall sit;

None of the ladies nor the men shall join her.

This chariot shall be led by a host of bright young women;

No one shall mention anything unpleasant or unfitting!"

Mayadevi then left her palace and went to the door of the king.

When she arrived, the divisions of horses, elephants, chariots, and foot soldiers

All called out with a deafening roar,

As loud as the waves on a great turbulent ocean.

At this moment, auspiciously, a hundred thousand bells rang out.

The king himself decorated the chariot,

And a thousand gods prepared a divine throne.

The four precious trees were complete with flowers and leaves.

Peacocks, cranes, and swans sounded their delightful calls;

Parasols, flags, and banners of all sizes were hoisted.

The chariot was covered with a beautiful lattice of tinkling bells and divine cloth;

From up in the heavens, celestial maidens looked down at the chariot.

They called out in divine melodious tones, offering words of praise.

When Mayadevi sat upon the lion throne,

The earth of the trichiliocosm trembled in six ways.

The gods waved cloths and scattered a rain of flowers:

"Today at Lumbini, a sublime being is to be born!"

The four guardians of the world led the supreme chariot;

Sakra himself, lord of the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, cleared its path.

Brahma, going ahead, expelled all untamed creatures;

Hundreds of thousands of gods joined their hands and bowed down.

The king, with a joyful heart, surveyed what had been prepared.

Thinking, "This child must be the god of gods!

When the four guardians, Brahma, and the gods, led by Sakra, make such offerings, He will surely become a Buddha!"

"None of the gods, nor the nagas, Sakra, Brahma, or the guardians of the world, And no other being in the trichiliocosm could accept such offerings as these, For their heads would burst asunder or their lives be lost. Yet he, supreme among gods, can accept all offerings."

Monks, Mayadevi now set forth, surrounded and protected by 84,000 richly ornamented horse-drawn chariots, 84,000 richly ornamented elephant-drawn chariots, and 84,000 brave, heroic, and handsome foot soldiers wearing excellent and solid armour. She was escorted by 60,000 Sakya maidens. She was guarded by 40,000 elders, youths, and middle-aged men from King Suddhodana's Sakya clan. She was also surrounded by 60,000 women from King Suddhodana's retinue, who sang songs and played music, bells, and cymbals. Some 84,000 celestial maidens followed her, as did 84,000 naga maidens, 84,000 gandharva maidens, 84,000 kimnara maidens, and 84,000 female demigods. All of them were lavishly ornamented and sang her praise in melodic voices accompanied by music.

The entire Lumbini Grove was sprinkled with droplets of perfumed water and strewn with celestial flowers. Every tree in that perfect grove had leaves, flowers, and fruits, even though it was out of season. Even the gods had done their best to decorate the forest. They had, in fact, made it appear like the gods' Misraka Garden.

When Mayadevi arrived at the Lumbini Grove, she stepped down from her fine chariot. As human and divine maidens encircled her, she wandered from tree to tree and from grove to grove. She looked among all the trees and eventually arrived beneath a very special and exquisite fig tree. Its branches spread out, full of lush leaves and clusters of blossoms, and further adorned with numerous human and divine flowers. Richly scented cloths of many colours were draped across its branches. It was sparkling with the light of many gems and jewels. Its roots, trunk, branches, and leaves were all adorned with jewels. Its branches were long and spread out spaciouly.

The ground where the fig tree stood was smooth like the palm of a hand, beautiful and open, and it was full of dark blue grass, the colour of a peacock's neck. The earth was pleasant to the touch, like soft kacalindi cloth. This tree had supported the mothers of previous victorious ones, and it had been praised in the poetry of the gods.

It was a tree to which the wholesome and peaceful gods of the pure realms would bow down and touch with their heads, including their topknots and diadems. Now the queen and her retinue had arrived at this pure and stainless fig tree.

However, at this moment the Bodhisattva's magnificence and power caused the fig tree itself to bow down and pay homage to him. Mayadevi stretched out her right arm, like a flash of lightning appearing in the middle of the sky, and grasped a branch of the tree. She auspiciously directed her gaze into the open sky and stretched her body. At that point sixty thousand goddesses from the desire realm approached Mayadevi to assist and venerate her.

Such were the miracles that occurred while the Bodhisattva was in his mother's womb. Now, as the ten months had been completed, he emerged from his mother's right side, fully aware and mindful. In this way he was unstained by any impurities of the womb, which otherwise are said to stain everyone else.

Monks, at that time Sakra, lord of the gods, and Brahma, lord of the Fearless Realm, appeared before the Bodhisattva. As they remembered and recognized who he was, they were full of veneration for the Bodhisattva and wrapped him up in divine silk. The temple in which the Bodhisattva had dwelt while in his mother's womb was carried off by Brahma, lord of the Fearless Realm, and the other gods of the Brahma realm up into their realm, where they enshrined the temple in a memorial and made it an object of worship. Thus the Bodhisattva was first received by the gods rather than by any humans.

As soon as he was born, the Bodhisattva stepped onto the ground. Wherever his feet touched the ground, a large lotus immediately sprung from the earth. Then the great naga kings Nanda and Upananda revealed their upper bodies in the sky and produced two streams of cool and warm water to rinse the Bodhisattva's body.

Sakra, Brahma, the guardians of the world, and many hundreds of thousands of divine sons then bathed the Bodhisattva in perfumed water and scattered flower petals over him. A parasol of precious gems and two yak-tail whisks also appeared from midair.

The Bodhisattva stood on a large lotus and surveyed the four directions with his lion's gaze, the gaze of a great being. At that time the Bodhisattva, with unhindered higher knowledge, which he manifested due to the ripening of previous roots of virtue, saw the entire great trichiliocosm. He saw all the cities, towns, estates, kingdoms, royal cities, and lands, as well as all gods and humans. He also perfectly knew the minds of all sentient beings and carefully surveyed them, looking to see if there was anyone similar to himself in terms of virtuous conduct, discipline, meditative absorption, or knowledge. However, in the entire great trichiliocosm, the Bodhisattva did not see anyone like himself.

At that point the Bodhisattva felt a lion-like fearlessness, free from anxiety or apprehension. Without any hesitation or wavering, he reminded himself of his good motivations. Because he had examined the minds of all sentient beings, he now knew their thoughts. Unsupported, he took seven steps toward the east and declared, "I will be the cause of all virtuous practices."

Wherever the Bodhisattva took a step, a lotus sprouted forth. He then took seven steps toward the south and said, "I am worthy of the offerings of gods and humans."

Next he took seven steps toward the west and, pausing on the seventh step, he proclaimed these satisfying words in lion-like fashion: "I am the Supreme Being on this earth. This is my last birth, where I shall uproot birth, old age, sickness, and death!" He then took seven steps toward the north and said, "I will be supreme among all sentient beings!" Next he took seven steps downhill, saying, "I will subjugate Mara and his army! I will cause great rain clouds of the Dharma to shower down on all hell beings, extinguishing the fires of hell and filling the beings there with happiness." Finally he took seven steps uphill, lifted his gaze, and said, "All sentient beings will look up to me."

As the Bodhisattva spoke in this way, his words were immediately heard throughout the entire great trichiliocosm. Such was the nature of the foreknowledge that sprang from the ripening of the Bodhisattva's previous actions. Whenever a bodhisattva takes birth into his final existence, and as he awakens to perfect and complete buddhahood, various miracles unfold.

Monks, at that time all beings were so delighted that the hairs on their bodies shivered. There was also a terrifying quaking of the earth, which caused the hairs on their bodies to stand on end. The cymbals and musical instruments of gods and humans sounded without being played by anyone. At that time all the trees in the great trichiliocosm—whether in season or not—blossomed and bore fruit. From the expanse of pure space, the sound of thunder rang out, and from the cloudless sky, a fine mist of rain showered down ever so gently, mixed with divinely coloured flowers, cloths, ornaments, and powdered incense. Deliciously scented breezes blew, delightful and cooling. In all directions there was no darkness, dust, smoke, or mist to be seen, and everything appeared bright and beautiful.

Also, from the empty space above, the great melodious and profound sounds of the realm of Brahma were heard. All the light of the sun, the moon, Brahma, Sakra, and the guardians of the world [86] was eclipsed by an otherworldly light of a hundred thousand colours, which filled the entire great trichiliocosm and brought pleasure and happiness, both physical and mental, to everyone that it touched. At the very moment when the Bodhisattva was born, all beings became filled with bliss. All types of attachment, anger, delusion, pride, [F.47.a] dislike, dejection, fear, greed, jealousy, and stinginess subsided, and everyone abandoned all forms of unwholesome conduct.

The illnesses of the sick were cured. The hungry and the thirsty were relieved of their hunger and thirst. The drunk and intoxicated were freed from their intoxication. The mad had their sanity restored. The blind could see. The deaf could hear. The crippled had their capacities restored. The destitute gained wealth. The imprisoned were freed. All ailments and sufferings of those in the hell realms, starting with the Hell of Ultimate Torment, ceased at that moment. The suffering of those born into the animal realm, such as the fear of being eaten by one another, was also pacified.

Likewise the sufferings experienced by beings in the realm of the lord of death, such as hunger and thirst, were also pacified.

The newborn Bodhisattva had already practiced good conduct for countless trillions of eons, and he possessed great diligence and strength. As such, when he took his first seven steps, he had already attained the state of reality. Therefore all the buddhas, the blessed ones, in all the realms in the ten directions blessed the earth at that spot of vajra nature so that it would not be destroyed by his steps. Monks, such was the awesome strength of the newborn Bodhisattva's first seven steps.

At that time the entire world was filled with a bright light, and the sounds of singing and dancing were heard. A rain of flowers, powders, incense, garlands, jewels, ornaments, and cloths showered down from innumerable clouds. All beings were filled with perfect joy. In short, when the Bodhisattva, who is more exalted than anyone in all the worlds, came into this world, many inconceivable events took place.

Venerable Ananda now stood up from his seat, removed his robe from one shoulder, and kneeled, placing his right knee on the ground. He joined his palms in the direction of the Blessed One, bowed, and supplicated him with these words:

"The Blessed One, the Thus-Gone One, is truly more amazing than anyone else. The Bodhisattva possessed incredible qualities, but how much more so the One Who Has Awakened to Perfect and Complete Buddhahood? O Blessed One, I therefore take refuge in Lord Buddha four times, five times, ten times, fifty times, a hundred times, or rather many hundreds of thousands of times!"

After the Blessed One had been supplicated in this manner by the venerable Ananda, the Blessed One proclaimed:

"In the future there will be some monks who do not train their bodies and minds and do not acquaint themselves with discipline and knowledge. Like unskilled children, they will be highly proud, wild, arrogant, unrestrained, distracted, hesitant, doubting, and without trust. They will bring stains on the monastic order and not live like proper monks. When they hear about the Bodhisattva entering his mother's womb in such a pure way, they will not believe it. Instead they will gather and gossip, saying, 'Listen, all of you, just listen to this nonsense! The Bodhisattva supposedly entered into his mother's womb, where he mixed with impure fluids. And yet he is said to have had such enjoyments. Moreover, it is said that when he was born, he emerged from his mother's right side without being sullied by any stains of the womb. [F.48.a] But how could this be possible?"

"Such fools will not understand that the bodies of those who have engaged in excellent actions are not begotten from unclean fluids. Monks, such sublime beings enter into and abide in the womb in the finest manner. It is due to their love and compassion for sentient beings that bodhisattvas are born into the world of humans, since gods do not turn the wheel of Dharma. Why is this? Ananda, it is because beings would otherwise have been discouraged, thinking, 'The Blessed One, the Thus-Gone One, the Worthy One, the Completely Perfect Buddha is a god. We are just human beings, so we are not able to achieve that state.'

"It will not occur to these foolish beings, such thieves of the Dharma, to think, 'This being is inconceivable and we cannot judge him.' Ananda, these future people will also not believe in the Buddha's miracles, let alone the miracles displayed by the Thus-Gone Bodhisattva. Ananda, these foolish beings will be overcome with desire for wealth, respect, and praise. They will sink into filth and be overcome with their lust for honour. In this way these impertinent beings will abandon the Buddha's teachings. Just consider how much nonvirtue they will accumulate!"

Ananda asked, "Blessed One! In the future will there really be such monks who reject excellent sutras like this one, and who speak poorly of them?" The Blessed One replied, "Ananda, not only will there be those who reject the sutras and speak poorly of them, there will also be monks who perform many negative deeds and leave aside their obligations as monks."

Ananda then asked, "Blessed One, please tell me how life will turn out for those wicked beings? What will happen as they move from one life to the next?"

The Blessed One replied, "They will share the fate of those who deny the Buddha's awakening and those who insult and defame the buddhas, the blessed ones, of the past, present, and future."

THE GRAND BIBLE

Venerable Ananda's hairs stood on end as he exclaimed, "I pay homage to the Buddha!" He then said to the Blessed One, "Blessed One, when I hear about the conduct of those wicked beings, it almost makes me faint!"

Then the Blessed One gave this speech: "Ananda, the behavior of such people will not be proper, but base. Ananda, through their improper conduct, these beings will fall into the great hell of incessant pain. Why is this? Ananda, there are some monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen who do not feel inspired when they hear sutras like this one. Instead they do not trust these sutras and they reject them. As soon as they die, they will all fall into the great Hell of Ultimate Torment. Ananda, one should never attempt to measure the thus-gone ones. Why not? Because, Ananda, the thus-gone ones are immeasurable, profound, vast, and difficult to judge.

"Ananda, when some beings hear sutras like this one, they become joyful, elated, and full of faith. Those beings obtain something wonderful. Their lives become meaningful and their humanity serves a purpose. Their conduct is excellent and they take hold of what is truly essential. They are freed from the three lower realms. They become heirs of the thus-gone ones and obtain all that they need. Their trust is meaningful and they will receive their fair share of the provisions of the kingdom. They will trust deeply in noble beings and cut through Mara's snares. They will cross over the wastelands of samsara and remove the thorns of misery. They will reach a place of supreme joy and genuinely take refuge. As appropriate objects for others' generosity, they are worthy recipients of offerings. These beings appear in the world only rarely, and when here they are to be held as proper objects of generosity. Why is that? It is because they have faith in the teachings of the thus-gone ones, which go against all worldly conventions.

"Ananda, those beings do not possess any inferior forms of roots of virtue. Ananda, those beings are not just companions who befriend me for a few lifetimes only. And why is that? Because, Ananda, some beings are pleased and delighted to hear me, but not to see me. Some, Ananda, are pleased and delighted to see me, but not to hear me. Still others, Ananda, are pleased and delighted both to see me and to hear me. Ananda, whatever the case, when beings are pleased and delighted to see me or hear me, you can be certain that they are friends who have accompanied me for multiple lifetimes. The Thus-Gone One sees them, and the Thus-Gone One will liberate them. They have the same qualities as the Thus-Gone One. They have gone for refuge in the Thus-Gone One. The Thus-Gone One has accepted them.

"Ananda, even during earlier times when I was practicing the conduct of a bodhisattva, others came to see me, desperate and bound by fear, begging me to protect them from their fears, which I did. So now that I have awakened to perfect and complete buddhahood, I will certainly do the same. Ananda, strive in faith; the Thus-Gone One urges you thus! Ananda, the task before you has already been completed by the Thus-Gone One. The Thus-Gone One has pulled out the thorn of pride.

"Ananda, if a person is willing to travel for hundreds of miles just to receive news of a friend and is delighted to hear that news, then how about if they actually meet their friend? Whoever relies on me and generates the roots of virtue will be recognised by the future thus-gone ones, the worthy ones, the completely perfect buddhas, who will think, 'Those beings are the old friends of the thus-gone ones. They are also our friends.'

"Why is that? Ananda, it is because friends please and delight each other. Whoever is dear to one's friend is also dear and delightful to oneself. Therefore, Ananda, have trust and understand it to be so. Develop trust and think, 'I also entrust myself to the thus-gone ones, the worthy ones, the completely perfect buddhas of the future. They are also my friends.' Think like this, and your wishes will be fulfilled.

"Ananda, think of this example: Consider a man who is strong and well-regarded but has only one son. Now, if that father has many friends, then even if he should pass away, the friends of the father will still accept the son and not reject him. Ananda, in the same way, whoever has faith in me, I will accept as my friend. They will take refuge in me. The Thus-Gone One has many friends. And because those friends of the Thus-Gone One speak genuinely and tell no lies, I entrust those friends of the Thus-Gone One to those who speak the truth—the future thus-gone ones, the worthy ones, the completely perfect buddhas. Therefore, Ananda, strive to have faith! That is what I ask of you!"

Thus, monks, when the Bodhisattva was born, many trillions of goddesses resting in the centre of the sky showered divine flowers, incense, garlands, scented oils, cloths, and jewels upon Mayadevi.

On this topic, it is said:

At that time sixty thousand goddesses with melodious voices,

Glowing with virtuous, stainless, pure golden light, resplendent like the sun and moon,

Arrived at Lumbini and spoke to Mayadevi:

"Do not be displeased but filled with joy! We are your servants.

"Please tell us what to do, what you wish to be done; We are your capable servants, with loving intentions.

We beg you to be joyful and abandon all sorrow;

Today, queen, you shall give birth with ease

To the sublime physician who will overcome sickness and death!

"The trees' buds open, and the sala trees blossom;

Thousands of gods stand before you, bowing their arms.

The earth and the sea tremble in six different ways;

Thus your son will be known here and in heaven as the Transcendent One.

"A pure light beautifies everything, glowing golden;

Hundreds of fine instruments resound from the empty sky without being played.

A hundred thousand pure, clean gods free from desire joyfully pay homage;

Today the One Who Will Benefit the Entire World shall be born.

Sakra, Brahma, the guardians of the world, and other gods Stand by, joyfully and happily, with folded hands.

The Lion-like Being, with disciplined conduct, emerged from Mayadevi's right side;

Like a golden mountain, glowing with purity, the Guide was born.

Sakra and Brahma held out their hands, receiving the Sage;

A hundred thousand realms trembled and were suffused with light.

The beings of the three lower realms were joyful, their sufferings freed;

A hundred thousand gods scattered flowers and waved banners.

From the solid earth sprung beautiful lotuses, the nature of vajra.

They appeared auspiciously where the Guide placed his wheel-marked feet.

He took seven steps and spoke with a melodious voice like Brahma's:

"I will be a perfect being, a sublime physician who cures old age and death!"

Brahma and Sakra, the supreme gods, hovered in the centre of space;

They bathed the body of the Guide with pure, clean, and fragrant water.

Two naga kings, dwelling in space, spouted forth two streams of cool and warm water;

As well, one hundred thousand gods bathed the Guide's body with fragrant water.

The guardians of the world, with deep respect, held him in their fine hands;

The trichilocosm, with all its animate and inanimate contents, shook.

As dazzling light streamed forth, even the lower realms were pacified;

When the Guide of the World was born, all suffering and afflictions ceased.

Upon the Victorious Guide of Men,

The gods showered a cooling rain of flowers.

Then the strong and diligent being

Took seven steps.

Wherever he placed his feet on the ground,

A beautiful lotus,

Adorned with many jewels,

Spouted forth from the earth.

Thus, having taken seven steps,

With the melodious voice of Brahma, he proclaimed:

"The sublime physician, dispeller of old age and death,

Has now arrived!"

Fearlessly he looked in all directions

And then spoke meaningfully:

"I am the leader of the world;

Supreme in this world. I am its guide.

"This is my last birth."

Saying this, the Guide of Men smiled.

Sakra and the world protectors felt strong faith

And bathed the benefactor of the world with the finest scented water.

The naga kings, too, followed suit,

Bathing his body with streams of scented water.

Ten billion other gods suspended in the sky

Also cooled his self-arisen body with streams of delightful scented water.

They held aloft vast white parasols and beautiful yak-tail fans;

Hovering in space, the gods bathed the body of the leader of men.

One man swiftly related the joyful news to Suddhodana:

"O king, great fortune! Your son has been born, adorned with signs!

He will certainly be a universal monarch, the jewel of your family lineage;

Uniting the victory banners of Jambudvīpa under one umbrella, he will have no enemies."

Then a second man came and presented himself before Suddhodana.

"O king, great fortune! Now, just as the Prince has been born into the Sakya clan,

There were 25,000 sons born to the Sakya house.

All are invincible, strong, and powerful."

Yet another man came and said, "O king, listen to my joyful news!

Eight hundred children, headed by Chanda, have been born to the servants.

Kanthaka's mare birthed ten thousand foals,

Perfect horses, glowing golden, with plaited manes and tails.

Twenty thousand kings from the borderlands

Came before the king, saying, "O king, may you be victorious!

We have come. Now tell us, king, what shall we do?

Your Majesty, you are the master and we are the subjects. King, may victory be yours!

"Twenty thousand fine elephants adorned with golden lattices

Have quickly marched to Kapilavastu, trumpeting out their cries.

Headed by Gopa, six thousand black-spotted calves have been born;

As the supreme god is born, so are these other beings. How excellent for the kingdom!

"Go, king, look upon all that is yours! Lord of shining merit!

As thousands of joyous gods and humans see the qualities of the newborn,

They set out for perfect awakening beyond suffering

And call out, 'May all be successful!'"

Monks, at the time of the Bodhisattva's birth, a great show of generosity was instigated. Moreover, five hundred children of noble family were born. Ten thousand girls, headed by Yasovati, were also born, as well as eight hundred female servants and five hundred male servants, headed by Chanda. Likewise ten thousand mares and ten thousand colts, headed by Kanthaka, were born. Finally five hundred female elephants and five hundred male elephants were born following the Bodhisattva's birth. These births were all recorded in registers by King Suddhodana and given to his young son for entertainment.

Through the power of the Bodhisattva and for his enjoyment, a bodhi tree grew at the centre of the four billion regions, while a sandalwood-tree forest grew at the inner region. Also for the Bodhisattva's enjoyment, five hundred parks sprang forth in the area surrounding the city. The entrances to five thousand treasures became visible as they broke forth from the earth. Thus all of King Suddhodana's intentions were perfectly fulfilled.

Then the king wondered, "Now, what shall I name my young son? Well, immediately when my son was born, all of my aims were fulfilled, so I will name him Sarvarthasiddha, Fulfiller of All Aims." Then King Suddhodana arranged a great naming ceremony and announced, "This child's name is Sarvarthasiddha."

Monks, although the Bodhisattva had now been born, his mother's right side was not torn or damaged but had returned to its usual state. Moreover, Trita's wells manifested with flowing waters, and three ponds of scented oil sprang forth.

Then five thousand celestial maidens came before the Bodhisattva's mother, bringing fragrant oils perfumed with the scent of celestial perfumes. They wanted to know how the birth had gone and whether she was feeling weary. Likewise five thousand celestial maidens bearing unguents came before the Bodhisattva's mother and asked how the birth was and whether she was weary. Then five thousand celestial maidens bearing vases filled with water scented with celestial perfumes came before the Bodhisattva's mother and asked how the birth was and whether she was weary. Next five thousand celestial maidens bearing divine children's clothing came before the Bodhisattva's mother and asked how the birth was and whether she was weary. Then five thousand celestial maidens bearing divine children's ornaments came before the Bodhisattva's mother and asked how the birth was and whether she was weary. Finally five thousand celestial maidens singing and playing divine instruments came before the Bodhisattva's mother and asked how the birth was and whether she was weary.

All of the non-Buddhist sages from Jambudvīpa who possessed the five extraordinary abilities came flying through the sky and arrived before King Suddhodana. They called out, "May the king thrive!"

Monks, for seven days following the Bodhisattva's birth, he was honoured with celestial and human music, respected, revered, and given various offerings in the Lumbini Grove. Food, drink, and enjoyments were proffered. The entire Sakya clan gathered, and everyone called out with delight, practiced generosity, engaged in merit, and satisfied the needs of 32,000 priests each day. They gave anything that was desired to whoever desired it. Sakra and Brahma also manifested themselves in the form of young priests within that gathering of priests and, sitting at the head of the line, they sang these verses of auspiciousness:

"As the lower realms are pacified,
As all beings feel joy,
He Who Will Establish Beings in Happiness,
The Bringer of Joy, has been born!
"As the unclouded lights
Of the gods, the sun, and the moon
Are outshone and disappear,
A light of merit has certainly appeared!
"The blind can see again;
The deaf can hear again;
The insane have had their sanity restored.
He will become an object of worship for the world!
"Since, unharmed by negative emotions,
The minds of beings are filled with love,
It is certain, without a doubt,
That he will become worthy of the offerings of ten million Brahmas.

"As sala trees blossom
And the earth is even,
Certainly he will become omniscient,
The recipient of offerings of all the world.
"Since the world is calm
And great lotuses have sprouted forth,
Certainly this splendourous one
Will be the protector of the world!
"Since gentle fragrant breezes
Perfumed with divine incense
Pacify the illnesses of beings,
He will become the king of physicians.
"As the hundred gods living in the form realm
Who are free from desire
Join their palms and bow down,
He will become worthy of veneration!
"Humans can see the gods,
And gods can see humans,
Yet they are without animosity toward one another;
Thus he will become the great leader!
"Since all fires have died out,
And all flowing rivers are still,
And the earth sways gently,
He will be one who sees the truth!"

Monks, seven days after the Bodhisattva was born, the time came for Mayadevi to pass away. Upon her death, she was born among the gods in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three.

Monks, you may think that it was because of the Bodhisattva that Mayadevi died. But you should not look upon things that way, since she had reached the maximum extent of her lifespan. Monks, seven days after the bodhisattvas of the past were born, their mothers also died. And why is that? Because once a bodhisattva is born and has grown up, it would destroy his mother's heart if he were to renounce his home.

Monks, seven days earlier Mayadevi had gone in great pomp from the city of Kapilavastu to the pleasure grove. However, with a splendour one trillion times greater than that, the Bodhisattva now entered the city of Kapilavastu. When he entered, five thousand vases filled with scented water were carried ahead of him. Likewise five thousand maidens carrying fans made of peacock feathers walked ahead. Five thousand maidens waving palm fronds preceded them, and farther ahead came five thousand maidens holding golden vases of scented water, who sprinkled this water upon the path. They were preceded by five thousand maidens holding various fresh garlands of wildflowers, as well as five thousand maidens carrying various boxes. Then came five thousand maidens holding fine jewels and sweeping the path. Farther ahead walked five thousand maidens carrying beautiful cushions, and five thousand priests carrying bells and ringing out sounds of auspiciousness. In front of them there were five thousand beautifully decorated elephants. Then came twenty thousand horses covered with golden ornaments and full of jewels.

Following the Bodhisattva were eighty thousand chariots beautifully outfitted with lattices of golden bells, and with parasols, victory banners, and flags hoisted. Then came forty thousand imposing foot soldiers and heroes wearing strong armour. Uncountable billions of gods of the desire and form realms, hovering in the sky, made various types of offerings to the Bodhisattva and followed after him. The Bodhisattva himself rode in a chariot, which the gods of the desire realm had decorated with a great array of ornaments. Twenty thousand celestial maidens with ornate jewellery held up jewel garlands and guided the chariot. Between every two of the celestial maidens was a human maiden, and between every two human maidens was a celestial maiden. However, because of the power of the Bodhisattva, the celestial girls did not find the smell of the human girls displeasing. Nor were the human maidens overwhelmed by the sight of the beautiful celestial maidens.

Monks, in the city of Kapilavastu, five hundred Sakyas had constructed five hundred homes for the Bodhisattva. When the Bodhisattva entered the city, they stood in front of these houses with their hands folded. Bowing reverentially, they invited the Bodhisattva:

"Sarvarthasiddha, please come here! God of Gods, please come here! Pure Being, please come here! Sublime Captain, please come here! Bringer of Pleasure, Joy, and Rapture, please come here! You Who Are Renowned as Being beyond Reproach, please come here! All-Seeing One, please come here! Peerless One beyond Equal, with your splendour, qualities, and body adorned with the major and minor signs, please come here!"

King Suddhodana wanted to make everyone happy, so he took the Bodhisattva into all the houses. In this way it took four months before the Bodhisattva entered his actual residence, the palace known as Display of Gems.

Then the eldest of the elders of the Sakya clan gathered to discuss who among their women should be responsible for the upbringing, care, and nurturing of the Bodhisattva. They agreed that it should be a skilled and kind person who could care for him in a loving and altruistic atmosphere. Five hundred Sakya women came to volunteer, saying, "I will care for the Prince! Please let me take care of the Prince."

The eldest male and female Sakyas then argued, "All of these women are impetuous young girls, who are vain and proud because of their beauty and youth. Such women are incapable of caring for the Prince and his needs. However, the Prince's maternal aunt Mahaprajapati Gautami would be able to raise the Prince so that he is happy and well. She will also be able to please King Suddhodana."

Since everyone agreed with this suggestion, they encouraged Mahaprajapati Gautami to take on this task. And indeed Mahaprajapati Gautami raised the Prince well. At that time thirty-two additional nurses were appointed to serve the Bodhisattva. Of these, eight would carry him, eight were nursemaids, eight were playmates, and eight were appointed to bathe him.

King Suddhodana then gathered all of the Sakyas for a council and asked, "Will this Prince be a universal monarch or will he instead depart from here as a renunciant?"

At that time the great sage Asita, who had the five extraordinary powers, was residing on the slopes of Himavat, the king of mountains, together with his sister's son Naradatta. When the Bodhisattva was born, he saw many amazing miraculous displays and he perceived many divine sons who joyfully hovered in the sky, waving banners and calling out, "Buddha!" Witnessing this, he thought to himself, "Excellent!

I must see this!" With his divine eye, he looked all over Jambudvīpa and saw that a prince had been born to King Suddhodana in the city of Kapilavastu. It was a prince who shone with the light of merit, who was worshiped by everyone, and whose body was beautifully adorned with the thirty-two marks of a great being. He said to the young priest Naradatta:

"Young priest, listen! A jewel has come into this world! In the city of Kapilavastu, in the household of King Suddhodana, a prince has been born. He shines with the light of merit, is worshiped by everyone, and is beautifully adorned with the thirty-two marks of a great being. If he remains in his palace, he will become a universal monarch who commands the four armies. He will be a victorious and pious Dharma king with the necessary strength to govern. He will also have seven precious possessions, which are the precious wheel, the precious elephant, the precious horse, the precious wife, the precious jewel, the precious steward, and the precious minister. He will beget one thousand sons, who will all be heroic, brave, handsome, and triumphant.

By his innate strength, he will subdue and conquer the entire world and its oceans without using force or weapons, and in a way that accords with the doctrine. In this way the entire world will be his kingdom. If, however, he leaves his home and goes forth as a renunciant, he will become a thus-gone one, a worthy one, a completely perfect buddha. He will become a teacher and a guide who is independent of others and renowned throughout the world. So come, let us go and see him."

Just like the king of swans, the great sage Asita, accompanied by his nephew Naradatta, soared through the sky to the city of Kapilavastu. When he arrived, he concealed his magical powers and entered the city on foot. He went to the palace of King Suddhodana and walked right up to the palace gates where, monks, he saw many hundreds of thousands of animals gathered.

The sage Asita went to the gatekeeper and told him, "Sir! Go and tell King Suddhodana that a sage has come to see him."

The gatekeeper went before King Suddhodana with folded hands and said, "Your Majesty! There is an old, elderly, and decrepit sage at the gate, who says that he wishes to see the king."

King Suddhodana had a seat prepared for the sage Asita and said to the gatekeeper, "Let the sage enter."

The gatekeeper returned from the king's quarters and told the sage Asita to enter the palace. The sage Asita went before King Suddhodana and told him, "Great king, may you be victorious! May you be victorious! May you live long! May you rule in accord with the Dharma!"

King Suddhodana first honoured the sage by giving him water to bathe his feet and rinse his mouth. He then very respectfully seated him on a cushion. Once he saw that the sage was sitting comfortably, he respectfully addressed him: "Sage, I do not recall having seen you before. Why have you come here?"

The sage Asita replied to King Suddhodana, "Great king, I have come to see the son who was born to you."

The king said, "Great sage, the child is sleeping now. Please wait for a short while until he wakes."

The sage replied, "Great king, a great being like this does not sleep long. Great beings like him usually remain awake."

Monks, out of affection for the sage Asita, the Bodhisattva now showed signs of having awakened. King Suddhodana carefully lifted Prince Sarvarthasiddha with both hands and carried him before the sage Asita. When the sage Asita looked at the Bodhisattva, he saw that his body was wonderfully adorned with the thirty-two marks and eighty signs of a great being. His body was superior even to that of Sakra, Brahma, and the guardians of the world. It was even more splendourous than hundreds of thousands of suns, and all of its parts were perfectly beautiful.

The sage exclaimed, "Oh! An amazing being has been born in this world! An exceptional and amazing being has been born in this world!" He stood up from his seat, joined his palms, prostrated to the Bodhisattva's feet, and circumambulated him. He then took the Bodhisattva on his lap and remained pensive. He saw that the Bodhisattva's body bore the thirty-two marks of a great being, and he knew that these marks could only indicate one of two possibilities. He saw that if the Bodhisattva was to stay in the palace, he would become a universal monarch who commands the four armies. He would be a victorious and pious Dharma king with the necessary strength to govern. He would also have the seven precious possessions of the wheel, the elephant, the horse, the wife, the jewel, the steward, and the minister.

He would beget one thousand sons, who would all be heroic, brave, handsome, and triumphant. By his innate strength, he would subdue and conquer the entire world and its oceans without using force or weapons, and in a way that accords with the doctrine. In this way the entire world would be his kingdom. On the other hand, if he were to leave his home and go forth as a renunciant, he would become a thus-gone one, renowned as the completely perfect buddha, a peerless leader. As the sage saw this, tears streamed down his face and he sat there sobbing.

Seeing the sage crying, shedding tears and sobbing, the king became afraid and distressed, and he very quickly inquired of the great sage: "Sage! You shed tears, you cry, and you sigh deeply. What is wrong? Is some misfortune to befall the Prince?"

The great sage Asita replied to the king: "Great king, I am not crying for sake of the Prince, and no misfortune will befall him. I cry for myself because, great king, I am elderly, old, and decrepit. Prince Sarvarthasiddha, however, will awaken to perfect and complete buddhahood and turn the wheel of the unexcelled Dharma in a way that cannot be done by any ascetic, priest, god, demon, or anybody else who follows worldly teachings. He will teach in a way that is beneficial and brings happiness to the world, including the gods. He will share a teaching of pure conduct, which is good in the beginning, good in the middle, and good in the end. It will be a teaching with excellent meaning and excellent words. It will be unique, perfect, pure, purifying, and consummate.

"When those who are bound within the caste system hear his teaching, those who are not free from birth will be liberated. Likewise those who are afflicted by old age, sickness, death, grief, lamentation, suffering, unhappiness, and irritation will be liberated from old age, sickness, death, grief, lamentation, suffering, unhappiness, and irritation. The rain of the sublime teaching will refresh those who are tormented by the flames of desire, anger, and stupidity.

"He will lead onto the straight path to nirvana those beings who are veiled by a variety of mistaken views and who have entered mistaken paths. He will free from bondage those who are trapped in the cage and prison of samsara and who are bound by the fetters of disturbing emotions. In those beings who are blinded by darkness, clouded vision, and the cataract of ignorance, he will engender the eye of insight. For those beings who are wounded by the thorn of disturbing emotions, he will pull out that thorn. Great king, an umbuara flower sometimes, though rarely, blooms in the world. Great king, in the same way, rarely, once in many millions of years, a blessed buddha is born in the world. And this great Prince will certainly awaken to unexcelled, perfect and complete buddhahood.

"Once he awakens to unexcelled, perfect and complete buddhahood, he will liberate many billions of beings, bringing them across the ocean of samsara and establishing them in immortality. Yet I shall not live to see this jewel of the Buddha. This is why, great king, I cry and sigh so sadly. I will not be able to venerate him, even if I remain healthy.

THE GRAND BIBLE

"Great king, if you look in our scriptures, you will see that the prince Sarvarthasiddha will not stay at home. The reason is, great king, that the prince Sarvarthasiddha bears the thirty-two marks of a great being. And what are these marks?"

"(1) Great king, Prince Sarvarthasiddha has a crown protuberance. That, great king, is the first mark of a great being found on Prince Sarvarthasiddha. (2) Great king, Prince Sarvarthasiddha's hair is deep blue like the neck of a peacock or kohl powder, and curls to the right. (3) His forehead is even. (4) Great king, at the place between Sarvarthasiddha's eyebrows, there is a ringlet of hair the colour of snow or silver. (5) Great king, Prince Sarvarthasiddha's eyelashes are like those of a bull. (6) His eyes are of a deep blue colour. (7) He has forty teeth. (8) He has even teeth. (9) His teeth are without gaps between them. (10) His teeth are perfectly white. (11) Great king, Prince Sarvarthasiddha has the voice of Brahma. (12) His experience of taste is unexcelled. (13) His tongue is very long and slender. (14) His jaw is like that of a lion. (15) His shoulders are well-rounded. (16) Seven of his body parts are well-rounded. (17) His chest is broad. (18) His skin is smooth and golden. (19) When standing up straight, his hands reach his knees. (20) His torso is like that of a lion. (21) Great king, Prince Sarvarthasiddha's arm span and height are identical, like the banyan tree. (22) Each of his hairs grows individually, and their tips curl to the right and upward. (23) His private parts are well sheathed. (24) His thighs are well-rounded. (25) His calves are like those of the black antelope, the king of deer. (26) His fingers are long. (27) His heels are broad. (28) His arches are high. (29) His palms and the soles of his feet are soft. (30) His fingers and toes are webbed. (31) Great king, on the palms of his long-fingered hands and on the soles of his long-toed feet, there are beautiful thousand-spoked wheels with both centre and rim. (32) Great king, Prince Sarvarthasiddha has even and well-placed feet.

"Great king, Prince Sarvarthasiddha possesses these thirty-two marks of a great being. Great king, marks of this type are not found on the body of a universal monarch; these are the marks found on the body of a bodhisattva.

"Great king, the body of Prince Sarvarthasiddha is adorned with eighty minor marks. Because he has these signs, Prince Sarvarthasiddha will not stay at home, but will certainly develop renunciation and depart from his home. Great king, what are these eighty minor marks? Well, great king, (1) Prince Sarvarthasiddha's fingernails are rounded, (2) copper coloured, and (3) glossy. (4) His fingers and toes are rounded, (5) long, and (6) well proportioned. (7) His veins are not visible. (8) His anklebones are not visible. (9) His joints are not visible. (10) His feet are even, rather than uneven. (11) His heels are broad. Great king, (12) Prince Sarvarthasiddha has markings on his hands that are even, (13) clear, (14) deep, (15) straight, (16) and well arranged. (17) His lips are red like the bimba fruit. (18) His voice is not loud. (19) His tongue is supple, soft, and copper coloured. (20) His voice is melodious like the trumpeting of an elephant, or the roll of thunder.

"Moreover, (21) his arms are long. (22) He is excellently clean. (23) His body is soft. (24) His body is not subject to fear or hesitancy. (25) His body is well proportioned, (26) heroic, (27) beautiful, and (28) well composed. (29) His kneecaps are broad, large, and well-developed. Great king, (30) Prince Sarvarthasiddha's body is rounded, (31) very smooth, (32) straight, and (33) well structured. (34) His navel is deep, (35) not crooked, and (36) tapering. (37) Like a sage, he is very pure in his conduct. (38) He is exceedingly attractive, (39) of pure appearance, and (40) shines with a light that dispels all darkness.

"Great king, (41) Prince Sarvarthasiddha moves with the serene gait of an elephant, (42) the stride of a lion, (43) the step of a great bull, (44) the swoop of a swan. (45) His steps always make beautiful circles to the right. (46) His sides are rounded, (47) well proportioned, and (48) straight. (49) His waist is slight like the curve of a bow. (50) His body is free from any blemishes or dark spots. Great king, (51) Prince Sarvarthasiddha has rounded canines. (52) His canines are sharp and well spaced. (53) His nose is elegantly high. (54) His eyes are clear, (55) stainless, (56) warm, (57) elongated, (58) large, and (59) resemble blue lotuses.

"Great king, Prince Sarvarthasiddha has (60) even eyebrows that are (61) thick, (62) dark, (63) continuous, and (64) tapered. (65) His cheeks are plump, (66) even, (67) unblemished, (68) and free from the flush of aggression. (69) His sense organs are clearly apparent. Great king, (70) Prince Sarvarthasiddha has a perfect tuft of hair between his brows. (71) His face and forehead are proportional. (72) His head is large. (73) His hair is black, (74) even, (75) fragrant, (76) soft, (77) well kempt, (78) well arranged, and (79) curly. Great king, (80) Prince Sarvarthasiddha has hair that curls into the forms of the endless knot, the mark of auspiciousness, the mark of eternal happiness, and the mark of prosperity. Great king, Prince Sarvarthasiddha has all of these eighty marks.

"Great king, these eighty marks that Prince Sarvarthasiddha bears mean that Prince Sarvarthasiddha will not remain in his home, but will certainly leave the palace in order to live the life of a renunciant."

When King Suddhodana heard the sage Asita's prophecy about the Prince, he rejoiced and felt satisfied, elated, joyful, and blissful. He rose from his seat, prostrated at the feet of the Bodhisattva, and spoke this verse:

"All the gods prostrate to you.
The sages give you offerings,
And the entire world worships you,
So I will also offer you my homage."

And so, monks, King Suddhodana satisfied the sage Asita and his nephew Naradatta appropriately with a banquet, offered them fine garments, and circumambulated them. Then the great sage Asita returned to his own abode by magically flying through the air. Once there, the great sage Asita told the young priest, "Naradatta, when you hear that a buddha has appeared in this world, you must go immediately to see him and take ordination with that teacher. This will have a long-lasting purpose and bring you benefit and happiness."

On this topic, it is said:

"Seeing the hosts of gods, suspended in space calling out, "Buddha!"

The divine sage Asita, who lived on the mountain slopes, was filled with joy.

"What is this word Buddha, which brings such joy to all beings?"

It fills my body with pleasure, my mind with joy, and brings supreme peace.

"Is he a god, a demigod, a garuda, a kimnara, this Buddha? That word, which I never heard before, brings joy and trust."

He looked with divine vision over the ten directions, mountains, earth, and oceans,

And looking again saw many amazing sights on the earth, mountains, and oceans.

"This beautiful light glows brilliantly, bringing physical bliss.

As coral shoots spring forth on the mountaintops,

The trees burst into blossom and are laden with fruits—

It is clear that a sublime jewel will soon appear in the three realms.

"The earth appears even and stainless like the palm of a hand,

The gods joyfully wave banners in midair,
Marvelous gems float in the abode of the ocean's naga king—

Certainly a victorious jewel, a source of the doctrine, will appear in Jambudvīpa!

"The lower realms are pacified, suffering removed, and beings find joy.

Hosts of devas move about the sky with delight

As the pleasing and melodious songs of the gods resound—
These are certainly signs that here in the three realms, a jewel will appear."

Here in Jambudvīpa, the sage Asita looked with the divine eye

To the city of Kapilavastu, King Suddhodana's sublime city.

There he saw a person born who was as strong as Narayana, with signs and splendourous merit;

He rejoiced, his mind became joyful, and he gained strength. Amazed, he went quickly with his disciple

And arrived at the gate of Kapilavastu, the king's supreme city,

Where he saw many trillions of living beings thronging.

He asked the gatekeeper to quickly say that a sage was at the gate.

The gatekeeper hurriedly entered the palace and told the king:

"Your Majesty, there is an old sage, a great ascetic, at the palace gates;

That supreme sage asks to enter the king's palace.
Great king, shall I let him in or not? Please let me know."

The king made a seat for the sage and said, "Go and bring him here."

When the sage Asita heard the doorman's words, he was happy and joyful. Like a thirsty man wishes for cool water, or one tormented by hunger hopes for food,

The sublime sage was overjoyed at the prospect of seeing this excellent being.

He joyously exclaimed, "King, may you be victorious and live long!"

With these pleasing words and with calm mind and senses, he took his seat.

The king respectfully addressed the sage with these words: "Please tell me, sage, why have you come to the royal palace?"

"A son was born to you, supreme, transcendent, and splendourous,

Ornamented by thirty-two excellent signs, and with the power of Narayana.

Your Majesty, I would be delighted to see your son, Sarvarthasiddha;

That is why I have come here, O king. I have no other wish."

"Excellent, you are welcome. Tired or not, I am delighted to see you.

The Boon-Granting Prince is sleeping, so this is not the time to see him.

Wait a while and you will see the Perfect One,
Who is like a stainless full moon adorned with a crown of stars."

When the Supreme Guide awoke, glowing like the full moon,

The king took that blazing being, whose light outshone the sun, onto his lap.

"Sage, behold the Golden One, worshiped by gods and humans."

The sage Asita saw his beautiful feet, ornamented by the mark of wheels.

Then the sage stood up, joined his palms, and prostrated to the Prince's feet;

The learned sage held the child and gazed upon him, deep in thought.

He saw the child with the strength of Narayana, ornamented by supreme marks;

Skilled in the Vedas and commentaries, the sage shook his head as he saw two possibilities:

The child would be a powerful universal monarch or a buddha, supreme in the world.

Terribly sad in body and mind, the sage shed tears and sighed deeply.

The supreme king became afraid and asked, "Why does the priest weep?"

Does the sage Asita see some obstacle for my Sarvarthasiddha?

"O Sage, why do you weep? Tell me the truth, what good or evil do you see?"

"There is no misfortune or obstacle for your son, Sarvarthasiddha;

I myself am old and infirm, and thus I grieve for myself.

This Prince will be a buddha, revered by the world, who will teach the genuine doctrine.

"And because I will not see this delightful sight, I cry.

Your Majesty, his stainless body is marked by thirty-two excellent signs,

Thus he has only one of two destinies, and no third choice:

Either he will be a universal monarch, or he will be a buddha, supreme on this earth.

"Yet, since he will not desire sense pleasures, he will certainly become a buddha."

Hearing the sage's prophecy, the king was delighted and overjoyed;

He stood up, joined his palms, and prostrated at the Prince's feet.

"Powerful One, the gods worship you, the sages praise you.

"Supreme Leader of All Beings in the Three Realms, I prostrate to you!"

The sage was delighted and spoke to his nephew: "Listen to my instructions!

When this Prince awakens as a buddha and turns the wheel of Dharma, You must immediately take ordination and follow the Able One, and then you shall attain nirvana."

The sublime sage prostrated at the Prince's feet, circled him, and told the king:

"You have very good fortune to have a son like this!

He will satisfy the world, with its gods and humans, through the doctrine."

The great sage then left Kapilavastu and returned to his hermitage.

Monks, as soon as the Bodhisattva was born, the divine son Mahesvara called out to the divine sons of the pure abodes:

"Friends, there is a bodhisattva, a great being, who has excellently and diligently practiced purification, generosity, discipline, patience, diligence, concentration, knowledge, methods, studies, conduct, ascetic practices, and austerities for countless trillions of eons. He has great love, great compassion, and great joy, and is possessed of a noble mind by virtue of its equanimity. He strives for the benefit of all beings and is shielded by the armour of diligence. He has appeared out of the roots of virtue that were brought about by previous buddhas.

"He is adorned with the marks of a hundred merits and is full of a determined resolve. He conquers the enemy's army and has a joyful and excellent mind without stains. He bears the crowning banner of great wisdom. He uproots the strength of the demons. He is the great leader of the trichilocosm and is worshiped by gods and humans. He has performed great sacrifices and possesses an exceedingly excellent accumulation of merit. Since he has his mind set on deliverance, he will uproot birth, old age, and death. He is wellborn and will bring beings to awakening. Born into the family of King Ikshvaku, he has come to the world of humans. He will soon awaken to unexcelled, perfect and complete buddhahood. Let us go and pay homage to him, serve him, respect him, and praise him. The other divine sons who are overcome by their pride will see us paying homage to the Bodhisattva, and they will cast aside their pride, haughtiness, and arrogance. They will also go to pay homage, service, and respect to the Bodhisattva. This will bring lasting purpose, benefit, and happiness to those divine sons, until they attain immortality. The might and prosperity of King Suddhodana will become renowned. Let us make a true prophecy about the Bodhisattva, and then return."

After the divine son Mahesvara had said this, he took off from the palace of King Suddhodana surrounded by 1.2 million divine sons, bathing the entire city of Kapilavastu in light. The gatekeeper informed the king of their arrival, and Mahesvara entered the palace with the king's permission. He prostrated, touching his head to the Bodhisattva's feet, drew his robe over one shoulder, and circled the Bodhisattva many hundreds of thousands of times. He then took the Bodhisattva onto his lap and spoke these joyful words to King Suddhodana: "Great king, you should be supremely delighted! The reason, great king, is that the Bodhisattva's body is beautifully ornamented with the major and minor marks of a great being, and he outshines the world of gods, humans, and demigods with his colour, magnificence, renown, and glory.

Great king, it is therefore certain that the Bodhisattva will awaken to unexcelled, perfect and complete buddhahood."

Monks, in this way the divine son Mahesvara, together with the many gods of the pure abodes, made offerings to the Bodhisattva and showed him great respect. As they had now given the true prophecy, they returned to their own abodes.

On this topic, it is said:

Learning of the birth of He Who Has Crossed the Ocean of Qualities,

Mahesvara, overjoyed, spoke to the gods:

"For many millions of eons, it is so rare even to hear of this; So come, let us go and worship the Lord of Men."

Thus all the twelve thousand pure gods, beautifully ornamented with jeweled crowns,

Excellently comporting, and with their lovely hair flowing,

Quickly traveled to the supreme city of Kapilavastu

And stood before the king's gate.

They spoke politely to the gatekeeper:

"Go to the palace and make our arrival known to the king."

The gatekeeper went inside as they asked,

Joined his palms, and spoke to the king,

"Your Majesty, may you always be victorious and live long!

Pure luminescent beings with great merit stand by your door,

Beautifully ornamented with jeweled crowns and excellent conduct.

Their faces are like the full moon; their luster is pure like that of the clear moon.

"King, wherever they go, they cast no shadow;

When they walk, their steps make no sound.

When they step on the earth, they raise no dust,

And beings never tire of gazing upon them.

"Their bodies radiate great clear light.

Their words are beautiful; those of humans cannot compare!

Their speech is profound, soft, and melodious.

These are not humans; I think they must be gods.

"They wait respectfully, each of them holding in his hands

The choicest flowers, garlands, unguents, and silk.

King, it is certain that they have come

To see and worship the Prince, the God of Gods."

The king, hearing these words, was delighted and said,

"Go invite them all into the palace.

The qualities and behavior you have described,

Such miracles are not made by humans."

The gatekeeper joined his palms and spoke to the gods:

"The king invites you all to come inside."

The gods with garlands in their arms were overjoyed

And entered the king's palace, which was similar to the god realm.

Seeing these supreme gods enter his palace,

The king rose from his seat and joined his palms:

"These thrones with jeweled legs have been arranged here.

Please, with your great benevolence, kindly take your seats."

Then, without pride or haughtiness, the gods took their seats.

"King, please listen to our reason for coming here.

A child, whose body is pure and who has great merits, has been born to you;

We wish to see his honoured person.

"We know the significance of excellent marks;

We know what they mean, their course and their application.

Thus, sublime king, do not feel sad;

We wish to see the one who has these many marks.

The king, surrounded by the women of the palace, was filled with joy,

And he took the Prince, blazing like a fire, on his lap.

The supreme gods, with flowing hair, approached;

Just when they emerged from the door, the whole trichiliocosm trembled.

When the supreme gods saw the Leader's feet and nails,

Copper coloured, stainless, pure, and majestic,

Those gods with their flowing hair quickly stood and prostrated,

Placing their heads at the feet of the one with stainless brilliance.

Because of these marks and the glory that they show,

As well as the splendour of merit and the unseen crown of his head,

And also because of the light that shines from the tuft of hair on his forehead,

It is certain that he will conquer Mara and find awakening.

The gods praised the Prince, saying, "He is free from the darkness of disturbing emotions;

He is full of qualities and is able to see things, just as they are.

This jewel among men has finally appeared—

The one who has conquered the enemies of birth, old age, death, and disturbing emotions.

"Stirred by objects of desire and imagination, three fires are born,

Setting the three existences ablaze and causing deep torment. Yet you, a heroic cloud of Dharma, will aid the tormented by filling the trichiliocosm

With a rain of the nectar of immortality to calm the suffering of negative emotions.

"With a loving voice and soft, compassionate speech,

You will call out with the delightful strains of Brahma's voice,

Heard in all three realms and by all beings.

Blessed One, quickly call out with the great speech of a buddha!

"You will conquer the evil hordes of non-Buddhists with mistaken views,

Who are caught up in worldly desire and who remain on the peak of existence.

Hearing your doctrine of emptiness and interdependent causality,

They will scatter like jackals before a lion!

"You clear away the obscuration of ignorance, the haze of the great disturbing emotions;

You appear and manifest for the sake of beings.

You, the shining light of wisdom, the light rays of insight, May you dispel the great darkness of all beings with your gaze!

"When such an amazing pure being as this appears,

Gods and humans acquire a tremendous boon.

This precious being, who grants awakening,

Will cut the path to the lower realms and open the paths of the gods!"

The gods strewed a rain of divine flowers over Kapilavastu,

Then they circled and praised the Bodhisattva,

Calling out, "This is the Buddha, the excellent Buddha!"

Before departing joyfully up through the sky.

This concludes the seventh chapter on the birth.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 8 — Going to the Temple

[The infant Bodhisattva visits a temple where the stone statues rise up to greet him.]

Monks, on the very evening of the Bodhisattva's birth, there were twenty thousand girls born among the ruling class, the priestly class, the merchants, and the householders, such as the landowners. All of them were offered to the Bodhisattva by their parents to serve and honour him. King Suddhodana also gave twenty thousand girls to the Bodhisattva to serve and honour him. His friends, his ministers, his kinfolk, and his blood relatives also offered twenty thousand girls to serve and honour the Bodhisattva.

Finally the members of ministerial assemblies also offered twenty thousand girls to serve and honour the Bodhisattva.

Monks, at that time the male and female elders of the Sakya clan gathered and said to King Suddhodana: "King, please pay heed. The Prince should now worship in the temple."

King Suddhodana replied, "Yes, it would be excellent for him to worship in this way. Therefore let the city be decorated! Ornament the streets, crossroads, intersections, and marketplaces. Send away all hunchbacks and all blind, deaf, and mute people, as well as anyone who is deformed or crippled. Gather everything auspicious!

Beat the drums of merit and ring the bells of auspiciousness. Ornament the gates of this excellent city. Play the most pleasant instruments, cymbals, and drums. Assemble all the local lords and gather the merchants, householders, ministers, gatekeepers, and all the local people. Prepare chariots for the girls. Procure brimming vases. Gather the priests who are experts in recitation. Ornately decorate the temples."

Monks, everyone followed the commands issued by the king. Then King Suddhodana went to his home and spoke to Mahaprajapati Gautami, saying, "The Prince is to pray in the temple. Ornament him well."

Mahaprajapati Gautami replied, "Of course," and dressed the Prince lavishly. While the Prince was being dressed, with a slight smile and no hint of annoyance he spoke these pleasant words to his maternal aunt: "Mother, where are you taking me?"

She replied, "Son, I am taking you to the temple."

The Prince then smiled, laughed, and spoke these verses to his maternal aunt:

"When I was born, this trichiliocosm trembled.

Sakra, Brahma, the demigods, the mahoragas, Surya, and Candra, as well as Vaisravana and Kumara, All bowed their heads to my feet and paid homage to me.

"What other god is there who is superior to me,

Who my mother takes me to worship today?

I am superior to all the gods; I am the God of Gods.

There is no other god like me, so how could anyone be superior?"

"Still, mother, I will follow worldly customs;

When beings see my miraculous displays, they will be pleased.

It will inspire them with great respect,

And gods and humans will know that I am the God of Gods."

Monks, once the main streets, crossroads, intersections, and markets had been richly ornamented, with praises and benedictions of all kinds posted around the city, a richly ornamented chariot was prepared for the Prince in the inner courtyard. With all auspicious circumstances having been arranged in this manner, King Suddhodana lifted the Prince onto his lap. Surrounded by priests, townspeople, merchants, householders, ministers, local lords, gatekeepers, local people, friends, and kinfolk, they traveled through the richly ornamented roads, intersections, crossroads, and marketplaces, which were enveloped in the fragrant scent of incense and strewn with flower petals, filled with horses, elephants, chariots, and foot soldiers, with parasols, victory banners, and flags held aloft, and resounding with many instruments. At that time a hundred thousand gods led the Bodhisattva's chariot. Many hundreds of millions of divine sons and maidens scattered flowers from the sky above and played cymbals.

Monks, King Suddhodana, accompanied by the great royal procession, splendour, and ceremony, brought the Prince to the temple. As soon as the Bodhisattva placed his right foot in the temple, the insentient statues of the gods, such as

Siva, Skanda, Narayana, Kubera, Candra, Surya,

Vaisravana, Sakra, Brahma, and the guardians of the world, all stood up from their seats and prostrated at the Bodhisattva's feet. Right then a hundred thousand gods and humans cried out in amazement and delight. The fine city of Kapilavastu trembled in six ways. A rain of divine flowers fell, and a hundred thousand divine instruments sounded without even being played. Then the various statues in the temple all returned to their seats and spoke these verses:

"Mount Meru, the greatest and best of mountains, would never bow down to a mustard seed;

The great ocean, the naga king's abode, would never bow down to a puddle;

The brilliant sun and moon would never bow down before a firefly.

So how could the Noble One, with merit and wisdom, bow down before the gods?"

"The gods and humans of this trichiliocosm

Are like mustard seeds, puddles, and fireflies, and yet filled with pride.

If the world bows to He Who Is like Mount Meru, the Ocean,

the Sun, and the Moon—The self-arisen sublime one of this world—then they would attain heaven and nirvana."

Monks, when the Bodhisattva entered the temple, 3.2 million divine sons gave rise to the intention to attain unexcelled, perfect and complete awakening. Monks, these are the circumstances and causes related to the Bodhisattva's equanimity as he was brought to the temple.

This concludes the eighth chapter on going to the temple.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 9 — The Ornaments

[Buddha's father, Suddhodana, commissions marvelous jewellery for him.]

Monks, at the time of the constellation of Citra, after the constellation of Hasta had passed, the chief priest of the king, who was called Udayana, the father of Udayin, [F.64.b] went before King Suddhodana surrounded by some five hundred priests and said, "Your Majesty, please know that it is now proper for ornaments to be made for the Prince."

The king replied, "Very well, then do it."

At that time King Suddhodana had five hundred types of ornaments made by five hundred Sakyas. He commissioned bracelets, anklets, crowns, necklaces, rings, earrings, armbands, golden belts, golden threads, nets of bells, nets of gems, shoes bedecked with jewels, garlands adorned with various gems, jeweled bangles, chokers, and diadems. When the ornaments were completed the Sakyas went before King Suddhodana at the time of the constellation of Pusya and said, "King, please ornament the Prince."

The king replied, "It is better if you ornament the Prince and make these offerings to him, since I have commissioned the ornaments for the Prince."

They replied, "The Prince should wear these ornaments that we have made for seven days and nights. This will make our efforts meaningful."

At dawn, as the sun rose, the Bodhisattva entered the park known as Stainless Array, where Mahaprajapati Gautami took him onto her lap. Eighty thousand women welcomed the Bodhisattva and gazed at his countenance. Ten thousand girls welcomed the Bodhisattva and gazed at his countenance. Ten thousand Sakyas welcomed the Bodhisattva and gazed at his countenance. Five thousand priests also arrived and gazed at the Bodhisattva's countenance. Then the ornaments that had been commissioned by the gracious king of the Sakyas were fastened onto the Bodhisattva's body.

As soon as the ornaments were placed on the Bodhisattva's body, the radiance of his body eclipsed their luster. They did not glitter or gleam, and they lost all their shine. They were just like a lump of coal that is placed next to gold from the River Jambu—it also does not glitter, gleam, or shine. In the same way, when the ornaments were struck by the light radiating from the Bodhisattva's body, they lost all their glitter, gleam, and shine. And thus it was that any ornament that was placed on the Bodhisattva's body lost its luster, like a lump of soot thrown before gold from the Jambu River.

Then the goddess of the pleasure grove, Vimala, revealed her vast body before the king and the group of Sakyas, and spoke these verses to them:

"Even if the entire trichilocosm with its cities and towns
Were filled with stainless and beautiful gold,

A single coin of gold from the Jambu River would steal its splendour,

Leaving the other gold bereft of glory and brilliance.

"Even if this entire earth were filled with gold from Jambudvīpa,

The light radiating from the pores of the Glorious Guide would outshine it.

It would not shine or gleam, but lose its beauty and glow;

Before the Blissful Protector, it would appear just like soot.

"He is brimming with hundreds of qualities, adorned by his own magnificence;

Not beautified by ornaments, his body is perfectly stainless.

The glows of the sun and moon, the stars, jewels, fire,

Sakra, and Brahma are no longer bright in front of his intense glory.

"His body is adorned with signs, the result of previous virtue,

So why would he need ordinary ornaments made by someone else?

Remove the ornaments! Do not disturb the One Who Makes the Foolish Wise—

He, who brings supreme knowledge, does not wear artificial ornaments!

"Chanda was born at the same time as the son of the kingdom;

Give these beautiful spotless jewels to him, the servan

Reflecting that the Sakya clan would flourish and become supreme,

The Sakyas were delighted and amazed.

Having spoken these words, the goddess scattered divine flowers over the Bodhisattva and disappeared.

This concludes the ninth chapter on the ornaments.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 10 — The Demonstration at the Writing School

[The Bodhisattva attends his first day at school, where he far surpasses even the most senior tutors. This chapter is notable in that it contains a list of scripts known to the Bodhisattva which has been of great importance in the history of Indic scripts, particularly through the comparison of various surviving versions of the text.]

Monks, when the young child had grown a little older, he was taken to school. He went there amid hundreds of thousands of auspicious signs, and he was surrounded and attended by tens of thousands of boys, along with ten thousand carts filled with hard food, soft food, and condiments, and ten thousand carts filled with gold coins and gems. These were distributed in the streets and road junctions, and the entrances to the markets of the city of Kapilavastu. At the same time a symphony of eight hundred thousand cymbals was sounded, and a heavy rain of flowers fell.

Hundreds of thousands of girls, adorned with all kinds of jewellery, perched themselves on the balconies, turrets, arches, windows, upper stories, and roofs of the homes. Gazing at the Bodhisattva, they tossed flowers. There were also eight thousand divine maidens, who were adorned with loose hanging jewellery and carried bhadrāṅkara gems. They went ahead of the Bodhisattva, cleansing his way. Gods, nagas, yakṣas, gandharvas, demigods, garudas, kinnaras, and mahoragas revealed the upper halves of their bodies, and festooned wreaths of flowers and woven silk from the sky. All the Sakya factions, with King Suddhodana leading the way, went ahead of the Bodhisattva. With such an array as this, the Bodhisattva was taken to school.

As soon as the Bodhisattva arrived in school, the schoolmaster, who was called Visvamitra, was unable to withstand the Bodhisattva's splendour and radiance, and prostrated to him face-down on the ground. A divine son from the Heaven of Joy called Subhanga saw the schoolmaster collapsed on the ground and, grabbing him with his right hand, raised him up. Suspended in the sky, Subhanga then said the following verses to King Suddhodana and the crowd:

"Whatever topics of knowledge are circulating in this world of humans—

Numbers, scripts, mathematics, the permutations of the elements,

And all the immeasurable mundane techniques of craftsmanship—

This child already learned these things many tens of millions of eons ago.

"Nonetheless he acts solely in harmony with people.

The Well-Instructed One thus came to school for the sake of instruction,

In order to mature many children for the Highest Vehicle

And to bring a myriad other beings to immortality.

"He knows the way of the path of the transcendent four truths.

He is adept in how things arise based on causes,

And how the cessation and termination of conditioned existence leads to the calm state.

When he knows all that, how could he not know the subject of scripts?

"There is no master superior to him throughout the three worlds;

Among all gods and humans, he alone is foremost.

All of you do not know even the names of the scripts

That he has learned before, many tens of millions of eons ago.

"This pure being knows in a single instant

The manifold, diverse thoughts of beings.

When he knows such invisible and formless things,

Why mention the visible forms of scripts?"

When he had spoken these verses, the divine son honoured the Bodhisattva with celestial flowers and immediately thereafter disappeared.

The nannies and the entourage of maids were asked to stay at the school, while the remaining Sakyas, headed by Suddhodana, departed. The Bodhisattva took up a writing board made of sandalwood. It was decorated with flecks of divine gold of prime quality and studded with precious gems on all sides. He then addressed the master Visvamitra:

"Which script, O master, will you be teaching me? Will it be the Brahmī script, the Kharoṣṭhī script, or the Puskarasari script? Will it be the Aṅga script, the Vaṅga script, the Magadha script, the Maṅgalya script, the Aṅgulīya script, the Sakari script, the Brahmavali script, the Parusya script, the Dravida script, the Kirata script, the Dakṣiṇya script, the Ugra script, the Saṅkhyā script, the Anuloma script, the Avamurḍha script, the Darada script, the Khasya script, the Cina script, the Luna script, the Huna script, the Madhyakṣarasvīstara script, the Pūṣpa script, the Deva script, the Naga script, the Yaksa script, the Gandharva script, the Kinnara script, the Mahoraga script, the Asura script, the Garuda script, the Mrgacakra script, the Vayasāruta script, the Bhaumadeva script, the Antarīkṣadeva script, the Uttarakuruḍvīpa script, the Aparagodani script, the Purvavīdeha script, the Utksepa script, the Niksepa script, the Viksepa script, the Praksepa script, the Sagara script, the Vajra script, the Lekhapratīlekha script, the Anudruta script, the Sastravarta script, the Gananavarta script, the Utksepavarta script, the Niksepavarta script, the Padalikhita script, the Dviruttarapadasaṁdhi script, the Yavaddasottarapadasaṁdhi script, the Madhyaharini script, the Sarvarutasamgrahani script, the Vidyantulomavimīrita script, the Rṣitapastapa script, the Rocamana script, the Dharanīpreksini script, the Gaganapreksini script, the Sarvasaḍdhiṅgā script, the Sarvasarasamgrahani script, or the Sarvabhūtarutagrahani script? Master, which of those sixty-four scripts will you teach me?"

The schoolmaster Visvamitra was amazed, and he smiled. Setting aside pride, conceit, and arrogance, he replied with the following verses:

"How wonderful! Even though the Pure Being

Is learned in all topics in the world,

He follows the conventions of the world.

Thus he has come to school.

"He has learned scripts

Even the names of which I have not heard,

Yet he has come to school.

"I see his face,

But the crown of his head is invisible.

If he has mastered the knowledge of scripts,

How can I teach him?

"This god, great god of gods,

Supreme divine scholar among all gods,

Is superior and without equal.

No person in the world is comparable to him.

"Only because of his unparalleled expertise

In applying knowledge and means,

Will I teach this learned being—

The final refuge of all beings."

Monks, then the schoolmaster taught writing to the Bodhisattva, along with ten thousand other children. However, through the power of the Bodhisattva, as the schoolmaster was saying the alphabet to the children, he did it in the following manner:

When he said the letter a, out came the statement: "Every composite phenomenon is impermanent (anityaḥ sarvasaṁskāraḥ)."

When he said the letter ā, out came the statement: "Beneficial to self and others (atmaparāhita)."

When he said the letter i, out came the statement: "The vast development of the senses (indriyavaiṣṭyā)."

When he said the letter ī, out came the statement: "The world is riddled with plague (tibhulāṁ jagat)."

When he said the letter u, out came the statement: "The world is rife with misfortune (upadravabāhulāṁ jagat)."

When he said the letter ū, out came the statement: "The world is of little substance (unasattvaṁ jagat)."

When he said the letter e, out came the statement: "Faults come from desire (esaṇasamutthānāda)."

When he said the letter ai, out came the statement: "The noble path is virtuous (airyaṣṭāḥ śreyāṇīti)."

When he said the letter o, out came the statement: "The stream has been forded (oghotṭara)."

When he said the letter au, out came the statement: "Spontaneously generated (aupapaduka)."

When he said the letter am, out came the statement: "The emergence of what is efficacious (amoghottara)."

When he said the letter aḥ, out came the statement: "Reaching an end (astarigaṇa)."

When he said the letter ka, out came the statement: "Immersion in the full ripening of actions (karmavīpakavātara)."

When he said the letter kha, out came the statement: "All phenomena are like space (khasamasarvadharmā)."

When he said the letter ga, out came the statement: "Immersion in the profound Dharma of dependent origination (gambhīradharmaprāṭītyasamutpadavātara)."

When he said the letter gha, out came the statement: "Eradicating the darkness of delusion and the thick veils of ignorance (ghanapatalavidyamohandhakaravidhamāna)."

When he said the letter ṅ, out came the statement: "The complete purification of factors (aṅgavīsuḍḍhi)."

When he said the letter ca, out came the statement: "The path of the four noble truths (caturāryasatyapatha)."

When he said the letter cha, out came the statement: "Abandoning the passion of lust (chandragaprahāna)."

When he said the letter ja, out came the statement: "Transcending old age and death (jaramānasamatīkramāna)."

When he said the letter jha, out came the statement: "Vanquishing the forces of the god of love (jhasadhvajabalānigrahāna)."

When he said the letter ṇa, out came the statement: "Making known (jñāpana)."

When he said the letter ṭa, out came the statement: "Severing the round of rebirths (vaṭṭopacchedana)."

When he said the letter ṭha, out came the statement: "A question rejected out of hand (thapanīyaprasna)."

When he said the letter da, out came the statement: "Vanquishing the evil one and those who cause discord (damaramānigrahāna)."

When he said the letter dha, out came the statement: "The impure regions (midhavisayaḥ)."

When he said the letter na, out came the statement: "Afflictions are subtle (renuklesāḥ)."

When he said the letter ta, out came the statement: "Suchness is undifferentiated (tathatasarībheda)."

When he said the letter tha, out came the statement: "Strength, power, force, and self-confidence (thamābalavegavāisarāḍya)."

When he said the letter da, out came the statement: "Generosity, discipline, restraint, and gentleness (danadamasamyamasaurabha)."

When he said the letter dha, out came the statement: "The wealth of the noble ones is sevenfold (dhanamaryanari saptavidham)."

When he said the letter na, out came the statement: "Full knowledge of name and form (namarupaparijña)."

When he said the letter pa, out came the statement: "The absolute (paramartha)."

When he said the letter pha, out came the statement: "The actualisation of the attainment of the fruition (phalapraptisaksatkriya)."

When he said the letter ba, out came the statement: "Liberation from bondage (bandhanamoksa)."

When he said the letter bha, out came the statement: "The destruction of existence (bhavavibhava)."

When he said the letter ma, out came the statement: "The cessation of arrogance and pride (madamanopasamana)."

When he said the letter ya, [F.68.a] out came the statement: "Understanding phenomena exactly as they are (yathavaddharmapravedha)."

When he said the letter ra, out came the statement: "Dissatisfaction with pleasure is delighting in the absolute (ratyaratiparamarharati)."

When he said the letter la, out came the phrase: "Severing the vine (latachedana)."

When he said the letter va, out came the statement: "The best vehicle (varayana)."

When he said the letter sa, out came the statement: "Calm abiding and insight (samathavipasyana)."

When he said the letter sa, out came the statement: "Destroying the six sense bases and obtaining the superknowledges and wisdoms (sadayatananigrahanabhijñānavapti)."

When he said the letter sa, out came the statement: "Attaining the perfect awakening to omniscient wisdom (sarvajñānabhisambodhana)."

When he said the letter ha, out came the statement: "Destroying the afflictions and parting from desire (hatakesaviraga)."

When he said the letter ksa, out came the statement: "Reaching the end of letters, all phenomena are ineffable (ksaraparyantabhilapya sarvadharmā)."

Thus, while the schoolmaster taught the children the alphabet, there emerged innumerable hundreds of thousands of excellent Dharma teachings due to the Bodhisattva's power. Moreover, while the Bodhisattva was attending school, 32,000 children gave rise to thoughts aimed at unexcelled, perfect and complete awakening. This is the circumstance and the reason why the Bodhisattva attended school, even though he was already so learned.

This concludes the tenth chapter on the demonstration at the writing school.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 11 — The Farming Village

[On a visit to the countryside as a young boy, he attains of the highest levels of samadhi. Samadhi or samapatti, in Hinduism, Jainism, Buddhism, Sikhism and yogic schools, is a state of meditative consciousness. It is the training of the mind, commonly translated as meditation, to withdraw the mind from the automatic responses to sense-impressions, and leading to a "state of perfect equanimity and awareness". In Buddhism, it is the last of the eight elements of the Noble Eightfold Path. In the Ashtanga Yoga tradition, it is the eighth and final limb identified in the Yoga Sutras of Patanjali.]

Monks, on another occasion when the Prince had grown a little older, he went with the sons of the ministers and some other boys to visit a farming village. After seeing the village, he entered a park at the edge of the fields. The Bodhisattva wandered around there in complete solitude. As he was strolling through the park, he saw a beautiful and pleasant rose apple tree, and he decided to sit down cross-legged under its shade. Seated there, the Bodhisattva attained a one-pointed state of mind.

He then settled into the first meditative concentration, which is free of factors connected with evil deeds and nonvirtues. It is accompanied by thought and analysis and is imbued with the joy and pleasure born of discernment.

He then brought about the cessation of thoughts and analysis and became perfectly quiet. As his mind became concentrated, he settled into the second meditative concentration, which is free of thought and analysis and is imbued with the joy and pleasure born of meditative absorption.

Without any attachment to joy, he remained in equanimity with mindfulness and introspection and experienced physical pleasure. Aware and cognizant, he felt physically at ease. He had settled into the third meditative concentration, which is without joy: "Impartial, aware, and abiding at ease," as the noble ones describe it. He had already relinquished suffering and, as he now abandoned the feeling of comfort, both mental pleasure and displeasure vanished. Thus he settled into the fourth meditative concentration: perfectly pristine with impartiality and mindfulness, unconnected with pleasure or pain.

Right then five non-Buddhist sages, who had miraculous powers and the five superknowledges, were flying through the sky toward the north. Yet as they flew above this grove, they suddenly could not go any farther, and it felt as if they were being pushed back. With the hairs on their bodies bristling with anger, they said the following verse:

"Like an elephant tearing apart a fresh grove of mango trees,

We proceed and reduce to ashes even the enormous diamond peak of Mount Meru.

Even among gods we go unhindered, high above the realm of yaksas and gandharvas,

Yet here at this grove, we are weak. Whose force dissolves our magical powers?"

Dwelling in that grove was a goddess, who sang this verse to the sages:

"It is the Sakya Prince, descendant of the best of kings, who shines like the dawn;

This wise, supreme man has a moon-like face with the beauty of a blooming lotus.

He, whom gods, naga kings, gandharvas, and yaksas revere, is in the park, concentrating;

His power, gained from merit in millions of lives, is thwarting your miracles."

When the sages looked down below, they saw a child blazing with glory and splendour, and they thought: "Who is this seated here? Could it be Vaisravana, lord of wealth? Or is it Mara, lord of sense pleasures, or perhaps the lord of the mahoragas?"

Could it be Sakra, the vajra holder? Or is it perhaps Rudra, or the lord of kumbhandas? Could it be the mighty Kṛṣṇa, or perhaps the divine moon, or the thousand-rayed sun? Or will it turn out to be a universal monarch?" Then they spoke the following verse:

"This youth appears far more beautiful than Vaisravana. So is he Rahu, an image of the vajra holder, the sun, or the moon?

Or maybe he is an image of the supreme lord of sense pleasures, or Rudra, or Kṛṣṇa?

Or perhaps he is a perfect Buddha, adorned with glorious physical signs?"

Then the goddess of the grove addressed the sages with the following verse:

"All the splendour of Vaisravana and the thousand-eyed one,

All the splendour of the four guardians of the world and the lord of the demigods,

All splendour of Brahma, lord of the world, and Kṛṣṇa, Is minuscule in comparison to that of the son of the Sakyas."

Once the sages heard the goddess's words, they descended to the ground. There they saw the Bodhisattva practicing concentration, his body immovable and blazing with a mass of light. Reflecting on the Bodhisattva, they praised him with verses. One of the sages said:

"In a world tormented by the fire of afflictions,

This lake has appeared.

He will discover the Dharma

That will soothe beings."

Another sage said:

"In a world benighted with ignorance,

This torch has appeared.

He will discover the Dharma

That will illuminate beings."

Then the third sage remarked:

"On a vast ocean of sorrow,

This sublime vessel has appeared.

He will discover the Dharma

That will ferry beings across."

The fourth sage said:

"To those bound by the fetters of afflictions,

A savior has appeared.

He will discover a Dharma

That will free beings."

Finally the last sage said:

"To those afflicted with old age and sickness,

The best of doctors has come.

He will discover a Dharma

That frees from birth and death."

Once the sages had praised the Bodhisattva with these verses, they circumambulated him three times and returned to the sky. King Siddhodana did not see the Bodhisattva. Displeased with his absence, he said, "Where has the child gone? I do not see him."

A great many people ran around searching for the boy. Finally one of the ministers saw the Bodhisattva seated cross-legged, practicing concentration in the shade of a rose apple tree. Although the shade of all the trees had shifted by that time, the shade of the rose apple tree had not left the Bodhisattva's body. Seeing him there, the minister was surprised. Elated with a sense of satisfaction and joy, he was ecstatic. In a state of jubilation he rushed before King Siddhodana and said the following verses:

"Your Majesty, look! This child is practicing concentration in the shade of the rose apple tree.

He shines with glory and splendour

Like Sakra or Brahma!

"The shade of the tree

Where this perfect being is seated

Does not leave him.

It shades this supreme being while he practices concentration."

King Siddhodana went over to the rose apple tree. He saw the Bodhisattva blazing with glory and splendour and said this verse:

"Like seeing a fire blazing on a mountain peak,

Or the moon present amid a cluster of stars,

When I see him meditating with a torch-like luster,

My limbs tremble."

He bowed to the feet of the Bodhisattva and said this verse:

"I have now twice bowed down to your feet,

O Leader and Lord—

Once when you were born,

And now as you practice concentration, shining."

At that point some of the other boys, who were carrying their seats, made a commotion.

The ministers thus told them, "Quiet down! Quiet down!"

"Why?" asked the boys.

The ministers responded: "Even though the orb of the sun has shifted, the shade of his tree does not leave Prince Siddhartha—who has the highest and most sublime marks of virtue and who is brilliant as the sky—as he practices concentration, motionless as a mountain."

On this topic, it is said:

In summer, the first month after spring,

When flowers were covered in buds and blooming,

When cranes, peacocks, parrots, and myna birds were singing,

Most of the Sakya boys went outside.

Chanda, surrounded by the other boys, said, "Young Prince, come on!

Let's go and take a look at the forest.

What use is staying in the house like a priest?

Come on, let's go call on some girls."

At midday, the Pristine Being,

Unnoticed and without asking his parents,

Went out to a village

Accompanied by five hundred attendants.

In that village, which belonged to the supreme king,

There was a rose apple tree with many broad branches.

Seeing the tree, the Prince was disturbed by the suffering he had just understood,

And remarked, "Conditioned things are no good! They bring a lot suffering."

With a disciplined mind, he approached the shade of the rose apple tree,

Gathered some grass, and spread out a seat for himself.

Then, sitting cross-legged and upright, the Bodhisattva practiced concentration,

Immersed in the virtue of the four concentrations.

When five sages were coursing through the sky,

They could not move beyond the top of the rose apple tree.

Thwarted, they relinquished pride and conceit,

And all of them were drawn to investigate.

They thought, "We travel swiftly and without impediment, Penetrating the supreme Mount Meru, and likewise the surrounding ranges,

Yet we are unable to pass beyond this rose apple tree.

What could be the reason for this?"

They descended and settled on the ground,

Where they saw the Bodhisattva, the Son of the Sakyas,

As he sat cross-legged at the trunk of the rose apple tree, practicing concentration,

Shining and brilliant like the glow of gold from the Jambu River.

Surprised, they joined their hands at their heads

And paid homage, bowing down to his feet with palms joined.

They said, "Holy One, Wellborn One, who brings happiness to the world!

May you swiftly become awakened and lead beings to immortality!"

The supreme tree bowed down like a lotus leaf;

Though the sun shifted, its shade did not leave the Bliss-Gone One.

Many thousands of gods, with palms joined,

Bowed down to the feet of this resolute child.

Siddhodana, searching all around his quarters, asked,

"Where has my son gone?"

His maternal aunt said, "I have searched but did not find him;

Your Majesty, please find out where the boy has gone." Suddhodana frantically asked his attendants,

The doormen, and everyone else in the inner quarters, "Has anyone seen my son go out?"

Then someone said, "Your Majesty! The Supreme One has gone to a farming village."

The king hurriedly left together with his companions and saw the Prince sitting on a hill by the farming village, Benefiting others and blazing with splendour, Like a trillion rising suns.

Taking off his crown, sword, and shoes,

The king made salutations to the Prince with his palms joined above his head.

The king said, "Yes! The eminent sages speak eloquently and truthfully;

The boy will surely leave home for the sake of awakening."

Twelve hundred gods with supreme devotion, As well as five hundred Sakya boys, approached.

Seeing the miraculous power of the Bliss-Gone One with his ocean of qualities,

They firmly engendered the intent set on supreme awakening.

Shaking the ground of the entire trichilocosm,

The Bodhisattva arose from his absorption with mindfulness and introspection.

The Resplendent One then said to his father in the voice of Brahma:

"O father, relinquish your fields and seek no further! [136]

If it's gold that you seek, I will shower down a rain of gold;

If it's garments that you seek, I will offer you garments;

If it's grain that you seek, I will shower down a rain of grain.

Your Majesty, please apply this genuinely to everyone!"

Once he had instructed his father and those in the retinue,

He instantly returned to the supreme city.

In conformity with worldly convention, he dwelt in that city,

Yet the Pristine Being had fixed his mind on renouncing the palace.

This concludes the eleventh chapter on the farming village.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 12 — Demonstrating Skill in the Arts

[As a young man, he demonstrates his incredible prowess in the traditional worldly arts, and wins the hand of Gopa, a Sakya girl whose father requires proof of the Bodhisattva's qualities as a proper husband.]

Monks, one time, when the Prince had grown older, King Suddhodana was sitting in the meeting hall together with the assembly of Sakyas. There some of the Sakya elders spoke to King Suddhodana:

"Your Majesty, you know that the priests who are skilled in making predictions, as well as the gods who have definite knowledge, have foretold that if Prince Sarvarthasiddha renounces the household, he will become a thus-gone one, a worthy one, a completely perfect buddha. Yet if he does not renounce the household, he will become a universal monarch, a righteous Dharma king who has conquered the four quarters and is equipped with the seven treasures. The seven treasures that will be his are the precious wheel, the precious elephant, the precious horse, the precious wife, the precious jewel, the precious steward, and the precious minister. He will have one thousand sons, all of them full, fierce warriors with well-built bodies that destroy the armies of the enemy. He will conquer the entire earth without the use of violence or weapons, and then he will rule according to the Dharma. Therefore we must arrange a marriage for the Prince. Once he is surrounded by a group of women, he will discover pleasure and not renounce the household. In that way the line of our universal monarchy will not be cut, and we will be irreproachably respected by all the kings of the realm."

King Suddhodana then spoke to the assembly: "If we are to do such a thing, then you should determine which girl would be a suitable match for the Prince."

One by one, five hundred Sakyas each came forth and said, "My daughter would be suitable for the Prince! My daughter is very beautiful."

The king said, "My son is difficult to match. So we should ask the Prince himself which girl he prefers."

As everyone gathered and broached the matter with the Prince, he told them, "I will give you an answer in seven days." He then thought:

"I know the endless pitfalls of desire—

They are the root of suffering, rife with conflict, enmity, and despair.

Desire is threatening, like a poisonous leaf,

Like fire and like the blade of a sword.

"Sensual objects are not alluring to me,

Nor am I attracted when among a crowd of women.

So I ought to dwell silently in the forest,

With a mind stilled by the bliss of concentrated absorption."

The Prince first reflected in this way. Then, manifesting skillful means, he considered the ripening of sentient beings and engendered intense compassion for them. He then said the following verses:

"Lotuses thrive in filthy swamps;

A king receives veneration surrounded by a crowd of people.

When a bodhisattva obtains a sizable entourage,

He leads trillions of sentient beings to the deathless state.

"The wise bodhisattvas who came before me,

All were known to have wives, children, and harems,

Yet they were not enamored with desire, nor deprived of the bliss of meditation.

I too will emulate their merits.

"An ordinary woman, lacking qualities of proper conduct and honest speech,

Would not be suitable for me at all.

Someone who pleases me, who is modest,

And perfectly pure in beauty, birth, family, and race would be fitting.

"The following verses describe her qualities;

If there is a girl like that, seek her out for me!

I have no use for an unabashed ordinary person;

If someone has the qualities described here, seek her out for me!

"She should be young and beautiful, but without vanity;

She should be loving like a sister.

Fond of renunciation, she should be generous and disciplined toward priests and ascetics.

Find a girl like this for me, O father!

"She should be without pride, conceit, or hostility;

She should be without deceit, jealousy, or guile, and not stray from uprightness.

She should not lust after other men, even in dreams;

Content with what is hers, she should lie with her husband, free from carelessness.

"She should not be arrogant or slothful. She should comport herself fittingly.

She should be without any pride or willfulness, like a servant.

She should not be attracted to alcohol, tastes, sounds, or fragrances;

She should be free of greed and covetousness, satisfied with her fortune.

"Adhering to truth, she should be steady and unwavering;

Not puffed up, she should dress with modesty.

Always engaging in righteousness, she should be unimpressed with flashy displays;

She should always be pure in body, speech, and mind.

"She should not be excessively slothful or indolent, nor full of foolish pride;

Circumspect, she should always be engaged in good deeds.

She should regard her in-laws with the affection reserved for teachers,

And be as loving to the servants and maids as she is to herself.

"She should be as adept as a courtesan in knowing the arts of love;

She should be the last to go to sleep and the first to rise;

She should lovingly obey, and be as guileless as a mother.

Find me, O father, a wife like this!"

Monks, when King Suddhodana heard those verses, he ordered his family priest,

"Go, great priest, out to the city of Kapilavastu! Go to every household and scrutinise the girls! If there is someone with these qualities—no matter whether she is a girl of royal caste, priestly caste, merchant caste, or servant caste—report to us about that girl! Because the Prince is not after family or caste; rather he is interested in her qualities alone."

On that occasion, he said the following verses:

"Whether she is a girl of royal caste or priestly caste,

Merchant caste or servant caste—

Report to me whichever girl

Possesses these qualities!

"My son is not enthralled

By family or caste;

His mind delights in Good qualities, truth, and righteousness."

Monks, the family priest went out to the city of Kapilavastu carrying the written verses, and wandered from house to house looking carefully, searching for a girl with such qualities. However, he did not see such a girl.

Eventually he reached the house of the Sakya Dandapani. When he entered that dwelling, he saw a beautiful, pleasant, and captivating girl. The girl had a sublimely beautiful complexion like a white lotus, was neither too tall nor too short, neither too fat nor too thin, neither too fair nor too dark, was in her first blush of youth, and was a jewel of a woman, just as the Prince had described.

The girl grabbed hold of the priest's feet and asked, "O great priest, what is your aim?"

The priest said:

"The son of Suddhodana is sublimely handsome;

Replete with thirty-two auspicious marks, he has splendourous qualities.

He has written of the qualities of a wife:

Whoever has those qualities will be his bride."

He then gave the girl the letter. The girl read the verses out loud, then she revealed a smile and spoke in verse to the priest:

"O priest, since I have all of these suitable qualities,

May this handsome and gentle Prince be my husband!

If he consents, there should be no delay,

Or I will end up with an inferior, ordinary man."

The councilor went before King Suddhodana and told him what had happened: "I have seen, O king, a girl who would be suitable for the boy."

The king asked, "Who does she belong to?"

The councilor replied, "Your Majesty, she is the daughter of the Sakya Dandapani."

King Suddhodana thought to himself: "The boy is unparalleled and inclined toward virtue. Most girls have no qualities, yet they think of themselves very highly. I will have some pleasing items made and let the boy distribute them to all the girls. I will choose for the Prince whichever girl his eyes linger upon."

King Suddhodana did indeed prepare some pleasing items made of gold, silver, and various jewels. Once the preparations were completed, he had the bell sounded in the city of Kapilavastu and announced the following decree: "In seven days the Prince will give a public showing. He will give pleasing goods to the girls, so all the girls should gather together in the assembly hall at that time."

Monks, after seven days had passed, the Bodhisattva went to the assembly hall and took his seat on a splendid throne. King Suddhodana had put some spies in place and ordered them: "Report to me if the boy's eyes linger upon any particular girl!"

Monks, then the girls in the city of Kapilavastu, as many as there were, all came to the assembly hall where the Bodhisattva was seated in order to see him and lay claim to the gifts being offered.

Monks, then the Bodhisattva gave the pleasing items to the girls according to the order of their arrival. The girls, however, could not bear the Bodhisattva's splendour and brilliance and, as soon as they received the gifts, they quickly departed.

Then the daughter of Dandapani Sakya, the Sakya girl named Gopa, surrounded and escorted by an entourage of female servants, came into the assembly hall where the Bodhisattva was seated. She approached the Bodhisattva and stood to one side, staring at him with unblinking eyes.

When the Bodhisattva had finished distributing all the gifts, she went up to him and, with a smile on her face, said to him, "O Prince, you pay no attention to me. Have I done anything inappropriate toward you?"

The Prince responded, "I am not ignoring you. But you certainly have come very late." He then took off his ring, which was worth several hundreds of thousands of silver coins, and gave it to her.

She said, "Am I, Prince, worthy of this?"

The Prince replied, "Here, take all these other ornaments of mine as well."

Then the girl said, "It is not right to strip the Prince of his adornments. Rather we should adorn the Prince." And then she left.

The people who were positioned as spies came before King Suddhodana and reported the event, saying, "O king, the boy's eyes lingered upon the daughter of Dandapani Sakya, the Sakya girl named Gopa, and there was a brief conversation between them."

When King Suddhodana heard this, he sent the councilor-priest before Dandapani Sakya with the request, "May your daughter be given to my son!"

Dandapani replied, "The noble boy has grown up in the palace in ease and comfort.

Yet our family rule is such that a girl can only be granted to someone who is skilled in the arts, and not to a man who lacks these skills. The Prince is not skilled in the arts since he does not know the maneuvers of swordsmanship, archery, combat, or wrestling. How can I give away my daughter to someone who lacks such skills?"

The king was informed of this reply and thought, "This makes two times that I have been opposed with such a commonsensical rule. When I said, 'Why do the Sakya boys not come to attend upon the boy?' I was told, 'Why should we attend upon an indolent?' And now this." The king sat and reflected thus.

The Bodhisattva heard the story as well. He went to King Suddhodana and asked,

"Your Majesty, what's wrong? Why are you sitting here so depressed?"

But the king just responded, "O child, enough with your questioning!"

But the Prince insisted, "Your Majesty, it is absolutely essential that you tell me!"

He asked King Suddhodana three times, until finally the king told the Bodhisattva what was wrong.

The Bodhisattva then asked, "O king, is there anyone in this city who can compete with me in the arts?"

King Suddhodana, with a smile on his face, said to the Bodhisattva, "My son, are you capable of demonstrating any athletic prowess?"

The Prince responded, "I surely am, Your Majesty. So please assemble everyone who is skilled in the arts! Then I will demonstrate my skills before them."

King Suddhodana then asked for the bell to be sounded in the city of Kapilavastu and announced, "In seven days the Prince will demonstrate his prowess in the arts.

Thus everyone skilled in the arts is to assemble then!"

When seven days had passed, a group of Sakya boys five hundred strong assembled.

The daughter of Dandapani Sakya, the Sakya girl named Gopa, was put forward as a trophy for the victor, and a pledge was sworn: "Whoever here is victorious in swordsmanship, archery, combat, and wrestling shall have her."

Ahead of everyone else, the boy Devadatta arrived from the city. He saw that a large white elephant was being brought to the city for the Bodhisattva to ride. Intoxicated with jealousy, and drunk with pride about his Sakya family line as well as his own strength, he grabbed hold of the elephant by its trunk with his left hand and killed it with his right hand in a single stroke.

Right then the boy Sundarananda arrived. Seeing that an elephant had been killed at the city gate, he asked, "Who killed it?"

The crowd told him, "It was Devadatta."

Sundarananda said, "That was not right of Devadatta." Grabbing hold of the elephant by the tail, he dragged it outside the city gate.

Later the Bodhisattva arrived riding a chariot and noticed the dead elephant. When he inquired who had killed the animal, he was told that it was Devadatta. The Bodhisattva said, "That was not good of Devadatta. Who dragged the elephant outside the city gate?"

When he was then told that it was Sundarananda who had done so, he answered,

"It was good that Sundarananda carried it out, but this animal has a huge body. When it decays, the entire city will fill with a horrible stench." Then, while still on his chariot, the Prince extended one foot to the ground, and with his big toe he took hold of the elephant and hurled it a mile outside the city, over seven walls and seven moats. A deep pit formed where the elephant landed. Today this is aptly called Elephant Gorge.

Then hundreds of thousands of gods and humans let out hundreds of thousands of cries of amazement and waved their banners. From the sky, divine sons called out these verses:

"In a movement like a great elephant in rut,

The Bodhisattva grabbed hold of the great elephant with his big toe

And hurled it far outside the fair city,

Beyond seven of the city's moats.

"This supremely wise one will surely

Hurl the people who are bloated with the strength of pride

Far beyond the city of saṃsara,

Alone, through the strength of his insight."

Then five hundred Sakya boys emerged from the city and arrived at the place where they were to demonstrate their abilities in the arts. King Suddhodana, the Sakya elders, and a big crowd also arrived there, eager to compare the differences in artistic skill between the Bodhisattva and the other Sakya boys.

First those Sakya boys who were skilled in the rules of writing competed with the Bodhisattva in the art of scripts. The teacher Vismamitra was appointed judge by the Sakyas, and he announced: "You are to determine who among these boys is superior, whether in penmanship or in the knowledge of scripts."

Then, because the teacher Vismamitra had witnessed firsthand the Bodhisattva's knowledge of scripts, he smiled and said these verses:

"This pure being has reached perfection

In all the scripts, as many as there are in all the worlds,

Whether it be the world of humans, the world of gods,

The world of demigods, or the world of gandharvas.

"Neither you nor I know even the names

Of the scripts and letters

That this moon among men knows.

I have witnessed it firsthand. He will be victorious."

The Sakyas said, "It may indeed be that this boy is superior in knowledge of scripts, but he should also be tested and distinguish himself in knowledge of mathematics."

So the greatest mathematician among the Sakyas, a man called Arjuna, an adept in knowledge of calculation, was appointed judge and told, "You are to determine who among the boys here is superior in knowledge of numbers."

First the Bodhisattva proposed a mathematical problem. One of the Sakya boys tried to calculate it, but he could not solve it. Next another Sakya boy, then two, three, four, five, ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, a hundred—up to five hundred of them—together tried to calculate the problem, but they could not solve it.

Next the Bodhisattva said, "Now you propose a mathematical problem, and I will calculate it." One of the Sakya boys proposed a mathematical problem to the Bodhisattva, but the boy could not confound the Bodhisattva's calculations. Next two of the Sakya boys, then three, four, five, ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty—up to five hundred of them—together proposed a mathematical problem, but they could not confound the Bodhisattva's calculations.

Finally the Bodhisattva said, "Enough with this dispute! All of you should convene and propose a mathematical problem for me. Then I will calculate it." Accordingly five hundred Sakya boys in unison proposed an unprecedented problem, and still the Bodhisattva calculated it without any consternation. In this way all the Sakya boys met their match while the Bodhisattva remained undefeated. The great mathematician Arjuna was amazed and said these verses:

"When this fine intellect was questioned,

His knowledge was so very quick

That all five hundred Sakya boys

Were surpassed on the path of calculation.

"With such insight, wisdom,

Intellect, and mindfulness,

This ocean of knowledge

Even today learns and trains further in calculation."

The whole Sakya assembly was shocked and amazed, and they all said in unison, "O Prince Sarvarthasiddha, you have won, you have won!" All of them stood up from their seats, and with palms joined paid homage to the Bodhisattva.

Then they addressed King Suddhodana: "Great king, you are so fortunate to have a son whose eloquent self-confidence is so swift, nimble, subtle, and potent in the face of questions."

King Suddhodana then said to the Bodhisattva, "Son, can you match the ways of calculation with the great mathematician Arjuna, an expert in the knowledge of numbers?"

"I can, Your Majesty," responded the Bodhisattva.

"Then calculate away!" commanded the king.

The great mathematician Arjuna then asked the Bodhisattva, "Child, do you know how to calculate the number called ten million to the hundredth power?"

"Yes, I do," said the Bodhisattva.

"How then," asked Arjuna, "should one commence that calculation?"

The Bodhisattva replied: "One hundred times ten million is called a billion (ayuta).

One hundred times one billion is called one hundred billion (niyuta). One hundred times one hundred billion is called one quadrillion (kaṅkara). One hundred quadrillions is called one sextillion (vivara). One hundred sextillions is called a nonillion (aksobhya). One hundred nonillions is called a vivaha. One hundred vivahas is called an utsāṅga. One hundred utsāṅgas is called a bahula. One hundred bahulas is called a nagabala. One hundred nagabalas is called a tiṭilambha. One hundred tiṭilambhas is called a vyavasthanaprajñapti. One hundred vyavasthanaprajñaptis is called a hetuhila. One hundred hetuhilas is called a karaphu. One hundred karaphus is called a hetvindriya. One hundred hetvindriyas is called a samaptalambha. One hundred samaptalambhas is called a ganaganagati. One hundred ganaganagatis is called a niravadya. One hundred niravadyas is called a mudrabala.

One hundred mudrabalas is called a sarvabala. One hundred sarvabalas is called a visarjñagati. One hundred visarjñagatis is called a sarvasamjña. One hundred sarvasamjñas is called a vibhutarīgama. One hundred vibhutarīgamas is called a tallaksana.

"If one uses tallaksana as the basic unit of calculation, it is feasible to calculate the size of Mount Meru, the king of mountains. Beyond that is the number called dhvajagravati. If one uses dhvajagravati as the basic unit of calculation, it is possible to solve the calculation for all the grains of sand in the river Ganges. Beyond that is the number called dhvajagrānisamani. Next is the number called vahanaprajñapti. Then comes the number called iṅga. Beyond that is the number called kuruṭu. Then comes the number called kuruṭavi. Then comes the number called sarvaniksepa. With this count serving as the basic unit of calculation, it is possible to calculate the number of grains of sand in ten Ganges rivers. Beyond that is the number called agrasara. With this figure as the basic unit of calculation, it is possible to solve the calculation equal to the number of grains of sand in one billion Ganges rivers.

"Finally comes the number called application to the smallest particles (paramanura jāhṛave sanugata). With the exception of a thus-gone one, a bodhisattva who dwells at the sublime seat of awakening, or a bodhisattva who is about to be initiated into all Dharmas, there is no other being who understands this number, with the exception of me and perhaps one like me, namely a bodhisattva in his final existence who has departed from the household."

Then Arjuna asked, "Child, how would you enumerate the number application to the smallest particles?"

The Bodhisattva answered: "Seven of the smallest particles is one small particle.

Seven small particles is one water particle. Seven water particles is one airborne dust particle. Seven airborne dust particles is one dust particle on a hare. Seven dust particles on a hare is one dust particle on a sheep. Seven dust particles on a sheep is one dust particle on a cow. Seven dust particles on a cow is one louse egg. Seven louse eggs is one mustard seed. Seven mustard seeds is one barley grain. Seven barley grains is one finger joint. Twelve finger joints is one thumb tip to one index fingertip.

Two measures of one thumb tip to one index fingertip is one cubit. Four cubits is one bow. One thousand bows is considered one earshot in Magadha. Four times shouting-distance is one league. Who among you knows the total number of smallest particles in a league?"

"Well," said Arjuna. "I am uncertain about this. So, child, how much more so will the others, who are of weaker intellect, be confused? Child, please explain how many of the smallest particles make up a league."

The Bodhisattva explained: "A league contains 100 billion nonillions, 30 quintillions, 60 billion, 320 million, 512 thousand smallest particles. Such is the sum of smallest particles in a league. There are seven thousand leagues here in Jambudvīpa, eight thousand leagues in the western continent of Godaniya, nine thousand leagues in the eastern continent of Videha, and ten thousand leagues in the northern continent of Kuru.

"Moreover, there are one billion worlds of four continents, such as this world, and one billion oceans. There are also one billion surrounding mountain ranges and one billion outer ranges. Likewise there are one billion Mount Merus, the kings of mountains.

"There are one billion god realms belonging to the four great kings. There are one billion Heavens of the Thirty-Three, one billion Heavens Free from Strife, one billion Heavens of Joy, one billion Heavens of Delighting in Emanations, and one billion Heavens of Making Use of Others' Emanations.

"There are also one billion Brahma Realms, one billion realms of the High Priests of Brahma, one billion realms of Brahma's Entourage, one billion realms of Great Brahma, one billion realms of Limited Light, one billion realms of Limitless Light, one billion realms of the Luminous Heaven, one billion realms of the Heaven of Limited Virtue, one billion realms of the Heaven of Limitless Virtue, one billion realms of the Heaven of Perfected Virtue, one billion realms of the Cloudless Heaven, one billion realms of the Heaven of Increased Merit, one billion realms of the Heaven of Great Fruition, one billion realms of the Heaven of Concept-Free Beings, one billion realms of the Unlofty Heaven, one billion realms of the Heaven of No Hardship, one billion realms of the Sublime Heaven, one billion realms of the Gorgeous Heaven, and one billion realms of the Gods of the Highest Heaven. All of this is called a great trichilocosm.

"In width and breadth, each world system contains leagues measuring in the hundreds, thousands, ten millions, billions, hundred billions, and so on, all the way up to the measure of an agrasara. There is also a corresponding measure of the smallest particles. The number of these particles can indeed be calculated but, since it is unfathomable, it is called incalculable. A number of smallest particles even more incalculable than that are those contained in a great trichilocosm."

When the Bodhisattva demonstrated this display of calculation, the great mathematician Arjuna and the entire assembly of Sakyas were surprised and delighted, and they felt great appreciation and joy. They each kept just a single garment for themselves and offered the remaining garments and jewellery to the Bodhisattva.

Then the great mathematician Arjuna uttered the following verses:

"One hundred times ten million is a billion.

Likewise it is for one hundred billion and one quadrillion, And also for a sextillion and a nonillion, but beyond that is unknown to me.

So in mathematics, the knowledge of the Peerless One is superior.

Moreover, Sakyas,

"If he can calculate in the duration of a single utterance of the sound hūṃ,

All the dust particles, blades of grass, forests,

Medicinal herbs, and drops of water in a trichilocosm,

Then what is so amazing about the other five hundred boys?"

When he said this, hundreds of thousands of gods and humans let out hundreds of thousands of exclamations of shock and cries of joy. From the centre of the sky, divine sons called out the following verse:

"The Bodhisattva perfectly understands, with a single movement of his mind,

All the primary and subsidiary mental states, conceptions, and opinions

That belong to all beings throughout the three times without exception,

Whether they be inferior or superior, narrow or broad."

Monks, in this way all the Sakya youths were defeated and the Bodhisattva alone stood out. As the day progressed, the Bodhisattva also excelled in all aspects of leaping, swimming, and running. In the sky above, divine sons sang these verses:

"With the qualities of disciplined conduct and austerity
And the strength of his forbearance, discipline, and love, developed over millions of eons,

He is a leader with a body and mind that are supple in action,

And so you now witness the superiority of his swiftness.

"You see this most excellent being here in this city,

But instantaneously he is moving throughout the ten directions,

Paying homage to infinite victorious ones,

With a plethora of jewels and gold, in infinite worlds.

"Yet you are totally unaware of his comings and goings;

Such is the extent of his miraculous powers.

So why should his skills here provoke wonder?"

He is without equal, and you should feel respect for him." [

With his performances, the Bodhisattva uniquely distinguished himself. The Sakyas then said: "The Prince should also be tested in terms of his strength."

At that time the Bodhisattva stood to one side while the five hundred Sakya youths wrestled among themselves. Then thirty-two Sakya youths stayed on to confront the Bodhisattva in wrestling. First Nanda and Ananda approached the Bodhisattva to wrestle with him. But as soon as the Bodhisattva merely touched the two boys, they were unable to withstand the Bodhisattva's power and brilliance, and they collapsed on the ground.

Next Devadatta vied with the Bodhisattva. He was a conceited and arrogant young man, who was bloated with pride about his strength and his relationship to the Sakya lineage. In the arena filled with spectators, Devadatta first made a round clockwise, and then he lunged at the Bodhisattva. The Bodhisattva, however, was calm and unhurried. He playfully seized Devadatta with his right hand, twirled him into a triple spin, and tossed him to the ground. All the while the Bodhisattva's mind was full of love. He did not intend to hurt Devadatta, but only to break his pride. Therefore Devadatta was unharmed.

Then the Bodhisattva said, "Enough of this quarrel. You should now all join up and confront me in wrestling." Exhilarated, they all assailed the Bodhisattva.

However, as soon as the Bodhisattva touched them, they were unable to withstand his splendour, brilliance, physical strength, and stamina. Merely by his touch, they fell to the ground. Then hundreds of thousands of gods and humans let out hundreds of thousands of exclamations of shock and cries of joy. The divine sons in the sky showered down a rain of flowers and called out these verses:

"Even if all the myriad beings in the ten directions

Became like mighty wrestlers inclined to foul play

And converged on this bull among men,

His mere touch would bring them to the ground.

"Grabbing Meru, the foremost mountain and the adamantine mountain ranges,

And all other mountains throughout the ten directions,

He could reduce them all to powder,

So what is so amazing about a human body with no substance?"

"Through the strength of his love, he will vanquish Mara—
That mighty, foul-playing wrestler—along with his bannered forces of footmen and cavalry.

Under the most excellent lord of trees, he will vanquish this friend of darkness

And peacefully attain unexcelled awakening."

In this way the Bodhisattva, fighting alone, was the winner. Then Dandapani said to the Sakya youths: "This has now been tested and witnessed. Next let him demonstrate his skill in archery."

First Ananda placed an iron drum twice shouting-distance away as his target.

Next Devadatta placed an iron drum four times shouting-distance away as his target.

Then Sundarananda placed an iron drum six times shouting-distance away as his target. Dandapani placed an iron drum eight times shouting-distance away as his target.

Finally the Bodhisattva placed an iron drum ten times shouting-distance away as his target. Behind the drum he set up seven palm trees, and beyond that he set up an iron image of a wild boar.

Ananda struck his drum target twice shouting-distance away, but he could not shoot any farther. Devadatta struck the drum target four times shouting-distance away, but he also could not shoot any farther. Then Sundarananda struck the drum target six times shouting-distance away, but he was also unable to shoot any farther.

Dandapani struck the drum target eight times shouting-distance away and pierced it, but he also could not shoot any farther than that.

However, whichever bow the Bodhisattva drew, the string snapped or the bow broke. So the Bodhisattva asked, "King, is there any other bow here in the city that I can string or that can withstand my physical strength?"

The king replied, "Yes, my son, there is."

The boy asked, "Where is it?"

The king replied, "Son, your grandfather was called Sirihahanu. He had a bow that is now being honoured in the temple with incense and flower garlands. No one since him has been able to string the bow, let alone draw it."

The Bodhisattva said, "Your Majesty, may the bow be brought here! I would like to test it."

When the bow was brought to the assembly, all the Sakya youths tried pulling the bow with all their strength, but they were unable to string it, let alone draw it. Then the bow was placed before the Sakya Dandapani, who mustered all his bodily strength and endurance and tried to string the bow, but could not. Finally the bow was placed before the Bodhisattva. He picked it up and, sitting on his seat in the cross-legged position, he held it with his left hand and strung it with a single fingertip of his right hand.

While he was stringing the bow, a sound resonated throughout the entire city of Kapilavastu. All the townspeople became agitated and asked one another where the sound came from. Some said, "The sound is surely from Prince Sarvathasiddha, who has strung his grandfather's bow." Then hundreds of thousands of gods and humans let out hundreds of thousands of exclamations of shock and cries of joy. The divine sons in the sky then said this verse to King Suddhodana and to the masses:

"Just as this bow was drawn by the Sage Without rising from his seat,

So will he undoubtedly fulfil his purpose

And conquer the armies of Mara with ease."

Monks, the Bodhisattva now picked up an arrow, drew the bow, and released the arrow.

His shot was so powerful that the arrow went right through the targets set up by Ananda, Devadatta, Sundarananda, and Dandapani. The arrow then cleaved his own iron drum target, which was ten times shouting-distance away, then pierced the seven palm trees and the iron image of a boar before it finally entered the ground and disappeared. There, in the area where the arrow pierced the ground and vanished, a crater formed, which still to this day is called Arrow Crater.

Then hundreds of thousands of gods and humans let out hundreds of thousands of exclamations of surprise and cries of joy. The entire assembly of Sakyas was shocked and astonished. They said, "How amazing! He has such expertise in the arts, without even having trained."

The divine sons in the sky then called out to King Suddhodana and the masses:

"O people, why be so amazed? Do you know what's amazing?"

"He will sit on this earth, on the seat of the previous awakened ones.

Holding the bow of calm abiding, he will shoot the arrows of empty selflessness,

And so destroy the enemies—the afflictions, rent asunder the net of views,

And attain sublime awakening—tranquil, stainless, and free of sorrow."

Having spoken thus, the divine sons approached the Bodhisattva, strewing him with divine flowers.

In this way the Bodhisattva was superior in all the main aspects of the mundane arts, as well as in all practices beyond the reach of gods and humans. He was superior in leaping, and likewise in writing, finger counting, computation, arithmetic, wrestling, archery, running, rowing, swimming, elephant mounting, horsemanship, carriage driving, bow-and-arrow skills, balance and strength, heroics, gymnastics, elephant driving, lassoing, rising, advancing, retreating, gripping with the hand, gripping using the foot, gripping using the top of the head, cutting, cleaving, breaking, rubbing, target shooting without causing injury, target shooting at vital points, target shooting through only hearing the target, striking hard, playing dice, poetry composition, prose composition, painting, drama, dramatic action, tactical analysis, attending the sacred fire, playing the lute, playing other musical instruments, dancing, singing, chanting, storytelling, comedy, dancing to music, dramatic dancing, mimicry, garland stringing, cooling with a fan, dying precious gems, dying clothes, creating optical illusions, dream analysis, bird sounds, analysis of women, analysis of men, analysis of horses, analysis of elephants, analysis of cattle, analysis of goats, analysis of sheep, analysis of dogs, ritual science and its related lexicon, revealed scripture, ancient stories, history, the Vedas, grammar, etymologies, phonetics, metrics and composition, rules for conducting rituals, astrology, the Samkhya philosophical system, the Yoga philosophical system, ceremonies, the art of courtesans, the Vaisesika philosophical system, economics, ethics, hydraulics, knowledge of demigods, knowledge of game animals, knowledge of bird sounds, logic, hydromechanics, beeswax crafts, sewing, wickerwork, leaf cutting, and perfume making.

When that became clear, the Sakya Dandapani decided to give away his daughter, the Sakya girl Gopa, to the Bodhisattva. King Suddhodana also formally requested her hand in marriage for the Bodhisattva.

Then indeed, in order to conform to worldly conventions, the Bodhisattva dwelt among 84,000 women and showed himself to partake of the amorous games with pleasure. Among the 84,000 women, the Sakya girl Gopa was consecrated as the foremost wife. However, no matter who the Sakya girl Gopa encountered, whether it was her mother-in-law, her father-in-law, or any other member of the inner quarters, she did not cover her face. So people criticised her and spoke badly of her, saying, "A new wife is supposed to be covered, but this one is always exposed."

The Sakya girl Gopa heard this rumour, and in front of all the folk of the inner quarters, she said these verses:

"A noble being shines when uncovered,

Whether sitting, standing, or walking,

Like a precious gem beaming,

Radiant on the pinnacle of a standard.

"While going, a noble being shines,

And likewise while coming, a noble being shines.

While rising or sitting,

A noble being always shines.

"A noble being shines when speaking,

And even when silent, a noble being shines,

Just like a nightingale does

Whenever seen or heard.

"Whether he wears clothes made of kusa grass,

Poor quality clothe, or his body is emaciated,

One who is replete with good qualities and is adorned by those qualities

Shines with his own radiance.

"A noble one without evil

Shines perpetually,

Whereas an immature being who commits evil

Never shines no matter what he wears.

"Those who have evil in their hearts but whose speech is sweet

Are like a jar of poison topped off with nectar.

Like a rocky stone rough to the touch, they are hard inside;

Being with them is like caressing a viper's head.

"The truly gentle are approached and honoured by all,

Just like a sacred bathing bank, which sustains everyone.

Noble beings are like a jar filled with milk and curd;

It is extremely auspicious to behold such a pure nature.

"Those who have long shunned evil companions,

Who are now surrounded by precious spiritual friends,

Who relinquish evil deeds and adhere to the teaching of the buddhas

Are fruitfully auspicious to behold.

"Those who control their bodies thus control all physical faults;

Those who control their speech never confuse their words;

Those with guarded senses are mentally composed and serene.

What good is it to cover the face of such beings?

"Others may be covered in a thousand garments,

But if their minds are revealed to lack shame and modesty

And if they have no good qualities and lack truthful speech,

Then they move through the world more naked than naked.

"There are those who conceal their mind and restrain their senses,

Who are satisfied with their husbands and do not pine after others.

When they shine unconcealed, like the sun and moon,

What good is it to cover their faces?"

"Furthermore the great sages, those who know the thoughts of others,

And the assemblies of gods all know my thoughts.

They know my discipline, qualities, restraint, and carefulness;

So why should I veil my face?"

Monks, when King Suddhodana heard these eloquent verses from the Sakya girl Gopa, he felt satisfied and happy, and he cheerfully rejoiced. He then offered her a pair of fine cotton fabrics that were set with many different types of jewels, a pearl necklace worth a hundred billion silver coins, and a garland of gold set with red pearls.

The king then offered this sentiment:

"Just as my son is adorned with good qualities,

His bride too is radiant with her own good qualities.

That these two pristine beings have come together

Is just like butter and clarified butter."

This concludes the twelfth chapter on demonstrating skill in the arts.

THE GRAND BIBLE

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 13 — Encouragement

[The Bodhisattva reaches maturity and is able enjoy life in the palace, where he is surrounded by all types of pleasure, including a large harem to entertain him. Seeing this, the gods gently remind him of his vows to awaken.]

Monks, while the Bodhisattva was staying in the midst of his retinue of consorts, there were numerous gods, nagas, yakshas, gandharvas, demigods, garudas, kimnaras, and mahoragas, as well as Sakra and Brahma and the guardians of the world, who were eager to make offerings to the Bodhisattva. They arrived calling out in joyous voices. However, monks, as time went on, many of these gods, nagas, yakshas, gandharvas, demigods, garudas, kimnaras, and mahoragas, as well as Sakra, Brahma, and the worldly protectors, began to think to themselves:

"Now, is this not sacred being staying too long among the consorts? There are beings who have been brought to maturity over a long period of time through the four means of attracting disciples, namely generosity, kind talk, meaningful actions, and practicing what one preaches. Once he attains awakening, those beings would be able to understand his teachings on the Dharma. But perhaps all these suitable recipients for his teaching may be gone by then. In that case, the Bodhisattva will leave his home and awaken to unexcelled, perfect and complete buddhahood on his own."

So they approached the Bodhisattva. Full of respect and devotion, they joined their palms and bowed before him. Standing expectantly in his presence, they asked with concern:

"Will we ever witness the Bodhisattva—this sacred, supreme, and pure being—leave home as an act of renunciation? Once he has left home, will we see him sitting under the great king of trees, taming Mara and his army, and awakening to unexcelled, perfect and complete buddhahood?"

"When shall we see him accessing the ten powers of the thus-gone ones, the four types of fearlessness of the thus-gone ones, and the eighteen unique qualities of a buddha? Or spinning the unexcelled wheel of Dharma in its twelve aspects?"

Or teaching, through a vast display of buddhahood, according to the wishes of the world, including its gods, humans, and demigods, and satisfying them?"

Monks, for a long time—many uncountable eons—the Bodhisattva had always and continuously been without any need to rely on others. He was his own master with regard to worldly concerns, as well as those that go beyond the world. For a long time he had known the right time, the occasion, and the opportunity for the practice of all aspects of the roots of virtue. His higher knowledge was flawless, and his five types of superknowledge were fully manifest. Since he had a masterly command of his sense faculties, he could manifest miraculous powers. He knew indeed what was timely as well as what was untimely. Seeking the right opportunity, he would never miss it, just like the great ocean, which is always timely. Since he possessed the power of clairvoyant wisdom, he knew everything himself:

"This is the appropriate time for reaching out, this is the time for separation, this is the time for getting together, this is the time for showing kindness, this is the time for resting in equanimity, this is the time to speak, this is the time to remain silent, this is the time to leave home, this is the time to take ordination, this is the time to recite, this is the time for deep reflection, this is the time to stay in solitude, this is the time to stay within royal circles, this is the time to be among priests and householders, and this is the time to be among gods, nagas, yakshas, gandharvas, demigods, garudas, kimnaras, mahoragas, Sakra, Brahma, worldly protectors, monks, nuns, as well as male and female novices. This is the time to teach the Dharma, and this is the time to rest inwardly."

At all times the Bodhisattva knew whether the time was suitable or not, and he watched out for opportunities. Monks, for bodhisattvas who have reached their last existence, it is customary that the buddhas, the blessed ones, who dwell in the realms within the ten directions, always come while these bodhisattvas amuse themselves in the female quarters and encourage them through singing and music to enter the gate of Dharma

On this topic, it is said:

Whatever perfect beings abide in the worlds of ten directions,

It is through their special power that, accompanied by music,

These verses and songs, so pleasant and sweet,

Encourage the supreme being to renounce his home.

"When witnessing others who suffer greatly,

You previously made an aspiration

To become their protector and refuge,

As well as their supreme supporter and defender.

"Virtuous Hero! Remember your previous actions

And your vow to help others.

This is your time, your moment;

So, Supreme Sage, renounce your palace!

"It is for the sake of those for whom you have previously given up

The best of wealth, and even your head, arms, and legs,

That you will become a buddha, the supreme tamer of gods and humans,

The foremost in the world, and a storehouse of hundreds of qualities.

"With discipline you must perform austerities and hardship; With patience you will benefit others.

With diligence you will unfold all good qualities;

Your concentration and knowledge will have no equal in the three realms.

"The many beings afflicted by anger and blemished by hate

Must be embraced by your love, Thus-Gone One.

Those who are lost and without any qualities of goodness

And the many unskillful ones must all feel your compassion.

"With your merit and wisdom, virtue pervades your body;

With your stainless concentration and higher knowledge, you shine brightly.

You illumine the ten directions,

Like the stainless moon free from clouds."

Many such pleasing words, accompanied by music,

Are sung by the victorious ones.

They encourage the One Who Gods and Humans Venerate, saying:

"This is the time for you to renounce your palace."

Monks, the home of the Bodhisattva was indeed exquisite, complete with the most perfect belongings. It was anything a person could wish for, full of all the things necessary for comfortable living. Like a divine palace, it had the very best of verandas, turrets, porticoes, skylights, corridors, upper floors, and terraces. It was adorned with all sorts of jewels in many different arrangements and patterns. Parasols, flags, and banners were hoisted. Fine bells made of gems hung from lattices, as did hundreds of thousands of silk streamers. There were garlands of pearls set with various precious stones, and bridges built with boards that were ornamented by all types of jewels.

Flower garlands and decorations hung everywhere. Incense burners dispensed fragrant smoke, and silk canopies were spread above. Fragrant flowers from all seasons adorned the grounds, and the ponds were full of white lotus flowers in bloom. In all the many lotus ponds were flocks of many types of birds, such as leafbirds, parrots, mynas, cuckoos, swans, peacocks, wild geese, kunalas, and pheasants that all called out in their beautiful voices. There were grounds covered in blue lapis lazuli that reflected all the many fine features of the palace. It was so delightful to watch, and thus one could never get enough.

The exquisite and perfect mansion where the Bodhisattva lived was a source of supreme pleasures and joy. In his palace his body was always pure and stainless, he was adorned with flower garlands and jewellery, and his limbs were scented with the finest and most sweet-smelling oils. To cover his body he wore stainless white clothes of the finest quality, without any blemishes whatsoever. His bedding was made of divine fabrics of the finest thread, and as soft to the touch as the kacialindi cloth. There on his perfect couch, he lay surrounded by his wonderful retinue of consorts, who all resembled divine maidens. All the girls were virtuous, agreeable, and wholesome in conduct.

Inside this beautiful palace, the Bodhisattva woke up to the sound of conchs, kettledrums, clay drums, wood drums, lutes, harps, tambourines, cymbals, and flutes that produced the most sweet-sounding and melodious tunes to accompany their many sweet songs. The girls woke up the Bodhisattva with beautiful and soft songs accompanied by the melodious tones of flutes. However, due to the grace of the blessed ones, the buddhas in the ten directions, the instruments suddenly began to encourage the Bodhisattva by resounding with these verses:

The girls are delighted and joyful;

They play fine melodies on beautiful instruments.

At that moment, by the power of the victorious ones in the ten directions,

These many verses can be heard, in all their diversity:

"Seeing the beings who are forever without protector,

Hero, you made the following promise:

'I will awaken to the supreme state without old age or grief So that I can deliver all beings from death, old age, and other sufferings.'

"Therefore, Virtuous One, quickly leave this fine city

And practice the conduct of previous sages.

When you reach the right place on the earth,

You shall awaken to the incomparable wisdom of the victorious ones.

"In the past you gave away your exquisite wealth and riches,

And even your hands, feet, and dear body.

Great Sage, now is your time;

Open up the limitless river of Dharma for sentient beings.

"Your stainless and virtuous discipline has never been broken;

Until now you have always been adorned by the best qualities;

Great Sage, no one has discipline like you.

Now you must free beings from their many afflictions.

"For hundreds of lives you trained in forbearance;

You had patience with all kinds of evil words from others; Through patience you are forbearing, self-controlled, and at ease.

Lord of Men, now you must decide to depart from home.

"Your diligence is firm, steadfast, and unshakable;

Bliss-Gone One, you are great from beginning to end.

Virtuous One, you will tame Mara, the evil one, and his army.

And dry up the entire three lower realms.

"This is why you have practised disciplined conduct and austerities—

To burn the afflictions of these evil and degenerate times.

Now let a rain of nectar fall

To soothe the thirst of those who for so long have had no protector.

"Now remember your supreme vow from the past:

'I will leave behind this beautiful town,

Quickly attain the state without death or sorrow,

And satisfy those who suffer from thirst with the nectar of immortality.'

"You are skilled in the supreme actions of knowledge;

Your wisdom is vast and limitless.

So now, Virtuous One, shine the beautiful light of knowledge

On those who are caught in delusion and doubt.

"For hundreds of lives you have trained in love,

As well as compassion, joy, and equanimity.

All those perfect acts that you have performed,

You must now share with sentient beings."

Through all the splendour of the victorious ones in the ten directions,

These verses, the wonderful blossoms of qualities, come about.

Through music they reverberate beautifully,

Encouraging the youth who rests on his couch.

At that time the joyful maidens who bring pleasure,

Beautiful as they are, play melodious tunes.

At the same time the victorious ones in the ten directions, who tame gods and humans,

Let this perfect speech be heard through the instruments in a pleasant sound:

"You, who benefit beings and possess many qualities,

Have made the virtues of the victorious ones your own as you traveled the paths.

Remember your past disciplined conduct and austerities;

Quick, go to the supreme tree and attain the state of immortality.

"Gods and humans are thirsty, lacking the qualities of the victorious ones;

Yet your resolve equals the task, so grant them the nectar of immortality.

You possess the features of the ten powers, and all learned ones venerate you;

Quick, Lord of Men, dispense that nectar.

"You, Benefactor of the World, delight in the qualities of the victorious ones.

In your past lives you gave away your wealth, jewels, and gold,

Your beloved wife and children, your land, cities, and villages,

And even your own head, eyes, hands, and feet.

"O Best of Men, in former times you were a virtuous king.

When a person came before you and said,

'Please give me this land with its cities and villages,'

You gave it away with a happy and undisturbed mind.

"In former times you were a personal priest to a king;

You attended upon the masters and caused no harm to anyone.

Best among priests, you established many ordinary beings in virtue;

After you died you were reborn in the divine realms.

"Prince, in the past you were a perfect sage.

At that time an evil king cut off your limbs in anger,

Yet your mind remained undisturbed and you performed your caste duties.

At that time milk flowed from your arms and legs.

"In the past you were a sage's son known as Syama;

In the fine shelter of the mountains, you delighted in your difficult discipline.

Yet when a ruler pierced you with his poisonous arrows,

You were not disturbed, and only felt pity for him.

"In the past, O Receptacle of Qualities, when you were a leader of a pack of deer,

A hunter was carried off by a raging mountain torrent.

Wishing to help, you carried him to dry land.

Even as you brought your enemy to safety, you remained calm.

"Perfect Man, in previous times you were born as the son of a priest.

When your gem fell in the ocean,

You dried out the ocean.

As the strong and firm leader of human beings, you recovered the valuable gem.

"Perfect Being, in times past you were born as a holy sage.

THE GRAND BIBLE

Once when a priest approached you, saying, 'Please give me your protection.'

Sage, you told him, 'Venerable priest, I will rid you of the enemy.'

You gave away your body, while the priest kept his.

"In the past you approached the sage Syama at his place by the tree;

He asked you how many leaves were on the tree.

With your skill you counted the leaves accurately

And told him the exact number.

"Previously you were a virtuous, quick-darting parrot that lived in a tree;

Although the tree died, you remained, remembering its kindness.

The king of gods saw your virtues and rejoiced;

He restored the perfect tree to its former glory.

"Your disciplined conduct and austerities are beyond compare;

You are a receptacle of virtue, rich in qualities, treading the path of virtue.

Your time has come to abandon your city and your land;

Quick, establish beings in the virtuous actions of the virtuous ones."

When gems of playful women, exquisitely dressed, their bodies adorned,

Play sweet music on the best of instruments,

Then, by the glory of the victorious ones in the ten directions,

These wonderful verses emerge from the beautiful sounds of the instruments:

"You vowed, 'I will be the protector of the world plagued by old age and death.'

Light of the World, in times past, for many eons, you have made this wish.

Lion of Men, remember your past aspirations;

Lord of Men, this is your time for renouncing your home.

"For billions of lives, you generously made many lavish gifts,

Giving away your wealth, gems, gold, fine cloth, a variety of jewels,

Your hands, feet, eyes, your beloved child, and the wealth of your kingdom.

Still you never had any resentment or anger for those who took it.

"You, Sasiketu, have been a peaceful king with fine teeth,

Loving and compassionate, with a crown jewel shining like the moon.

Such were your main deeds, mighty hero with the beautiful eyes of a king.

As a king, for billions of years you have practiced generosity gladly.

"Thus-Gone One, for many eons you have practiced discipline.

Like a stainless jewel, your discipline has been pure;

Like a female yak that protects her calf, you have guarded your discipline.

Since you delight in discipline, you have done so much to benefit beings.

"As a perfect elephant, the arrows of the evil hunter hit you,

Yet you felt love and compassion for this harsh enemy and protected him.

You gave him your fine and beautiful tusks and did not relinquish your discipline;

You displayed such discipline many times.

"Delighting in forbearance, you had patience with the many harms, sufferings,

Harsh words, murders, and imprisonments inflicted upon you by others.

In the past you always provided others with every comfort,

And although they were your executioners, you still remained forbearing.

"Protector, once you were a bear, living in a mountain lair;

At that time you rescued a man, frightened and terrified, out of an avalanche.

You served him roots and berries and provided him with every comfort;

Although he soon killed you and carried you off, you remained patient.

"When through austerities, you sought awakening and wisdom of many qualities,

You possessed fortitude, determination, unshakable resolve, and diligence;

The strength of your diligence could overcome even the most powerful demon.

Lion of Men, the time has come for renunciation.

"In the past you were the finest of horses, as white as snow;

With compassion, you traveled swiftly through the sky to the land of demoneses.

You rescued the men in distress and brought them to safety;

Many times have you demonstrated such diligence.

"A skilled meditator, you destroyed afflictions with calmness, discipline, and restraint,

And tamed the fickle mind, which chases after the pleasures of the senses.

Since you delight in concentration, your personal qualities benefit others;

Now, Perfect Being, the time has come for you to demonstrate your concentration.

"In the past you were a well-to-do sage who delighted in concentration;

People who had lost their king invited you and consecrated you to kingship.

You showed these people the ten virtues and established them on the path of Brahma;

Later, as they died, they all proceeded to the realm of Brahma.

"You have mastered the art of knowing the destinies of beings in all directions;

You know their actions, languages, and capacities.

You have perfected the way, the discipline, and different types of memory;

Royal Son, today the time for renunciation has come.

"In the past, when you saw anyone with wrong views,

Who suffered from old age, death, and all the different afflictions,

You instructed them in the straight path that destroys existence.

You who conquer darkness, you have benefited the world greatly."

These many virtuous and beautiful verses emerge from the tune of the instruments;

By the glory of the victorious ones, they encourage the hero: "Intelligent One, the time for renunciation has come;

When you see these suffering beings, do not remain indifferent."

The pleasing and joyful women are adorned

With fine clothes, gems, necklaces, perfumes, and flower garlands;

They wake the Supreme Being with music and song.

By the power of the victorious ones, the instruments call out these verses:

"It was for the sake of others that for many eons,

You gave up what is hard to abandon and were disciplined, forbearing, and diligent.

Through your training in concentration and knowledge, your time has come;

Guide, quick, direct your mind toward renunciation, without delay!

"Before you relinquished treasuries of jewels, gold, silver, and ornaments;

In all those lives, you performed sacrifices of many types.

You gave away your wife, sons, daughters, body, kingdom, and even your life;

For the sake of awakening, you gave away without limits what is hard to abandon.

"You have been kings rich in merit and renowned for splendour:

Nimindhara, Nimi, Krsnabandhu, Brahmadata, Kesarin, Sahasrayajña, Dharmacinti, Arcimat, and Drdhadhanu.

Always considering the matter well, you gave to lowly people what is hard to give.

"You have been powerful Sutasoma, Diptavirya, and Puñyaramsi;

Generous and powerful, you also acknowledged the kindness of others.

O Royal Sage, you were the moon-like hero Satyavardhana, The King Subhasitagavesin, and the gentle Sumati.

"You have been Candraprabha, Visesagamin, and Renu, lord of the ten directions;

You have been the king of Kasi Pradanasura, Ratnacuda, and Santaga.

When you were these rulers, as well as others, you gave what is hard to give;

As you showered a rain of gifts then, may you now shower a rain of Dharma.

"In the past you saw the best of beings, as numerous as sand in the Ganges,

And made an inconceivable and limitless number of offerings to them.

As you searched for supreme awakening in order to liberate others then,

Hero, now the time has come to renounce this perfect city.

"At the beginning you offered Amoghadasin a sala flower;

With a mind full of devotion, you gazed for a moment at Vairocana.

You offered Dundubhisvara a myrobalan fruit;

When you saw Candana's house, you brought your grass torch and held it up.

"When Renu entered the city, you scattered a handful of fragrant powder at him;

When Dharmesvara taught the Dharma, you applauded him.

When you saw Samantadasin, you declared your homage to him;

You joyfully threw a golden chain toward Maharciskandhin.

"To Dharmadhava you offered a robe, and to Nirodha a handful of beans.

You offered Jñanaketu a flower of the asoka tree, and soup to Sarathi.

You offered a candle to Ratnasikhin, and medicine to Padmayoni.

To Sarvabhibu you offered a pearl necklace, and to Sagara a lotus flower.

"You offered a canopy to Padmagarbha, and a rain cover to Simha.

To Salendraraja you offered clarified butter, and milk to Puspita.

To Yasodatta you offered kurunṭa flowers, and food to Satyadasin.

You bowed down to Jñanameru, and offered robes to Nagadatta.

"To Atyucagamin you offered the finest sandalwood, and a handful of salt to Tisya.

You offered lotus flowers to Mahavyuha, and jewels to Rasmiraja.

To Sakyamuni you offered a handful of gold, and you praised Indraketu.

You offered earrings to Suryananda, and a golden crown to Sumati.

"To Nagabhibu you offered a jewel, and a cotton mat to Pusa.

To Bhaisajyaraja you offered a precious parasol, and a throne to Simhaketu.

You offered Guṇagrādhari a net of precious stones, and instruments to Kasyapa.

To Arciketu you offered powders of exquisite scent, and flowers to Caityaka.

"You offered Aksobhyaraja a multistoried palace, and a flower garland to Lokapujita.

To Tagarasikhin you offered your kingdom, and to Durjaya much incense.

You offered yourself to Mahapradipa, and jewel adornments to Padmottara.

To Dharmaketu you offered various flowers, and blue lotuses to Dipamkara.

"In the past you made these and other offerings,

Manifold and marvelous, to the best of beings.

Remember the buddhas of the past and your offerings to these teachers;

Do not abandon those who suffer without protection; leave your home.

"Merely seeing Dipamkara, you attained supreme forbearance,

And discovered, accordingly, the five indestructible clairvoyant perceptions.

Subsequently you performed inconceivable offerings

For limitless eons to all the buddhas in all the universes.

"Now limitless eons have passed, and those buddhas have passed into nirvana.

Where are all your past bodies and names now?

All things perish by nature; there is no permanence in conditioned things.

Delights, kingdoms, and enjoyments are impermanent, so leave this perfect city.

"Like the fierce and terrifying inferno, when this eon comes to an end,

Old age, sickness, and death bring great and terrible fear.

In the end, all things are conditioned and therefore cannot last;

Look at those who suffer intensely and, Capable One, renounce."

As the retinue of women wake up the Lord of Men,

Who was resting in his comfortable bed,

With sounds of lutes, flutes, and other instruments,

At that time the following words come from within the sounds of the instruments:

"The three worlds are ablaze with the suffering of old age and sickness;

This world is ablaze with the fire of death and without a protector.

Always deluded in impure existence,

Beings spin like a bee caught in a vase.

"The three worlds are unstable, like autumn clouds;

The birth and death of beings is like watching a play.

The life of a being passes quickly,

Like a lightning bolt in the sky or a mountain stream.

"By the power of craving for existence and ignorance,

Beings take birth as humans, gods, or in the three lower realms.

In their ignorance they continuously circle among these five existences,

Like the spinning of a potter's wheel.

"Beautiful forms, sweet sounds, fragrant smells,

Delicious tastes, and pleasant touch—

The snare of these unfortunate times has caught beings,

Like the hunter's snare catches a monkey.

"The objects of enjoyment lead to much suffering and harm;

They bring fear, make enemies, and lead to depravity.

A noble being will reject them like a bowl of excrement,

The edge of a sword, or poison ivy.

"The objects of enjoyment always bring fear and depravity;

They make us suffer when we think of them, and they make us blind.

THE GRAND BIBLE

They always produce causes of fear and are the root of suffering;

They make the vine of craving for existence grow.

"Just like a terrifying fire pit,

So the noble ones understand desire.

Or they see it like a great swamp, or like walking on swords,

Or like the edge of a knife smeared with honey.

"Like a viper's head or a bowl of excrement,

So the wise ones understand desire.

Desires are like a pang of pain, and as fragile as a bird's egg;

Like a bone among dogs, they are the prime cause of enmity.

"Desired objects are like a moon reflected in water,

Like a reflection, or an echo,

Like an illusion, or like a theater play,

Or like a dream—thus perceive the noble ones.

"Desired objects are momentary and empty.

They are as untrue as a magical illusion or a mirage;

They have no substance, like a bubble of water or foam.

The learned ones realize that these objects emerge from conceptualisation.

"At first in youth, when one has a fine body,

One is liked and desired and acts like a child.

Yet when old age, suffering, and diseases conquer the splendour of the body,

One is abandoned, just like a dried-up river is abandoned by deer.

"When one is powerful with the best of wealth, grains, and possessions,

One is liked and desired and acts like a child.

Yet when the wealth is spent and suffering sets in,

One is abandoned, just like an empty wilderness.

"Like a tree with flowers and fruits,

People love a person who delights in giving.

Yet when the wealth is gone, one becomes a beggar, miserable in old age;

At that point, just like a vulture, one becomes disliked.

"When one is powerful, rich, and handsome, one is like a lord;

People like to meet such a being, and one pleases their senses.

Yet when one is old, suffering from disease, and all wealth is spent,

One becomes as disagreeable as death.

"When one is old and youth has passed,

Like a tree struck by lightning,

One is worn out and terrifying to others, like a ruined house.

Sage, quick, tell us how to avoid old age!

"Old age withers men and women,

Just as the malu ivy does to a thick sala forest.

Old age robs one's diligence, energy, and power,

Like a person caught in a swamp.

"Old age makes the beautiful person ugly;

Old age steals one's splendour and robs one's power.

Old age takes your happiness and defeats you;

Old age brings death and destroys your vital force.

"There are hundreds of diseases, and being struck by sickness

Brings torment to beings, like deer tormented by forest fire.

Look at those beings that are overcome by old age and sickness,

And, quick, explain how to be free of suffering!

"Just as the heavy snow during winter

Steals all life from grass, trees, and herbs,

So, alas, do sickness and old age rob the vitality of beings

And destroy their faculties, bodies, and strength.

"Old age and disease exhaust all stores of wealth and grain;

They bring great anguish to beings.

They create resentment and bring animosity among loved ones;

They torment everyone intensely, like the sun in the sky.

"When the time of passing away has arrived,

One is always separated from one's favourite possessions and loved ones.

There will be no returning or meeting again,

Just as fruits or leaves taken by the river never meet the tree again.

"Death makes the powerful helpless;

Death robs everyone, like a river carrying off a tree.

One must proceed alone, without friend or company;

One is powerless but to follow the results of one's actions.

"Death devours beings by the hundreds,

Like a sea monster devouring numerous beings,

Or like a garuda devouring a naga, or an elephant catching a lion,

Or how a fire devours plants, herbs, and living creatures.

"To liberate beings from these hundreds of calamities,

Thus you made your aspiration.

Now remember that aspiration of bygone times;

The time for leaving your home has come."

While the group of delighted women

Are waking up the Great Sage with their music,

At this time, through the power of the thus-gone ones,

These wonderful verses come out from the sound of the instruments:

"Everything compounded quickly disintegrates;

Nothing lasts longer than a flash of lightning in the sky.

Your time has now come—

The time for leaving home, Disciplined One!

"Conditioned things are impermanent and without stability;

Their nature is to break, like an unbaked earthen vase.

They are like things on loan from another,

Or a city of sand, so short-lived are they.

"All these conditioned things are impermanent by nature.

Like mud plaster applied during the rains,

Or the sandy banks of the river,

They depend on conditions and have a feeble nature.

"Conditioned things are like the light of a candle:

They have the nature of quickly coming and going.

Like the wind, they do not remain;

Like foam, they are feeble and insubstantial.

"Conditioned things are inert and empty;

When examined they are like the stem of the plantain tree.

They are like an illusion that deceives the mind;

They are like an empty fist that tricks children.

"All conditioned things come about

Based on causes and conditions.

One causing the other, they arise in dependence,

Yet all the childish beings do not recognise this.

"Just as valvaja grass depends on muñja grass

To give a rope proper strength,

Or just as a bucket in a well depends on a winch—

One unable to function without the other—

"So too function the twelve links of interdependent origination.

Being all in mutual dependence,

One thing follows after another,

And it cannot be seen where one thing ends and the other begins.

"When you have a seed, a sprout can grow,

Yet the seed is not the sprout.

Still it is not different;

In this way the true nature knows no permanence or impermanence.

"Formative factors have ignorance for their cause;

Formative factors do not truly exist.

Ignorance and formative factors

Are naturally empty and inert.

"The seal makes the mark of the seal appear,

Yet the seal itself was not transferred anywhere.

It is not in the mark, yet it is also not elsewhere;

In this way the formative factors are beyond annihilation and permanence.

"It is based on the eye and form

That the eye consciousness appears.

Yet the form is not dependent on the eye,

Nor is the form transferred to the eye.

"Although all of this is without a self and is repulsive,

Beings perceive it as having a self and as beautiful.

Although that is a mistaken and corrupt imputation,

The eye consciousness arises from it.

"The consciousness ceases and rearses.

The practitioner observes this arising and ceasing of consciousness:

It goes nowhere and it does not come from anywhere.

The practitioner perceives consciousness as empty and illusory.

"Since the combination of these three is needed—

The lower and upper pieces of wood, and the action of the hands—

A fire is born in dependence on conditions.

It is born, fulfills its purpose, and quickly ceases.

"In this way some scholars investigate:

"Where does this come from and where does it proceed?"

They check in all directions,

And find that nothing comes and nothing goes.

"The conditions for the aggregates, the sense fields, and the elements

Are ignorance, craving, and karma.

When all of these assemble, that is called a sentient being,

Although ultimately nothing is there.

"Based on the lips, throat, palate, and tongue,

The sounds of syllables are produced.

This is not so with just the throat or the palate;

No sound can be found in them individually.

"Speech occurs based on all of these things coming together;

It emerges based on the power of mind and intelligence.

Yet mind and speech are by nature invisible;

They are nowhere to be found, inside or outside.

"When the learned ones analyze the coming and going

Of speech, voices, sounds, and tunes,

They see that all speech is like an echo,

Momentary and without substance.

"Sound is based on wood and strings

Meeting with the movements of the hands.

Due to these three things, sounds can emerge

From instruments such as the melodious lute.

"When some skillful people analyze this and wonder:

"Where does the sound come from and where does it go?"

They may search in all directions,

Yet never find the origin of sound or its destination.

"This is how all compounded phenomena appear,

Based on causes and conditions.

The practitioner, by observing the true nature of conditioned things,

Sees that these things are all empty and inert.

"The aggregates, sense fields, and elements

Are empty within and empty without;

They all lack a self and do not abide.

Everything is essentially like space.

"That everything is this way,

You realised when you met Dipamkara.

That which you understood, exactly as it is,

You must now make gods and humans comprehend.

"Beings are scorched by attachment and anger,

Yet they are falsely imputed—such ills are not for real.

Guide, release the stream of nectar,

The cooling waters of peace from the cloud of compassion.

"Once I attain supreme awakening,

I will gather noble wealth for beings.'

Skillful One, saying this you sought out supreme awakening,

And for many millions of eons you made offerings to the learned.

"Remember your previous actions!

Charioteer, do not forget to bring this noble wealth

To those who are depressed, poor, and suffering.

Gather them with your noble wealth.

"I will show millions of beings

The perfect gate to the nectar of the higher realms.'

Saying this, you guarded your discipline well

In order to block the way to the three lower realms.

"Keep your discipline and fulfill your wishes;

Remember your past actions.

Close the gates to the three lower realms,

And open the gates to the nectar of the higher realms.

"I will put up with beings' hostility and anger,

And liberate everyone from the ocean of existence.

I will establish them in peace and happiness without disease.'

Saying this, you have always trained in forbearance.

"Remember your previous actions!

Do not abandon those who engage in harmful actions,

Due to being disturbed by animosity, ill will, and harmful wishes.

You said: 'I will bring those beings to the stage of forbearance.'

"I will prepare the ship of Dharma,

Deliver beings from the ocean of existence,

And establish them in peace and happiness without disease.'

Saying this, you have relied on diligence to achieve that.

"Remember your previous actions!

The four rivers carry beings away;

Quick, rescue those beings that have no guide,

Through the power of your diligence and the strength of your discipline.

"I will establish on the noble path

Those beings that have confused faculties and suffer from monkey-like thoughts.'

O Gentle One, to accomplish that,

You have trained in concentration that expels disturbing emotions.

"Remember your previous actions!

Do not abandon those afflicted beings

Who are agitated by the web of disturbing emotions.

Establish these beings in one-pointed concentration.

"I will give beings who are veiled by the darkness of delusion and ignorance

A vision of many hundred doors to the Dharma.

I will give them eyes that can see reality.'

Saying this, you have meditated on knowledge.

"Remember your previous actions!

To those beings who are veiled by the darkness of delusion and ignorance,

You must give the excellent light of sacred knowledge,

The eye of Dharma, which is stainless and impeccable."

Verses like this emerge from

The sounds of the women's instruments.

Hearing them, all the Bodhisattva's sleepiness vanishes

And he sets his mind on perfect and supreme awakening.

Monks, in this way, even as the Bodhisattva was with his retinue of consorts, he could not avoid hearing the sound of the Dharma. He could not avoid thinking about the Dharma.

Monks, this was because for so long the Bodhisattva had paid his respects to the Dharma and to those who teach the Dharma. From the innermost core of his being, he strove toward the Dharma, wished for the Dharma, and his only delight was in the Dharma. As he searched for the Dharma, he was insatiable.

He taught the Dharma just as he had heard it. He was a master of generosity in bestowing the gift of the unexcelled great Dharma. He taught the Dharma without seeking rewards. He was without any stinginess when it came to teaching the Dharma.

Regarding the Dharma, he never held back anything as a teacher. He practiced the Dharma that he taught. He was brave in making the Dharma manifest. He found his home in the Dharma, his protection in the Dharma, and his refuge in the Dharma. His point of reference was the Dharma, and his ultimate resort was the Dharma. With the Dharma as his object of meditation, proficient in forbearance, he practiced the perfection of knowledge and attained skillful means.

Monks, the Bodhisattva demonstrated, with a playful mastery of his great skillful means, the actions conforming to the wishes of his entire retinue of consorts. He was acting in conformity with the bodhisattvas of the past who, while being beyond the world, acted in worldly ways. Since the Bodhisattva had long ago realized the shortcomings of desire, he now demonstrated sensual enjoyment, without himself wanting it, simply in order to ripen others. By the unique power of the accumulation of merit, gathered through limitless roots of virtue, he demonstrated the qualities of the ruler of the world. He demonstrated a complete enjoyment of the delightful forms, sounds, smells, tastes, and textures that went far beyond anything known to gods and humans in terms of quality and extent.

He demonstrated a mastery of mind, which was free from attachment to any of his delightful maidens of pleasure. He ripened those who were now in his company as friends, due to the power of their previous aspirations and their accumulated roots of virtue. As such he was able to stay among the consorts without ever being disturbed by the stains of worldly emotions. While watching for the time to ripen the potential in those who were around him, the Bodhisattva kept his former promise acutely in mind.

He actualised the Buddha and the Dharma and perfected the power of aspiration. For sentient beings he felt great compassion and kept their complete freedom foremost in his mind. He understood that in the end, any amount of wealth will be used up. He understood that samsara is full of many calamities and terrors. He broke free from the evil shackles of Mara, extricated himself from the prison of cyclic existence, and directed his attention to nirvana.

Monks, from the very beginning the Bodhisattva had already understood the many shortcomings of cyclic existence. With all his heart, he stopped striving after compounded phenomena, as well as all kinds of grasping and clinging. Instead he now only felt interest in the Buddhadharmas. He turned toward the state of nirvana and turned his back on samsara. He delighted in the domain of a thus-gone one, because he had separated himself from the domain of Mara.

Perceiving the three realms to be ablaze with the shortcomings of existence, his wish was to free himself from them, and he became skilled in removing himself from the shortcomings and faults of cyclic existence. His wish was to become ordained, and his mind was filled with the thought of leaving home. He was determined to live in solitude and delighted in seeking remoteness. His wish was to be completely on his own and at peace.

He strove to be of help, both for himself and for others, and was a hero in unexcelled persistence. He wished to be of service to the world and to assist the world. He wished happiness and the peace of accomplishment for the world. He had compassion for the world and wanted to help. He was filled with love, saturated with great compassion, and skilled in the art of attracting others. He was never sad. He was skilled in ripening and training others. In his heart he harbored the same love toward everyone that one has for one's only child.

He had abandoned wishes for material objects and paid no attention to them. He delighted in giving and sharing. He never refused, but gave courageously with an open hand. He made religious offerings. He accumulated perfect merit and guarded it well. Through discipline, he freed himself from any stains or miserliness, and was fully in control of his thoughts. He was a peerless great benefactor. Even though he gave, he had no expectation of reward. He was a heroic giver ready to subdue the hostile forces of the entire multitude of disturbing emotions, the primary ones being longing, desire, attachment, anger, haughtiness, pride, delusion, and miserliness.

He did not lapse from continually giving rise to the state of omniscience. He was always well protected by an armour of great generosity. He had love and compassion for the world and wished to help. His protection and coat of mail was diligence. His focus was on liberating others. His power was compassion, and his strength was courage. He did not turn back. He had complete impartiality with regard to all beings, and his weapon was generosity. He was able to satisfy the hopes and wishes of others. He was a vessel fit for awakening who continuously realised the Dharma. He would dedicate his awakening to all beings. He did not lower his banner. When he gave, his generosity was not involved with subject, object, and action. He had the sharp vajra weapon of supreme wisdom. He conquered all opposing forces of disturbing emotions.

He was disciplined, skilled, and behaved correctly. He guarded carefully all his physical, verbal, and mental acts, and exhibited fear of even the smallest unwholesome act. His discipline was perfectly pure. Mentally he had abandoned all stains and was now clean and spotless. Disturbing emotions resulting from negative speech, harmful talk, adversity, criticism, blaming, cursing, beatings, threats, murder, bondage, and imprisonment did not perturb his mind, which was simply unshakable. He was perfectly forbearing and gentle. He had no harmful wishes, never did any damage, and was utterly free from any ill will.

He had given rise to a fervent diligence that was set on helping all other beings. It was a firm resolve. He could not be turned back from accomplishing all the practices that are the roots of virtue. He was mindful and composed. His mind was not distracted, and he rested one-pointedly in concentration. He was skilled in analyzing phenomena. He had found the light, and all darkness had disappeared for him. His mind was filled with thoughts about the nature of impermanence, suffering, and repulsiveness.

He was trained in the applications of mindfulness, the thorough relinquishments, the bases of miraculous power, the faculties, the powers, the branches of awakening, the path, the four truths of the noble ones, and all the principles conducive to awakening.

His mind was purified by tranquility and insight. He perceived the truth of dependent origination. Since he had realized the truth, he was not reliant on others. He mastered the three gateways to liberation. He had realized that all phenomena are like an illusion, a mirage, a dream, a moon reflected in water, an echo, or an optical illusion. Monks, in this way the Bodhisattva lived according to the Dharma.

In this way he rested in wisdom. In this way he rested in a state of immense qualities. In this way he strove for the benefit of others.

Encouraged even more by these verses, which emerged out of the sounds of the instruments through the blessings of the buddhas in the ten directions, the Bodhisattva at this point manifested four Dharma gates in order to mature his retinue of consorts, just as all previous bodhisattvas in their last existence had done. What are these four Dharma gates?

The first Dharma gate that he manifested is called pure accomplishment. It refers to the four means of attracting disciples: generosity, kind talk, meaningful actions, and practicing what one preaches.

The second Dharma gate that he manifested is called the irreversible state. It produces the power of aspiration toward inexhaustible omniscience, and it ensures that the capacity of the Three Jewels is upheld and not wasted.

The third Dharma gate that he manifested is called putting great compassion into practice. It is a disposition of never abandoning any sentient beings.

The fourth Dharma gate that he manifested is called the great array. It accomplishes the unique strength of the accumulation of wisdom, which ascertains the meaning of the different categories related to all the factors of awakening.

These are the four Dharma gates that the Bodhisattva manifested. At that point, in order to mature his entire retinue of consorts, he produced many miraculous manifestations. By the power of the Bodhisattva, these miraculous displays caused hundreds of thousands of Dharma gates to emerge from the sounds of the music, such as the following:

"Through profound aspirations in one's heart
And the heartfelt compassion for beings,
The mind of the most eminent awakening is born."
Such words rang out from the musical instruments.
"Faith, devotion, dedication, respect,
Lack of pride, and humility before the teachers,
Inquiry and search for the nature of virtue,
And training in mindfulness." Such were the words that emerged.

"Generosity, calmness, collectedness, discipline,
Forbearance, diligence,
Concentration, absorption,
Knowledge, and means." Such were the words that emerged.
"Through settling on love, compassion,
Joy, equanimity, higher knowledge,
And the four means of attracting disciples,
You will ripen beings." Such were the words that emerged.
"Analyze the four applications of mindfulness,
The thorough relinquishments, the bases of miraculous power,

The five faculties, the five powers, and the branches of awakening."
Such were the words that emerged from the instruments.

"The divisions of the supreme eightfold path of the noble ones,

Tranquility, insight, impermanence,
Suffering, lack of self, and repulsiveness."
Such were the words that emerged from the instruments.
"Freedom from attachment, solitude,
Knowledge of extinction, nonarising,
Cessation, nonabiding, and nirvana."
Such were the words that emerged from the instruments.

Through the power of the Perfect Bodhisattva,
Such words emerged from the instruments.

As all these wanton women heard these words, they learned them,

And directed their aspirations for awakening to the Perfect
Being.

Monks, while the Bodhisattva remained in this way among his retinue of consorts, he matured 84,000 women along with many hundreds of thousands of assembled gods for the attainment of unexcelled and perfect awakening.

When it was time for the Bodhisattva to leave home, there arrived a divine son from the Heaven of Joy by the name Hriveda, on a visit concerning the Bodhisattva's unexcelled and perfect awakening. Then, in the quiet of the night, he arrived at the palace together with an assembly of 32,000 divine sons in order to serve and venerate the Bodhisattva. As he arrived, he stopped in midair and sang these verses to the Bodhisattva:

"You have manifested passing away, Famed One!
Lion of Men, you have also manifested birth.
In order to teach the retinue of consorts,
You have acted in accordance with the world.
"While acting in conformity with the world,
You have ripened many gods and humans.
Today the time has come,
So please consider leaving home.

"If you are not free yourself, you will be unable to liberate
others;

A blind man cannot show the way.
If you are free, you can liberate others;
A person with sight can show the way.
"Those beings who are slaves to desire—
Attached to their house, wealth, sons, and wife—
When being trained by you,
May they too form a wish to leave their homes.

"You must abandon your dominion and the sports of love,
And the seven riches on the four continents.
When people hear that you have renounced all this,
The world with its gods and humans will long for the same.
"You are not delighted by desire;
You rest in the bliss of concentration.
Yet many hundreds of gods and humans,
You awaken from their sleep.
"The prime of life is very short;
It passes quickly, like a cascading waterfall.
As youth fades away,
Leaving home will not seem appealing.

"So depart from home now
While you are still young and in your prime.
Fulfill your promise
And act in the interest of the host of gods.
"Desired objects never satisfy;
They are just like salty water from the ocean.
Satisfied, however, are those who possess knowledge,
The stainless noble ones who transcend the world.
"You are the delight of King Suddhodana's kingdom,
Who has won its hearts and minds.
Your face is like a blooming lotus with hundreds of petals.
So please consider departing now!

"Beings suffer from the burning torment of disturbing emotions.
They are without refuge, bound in heavy fetters.
Hero, quick, establish them in peace
On the path to complete liberation.
"You, the skilled physician,
Please, quickly establish in the happiness of nirvana
The beings touched by diseases, who have suffered for so long,
By dispensing the medicine of Dharma.
"Beings are blind in the darkness of their stupor
And bound by the web of wrong views.
You are the eye of gods and humans,
So quick, shine the light of wisdom.
"We must see the One Who Has Attained Awakening,
And listen to the unexcelled Dharma."
So say the many gods, demigods, nagas,
Yaksas, and gandharvas who are watching you.
"The king of nagas can see your splendour,
Since it illumines even his abode.
He brings boundless offerings,
So fulfill his wish for disciplined conduct.
"At the feet of the Bodhi tree your mind shall be perfected,
And we shall present you with four offering bowls."
So say the four guardians of the world and their armies,
Who are all awaiting you.
"Even Brahma, the peaceful and compassionate one,
Who speaks lovingly, awaits you, thinking:
"I must request this lord of men
To turn the unexcelled wheel."
"The gods who venerate awakening
Are all present at the seat of awakening.
They await you, thinking:
'We shall witness his awakening.'

Demonstrate their occupation with consorts.
You, however, should be at the forefront.
Do not fall behind them!
"Remember the sweet-sounding and soft words
Of Dipankara when he gave his prophecy!
Utter now the sound of the victorious ones' voice,
The voice that is genuine and free from error!
This concludes the thirteenth chapter on encouragement.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 14 — Dreams

[The Bodhisattva takes a trip outside of the palace walls to visit the royal parks. On this trip, he encounters a sick person, an old man, a corpse, and a religious mendicant. Deeply affected by these sights, the Bodhisattva renounces his royal pleasures.]

Monks, while the divine son in this way was encouraging the Bodhisattva, a dream occurred to King Suddhodana. As he was sleeping, King Suddhodana dreamed that the Bodhisattva was leaving the palace in the quiet of the night, surrounded by a host of gods. As the Bodhisattva left the palace, the king saw that he had become ordained and was wearing the saffron-coloured robes.

As soon as the king awoke, he immediately asked the chamberlain: "Is the young Prince with the consorts?"

The chamberlain replied, "Yes, Your Majesty."

King Suddhodana, sitting in the female quarters, thought to himself: "Then the young Prince will surely leave us soon, as these omens foretell." As a sharp pain shot through his heart, he began to scheme: "My young Prince must never even set foot in the palace gardens. He must always remain inside with the maidens so that he will be addicted to their pleasures. He must never leave us!"

Then, in order for the young Prince to enjoy himself, King Suddhodana erected three palaces for each of the three seasons—hot, rainy, and cold. The Hot Season Palace was very cool, the Rainy Season Palace was both cool and warm, and the Winter Palace was naturally warm. At each palace five hundred guardsmen walked up and down the staircase. While they were ascending and descending the stairs, their calls could be heard for a distance of half a league. Everyone thought, "The young Prince will never be able to leave without being noticed."

Nevertheless all the astrologers and fortunetellers kept making the same prediction, saying: "The young Prince will leave through the Gate of Auspiciousness." So the king had massive door panels fitted into the Gate of Auspiciousness, so large that it took five hundred men to open and close each of them. The calls of these five hundred men could be heard half a league away. The king provided the palaces with the five desirable things, the likes of which had never been seen before. There were constantly young maidens around the Bodhisattva, playing their instruments, singing songs, and dancing for him.

Monks, at that point the Bodhisattva told his charioteer: "I will go to the parks, so quick, go and prepare my chariot."

But the charioteer went to King Suddhodana and told him: "Your Majesty, the young Prince wishes to visit the parks."

On hearing that, King Suddhodana thought to himself: "My young Prince has never been to the parks to see their lovely grounds. However, if I allow him to visit the parks, the young Prince must be surrounded by women. That way he can really enjoy amorous delights and surely he will not leave us then."

As King Suddhodana had such love for the Bodhisattva and wanted to please him, he dispatched bell ringers and made the following announcement to the people in his city: "Seven days from now, the young Prince will be visiting the grounds of the pleasure grove. You must all make sure that the young Prince does not catch sight of anything disagreeable, so take care that everything that is not beautiful has been removed, and every nice thing, pleasing to the senses, has been brought forth!"

Accordingly, on the seventh day, the entire city was beautifully adorned. The parks were also adorned with canopies of cloth in various colours, as well as parasols, flags, and banners. The road on which the Bodhisattva was to proceed had been sprinkled and swept, sprayed with perfumed water, and scattered with fresh flower petals. Incense burners dispensed fragrant smoke, and along the road vases had been placed and plantain trees planted. The road was shaded with silk canopies in many colours, and festooned with nets of tiny jewel bells and decorative garlands and tassels. Four army divisions had also taken position along the route, and members of the retinue were busy adorning the young Prince's consorts.

Amid all this activity, while the Bodhisattva was exiting through the eastern gate of the city on his way to the parks, through the power of the Bodhisattva the divine sons from the pure abodes emanated an old man on the road ahead. He was a decrepit old man, so skinny that the veins on his body protruded. His teeth had fallen out and he was covered in wrinkles everywhere. His hair was gray and he was hunched over like the rafters in a gable roof. Weak and broken, he had to use a stick to keep himself from falling. He was in pain and his vitality was long gone. The only sounds that emerged from his throat were a dry wheezing. As he stood there on the road, with the weight of his upper body supported by his stick, all his limbs were shaking and trembling.

When the Bodhisattva saw the man, he asked his charioteer the following, even though he already knew the answer:

"Charioteer! Who is that decrepit man?"

He is so weak, emaciated, and wrinkled;

His head is all gray, his teeth are few and far between, and his body is so skinny.

Holding his stick, he sways in discomfort from side to side."

The charioteer replied:

"Your Highness, that man is overcome by old age;

His senses are weak, he suffers greatly, and his strength and energy are gone.

His relatives despise him and no one looks after him;

Unable to function, he has been abandoned like a piece of wood in the forest."

The Bodhisattva then asked:

"Is that a practice specific to his family,

Or could that happen to anyone?"

Quick, tell me the truth!

Then I will reflect on what I hear."

The charioteer replied:

"Your Highness, that is not the practice of his caste or the state;

For all beings, old age overcomes youth.

Even your father, mother, friends, and relatives

Are not free from old age, nor is any other class of people."

The Bodhisattva then remarked:

"Charioteer! How sad; childish and ignorant beings do not see old age,

Proud and crazed as they are in youth.

I will go back now—quick, turn my chariot around!

If I shall also be old, how can I enjoy myself and play games?"

So the Bodhisattva turned his fine chariot around and returned to the city.

However, monks, sometime later, while the Bodhisattva was setting out for the parks through the southern city gate, again accompanied by a large parade, he saw on the road a man suffering from disease. His body was weak, and he was suffering greatly as he lay in his own urine and feces. There was no one to take care of him or assist him, and he was breathing only with the greatest difficulty. When the Bodhisattva saw this man, he turned to the charioteer and asked him the following, even though he already knew the answer:

"Charioteer, the body of this poor man is covered in sores and discoloured;

His senses are weak, he is crippled, and he breathes so heavily.

He is so skinny, his belly is in convulsions, and he suffers;

He is lying in his own excrement, in a revolting state."

The charioteer replied:

"Your Highness, that man is seriously ill;

Confronted by the terrors of disease, he is now on the brink of death.

The splendour of his former health is gone and his strength has been lost;

He has no protection, refuge, or sanctuary, and nowhere to go."

The Bodhisattva then exclaimed:

"Health is just like a play in a dream.

What wise person, having witnessed

Such unbearable terrors of disease,

Would have a positive view of playful games?"

And so, monks, once again the Bodhisattva turned his beautiful chariot around and returned to the city.

However, monks, sometime later, while the Bodhisattva was setting out for the parks through the western city gate, accompanied by a large parade, he saw on the road a dead man who had reached his end. The corpse was lying on a stretcher, covered by a cotton cloth. It was surrounded by a group of relatives who wailed, cried, and lamented. As they followed the deceased, they pulled out their hair, threw dust on their heads, beat their chests, and lamented loudly.

When he saw this, the Bodhisattva turned to the charioteer and asked him the following, even though he already knew the answer:

"Charioteer, who is this man carried on the stretcher?"

The other people have surrounded him,

And they keep pulling their hair, scratching their faces with their fingernails, Throwing dust on their heads, beating their chests, and crying in distress."

The charioteer replied:

"Your Highness, this man has died in Jambudvīpa;

Never again shall he see his parents, wife, or children.

He must abandon his possessions, his house, his friends, and his relatives,

And proceed to the next world, where he shall never see his relatives again."

The Bodhisattva exclaimed:

"How sad that old age destroys youth!

How sad that health is destroyed by various sicknesses!

How sad that the life of a wise man does not last long!

How sad that scholars are attached to pleasure!

"Even if there were no old age, sickness, or death,

The five aggregates would still be ridden with great suffering.

What then about old age, sickness, and death, which always occur together?"

Well then! Turn around—I will think about how to be liberated from this state."

And so, monks, once again the Bodhisattva turned his fine chariot around and returned to the city.

Monks, sometime later, while the Bodhisattva was setting out for the parks through the northern city gate, through the power of the Bodhisattva the divine sons emanated a mendicant in the street where they were passing. The Bodhisattva saw the mendicant and noticed that he was peaceful. He was self-controlled and restrained.

He had pure conduct, and his eyes did not wander but looked down ahead at a distance of six feet. His behavior was beautiful and exquisite, as was the way he walked. The way he looked ahead and to the left and right was also beautiful. When he bent and stretched his limbs, he did so in an exquisite manner. The way he wore his robes and his offering bowl was delightful to see.

When he saw this monk, the Bodhisattva turned to the charioteer and asked him the following, even though he already knew the answer:

"Charioteer, who is this peaceful and calm person?"

He walks with his eyes toward the ground at a distance of six feet.

His clothes are saffron coloured and his actions so peaceful; He carries his offering bowl and is not overbearing or haughty."

The charioteer replied:

"Your Highness, that person is what we call a monk.

He has abandoned sensual enjoyments and now acts in a very gentle manner;

He has become a mendicant and searches for peace.

Free from attachment and anger, he lives from alms."

The Bodhisattva said:

"What you say is very true, and I agree;

Wise beings always praise the life of a monk.

Such a life is beneficial for oneself and it also helps others;

It is a happy life that results in the sweet nectar of immortality.

And so, monks, once again the Bodhisattva turned his fine chariot around and returned to the city.

Monks, King Suddhodana both saw and heard that the Bodhisattva had been inspired in these ways. So in order to guard the Bodhisattva even more, he erected a perimeter wall around the palace, dug trenches, and strengthened the gates. He also posted guards, alerted his brave soldiers, and even prepared the cavalry. All of them were in full armour. In order to guard the Bodhisattva, he placed a full army division at each of the junctions by the four city gates to keep watch day and night, and told them to prevent the Bodhisattva from eloping. At the quarters of the consorts he directed everyone to continuously sing and play music, and not to stop for even a moment. "You must apply all your skills in pleasure and games!" he told them. "Use all your female trickery and keep persevering with the young Prince so that when his mind becomes attached to you, he will not want to leave for the sake of ordination!"

On this topic, it is said:

At the gates there are men fond of combat, holding their swords aloft;

There are elephants, horses, chariots, and men in armour on rows of elephants.

Ditches have been dug, and tall walls and archways with turrets have been built;

There are gates so solid that their noise can be heard for several miles.

All the Sakyas are worried and keep guard day and night;

The great noise of the powerful army is heard everywhere.

The city is in turmoil and full of terrified cries: "May the Gentle One not depart!

If the holder of the Sakya lineage leaves, this royal line will be broken!"

The women are told: "You must never stop your songs and music;

You must make him stay, so captivate his mind with your games of pleasure.

Demonstrate all your many ways of female trickery and make a good effort;

Watch over him and create hindrances so that the Gentle Being does not depart!"

THE GRAND BIBLE

These are omens that foretell the departure of the best of charioteers:

The swans, cranes, peacocks, mynas, and parrots do not make any sounds.

They sit on terraces, by palace windows, on gateways, parapets, and pedestals;

Depressed, unhappy, and miserable, they hang their heads and remain silent.

Even the beautiful lotuses in the ponds and the pools wither and die;

The foliage and the flowers in the trees disappear, and the trees blossom no more.

The strings on the lutes and the sitars break for no apparent reason;

The drums, big and small, all break when touched and emit no sounds.

The whole city is disturbed and overcome by lethargy; Nobody has any desire for dancing, singing, or making merry.

Even the king is severely depressed and given to brooding; He wonders: "Oh no, will the Sakya lineage, of such fortune, now be destroyed?"

As Gopa and the Prince lie asleep in the same bed, A dream appears to Gopa in the middle of the night.

She dreams that the entire earth with all its mountains is shaken;

The trees are rocked by the wind, and uprooted they fall to the ground.

The sun, the moon, and the stars that adorn them fall from the sky onto the earth;

She sees her shorn-off hair in her right hand, and her diadem crumbling into pieces.

Her hands and feet are cut off and she finds herself naked; Her pearl necklace and the jewel in her girdle break apart.

The four legs of her bed break off, and she ends up lying on the ground;

The beautiful and splendourous handle of the king's parasol is broken.

All her ornaments fall off and are scattered about and carried off by water;

Her husband's ornaments, clothes, and crown lie scattered on their bed.

Torches are carried out from the city, which is left behind in darkness;

The beautiful jewel lattices she sees in her sleep are broken. The tassels of pearl fall off and the ocean is stirred;

She dreams that Meru, the king of mountains, is shaken in its foundation.

These are the dreams that appear to the daughter of the Sakyas.

As she awakens with tearful eyes, she asks her husband: "Lord, what is going to befall me? Please tell me the meaning of these dreams!"

My memory is confused, and I cannot see clearly. My heart is aching!"

The Lord replies to Gopa in a voice as sweet as the nightingale, a drum, or Brahma:

"Cheer up! Nothing bad is in store for you.

Only beings who have created previous merit have such dreams;

People for whom there is suffering in store could never dream like that.

"When you dream that the earth is shaken And the mountains crumble to the earth,

It shows that gods, nagas, raksasas, and bhutas All rank you as the highest among those worthy of worship.

"When you dream that the trees are uprooted And you cut off your hair with your right hand,

It shows that you, Gopa, will quickly cut the web of afflictions

And free yourself from the web of viewing conditioned phenomena.

"When you dream that the sun and the moon fall to the ground

And that the stars fall as well, It shows that you, Gopa, will quickly conquer the enemy of afflictions

And will become worthy of offerings and praise from the world.

"When you dream that your pearl necklace is torn And that you are naked and your body is mutilated,

It shows that you, Gopa, can soon leave your female body And swiftly attain a male body.

"When you dream that the legs of your bed break off And the precious handle of the parasol is broken,

It shows that you, Gopa, shall quickly cross the four rivers And see me as the single parasol bearer in the triple universe.

"When you dream that your jewellery is carried off by water And my clothes and crown are left behind on my throne,

It shows that you, Gopa, shall quickly see me adorned with signs

And receiving the praise of the entire world.

"When you dream that billions of lights Leave the city and plunge it into darkness,

It shows, Gopa, that soon I will illuminate with the light of knowledge

The entire world, which is plagued by delusion and the darkness of ignorance.

"When you dream that your pearl necklace breaks And your beautiful golden chain is broken,

It shows that you, Gopa, shall quickly cut the web of affliction

And remove your chain of conceptual perception.

"Gopa, since you pay homage to me And always make offerings with the highest respect,

You shall never go to the lower realms or meet with suffering.

Soon you shall have happiness and fortune. "In the past I made abundant offerings;

I guarded my discipline and always trained in forbearance. Therefore whoever has faith in me

Shall find happiness and fortune. "For a limitless number of millions of eons in cyclic existence, I have trained in the perfect path to awakening.

Therefore whoever has faith in me Shall eliminate the three lower realms.

"So be happy and do not be depressed! Be fulfilled and joyful!

Soon you shall attain happiness and fortune. Gopa, with such good omens, lay down and sleep."

Those who are nourished by the splendour of merit and have merit in their heart,

Will see in their dreams splendourous signs, Which occur to supreme beings, who have accumulated virtuous karma, At the time of their departure from home.

Such a being dreams that the waters in the four great oceans Are stirred with the strokes of his hands and feet.

The entire earth becomes his bed, And the king of mountains is his pillow.

He sees in his dream a light shining forth That clears away the deep darkness of the world.

A parasol emerges from the ground and covers the entire three worlds;

Touched by this radiance, the misery of those who suffer disappears.

In his dream four white-and-black animals lick his feet, Birds of four colours change into one colour.

He climbs an abhorrent and revolting mountain of excrement,

Yet he succeeds and remains free from stains. In his dream he further sees rivers overflowing

And many billions of beings swept away. Building a boat he frees himself and can save others;

He takes them to the best of shores, the one that is free from fear and suffering.

He further sees many beings struck with illness; Their health and splendour is gone, and their strength is weak.

He becomes a doctor and dispenses many medicines, Curing billions of beings of their many diseases.

He sits on a lion throne on the central mountain; His students join their palms, and the gods all venerate him.

He sees himself victorious in the midst of a battle, With the immortals in the sky cheering him in joyous voices.

Such signs did the Bodhisattva see in his dreams, And he saw the fulfillment of his virtuous and excellent conduct.

The gods and humans who heard this were delighted and thought:

"Soon he shall become the god of humans and gods!" This concludes the fourteenth chapter on dreams.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 15 — Leaving Home

[The Bodhisattva departs from the palace to begin the life of a religious seeker on a spiritual journey.]

Monks, in the meantime the Bodhisattva thought to himself, "It would not be right if I did not share my plans with the great king Suddhodana and simply left home without his permission. It would be very ungrateful of me."

So that night when everything became quiet, he left his own quarters and entered the quarters of King Suddhodana. As soon as the Bodhisattva stepped foot on the palace floor, the entire palace became illuminated with light. The king woke up and, when he saw the light, he promptly asked his chamberlain,

"Did the sun rise? It is such a beautiful light!" His chamberlain replied: "No, my lord, it is still the middle of the night." He continued:

"My lord, the light of the sun causes trees and walls to cast shadows;

It torments and overheats the body. Also swans, peacocks, parrots, cuckoos, and wild ducks

Call out at the time of dawn. "However, Your Majesty, this light is lovely and pleasant.

It is soothing, auspicious, and does not burn; It penetrates trees and walls and casts no shadow. Someone with great qualities must have arrived here."

The king, worried, looked all around, And saw the pure being with eyes like lotuses.

He tried to get up from his bed, but did not succeed; The noble one with pure heart then felt respect for his father.

Standing in front of the king, he said: "My lord, now the time is right for me to leave home;

Please do not hinder me and don't be distraught. My king, may you, my family, and the people of the kingdom forgive me."

The king replied with tears filling his eyes: "What will it take for you to change your mind?

Will you ask me for a boon? Tell me, I will give you anything!

I am yours, and you can have the palace, the servants, and this whole kingdom."

Then, in a sweet voice, the Bodhisattva replied: "My lord, I wish for four boons. Please grant them to me!

If you are able to give them to me, you will have power over me.

You will always see me here at home and I will not depart. "I want, my lord, to be unharmed by old age;

To retain my fine complexion and youth forever; To be healthy and without disease;

And to have infinite life without death ever coming." When the king heard these words, he felt extremely sad.

"My son, you are asking for the impossible; I am powerless here.

Even the sages who live for eons are not beyond Degeneration and the dreads of sickness, old age, and dying."

"My lord, if you cannot give me these four boons— Freedom from misfortune and the terrors of sickness, old age, and dying—

Then I request of you another boon. Please listen, Your Majesty:

I wish that, after I die, I will not have to take rebirth again."

When the king heard these words from the best among men, He diminished his longing, let go of his attachment for his son, and said:

"Then go and benefit and liberate beings. I rejoice in that. May all your wishes be fulfilled."

Monks, then the Bodhisattva left and went to his own residence, where he lay down on his bed. No one had even noticed that he had left.

Monks, at daybreak King Suddhodana gathered the entire Sakya clan and announced,

"The Prince wants to abandon his home. What shall we do?"

The Sakyas replied, "Your Majesty, let us guard him. There are many of us in the Sakya clan, and he is alone. He will not be able to leave home."

Thereafter the Sakyas and King Suddhodana placed five hundred young men by the eastern city gate to guard the Bodhisattva. All the men were armed, trained in combat, skilled in archery and javelin throwing, and were as strong as powerful wrestlers. In order to further guard the Bodhisattva, each of the young Sakya men had five hundred chariots at their disposal, and along with each chariot were five hundred infantrymen.

Likewise they placed five hundred young men by the southern, western, and northern city gates to guard the Bodhisattva. All the men were armed, trained in combat, skilled in archery and javelin throwing, and were as strong as powerful wrestlers. In order to further guard the Bodhisattva, each of the young Sakya men had five hundred chariots at their disposal, and along with each chariot were five hundred infantrymen.

The elders of the Sakya clan, both male and female, were also placed everywhere at road intersections, junctions, and many highways in order to guard the Bodhisattva.

Even King Suddhodana kept watch at the palace gate, accompanied by five hundred young Sakyas mounted on elephants and horses.

Mahaprajapati Gautami said to her servants: "Light bright lamps and fasten all jewels to the peak of the banners!

Hang garlands of pearls and illuminate this entire palace! Play music, sing songs, and stay awake and alert through the night.

Guard the Prince so that he cannot leave without anybody knowing.

"Arm yourselves! Carry in your hands weapons— Swords and lances, bows and arrows, and two-pointed spears—

To guard our beloved prince. Everyone must be on high alert!

"First shut all doors, then lock them tight And place door bolts firmly across the door panels. Unless you must, do not open any door,

Otherwise this noble being might escape.

THE GRAND BIBLE

"Adorn yourselves with necklaces of jewels and pearls;
Wear flower ornaments, half-moon ornaments, and chains.
Adorn yourselves with belts, rings, and earrings;
Take care to fasten your anklets well.

"Should this benefactor of humans and gods, who acts like a proud elephant,

Try to escape in a hasty manner,
You should confront him in such a way
That no harm is done to him.
"You girls with lances in your hands,
Who surround the bed of this pure being,
You must not slip into laziness,
But watch him with eyes like a butterfly.

"In order to guard the Prince,
Adorn this palace with bejeweled lattices
And take up your flutes and play them to your fullest.
Protect the Stainless Being through the night!
"Keep each other awake
And do not take rest.

Otherwise he may certainly leave his home behind,
Abandoning the kingdom and all his subjects.

"If he were to leave his home,

Then the royal palace would become a place with no joy.

The continuity of the royal lineage, which has endured so long, would become interrupted."

Monks, at that point the twenty-eight great yaksa generals, such as Pañcika, met with the five hundred sons of Hariti and voiced their concern: "Friends, tonight the Bodhisattva will leave his home. So you should delight in making offerings to him."

Likewise the four great kings, who had entered the Adakavati Palace, told the great gathering of yakas: "Friends, tonight the Bodhisattva will leave his home. You must help him leave by carrying the hooves of his fine horse with your hands."

The gathering of yakas responded:

"Hard as vajra, and indestructible with a body as powerful as Narayana's,

Diligent and strong, this perfect man cannot be moved.

Although great Meru, the foremost mountain, may be lifted and held up in the sky,

No one can lift the mountain of a victor's qualities, founded on merit and wisdom."

Vaishnavas said:

"For people bloated with pride, this teacher will be heavy;

For those who are loving and respectful, he will be light.

If from your heart you devote yourself to him with respect,

You will find him as light as a tuft of cotton is to birds.

"I will walk in front, while you will carry his horse.

When the Bodhisattva leaves, we shall gather vast amounts of merit!"

Monks, then Sakra, lord of the gods, spoke to the gods in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three: "Friends, tonight the Bodhisattva will leave his home. So you should delight in making offerings to him."

The divine son Santamati replied: "I will cause all men, women, and children in the city of Kapilavastu to fall asleep."

The divine son Lalitavyuha offered: "I will silence all sounds from horses, elephants, donkeys, camels, cows, buffaloes, women, men, boys, and girls."

Then the divine son Vyuhamati volunteered: "I will construct in midair a fabulous road seven chariots wide, flanked on both sides by jeweled platforms, blazing with the light of sunstone gems, shaded with raised parasols, flags, and banners, strewn with various flowers, and censured from incense burners of various fragrances. On this road the Bodhisattva will set forth."

Then the king of the elephants named Airavana spoke: "Upon my trunk I will erect a mansion thirty-two leagues tall. In that mansion divine maidens can assemble to serve and venerate the Bodhisattva by making music, singing songs, and playing instruments."

Then Sakra, lord of the gods, himself said: "I will open the gates and show him the path."

Next the divine son Dharmacarin said: "I will cause the retinue of consorts to look unappealing."

Then the divine son Sañcodaka spoke: "I will help the Bodhisattva to rise from his bed."

Finally the naga kings Varuna, Manasvin, Sagara, Anavapta, Nanda, and Upananda spoke: "We, for our part, will produce cloud banks of sandalwood and let a rain of sandalwood powder descend as offerings to the Bodhisattva."

Monks, then all the gods, nagas, yakas, and gandharvas set out to do what they had promised.

In the meanwhile the Bodhisattva's mind was on the Dharma. He was resting comfortably in the music hall, surrounded by his ladies. As he reflected on the conduct of past buddhas and the way to benefit all sentient beings, he was thinking about four aspiration prayers that he had formed in the past:

"Previously I wished to become a self-appearing lord and pursue omniscience. At that time I donned the armour of the following fourfold resolve. First:

"I have seen how sentient beings suffer. So may I free and liberate those who are bound to the world and caught in the prison of cyclic existence. May I liberate sentient beings from the tight shackles and chains of craving."

Such was his first aspiration prayer from the past. Next he thought of his second aspiration prayer from the past:

"May I shine the light of Dharma for those who are thrown deep into the darkness of great ignorance within the world—for the people whose eyes are obscured by the cataract of ignorance, who lack the eye of wisdom, and who are blind with ignorance and delusion. May I raise the lamp of wisdom, which destroys the darkness for those who are blinded by ignorance. May I apply the medicine of the three gateways to liberation—the remedy that employs means, wisdom, and knowledge. May I remove the darkness of ignorance and all cataracts and faults of dullness, and in this way purify their wisdom eye."

Then the Bodhisattva thought of his third aspiration prayer from the past:

"Alas, this world has raised the banner of pride and egotism. It is obsessed with clinging to 'I' and 'mine.' People's minds grasp at the self, and false notions of a self distort their views. May I bring down this banner of pride that thinks 'I am' by showing them the noble path."

Finally the Bodhisattva thought of his fourth aspiration prayer from the past:

"Alas, this world is not at peace because of the self. The world is continually disturbed and is like a tangled mass of cords. Beings come and go. They always move and circle back and forth between this world and the next. Their spinning around knows no end and resembles a firebrand's circle. May I show them the Dharma of tranquility, which brings fulfillment through knowledge."

Right then the divine son Dharmacarin and the divine sons of the pure abodes made the retinue of consorts appear unappealing. After the divine sons had revealed the consorts' unpleasant and unattractive features, they took position in the sky and uttered the following verses:

The divine sons who have great magical powers
Spoke to the One with Elongated Eyes like a Blooming Lotus:

"How can you be so delighted

When living amid a cemetery?"

Inspired by the lords of gods,

Immediately the Bodhisattva looked around and examined the retinue of consorts.

Seeing that they had become repulsive,

He thought, "It is true, I live amid a cemetery."

When the Bodhisattva looked at the entire retinue of women, he saw that some had garments that had slipped off, some had disheveled hair, and some had their jewellery in disarray. Others had lost their head ornaments, some had ugly shoulders, while some had uncovered arms and legs. Some had repulsive expressions, while the eyes of others were crossed. Some were drooling, and others were snoring.

Some were laughing wildly, some were coughing, and others were prattling incoherently.

Some others were gnashing their teeth, and the complexion of others had changed. Some of the women had unpleasant features, such as arms that were too long. Some tossed their feet around. Some had their heads uncovered, while the heads of others were covered. The facial features of some had changed. The bodies of some looked awful, and some were even lying naked.

Some were hunched over and making gargling sounds. Some, still holding clay kettledrums, were twisting their bodies and heads. Some of the women held their instruments, such as lutes and three-stringed lutes. Others were grinding their flutes with their teeth, making crushing noises. Some were playing kampilas, nakalus, and sampas whose resonance boxes had been removed. Some had their eyes closed, some had them open, and some were rolling their eyes. Some of the women were also lying with their mouths agape.

The Bodhisattva looked at the retinue of consorts, who were lying there on the floor looking utterly revolting, and he had the impression that he was indeed in a cemetery.

On this topic, it is said:

Seeing this, the Protector of the World felt upset.

With an outpouring of compassion he exclaimed,

"Ah! This gathering is so miserable!

How could I find delight in this assembly of demonesses?

"Flawed and obscured with delusion is the judgement

Of he who thinks that worthless sense pleasures are meaningful.

Like a bird caught in a cage,

One never regains one's freedom."

Then the Bodhisattva examined his retinue of women by means of this gateway to the light of the Dharma. Next, with words spoken out of great compassion, he lamented sentient beings:

"These childish beings are killed, like the condemned at the scaffold.

These childish beings are filled with desire, like fools who are attracted to a ceramic vase filled with vomit.

These childish beings are drowning, like elephants sinking in deep water.

These childish beings are confined, like thieves in a dungeon.

These childish beings are content, like a pig surrounded by filth.

These childish beings are greedy, like a dog with a bone.

These childish beings fall, like moths flying into the candle flame.

These childish beings are trapped, like a monkey tangled in a snare.

These childish beings are caught, like fish snarled in a net.

These childish beings are cut up, like sheep on a slaughtering log.

These childish beings are impaled, like a criminal on the tip of a stake.

These childish beings are sinking, like an old elephant in a swamp.

These childish beings perish, like a ship wrecked on the ocean.

These childish beings fall, like a blind person tumbling into a deep abyss.

These childish beings are exhausted, like water running into the surface of the earth.

These childish beings go up in smoke, like this great earth at the end of the eon.

These childish beings are spinning, like the revolving of a potter's wheel.

These childish beings have lost their way, like blind people roaming the mountains.

These childish beings are tied up and run in circles, like dogs kept on a leash.

These childish beings wither, like grasses and trees in the hot season.

These childish beings diminish, like the waning moon during the dark fortnight.

These childish beings are devoured, like snakes by the garudas.

These childish beings are swallowed, like ships by huge sea monsters.

These childish beings are robbed, like a traveler by a horde of thieves.

These childish beings are broken, like palm trees in a storm.

These childish beings are killed, like someone bitten by a poisonous snake.

These childish beings are wounded because of seeking a taste, like fools licking a knife smeared with honey.

These childish beings are carried away, like wooden logs taken off by the river.

These childish beings play, like children toying with their own excrement.

These childish beings are controlled, like elephants by the mahout's hook.

These childish beings are deceived, like a simple-minded person by a charlatan.

These childish beings exhaust their roots of virtue, like a gambler losing his wealth.

These childish beings are devoured, like merchants consumed by demonesses.

The Bodhisattva examined the retinue of consorts by means of these thirty-two similes.

He contemplated the impure nature of the body and developed a feeling of repulsion, and then disgust. Next he meditated the fact that his own body was just like theirs, and so he truly saw the shortcomings of the physical body. Then he let go of his attachment toward the body, destroying his perception of it as being attractive and instead seeing it as repulsive. He saw that the body, from the soles of the feet all the way up to the top of the head, is made of filth, produces filth, and emits filth. At that moment he exclaimed the following verses:

"Grown in the fields of karma and born from the water of craving, we call it the transitory body.

This body is moist from tears, sweat, and mucus, and filled with urine and blood.

It is full of all kinds of filth, fat, pus, and brains;

It constantly leaks excrement and it stinks.

"It is made of bones, teeth, and hair, and is covered by a hairy skin;

Packed with intestines, liver, spleen, lymph, and saliva, it is weak.

It is like a machine held together by bones and sinew and adorned with flesh;

It is filled with diseases, subject to pain, and always afflicted by hunger and thirst.

"The body of beings has many cavities and transforms into old age and death.

Seeing the body, what wise person would not think of it as an enemy?"

THE GRAND BIBLE

In this way the Bodhisattva remained mindful of the body as something that must be left behind.

The divine sons, who were hovering in the sky above, asked the divine son Dharmacarin:

"Dear friend, what is this? Siddhartha dawdles and keeps looking at the retinue of consorts. He even smiles and does not seem displeased. But perhaps he is like a deep ocean that cannot be fathomed? Because isn't it true that whoever is unattached does not cling to objects? Or will he perhaps forget the promise he made when he was inspired by the gods?"

The divine son Dharmacarin replied: "Why say something like that? There is surely evidence that when he practiced awakened conduct in the past, he developed this kind of detachment. Why then would he all of a sudden become attached in this existence, which is his last?"

Monks, indeed the Bodhisattva had become certain. He was filled with distaste and had made up his mind. So without any delay, he gracefully rose from his seat in the music hall and turned toward the east. With his right hand he parted the bejewelled lattice and went onto the palace roof. There he folded his hands and, recalling all the buddhas, he bowed to them. When he looked up into the expanse of space, he saw Indra, the one-thousand-eyed lord of the gods, with a retinue of one hundred thousand gods, holding flowers, incense, garlands, perfumes, scented powder, garments, parasols, victory banners, flags, earrings made of flowers, and garlands made of precious stones. Bowing before him, Indra paid his respect to the Bodhisattva.

The Bodhisattva also saw the four guardians of the world together with hordes of yakshas, demons, gandharvas, and nagas. They all wore solid armour, corselets, and helmets. In their arms they held swords, bows and arrows, spears, javelins, and tridents. They gracefully took off their bejeweled diadems and crowns and bowed before the Bodhisattva. Then he saw two divine sons, the Sun and Moon, standing on his right and left sides. Pusa, the chief of all constellations, was also seen standing by.

Seeing that it was now midnight, the Bodhisattva called upon Chanda:

"All the auspicious signs have come together;
Without a doubt I will accomplish my wishes tonight.
Chanda, do not vacillate or delay!
Ornament the king of horses and bring it bedecked to me."
When Chanda heard these words, he felt sad and asked:
"Where are you going, you who whose eyebrows are long
And who has eyes as beautiful as blooming lotuses?
A lion among men, with a face like the autumn moon,
The moon that delights the lotuses of the night?
"Your face is like a blooming white lotus;
It is as tender as a young blue lotus.

Your splendour is like that of the sun, or well-purified gold;
It is like the newly risen and stainless moon,
"Like the fire whose flames are fed by the sacrificial butter.
Your splendour is like a blazing flash of lightning;
Your invincible gait is as graceful as that of a confident elephant;

You walk and place your feet beautifully, with the gait of a bull, a lion, or a swan."

The Bodhisattva replied:
"Chanda, tell me, for what purpose then
Have I in the past forsaken my arms and legs and eyes?
I have given up my head and my beloved wife and children,
My kingdom, wealth, gold, and clothes,
"Elephants and horses laden with jewels,
Swift as the wind and of great power.

For trillions of eons I have trained in discipline and patience,
Delighting in diligence, the powers, concentration, and knowledge.

"Therefore, once I attain the auspicious peace of awakening,
The time has come for me to free beings drowning in the ocean of old age and death."

Chanda replied: "I have heard, my Lord, that when you were born, you were brought to the priests who are skilled in making predictions based on examining signs. They prophesied before your father, King Suddhodana: 'Your Majesty, your royal line will flourish.' When King Suddhodana inquired further, the priests replied:

"Your newborn son possesses a hundred marks of merit
And blazes with the splendour of merit.

He will become a universal monarch, ruling over the four continents,

And he will possess the seven treasures.

"However, if he is confronted with the miseries of this world,

He will abandon his retinue of consorts and leave his home.

Then he will attain awakening, the state free from old age and death.

He will satisfy beings with the water of the Dharma."

"My Lord, there is this prophecy and it cannot be denied. But please listen to what I have to say, for I may be able to help you!"

"How so?" asked the Bodhisattva.

Chanda replied: "My Lord, why is it that some people go through disciplined actions and practice austerities? They wear deerskin and tie their hair in a topknot.

They wear garments made of tree bark. They let their nails, hair, and beard grow long. They take pleasure in torturing their bodies and go through various difficult torments. They take up the harshest of austerities because, as they say, they wish to attain the best among gods and humans. But you, Lord, you already possess this good fortune!

"The kingdom is prosperous, large, and peaceful, with excellent harvests. It is delightful and filled with many people. Your parks are the best of the best, full of flowers and fruits and resounding with the singing of birds. There are beautiful ponds with blue, pink, and white lotus flowers, and they resound with the cries of swans, peacocks, cuckoos, wild ducks, storks, and whooper swans. There are many flowering trees growing around the lakes, such as mango, asoka, magnolia, amaranth, and saffron trees. The parks are adorned with groves of jeweled trees that are arranged like chessboards and surrounded by jewel platforms. One sees jeweled lattices hanging everywhere. The parks can be enjoyed during any season, and they are pleasant to visit whether it is the hot season, the rainy season, autumn, or winter.

"Your palaces are like the palace of Vaijayanta, wherein one finds the peace of true Dharma, and all one's worries are gone. Since your palaces are the colour of autumn clouds, they resemble Mount Kailasa. They are adorned with verandas, arches, portals, windows, cooling terraces, and top-floor terraces. They resound with the tinkling of tiny bejeweled bells on latticed draperies.

"Your retinue of consorts is well trained. They sing songs while playing melodious music and dancing. They play tunas, panavas, flutes, lutes, wood kettledrums, reed pipes, wooden pins, cymbals, kampilas, nakalus, guitars, clay kettledrums with a good sound, and patahas. They attend upon you with comedy and dance—playful, enjoyable, happy, and sweet.

"And you, my Lord, are still young. You are in the prime of your life. You are a fresh and tender boy with black hair and a body like a lotus. You have not yet given yourself to the pleasures of the senses. So now enjoy yourself, like the lord of the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, the lord of the gods, the one endowed with a thousand eyes. We can always leave our homes later, once we are old."

At that moment Chanda spoke the following verse:
"You know the techniques of enjoyment, so relish them,
Like the powerful lord of gods in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three!

Later, when we are old,
We can practice disciplined conduct and austerities!"

The Bodhisattva replied: "Enough, Chanda! These sense pleasures are impermanent and unstable. They do not endure and are subject to change. Like the rapids of a mountain torrent, they quickly pass and are turbulent. Like dewdrops, they do not last. Like an empty fist that tricks a child, they have no substance. Like the core of a plantain tree, they have no strength. Like a vase of unbaked clay, they naturally break. Like autumn clouds, they appear one moment and vanish the next. Like a flash of lightning in the sky, they last for just the briefest time. Like a vessel filled with poison, they cause pain. Like poison ivy, they bring discomfort.

"The objects of desire, which are desperately craved by all those with immature minds, are like water bubbles, always changing. Like a mirage, they are caused by mistaken perception. They are like a hallucination that has come about through false thinking. Just like dreams, they cannot satisfy, since one is grasping at a false appearance.

Just as it is difficult to fill the oceans, desires can never be fulfilled. Like saltwater, objects of desire only make you thirstier. Like the head of a viper, they are dangerous to touch. Like a deep abyss, they are abandoned entirely by wise people. They produce anxiety, cause strife, and generate distress and faults. Knowing this, the wise ones avoid them, the clever ones deplore them, the noble ones abhor them, and the intelligent ones disparage them. Yet the ignorant embrace them, and the immature rely on them."

At that moment he spoke the following verses:
"Wise people avoid the sense pleasures like the head of a snake;

They drop them like a filthy vessel filled with excrement.
Chanda, since I understand that sense pleasures
Destroy all virtue, I do not enjoy them."

Then Chanda, wailing as if in sharp pain, with tearful eyes and stricken with agony, exclaimed the following verses:

"Why do some persevere in many austerities?

They wear deerskin and let their hair, beard, and nails grow long;

They cover themselves in tree bark.

Adhering to their practices of austerities, many have emaciated bodies.

"Some eat only vegetables, millet, and the gardula plant.

Others, who have vowed to adopt the behavior of a cow, always keep their heads down.

We, however, should become the best and most distinguished in the world;

We should be supreme universal monarchs and guardians of the world,

"Or vajra holders like Sakra, or the chief god in the Heaven Free from Strife,

Aspiring to experience the bliss of meditation in the realm of Brahma.

Perfect Being, your kingdom is wealthy, flourishing with excellent harvests.

Full of parks and palaces, it equals the Vaijayanta Palace.
"These ladies are well trained in offering pleasures,

In combination with song and the melodious sounds of lutes and reed pipes.

Enjoy these pleasures, my Lord!
If you do not leave, you will experience great delights!"

The Bodhisattva answered:
"Listen, Chanda! In previous births

I have endured hundreds of sufferings—
Imprisonment, slavery, beatings, threats—all on account of desire.

While my mind was fixed on conditioned things, I could not gain liberation.

"Under the sway of carelessness and overcome by delusion,
I was blind in the past, covered with a veil of wrong views.

Such views made me grasp at the notion of self
And perpetuate the experience of sensations, all due to not knowing the Dharma.

"All things move and change and are impermanent like clouds;

They may be likened to a flash of lightning.
They are like a dewdrop on a blade of grass, and deceptive like an empty fist;

They have no essence and no self, and lack intrinsic existence in every way.

"So my mind is not attached to objects anymore.
Chanda, bring me Kanthaka, well adorned, the supreme king of all horses.

My auspicious aspirations from the past have been fulfilled;
Overcoming everything, I will become a master of all phenomena, a king of Dharma, a sage."

Chanda replied:
"Do you not see these women with eyes like blooming lotuses,

Who are adorned with garlands of many precious gems,
Sparkling like a flash of lightning amid cloud banks in the sky,

So beautiful as they rest on their beds?
"Or those who play such sweet-sounding flutes and cymbals,
Clay drums and reed pipes, making music and song,

Accompanied by the sounds of partridge, peacocks, and cuckoos?"

Are you going to abandon this place, which is like a city of kimnaras?

"Here are many flowers, such as jasmine, blue lotuses, coral jasmine, and magnolias,

And fragrant garlands with masses of fine blossoms.
We have perfectly scented incense made of black aloe wood,
And sublime scented ointments. Do you not see all of this?

"Here you get the finest cuisine and the best dishes,
With exquisite flavors, emitting superb aromas,
Along with the sweetest beverages.

Do you not see them, my Lord? Where will you go?
"Here your garments are scented in the cold season with warming oils,

And in the hot season, with sandalwood.
You have beautiful, fine silken clothing;

Do you not see them, my Lord? Where will you go?
"Here are the five sense pleasures,

As exquisite as the divine pleasures in the god realms.
Now, enjoy and revel in them with delight and bliss!

Then later, Noble Lord of the Sakyas, you can retreat to the forest!"

The Bodhisattva replied:
"Chanda, for countless eons beyond measure,
I have enjoyed the many sense pleasures of humans and gods,
In the manner of forms, sounds, smells, tastes, and textures,
Yet I have failed to become satisfied!

"I have been a supreme royal son, so rich in power!
I have been a universal monarch, ruling over the four continents.

I possessed the seven treasures,
And I lived in the midst of ladies.

"I ruled over the Heaven of the Thirty-Three and the Heaven Free from Strife;

I left those realms and came here.
In the past I enjoyed the most sacred and superb objects
Among the gods of emanations.

"I have been the lord of demons, who controls the realms of gods;

I have enjoyed the best and most exquisite sense pleasures, but found no satisfaction.

How then would I find satisfaction now by indulging in inferior pleasures?"

This is out of the question!
 "Moreover, Chanda, I see that this world is suffering;
 It is caught in the midst of cyclic existence.
 It is a wilderness of misery, full of afflictions and evil,
 Where beings are constantly swept away.
 "Without refuge or purpose, beings wander in the darkness of ignorance and delusion;
 They suffer from the terrors of old age, sickness, and death.
 They are assailed by the sufferings attendant upon taking birth,
 And they suffer the onslaughts of enemies.
 "So I will now assemble the ship of Dharma.
 It is constructed with the strongest wood—
 Giving, disciplined conduct, patience, and diligence—
 And firmly secured by my indestructible, superior motivation.

"It is my resolve to board that ship and cross the ocean of cyclic existence.
 Then I will ferry innumerable beings across this ocean,
 This sea of suffering so hard to cross with its waves of anger,
 Monsters of passion, and maelstroms of enmity.
 "I will cross the ocean of existence,
 Infested with the monsters of harmful views and the demons of affliction.
 Once I have ferried innumerable beings across,
 I will establish them on the auspicious dry land without old age or death."
 At that time Chanda, who now cried even harder, exclaimed:
 "Lord, is your resolve based on conviction?"
 The Bodhisattva replied:
 "Chanda, listen to this about my resolve:
 I will strive to benefit and liberate beings!
 My resolve is like a mountain: immutable, unchangeable, and firm.

It is as difficult to move as Meru, the king of mountains."
 Chanda then asked, "Lord, how can you be so certain?"
 The Bodhisattva replied:
 "Even if bolts of lightning, battle-axes, spears, and arrows were to rain upon me,
 And if molten iron, blazing like a fork of lightning,
 And an erupting volcano were to drop on my head,
 I would never want to be a householder again!"
 At this moment the divine sons who were watching from the sky uttered cries of joy and rained down flowers, exclaiming:
 "With a mind not attached to any object,
 And with compassion and love for sentient beings,
 May you, the one with supreme intelligence, be victorious!
 You are the protector who grants fearlessness to beings.
 "Like the sky, which remains unattached to darkness, dust, smoke, or comets,
 The mind of the Supreme Being remains unattached.
 The Pure Being is unstained by pleasurable objects,
 Just like a lotus rising up from the water."
 Monks, when the divine sons Santamati and Lalitavyuha understood the Bodhisattva's determination, they caused all men, women, and children in the city of Kapilavastu to fall asleep. They made everything plunge into deep silence.

Monks, at that moment the Bodhisattva realized that everyone in the city was sound asleep, that the hour of midnight had come, and that the moon was in the constellation of Pusya, the lord of constellations. He was aware that right then the time had come for him to leave home.

So he told his servant: "Chanda, do not badger me now.
 Instead, without any further delay, bring me my horse
 Kanthaka, well adorned."

As soon as the Bodhisattva uttered these words, the four great kings left their residences.

They had listened to the Bodhisattva's words and had prepared to make offerings to him. Now they hurried quickly to the city of Kapilavastu.

King Dhrtarastra, lord of the gandharvas, arrived from the east together with several trillion kimnaras playing various instruments and singing songs. As soon as Dhrtarastra arrived, he began to circumambulate the city of Kapilavastu.
 Stopping in the east, from where he had arrived, he paid homage to the Bodhisattva.

The great king Virudhaka arrived from the south with several trillion kumbhandas holding in their hands various pearl necklaces. In addition they carried various precious gems, and vases filled with different types of perfumes. As soon as Virudhaka arrived, he also began to circumambulate the city of Kapilavastu. Stopping in the south, from where he had arrived, he paid homage to the Bodhisattva.

The great king Virupaksa arrived from the west with several trillion nagas holding in their hands various necklaces made of pearls and different types of precious gems.

They sent forth a gentle breeze from a rain of flowers and perfumed powders that emitted beautiful scents. When Virupaksa arrived, he also circumambulated the city of Kapilavastu. Stopping in the west, from where he had arrived, he paid homage to the Bodhisattva.

The great king Kubera arrived from the north with several trillion yakshas holding in their hands precious jewels of the type called starlight. They also carried oil lamps and lighted lanterns. They held in their hands various weapons, such as bows and arrows, swords, spears, lances with two and three points, discuses, one-pointed pikes, and javelins, and they were armed with strong armour and helmets. When Kubera arrived, he also began to circumambulate the city of Kapilavastu. Then he settled in the northern direction, from where he had arrived, and paid homage to the Bodhisattva.

Thereafter Sakra, lord of the gods, arrived together with the gods from the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, bringing divine flowers, perfumes, garlands, ointments, scented powders, garments, parasols, victory banners, flags, earrings, and adornments. When he arrived there, he began to circumambulate the city of Kapilavastu. Then he settled together with his retinue in the space above, in the same direction from which he had come, and began to pay homage to the Bodhisattva.

Monks, when Chanda heard the Bodhisattva's words, his eyes became filled with tears and he said: "Lord, you know the right time, the right moment, and the right occasion.
 However, this is not the right time and not the occasion to leave. So why do you give me the order for leaving?"

The Bodhisattva replied: "Chanda, the time has come."
 Then Chanda asked:

"The time for what, my Lord?" The Bodhisattva replied:
 "A long time ago, while seeking to benefit beings,
 I made the wish to liberate the world
 Once I attained the state of awakening beyond old age or death.
 Now that time has come."

On this topic, it is said:
 At the time when the Supreme Being departed,
 All the gods were eager to present offerings.
 All protector gods of heaven and earth came,
 As did Sakra, lord of the gods, along with his following.
 The gods of the Heaven Free from Strife, the Heaven of Joy, and the Heaven of Delighting in Emanations,
 And the gods of the Heaven of Making Use of Others'
 Emanations all came.
 So did the naga kings Varuna, Manasvin,
 Anavapta, as well as Sagara.
 The gods in the form realm also came,
 Those who always experience the peace of concentration.

They were in a hurry to make offerings to the Supreme Being.

Who is worthy of honour in all the three realms.
 Also the bodhisattvas, who were his companions in past
 actions,

Gathered there from all ten directions, saying,
 "Let us see the departure of the Victorious One,
 And make offerings to him in an appropriate manner."

The great being who is lord of the guhyakas,
 Pradiptavajra, positioned himself in the sky above.
 Wearing an armour, strong, brave, and energetic,
 He held a blazing vajra in his hand.
 Moon and Sun, these two divine sons,
 Came to stand to his right and left.

They joined their palms together
 And reflected on the Bodhisattva's departure.
 The constellation Pusya as well, with his retinue,
 Transformed his body in a majestic way,
 And stood before the noblest of men.

With a delightful voice he spoke:
 "Now that Pusya is present, this is the perfect time to leave.
 Tonight all your virtuous and auspicious prayers will be fulfilled;

I will accompany you.
 As you make an end to desire, may you encounter no obstacles!

"You have been encouraged by the divine son Sañcodaka.
 Now swiftly manifest your strength and courage,
 And liberate all beings who are oppressed by misery!
 Now is the right time for you to leave!"
 Billions of gods had gathered

And let a rain of ravishing flowers fall down.
 The Bodhisattva, for his part, sat there in the perfect cross-legged posture;
 Surrounded by gods, he was so beautiful, blazing with splendour.

In the city, all men, women, and children
 Became tired and fell asleep, abandoning their chores.
 The horses, elephants, oxen, parrots, cranes, peacocks, and mynas

Became tired and quickly slept, not noticing anything.
 Armed with lances hard as vajra, and mounted on elephants, horses, and chariots,

The Sakya youths who kept guard also fell asleep,
 As did the king, the princes, and the royal pages.
 The retinue of consorts, completely naked, were asleep and oblivious.

As midnight arrived, the Bodhisattva spoke to Chanda
 In a voice captivating like Brahma's and sweet as a nightingale:

"Chanda, bring Kanthaka, well adorned and well groomed.

Do not create obstacles and do not hesitate, if you have any affection for me."

Chanda's eyes filled with tears as he spoke to his master:
 "Great Charioteer, where will you go? What do you need the horse for?"

You know the right time and moment, and this is not the time to practice the Dharma.

The gates are shut and firmly bolted, so who will open them for you?"

Right then Sakra opened the gate merely by the power of his mind;

Chanda was thrilled at the sight, yet also sad and on the verge of tears.

"Oh no, what shall I do now? Who can help? To whom should I turn?"

Sakra will only listen to the one with such invincible power.
 "What use is this powerful army with its four divisions?"

The king, the princes, and the royal pages—none of them know what the Bodhisattva is doing.

Yasovati and the retinue of consorts are in their beds, lulled to sleep by the gods.

Alas! He is leaving. The vow he made in the past is now being fulfilled!"

Right then, billions of overjoyed gods spoke to Chanda:
 "Chanda, bring him the excellent horse Kanthaka. Do not disappoint our guide.

The gods and demigods play their millions of drums and instruments,

And still this supreme city that the gods have put to sleep does not awake!

"Chanda, look to the pure sky where a divine light shines so beautifully!

Look at the millions of assembled bodhisattvas making offerings.

Look at glorious Sakra, Saci's husband, who is at the gates with his army.

Look at the gods, demigods, and kimnaras who are here making offerings!"

Chanda heard the gods and told the horse Kanthaka:
 "You must neigh now, because here comes the supreme charioteer of beings!"

Then he adorned the horse's jasmine-coloured hoofs with gold.

Distressed and weeping, he gave the horse to He Who Is an Ocean of Qualities, saying:

"You with noble marks who benefits others, here is your horse of virtuous pedigree.

May all your past aspirations become fulfilled! Please proceed!

May all obstacles be pacified and your desired disciplined conduct accomplished!

May you grant all beings happiness, rebirth in the higher realms, and peace!"

When the Bodhisattva rose from his seat, the earth shook in six ways;

He mounted the supreme king of horses that resembled the full moon.

The guardians, with their pure lotus-like hands, then lifted up the supreme horse;

Sakra and Brahma went in the front, showing the way.

The pure and bright light sent forth by the Bodhisattva illumined the earth;

The lower realms were pacified, and all beings were happy and free from afflictions.

A rain of flowers fell, millions of instruments sounded, and gods and demigods rejoiced;

All of them circumambulated the city and departed filled with delight.

Since the Great Being was leaving, the deity of the best of cities came, feeling depressed.

Appearing before the Bodhisattva, the deity spoke to his lotus face, feeling miserable and dejected:

"If you leave, the city will become disturbed and steeped in darkness.

If tonight you abandon your palace, there will be no joy and no happiness for me.

"No longer will I hear the singing of the birds,
 Or the sweet sound of the flute in the female quarters,
 Or the sound of songs with propitious lyrics,

Which you, One of Infinite Fame, used to hear on waking up.

"No longer will I behold the assembly of divine siddhas
 Who make offerings to you day and night,
 Nor will I be able to smell any longer the divine scents,
 If you, who conquers emotions, abandons this palace tonight.

"This palace, if abandoned by you,
 Will be like a withered and used garland;
 It will seem like an empty stage.

When you are gone, all magnificence and splendour will disappear.

"You will take away the vitality and power from this entire city;

Like a wasteland, it will shine with beauty no more.

THE GRAND BIBLE

Today, disproved are the sages' prophecies
That you will be a universal monarch on earth.
"The might of the Sakyas on this earth will come to nothing,
And the royal family line will be interrupted.
The hopes of the assembly of Sakyas will be dashed entirely
If you, the great tree of merit, depart.
"Immaculate One, Faultless One, let me go with you,
Wherever you wish to depart for.
Yet please engender love and compassion,
And take one more look at this palace!"
The Intelligent One looked at the palace
And spoke in the sweetest voice:
"Until I have made an end to birth and death,
I will not return to the city of Kapilavastu.
"Until I have attained precious awakening,
The supreme level of immortality beyond old age and dying,
I will not turn my face toward Kapilavastu,
Whether I am standing, sitting, lying down, or walking."
When the Bodhisattva, the Lord of Beings, departed,
The celestial maidens traveling through the sky began to sing his praise:
"He is the marvelous object of offering and a great field of merit,
The field for those wishing for merit, and the giver of the fruit of immortality.
"Out of compassion for sentient beings, he has throughout ten million eons
Trained in generosity, self-control, and restraint, and thus attained awakening.
His discipline is pure, his conduct excellent, and his practice undiminished;
He did not pursue pleasures and enjoyments, but observed discipline.
"He always spoke patiently to protect others;
Even when his limbs were cut off, he was never angry or hostile.
Constantly diligent for millions of eons, he never felt disheartened;
Thus he has awakened and performed millions of sacrifices.
"Always in meditative concentration, his mind has become calm and tranquil;
Since he has burned away all emotions, he will liberate millions of beings.
He possesses unobstructed knowledge and is free from conceptual thinking;
With a mind free from conceptuality, he will become a self-arising victor.
"His mind is always suffused with love, and his compassion is complete;
He possesses joy, equanimity, concentration, and knows the four immeasurables.
He is the supreme god of gods, worthy of all gods' worship;
With his pure, stainless, and sublime mind, he perfected millions of qualities.
"He is a refuge for the frightened, and a lamp for the blind;
He is a place of rest for the persecuted, and a physician for those long sick.
He is like a king, a righteous king, like Sakra with a thousand eyes,
Like the self-arisen Brahma, pure in body and mind.
"He is firm with abundant knowledge, diligent and detached;
He is a hero because he destroyed the afflictions; undefeated,
he conquers all enemies.
He is fearless like a lion and gentle like an elephant;
He is the leader of the herd like a perfect bull, always patient and without anger.
"He is bright like the moon and illuminating like the sun;
He shines like a torch and glows like a star.
He is unstained like a lotus, and his discipline smells sweet like a flower;
This teacher is immovable like Mount Meru and provides sustenance like the earth;
He is unshakable like an ocean.
"He has defeated the demon of the afflictions and the demon of the aggregates;
He has defeated the demon of death and the demon of the divine son.
He is the great leader who soon will teach the supreme, eightfold path of the noble ones
To those who are established in wrong paths.
"Free from the darkness of ignorance, he destroys old age, death, and the afflictions;
He will become the self-arisen victor, famous on earth and in heaven.
In the form of a supreme being, he is praised in infinite ways;
Through the merit of praising you, may we become like you,
the lion of speech."
Monks, once the Bodhisattva had left his home, he crossed over the lands of the Sakyas, the Krodyas, and the Mallas.
When day broke, he had arrived six leagues away from the town of Anumaineya in the country of Maineya. There he dismounted from his horse Kanthaka and, once he was on the ground, he dismissed the great assembly of gods, nagas, yaksas, gandharvas, demigods, garudas, kirnharas, and mahoragas. Then he thought to himself: "I should entrust these ornaments and the horse Kanthaka to Chanda, and then send him back."

So he summoned Chanda and told him, "Chanda, you should go back now. Take these ornaments and my horse Kanthaka and return to the palace."
At the place where Chanda left the Bodhisattva in order to return home, a memorial was later built. This memorial is still known today as Chanda's Return. The Bodhisattva then thought to himself: "With my hair this long, I cannot be a monk." So he took his sword, cut off his hair, and then cast it into the air. The gods in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three collected the hair for worship. Even to this day the gods in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three celebrate this event during the Hair Festival. At this very place another memorial was built, which today is still known as Receipt of the Hair.
Again the Bodhisattva considered, "If I am to be a monk, it would not be right to wear silken garments. So it would be good if I could find some clothes suitable for living in the forest."
The gods of the pure realms then thought, "The Bodhisattva needs saffron-coloured robes." Immediately a divine son left and manifested in front of the Bodhisattva in the form of a hunter wearing saffron-coloured cloth.
The Bodhisattva asked the divine son: "My friend, would you give me your saffron-coloured robes? Then I will give you my silken garments."
The divine son replied, "Your clothes already suit you well, and I am happy with what I wear."
But the Bodhisattva insisted: "Please, I beg you."
The divine son, still in the shape of a hunter, then gave his saffron-coloured clothes to the Bodhisattva, while he himself took the Bodhisattva's silken garments. Because the divine son was overcome with devotion to the Bodhisattva, he touched the garments to his head, holding them with both of his hands.
Then he returned to the celestial world in order to render offerings and veneration to the garments there. Chanda had witnessed the exchange of clothes, and later a memorial was erected at the site. This memorial is still known today as the Memorial of Receiving the Saffron-Coloured Cloth.
When the Bodhisattva cut off his hair and put on the saffron-coloured cloth, one hundred thousand gods felt joyous, pleased, and elated. Happy and delighted, they called out cries of joy and exclaimed:
"Friends, Prince Siddhartha has left his home. Friends, Prince Siddhartha has become a monk! He will awaken to unexcelled, perfect and complete buddhahood and will turn the wheel of the Dharma. He will liberate from birth the infinite number of beings who are born. Then he will free them from old age, death, sickness, pain, lamentation, suffering, depression, and distress, and ferry them to the other shore of the ocean of saṃsāra. He will establish them in the realm of phenomena, which is blissful, peaceful, deathless, and free from fear, suffering, harm, and stain."
These words of amazement, delight, and joy resounded all the way up to the Highest Heaven.
When the retinue of consorts did not see the young Prince, they began to search for him in the spring, summer, and winter palaces, and in his private rooms and apartments.
Unable to find him, they all began to wail like fish hawks. The ladies were overcome by extreme grief, and some cried out,
"My son!" Others called out "My brother," "My husband,"
"My lord," and "My master." Some mumbled different tender words, while others contorted their bodies in various ways and wept. Some of the ladies plucked their hair, while others faced each other and sobbed.
Some cried with rolling eyes, and others shed tears, wiping their faces with their garments. Some slapped their thighs with their hands, and others beat their chests.
Some slapped their arms with their hands, and others beat their heads.
Some covered their head with dust and wept, crying out loud. Some ladies were seen disheveling their hair, others pulling it out. Some raised their arms and lamented loudly.
Some ran headlong, like gazelles pierced by poisonous arrows, all the while crying. Some among them staggered about like a plantain tree shaken by the wind and sobbed. Others tossed their bodies around on the floor, as if they were just about to die, while some writhed on the ground, as if they were fish pulled from water, and cried. Others collapsed suddenly on the ground, like a tree that has been cut from its root, and wept.
When the king heard these noises, he asked his fellow Sakyas: "What is this loud noise coming from the ladies' apartments?"
The Sakyas looked into the matter and replied: "Your Majesty, the young Prince is not in the ladies' apartments."
The king then ordered: "Quickly close the city gates! Let us search for the Prince within the gates!" But the Prince was nowhere to be found, whether inside or outside the gates.
Maharajapati Gautami collapsed on the ground lamenting and said to King Suddhodana: "Your Majesty, get my son back quickly."

The king then sent messengers on horseback into the four directions with the order:
"Go, and do not come back until you have found the Prince!"
Since those who can read signs and the future had prophesied that the Bodhisattva would leave through the Gate of Auspiciousness, the messengers proceeded to this gate.
There they saw that a rain of flowers had fallen on the road, and they thought, "He must have left this way."
When they had traveled a little farther, they met the divine son who was carrying the Bodhisattva's silken garments on his head. Again they thought: "These are the silken garments of the Prince. Can it be that he has been killed for their sake?
Get hold of this man!"
However, right then they saw Chanda trailing behind the divine son, leading the horse Kanthaka and carrying the Bodhisattva's ornaments. So they said, "Here comes Chanda with Kanthaka. Let us not act rashly but instead question him first."
So they asked him, "Chanda, did this man kill the Prince for the sake of his silken garments?"
Chanda replied: "No, not at all. This person offered the Prince his own saffron-coloured clothes, and the Prince in return gave him these silken garments. That divine son then placed the garments on top of his head and returned right then to his celestial realm in order to venerate them."
The men questioned Chanda further: "What do you think, Chanda? Should we go after the Prince? Will we be able to make him return?"
Chanda replied: "No, you will not be able to do so. The young prince is so diligent, disciplined, and steadfast. He said that unless he awakens to perfect and complete buddhahood, he will never again enter the city of Kapilavastu. So he will not return with you. What the Prince said will happen is in fact what will happen. And why will the Prince not return?
Because of his enthusiasm, discipline, and steadfastness."
Then Chanda took the horse Kanthaka and the ornaments and went to the inner quarters. Three young Sakyas called Bhadrika, Mahanama, and Aniruddha tried for a long time to lift the ornaments, but they were unable to. These ornaments were made for someone with a body as strong as Narayana, and so other people were not able to wear them.
When Maharajapati Gautami saw that nobody could move the ornaments, she thought: "When I see his ornaments lying there, my heart is pierced with pain. I think it is better therefore to throw the ornaments into the pond." So she let the ornaments be thrown into the pond, and even to this day that lake is called the Lake of the Ornaments.
On this topic, it is said:
When the wise and courageous Bodhisattva departed from his home,
The entire city of Kapilavastu awoke from its sleep.
Everyone thought that the young prince was still asleep in his bed;
Seeing one another, they felt content.
When Gopa and the assembly of consorts awoke,
They looked at his bed but did not find the Bodhisattva there.
They let out cries that reached the king's quarters:
"Alas, we have been deceived! Where did the Bodhisattva go?"
When the king heard that, he collapsed on the ground.
He wept and cried: "Oh no, my only son!"
Many hundreds of Sakyas tried to revive him,
Sprinkling water from vases on him as he lay motionless.
Gopa had also fallen off her bed and onto the ground;
She cut her hair and took off her jewellery.
She exclaimed: "Before long we must separate from those we love.
The Guide of Beings told me that; he made me so perfectly aware of this.
"Your form is so beautiful; your faultless limbs are perfect.
So brilliant and pure; all beings cherish you.
Praised as he who brings good fortune, you are honoured in heaven and on earth.
When you left my bed, where did you go?
"Until I see the Bodhisattva with all his good qualities again,
I will not drink water, nor mead or liquor.
I shall sleep on the ground and wear my matted hair in a topknot;
Without bathing, I shall practice disciplined conduct and austerities.
"In all the parks, the leaves, flowers, and fruits are gone;
The brilliant white necklaces of pearl have faded and collected dust.
Since the most noble being has left this fine city,
The palace has lost its beauty and the city has become like a desert!
"Alas, the delightful singing voices!
Alas, the assembly of consorts with fine jewellery!
Alas, the spaces covered with golden nets!
All this I shall see no more without him, who is so full of qualities."

THE GRAND BIBLE

The maternal aunt, who also felt miserable,
Tried to console her, saying: "Daughter of the Sakyas, do not cry.

The supreme noble one among men has said in the past:
'I will liberate this world from birth and old age.'
The Great Sage, who is well trained in thousands of virtues,
Traveled six leagues during the remainder of the night.
He gave his fine horse and his ornaments to Chanda and said:

"Chanda, take these and return to the city of Kapilavastu!
Repeat the following to my parents:

'The young Prince has left. Please do not be saddened!
When he attains awakening, he will return.
Then you will listen to the Dharma and find peace.'
Chanda began to weep and spoke again to the Guide:

"Your kinfolk, the best of people, may beat me and ask,
'Chanda, where have you taken the virtuous Bodhisattva?'
But I have no ability, fortitude, and strength."

The Bodhisattva replied: "Chanda, do not be afraid.
My kinfolk will be happy to see you again.
They will always regard you as their teacher
And love you in the same way as they loved me."

Bringing the finest of horses and the ornaments,
Chanda returned to the park of the noble one among men.
The guard at the park, overjoyed upon seeing them,
Speedily conveyed the happy news to the Sakyas:

"The Prince, the noble horse, as well as Chanda,
Have returned to the park, so don't worry anymore."
When the king, who was surrounded by the retinue of Sakyas, heard this,

He became exhilarated and quickly went to the park.
But Gopa, knowing the intelligence and steadfastness of the Bodhisattva,

Was not thrilled, and did not trust these words. She thought:

"It is wrong to assume that the Prince returned here Before having attained awakening."
When the king saw only the horse Kanthaka and Chanda,
He cried out and collapsed on the ground.

"Alas, my son, so talented in playing music and singing songs,

Where have you gone, abandoning this kingdom?
Chanda, now explain to me truly, right here,
Where did the Bodhisattva go, and what are his plans?
Who opened the gate for him, who led him away?
How did the gods make offerings to him?"

Chanda replied, "Powerful king, listen to me.
At night, when the old and young in this city were deeply asleep,

The Bodhisattva told me in a soft and gentle voice,
'Chanda, quickly bring me the king of horses.'
"I tried to wake up the assembly of men and ladies,
But they were so sound asleep that they did not hear my words.

With tears I had to bring him the king of all horses.
I then told him, 'Benefactor of Beings, go wherever you please.'

"Sakra opened the gates that were fitted with a lock;
The guardians of the world tightly held the horse's hoofs.
When the hero mounted the horse, the trichilocosm shook;
The road on which he traveled through the sky was very broad indeed.

"A bright light appeared, which dispelled the pitch-black darkness;
Flowers fell, and the sound of hundreds of musical instruments was heard.

The gods and divine maidens offered him praises
As he moved through the sky surrounded by a celestial retinue."

Then Chanda took the noble horse and the ornaments with him

And went into the ladies' quarters, weeping.
When Gopa saw Chanda and the noble horse,
She fainted and collapsed on the ground.
Startled, the large gathering of women
Brought water, washed her, and called out:

"May our Sakya princess not die now!
It would be too much to bear if we lost two loved ones!"
The dejected princess of the Sakyas gathered her strength
And embraced the neck of the noble king of horses.

Recalling the games of love from the past,
She was overcome by sorrow and cried out:
"Alas, you gave me joy!

Alas, noble man whose face is like the spotless moon!
Alas, my most noble of men!
Alas, you with excellent marks, so stainless and splendid!
"Alas, my wellborn man with a perfect body,
Well formed and tapering, you are unequalled.

Alas, my lord full of supreme qualities,
Venerated by humans and gods alike and full of great compassion.

"Alas, my powerful man, who is as strong as Narayana,
You conquer the hordes of demons.
Alas, my gentle love with a voice as sweet as Brahma's

And as soft as the sound of a nightingale.
"Alas, my man of limitless renown,
You have emerged from hundreds of virtues and have stainless merit!

Alas, you are my love with glory beyond limits!
Adorned with good qualities, you delight the sages!
"Alas, my handsome love, who was born in the sublime forest of Lumbini,

Which resounds with the buzzing of bees.
Alas, my dear one, renowned in heaven and on earth,
You who are a revered tree of wisdom.
"Alas, my sweet-tasting man, with lips like the bimba fruit,
With eyes like a lotus and skin of golden hue.

Alas, my dear one with spotless teeth,
As white as cow's milk or snow.
"Alas, my dear one with a beautiful nose, beautiful eyebrows,

And the stainless circling hair between your brows.
Alas, my dear one with shoulders so well formed,
With a waist like a bow, legs like a deer, and rounded hips.
"Alas, my man with thighs like the trunk of an elephant,
With fair hands and feet, and with copper-coloured nails.

All these beautiful attributes were formed by your merit
And delighted the king.
"Alas, you were my melodious song and music,
And a balm obtained from exquisite flowers in the best of seasons.

Alas, you were to me the scent of flowers;
You brought delight to the retinue of consorts with song and music.

"Alas, fine Kanthaka, my husband's companion!
Where did you carry him?
Alas, Chanda, don't you have any compassion?
Why did you not wake us when the best of men was leaving?"

"Today the compassionate guide
Of those who need guidance has left this noble city.
Why did you not tell us
That our benefactor was leaving?"

"How did our benefactor leave?
And who helped him escape from the capital?
In which direction has he gone?"

Fortunate are the deities of the forest groves who are now his companions.
"Chanda, I am miserable, for I had been showed a treasure.
Yet now, since it is like my eyes have been gouged, restore my sight!

Chanda, the victorious ones always teach
That one's parents are to be honoured.
"If he abandoned them, needless to mention
That he would leave the pleasures of love with a woman!
Alas, to separate from those we love
Is like watching a play—nothing endures!

"Because of grasping at concepts, childish beings hold mistaken views;
This is why they have to take birth and die.
In the past he taught that all who are conditioned by birth and death
Have no friends whatsoever.

"So may his wishes be fulfilled and may he,
Under the best of trees, attain supreme and noble awakening.
When he has attained stainless awakening,
May he return to this noble city!"

When Chanda heard Gopa's words,
He felt deeply unhappy.
He said in a voice choked with tears:
"Gopa, listen to my words.

"Around midnight, when the gathering of ladies
Were deeply asleep, secretly
The One Elevated with Hundreds of Merits
Told me to bring his horse Kanthaka.
"When I heard his words,
I immediately looked at you, asleep on your bed,
And I shouted aloud to you, Gopa,
"Your beloved is about to leave, get up!"

"But the gods blocked my words,
And so not even one lady awoke.
Weeping, I adorned that king of horses
And gave it to the most exalted among men.

"Kanthaka then neighed with his fierce energy,
And although the sound could be heard for a mile,
Nobody in our fine city heard it,
Having been lulled to sleep by the gods.
"As the hooves of Kanthaka—
Covered with gold, silver, and precious gems—struck the earth,

The earth gave off a terrible and beautiful sound,
And yet nobody could hear it.
"At that time the constellation of Pusya had arisen,
And the moon and the stars were shining in the sky.
From the sky tens of millions of gods folded their hands,
Bowed to him, and offered prostrations.

"With the assembly of yakshas and raksasas in attendance,
The four guardians of the world, who possess great magical power,
Lifted the hooves of Kanthaka with their hands
That were as spotless and pure as the anthers of a lotus flower.

"The Lord elevated with hundreds of merits
Mounted the horse and resembled a red lotus and a jasmine flower.
At that time the earth shook in six different ways,
And the buddha realms were pervaded with stainless light.
"Then the god Sakra, the husband of Saci,
And the principal of all gods, opened the gates.
A hundred million gods preceded the Bodhisattva,
And the nagas and gods offered him their veneration as he left.

"The noble Kanthaka, at a mere sign,
Carried the protector of this world across the sky.
Gatherings of gods and demigods, along with Sakra, Escorted the Bliss-Gone One as he was leaving.
"The divine maidens, so skilled in playing music,
Praised the qualities of the Bodhisattva.
They all gave Kanthaka strength
As they sang to him in the most delightful and touching way:

"Kanthaka, carry the guide of this world!
Be swift and don't feel sad!
When you assist the protector of this world,
You are free from the dangers of the lower realms and difficult rebirths.'

"Each of the gods also expressed this desire, saying:
'I also want to carry the guide of this world.'
There was not a place to be found
Not walked upon by the millions of gods, who said:
"Kanthaka, look at the path prepared for you in the sky!
It is so bright and beautiful.
Its bejeweled ledges are ornamented in various ways,
And it is censured with divine incense based on supreme essences.

"Kanthaka, because of your meritorious deed,
You will be magically reborn in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three.
As divine maidens surround you and attend to you,
You will delight in divine sense pleasures.'
"Gopa, do not shed any more tears!
Be happy and rejoice!
Before long you will witness the best among men attaining awakening.
You will see him honoured and served by the immortals.
"Gopa, one should never shed tears over people
Who do such excellent deeds!
Instead, rejoice in He Who Is Elevated by Hundreds of Splendours and Merits,
And do not weep anymore!
"Gopa, even if I were to speak for seven days
About the offerings that humans and gods arranged
At the time of our King's departure from home,
I would not be able to cover it all.
"You have served and paid respect
To the One Who Benefits Beings;
Thus you will find supreme and inconceivable attainment.
I believe that you shall become just like him, the most noble being!"
This concludes the fifteenth chapter on leaving home.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 16 — The Visit of King Bimbisara

[The Bodhisattva seeks out the foremost spiritual teachers of his day, and he quickly surpasses each of his teachers in understanding and meditative concentration. His extraordinary charisma also attracts many beings, such as the king of Magadhā, who requests the Bodhisattva to take up residence in his kingdom, but without success.]

Monks, through the blessing of the Bodhisattva, Chanda told King Suddhodana, the Sakya princess Gopa, the retinue of consorts, and everyone else among the Sakyas what had happened in order to alleviate their suffering.

Monks, the Bodhisattva first gave his silken robes to a divine son in the form of a hunter, and then he donned the hunter's saffron-coloured robes. He adopted the lifestyle of a renunciate in order to act in agreement with the perception of worldly people, and also because he felt compassion for others and wished to mature them.

The Bodhisattva then went to the hermitage of a Brahmin woman called Saki. The woman invited the Bodhisattva to stay and have a meal. Next the Bodhisattva went to the hermitage of a Brahmin woman called Padma, who also invited the Bodhisattva to stay for a meal. Later he went to the hermitage of a sagely priest called Raivata, who offered the Bodhisattva hospitality in the same way. Likewise Rajaka, the son of Datrmadandika, also invited him as a guest. Monks, in this way the Bodhisattva slowly made his way to the city of Vaisali.

THE GRAND BIBLE

At that time Arada Kalapa had arrived in Vaisali, where he resided together with a Saṅgha of listeners and three hundred students, to whom he taught the practices that actualize the state of utter absence. When Arada Kalapa saw the Bodhisattva approaching in the distance, he was amazed and told his students: "Oh, look at his figure!"

The students replied: "Yes, we see him. He is amazing."

Monks, I walked up to where Arada Kalapa was staying and addressed him in the following way: "Arada Kalapa, I have come to learn spiritual practices from you."

Arada Kalapa replied: "Gautama, I shall give you a teaching through which a faithful person of good family can accomplish omniscience with very little hardship."

Monks, I then thought to myself: "I have faith. I am also diligent. I am mindful and I can practise absorption. I also have knowledge. So therefore, in order to master and actualise that teaching, I will practice on my own in a solitary place, without getting distracted."

Monks, I then practiced on my own in solitude with carefulness and diligence. And indeed, with only little hardship, I was able to understand and actualize the teaching.

Monks, I then went to Arada Kalapa and asked him: "Arada Kalapa, you have understood and actualised this teaching, isn't that true?"

"Yes, Gautama, indeed I have," he replied.

I then told him: "I have also understood and actualised this teaching."

Arada Kalapa replied: "Well then, Gautama, whatever teaching I know, you also know. And whatever you know, I also know. So now both of us should assume patronage of the students."

After he made that offer, Arada Kalapa honoured me with exquisite offerings and installed me as a teacher in residence, who would share his duties with him. Monks, I then thought to myself: "Arada's teaching does not bring freedom. It would not bring total freedom from suffering for either of us. So now I must depart and search for a better practice."

Monks, since I had now stayed in Vaisali for as long as I found enjoyable, I proceeded to the country of Magadha and found my way to Rajagrha, the capital city of that country. Once there I took up residence at Pandava, the king of mountains, where I stayed on its slope alone in solitude without any company. At that time many trillions of gods protected me.

One morning I dressed in the skirt and robes of a mendicant and, holding my offering bowl, I went into the city of Rajagrha through the Gate of Warm Water and started my alms round. I looked ahead and to both sides and proceeded in a gracious manner, moving my limbs with elegance. I carried the skirt, the offering bowl, and the monk's robes in a very beautiful manner. My senses were undistracted and my mind was not diverted by outer events. Like an image of someone who is carrying a vase filled with oil, I looked ahead at a distance of six feet.

When the people of Rajagrha saw me, they were amazed and thought: "Goodness, is that Brahma? Or perhaps Sakra, king of the gods, or Vaisravana? Or is it some kind of mountain god?"

On this topic, it is said:

Stainless and of infinite glory,

The Bodhisattva becomes a mendicant of his own will.

His mind is peaceful and his actions are gentle;

He resides on the slope of Pandava, the king of mountains.

As the Bodhisattva knows that day has broken,

He dons his robes, so beautiful to behold.

Holding his alms bowl with a humble attitude,

He enters Rajagrha on his alms round.

Like gold, he is of refined nature

And bears the thirty-two marks.

When men and women see him,

They cannot get enough of beholding him.

The streets are adorned with precious fabrics;

People move out of his way, only to follow behind him.

They ask, "Who is that being whom we have never seen before

And whose luster makes the whole city shine?"

Thousands of women stand on their roofs

And in their doorways and windows.

Filling the streets, they leave their houses empty;

Dropping all other tasks, they only stare at this perfect man.

All business and shopping comes to an end;

Even those in the bars stop drinking.

They cannot stay still in their houses or in the streets

As they behold the form of this perfect man.

Quickly one man runs to the palace

And joyfully relates the story to King Bimbisara:

"It seems that Brahma himself is doing alms rounds in our city!

Your Majesty, you are most fortunate!"

Some people say to the king that it is Sakra, king of the gods;

Others say it is a divine son from the Heaven Free from Strife.

Others say it is a god from the Heaven of Joy or the Heaven of Delighting in Emanations;

Some suggest it is a divine son from the Heaven of Making Use of Others' Emanations.

There are some who say that it is the Moon or the Sun;

Some say it is Rahu, Bala, or Vemacitri.

Still others are saying,

"He lives on Pandava, the king of mountains."

As the king hears these reports,

He is overjoyed and comes to his balcony.

There he sees the Perfect Being, the Bodhisattva,

Who shines with beauty like well-refined gold.

King Bimbisara gives the Bodhisattva some alms

And tells his men: "Find out where he goes."

Seeing that he returns to the best of mountains, they report back:

"Your Majesty, he is staying on the face of the mountain!"

Knowing that the night has passed,

King Bimbisara, surrounded by a large retinue,

Arrives at the roof of Pandava, the king of mountains,

And sees that the mountain is ablaze in glory.

He dismounts from his chariot and proceeds on foot.

With great devotion he beholds the Bodhisattva

Sitting cross-legged on a cushion of grass,

Immutable, like the central mountain.

The king touches his head to the Bodhisattva's feet.

As they discuss many issues, the king says:

"I will give you half my kingdom.

Enjoy the sense pleasures here; I will give you all you need."

The Bodhisattva replies in soft words:

"Ruler of this land, may your life be long!

I have already discarded a beautiful kingdom and become a monk

In order to search for peace with no expectations for the future."

The king of Magadha responds to the Bodhisattva:

"You are young and in the prime of life;

You have a beautiful complexion and you are strong.

Let me offer you much wealth and many women.

"Please stay in my kingdom and enjoy yourself.

When I see you, I am filled with supreme joy;

Please be my friend, and I will give you my entire kingdom.

Please enjoy its abundant pleasures.

"Please do not stay in the empty forest;

From now on, please do not sit on grass on the ground.

Your body is so young and fresh,

So please stay in my kingdom and enjoy yourself."

The Bodhisattva replies in a gentle voice,

With love and concern for the king's welfare:

"King, may fortune always be with you!

I do not seek desirable objects.

"Desire is like poison and has endless faults;

It pushes beings into hell and the realms of hungry spirits and animals.

Ignoble desires are condemned by the wise ones;

I have abandoned desire like putrid snot.

"Desires fall like fruit from trees;

They pass like clouds and rain.

Unstable and fleeting, they move like the wind;

They destroy everything that is good, and should be avoided.

"If people don't get what they want, their desires burn;

But even if they do get what they want, it is never enough.

However, when desires consume someone who is unable to handle them,

That is when these terrifying desires bring the most pain.

"Your Majesty, even if one man were to attain

All the pleasures of the gods

And everything desirable among humans,

It still would not suffice, and he would search for more.

"Yet, Your Majesty, whoever is peaceful and gentle,

Informed by the noble and stainless Dharma,

And filled with knowledge—he is satisfied.

For him desirable objects have no attraction.

"Your Majesty, if one follows after desire,

It will never end.

Like drinking salty water,

Following after desire only increases craving.

"Your Majesty, consider how unstable the body is.

There is no substance to the body—it is like a machine of suffering;

It constantly leaks from the nine openings.

Your Majesty, I have no desire for pleasures.

"I have abandoned many delights

And thousands of women so beautiful to behold.

I now wish for the perfect peace of sacred awakening.

Since I find no joy in conditioned existence, I have left it."

The king of Magadha now asks:

"Monk, where do you come from?

Where were you born? Where are your father and mother?

Are you a member of the ruling class, a priest, or a king?

Monk, please tell me everything, if you don't mind."

The Bodhisattva replies:

"Your Majesty, I am from the city of Kapilavastu of the Sakyas,

A wonder-filled city of which you may have heard.

My father's name is Suddhodana.

I renounced this city because I wished for deeper qualities."

The king of Magadha says:

"Good! We are so glad to see you!

As for your life, we too can learn from it.

Also forgive me for my earlier intention

To invite the One Free from Desire to enjoy sense pleasures.

"If you do become awakened,

Dharma Lord, please share the Dharma with me.

Self-Born One, that you now live in my country

Is for me the greatest gift of all."

Once again the king bows to the Bodhisattva's feet;

He circumambulates the Bodhisattva with the greatest respect.

Then, surrounded by his entourage,

The ruler returns to his royal palace.

The Protector of the World came to the city in Magadha;

Peacefully, he stayed as long as he wished.

When he had accomplished the welfare of gods and humans,

The Lord of Men proceeded to the banks of the Nairanjana River.

This concludes the sixteenth chapter on the visit of King Bimbisara.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 17 — Practicing Austerities

[The Bodhisattva follows Rudraka, a renowned spiritual teacher. He quickly masters the prescribed trainings, but once again he is disappointed with the teachings. The Bodhisattva concludes that he must discover awakening on his own, and he sets out on a six-year journey of extreme asceticism. These practices take him to the brink of death.]

Monks, at that time a son of Rama by the name of Rudraka arrived in Rajagrha, where he stayed with a large group of seven hundred of his students. He was teaching his students the principles of the disciplined conduct necessary for attaining the state where there is neither perception nor nonperception.

Monks, the Bodhisattva saw that Rudraka, the son of Rama, was in charge of a group, indeed a large group, and that as the head of the congregation, he was wellknown, popular, venerated by the masses, and recognized by all scholars. Witnessing this, the Bodhisattva thought to himself:

"Rudraka, the son of Rama, is really in charge of a group, indeed a large group; he is the head of the congregation and, moreover, well-known, popular, venerated by the masses, and recognized by all scholars. However, unless I begin to practice disciplined conduct and austerities myself in his presence, he will never perceive me as someone special. He will also not have an understanding based on direct perception. In this way he will never renounce his concentration, absorption, and states of equilibrium, which are fabricated, defiled, and perpetuating.

"Therefore I must first actualise these experiences myself. In that way I can demonstrate that his worldly absorptions, which are limited to concentration and which only support states of equilibrium, do not carry a result. I will go to Rudraka, the son of Rama, and become accepted as his student in order to demonstrate the superiority of the qualities of my own absorption. I will demonstrate to him that fabricated absorptions are pointless."

Monks, with this purpose in mind, the Bodhisattva went to see Rudraka, the son of Rama. When he met Rudraka, the Bodhisattva asked: "My friend, who is your teacher?"

Who taught you so well?"

Rudraka, the son of Rama, answered: "My friend, I did not have a teacher. Nevertheless I did reach a genuine understanding on my own."

The Bodhisattva then asked: "What is it you understand?"

Rudraka replied: "The way of equilibrium, which is neither perception nor nonperception."

Next the Bodhisattva asked: "Could you please allow me to follow you so that I can obtain the instructions for your path of absorption?"

Rudraka replied: "Yes indeed, I will let you follow me so that you can obtain instructions for my path of absorption."

With this the Bodhisattva went off and sat down with his legs crossed. Now, no sooner did the Bodhisattva sit down before he actualized hundreds of all the main types of worldly and transcendent equilibriums in all their many details. The reason he could do this was because he had become a master of his mind, possessing a superior accumulation of merit and wisdom, a special fruition of all his previous trainings, and a distinctive familiarity with all absorptions.

At that point the Bodhisattva arose from his seat, mindful and attentive, and went to see Rudraka, the son of Rama. He then addressed him: "My friend, is there any higher path than the state of neither perception nor nonperception?"

"No," Rudraka replied.

THE GRAND BIBLE

The Bodhisattva then thought to himself: "Rudraka is not the only one who has faith, diligence, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom. I am also faithful, diligent, mindful, concentrated, and wise." He therefore addressed Rudraka with these words: "My friend, I have now understood the teaching in which you are adept." Rudraka replied, "Well, in that case, come, we should teach everyone together." And accordingly he installed the Bodhisattva as a teacher on the same level as himself.

The Bodhisattva then said: "My friend, this path does not free the mind. Neither does it free one from attachment. It also does not lead to cessation or peace. It does not bring higher knowledge, nor does it lead to complete awakening. It does not make one a mendicant or a priest, and it does not lead to nirvana."

Monks, in this way the Bodhisattva made up his mind regarding Rudraka, the son of Rama, and his followers. He left them, saying, "This is enough; I am leaving." At that point there were five ascetic companions who were learning religious practices under the guidance of Rudraka, the son of Rama. They thought to themselves:

"Even though we have tried and persisted for a long time in this way, we have not been able to realize our goal. Yet this mendicant Gautama was able to realize it and manifest it through such little hardship. And now he doesn't want it! Surely he must be searching for something even higher than that. Surely he will become a teacher of the world. Whatever he is about to discover, he will probably share it with us." And with this, the five ascetic companions left Rudraka, the son of Rama, to follow the Bodhisattva instead.

Monks, by that point the Bodhisattva had remained in Rajagṛha for as long as he wanted, and now he left together with the five ascetic companions in order to wander through the kingdom of Magadha. Somewhere on the road between Rajagṛha and Gaya, they met a group of people who were enjoying a feast. This group called out to the Bodhisattva and the five ascetic companions and invited them to sit down and participate in the feast.

Monks, afterward the Bodhisattva proceeded through Magadha and eventually arrived at Gaya. At the peak of Mount Gaya, the Bodhisattva stayed in order to apply himself to strenuous practice. As he was staying there, three parables that he had never previously heard or thought of came to his mind. What were these three?

First he thought: "There are some monks and priests who are unable to separate their mind and body from the objects of their desire. Instead they delight in those objects and feel attached to them, long for them, wish for them, strive for them, crave and thirst for them, become senseless for them, and are burned by them. This striving after the objects of desire never brings peace. They further harm themselves and torment their bodies and end up with intense and unbearable feelings of suffering.

Therefore, in doing so, they become incapable of actualizing the noble wisdom vision that is superior to any human teaching. This is like a person who tries in vain to create a fire in order to make light by rubbing together two wet pieces of wood that have been submerged in water. He will not be able to produce fire and make light.

This is the same as the monks and priests who are unable to separate their mind and body from the objects of their desire. They delight in those objects and feel attached to them, long for them, wish for them, strive for them, crave and thirst for them, become senseless for them, and are burned by them. This striving after the objects of desire never brings peace. They further harm themselves and torment their bodies and end up with intense and unbearable feelings of suffering. Therefore, in doing so, they become incapable of actualizing the noble wisdom vision that is superior to any human teaching." This was the first example that he had never thought or heard of that came to the Bodhisattva's mind.

Second, he continued to think: "There are also monks and priests who have separated their mind and body from the objects of their desire. Still they delight in those objects and feel attached to them, long for them, wish for them, strive for them, crave and thirst for them, become senseless for them, and are burned by them. This striving after the objects of desire never brings peace. They further harm themselves and torment their bodies and end up with intense and unbearable feelings of suffering. Therefore, in doing so, they become incapable of actualizing the noble wisdom vision that is superior to any human teaching. This is like a person who tries in vain to create a fire in order to make light by placing a wet piece of wood on the ground and rubbing another wet piece of wood against it. He will be unable to produce fire and make light. This is the same as some monks and priests who have separated their mind and body from the objects of their desire. They delight in those objects and feel attached to them, long for them, wish for them, strive for them, become senseless for them, and crave for them to the extent that they never find peace.

In this way they harm themselves and torment their bodies and end up with intense and unbearable feelings of suffering, as if being burned. Therefore, in doing so, they become incapable of actualizing the noble wisdom vision that is much supreme to the highest human teaching." This was the second example that he had never thought or heard of that came to the Bodhisattva's mind.

Third, he thought: "There are also other monks and priests who have separated their mind and body from the objects of their desire. Although they also delight in those objects and feel attached to them, long for them, wish for them, strive for them, crave and thirst for them, and become senseless for them, they do find peace. Although they do harm themselves and torment their bodies and end up with intense and unbearable feelings of suffering, in doing so they do become capable of actualizing the noble wisdom vision that is superior to human teaching. They are like a person who wishes to create a fire in order to make light, and therefore places a dry piece of wood on the ground and rubs another dry piece of wood against it. For such a person the fire will ignite, and light will shine. This is how there are also other monks and priests who have separated their mind and body from the objects of their desire. Although they also delight in those objects and feel attached to them, long for them, wish for them, strive for them, crave and thirst for them, and become senseless for them, they do find peace. Although they do harm themselves and torment their bodies and end up with intense and unbearable feelings of suffering as if being burned, in doing so they do become capable of actualizing the noble wisdom vision that is much supreme to the highest human teaching." This was the third example that he had never thought or heard of that came to the Bodhisattva's mind.

Monks, then the Bodhisattva thought to himself: "I have also separated my body from the objects of desire. Although I also delight in those objects and feel attached to them, long for them, wish for them, strive for them, crave and thirst for them, and become senseless for them, I do nevertheless find peace. Although I do harm myself and torment my body and end up with intense and unbearable feelings of suffering, as if being burned, in doing so I have become capable of actualizing the noble wisdom vision that is much supreme to the highest human teaching."

Monks, in this way the Bodhisattva remained in Gaya at the peak of Mount Gaya for as long as he pleased before he proceeded by foot to the village Senapati near Urubilva. On the way he passed by the Nairāṅjana River. He witnessed its pure water and beautiful bathing areas and saw how trees and groves adorned the riverbank and the surrounding village. This made the Bodhisattva very delighted, and he thought to himself: "What an amazing place! It is so pleasant! It is a great place to stay, and it is perfect for someone of noble family who is wholly dedicated to renunciation.

Since I am wholly dedicated to renunciation, I will stay here."

Monks, the Bodhisattva continued to think: "I have been born in this world at the time of the five degenerations among beings who are occupied with lowly pursuits.

These various religious practitioners have so many orientations and views. They wholly fixate on the body. They seek to purify the body by oppressing it in various ways. In complete ignorance, they give instructions. Some, for example, make use of spells, lick their hands, remain seated, cease talking, ingest various roots, abstain from eating meat and fish, spend the summer indoors, refrain from wine and beverages and even water, and take their nourishment from one or three or five or seven houses.

"Some consume roots, fruits, water plants, kusa grass, leaves, cow dung, cow urine, milk, yogurt, butter, molasses, or seeds that have not been ground. There are others who wash and eat the leftovers that swans and pigeons throw away. Others live in villages or remote places. There are others who practice living like an ox, a deer, a dog, a pig, a monkey, or an elephant. There are some who only stand, some who don't talk, and some who hold the virasana body posture. Some live on just one mouthful of food, or anything up to seven mouthfuls. Some eat only once a day, some eat once every twenty-four hours, while others eat every four or five or six days. Others fast for a fortnight or a month, according to the moon.

"Some dress themselves in the feathers of vultures or owls, while others wear planks, muñja grass, asana bark, darbha grass, or valvaja grass. Others don a cloak made of camel wool, goat wool, horsehair, or simply a hide. Still others only put on wet clothes. Some sleep on a stool or in the water, while others sleep in ashes, on rocks, gravel, planks, thorns, grass, or sticks. Others sleep with their heads toward the ground, in squatting posture, or on the bare ground. There are some who wear one, two, three, four, five, six, seven or more pieces of clothing, while others go naked. There are some who have a ritual of bathing, and others who make a ritual out of never bathing. Some let their hair and nails and beards grow long, while others keep their hair braided in a topknot. There are also some who subsist on just a single juniper berry, sesame seed, or grain of rice.

"Some smear their bodies with ashes, soot, dead flower pollen, coal dust, dirt, and mud. Others adorn themselves with bodily hair, reeds, scalp hair, fingernails, rags, ribs, and skulls. They drink hot water, water leftover after washing rice, water filtered through a blanket, and dishwater. Some wear dyes of charcoal, minerals, or saffron, shave their heads, carry vases, human skulls, and clubs.

"In such ways do these fools believe themselves to be pure. Some inhale smoke and fire, stare at the sun, and perform the five-fires ritual. They stand on one foot, raise one hand in the air, and stay in just one spot. Such are the hardships that they undergo. They use burning chaff and coals and tandoor ovens. They walk on glowing rocks, scorching fire, or scalding water. Some go to a sacred riverbank and die there. They follow the course of such practices.

"They believe that they become pure by reciting orṃ, vasat, svadha, svaha, the benedictions, collected praises, or invocations; by repeating mantras or dharanis; or by practicing meditation. Considering themselves pure, they take refuge in and pay homage to beings that they believe to be essential, such as Brahma, Indra, Rudra, Viṣṇu, Devī, Kumara, Matr, Katyayani, Candra, Aditya, Vaisravana, Varuna, the Vasus, the Asvins, nagas, yakṣas, gandharvas, demigods, garudas, kiṃnaras, mahoragas, rakṣasas, bhūtas, kumbhanda, pretas, ganas, ancestors, pisacas, devasīs, rajarsīs, and brahmarsīs.

"They also take refuge in the elements, such as earth, water, fire, wind, and space. Likewise they resort for refuge in mountains, rivers, sources of rivers, lakes, ponds, pools, oceans, reservoirs, lotus ponds, and wells; trees, bushes, vines, grass, tree trunks; cow pens, cemeteries, crossroads where four roads meet, and markets. They pay homage to houses, pillars, and rocks; clubs, swords, bows, axes, arrows, spears, and tridents. They also believe that yogurt, butter, mustard seeds, barley, magic strings, durva grass, jewels, gold, silver, and other such items are auspicious.

"This is what these non-Buddhists rely on because of their fear of cyclic existence. In doing so, some of them think, 'Because of these methods, in the afterlife we shall find heaven and final emancipation.' In this way they go astray on errant paths. They seek refuge in that which cannot offer protection. They take as auspicious that which is not auspicious. They take as pure that which is not pure.

"However, if I now attain mastery in the prescribed practices and austerities, all the opposing views will become suppressed. I will then demonstrate to these people, who disregard karmic actions, the inescapability of the fruits of actions. And as for the gods in the realms of meditative concentration and form, if I can demonstrate a superior meditative concentration, they will become interested."

Monks, following up on these thoughts, the Bodhisattva now began a six-year period of extremely fierce prescribed practices and hardships that were intensely difficult, the hardest of all difficult practices. The reason for calling this difficult practice is because it is excruciatingly difficult, and therefore it is described in such terms.

Except for a bodhisattva who has reached his last existence and rests in equanimity in all-pervasive absorption, there is no one, human or nonhuman, who is capable of undergoing such hardships. This absorption is called all-pervasive because as the Bodhisattva rested in equanimity in the fourth absorption, from the very beginning all movements of the breath slowed down and ceased, and the absorption was nonconceptual.

There was no thought, no movement, no conceptual mind, and no change, yet it was all-pervading and not dependent on anything. Previously no student, master, solitary buddha, or bodhisattva who had taken up such conduct had ever entered this absorption. This absorption is likened to space, because like space—which is motionless, uncaused, and changeless—there is nowhere it cannot reach. In that way it is similar to space, and therefore it is described as such.

Monks, in this way the Bodhisattva displayed true wonders to the worldly ones. He did so in order to shatter the proud satisfaction of extreme practitioners, to vanquish the opponents' attacks, to attract the gods, and to correct nihilists and eternalists, who disregard karmic action. He also did so in order to declare the results of merit, to teach the results of wisdom, to distinguish the levels of concentration, to demonstrate the power and strength of the body, and to develop bravery of mind. For these reasons the Bodhisattva sat down on the rugged earth, crossed his legs, and began to punish and torment his body through his mental resolve.

Monks, for eight winter nights I punished and tormented my body. Sweat ran from my armpits and from my forehead. As the sweat fell on the ground, the drops turned into hoarfrost, heated up, and evaporated. It was just like a strong man who grabs a very feeble person by the neck and strangles him. Such was the manner, monks, in which my mind brought punishment and torment on my body. Sweat ran from my armpits and from my forehead and, as the sweat fell on the ground, the drops turned into hoarfrost, then grew hot, and evaporated.

Monks, at that point I thought to myself: "I should now practice the all-pervading absorption." And, monks, as I was practicing the all-pervading absorption, from my mouth and my nose all movement of breath ceased, and within the openings of my ears an immense sound was heard. The sound was as loud and intense as when a blacksmith's bellows is being squeezed. Monks, all the while there was no movement of my breath through my mouth and nose, there was this intense, loud noise in my ears.

Monks, I then continued to think: "I should practice the all-pervading absorption."

Since my mouth, nose, and ears were blocked, [252] the breath went up into my skull. Monks, it felt as if someone was striking my skull with a sharp spear. Monks, in that way, as my mouth, nose, and ears were blocked, my in-breaths and out-breaths were pushing up and hitting my skull.

Some divine sons noticed the suffering of the Bodhisattva and remarked:

"Oh no! It seems the young Siddhartha is dying!"

The others remarked: "No, he's not dying. This is simply how worthy ones abide in absorption."

On this occasion, they then sang these verses:

"May this son of the Sakya kings,

Who has not fulfilled his aim in the forest here,

Not pass away without fulfilling his intention,

And thus leave this triple world suffering and without a defender.

"Oh no! You are the essential being and your commitment is strong.

Protector, previously in the Heaven of Joy you invited us

To hear the gift of the sacred Dharma,

But now where is your resolve, O Pure Being?"

These divine sons then went to the gods in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three and told Mayadevi: "It seems that the young Prince is about to pass away."

Mayadevi surrounded herself with a retinue of divine maidens, and at midnight they went to the bank of the Nairanjana River where the Bodhisattva was staying. She saw how thin the Bodhisattva had become, and it appeared as if he had died. Upon seeing this, she was choked with tears and began to weep. She then sang these verses:

"When I gave birth to you, my son, in the Lumbini Grove,

Without support, like a lion, you took seven steps on your own.

You gazed in the four directions and said these beautiful words:

'This is my last birth.' Those words will now never come to pass.

"Asita predicted that you would be a buddha in this world,

But his prediction was wrong, as he did not foresee impermanence.

My son, you have not yet had the joys of a universal monarch's splendours,

And now you are passing away in this forest without attaining awakening.

"To whom can I turn to about my son?

To whom shall I cry out in my pain?

Who will give life back to my only son,

Who is barely alive?

The Bodhisattva answered:

"Who are you? You cry so heart wrenchingly,

With disheveled hair and your beauty impaired,

Lamenting your son so intensely

And throwing yourself on the ground."

Mayadevi replied:

"It is I, your mother, O son,

Who for ten months

Carried you in my womb like a diamond.

It is I who now cry out in despair."

Then, in order to console her, the Bodhisattva told her: "As for grieving for your son, there is no need to worry; your hardship will pay off. Renouncing the world for the sake of awakening is indeed meaningful. What the priest Asita predicted shall come true. Likewise the prediction of Dipamkara shall come to pass.

"It is possible that the world may break into a hundred pieces, and the jewel peak of Mount Meru may fall into the ocean. The sun, the moon, and the stars may fall to the ground. Yet although I am an ordinary person, I will not die. Therefore do not bring misery on yourself. Before long you shall behold the awakening of a buddha."

As soon as Mayadevi heard this, she became overjoyed, and the hair on her body stood on end. Sprinkling the Bodhisattva with mandarava flowers, she circumambulated him three times. Then, accompanied by heavenly music, she went back to her abode.

Monks, at that point I thought to myself: "Because some religious practitioners and priests believe that one becomes purified by eating very little food, I must also be diligent in fasting." Monks, I realized that I should henceforth live on a single juniper berry and restrain myself from eating two. Monks, you might think that the juniper berries of that time were larger than now, but that is not the case. They were just as they are now.

Monks, as I now began living on just a single juniper berry, never taking a second, my body became extremely weak and emaciated. Monks, my limbs and joints began to resemble the knots of the astaki plant or the kala plant. My rib cage resembled the sides of a crab. Like an old stable for horses or elephants where the two sides have caved in and made the inside rafters visible, the insides of my chest became visible through both sides of my ribs. My spine appeared uneven and rugged, like a braid of hair with all its ups and downs.

Just as a bitter gourd that has been cut too early withers, dries out, and develops cracks, likewise my head began to wither, dry out, and develop cracks. Just like a well during the end of summer, where the reflection of the stars has sunk and is hard to notice, my eyeballs had sunk into my head and become barely visible. My legs resembled the legs of a goat or a camel, and so it was for my armpits, belly, chest, and so forth. Monks, when at that point I tried touching my belly with my hand, I actually ended up touching my spine. I was so hunched over that I fell whenever I tried to stand. When I finally managed to get up and wipe my dust-covered body with my hands, my decayed hair fell out of my body. Previously my complexion had been beautiful and smooth, but now this radiance was all gone due to exerting myself in harsh travails.

The people who lived in the villages surrounding the area where I was practicing began to say: "Oh my, the mendicant Gautama has turned black! Have you seen, he's so dark! The mendicant Gautama has the colour of the madgura fish! Previously his complexion was so beautiful, but now it has all changed."

Monks, at that point I thought to myself: "I must apply myself to eating even less than this." I realized that I should henceforth live on only a single grain of rice and restrain myself from eating two. Monks, you may think that the rice grains of that time were larger than now, but that is not the case. They were just as they are now.

Monks, as I now lived on only a single grain of rice, my body quickly grew thinner, and people began to say: "Oh my! The mendicant Gautama has turned black! Have you seen, he's so dark! The mendicant Gautama has the colour of the madgura fish! Previously his complexion was so beautiful, but now it has all changed."

Monks, at that point I thought to myself: "I must apply myself to eating even less than this." I realized that I should henceforth live on only a single sesame seed and restrain myself from eating two. Just as before, I grew even thinner, and people continued to remark on how my previously beautiful complexion had disappeared.

Monks, I then thought to myself: "There are some monks and priests who believe that they are purified by abstaining from eating food. I should also apply myself to completely abstaining from any food." Monks, I then began a complete fast. Monks, as I now began living without any sustenance, my body became extremely weak and emaciated. Monks, my limbs and joints gradually became twice, three times, four times, five times, and finally ten times as thin as the knots of the astaki and kala plants. My rib cage resembled the sides of a crab, and it looked like a collapsed stable with rafters exposed on either side. My spine appeared like a braided tuft of hair. My skull looked like a cracked gourd. My eyeballs appeared like stars in a sunken well. Monks, whenever I thought I should stand up, I tried to do so, but my body was so hunched over that I fell every time. When I finally managed to get up with great effort and wipe my dust-covered body with my hands, my body hair, its roots rotten, came out of my body. Previously my complexion had been beautiful and smooth, but now this radiance had disappeared because of exerting myself in extreme austerities.

The people who lived in the villages surrounding the area where I was practicing began to say: "Oh my, the mendicant Gautama has turned black! Have you seen, he's so dark! The mendicant Gautama has the colour of the madgura fish! Previously his complexion was so beautiful, but now it has all changed."

During this time King Suddhodana sent a messenger every day to see the Bodhisattva.

Monks, in this way the Bodhisattva displayed true wonders to the world. He did so in order to shatter the proud satisfaction of non-Buddhists, to vanquish the opponents' attacks, to attract the gods, and to show the nihilists and eternalists, who disregard karmic action and the ripening of karmic results. He lived on just a single sesame seed, a single juniper berry, and a single grain of rice in order to demonstrate the accumulation of merit, to teach the qualities of great wisdom, and to distinguish the levels of absorption. In this way he demonstrated hardships for six years without ever weakening his resolve.

The Bodhisattva remained sitting cross-legged for six years. He simply sat the way he was, without forsaking his activity. When the sun was shining, he did not seek shade. When the shade fell on him, he did not move into the sun. Never did he seek shelter from the wind, the sun, and the rain. He never chased away mosquitoes, bees, and poisonous snakes. He did not defecate, urinate, spit, or blow his nose. Neither did he bend his limbs or stretch them out. He never lay down on his belly, side, or back.

The hot season, the winter, and the great clouds, storms, rain, and lightning of autumn all assailed the body of the Bodhisattva. In fact the Bodhisattva did not even use his hand to shelter himself. He did not block his senses, but neither did he follow after the objects of his senses. Those who passed by the Bodhisattva, such as village boys or girls, ox herders, cow herders, grass collectors, wood collectors, and those looking for dung, all thought he was a demon made of dust. They made fun of him and sprinkled him with dust.

In this way the Bodhisattva spent six years, during which time his body became increasingly feeble, weak, and emaciated. When people placed grass or cotton in his ears, it would stick out of his nostrils. When they did the same with his nostrils, the grass and cotton would emerge from his ears. When they placed things in his ears, they would stick out of his mouth. And when they stuffed things in his nostrils, they would come out of his ears and nose. Things put in his nostrils would appear out of his ears, nose, and mouth.

The gods, nagas, yakshas, gandharvas, demigods, garudas, kimmaras, and mahoragas who witnessed the qualities of the Bodhisattva watched over him day and night, making offerings and forming aspirations. While the Bodhisattva demonstrated austerities for six years, 1.2 trillion gods and humans were matured in the Three Vehicles. On this topic, it is said:

The Bodhisattva left his home

In possession of all good qualities.

In order to benefit sentient beings,

He gave rise to a skillful outlook.

"At the time of the five degenerations,

When lowly people devoted themselves to non-Dharma,

I was born in this world,

Where people endowed with leisure practice Dharma.

"The world is full of non-Buddhists,

Who act out of curiosity or for the sake of good luck.

Making their own bodies into tools,

These childish people think they are purified.

"They walk into ravines, fire, and desolate areas;

Naked, they smear themselves in soil and ashes.

In order to punish the body,

They employ the five-fires ritual.

"They commit the error of using mantras;

In ignorance they lick their hands.

Some do not take food from vases;

Others reject offerings near doors and pillars.

"Some won't take offerings where a dog lives;

Others reject places where they are told to stay or come.

By receiving a single offering from a house,

They think: 'I have become pure.'

"Some reject butter, oil, molasses, and yogurt;

Others won't eat fish, meat, and milk.

Instead they eat vegetables and grain,

Lotus roots and gardula seeds.

"Living on roots, fruits, and leaves,

They wear grass, mendicant's robes, and skins.

Still others wander naked;

Such fools think they have grasped the only truth.

"Some hold up their hand outstretched;

Others keep their hair in a braided knot.

Straying from the path,

They have lost the path, yet they hope for happy rebirths.

"They sleep on beds of grass, sticks, and ashes;

They sleep on thorns or sit upright.

Some always stand on one leg,

Staring, with their faces upturned, at the sun and the moon.

"They also venerate springs, lakes, and ponds,

The ocean, rivers, the sun, and the moon,

Trees and mountain peaks,

Rocks and soil.

"These fools use many different methods,

Trying to purify their bodies.

Because of their wrong views,

They will quickly fall into the lower realms.

"The intense hardship

That I now intend to engage in

Will consist of austerities, discipline, and adversities

That no god or human can perform.

"My concentration will be one

That even solitary buddhas cannot demonstrate.

Stable and firm like a diamond,

I will now practice the all-pervasive concentration.

"There are gods and humans

Who delight in the distorted discipline of non-Buddhists.

In order to ripen these beings,

I will now practice fierce hardship and discipline."

Sitting cross-legged

On bare ground,

He demonstrated the method of subsisting on

A single berry, sesame seed, or rice grain.

Cutting off all movements of the breath,

Immutable, he showed his strength.

For six years he practiced the supreme concentration—

The all-pervasive concentration.

Without any conceptual thought,

Immutable and mentally still,

He practiced the all-pervasive concentration

That merges with the element of space.
 He neither moved from the sun to the shade,
 Nor from the shade to the sun.
 Immutable like the central mountain,
 He practiced the all-pervasive concentration.
 He did not protect himself against the wind and the rain,
 Nor mosquitoes, poisonous snakes, or bees.
 With a completely undisturbed behavior,
 He practiced the all-pervasive concentration.
 Not merely for his own sake
 Did he practice the all-pervasive concentration.
 With compassion for others,
 He practiced for their sake as well.
 Yet village children and cow herders
 And those who gather wood and grass
 Thought that he was a demon made of dust
 And covered him in soil.
 They even covered him with impure substances
 And harmed him in many ways.
 Yet immovable and calm,
 He practiced the all-pervasive concentration.
 Neither getting up nor lying down,
 He did nothing to protect his body.
 He did not defecate nor did he urinate;
 When sounds were heard, he was neither startled, nor did he avert his gaze.
 His flesh and blood dried out
 So that the bones and tendons stuck out through his skin.
 His spine could be seen through his belly,
 Twisted like braided hair.
 The gods, demigods, yakshas, gandharvas, and nagas
 Who supported him,
 Made offerings to him day and night
 Because of seeing his qualities.
 Since his mind is like the sky,
 He practiced the all-pervasive concentration.
 "May we also quickly be like him!"
 Such aspirations did they make.
 Motivated by compassion for others,
 He sought to bring about vast benefits to the world.
 He did not practice for himself,
 Neither for pleasure nor to feel the taste of absorption.
 He overcame his opponents' attacks;
 He outshone the feeble minds of non-Buddhists.
 The actions and deeds that were described by Kasyapa
 Were now being demonstrated.
 This awakening was the same as the awakening of Krakucchanda;
 It is difficult to find even over many eons.
 In order to bring benefit to mankind,
 He practiced the all-pervasive concentration.
 There are 1.2 trillion gods and humans
 That are guided in the Three Vehicles.
 It is for their sake that the One with Excellent Intellect
 Practiced the all-pervasive concentration.
 This concludes the seventeenth chapter on practicing austerities.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 18 — The Nairañjana River

[The Bodhisattva concludes that the austere practices do not lead to awakening and, encouraged by some protective gods, he begins to eat a normal diet once again, and regains his health.]

Monks, during the six years that the Bodhisattva practiced austerities, he was continuously followed by Mara, the evil one. Yet, although Mara tried his best to harm the Bodhisattva, he never found an opportunity. As it became apparent that it would be impossible to harm the Bodhisattva, Mara, sad and dejected, finally left.

It is also expressed in this way:
 There is a pleasant wilderness
 With forest thickets full of herbs
 To the east of Urubilva,
 Where the Nairañjana River flows.
 There, for the sake of renunciation,
 The Bodhisattva persevered with continuous and stable strength.

To attain accomplishment and bliss,
 He remained calm and diligent.
 Mara approached him and said,
 With soft and pleasant words:
 "O Son of the Sakyas, get up!
 What use is there in tormenting your body?
 "Life is better for the living;
 Alive, you can practice the Dharma.
 As a living being, you can do that,
 Then later you will have no regrets.
 "But your complexion has faded and is almost gone,
 And it appears as though you're on the verge of dying.
 Death has a thousand chances,
 While life has only one.

"One who always gives
 And performs fire offerings
 Will accumulate great merit.
 Why then do you practice renunciation?
 "The path of renunciation brings only suffering
 And taming the mind is hard."
 This is what Mara said
 When addressing the Bodhisattva.
 To reply to Mara who said these words,
 The Bodhisattva said:
 "Evil one, steeped in craziness!
 You have come here with ulterior motives.
 "For you have no intent
 That would match my merits, Mara.
 If you were interested in merit,
 You would rather speak like this:
 "Since the end of life is death,
 I do not concern myself with death.
 Wholly devoted to my religious practice,
 I shall never back down.
 "If even the flow of rivers
 Can be dried out by the wind,
 Then what about the body and blood of the renunciant?
 Wouldn't that be dried out as well?
 "When his blood has dried out, his flesh will wither.
 When his flesh has wasted away,
 His mind will become yet clearer.
 He will have more dedication, diligence, and absorption."
 "Since I live like that,
 I have attained the highest perception,
 So I do not worry about my body and my life.
 Just look at the purity of my being.
 "I am dedicated and diligent;
 I have insight as well.
 In this world I see no one
 Capable of disturbing my diligence.
 "Better is death, the thief of the life force,
 Than living an unwholesome life.
 It is better to die in battle
 Than live defeated by the enemy.
 "A coward cannot defeat an army;
 Armies conquer and win respect.
 Yet a hero can defeat an army;
 O Mara, I will easily defeat you.
 "Desire is your foremost army;
 Discontent comes next.
 Third is hunger and thirst;
 Craving is your fourth army.
 "Fifth is dullness and stupor;
 Fear is said to be sixth.
 Your doubt is army number seven;
 Anger and hypocrisy come eighth.
 "Ambition, greed, and wanting praise,
 Fame obtained through deception,
 Seeking to exalt oneself
 And put down others:
 "This is the army of Mara,
 The evil friend who inflicts torment.
 Some ascetics and priests
 Appear to be caught up in that.
 "This army of yours,
 Which overcomes this world and that of the gods,
 I will destroy it with knowledge,
 Just as water destroys a vessel of unbaked clay.
 "With mindfulness as the foundation
 And knowledge as my training,
 I act carefully.
 So what will you now do, O feeble-minded one?"
 As the Bodhisattva spoke these words, Mara, the evil one, felt very uncomfortable and sad. Having lost his confidence, he disappeared.

Monks, at that point the Bodhisattva thought to himself:
 "There are monks and priests in the past, the future, and the present who cause themselves harm. They experience intense suffering from unbearable heat and go through very unpleasant experiences. In this way they suffer greatly."

Monks, I continued to think: "With these acts and methods I have not been able to manifest any true knowledge that would be higher than manmade teachings. This path does not lead to awakening. This path is incapable of eradicating the continuation of birth, old age, and death in the future. But there must be another path to awakening that can eradicate the future suffering of birth, old age, and death."
 Monks, I continued to think: "Once, when I was sitting in my father's park under the shade of a rose apple tree, I rejoiced as I attained the first level of concentration, which is free from desires and negativities, endowed with good qualities, reflective, investigative, and full of joy born out of discrimination. I rejoiced as I attained the levels of concentration up to the fourth. That, indeed, must be the path to awakening, which can eradicate the arising of the sufferings of birth, old age, sickness, and death. And so a conviction was born in me: "This is the path to awakening!"

Monks, I continued to think: "Once, when I was sitting in my father's park under the shade of a rose apple tree, I rejoiced as I attained the first level of concentration, which is free from desires and negativities, endowed with good qualities, reflective, investigative, and full of joy born out of discrimination. I rejoiced as I attained the levels of concentration up to the fourth. That, indeed, must be the path to awakening, which can eradicate the arising of the sufferings of birth, old age, sickness, and death. And so a conviction was born in me: "This is the path to awakening!"

Again I thought: "Yet this path cannot be realized by someone who has grown so weak. If I were to proceed toward the seat of awakening merely by the power of my supernatural knowledge but with my body so critically weak, future beings would not be disposed favourably toward me, and this path would not lead to awakening.

Therefore I shall begin to eat solid food again. That way I can regain my physical strength. Once I do so, I will proceed to the seat of awakening."

Monks, at that point some divine sons felt concern for me. Since they knew my thoughts, they came to where I was staying and told me: "Holy Man, don't eat solid food! We can give you nourishment through the pores of your body."

Monks, I then thought: "I took a vow to remain fasting. And in this way the people in the villages around me would know that the mendicant Gautama abstains from food. However, if these concerned divine sons were to grant me nourishment through the pores of my body, I would be the worst of hypocrites."

The Bodhisattva therefore decided to disregard the words of the divine sons in order to avoid hypocrisy. Instead he decided to begin eating solid foods. Monks, in this way the Bodhisattva arose from the seat where he had practiced discipline and hardship for the past six years, and he proclaimed: "I will now eat solid foods, such as molasses, pea soup, lentil soup, porridge, and rice!"

Monks, at that point the five ascetic companions thought to themselves: "Based on this path and these practices, the mendicant Gautama appears unable to actualise an exalted wisdom vision that is any higher than manmade teachings. Yet how can eating solid foods and leading a comfortable life be of any help? What an ignorant and childish man!" With this thought in mind, the companions left the Bodhisattva and headed toward Varanasi, where they set up camp at the Deer Park by the Hill of the Fallen Sages.

Ever since the Bodhisattva had begun his practice of austerities, ten young girls from the village had served him as a way to see him, venerate him, and assist him. At the same time his five companions had also attended him by bringing him the single juniper berry, sesame seed, or rice grain that he ate. The names of these ten village girls were Bala, Balagupta, Supriya, Vijayasena, Atimuktakamala, Sundari, Kumbhakari, Uluvillika, Jatilika, and Sujata.

These young girls now prepared various types of soups for the Bodhisattva and offered them to him. The Bodhisattva accepted these meals, but he also gradually began to go on alms rounds in the local village. In this way he regained his previous luster, appearance, and strength. People now began calling him the beautiful monk and the great monk.

Monks, every day since the beginning of the Bodhisattva's practice of austerities, the village girl Sujata had offered food to eight hundred priests in the hope that the Bodhisattva would come out of his discipline and hardship and maintain his vital functions. As she did so, she offered the prayer: "May the Bodhisattva take my food and thereby truly attain perfect and completely unexcelled awakening!"

Monks, since six years had passed, I had this thought: "My saffron robes have really aged. Perhaps it would be good if I could find some cloth to cover me." Monks, at that point one of Sujata's servants, a woman named Radha, had just died. She had been wrapped in a hemp cloth and left in the charnel ground. When I saw this dusty rag, I decided to use it to cover myself.

As I stood there, bent over with my left leg stretched out and my right hand reaching down in order to pick up the rag, one earth god called out to the sky gods: "Friends, here is a descendent of a great royal clan. He has abandoned his kingdom of a universal monarch, and now he turns his mind to a dusty rag. What a sight! Friends, this is really amazing!"

All the sky gods heard the voice of the earth god, and they passed on the message to the gods in the Heaven of the Four Great Kings. The gods in the Heaven of the Four Great Kings told the gods in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three. They in turn passed on the message to the gods in the Heaven Free from Strife, and from there the message spread to the Heaven of Joy, the Heaven of Delighting in Emanations, the Heaven of Making Use of Others' Emanations, and finally all the way to the Brahma realm. Monks, at that time, at that moment, at that very instant, this message resounded and traveled all the way to Highest Heaven: "Friends, here is a descendent of a great royal clan. He has abandoned his kingdom of a universal monarch, and now he turns his mind to a dusty rag. What a sight! Friends, this is really amazing!"

The Bodhisattva then thought to himself: "I have found this dusty rag, so it would be good if I could find some water to wash it with." At that very moment the gods hit the ground with their hands, and on that spot a lotus pond appeared. Still to this day, this pond is known as the pond where the hands struck.

Once again the Bodhisattva thought: "Now I have obtained water, so it would be good if I could also find a flat stone on which to wash this cloth." At that very moment Sakra placed such a rock before him, and the Bodhisattva now began to wash the dusty rag.

THE GRAND BIBLE

Sakra, king of the gods, then spoke to the Bodhisattva: "Holy Man, give the cloth to me. Then I will wash it." However, the Bodhisattva wanted to demonstrate the conduct of a renunciant, so he did not give the cloth to Sakra. Instead he washed it himself.

Afterward the Bodhisattva felt tired and wanted to step out of the pond. However, Mara, the evil one, felt jealous and magically raised the edge of the pond. Yet at the side of the pond was a large kakubha tree. In order to follow the worldly custom and to please the goddess of that tree, the Bodhisattva called out to her: "Listen, goddess, lower one of your branches!" The goddess lowered a branch and, as the Bodhisattva grasped it, he was lifted out of the pond. Once he was free, he remained under the shade of the kakubha tree, where he sewed the dusty rag into the robes of a monk. Today this place is still known as the sewing of the dusty rags.

At that point a divine son from the pure abodes, who was called Vimalaprabha, offered the Bodhisattva divine fabrics that had been dyed in saffron-red colour, as is suitable for a monk. The Bodhisattva accepted this gift, and the following morning he put on these fabrics, arranged them into a monk's robes, and went to the nearby village.

At midnight the gods announced the following to Sujata, daughter of the villager Nandika, in the village Senapati in Urubilva: "The one for whom you have been making offerings has relaxed his discipline and decided that he will once again eat nourishing and solid food. Previously you made the aspiration: 'May the Bodhisattva take my food and thereby truly attain perfect and completely unexcelled awakening!'"

Now that time has come, so you must do what you ought to be doing."

Monks, as soon as Sujata, daughter of the villager Nandika, heard these words of the gods, she quickly gathered the milk of a thousand cows. Seven times she skimmed the cream from the milk, until she obtained a thick, strength-giving cream.

She then poured this cream into a new clay pot, mixed it with the freshest rice, and placed it on a brand-new stove. As the milk porridge was cooking, various omens manifested. Within the milk appeared the contours of an endless knot, a simple swastika, an elaborate swastika, a lotus, a vardhamana, and other auspicious signs.

Upon seeing this, Sujata thought to herself: "The appearance of these signs surely means that the Bodhisattva will now take food and obtain unexcelled, perfect and complete awakening." At that time a fortuneteller versed in ritual and the art of reading signs came to the village and prophesied that someone would attain immortality there.

When Sujata had finished cooking the porridge, she placed it on the ground where, full of devotion, she had already prepared a seat for the Bodhisattva by scattering flowers and perfumed water. She then told one of her servants, a woman named Uttara: "Uttara, go and fetch the priest. I will stay here and look after this milk porridge with honey."

"Very well, my lady," answered Uttara, who then did as she was told. She went off in the eastern direction, but there she met only the Bodhisattva. She then went south, but there as well she met the Bodhisattva. Then she went west and north, but in those places as well she encountered the Bodhisattva. At that time some divine sons from the pure abodes had removed all the non-Buddhist practitioners, and now none of them were to be found.

When she returned, Uttara told her mistress what had happened: "Wherever I go, the only person I meet is that beautiful monk. Other than him, there are no monks or priests!"

Sujata said: "He alone is the monk, he alone is the priest! It is for his sake that I have prepared this meal. Go, Uttara, and fetch him."

"Very well, my lady," said Uttara, and off she went. When she met the Bodhisattva, she bowed at his feet and conveyed Sujata's invitation to him.

Monks, the Bodhisattva then went to the home of the village girl Sujata, where he sat down at the seat that had been prepared for him. Monks, the village girl Sujata then filled a golden vessel with the milk porridge and honey and offered it to the Bodhisattva.

The Bodhisattva then had this thought: "Sujata has offered this food, and if I eat it now, there is no doubt that I shall truly attain perfect and completely unexcelled awakening." Then the Bodhisattva had his meal. When he was done, he got up and asked Sujata: "Sister, what should I do with the golden bowl?"

She replied: "Please take it with you."

The Bodhisattva told her: "I don't need this bowl."

Sujata then told him: "Well then, do as you please. But I do not give food to anyone without also giving them a bowl."

So the Bodhisattva took the bowl and left Urubilva. Before noon he arrived at the banks of the Nairañjana River, the river of nagas. He put down his bowl and rope and entered the water to refresh himself. Monks, while the Bodhisattva was bathing, several hundred thousand divine sons came to venerate him. They poured divine aloe and sandalwood powder as well as various ointments into the river, and they scattered divine flowers of all colours onto the water. In this way the whole great Nairañjana River flowed on full of divine perfumes and flowers that rained down.

Many trillion divine sons came to collect the perfumed water that the Bodhisattva had used for bathing. They brought it with them to their own abodes in order to enshrine it in memorials and venerate it. The village girl Sujata also collected all the hair and the beard of the Bodhisattva. Thinking that it must be sacred, she took it with her in order to make memorials for veneration.

When the Bodhisattva emerged from the river, he wanted to sit down, and so he looked for a suitable place on the riverbank. Right then, a naga girl who lived in the Nairañjana River emerged out of the earth's surface and offered the Bodhisattva a throne made of jewels.

The Bodhisattva took his seat there and, while he was thinking fondly of the village girl Sujata, he drank what he needed of the milk porridge made with honey.

When he was done with his meal, he threw the golden bowl into the water without any feelings of attachment. As soon as the bowl hit the water, the naga king Sagara, full of devotion and great respect, came to fetch the bowl and bring it to his kingdom, thinking, "This is worthy of veneration!"

At that point the thousand-eyed Indra, the destroyer of cities, changed into a garuda with a diamond beak and attempted to steal the golden bowl from the naga king Sagara. When Indra was unable to do so, he changed into his own form and requested it politely. This time he received the bowl, and he brought it back to the Heaven of the Thirty-Three in order to enshrine it in a memorial for the sake of worship. In this heaven he started a religious festival called The Procession of the Bowl, observed on the days of astrological juncture. To this day the gods in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three hold an annual Festival of the Bowl. The naga girl carried off the magnificent throne in order to make a memorial out of it and venerate it.

Monks, due to the strength of the Bodhisattva's merit and the power of his insight, his body instantaneously changed as soon as he took in solid foods. In one moment his body regained its previous beautiful lotus-like luster. He now manifested the thirty-two and eighty marks of a great being as well as a halo of light, one fathom in diameter, around his body.

On this topic, it is said:

After six years of austerities, the Blessed One thinks:

"I may have the strength of concentration and supernatural knowledge,

But if I go to the king of trees in order to awaken to omniscience under its branches

While I am this emaciated, that would not be kind toward beings in the future.

"Gods and humans with little merit look for wisdom in mistaken ways;

Being in a weakened state, they are unable to attain nectar-like awakening.

Yet if I eat solid and excellent food, I will regain my physical strength;

Then I can go to the king of trees to attain omniscient awakening under its branches."

The village girl Sujata, who has done much good in the past, continuously makes offerings, thinking: "May this guide complete his discipline!"

When she hears the request of the gods, she brings milk porridge with honey;

She goes to the river and happily sits on the banks of the Nairañjana.

For one thousand eons the Bodhisattva practiced discipline, and his faculties are at peace.

He goes to the Nairañjana surrounded by hosts of gods and nagas as well as sages;

He makes the crossing and bathes with thoughts aimed at liberating others.

The Sage, pure and stainless, washes himself in the river out of love for the world.

Trillions of gods joyfully descend into the river and infuse the waters

With perfumes and scented powders so the Sacred Being can bathe.

When the Stainless Bodhisattva has bathed and rests serene on the shore,

Thousands of gods rejoice and take the bathing water as an object for venerating the Pure Being.

A divine son offers him saffron robes of beautiful stainless cloth;

Dressed in these suitable robes, the Blessed One rests on the banks of the river.

A naga girl joyfully and devotedly erects a splendid throne On which the guide of the universe peacefully sits.

Sujata fills a golden bowl with food and offers it to the Mindful One;

She prostrates at his feet, saying joyfully, "Great Guide, please enjoy this!"

The Mindful One eats as much as necessary and then throws the bowl in the river;

The highest god, the destroyer of cities, carries it off, saying, "I will venerate it!"

The very moment the Victorious One consumes solid and excellent food,

His body regains its former strength, magnificence, and splendour.

To Sujata and the gods he offers a teaching that benefits them greatly;

He, the lion with the bearing of a swan and the gait of the supreme elephant, proceeds to the Bodhi tree.

This concludes the eighteenth chapter on the Nairañjana River.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 19 — Approaching the Seat of Awakening

[Sensing that he is on the verge of attaining his goal, the Bodhisattva sets out for the bodhimanda, the sacred place where all bodhisattvas in their last existence attain full and complete awakening.]

Monks, when the Bodhisattva bathed in the Nairañjana River and enjoyed a meal, his physical strength came back to him. With a triumphant gait, he now began the walk toward the great bodhi tree. This tree was the king of trees and was found at a place characterized by sixteen unique features.

He walked with the gait of a great being. It was an undisturbed gait, a gait of the naga Indrayasti, a steadfast gait, a gait as stable as Mount Meru, the king of mountains.

He walked in a straight line without stumbling, not too fast and not too slow, without stomping heavily or dragging his feet. It was a graceful stride, a stainless stride, a beautiful stride, a stride free from anger, a stride free from delusion, and a stride free from attachment. It was the stride of a lion, the stride of the king of swans, the stride of the king of elephants, the stride of Narayana, a stride that floats above the surface, a stride that leaves an impression of a thousand-spoked wheel on the ground, the stride of he whose fingers are connected through a web and who has copper-coloured nails, the stride that makes the earth resound, and the stride that crushes the king of the mountains.

He walked with the stride of someone whose feet level off the terrain, be it sloping up or sloping down, the stride that leads sentient beings to happy rebirths through contact with the light rays that emerge from the web between his fingers, the stride that walks upon stainless lotuses, the stride that proceeds from previous wholesome actions, the stride of the previous buddha-lions, and the stride that proceeds from a stable and indestructible diamond-like intention. He had a stride that destroys all lower realms and all miserable existences, a stride that brings happiness to all beings, a stride that points out the path to liberation, a stride that renders powerless the strength of demons, a stride that suppresses evil opponents with their doctrines, a stride that removes the cataract of darkness and disturbing emotions, and a stride that undoes the workings of cyclic existence.

He walked with a gait that outshines Sakra, Brahma, Mahesvara, and the worldly protectors. His stride was that of the single lord of the great trichilocosm, the spontaneous stride that cannot be overpowered, the stride that actualises the attainment of omniscient wisdom, the stride of mindfulness and insight, the stride that leads to a happy rebirth, the stride that pacifies old age and death, the stride of stainless peace, the stride that leads to the city of nirvana, which is auspicious, stainless, and free from fear. With such a stride the Bodhisattva set out for the seat of awakening.

Monks, on the stretch between the Nairañjana River and the seat of awakening, the gods of wind clouds swept the road for the Bodhisattva, while the gods of rain clouds sprinkled his path with scented water, and scattered flowers along the way. At that point all the trees in this world of the great trichilocosm bent their crowns toward the seat of awakening. All the children who had been born on that very day now slept with their heads toward the seat of awakening. Likewise all the mountains that exist in this world of the great trichilocosm, such as Mount Meru, bowed toward the seat of awakening.

All the way from the Nairañjana River to the seat of awakening, the road had been beautified for a stretch of several miles by the gods of the desire realm. At both sides of the road, they had magically erected a railing made from the seven types of precious stones. The road was shaded, at the height of seven palm trees, with a jeweled latticework and adorned with divine parasols, flags, and banners. At a distance of an arrow's flight, they had emanated a row of palm trees made of the seven types of precious stones and taller than the railing. Between all the palm trees, jewel garlands were strung. In between each pair of palm trees, a lotus pond was built, filled with scented water, lined with golden sand, and covered in blue, yellow, red, and white lotuses. Jewel ledges and lapis lazuli staircases surrounded the ponds.

The ponds resounded with the calls of ducks, storks, swans, geese, cranes, and peacocks.

THE GRAND BIBLE

Eighty thousand divine maidens sprinkled the path with flowers of divine scent. In front of each of the palm trees was a jewel podium on which eighty thousand divine maidens stood, proffering containers with powders of sandal and aloe wood, and holding up lighted incense burners with sandalwood. On each of these jewel podiums were also five thousand divine maidens singing celestial songs.

Monks, in this way the Bodhisattva proceeded on his way, emitting trillions of light rays, while the realms shook, music played from millions of instruments, a great rain with an abundance of flowers fell, millions of silken banners fluttered in the wind, millions of drums resounded as they were beaten, and horses, elephants, and bulls circumambulated the Bodhisattva. Hundreds of thousands of parrots, mynas, cuckoos, partridge, swans, sandpipers, peacocks, and cakravaka birds were drawn into the Bodhisattva's presence. Adorned with hundreds of thousands of auspicious signs, such was the road on which the Bodhisattva traveled on his way to the seat of awakening.

On that night, the very night when the Bodhisattva set his aim on attaining full and complete awakening, the all-powerful Brahma, the ruler of the great trichilocosm, called out to his large retinue in the Brahma realm:

"Friends," he said, "you should be aware of this. The Bodhisattva, the Great Being, has donned the great armour. Without forsaking his great vow, protected by his solid armour, he is undeterred and has perfected all the conducts of a bodhisattva. He has reached the further shore of all the perfections and become a master of all the grounds of a bodhisattva. He is perfectly pure in his aspirations of a bodhisattva and joins in the five spiritual faculties of all sentient beings. He has entered the secret locations of all the thus-gone ones and is beyond all paths of demonic activity.

He is not dependent on others regarding the basis for acquiring merit. He is blessed by all thus-gone ones. He demonstrates the path to complete freedom for all sentient beings. He is a great captain who conquers the circle of Mara's army. He is the single hero of the trichilocosm.

"He has accomplished all the medicines of Dharma and is the great king of physicians, wearing a silken headband of salvation. He is the great Dharma king who shines the bright light of knowledge. He is a great meteor-like king who, like a magnificent lotus flower, is unstained by the eight worldly concerns. He never forgets the dharanis of any teaching. He is like a great ocean, free from attachment and aversion. He is immovable and unshakable like the great central mountain. He is utterly stainless, pure, and in possession of a very wholesome mind, and thus he is like a great jewel. He has become a master of all phenomena and is, in all his actions, beyond intentions.

"The Bodhisattva, who is like the great Brahma, proceeds to the seat of awakening with the desire to awaken to unexcelled, perfect and complete buddhahood in order to tame the armies of Mara. He proceeds in order to perfectly accomplish the ten powers, the fourfold fearlessness, and the eighteen unique qualities of a buddha.

His aim is to turn the great wheel of Dharma and utter the lion's great roar. With the gift of Dharma, he will satisfy all sentient beings. He will purify the eye of Dharma of all sentient beings and annihilate all his opponents together with their doctrines. He goes to the seat of awakening to demonstrate the fulfillment of his previous vows and to gain a ruler's complete mastery over all phenomena. Friends, for these reasons you should pay homage to the Bodhisattva and joyfully assist him in every way possible!"

Then at that point the all-powerful Brahma spoke these verses:

"He, by whose merits and glorious splendour the great path can be known—

Love, compassion, joy, and equanimity, as well as the absorptions and the types of higher knowledge—

Has practiced wholesome conduct for a thousand eons and now sets out for the Bodhi tree.

You should make offerings to that sage as he practices to fulfill his aspirations.

"Take refuge in him, and you will not meet or experience the fears of the lower realms or the lack of the freedoms;

Instead you will find the happiness of desire-realm gods in the vast abode of Brahma.

He went through hardship for six years, and now he departs for the Bodhi tree.

Well done! Let us all venerate this man with joy and devotion!

"He is king of the trichilocosm, the best of masters, the royal master of Dharma;

In the cities of Indra, Brahma, the Sun, and the Moon, there is no equal to him.

When he was born, one trillion worlds quaked in six different ways;

Today he sets out for the supreme magnificent tree to conquer the armies of Mara.

"The crown of his head I cannot see, nor can the others here in the Brahma realm;

His body, bearing the best of the excellent marks, is adorned with the thirty-two.

His speech is beautiful, sweet, and pleasant to hear, a voice melodious like that of Brahma;

His mind is calm and free from anger. Come, let's pay him homage!

"Intelligent ones who aim to transcend the perpetual bliss in the realms of Indra and Brahma,

Or those who wish to cut the net of the fettering vines of disturbing emotions,

Or those wishing to attain immortality without hearing about it from others, which is an auspicious solitary awakening—

If anyone desires awakening, he should pay homage, in the three realms, to this guide.

"He has renounced the earth with its oceans, along with countless precious objects.

He has abandoned palaces with their oval windows and terraces, as well as conveyances,

The land adorned with exquisite flowers, with beautiful parks, springs, and ponds.

He gave up his limbs, his head, and his eyes, and now he walks to the seat of awakening!"

Monks, the great Brahma, who presides over the trichilocosm, then made, in a single moment, all the worlds in the great trichilocosm the same. The world had now become smooth, like the palm of a hand. There was no longer any gravel or rocks, and instead the world was filled with jewels, pearls, cat's-eye gems, conch shells, crystals, corals, gold, and silver. He covered this entire world of the great trichilocosm in soft green grass, curled to the right in the pattern of a swastika, soft as the finest cloth, and pleasant to the touch.

At that moment all the great oceans had also become as peaceful as dry land, and all the beings who live in the waters had become free from any harm. When all the worldly guardians in the ten directions, such as Indra and Brahma, saw how beautiful the world had become, they decided to venerate the Bodhisattva by adorning a hundred thousand buddha realms in the same way.

All other bodhisattvas who are beyond the world of humans and gods also wished to venerate the Bodhisattva, and therefore they adorned the limitless buddha realms in the ten directions with an array of offerings. All these buddha realms, even though they were adorned in different ways, now appeared as one single buddha realm. All the space between the worlds had disappeared, as had the encircling black mountains and the smaller and greater perimeter walls. All these buddha realms could be seen permeated with the light streaming from the Bodhisattva.

At the seat of awakening, there were sixteen divine sons who guarded the place.

Their names were Utkhalin, Sutkhalin, Prajapati, Surabhala, Keyurabala, Supratisthita, Mahindhara, Avabhasakara, Vimala, Dharmesvara, Dharmaketu, Siddhapatra, Apratihatanetra, Mahavyuha, Silavisuddhanetra, and Padmaprabha. It was these sixteen divine sons, all of whom had attained irreversible patience, who guarded the seat of awakening.

As a way to venerate the Bodhisattva, they had adorned the seat of awakening. At a distance of eighty leagues, they had encircled the place with railings, built in seven rows. Palm trees were also placed in seven circles, and a sevenfold lattice with bells of precious stones encircled it. All of this was surrounded with seven threads made of precious materials.

The seat of awakening was covered with cloth made of gold from the River Jambu, a cloth studded with seven precious gems and woven with a golden thread. It was bestrewn with lotuses of gold from the Jambu River, scented with aromatic essences, and covered by a jewel canopy. All the beautiful and excellent trees that grow and are venerated in all the different worlds in the ten directions, including the worlds of gods and humans, now manifested at the seat of awakening. Likewise all the different species of flowers that grow in water as well as on land manifested there at the seat of awakening. Moreover, the bodhisattvas in all the various worlds in the ten directions now became visible at the seat of awakening, adorning the place with their immeasurable accumulations of merit and wisdom.

In this way the divine sons who guarded the seat of awakening magically manifested such displays at that place. They were so magnificent that when the gods, nagas, yakshas, gandharvas, and demigods witnessed them, they began to conceive of their own abodes as nothing more than charnel grounds. As they saw the displays, they felt great respect and exclaimed with joy: "How great! What an inconceivable manifestation of meritorious ripening this is!"

At the Bodhi tree itself there were four deities: Venu, Valgu, Sumanas, and Ojopati.

These four deities of the Bodhi tree also wished to venerate the Bodhisattva, and therefore they modeled the Bodhi tree to give it a perfect root, trunk, branches, leaves, flowers, and fruits, as well as a perfect height and circumference. It was beautiful, nice to behold, wide, and, with its height of eighty palm trees and a corresponding circumference, very imposing. This was indeed a magnificent and beautiful tree.

It was encircled by jewel platforms that were built in seven rows. Jewel palm trees were also placed around it in seven circles, and a sevenfold lattice with bells of precious stones encircled it. All of this was surrounded with seven threads made of precious materials that formed the outer ring.

Like the coral tree or the kovidara tree, this was a tree that one could never tire of beholding. This place, where the Bodhisattva was to take his seat with the intention of attaining full and complete awakening, had become the essence of indestructible diamond, harder than any diamond in the great trichilocosm.

Monks, as the Bodhisattva was walking toward the seat of awakening, rays of light streamed forth from his body. The light pacified all the lower realms and caused all unfortunate states to cease. All the painful feelings of beings in the lower realms came to a halt. All beings with impaired faculties now recovered their senses. Anyone who suffered from disease was healed. Anyone feeling discomfort attained happiness. All who were struck with fear found release. Anyone living in bondage was freed from his or her ties. Anyone suffering from poverty discovered wealth. All the people tormented by disturbing emotions found release from their anguish.

Those who were starving had their stomachs filled. All the ones who were parched were relieved of their thirst. Pregnant women gave birth easily. Those who were old and weak gained perfect strength.

At that moment all sentient beings were relieved of the harms inflicted by attachment, anger, ignorance, wrath, greed, cruelty, ill will, envy, and jealousy. At that moment no one experienced dying, moving to the next life, and taking birth. At that moment everyone engendered love, altruism, and a feeling that all beings are each other's mothers and fathers.

This can also be expressed in verse:

All the way to the hell of Ultimate Torment,

The hell beings presented a horrible sight.

These beings had their suffering pacified

And experienced feelings of happiness.

The beings born as animals,

Which harm each other in countless ways,

Were touched by the light of the Lord,

And, for their good, gave rise to a loving mind.

Spirits, as many as there are in the world,

Pained by hunger and thirst,

Discovered food and drink

Through the power of the Bodhisattva.

All unfortunate states came to a halt,

And the lower realms dried out.

All beings gained happiness

And were fulfilled with divine pleasure.

Those without eyes and ears,

And all others with impaired faculties,

Regained their full senses

And obtained beautiful limbs.

Attachment and anger

And other disturbing emotions that harm beings—

In that moment all these disturbing emotions were pacified,

And beings were filled with happiness.

The ones who had lost their minds regained their composure;

Those living in poverty found wealth.

Those stricken with sickness were healed;

Those who were bound were freed.

There was no miserliness nor animosity,

No ill will or strife.

All beings interacted in harmony,

Their minds full of loving kindness.

Just as a father and mother

Cherish their only child,

At that moment all beings felt

Parental love for each other.

The web of the Bodhisattva's light rays

Streamed out all around in the ten directions

And illuminated an inconceivable number of realms,

As numerous as grains of sand in the Ganges.

The Black Mountains

And the surrounding perimeter walls disappeared.

All the vast worlds

Now appeared as one.

They could be seen as clearly as the palm of a hand,

Composed of all kinds of jewels.

In order to venerate the Bodhisattva,

All realms were well adorned.

The attendants at the seat of awakening

Were a group of sixteen gods.

Up to a distance of eighty leagues,

They adorned the seat of awakening.

All great displays

In all the limitless millions of realms

Now manifested at this place

By the power of the Bodhisattva.

The gods, nagas, yakshas,

THE GRAND BIBLE

Kimnaras, and mahoragas
Now came to think of their celestial palaces
As nothing more than charnel grounds.
When gods and humans witnessed this display,
They were filled with amazement.
"How great is this manifestation of merit,
Which results in such an auspicious juncture!"
Without any effort,
Whether physical, verbal, or mental,
All the Bodhisattva's goals, wishes, and intentions
Were fully accomplished.
Even the wishes of others were fulfilled
Through his actions in the past.
The ripening of those actions
Now produced such perfect results.
The four deities at the seat of awakening
Adorned the seat of awakening
To make it even more supreme
Than the heavenly coral trees.
The displays at the seat of awakening
Were created by these four deities.
To describe their qualities in words
Would be utterly impossible. [F.139.a]
Monks, the light that streamed from the body of the Bodhisattva illuminated the abode of Kalika, the king of nagas. The light was pure and stainless and gave rise to joy as it satisfied the bodies and minds that it touched. It cleared away all disturbing emotions and brought joy, happiness, trust, and supreme enjoyment to all sentient beings. When Kalika, the king of the nagas, saw how the light illumined his own abode, he spoke these verses in front of his retinue:
"I see a light like that of Krakuchanda, or the brightness of Kanakamuni;
It is like seeing the stainless and faultless light of Kasyapa, the Dharmaking.
Surely a being with supreme features, helpful activity, and wisdom light is here;
That is why this abode of mine is bright and adorned with this golden light.
"Up to now, our isolated home has been filled with darkness as a result of our previous negative actions;
Even the far-reaching rays of the sun and moon do not penetrate this place.
The pure light from fire, jewels, lightning, and the stars also do not penetrate this place;
Neither do the light rays of Indra, Brahma, or the demigods shine through.
"Yet today this house is bright with a beauty that resembles the sun;
Our minds are filled with joy, and our bodies feel at ease and soothed.
Even the rain of warm sand falling on my body feels cool.
It is clear that the One Who Practiced Good Conduct for Many Millions of Eons is walking toward the Bodhi tree.
"Quick, go get beautiful naga flowers, fine and sweet-smelling cloths, pearl necklaces,
Ornaments and bracelets, powders, and our finest incense.
Offer him the melodious sounds of song and music, and beat the finest drums;
Go now! Make offerings to the benefactor who is worthy of everyone's respect."
Kalika then stood up and, with the naga daughters, looked in the four directions;
He saw the Bodhisattva, shining with splendour like the central mountain.
He was surrounded by millions of gods, demigods, Brahma,
Indra, and the yakshas;
Joyfully they venerated him and showed him the way.
The king of the nagas became overjoyed and respectfully made offerings to the Supreme
One in the world;
With devotion he prostrated at the Sage's feet and stood in front of him.
The naga daughters also joyfully and respectfully venerated
the Sage;
They scattered flowers, incense, and perfumes, and played music.
Overjoyed with the Lord's perfect qualities, the king of the nagas joined his palms.
"Guide! The best in the world! Wonderful to see your face, like the full moon!
As I saw the omens foretelling the previous sages, I see the very same signs in you.
Today you will conquer Mara's army and attain your desired state.
"This is why in the past you practiced discipline, generosity, and restraint, and gave up all possessions;
This is why you cultivated discipline, ethical conduct, love, compassion, and the power of forbearance.
This is why you were diligent, steadfast, delighting in concentration, and letting your insight blaze;
Today all your aspirations will be fulfilled and you shall become victorious.

"Since other trees with their leaves, flowers, and fruits bow to the Bodhi tree,
Since a thousand vases filled with water circumambulate
you,
Since hosts of apsaras, overjoyed, make affectionate sounds,
Since flocks of swans and cranes playfully take to the sky
And joyfully circle clockwise above the Sage, today you will become a worthy one.
"Since hundreds of buddha realms are filled with beautiful golden light,
Since the lower realms in their entirety come to a halt and the suffering of beings ceases,
Since showers fall in the abodes of the sun and the moon,
and a soft breeze blows,
Today you will become a leader who delivers beings from birth and old age in the three realms.
"Since the gods give up their delight in pleasure and come to venerate you,
Since Brahma and the gods of the Brahmajurohita class abandon the bliss of concentration,
And likewise all the others in the three realms arrive here,
Today you will become the king of physicians who delivers beings from birth and old age in the three realms.
"Since the path that you walk on today has been swept by the gods,
A path that the lords Krakuchanda, Kanakamuni, and Kasyapa also traversed,
Since in your footsteps stainless and perfect lotuses spring forth, breaking out of the earth, Onto which you tread with powerful steps, today you will become a worthy one.
"Trillions of demons, as many as there are grains of sand in the Ganges,
Are unable to move you from under the branches of the Bodhi tree, or to shake you.
You have made billions of offerings, as many as there are grains of sand in the River Ganges, Always acting for the benefit of the world—this is why you shine here today.
"The planets, the moon, the stars, and the sun may fall from the sky to the ground,
The mightiest mountains may move from their places, and oceans may dry up,
Some learned person might magically display each of the four elements,
Yet it is impossible that you would go to the king of trees and rise before attaining awakening.
"Guide, in seeing you I have fortuitously obtained great prosperity;
I have made offerings to you, spoken of your qualities, and strived for awakening.
May I and all my naga wives and children become free from this existence.
Your gait is like the walk of an elephant in rut—may we walk like you!"
Monks, at this point Suvarnaprabhasa, the chief queen of Kalika the naga king, came to see the Bodhisattva. She was surrounded and escorted by many naga girls, who were holding various types of cloth, parasols made of assorted jewels, different pearl necklaces, a variety of precious jewels, an array of garlands, a myriad of unguents and powders made by gods and humans, and containers with diverse perfumes.
The naga girls attended to the Bodhisattva while they sang melodious songs accompanied by music. In this way, as the Bodhisattva proceeded on his way, they besprinkled him with showers of flowers made of various jewels and praised him with these verses:
"You are unerring, fearless, confident, and brave;
You are not depressed, but intrepid, joyous, and hard to dominate.
You are not attached, not angry, not deluded, and without desire;
You are dispassionate and liberated. Homage to you, O
Great Sage!
"You are a physician who removes pain, and a guide for those who need guidance;
You are the supreme physician who liberates beings from suffering.
Considering those without refuge or protection,
You have manifested as a home and a refuge in this threefold world.
"Since the congregation of gods is pleased and joyful,
They cause a great rain of flowers to fall from the sky.
Since they toss down plenty of the finest cloth,
You will become victorious today. So be joyful!
"Approach the lord of trees and sit there without fear!
Conquer Mara's army and become free from the web of disturbing emotions!
Just as the victorious lords of the past attained awakening,
So you will also attain supreme, sacred, and peaceful awakening!
"For many millions of eons you have aimed for this;

For the sake of liberating beings you have gone through hardship.
Now the time has come for your wishes to be fulfilled;
So go to the lord of trees and connect with supreme awakening."
Monks, the Bodhisattva then thought to himself: "Where did the previous thus-gone ones sit when they attained unsurpassed, genuine and perfect awakening? They sat on a bed of grass!"
At that point hundreds of thousands of gods from the pure abodes descended into the atmosphere. They knew the Bodhisattva's thoughts and said: "Yes, that is how it is. Holy Man, that is correct. The previous thus-gone ones used a seat of grass as they attained unsurpassed, genuine and perfect awakening."
Monks, at the right side of the road the Bodhisattva now noticed a grass seller, whose name was Svastika, who was busy cutting grass. The grass was green, soft, fresh, and beautiful.
It coiled to the right and resembled the neck of a peacock. It was as soft to the touch as divine cloth, with the sweetest scent and the most beautiful colour.
At this sight the Bodhisattva left the road, and he went to the grass seller Svastika and spoke to him with sweet words.
His words were authoritative, informative, and clear. His speech was uninterrupted, captivating, and pleasant to hear.
It was affectionate, worthy to be remembered, encouraging, satisfying, and delightful.
His words were not harsh. They were free from stammering, and they had no animosity.
They were not erratic but smooth, gentle, sweet, and pleasant to the ear. It was a speech that delighted both the body and the mind and cleared away all attachment, anger, delusion, strife, and quarrels. His voice was like the call of the cuckoo bird, the kunal bird, and the partridge. It sounded like a drum or a melodious chant.
It caused no harm but was true, clear, and genuine. His voice had a resonance like the voice of Brahma, or the gushing of waves on the ocean, or the sound of rocks hitting against each other. It was a voice praised by the lord of the gods and the lord of the demigods. It was hard to measure its profundity and depth. It rendered powerful demons powerless and eliminated opposing doctrines.
He spoke with the strength of the lion's roar, the neighing of a horse, the trumpeting of an elephant, and with a voice resounding like that of a naga. His voice was like the clapping of a thundercloud, pervading all buddha realms in the ten directions. It roused all sentient beings in need of guidance. It was unconfused, harmless, and without hesitation. It was appropriate, logical, spoken at the right time, in a timely manner, and contained hundreds of thousands of teachings. It was smooth, unimpeded, and with uninterrupted eloquence.
He spoke with a single voice, yet was heard in all languages.
His voice caused all meanings to be known, produced all types of happiness, demonstrated the path to liberation, proclaimed the accumulations necessary for the path, did not ignore his audience, pleased all retinues, and conformed with the teachings of all buddhas.
It was with such words, spoken in verse, that the Bodhisattva addressed the grass seller Svastika:
"Svastika, quick, hand me the grass!
Today this grass will be very meaningful to me.
Once I have conquered Mara and his armies,
I will experience the peace of unexcelled awakening.
"That peace, for the sake of which, for many thousands of eons,
I have practiced generosity, constraint, renunciation,
And ethical and disciplined conduct, as well as austerities—
That peace will come to fruition today.
"The power of forbearance and the power of diligence,
The power of concentration and the power of insight,
The power of merit, the power of realisation, and the power of liberation—
Today I will accomplish those.
"The power of insight and the power of means,
The power of miracles and unattached love,
The power of correct discernment and complete truth—
Today I will accomplish those.
"If today you grant me this grass,
You shall reap the power of limitless merit.
For you this is none other than a sign heralding
That you will become an unsurpassed teacher!"
Svastika, hearing these beautiful and sweet words spoken by the Guide,
Became joyful, elated, and thrilled with delight.
Taking a sheaf of soft, fresh, and tender grass,
He stood before the Bodhisattva and spoke these words, his heart overflowing with joy:
"If this grass can help you attain the supreme state of immortality—
The awakening, supremely peaceful, so hard to find, the path that previous buddhas traversed—
Then please wait a moment, O Great Ocean of Qualities of Immeasurable Glory.

I myself shall awaken first to the supreme state of immortality."

The Bodhisattva replied:

"Svastika, without practicing disciplined conduct and austerities for many eons,

You will not attain awakening by sitting on a seat of fine grass.

Yet when an intelligent person is elevated through the tools of insight and merit,

Then the sages make a prediction and say: 'You will later become a stainless victorious one.'

"Svastika, if it were possible to hand awakening to another being

By making awakening into a lump of alms food, I would surely grant this to everyone!

When I attain awakening, you should know that I will distribute immortality.

You must come, listen, and apply yourself to the teaching, and then you will become stainless."

The Guide took a bundle of soft and perfect grass;

As he departed with the stride of a lion and a swan, the earth shook.

The multitudes of gods and nagas joined their palms, rejoiced, and thought:

"Today he will conquer the hordes of demons and gain immortality!"

Monks, as the Bodhisattva was walking toward the Bodhi tree, the divine sons and bodhisattvas realised that this was the moment when the Bodhisattva, having sat there, would attain awakening and become a truly perfect awakened one. Accordingly they decided to decorate another eighty thousand bodhi trees.

Some of the Bodhi trees were made of flowers and were one hundred thousand leagues high. Other bodhi trees were made of odoriferous substances and were two hundred thousand leagues high. Some bodhi trees were made of sandalwood and were three hundred thousand leagues high. Still other bodhi trees were made of cloth and were five hundred thousand leagues high. Some bodhi trees were made of jewels and were one million leagues high. Other bodhi trees were made of all sorts of jewels and were one trillion leagues high.

At the root of each of these bodhi trees, they erected a suitable lion throne draped in various kinds of divine cloth. By some of the Bodhi trees they also prepared a lotus throne, or a throne made of fragrant substances, or a throne made of various precious materials.

The Bodhisattva now rested evenly in the absorption known as playful array. As soon as the Bodhisattva began to rest in this absorption of playful array, immediately an identical bodhisattva appeared, with his body beautifully adorned with all the excellent marks and representations, sitting upon each of the lion thrones at the root of each of the Bodhi trees.

At that point the bodhisattvas and the divine sons each perceived that the Bodhisattva was resting in equilibrium upon their particular lion throne and not on those set forth by the others. The power of the Bodhisattva's absorption of playful array produced similar perceptions in the beings in hell, those born as animals, those living in the realm of the lord of death, all gods and humans, and all other beings, regardless of their form of existence. All beings now witnessed the Bodhisattva sitting on the lion throne at the root of the Bodhi tree.

Nevertheless, in order to also satisfy the intellect of those who lacked dedication, the Bodhisattva picked up the bundle of grass, went to the Bodhi tree, and circumambulated [went round] it seven times. The Lord then arranged the grass so that the ends of the grass pointed inward and the roots pointed outward. In this way he arranged for himself a very fine seat of grass.

He then sat down like a lion, like a hero, in a powerful way, in a steady way, in a diligent way, in a forceful way, like an elephant, like a lord, in a natural manner, like a wise person, like an unsurpassed person, like a special one, like an exalted one, like a famous one, like one full of praise, like a generous person, like a disciplined person, like a forbearing person, like a diligent person, like a concentrated person, like an insightful being, in a wise manner, in a meritorious manner, like someone who has conquered the attacks of demons, and like someone who has perfected the accumulations. In this way he sat down on the grass seat and crossed his legs facing toward the east. He then straightened his back, collected himself one-pointedly, and formed this firm resolve:

"On this seat my body may wither and rot,

And my skin, my bones, and my flesh may dissolve.

Yet until I attain awakening, so hard to find even through many eons,

I will not move my body from this seat."

This concludes the nineteenth chapter on approaching the seat of awakening.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 20 — The Displays at the Seat of Awakening

[He arrives at the seat of awakening, and the gods perform a variety of miraculous displays, transforming the area so that it resembles a divine realm, fit for the epic achievement that awaits the Bodhisattva.]

Monks, as the Bodhisattva sat down at the seat of awakening, the gods of the six classes within the desire realm decided to protect the Bodhisattva from obstacles.

These gods therefore took position in the eastern direction. Likewise the southern, western, and northern directions were taken over by other classes of gods.

Monks, when the Bodhisattva sat down at the seat of awakening, he began to emit a light known as inspiring the bodhisattvas. The light shone in all the ten directions, illuminating all the boundless and immeasurable buddha realms—the realms that filled the entire field of phenomena.

In the eastern direction this light encouraged the bodhisattva, the great being, Lalitavyuha, who resided in the Vimala world in the thus-gone one Vimalaprabhasa's buddha realm. Surrounded and escorted by an infinite number of bodhisattvas, he proceeded to the seat of awakening where the Bodhisattva was sitting. As a way to venerate the Bodhisattva, he produced a miraculous manifestation whereby he was able to display all the buddha realms, in all directions to the end of space, as a single mandala made of blue lapis lazuli.

At the same time Lalitavyuha made it so that the Bodhisattva, who was sitting at the seat of awakening, became visible to all sentient beings living in the five types of existences. These sentient beings pointed their fingers at the Bodhisattva and asked each other: "Who is this charming being? Who is that beautiful person?"

Then the Bodhisattva emanated other bodhisattvas in front of everyone. The forms of these bodhisattvas then sang this verse:

"He is someone free from attachment, anger, stains and their habitual tendencies;

Light shines from his body in the ten directions, outshining all other lights.

For many eons he increased the accumulations of merit, absorption, and wisdom;

Sakyamuni, the most illustrious of great sages, now beautifies all places."

In the southern direction the light encouraged the bodhisattva, the great being,

Ratnacchattrakutasamdarana, who resided in the world Ratnavyuha of the thus-gone one Ratnarci's buddha realm. Surrounded and escorted by an infinite number of bodhisattvas, he proceeded to the seat of awakening where the Bodhisattva was sitting.

As a way to venerate the Bodhisattva, he sheltered the entire area with a single jewel parasol.

Indra, Brahma, and the worldly protectors now said to each other: "How come this jewel parasol appeared? Whose karmic result is this?" At that point this verse was heard from the jewel parasol:

"He who donated trillions of jewels, fragrant substances, and parasols

To those without an equal who abide, their minds full of loving kindness, in the state of passing beyond suffering,

Is the benefactor endowed with the best marks with strength like Narayana.

This offering is for him, the master of good qualities, who has gone to the Bodhi tree!"

In the western direction the light encouraged the bodhisattva, the great being, Indrajalin, who resided in the Campakavarna world of the thus-gone one Puspavali Vanaraji Kusumitabhijña's buddha realm. Surrounded and escorted by an infinite number of bodhisattvas, he proceeded to the seat of awakening where the Bodhisattva was sitting. As a way to venerate the Bodhisattva, he sheltered the entire area with a single jewel canopy.

The gods in all directions, together with the nagas, yakas, and gandharvas, said to each other: "Who created this display of light?" At that point this verse was heard from the jewel canopy:

"He is a jewel mine, a jewel banner, and a delight to the three worlds;

He is the best of gems, renowned as a jewel, who delights in the true Dharma.

He has the diligence by which he will never be cut off from the Three Jewels;

This is to venerate the One Who Is About to Attain Supreme Awakening."

In the northern direction the light encouraged the bodhisattva, the great being,

Vyuharaja, who resided in the Suryavarta world of the thus-gone one Candra surya jihmi kara prabha's buddha realm. Surrounded and escorted by an infinite number of bodhisattvas, he proceeded to the seat of awakening where the Bodhisattva was sitting.

As a way to venerate the Bodhisattva, he revealed within the courtyard the complete displays of qualities of all buddha realms contained in all the worlds in the ten directions.

Seeing this, some bodhisattvas asked each other: "Who created such displays?" At that point this verse was heard from each of the displays:

"The enormity of his merit and wisdom has purified his body;

His disciplined action, austerities, and truthful Dharma have purified his speech.

His conscientiousness, devotion, love, and compassion have purified his mind;

This is to venerate him, the Leader of the Sakyas, who has gone to the king of trees."

In the southeastern direction the light encouraged the bodhisattva, the great being,

Gunamati, who resided in the Gunakara world of the thus-gone one Gunarajaprabhasa's buddha realm. Surrounded and escorted by an infinite number of bodhisattvas, he proceeded to the seat of awakening where the Bodhisattva was sitting. As a way to venerate the Bodhisattva, he miraculously emanated within the sacred area a multistoried palace endowed with all perfect qualities.

The members of Gunamati's retinue asked: "Who has created such a display?" The multistoried palace then resounded with this verse:

"It is merely a trace of his qualities

That the gods, demigods, yakas, and mahoragas will ever possess.

With such traits he was born into a royal family of many qualities.

Now this Ocean of Qualities sits under the branches of the Bodhi tree."

Then, in the southwestern direction, the light encouraged the bodhisattva, the great being Ratnasambhava, who resided in the Ratnasambhava world of the thus-gone one Ratnayasti's buddha realm. Surrounded and escorted by an infinite number of bodhisattvas, he proceeded to the seat of awakening where the Bodhisattva was sitting.

As a way to venerate the Bodhisattva, he emanated within the sacred area a limitless and boundless number of pavilions made of precious stones. Then from these celestial pavilions, this verse was heard:

"He who has renounced the ocean and the land along with all precious objects,

Who abandoned his palace with its fine oval windows and terraces, and also his harnessed carriages,

Ornate pavilions, exquisite flowers and garlands, parks, wellsprings, and assembly halls,

Giving up his feet, hands, head, and eyes—he now sits at the seat of awakening."

Then, in the northwestern direction, the light encouraged the bodhisattva, the great being, Meghakuṭṭabharigjitavara, who resided in the Meghavati world of the thus-gone one Megharaja's buddha realm. Surrounded and escorted by an infinite number of bodhisattvas, he proceeded to the seat of awakening where the Bodhisattva was sitting. As a way to venerate the Bodhisattva, he manifested a cloud of gum benjamin and aloe wood above the sacred area and caused a rain of sandalwood dust to fall. The cloud then resounded with this verse:

"He, shining with the light of confidence in knowledge, spreads the cloud of Dharma all throughout the three realms;

He, free from attachment, makes the sacred Dharma—the nectar that takes beings beyond suffering—fall like rain.

He will cut the fettering vines of attachment and negative emotions, along with their habitual tendencies,

And blossoming forth with concentration, miracles, powers, and strengths, he will grant to beings a fount of faith."

Then, in the northeastern direction, the light encouraged the bodhisattva, the great being, Hemajalampkrta, who resided in the Hemajalapraticanna world of the thus-gone one Ratnacchattrabhyudgatavabhasa's buddha realm. Surrounded and escorted by an infinite number of bodhisattvas, he proceeded to the seat of awakening where the Bodhisattva was sitting. As a way to venerate the Bodhisattva, he emanated appearances of bodhisattvas, each adorned with the thirty-two marks, on each of the palaces and pavilions. Each of these manifestations of bodhisattvas held up flower garlands from both the human and divine realms. They all bowed to the Bodhisattva and, as they offered the flower garlands, they sang this verse:

"Who praised a million buddhas

And respectfully developed great faith?

Who speaks with a beautiful voice, like the melody of Brahma?

To him, who now has arrived at the seat of awakening, I bow."

In the quarter down below, the light encouraged the bodhisattva, the great being, Ratnagarbha, who resided in the Samantavilokita world of the thus-gone one Samantadarasin's buddha realm. Surrounded and escorted by an infinite number of bodhisattvas, he proceeded to the seat of awakening where the Bodhisattva was sitting.

As a way to venerate the Bodhisattva, he displayed lotuses made of gold from the Jambu River within the lapis lazuli mandala. At the centre of the lotuses, one could see the upper body of many women, in perfect shape and appearance and adorned with various jewellery. In their hands they proffered many types of jewellery, such as necklaces, bracelets, armbands, gold threads, and pearl necklaces. As they offered these along with flower garlands and silken tassels, they bowed in the direction of the seat of awakening and the Bodhisattva, and sang this verse:

"He always bowed to the buddhas, the hearers,
The solitary buddhas, and his masters.

Disciplined, mindful, joyful, and without pride,
To him, who is full of qualities, you should bow down!"

In the quarter above, the light encouraged the bodhisattva, the great being, Gaganagañja, who resided in the Varagana world of the thus-gone one Ganendra's buddha realm. Surrounded and escorted by an infinite number of bodhisattvas, he proceeded to the seat of awakening where the Bodhisattva was sitting. As a way to venerate the Bodhisattva, he stood in the middle of the sky and brought down a rain of objects never before seen or heard of in any of the buddha realms in the ten directions.

It rained down many types of flowers, incense, perfumes, flower garlands, ointments, powders, cloths, ornaments, parasols, banners, streamers, banners of victory, jewels, precious stones, gold, silver, pearls, horses, elephants, chariots, infantrymen, carriages, flowering trees, leaves, fruits, boys, girls, gods, nagas, yakas, gandharvas, demigods, garudas, kimnaras, mahoragas, Indra, Brahma, worldly protectors, humans, and nonhumans. Everyone felt full of joy and happiness, and no one made anyone afraid or caused anyone harm.

This can also be expressed in verse:

In brief, the offspring of the victorious ones from the ten directions

Arrive to pay homage to the benefactor who has attained awakening.

You will hear only an approximate account of the displays of these bodhisattvas,

The bodhisattvas possessed of strength and beauty.

Some offer a million necklaces;

They arrive in the sky, loud like thunder.

Some display flowers and palaces in the expanse of space;

They arrive with jewel diadems adorning their hair.

Some proclaim emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness;

As they arrive on the ground, they roar like lions.

Some scatter beautiful flowers never seen before;

As they arrive, they roar like bulls.

Some reveal their bodies in a thousand colours;

As they arrive in space, they cry like peacocks.

Some proclaim the garlands of qualities of the son of the Bliss-Gone Ones;

As they arrive in space, they are like the full moon.

Some, like the sun, send forth rays of light;

As they arrive, they make all the abodes of Mara appear dark.

Some who have gathered the accumulation of merit

Arrive at the seat of awakening, bright as rainbows.

Some scatter a lattice of precious stones from the sky,

Shining like the beautiful new moon.

They throw mandarava flowers and garlands of campaka flowers

Toward the Bodhisattva as he sits at the foot of the king of trees.

Some arrive, making the earth shake with their two feet;

The shaking ground amuses the people.

Some proffer the central mountain on the palms of their hands

As they remain in midair, scattering flowers from baskets.

Some bring the four oceans on top of their heads;

As they arrive, they scatter and sprinkle perfume on the ground.

Some hold up various jewel staffs;

As they arrive, they point out the Bodhisattva from afar.

Some, like Brahma, have peaceful forms;

Their peaceful minds rest calmly and their concentration is firm.

As they arrive, the pores of their bodies resonate with the beautiful sounds

Of limitless love, compassion, joy, and equanimity.

Some arrive like the god Indra;

They come surrounded by millions of gods.

At the Bodhi tree they join their palms

And scatter jewels like the ones possessed by Indra.

Some arrive like the protectors of the four directions,

Surrounded by gandharvas, raksasas, and kimnaras.

Like lightning, they bring down a rain of luminous flowers, and praise the heroic one with the voice of gandharvas and kimnaras.

Some arrive with heavenly trees in bloom,

With fruits, flowers, and perfect scents.

Among the leaves, the upper bodies of the buddhas' offspring are visible;

They bow to the centre of the world and scatter flowers.

Some arrive proffering ponds with blooming lotuses;

They bring blue and white lotuses that have opened.

At the centre of each of the flowers, there are beings endowed with the thirty-two marks,

Who praise the learned Bodhisattva and his undefiled mind.

Some arrive in bodies as big as the central mountain.

Standing in midair, they cast off their bodies;

Immediately they transform into fresh flower garlands,

And cover the realms of the victorious ones in all the trichilocosm.

Some arrive with eyes blazing like the fire at the end of an eon,

Showing the dissolution and the creation.

From their bodies many Dharma gates are heard,

Causing millions of beings to abandon craving.

Some arrive with lips as beautiful as the bimba fruit;

Their perfect mouths speak with voices like the kimnaras.

They appear like maidens, well adorned with necklaces;

The gods who view them cannot get enough.

Some arrive with indestructible, vajra-like bodies;

They wade through the waters below.

Some arrive with their faces like the sun or the full moon;

Their rays of light and luster conquer the faults of disturbing emotions.

Some arrive adorned with precious stones, holding jewels in their hands;

With these gems they cover billions of realms.

In order to benefit, delight, and satisfy many sentient beings,

They bring down a rain of scented and perfect jewel flowers.

Some arrive with the treasury of the precious great dharanis; From the pores in their skin, hundreds of thousands of sutras are heard.

With their confidence, intelligence, and exalted minds,

They cause realisation in all proud and haughty beings.

Some arrive holding the central mountain like a drum;

Beating it, they fill the sky with sweet voices.

Their sound goes out to millions of realms everywhere:

"The Teacher is poised to awaken today, and subsequently to attain immortality!"

This concludes the twentieth chapter on the displays at the seat of awakening.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 21 — Conquering Mara

[Māra, the most powerful demon in the desire realm, arrives with the aim of preventing the Bodhisattva from attaining his goal. Māra attempts to terrify the Bodhisattva with his powerful army, and to seduce him with his seductive daughters, but he is unable to divert the Bodhisattva from his goal. Māra gives up, defeated.]

Monks, in order to venerate the Bodhisattva, the other bodhisattvas manifested many such displays at the seat of awakening. The Bodhisattva himself, however, caused all the displays that ornamented all the seats of awakening of the past, present, and future buddhas in all the buddha realms in the ten directions to become visible right there at the seat of awakening. Monks, as the Bodhisattva now sat at the seat of awakening, he thought to himself:

"Māra is the supreme lord who holds sway over the desire realm, the most powerful and evil demon. There is no way that I could attain unsurpassed and complete awakening without his knowledge. So I will now arouse that evil Mara. Once I have conquered him, all the gods in the desire realm will also be restrained. Moreover, there are some divine sons in Mara's retinue who have previously created some basic goodness. When they witness my lion-like display, they will direct their minds toward unsurpassed and complete awakening."

Monks, as soon as the Bodhisattva had this thought, a light known as the light which conquers all demonic congregations was emitted from the hair between his eyebrows. The light illuminated all demonic abodes in the entire great trichilocosm, making them dark by comparison and causing them to shake. In fact the entire great trichilocosm was bathed in an immense light.

From this light a voice called out to Mara, the evil one:

"Here is a pure being who has acted well for many eons.

As Siddhodana's son he abandoned his kingdom;

He appeared as a benefactor seeking immortality.

He has arrived at the Bodhi tree, so you should now make an effort!

"Himself having crossed, he causes others to cross;

Himself liberated, he also liberates others.

Having found relief, he gives relief to others;

Having passed beyond suffering, he will cause others to transcend suffering.

"He will empty the three lower realms totally,

And fill the city of gods and humans.

He, the Benefactor, will attain immortality,
And bestow absorptions, higher knowledge, immortality, and happiness.

"He will empty your city, O evil kinsman;

With your army powerless, you will be without an army and without allies.

When the Self-Arisen One, by his nature, pours down the rain of Dharma,

You will not know what to do or where to go."

Monks, Mara, the evil one, was aroused by these verses and had a dream with thirty-two omens. What are these thirty-two? They are as follows:

1. He saw his abode being filled with darkness.

2. The abode was filled with dust, and rough with scattered pebbles.

3. Startled with fear and terror, he fled in the ten directions.

4. He lost his diadem and his earrings fell off.

5. His lips, throat, and mouth dried out.

6. His heart was beating fast.

7. The leaves, flowers, and fruits in his parks withered.

8. His lotus ponds were emptied of water and dried out.

9. All birds, such as swans, cranes, peacocks, cuckoos, kunalas, the two-headed pheasants, and so forth, had broken wings.

10. All his musical instruments—such as his drum, conch, clay drum, hand drum, tambour, lute, harp, cymbals, and tambourines—broke, fell into pieces, then into shreds, and fell on the ground.

11. His beloved kinfolk and retinue abandoned him, their faces cast down, while he stood aside and brooded.

12. His chief queen, Marini, fell from her bed onto the ground and started beating her head with her fists.

13. Those among his sons who were the most diligent, powerful, glorious, and intelligent prostrated to the Bodhisattva, who was sitting at the supremely sacred seat of awakening.

14. His daughters wailed and cried out, "Oh no, father, oh no, father!"

15. He was dressed in stained clothes.

16. With his head covered in dust and his face colourless and pale, he beheld himself as devoid of any vital force.

17. His palace with its corridors, skylights, and porticoes became covered in dust and crumbled down.

18. All his generals from the realms of the yakas, raksasas, kumbhandas, and gandharvas placed their hands on their heads and fled while crying and wailing.

19. Whatever divine regents there are among the gods in the desire realm—Dhrtarastra, Virudhaka, Virupaksa, Vaisravana, Sakra, Suyama, Santusita, Sunirmanarati, Vasavarti, and so forth—Mara, the evil one, saw all of them eagerly listening to the Bodhisattva with their faces turned toward him.

20. In the midst of battle, his sword could not be pulled from its sheath, and he himself was unwell and wailing.

21. His retinue abandoned him.

22. His vases full of auspicious items fell into a hole.

23. The priest Narada pronounced a curse.

24. The gatekeeper Anandita cried out in distress.

25. The canopy of the sky became covered in darkness.

26. The goddess Sri, who lives in the desire realm, began to weep.

27. His faculties became ineffectual.

28. He lost his allies.

29. His lattices of jewels and pearls became silent, fell apart, tore, and fell down.

30. His whole dwelling swayed.

31. The trees and the turrets of his buildings tore and fell over.

32. The entire army of Mara was felled in a confrontation.

Monks, such were the thirty-two omens in the dream of Mara, the evil one.

When Mara awoke from this dream, he was so terrified that he gathered all his family members. When he saw that they had gathered along with his armies, his retinue, his generals, and his gatekeepers, he addressed them with these verses:

When Mara saw these omens, he became worried.

He summoned the demon captain Simhahanu

And his sons and his retinue.

The evil kinsman then conferred with all of them:

"Today I heard these verses sung from the sky:

'A being was born among the Sakyas adorned with perfect marks.

He practiced severe austerities for six years, and now has arrived at the Bodhi tree.'

You must make great effort!

"If the Bodhisattva becomes awakened, all by himself

He will awaken billions of beings.

When he attains immortality and reaches the cool state,

He will empty all our abodes.

"Come on! Let us advance with a great army!"

THE GRAND BIBLE

We shall destroy that monk, alone at the king of trees.

Quick, mobilise the four army divisions!

If you wish to please me, do not delay this.

"Although the world may be full of worthy ones and solitary buddhas,

My force will remain unharmed when they pass beyond suffering.

Yet if he alone becomes a victorious one and a Dharma king,

He would never allow the line of uncountable victorious ones to be broken."

Monks, at that point the son of Mara, the evil one, who was named Sarthavaha, addressed his father in these verses:

"Father, why is your face so sad and pale?

Your heart is thumping and your every limb is shaking.

Come now, tell me quick, what did you hear or witness?

Let us discover the truth and devise a plan."

With his pride vanished, Mara said:

"Son, listen to me. I had a bad dream, extremely terrifying.

If I were to tell everything now to the audience here,

You would faint and fall to the ground."

Sarthavaha said:

"When the time for battle has arrived, victory is of no bad consequence;

However, for the one who is killed, there is detriment.

If your dream conveys an omen of this kind,

It may be best to give up and not go to war, which would bring humiliation."

Mara replied:

"One with a determined mind will win in battle;

If we rely on firmness and correct action, victory will be ours.

When he sees me and my retinue,

He will be powerless but to rise and bow to my feet."

Sarthavaha said:

"An army may be vast, but if it is weak,

A single powerful hero may win the battle.

Even if the universe were filled with fireflies,

They could be destroyed and eclipsed by a single sun."

Moreover:

"He who is proud and ignorant does not have much acumen;

If he is opposed to a shrewd person, he will not be able to think effectively."

Monks, Mara, the evil one, did not pay heed to Sarthavaha's warning. Instead he gathered all four divisions of his great and powerful army. It was a terrifying army, so brave in battle that it would make anyone's hair stand on end. Such an army had never been seen before, or even heard of, in the realms of gods and humans. The soldiers were able to transform their faces in a trillion ways. On their arms and legs slithered hundreds of thousands of snakes, and in their hands they brandished swords, bows, arrows, darts, lances, axes, tridents, clubs, staffs, bludgeons, lassos, cudgels, discuses, vajras, and spears. Their bodies were covered in finest cuirasses and armour.

Some had their heads, hands, or feet turned backward, or their eyes facing backward.

Their heads, eyes, and faces were ablaze. Their bellies, hands, and feet were deformed, and their faces brimmed with vehement ardor. Their mouths, with protruding ugly fangs, appeared contorted in the extreme, and their thick and broad tongues, rough like a turtle's neck or a straw mat, dangled from their mouths.

Like the eyes of a black snake, which are flush with poison, their eyes were blazing red, as if on fire. Some of them were vomiting poisonous snakes, while others, like garudas emerging from the ocean, grasped these poisonous snakes in their hands and ate them. Some ate human flesh and drank blood, chewing on human arms, legs, heads, and livers, and slurping entrails, feces, and vomit. Their terrifying bodies had many colours, such as brown, blue, red, black, and blazing yellow.

Some had ugly hollow eyes, like wells. Others had eyes that were gouged out, eyes that were ablaze, or disfigured eye sockets. Some had ugly eyes, rolling and blazing. Some carried flaming mountains in their hands while playfully riding on other mountains as their mount. Others ran toward the Bodhisattva, carrying trees that had been uprooted.

Some had ears like goats, demons, elephants, or pigs, or hanging ears. Others had no ears at all. Some had swollen bellies and weak bodies, with their bones sticking out. They had broken noses, bellies like barrels, and feet round as balls. Their skin, flesh, and blood had dried out, and their ears, noses, hands, feet, eyes, or heads were cut.

Some were so thirsty for blood that they would cut each other's heads off. They would make snappy, ugly, terrifying, and rough sounds of "Phut phut, picut, phulu phulu!" Others would call, "Let's get rid of him! Grab that mendicant Gautama along with his tree! Let's make sure that he is caught, cut, slashed, tied, held, harassed, cut in pieces, gotten rid of, and destroyed!"

They were disfigured and caused terror with their awful faces of foxes, jackals, pigs, donkeys, oxen, elephants, horses, camels, wild asses, buffaloes, rabbits, yaks, rhinos, and the eight-legged lion beast. Some had animal bodies like lions, tigers, wild boars, bears, monkeys, elephants, cats, goats, sheep, snakes, mongooses, fish, crocodiles, alligators, tortoises, ravens, vultures, owls, and garudas.

Some had misshapen forms. Some had just one head, but others had two or more, some even up to one hundred thousand. Some had no head at all. Some had just one arm while others had up to one hundred thousand. Others had no arms. Some had just one leg while others had up to one hundred thousand. Others had no legs at all. Some had poisonous snakes emerging from their bodily apertures—ears, mouths, noses, eyes, and belly buttons. They threatened the Bodhisattva as they danced around and brandished their many weapons, such as swords, bows, arrows, darts, tridents, axes, discuses, spears, lances, vajras, javelins, and other sharp weapons.

Some of them wore garlands of human fingers that they had cut off and strung together.

Others wore on their heads bones, hands, and skulls, which they had strung into garlands, and some had their bodies covered in poisonous snakes. Some were holding skulls and rode on elephants, horses, camels, donkeys, and buffaloes. Some had their heads pointing down and feet up. Some had needle-like hair on their heads.

Others had hair like oxen, donkeys, boars, mongooses, goats, sheep, cats, monkeys, wolves, or jackals.

They were vomiting poisonous snakes, spitting out lumps of iron, spewing fire, and producing a rain of flaming iron and copper. They sent rains with thunder, released bolts of lightning, caused a rain of hot iron sands, gathered black clouds, and made storms arise. They sent rains consisting of masses of arrows, bringing darkness and causing swishing sounds as they ran toward the Bodhisattva.

Some of the soldiers swung their lassos, destroyed great mountains, stirred the vast oceans, jumped over tall mountains, and shook Meru, the king of mountains. In this way they came running, throwing their limbs in the air and rocking their bodies.

They cried out loudly in laughter, slapped and beat their chests, and disheveled their hair. Their faces were yellow, their bodies blue, their heads flaming with the hair streaming upward. Running around impetuously, darting here and there with eyes like a fox, they tried to frighten the Bodhisattva.

Old women approached the Bodhisattva and called out to him: "Oh no, son! Oh no, my son! Get up! Quick, get up and flee!" Awful forms of demoneses, flesh eaters, and hungry spirits—one-eyed, limping, and with hunger in their eyes—ran toward the Bodhisattva with outstretched hands, distorted faces, and terrifying cries.

They were fearful and horrifying.

Such an army of demons formed a big gathering, stretching eighty leagues on every side. Just like this single army, so too the armies of hundreds of zillions of evil demons, residing in the great trichilocosm, spread themselves around the Bodhisattva in horizontal and upward directions.

On this topic, it is said:

Forms of yaksas, kumbhandas, and mahoragas,

As well as raksasas, hungry spirits, and flesh eaters,

In any form that the world finds ugly and fierce,

All have been magically manifested there by these rogues.

They have one, two, three heads,

Up to a thousand faces.

One, two, three arms,

Up to a thousand arms.

There are also many with one, two, three legs,

Even some with a thousand legs.

Some have a blue face and a yellow body;

Others have a yellow face and a blue body.

Their heads and bodies do not match;

Such is the army of soldiers approaching.

They have faces like tigers, snakes, and hogs,

Elephants, horses, donkeys, and camels,

Monkeys, lions, or bears.

Such are the faces of the approaching army.

Many terrifying malevolent spirits approach,

With wild matted hair, sheep heads, crooked bones, and goiters;

Their bodies are drenched with human blood.

Such are the malevolent spirits that approach.

Their legs are like the legs of an antelope;

Their eyeballs look like those of monkeys;

Their fangs look like elephant tusks.

Such are the faces of the approaching army.

The shape of their bodies is that of a crocodile;

Their two eyeballs are ablaze;

Their ears are like those of a goat.

Such are the faces of the approaching army.

Some hold up a staff in their hands,

Others brandish hammers, clubs, and tridents,

While some hold Mount Meru in their hands.

These are the terrifying forms of the approaching malevolent spirits.

They hold up sickles, brandish discuses, roll their eyes,

Lift great mountaintops in their hands,

And bring down storms and rains of rock and meteor.

These are the terrifying malevolent spirits approaching.

They blow hurricanes, bring down rainstorms,

Shoot off billions of lightning bolts,

Roar with thunder, and sway trees.

Yet the leaves on the Bodhi tree remain still.

The rain pours down in torrents;

Rivers overflow and flood the land.

So many terrifying things have appeared

That even inanimate trees fall over

As they witness these terrible forms,

All of them ugly and misshapen.

Yet the One Who Has Qualities, Marks, and Splendour

Keeps his mind unshaken, like Mount Meru.

He sees all phenomena as illusion,

Like a dream, and like clouds.

Since he sees them in this manner that accords with the Dharma,

He meditates steadfastly, established in the Dharma.

Whoever thinks of "me" and "mine"

And clings to objects and the body,

Should be afraid and terrified,

Since they are in the clutches of ignorance.

The Son of the Sakyas has realized the essential truth

That all phenomena arise in dependence and lack reality.

With a mind like the sky, he is just fine,

Unperturbed by the spectacle of the army of rogues.

Monks, among the one thousand sons of Mara, the evil one, there were some, such as Sarthavaha, who began to feel devotion toward me, the Bodhisattva.

They all assembled on the right side of Mara, the evil one, while those who supported Mara took a stand on his left side.

Now Mara asked his sons: "What type of army should we use to subdue the Bodhisattva?"

Standing to his right, Mara's son Sarthavaha spoke this verse to his father:

"Would you want to wake up the leader of the nagas?

Would you want to wake up the leader of the elephants?

Would you want to wake up the king of the animals?

That is like wanting to disturb the leader of men from his ease."

Standing to his left, Mara's son Durmati replied:

"Even at the mere sight of us, people's hearts burst,

And so does the solid core of great trees.

Struck by my stare, what power would this monk have?

Or struck by death, what power would he have to live in this world?"

From the right side, Madhuranirghosa spoke:

"What solid core do trees have for that matter?"

You say 'I will break him by staring,' but can you do that, people?

Even if you could destroy Mount Meru with your stare,

You could not even open your eyes in his presence."

Moreover:

"To cross the ocean using one's hands

And to drink its water is impossible for people.

Yet looking directly at the Bodhisattva's stainless face

Would be even harder than that."

From the left side, Satabahu said:

"My body has one hundred arms,

And with just one of them I can shoot off one hundred arrows.

O father, I will break the body of this monk!

Be happy and go now without delay."

From the right side, Subuddhi said:

"If it is advantageous to have one hundred arms,

Why do bodily hairs not become arms?

You may hold a spear in each of your hands

And use them all, yet that will bring you nothing."

Why is that?

"Because of his love, the body of this sage

Is inaccessible to poison, weapons, and fire.

Since the love that he feels transcends the world,

When you shoot your weapons, they turn into flowers."

And moreover:

"All the powerful ones in the sky, the earth, and the waters, Whether humans or guhyakas, may hold up their swords and axes.

But when they go to the leader of men, who has the power of forbearance,

They all change from very strong, to strong, to weak."

On the left side, someone named Ugratejas called out:

"Invisible, I will enter his beautiful body

And then I will burn it,

Just like a low forest fire

Would burn a dry, hollow tree."

On the right side, Sunetra replied:

"You may burn the entire Mount Meru

And enter, invisible, into the earth,

But his vajra mind cannot possibly be burned

By the likes of you, even if you were equal in number to the grains of sand in the River Ganges."

THE GRAND BIBLE

Moreover:
"It can happen that all mountains quake,
And it may be that the oceans dry up.
It is also possible that the sun and moon will fall from the sky,
And it may be that the earth will one day melt away.
"Yet it is impossible that the one who has set out
To benefit the world with a firm resolve
Should rise from the foot of the great tree
Before he attains awakening."
From the left side, Dirghabahugarvita said:
"Right here before you,
I could use my bare hands
To grind to dust
The sun, the moon, and the stars.
"I could, with playful ease,
Get hold of all the water in the four oceans.
Father, I will get hold of this monk
And throw him to the end of the oceans.
"Father, may this army stand firm!
Do not be aggrieved!
I will uproot the Bodhi tree
And scatter it everywhere with my hands."
From the right side, Prasadapratilabdha said:
"You may proudly assume
That you can crush with your hands
All gods, demigods, and gandharvas,
Along with the earth, the mountains, and the oceans.
"Yet even thousands of beings like you,
As many as there are grains of sand in the Ganges,
Would be unable to move a single hair
On that wise Bodhisattva."
From the left side, Bhayanakara said:
"Father, for one who is set in the midst of a great army,
What is the use of excessive fear?
He does not have an army. Where are his allies?
Why do you fear him?"
From the right side, Ekagramati said:
"In the universe, the sun and the moon have no army,
And the universal monarch and the lion have no army.
Likewise this Bodhisattva has no army,
Yet he is capable of destroying Namuci single-handedly."
From the left side, AvataraPREKSHIN said:
"He has no lances or spears, no clubs or swords,
No horses, elephants, chariots, or foot soldiers.
That single arrogant monk, sitting there—
Father, I will kill him today, please have no worries."
From the right side, Puniyalamkara said:
"His body is unshakable and indestructible like Narayana's;
He wears an armour of forbearance and wields the sword of unbendable diligence;
The threefold liberation is his steed, and knowledge is his bow.
Father, through the force of his merit, the Bodhisattva will conquer Mara's army."
From the left side, Anivartin said:
"The fire burning on the plains does not shy away from burning the grass;
The arrow shot skillfully cannot be stopped by a learned one;
The bolt of lightning shooting across the sky does not return.
I will not rest until I have conquered the son of the Sakyas."
From the right side, Dharmakama said:
"When meeting wet grass, the fire retreats;
When the arrow hits a mountain peak, it rebounds;
The bolt of lightning, having hit the ground, sinks down.
Until the Bodhisattva obtains peaceful immortality, he will not retreat."
And why?
"Father, even if one could draw pictures in the empty sky,
Or gather the minds of all sentient beings, as many as there are, into one,
Or, my father, bind the sun, the moon, and the wind with a noose,
One could still not move the Bodhisattva from the seat of awakening."
From the left side, Anupasanta said:
"With the great poison of my gaze, I can burn Mount Meru
And turn the waters in the great oceans to ashes.
So, father, look at the seat of awakening and that monk
As I now turn both of them to ashes with my gaze."
From the right side, Siddhartha said:
"You may be able to fill the world with poison
And put ablaze the great trichilocosm,
Yet by a mere glance from the One Who Is the Source of All Good Qualities,
Your poison will lose its toxicity.
"In the three realms, there are fierce poisons
In the form of attachment, anger, and delusion.
Yet none of them can be found in his body, nor in his mind,
Just as mud and dust cannot be found in the heavens.
"His body, speech, and mind are pristine,⁶
And he is filled with love for sentient beings.

No weapon or poison will be able to harm him,
So, father, please, let us all turn back."
From the left side, Ratilola said:
"I will play thousands of instruments
And send forth billions of well-adorned divine girls
Who will get him excited and lead him to our exquisite harem.
I will provide sexual pleasure and bring him under your control."
From the right side, Dharmarati said:
"He only delights in the pleasures of the Dharma,
The bliss of concentration and the significance of immortality,
And the joy of liberating sentient beings and the happiness of a loving mind.
He does not delight in the pleasures of passion."
From the left side, Vatajava said:
"I can at once swallow the sun and the moon
And the wind blowing through the sky.
Father, I will catch that mendicant this very day
And blow him away like a handful of husk."
From the right side, Mara's son named Acalamati said:
"Even if all gods and humans became
As swift and strong as you are
And gathered in a single place,
They would be unable to harm this peerless being."
From the left side, Brahmamati said:
"If there was such a fierce crowd of our men,
He could do nothing to wound your pride.
Since all tasks are accomplished by teams,
How could he harm you just on his own?"
From the right side, Siphmanadin said:
"Lions have never been seen sitting on the ground in a row;
Those with a poisonous gaze do not team up.
Those splendourous beings that have courage because of being true,
Those supreme leaders of beings also do not congregate together."
From the left side, Sarvacandala said:
"Father, you have not heard such heated voices before
As those your sons are calling out with now.
Mustering diligence, speed, and power,
Let's quickly go and destroy that monk!"
From the right side, Siphmanadin said:
"In the midst of the jungle, when the lion is not there,
Many jackals bark.
Yet when they hear the lion's frightening roar,
They flee in panic in all directions.
"In the same way, these ignorant sons of Mara,
As long as they have not heard the voice of the perfect man,
Raise their voices, opinionated and impudent,
While the lion of men remains silent."
From the left side, Duscintitacintin said:
"Whatever I wish for is quickly accomplished,
So why does he not look at us with circumspection?
He must be either deluded or ignorant
Since he does not rise up quickly and flee."
From the right side, Sucintitartha said:
"He is neither a fool nor a weakling;
You yourselves are the fools, so extremely careless.
You have no idea about his valor;
The power of his insight will conquer you all.
"Even with the strength of demonic sons
Equal in number to the grains of sand in the river Ganges,
You would not be able to bend a single hair on his head,
So how much less could you kill him?
"Do not corrupt your minds;
Instead you should respect him with devotion.
He is about to become king of the three realms;
Turn back and do not make war."

In this way a thousand of Mara's sons, both good and bad, each further addressed Mara, the evil one, in verses. At the end, Bhadrāsena, the general of Mara, spoke these verses to him:

"All those who normally follow you, such as Sakra,
The protectors, the hordes of half kimmaras,
The leaders of the demigods, and the leaders of the garudas,
Now they all join their palms and bow to the Bodhisattva.
"So what need is there to mention those who do not follow you,
Brahma and the luminous divine sons,
And the gods of the pure abodes—
They all, too, bow to him.
"Even those of your sons who are wise,
Who are powerful and smart,
Venerate the Bodhisattva
In accord with his essence.
"This army of yakṣas and other beings,
Which extends for eighty leagues,
Is seen in full by the All-Seeing One,
With a clear mind and without hatred.
"Since he is neither taken aback nor stirred
When seeing this wild and fierce army,

So hideous and frightening,
His victory is certain now.
"Wherever this army is found,
The cries of the jackal and the owl are heard.
When the calls of the crow and the donkey ring out,
It is wise to quickly retreat.
"Please look toward the seat of awakening!
Clever crows, swans, cuckoos, and peacocks
Are circumambulating the Bodhisattva.
It is certain that today the victory will be his.
"Wherever this army is found,
Dust and soot rain from the sky.
Yet at the seat of awakening, a rain of flowers falls,
So heed my words and turn back!
"Wherever this army is found,
The ground is uneven and filled with thorns and prickles.
Yet at the seat of awakening, the ground is stainless like gold.
So it is better for the wise to retreat.
"The past nightmares
Will now come true. If you do not retreat,
He will reduce this army to dust,
Just as countries are destroyed by the sages.
"When the supreme, masterful sage Became angry with King Brahmadaṭṭa,
He burned the Dandaka Forest
So that for many years no grass would grow.
"Whatever sages there are who practice disciplined conduct
And practice austerities,
He is supreme among them,
For he does not harm any living being.
"Have you not heard before
That the one whose body blazes with all the marks
And who walks away from his home
Will conquer disturbing emotions and attain awakening?
"The sons of the victors manifest such great powers
As an act of worship,
For isn't the Supreme Being
A worthy recipient of the best of offering rites?
"Since the immaculate hair between his eyebrows
Beautifies a trillion realms
And outshines all of us,
He will surely conquer Mara's army.
"Since the gods at the peak of existence
Are unable to see the crown of his head,
So, surely, without being taught by others,
He will attain omniscience.
"Since Mount Meru and the surrounding ranges,
The sun, the moon, Sakra, Brahma,
All the trees, and the best of mountains
All prostrate to the seat of awakening,
"It is certain that the one with the power of merit,
The powers of knowledge and wisdom,
And the powers of forbearance and diligence,
Will render Mara's factions powerless.
"Like an elephant stepping on a fresh clay pot,
Or a lion fighting a fox,
Or the sun effacing a firefly,
The Bliss-Gone One will obliterate our army."
Upon hearing these words, another son of Mara became enraged and, with bloodshot eyes, he said:
"Your praise for this lone person
Is without any bounds.
What could that single man be capable of?
Can you not see this great and terrifying army?"
Then from the right side, the son of Mara called Marapramardaka said:
"It is not necessary to help the sun in this world,
Nor the lion or the universal monarch.
The Bodhisattva sitting with resolve for awakening
Surely does not need any helpers."
At that point, in order to weaken the strength of the demons, the Bodhisattva turned his face, which resembled a blooming lotus with one hundred petals, toward them. Upon seeing the Bodhisattva's face, Mara took flight. Fleeing, he thought that his army could withstand the sight of the Bodhisattva's face, and he once again turned back.
Assisted by his followers, they now began to hurl various weapons upon the Bodhisattva.
However, even when they threw mountains as big as the central mountain at the Bodhisattva, the mountains all turned into flower canopies and celestial palaces.
Those with poisonous gazes, those with poisonous snakes, and those with poisonous breath shot flames of fire at the Bodhisattva. Yet this circle of fire just turned into what seemed to be the Bodhisattva's halo of light.
The Bodhisattva now touched his right hand to his head. Mara perceived that the Bodhisattva was brandishing a sword in his hand, and so he fled toward the south.
However, thinking that it could not be true after all, he again returned. When he came back, the demons began to hurl all sorts of terrifying weapons at the Bodhisattva. They threw swords, arrows, darts, lances, axes, clubs, javelins, bludgeons, discs, vajras, hammers, uprooted trees, rocks, lassos, and iron balls. However, as soon as the demons released the weapons, the weapons turned into garlands and canopies of flowers, and a cooling rain of flower petals fell on the ground. The flower garlands hung as adornments on the Bodhi tree.

THE GRAND BIBLE

When Mara, the evil one, witnessed the Bodhisattva's power and the displays that he performed, his mind was disturbed by jealousy and avarice. He called out to the Bodhisattva: "Listen, young Prince, get up! Get up and relish your kingship—your virtue lies precisely in doing that! On what grounds could you ever attain liberation?"

The Bodhisattva answered Mara, the evil one, with words that were firm, profound, vast, gentle, and sweet:

"You, evil one! Through just a single unstinting act of giving, you have become lord of the desire realm. I, on the other hand, have performed trillions of unstinting acts of giving. I have cut off my hands, legs, eyes, and my head, and given them to beggars. With the intention to liberate sentient beings, I have often given beggars my house, wealth, grains, beds, clothes, and parks."

Mara, the evil one, replied with this verse:

"Previously I made a wholesome act of giving;

It was an unstinting act, and you are my witness.

But you have no witness to your acts,

So there is no point in speaking of them, and instead you will be conquered."

The Bodhisattva replied: "Evil one, the earth here is my witness."

He then embraced Mara, the evil one, and his demonic retinue with thoughts of love and compassion. Like a lion, he was without fear, fright, anxiety, timidity, disturbance, and perturbation. He had no goose bumps, which indicate fear.

He now let his right hand slide over his entire body and then gracefully tapped on the earth—the hand that had the contours of a conch, a victory banner, a fish, a vase, a swastika, an iron hook, and a wheel. The hand's fingers were connected by a web. Its nails were exquisite and copper coloured. Soft and supple, it looked perfectly youthful.

All this was the result of limitless eons of gathering the accumulations of basic goodness. He then spoke this verse:

"This earth supports all beings;

She is impartial and unbiased toward all, whether moving or still.

She is my witness that I speak no lies;

So may she bear my witness."

As soon as the Bodhisattva touched this great earth, it shook in six different ways. It quivered, trembled, and quaked, and it boomed, thundered, and roared. Just as a Magadhan brass cauldron, when struck with a wooden log, chimes and reverberates, so did this great earth sound and reverberate when struck by the Bodhisattva with his hand.

Then the earth goddess in this great trichiliocosm who is called Sthavara, along with her retinue of one billion earth goddesses, began to shake the entire great earth. Not far from where the Bodhisattva was sitting, she broke through the earth's surface and revealed her upper body, adorned with all sorts of jewels. She bowed toward the Bodhisattva, joined her palms, and spoke to him:

"You are right. Great Being, you are right. It is just as you say. We bear witness to this. But still, my Lord, you alone are the supreme witness in the worlds of gods and humans and the supreme authority."

Having spoken thus, the earth goddess Sthavara rebuked Mara, the evil one, in many ways, and praised the Bodhisattva again and again. She made a great display of her myriad powers and then disappeared together with her following there and then.

When the wicked one and his army heard that sound from the earth,

Frightened and disheartened, they all fled,

Just like jackals in the forest hearing the lion's roar,

Or crows taking flight when a rock is thrown.

Now Mara, the evil one, felt unhappy and full of suffering. Still, even though he was miserable and ashamed of himself, he was overpowered by pride to such an extent that he could not leave; he could not turn back and flee. Therefore he turned to his men and spoke:

"All of you! Wait a while until we find out whether it is possible to arouse the Bodhisattva by polite persuasion. Such a jewel of a being should not be killed outright."

Then Mara, the evil one, spoke to his daughters: "Girls, you must go now to the seat of awakening and examine the Bodhisattva. Does he have desires or not? Is he deluded or intelligent? Is he like a blind man, or does he know the country and seek advantage? And is he weak or strong?"

When they heard these words, these divine maidens went to the seat of awakening where the Bodhisattva was. They assembled in front of the Bodhisattva and began displaying the thirty-two ways of female trickery. What are these thirty-two ways?

They are as follows:

1. Some of the girls partially covered their faces.

2. Some showed off their firm and voluptuous breasts.

3. Some smiled at him and flashed their teeth.

4. Some lifted their arms, waving them in the air to reveal their armpits.

5. Some flaunted their lips, red like bimba fruit.

6. Some looked at the Bodhisattva through half-closed eyes and then quickly closed their eyes.

7. Some showed off their half-covered breasts.

8. Some loosened their clothes to reveal their hips adorned with girdles.

9. Some wore fine, transparent clothes that revealed their hips and their girdles.

10. Some made clinking sounds with their anklets.

11. Some showed their breasts adorned with strings of pearls.

12. Some showed off their half-naked thighs.

13. Some displayed jays, parrots, and myna birds sitting on their heads and shoulders.

14. Some cast sidelong glances at the Bodhisattva.

15. Some wore good clothes, yet let them hang improperly.

16. Some made the chains on their hips shake and twinkle.

17. Some mischievously moved back and forth in a flirtatious manner.

18. Some danced.

19. Some sang.

20. Some flirted and acted shy.

21. Some shook their thighs like a palm tree moved by the wind.

22. Some let out deep moans.

23. Some dressed in transparent cloth with bells hanging from the string at their waist and walked around giggling.

24. Some stripped off all their clothes and jewellery.

25. Some showed off all their jewellery, both the secret and the apparent.

26. Some showed their arms, which had been rubbed with perfume.

27. Some displayed their earrings anointed with perfume.

28. Some covered their face with a veil and then suddenly revealed it.

29. Some laughed, played, and had fun, trying to attract each other's attention. But then they again pretended to be shy.

30. Some of them showed off their virgin bodies that had never given birth.

31. Some tried to lure the Bodhisattva with offers of love.

32. Some scattered flower petals on the Bodhisattva.

Standing before the Bodhisattva, they pondered what his thoughts might be as they looked at his face. Did he look at them with his senses aroused? Or did he look into the distance? They looked to see if he was excited or not.

The face of the Bodhisattva, however, remained as pure and stainless as the orb of the full moon when it escapes the mouth of Rahu, or the sun rising in the early dawn, or a golden pillar, or a blooming thousand-petaled lotus, or a sacrificial fire sprinkled with oil. Like the central mountain, it remained unmoving. Like the surrounding mountains, it was truly elevated. He guarded his senses well and, like the elephant, his look was that of someone with a mind well tamed.

Now the daughters of Mara, in a further attempt to arouse the Bodhisattva's desires, spoke these verses to him:

"Springtime is here, the best of seasons;

Let us frolic, dear, while the trees are in bloom.

Your body is so beautiful and attractive;

It is enticing, has auspicious marks, and is well adorned.

"We were born beautiful and with perfect curves;

We are here to please gods and humans and grant complete satisfaction.

Awakening is hard to gain, so change your mind;

Quick, stand up and enjoy the prime of youth!

"It is for your sake that we have come here, all dressed up and adorned;

Come now, take a look at these divine girls so beautifully adorned.

Who would not be thrilled when enjoying the passion of love?

Even a decayed tree would be brought back to life!

"Our voices are soft and our scent is delicious;

Our faces look their best with diadems, earrings, and makeup.

Our faces have beautiful brows and are well anointed;

Our beautiful eyes are as pure and large as lotuses.

"Our faces resemble the full moon;

Our lips are like ripe bimba fruit;

Our teeth are white like conch shells, jasmine flowers, or snow.

So, O Beloved, look at us who ardently desire pleasure.

"Look at our firm and voluptuous breasts,

The beautiful three folds on our bellies,

And our broad and beautiful hips.

Lord, look at us, such beautiful maidens.

"Our thighs resemble the trunk of an elephant;

Our arms are bedecked with abutting bracelets;

Our hips are adorned with beautiful chains.

Lord, look at us, your servants.

"With the gait of a swan, we gently approach you;

Soft and beautiful, we talk of amorous love.

Beautifully adorned as we are,

We are experts in divine pleasures.

"We are well trained in singing, playing instruments, and theatrical performance;

We are born with perfect bodies for the sake of pleasure.

If you don't accept us now, as we crave pleasure,

You will quickly become a loser in this world.

"What man would run away when he sees a treasure?"

You will be exactly like that, ignorant of the treasure, which is love,

If you remain ignorant of amorous passion

And fail to enjoy these young girls, who have come of their own will."

Monks, the Bodhisattva just smiled with unblinking eyes. He sat there smiling, with calm senses, physically at ease, resplendent, without attachment, free from anger, and without delusion. Like the king of mountains he was immutable, confident, unconfused, and untroubled. Since he had totally abandoned, all by himself, all disturbing emotions through his well-established intelligence and wisdom, he now spoke with soft and pleasant words in a tone that exceeded even the voice of Brahma. His voice was like that of a cuckoo, pleasant and sweet sounding, as he addressed Mara's daughters with these verses:

"Desire results in a great deal of suffering; it is the root of suffering.

For the unwise, desire ruins their concentration, magical ability, and austerities;

The wise say that chasing women brings no satisfaction.

I will satisfy the unskillful ones with wisdom.

"The thirst of someone who pursues desires increases evermore,

Just like one feels after drinking salty water.

If I were to engage in that, there would be no benefit to me or to others,

And I delight in being useful to both myself and to others.

"Your beauty is like water bubbles or foam;

Like magical colours, it is merely mentally created.

Like a play or a dream, it is unstable and impermanent;

It deludes the minds of childish beings.

"The eyes are like water bubbles—they are enclosed in a membrane,

Like clotted blood is enclosed in a suppurating ulcer.

The belly is one big load of urine and excrement, excreting filth;

This mechanism of suffering has emerged from karma and disturbing emotions.

"It is the deluded people with childish minds, not the wise ones,

Who mistakenly perceive the body as beautiful.

This makes them spin for a long time in cyclic existence, the source of suffering;

Their suffering, experienced in hell, is extremely painful.

"From the crotch, awful smells are leaked;

The thighs, the calves, and the feet are joined together like a mechanical contraption.

When I examine you, I see that you are like an illusion,

Which has deceptively emerged from causes and conditions.

"When seeing that sensual enjoyments are without good qualities,

And that they lead away from the noble path of wisdom,

And that they are the same as poisonous plants or fires, or like angry vipers,

Only fools would call them happiness.

"Whoever becomes a slave of women through desire

Will stray from discipline, from concentration, and lose common sense.

Wallowing in pleasure, he will be far removed from wisdom

If he discards his joy in the Dharma and delights in desire.

"I have neither attachment nor anger;

I do not perceive anything permanent, attractive, or with a self.

I do not feel dislike or joy;

My mind is free, like the wind in the sky.

"Even if the whole world were filled with the likes of you

Who besieged me here, for eons on end,

I would not feel anger, attachment, or delusion,

Because the mind of the victorious ones is like the sky.

[F.159.a]

"Although the gods and goddesses in their purity and splendour

Have no blood or bones,

They all live in great fear

Since they lack permanence and cannot endure."

At that point Mara's daughters, skilled as they were in female deception, felt even greater lust, haughtiness, and pride. They displayed love gestures, showed off their adorned bodies, and tried even further female trickery in their attempts to seduce the Bodhisattva. On this topic, it is said:

The most seductive and sweet girls, Trsna, Rati, and Arati,

These three graceful ones hastily arrived, sent by Mara.

THE GRAND BIBLE

They danced like the shoots of young creepers on a tree blowing in the breeze

To stir lust in the Prince sitting under the tree branches.

Among all seasons, springtime is the best;

At this time men and women frolic, and darkness and dust disappear.

Cuckoos, swans, and peacocks call out, and flocks of birds fill the air;

The time to experience the joys of pleasure has arrived.

For thousands of eons he delighted in discipline, austerities, and hardships;

He is immutable like the king of mountains, with a body like the rising sun.

Like roaring thunder, his beautiful voice resounds like that of the king of beasts;

This person, who benefits others, utters only meaningful words.

Desire, disputes, hostility, and strife bring the fear of death; Ignorant fools engage in them continually, yet the skilled ones renounce them.

This is the time when the Bliss-Gone One attains immortality,

So today he will conquer Mara and become a worthy one with the ten powers.

After many magical displays they said, "You, with your lotus-like face, listen to us.

You will become a king, a supreme ruler, a powerful master of the earth;

Flocks of beautiful women will play thousands of instruments for you.

Of what use is the dress of a sage to you? Give that up and enjoy pleasures instead."

The Bodhisattva replied:

"I will be the master of the three realms, venerated by gods and humans;

I will be a king who travels by the wheel of Dharma, endowed with ten powers.

A million seekers, and those with no more need for learning, will always bow to me;

Because I enjoy the Dharma, I no longer seek joyful objects."

The daughters replied:

"For as long as your youth has not passed and you are in your prime,

For as long as disease has not struck you and you are not old and gray haired,

For as long as you have your beauty and youth, and we, too, are happy,

For so long you should enjoy the pleasures of love with a smile on your face."

The Bodhisattva replied:

"Until I attain perfect freedom and immortality, so difficult to attain,

Until I am rid of the suffering and bondage in the realms of gods and demigods,

Until old age, disease, and death show their angry faces,

For so long I will train on the auspicious path that leads to the city of fearlessness."

The daughters said:

"In the divine realm you, like Sakra, will be surrounded by divine maidens;

In the Heaven Free from Strife, the Heaven Fully Free from Strife, and the Heaven of Joy, you will be praised by the best of immortals.

In the realm of Mara, enthralled by amorous women, you will find the pleasures of love;

Relish playing with us—it will bring great pleasure!"

The Bodhisattva replied:

"Desire is ephemeral like dew on the tip of grass, or like autumn clouds;

Desire is terrifying like the wrath of the naga girls.

Sakra, the gods in the Heaven Free from Strife, and the gods in the Heaven of Joy, all fall under the sway of Mara;

Desire plagues all ignoble ones, so how could anyone rejoice in that?"

The daughters said:

"Look at these beautiful trees with fresh leaves and blooming flowers;

They resound with the cries of pheasants, cuckoo birds, and the humming of bees.

On the ground grows fresh green grass, so soft and thick;

Will you, the lion of a men, enjoy yourself with us young girls in a pleasure grove?"

The Bodhisattva replied:

"All of these trees produce shoots and flowers according to seasons,

And bees also seek out flowers because of suffering from hunger and thirst.

Since everything that grows from the ground will wither under the sun, [F.160.a]

I have resolved to actualize the nectar that all victorious ones have enjoyed."

Mara's daughters replied:

"Look at us! Our faces are like the moon and like fresh lotus flowers;

Our speech is soft and pleasant, and our teeth as white as snow or silver.

Such beauties are rare among the gods, so how about among humans?"

These women that you have here are even desired by the highest of gods."

The Bodhisattva replied:

"I see the body as impure, filled with masses of worms;

It easily breaks and perishes, and is thoroughly without pleasure.

Yet I will attain that imperishable state, venerated by the wise,

The state that brings ultimate happiness to the animate and inanimate worlds."

The daughters now put on sixty-four displays of amorous behavior;

They rang their anklets and girdles and let their clothes slip off.

Struck with the arrow of desire, infatuated, with smiles on their faces, they said:

"Lord, do we appear so ugly to you that you don't share our love?"

Knowing the faults in all of saṃsara, the Stainless One replied:

"Desire is like a sword, a spear, a trident, or a razor blade smeared with honey;

It is like the head of a viper or a fire pit—that much I have realized.

So, since women steal one's virtues, I have abandoned their company."

With all the billions of skills that induce amorous infatuation,

The girls were unable to seduce the Bliss-Gone One who has the gait of a young elephant.

So with shame and embarrassment, they now bowed to the feet of the Sage;

Giving rise to respect, joy, and love, they praised the Benefactor:

"Your face is like the spotless centre of a lotus, or the harvest moon;

Your luster is like the flames of a sacrificial fire, or the shine of the golden mountain.

May your wishes and vows, which you have made in hundreds of lives, be fulfilled;

Now that you yourself have crossed, please liberate all suffering beings."

They praised the One Who Is like the Bayur Tree or the Magnolia;

They circumambulated the Supreme Being, who was immutable like a majestic mountain.

Returning, they bowed their heads to their father and told him:

"Father, this master of gods and humans has no fear or anger.

"With a smiling face he looks on with eyes like lotus petals; Never does he look at others with attachment or a frown.

Mount Meru may tremble, the oceans dry up, and the sun and moon fall,

But never will He Who Sees the Faults of the Three Existences come under the sway of amorous women."

When Mara, the evil one, heard these words, he felt even more miserable and unhappy.

Angry and disappointed, he told his daughters: "Oh my, that stupid fool, so ignorant that he doesn't see your beauty and good looks! How can it be that we are unable get him away from the seat of awakening?"

Then once again, the daughters of Mara spoke to their father in verse:

"Although we speak to him softly and lovingly, he does not get aroused;

Even though we show him the most secret of things, he does not get hostile.

No matter what acts he witnesses, he remains without delusion;

Although he sees the entire body, his thoughts remain profound.

"He clearly realizes the faults of women;

He is far removed from lust and has no desire.

Neither in divine abodes, nor here on earth, is there a human or a god

Capable of gauging his mind and actions.

"Father, we tried every female trick on him!

With all our lust, surely his heart should have melted!

Yet, although he saw it all, his mind wasn't distracted even once;

Like the foremost king of mountains, he was immutable. [331]

"He accumulated the splendours of hundreds of virtues and qualities;

For many millions of eons he has practiced ethics and disciplined conduct.

The gods and Brahma, pure beings possessing the splendour of virtue,

Pay homage to him and touch their heads to his feet.

"Once he conquers Mara's army,

He will surely attain sacred awakening, just as the victorious ones did in the past.

[F.161.a]

Father, he does not seek fighting or quarreling with us;

Even though our forces are powerful, our task would be a difficult one.

"Father, look at the sky, where millions of perfect Bodhisattvas,

With jewels on the top of their heads, respectfully wait.

On their limbs these sources of wealth are adorned with flower garlands;

They possess the ten powers and have come here to venerate him.

"Whoever has a mind, and even that which doesn't,

Trees, mountains, gods, yakshas, and garudas,

They all bow down to that mountain of qualities.

Father, it would be better to leave him alone today."

Moreover:

"One will not cross where one cannot reach the end;

One will not dig where one cannot pull out the root.

One cannot make him angry, or even make him suffer with forbearance;

One can do nothing that would make him unhappy."

Monks, at that point the eight goddesses dwelling in the tree of awakening—Sri,

Vrddhi, Tapa, Sreyasi, Vidu, Ojobala, Satyavadini, and Samaṅgini—honoured

the Bodhisattva, made him thrive through sixteen types of splendour, and praised him:

"Sacred One, you are beautiful,

Like the moon during the bright fortnight.

With your pure mind, you are radiant,

Like the sun at dawn.

"Pure Being, you have bloomed,

Like a lotus in a pond.

Pure Being, you roar,

Like a lion with a mane, moving in the jungle.

"Supreme Being, you shine forth,

Like the king of mountains in the middle of the ocean.

Pure Being, you are elevated,

Like the ring of surrounding mountains.

"Supreme Being, you are hard to fathom,

Like the ocean rich in jewels.

Protector of the World, your mind is vast,

Like the unlimited sky.

"Pure Being, your mind is firm;

Like the earth, you sustain all beings. [F.161.b]

Supreme Being, your mind is never turbid;

Like the lake Anavapta, it is always calm.

"Supreme Being, your mind is without a fixed abode;

Like wind, it never lingers anywhere in the world.

Supreme Being, you are hard to meet with;

Like the king of brightness, you are free from all conceit.

"Sacred One, you are very powerful;

Like Narayana, you are hard to tame.

Protector of the World, your resolve is firm;

You will not move from the seat of awakening.

"Like a lightning bolt released from the hand of Indra,

Supreme Being, you cannot be turned back.

Supreme Being, you will attain your aim in full;

Soon you will be endowed with the complete ten powers."

Monks, in this way the goddesses at the Bodhi tree glorified the Bodhisattva through the sixteen types of magnificence.

Monks, at that moment the divine sons of the pure abodes tried to discourage Mara in sixteen different ways. What were these sixteen? They were:

"Evil one, you are lost;

You are brooding like an old crane.

Evil one, you are powerless,

Like an old elephant sinking in a swamp.

"Evil one, you are on your own,

Like a loser pretending to be a hero.

Evil one, you have no one with you,

Like someone suffering from a contagious disease, abandoned in a forest.

"Evil one, you are weak,

Like a young bull pained by a heavy load.

Evil one, you are thrown on your back,

Like a tree tossed about by the wind.

"Evil one, you are on the wrong path,

Like a traveler who has lost his way.

Evil one, you are the lowest of the low,

Like a poor man who gets envious.

"Evil one, you are garrulous,

Like an impudent crow.

Evil one, you are overcome with pride,

THE GRAND BIBLE

Like an ungrateful ruffian.
"Evil one, today you will flee,
Like a jackal at the sound of a lion's roar. [F.162.a]
Evil one, today you will be scattered about,
Like a bird tossed around by the roaring wind.
"Evil one, not knowing when the time is right,
You are like a beggar whose merit has run out.
Evil one, today you will be abandoned,
Like a broken pot full of dust.
"Evil one, today you will be restrained by the Bodhisattva,
Like a snake by a spell.
Evil one, you are completely powerless,
Like Urunda, who lost his arms and legs."
Monks, in these sixteen ways the gods from the pure realms tried to discourage Mara. And, monks, the gods who attended upon the Bodhisattva now also tried to break Mara's resolve in sixteen ways. What were these sixteen? They were:
"Evil one, today you will be defeated by the Bodhisattva,
Like an enemy soldier by a hero.
Evil one, today you will be held down by the Bodhisattva,
Like a weak wrestler by a powerful one.
"Evil one, today you will be outmatched by the Bodhisattva,
Like a firefly by the sun.
Evil one, today you will be scattered by the Bodhisattva,
Like a handful of chaff by a strong wind.
"Evil one, today you will be terrified by the Bodhisattva,
Like a jackal by a lion.
Evil one, today you will be felled by the Bodhisattva,
Like a great sala tree whose roots have been cut.
"Evil one, today you will be destroyed by the Bodhisattva,
Like a hostile city by a great king.
Evil one, today you will be dried up by the Bodhisattva,
Like the water-filled footprint of a cow.
"Evil one, today you will flee from the Bodhisattva,
Like a criminal escaping execution.
Evil one, today you will be sent swirling by the Bodhisattva,
Like a swarm of bees by the heat of fire.
"Evil one, today you will be hurt by the Bodhisattva,
Like a lawful king who has lost his kingdom.
Evil one, today you will brood because of the Bodhisattva,
Like an old crane with clipped wings.
"Evil one, today you will be deprived of livelihood by the Bodhisattva,
Like a weary traveler without provisions in a wilderness.
Evil one, today you will be weeping because of the Bodhisattva,
Like someone shipwrecked at sea.
"Evil one, today you will be depleted of life force by the Bodhisattva,
Like grass and trees by the fire at the end of an eon.
Evil one, today you will be crushed by the Bodhisattva,
Like a mountaintop by a mighty thunderbolt."
Monks, although the divine sons who attended upon the Bodhisattva tried to discourage Mara, the evil one, in these sixteen ways, Mara would not be deterred. On this topic, it is said:
Although hosts of deities ask him to turn back, Antaka does not pay heed;
Instead he says, "Tear him up! Beat him! Destroy him!
Don't let him escape alive!
If he is liberated, he will liberate my realm and other realms as well;
But the only liberation in store for this mendicant is to get up and flee."
The Bodhisattva said:
"The king of mountains, Mount Meru, may move and all beings may cease to be;
All the stars, the planets, and the moon may fall from the sky to the earth;
It is possible that all beings may think and act in unison and the great oceans may dry out;
But it is impossible that someone like me would ever move from the king of trees."
Mara replied:
"I am lord of desires and master of the universe.
I rule over gods, demigods, humans, and animals;
All of them fall under my control.
So get up! Since you are in my realm, follow my orders!"
The Bodhisattva said:
"If you are master of sense pleasures, you are clearly not a master at all;
Look who I am in reality—I am master of the Dharma.
If you are the master of sense pleasures, you should not go to the lower realms;
While you watch powerlessly, I shall attain awakening."
Mara replied:
"Monk, what are you doing here in the wilderness on your own?
It is not an easy task to find that which you seek.
Bhrgu, Aṅgiras, and others who exerted themselves in austerities
Did not attain that supreme state, so forget about you, an ordinary man."

The Bodhisattva said:
"With a mind possessed by anger and full of desire for the divine realms,
And a belief that the self is either permanent or impermanent,
And the thought that liberation is a place you can go to,
With such mistaken preconceptions, past sages practiced austerities.
"Not knowing the truth, they preached the existence of a soul,
Viciously claiming that this soul is all-pervasive, confined to locations, eternal,
With form, without a form, with qualities, without qualities,
An agent, and not an agent. This is what they claimed.
"But today, sitting here on this seat, I will attain stainless awakening;
I will defeat you, Mara, and repel your army and soldiers.
I will explain to the world about the origin and arising of things,
And also about nirvana, the cool state where suffering is pacified."
Mara, upset, angry, and furious, shouted harsh words:
"Catch that Gautama, who sits alone in the wilderness, and bring him quickly to me!
Take him to my palace, shackle, fetter, and yoke him, and make him my gatekeeper!
I will watch him suffer and cry out uncontrollably in many different ways, a slave of the gods."
The Bodhisattva replied:
"It is possible that someone can make drawings in the empty sky,
Or catch the blowing wind with a lasso,
Or make the bright sun and moon fall from the sky to the earth.
Yet you, or countless beings like you, will never force me away from this tree."
The powerful army of demons came forth.
With wild cries, playing conchs and various drums, they asked:
"When you see this terrifying army of Mara,
Oh, our son, our dear child, are you not annihilated already?
"You are as bright as gold from the Jambu River, or the pericarp of campaka flower;
You are youthful, praised and honoured by gods and humans.
But today you will meet your doom in this great battle;
You will come under the control of Mara, like the moon seized by the demigod."
With the voice of Brahma and the call of the cuckoo bird,
The Bliss-Gone One spoke to the hordes of yakshas and raksasas:
"He who hopes to remove someone like me from this perfect tree
Is a fool who tries to frighten space itself.
"No one can harm me here beneath this tree,
Not even someone who can destroy the trichiliocosm and count its motes of dust,
Not even someone who can draw all the water in the oceans through a single straw,
Not even someone who can split the supreme diamond mountain in a single instant."
Mara, being thus restrained, became angry;
He held aloft his unsheathed, sharp sword.
"Monk, quick, get up and do as I tell you,
Or I will cut you right away like a bamboo twig or durva grass."
The Bodhisattva replied:
"Even if this trichiliocosm were filled with demons,
And each of them brandished a sword as large as Mount Meru,
They could not bend a hair on my body, let alone kill me.
Do not disbelieve me; I am reminding you of my firm resolve."
With faces of camels, oxen, and elephants, and terrifying eyes,
With venomous snakes for arms, with horrible poisonous eyes,
They hurled erupting volcanoes at him,
As well as trees with their roots, and copper and iron.
They gathered like clouds from the four directions,
Roaring and raining down bolts of lightning, iron balls,
Swords, spears, sharp axes, and poisoned arrows.
They shattered the earth's surface and pulverized trees.
Some had one hundred hands and shot one hundred arrows.
From their mouths they shot out poisonous snakes and fire,
While seizing crocodiles and other aquatic creatures from the ocean.
Some transformed into garudas and pounced at snakes.
Infuriated, some hurled iron balls the size of Mount Meru,
As well as blazing mountain peaks.
Hitting the ground, they made the earth quake
And stirred up the underground masses of water.

Some jumped in front of him and some attacked him from behind;
Yelling out, "You child!" they attacked from the left and from the right.
Their hands and feet were turned the wrong way, and their heads were afire;
Blazing lightning bolts sprang forth from their eyes.
As he witnessed this army of demons, ugly with unnatural forms,
This pure being understood that they were like an illusion.
"There is no eye, no man, no women, and no self;
There is no ear, no nose, no tongue, and no body.
No one created these phenomena and no one experiences them;
They arise in dependency and are empty both from within and without."
As he proclaimed the truth that phenomena are empty,
The yakshas who are agreeable to discipline
Perceived the weapons in their hands to be flower garlands.
Such was the result of the words spoken by the One Who Always Speaks the Truth.
He gracefully ran his right hand over his body from head to toe—
The hand, which was adorned with a fine web,
Which had beautiful copper-coloured nails, sparkling like gold from the Jambu River.
And was marked with a thousand-spoked wheel, and was auspicious with the merit of virtue.
He stretched out his hand, like a lightning bolt striking from the sky,
And said, "This earth is my witness.
In the past I have made millions of elaborate sacrifices
And never denied those who petitioned me.
"Water and fire and wind are my witnesses,
And so are Brahma, the lord of beings, the moon, the sun, and the stars.
The buddhas in the ten directions are my witnesses;
My discipline, practice, and the superior branches of awakening are all my witnesses.
"Generosity, discipline, and patience are my witnesses;
Diligence, concentration, and knowledge,
The four limitless contemplations, and the five higher knowledges are my witnesses.
In fact all the gradual practices of awakening are my witnesses.
"However many beings there are in the ten directions,
With all their strength of merit, discipline, and wisdom,
And all their many unrestricted sacrifices,
They do not equal even 1 percent of the qualities in a single hair of mine."
He gracefully touched his hand to the earth
So that the earth resounded like a copper vase.
As Mara heard this he fell to the ground,
And then heard the words, "Strike! Catch this friend of darkness."
As Mara's body started to sweat, his splendour disappeared and his face grew pale;
Mara now saw himself overcome by old age.
He beat his chest and cried out in fear, with no protector in sight;
Mara's mind was confused and his thoughts befuddled.
His elephants, horses, conveyances, and chariots all fell to the ground;
The yakshas, kumbhandas, and flesh eaters were terrified and ran.
Disoriented, they could not find their way, and without resting place or protection,
They fled like birds seeing a forest fire.
Parents, children, sisters, and brothers asked about them:
"Where were they seen? Where have they gone?"
And in this way they started to argue and fight with each other:
"Such suffering has befallen us, and there are no prospects for living."
The great army of demons, so utterly unshakable,
Was now all gone, dispersed, and no more together.
For seven days they did not see each other,
And when they finally did see their phantasmal forms, they said, "Great to see you alive."
The goddess in the tree felt compassion;
She took her vase with water and sprinkled the friend of darkness.
"Quick, get up! You must depart without delay!
For this is what happens to those who pay no heed to the words of the Master."
Mara replied:
"I did not listen to the kind and helpful advice of my sons,
And offended against a perfectly pure being.
Therefore I now reap suffering, fear, misfortune, grief, ruin, Lamentation, loss of honour, and this miserable state."

The goddess replied:

"A fool who offends against those who are faultless
Shall himself meet with many troubles—
Fear, suffering, calamities, misery,
Lamentation, murder, and bondage."

The leaders of gods, demigods, garudas, kinnaras, and raksasas,

Brahma, Indra, and the gods in the Heaven of Making Use of Others' Emanations

And the Heaven of Joy all proclaimed his victory and called out:

"You have conquered Mara's army! Hero of the World, be victorious!"

They offered garlands of pearls, crescent moons, parasols, flags, and banners,

And showered him with flowers and powders of aloe, tagara, and sandalwood. [343]

They played music and sang,

"Sit at the tree, O Hero, O Lion Who Conquers His Enemies.

"At this supreme seat, you have conquered with love the wicked army of demons.

Hero, today you shall attain awakening!

The ten powers, the unique qualities, the distinct realisations,

And the experiences of a buddha you shall attain today.

"In order to tame Mara, you entered this battle.

There were 360 million beings who witnessed

The power and might of a perfect bodhisattva,

And 240 million who formed the wish for the perfect awakening of a buddha!"

This concludes the twenty-first chapter on conquering Mara. [F.165.a]

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 22 — Perfect and Complete Awakening

[Now the stage is set for the Bodhisattva to attain awakening under the Bodhi Tree, a gradual process that unfolds throughout the night until he fully and perfectly awakens at dawn to become the Buddha ("awakened") or Tathagata, as he is known subsequent to his awakening.]

Monks, once the Bodhisattva had destroyed his demonic opponents, vanquished his enemies, triumphed in the face of battle, and raised high the parasols, standards, and banners of conquest, he settled into the first meditative concentration. That state is free from desires, free of factors connected with evil deeds and nonvirtues, accompanied by thought and analysis, and imbued with the joy and pleasure born of discernment.

When he had brought about the cessation of thought and analysis, he became perfectly quiet in and of himself, and therefore his mind became concentrated. Through this he settled into the second meditative concentration, which is free of thought and analysis and is imbued with the joy and pleasure born of meditative absorption.

Through disenchantment with joy, he remained impartial, maintained mindfulness and introspection, and experienced physical pleasure. He thus settled into the third meditative concentration, which is unconnected with joy. The noble ones call such a person the impartial one dwelling on pleasure that is imbued with mindfulness.

Through relinquishing pleasure at that moment, and having formerly relinquished pain in the past, both mental pleasure and displeasure vanished. Thus he settled into the fourth meditative concentration, which is perfectly pristine impartiality and mindfulness, unconnected with pleasure or pain.

While the Bodhisattva's mind—purified and cleansed, lucid, free of basic and subsidiary afflictions, gentle, adaptable, and immovable—was immersed in this way, in the early station of the night he produced the intent to actualize the knowledge that sees wisdom with the divine eye, and so he directed his mind toward that purpose.

Then the Bodhisattva, with the pristine divine eye beyond that of humans, looked at sentient beings. He saw them dying and being born, in all their beauty and ugliness, in favourable and unfavourable circumstances, degenerating or advancing precisely in accordance with their actions. With this understanding he thought:

"Alas! Sentient beings engage in negative physical, verbal, and mental conduct. Harboring wrong views, they revile the noble ones. As they engage in the actions associated with wrong views, once their bodies collapse and they die, they fall into bad migrations and are born among the hell realms. Yet other sentient beings engage in negative physical, verbal, and mental conduct. Harboring the correct view, they do not revile noble ones. Since they engage in the actions associated with the correct view, once their bodies collapse and they die, they are born into pleasant existences in the god realms."

In this manner, with his pristine divine eye beyond that of humans, the Bodhisattva saw sentient beings dying and being born, in all their beauty and ugliness, in favourable and unfavourable circumstances, degenerating and advancing, respectively, precisely in accordance with their actions. Monks, this was indeed how, during the first station of the night, the Bodhisattva actualized knowledge, removed darkness, and lit the light.

Then, while his mind—purified and cleansed, lucid, free of basic and subsidiary afflictions, supple, flexible, and immovable—was immersed in this way, in the middle station of the night the Bodhisattva produced the intent to actualize the knowledge that sees the wisdom of recollecting past lives, and so he directed his mind toward that purpose.

In this way he recollects the previous lives of himself and other sentient beings, starting with one, two, three, four, and five lifetimes, then ten, twenty, thirty, forty, and fifty more lifetimes, then one hundred lifetimes, one thousand lifetimes, one hundred thousand lifetimes, then many hundreds of thousands of lifetimes, ten million lifetimes, a billion lifetimes, ten billion lifetimes, a trillion lifetimes, and a quadrillion lifetimes, then several billion, several tens of billions, several trillions, and several quadrillions of lifetimes, all the way up to the lifetimes in an eon of destruction, an eon of formation, an eon of both destruction and formation, and several eons of both destruction and formation. He remembered the former lives of himself and others in the greatest detail, thinking:

"In that place I had this name, this surname, this family, this caste, this diet, this lifespan, stayed for this duration, and experienced these kinds of pleasure and pain.

After falling from there, I was born here. After falling from there, I was born here..."

Then, while his mind—purified and cleansed, lucid, free of basic and subsidiary afflictions, supple, flexible, and immovable—was immersed in this way, during the final station of the night, just at the break of dawn, right at the time of night when the morning drum is beaten, the Bodhisattva produced the intent to actualize the knowledge that brings suffering and its origin to an end and realizes the insight that exhausts defilements, and so he directed his mind to that purpose.

Then he thought: "How miserable this world is! It is anguished by birth, old age, sickness, death, departure, and rebirth, but it does not know how to remove itself from this massive heap of pure anguish, marked foremost by old age, sickness, and death. Alas! If only beings understood how to extinguish this massive heap of pure anguish marked foremost by old age, sickness, and death."

Then the Bodhisattva continued to think: "What is the prerequisite for old age and dying to take place? And what is the causal condition of aging and death?" It then occurred to him: "Aging and death happen when there is birth. Birth is the causal condition of old age and death."

Then the Bodhisattva thought again: "What is the prerequisite for birth to take place? What is the causal condition of birth?" It then occurred to him: "Birth happens when there is existence. Existence is the causal condition of birth."

Then the Bodhisattva wondered: "What is the prerequisite for existence to emerge?"

What is the causal condition of existence?" It then occurred to the Bodhisattva: "Existence occurs when there is clinging. Clinging is the causal condition of existence."

Then the Bodhisattva wondered: "What is the prerequisite for clinging to occur?"

What is the causal condition of clinging?" It then occurred to him: "Clinging occurs when there is craving. Craving is the causal condition of clinging."

Then the Bodhisattva thought: "What is the prerequisite for craving to take place?"

What is the causal condition of craving?" It then occurred to him: "Craving occurs when there is feeling. Feeling is the causal condition of craving."

The Bodhisattva then wondered: "What is the prerequisite for feeling to take place? What is the causal condition of feeling?" It then occurred to him: "Feeling happens when there is contact. Contact is the causal condition of feeling."

Then the Bodhisattva thought: "What is the prerequisite for contact to occur?"

What is the causal condition of contact?" It then occurred to him: "Contact happens when the six sense fields are present. The six sense fields are the causal condition of contact."

Then the Bodhisattva wondered: "What is the prerequisite for the six sense fields to emerge? What is the causal condition of the six sense fields?" It then occurred to him: "The six sense fields emerge when there is name and form. Name and form is the causal condition of the six sense fields." The Bodhisattva then thought: "What is the prerequisite for name and form to come into being? What is the causal condition of name and form?" It then occurred to him: "Name and form come into being when there is consciousness. Consciousness is the causal condition of name and form."

Then the Bodhisattva wondered: "What is the prerequisite for consciousness to form? What is the causal condition of consciousness?" It then occurred to him: "Consciousness emerges when there are formations. Formations are the causal condition of consciousness."

The Bodhisattva then pondered: "What is the prerequisite for formations to form?"

What is the causal condition for formations?" It then occurred to him: "Formations come into being when there is ignorance. Ignorance is the causal condition of formations."

Then, monks, the thought occurred to the Bodhisattva: "Ignorance provides the causal condition for formations. Formations provide the causal condition for consciousness.

Consciousness provides the causal condition for name and form. Name and form provides the causal condition for the six sense fields. The six sense fields provide the causal condition for contact. Contact provides the causal condition for feeling. Feeling provides the causal condition for craving. Craving provides the causal condition for clinging. Clinging provides the causal condition for existence. Existence provides the causal condition for birth. Birth provides the causal condition for old age and death, lamentation, pain, despair, and torment. Such is how this massive heap of pure anguish comes into being."

Monks, through considering and ruminating over these factors, which had never before been heard, there dawned in the Bodhisattva wisdom, vision, knowledge, intelligence, prudence, and insight, and a light began to shine.

Then the Bodhisattva thought: "What must be absent for old age and death not to occur? What must be prevented to eliminate old age and death?" It then occurred to him: "When there is no birth, old age and death do not happen. Old age and death are prevented by preventing birth."

Then the Bodhisattva pondered: "What must be absent for birth not to happen?"

What must be prevented to eliminate birth?" The thought then occurred to him:

"When there is no existence, birth does not take place. Birth is eliminated by preventing existence."

The Bodhisattva then considered: "What must be absent to avoid everything down to formations to manifest? What must be prevented to eliminate formations?" It then occurred to him: "When there is no ignorance, formations do not form. Preventing ignorance prevents formations. By preventing formations, consciousness is prevented, and so on, until birth is prevented, thus putting an end to old age and death, anguish, lamentation, pain, despair, and torment. Such is how this massive heap of pure anguish is brought to an end."

Monks, through considering and ruminating over these factors that had never before been heard, there dawned in the Bodhisattva wisdom, vision, knowledge, intelligence, prudence, and insight, and a light began to shine.

Monks, on that occasion I accurately understood four truths [The Four Noble Truths]. I understood: (1st) the defiled is suffering, (2nd) the source of the defiled, (3rd) how the defiled is brought to cessation, and (4th) the path that leads to the cessation of the defiled. I accurately understood the defilement of desire, the defilement of craving, the defilement of ignorance, and the defilement of beliefs. I understood where exactly these defilements come to an end without leaving any residue, and where exactly these defilements vanish and disappear without leaving any residue.

I accurately understood the identity of ignorance, the source of ignorance, the cessation of ignorance, and the path leading to its cessation. I understood where exactly all ignorance without exception vanishes and disappears. And further I accurately understood the precise identity of formations, the source of formations, the cessation of formations, and the path leading to their cessation. I accurately understood the precise identity of consciousness, the source of consciousness, the cessation of consciousness, and the path leading to its cessation.

I accurately understood the precise identity of name and form, the source of name and form, the cessation of name and form, and the path leading to its cessation. I accurately understood the precise identity of the six sense fields, the source of the six sense fields, the cessation of the six sense fields, and the path leading to their cessation. I accurately understood the precise identity of contact, the source of contact, the cessation of contact, and the path leading to its cessation. I accurately understood the precise identity of feeling, the source of feeling, the cessation of feeling, and the path leading to its cessation. I accurately understood the precise identity of craving, the source of craving, the cessation of craving, and the path leading to its cessation. I accurately understood the precise identity of clinging, the source of clinging, and the path leading to its cessation. I accurately understood the precise identity of existence, the source of existence, the cessation of existence, and the path leading to its cessation. I accurately understood the precise identity of birth, the source of birth, the cessation of birth, and the path leading to its cessation.

I accurately understood the precise identity of old age, the source of old age, the cessation of old age, and the path leading to its cessation. I accurately understood the precise identity of death, the source of death, the cessation of death, and the path leading to its cessation. I accurately understood precisely how this massive heap of pure suffering, with its anguish, lamentation, pain, despair, and torment comes into being and how it ceases. I accurately understood the precise identity of suffering, the source of suffering, the cessation of suffering, and the path leading to its cessation.

Thus, monks, sure enough, during the final station of night, just at the break of dawn, right at the time for the beating of the morning drum, the Bodhisattva—the being, the good being, the supreme being, the great being, the ox among men, the elephant among men, the lion among men, the bull among men, the hero among men, the champion among men, the adept among men, the lotus among men, the white lotus among men, the supreme beast of burden among men, the unexcelled charioteer among men—reached unexcelled, perfect and complete awakening, attaining the threefold knowledge. He did so through knowledge that consists of one-pointed insight into everything that might be known, understood, attained, realized, and actualised via the wisdom of the noble ones.

Monks, then the divine sons said, "Friends, let us scatter flowers! The Blessed One has reached perfect awakening!"

But just then, some divine sons who had seen buddhas before came together and told the others, "Friends, since perfect and complete buddhas of the past all produced and manifested a sign, do not toss flowers until the Blessed One has made a sign."

Monks, the Thus-Gone One knew that the divine sons were in doubt, so he ascended into the sky to the height of seven palm trees, and while seated there he uttered this phrase of exultation:

"The path has been interrupted;
Impurities have been extinguished.
The outflows have dried up and flow no longer;
The path, now ended, I travel no longer.
This is called the end of suffering!"

The divine sons thus strewed the Thus-Gone One with celestial flowers, piling them up to his knees.

Monks, when the Thus-Gone One reached complete awakening in this manner, a thick darkness was lifted, craving was purified, beliefs were eradicated, the afflictions were rattled, the splinter was removed, the knot was untied, the flag of pride was brought down, the flag of righteousness was lifted, latent formations were uprooted, the suchness of phenomena became known, the absolute was comprehended, the realm of phenomena was understood, the nature of sentient beings was ascertained, those oriented toward reality were approved of, those oriented toward mistakenness were disapproved of, the indeterminate were accepted, the faculties of sentient beings were seen in all their variety, the conduct of sentient beings was understood, the cure for the illnesses of sentient beings was comprehended, and the medicinal concoction of immortality was employed. He became the king of physicians, who would liberate beings from all suffering and establish them in the bliss of nirvana; he took his seat on the magnificent royal throne of the thus-gone ones, the essence of the thus-gone ones. He discovered the means to complete liberation and entered the city of omniscience, where he mingled perfectly with all buddhas and became inseparable from the comprehension of the realm of phenomena.

Monks, the Thus-Gone One abided on the seat of awakening for the first seven days, reflecting, "Here I have brought an end to the suffering of birth, old age, and death, which has been happening since time immemorial."

Monks, indeed, the very moment that the Bodhisattva attained omniscience, all beings throughout all the worlds in the ten directions instantly became ecstatic.

All the worlds were flooded with bright light, including even the dark spaces between them that were riddled with evil.

All the worlds throughout the ten directions shook in six ways: they quivered, trembled, and quaked, wobbled, rocked, and swayed; they vibrated, shuddered, and reeled, rattled, shook, and convulsed; they clattered, rattled, and clanged, boomed, thundered, and roared.

All the buddhas offered congratulations to the Thus-Gone One for reaching perfect and complete awakening and conferred upon him religious gifts. With these religious gifts, this trichilocosm became covered with a jewel parasol, and from that jewel parasol issued forth a network of light rays, which illuminated the immeasurable and innumerable worlds throughout the ten directions.

Then the bodhisattvas and divine sons throughout the ten directions uttered an expression of joy:

"An adept among beings, a lotus on the lake of wisdom, has appeared.

Untainted by mundane concerns,
He will cause a cloud of great compassion to mass,
Which will shower throughout the realm of phenomena.
"The gentle rain of Dharma, medicine to living beings,
Will cause all the seeds of the roots of virtue to sprout,
Bring growth to the saplings of faith,
And yield the fruits of liberation."

On this topic, it is said:

Since he defeated Mara, along with his hordes, he is indeed a lion among men.

When this teacher actualized the bliss of concentration

And attained the threefold knowledge by means of the tenfold power,

Many tens of millions of buddha realms throughout the ten directions trembled.

Those bodhisattvas who had previously come desiring the Dharma

Bowed before his feet and said: "Are you not tired?

We have witnessed the army, as terrifying it was,

Vanquished by the strength of your insight, merit, and diligence."

Parasols were carried by the buddhas of one hundred billion realms,

Who said, "Well done, Great Being! You overpowered the demonic hordes

And attained the sublime state, deathless and free of anguish.

Swiftly shower down the rain of true Dharma throughout the three worlds."

The best of beings throughout the ten directions extended their arms

And said in the voice of a cuckoo's call:

"Just as we attained awakening, you too have reached the pristine state;

We are just like butter and clarified butter."

Then the divine maidens of the desire realm perceived that the Thus-Gone One on the seat of awakening had attained higher knowledge, fulfilled his purpose, and become victorious in battle. He had vanquished the demonic opponents, raised parasols, standards, and flags, and become a hero, a supreme victor, a man, a great man, a supreme physician, and a great remover of thorns. Like a lion, he was fearless and without worry. Like an elephant, he was gentle. Since he had relinquished the three stains, he was stainless. He was knowledgeable, since he had actualized the threefold knowledge. He had reached the other shore, since he had crossed the four rivers. He was of royal caste since he upheld the single jewel parasol, a priest of the three worlds since he had abandoned evil actions, a mendicant since he had cracked open the eggshell of ignorance, an ascetic since he had perfectly transcended all attachment, a gentleman since he had eradicated afflictions, a hero since he did not let the banner fall, a powerhouse since he was endowed with the ten powers, a jewel mine since he was replete with all the gems of the Dharma.

Knowing this, the divine maidens approached the seat of awakening and praised the Thus-Gone One with these verses:

"Having defeated the demon hordes

At the trunk of the king of trees,

He sits there unshakable like Mount Meru,

Fearless and silent.

"Through practicing generosity, discipline, and restraint

For many tens of millions of eons,

He attained perfect sublime awakening

And therefore shines here today.

"Through practicing discipline, vows, and austerities

For many tens of millions of eons

While seeking awakening,

He outshines Sakra and Brahma.

"Through wearing the strong armour of forbearance

For many tens of millions of eons,

He embraced suffering

And therefore shines like gold.

"Through the strength and intensity of his valor

Over many tens of millions of eons,

He drove away his opponents

And thus triumphed over Mara's army.

"Through his concentration, higher knowledge, and wisdom

Enacted over many tens of millions of eons,

He revered the best of sages

And is therefore honoured now himself.

"Through his insight, learning, and accumulations,

Developed over the course of tens of millions of eons,

He has benefited tens of millions of sentient beings

And thus swiftly attained awakening.

"He has triumphed over the demon of the aggregates

And likewise over the lord of death and the demon of afflictions.

He has also triumphed over the demon of the gods—

Thus he has no anguish.

"This god of gods,

Revered even by the gods,

Is worthy of reverence throughout the three worlds

As a field for those seeking merit.

"He yields the fruit of immortality;

He is a sublime object of veneration.

When a donation is given to him, the result is never-ending

Until the attainment of supreme awakening.

"The hair between his eyebrows radiates light,

Illuminating many tens of millions of locales.

Outshining even the sun and the moon,

He is a light unto all sentient beings.

"His form is handsome—

Sublime and well-proportioned.

Replete with the best of characteristics and poised to be of benefit,

It is worthy of reverence throughout the three worlds.

"His eyes are pristine:

They spontaneously see

The myriad insentient and sentient,

The locales and multitudes of beings.

"His ears are pristine:

They hear infinite sounds,

Those of gods and humans

And those of the victorious ones' Dharma.

"His tongue is long

And as melodious as a cuckoo's voice.

Let us listen to him speak about the Dharma,

An ambrosia that brings great peace.

"Even witnessing Mara's army,

His mind is unperturbed.

Even seeing the multitudes of gods,

His sensible mind is not ecstatic.

"It was not with knives and arrows

That he defeated Mara's army.

Rather it was with truth, restraint, and austerity

That he overcame the villainous thugs.

"Without budging from his seat,

His body was unharmed.

On that occasion he was neither affectionate

Nor even angry.

"Those gods and humans

Who listen to the Dharma from you,

And strive to accomplish it,

Procure their desired acquisition.

"Through the merit of praising you,

O Victorious One, replete with the resplendence of merit,

May we all immediately become like you,

O Moon among Men!"

Once the guide, a bull among men, had awakened to buddhahood,

Hundreds of billions of realms trembled and Mara was vanquished.

Then, in the cadence of Brahma and the melody of a cuckoo, The Guide first spoke these verses:

"Merit, fully ripened, brings happiness and vanquishes all suffering.

The wishes of a person with merit will be accomplished;

He will overcome Mara, quickly reach awakening,

And attain nirvana, the tranquil state of peace.

"Thus who could get their fill of making merit?

Who could be satiated with listening to ambrosia-like Dharma?

Who could get enough of dwelling in deserted forests?

Who could get enough of working for the welfare of beings?"

Extending his hand, he said to the bodhisattvas:

"Respect has been paid, thus return to your own places."

All of them bowed to the feet of the Thus-Gone One

And returned to their own abodes, in magnificent arrays.

After witnessing the great demonic horde advancing

And the Bliss-Gone One toying auspiciously with them,

Beings, out of an unparalleled wish to reach awakening, said:

"May we vanquish Mara and his horde, and thus reach the deathless state."

Monks, even while the Thus-Gone One reached perfect and complete awakening seated on his lion's throne at the trunk of the tree of awakening, he simultaneously manifested such innumerable displays of awakened playful activity that they would not be easy to reveal even in an eon.

On this topic, it is said:

The earth became as even as the palm of a hand;

Hundred-petaled lotuses in full bloom arose in a flood of light.

Hundreds of thousands of gods bowed down to the seat of awakening

And witnessed there the One Who Was First Heralded by a Lion's Roar.

Hundreds of trees in the trichilocosm and also its mountains,

Along with Meru, king of mountains, bowed to the seat of awakening.

Approaching the one with the ten powers, Brahma and Sakra paid homage.

Such was the play of the Lion among Men while at the seat of awakening.

Hundreds of thousands of light rays radiated from his body,

Pervading the perfect realms of the victorious ones and pacifying the three lower realms.

Through this, the unfortunate states were dried up in a mere fraction of an instant,

And hardness, conceit, and hatred were rendered harmless to any sentient being.

Such was the play of the Lion among Men while he sat in his seat.

The resplendent tuft of hair on his forehead

THE GRAND BIBLE

Outshone the radiance of the sun, moon, jewels, fire, lightning, and gods.

And the crown of the Teacher's head was not beheld by any being whatsoever.

Such was the play of the Lion among Men while he sat in his seat.

By touching the earth with the palm of his hand, it trembled in six ways;

This shook Mara's hordes as if they were tufts of cotton.

Mara, brandishing an arrow, etched images in the earth.

Such was the play of the Lion among Men while he sat in his seat.

This concludes the twenty-second chapter on perfect and complete awakening.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 23 — Exaltation

[Recognising his epic achievement, the entire pantheon of divine beings visits the Thus-Gone One, making offerings and singing his praise.]

Then the divine sons from the pure abodes circumambulated the Thus-Gone One, who sat at the seat of awakening. They showered him with a rain of divine sandalwood powder and praised him with these fitting verses:

"You are a light that has dawned upon this world!

Illuminating Lord of the World,

You have given eyes for abandoning afflictions

To this world gone blind!

"You are victorious in battle!

Through merit you have fulfilled your aim!

Replete with virtuous qualities,

You will satisfy beings!

"Sinless, you have crossed the mire

And stand on dry ground, O Gautama!

You will ferry across other sentient beings,

Who are carried away by the swift current!

"Your great insight exalts you!

You are without peer throughout the worlds!

You are untainted by mundane concerns,

Like a lotus floating on water!

"With the torch of your insight,

You can awaken

This long-slumbering world,

Shrouded in the fog of darkness!

"Into the world of the living,

Chronically troubled with the disease of afflictions,

You have come, O King of Physicians,

To cure the world of all illnesses!

"Now that you have appeared, O Lord,

The unfortunate states will become vacant!

Gods and humans

Will become filled with happiness!

"Those who seek to behold you,

O Gentle Bull among Men,

Will never go to the lower realms

For thousands of eons!

"Those who listen to the Dharma

Will become scholars and be free of illness.

They will be profound and bring an end to the aggregates,

And be free from fear!

"As they sever the bonds of affliction,

They will all be free of clinging

And swiftly become liberated,

And thus attain the fruition of supreme virtue!

"They will be objects of generosity in the world,

Worthy of receiving gifts!

Donations to them will not diminish,

But become causes for all beings to reach nirvana!"

Monks, once the divine sons from the realm of the pure abode had praised the Thus-Gone One in this manner, they prostrated to the Thus-Gone One with palms joined and stood to one side.

Monks, then the luminous divine sons paid homage to the Thus-Gone One sitting at the seat of awakening with a plethora of flowers, incense, perfumes, garlands, unguents, parasols, standards, and flags. When the offerings had been made, they circumambulated him three times and then praised him with these verses:

"Your mind is profound, O Sage, and your voice is sweet;

O Supreme Sage, your song-like voice is melodious like Brahma's.

You have discovered the absolute awakening, most sublime!

Homage to you, who has reached the culmination of all melodious tunes!

"You are protection, an island, the highest goal!

You are the compassionate and loving lord of this world!

You are the supreme physician, remover of thorns!

You are the healer who brings sublime benefit!

"As soon as you saw Buddha Dipamkara,

You attained the cloud masses of love and compassion.

Release a torrential downpour of ambrosia, O Lord!

Quell the torment of gods and humans!

"Like a lotus you are untainted by the three worlds!

Like Meru you are immovable and unshakable!

Like a vajra your pledge is unwavering!

Like the moon you are replete with the best of all qualities!"

Monks, once the luminous gods had praised the Thus-Gone One so, they bowed to him with palms joined and stood to one side.

Then the gods from the Brahma realm, led by the son of gods, Subrahman, covered the Thus-Gone One sitting at the seat of awakening with a jewel net studded with many trillions of gems. They circumambulated him three times, then praised him with these fitting verses:

"With your virtuous and stainless insight, you radiate and shine.

You are replete with the thirty-two most sublime characteristics;

Attentive and intelligent, you possess wisdom.

Tireless One, to you we bow down.

"Utterly devoid of the three stains, you are stainless and pure.

Renowned throughout the three worlds, discoverer of the threefold knowledge,

You bestow insight into the threefold liberation.

We bow to you who possesses the three stainless eyes. [360]

"You have banished this foul dark eon, you of well-restrained mind;

Exalted in compassion and love, you work for the welfare of beings.

Sage Exalted in Joy, your mind is tranquil;

Deliverer from Doubt, you delight in impartiality.

"Exalted in discipline and austerity, you act for the welfare of beings;

Having purified your own conduct, you have reached the culmination of conduct.

As the teacher of the four truths, you delight in emancipation;

Being liberated yourself, you liberate other beings as well.

"When Mara, powerful and persistent, arrived,

You defeated him with your insight, diligence, and love,

And then you attained the deathless supreme state.

Vanquisher of the Villainous Hordes, to you we pay homage!"

Monks, once the gods of the Brahma realm, led by the divine son Subrahman, had praised the Thus-Gone One with these verses, they bowed to him with palms joined and stood to one side.

Then those sons of Mara who were on the side of righteousness approached the Thus-Gone One and covered him with giant jewel parasols and canopies. Then with palms joined, they praised the Thus-Gone One with these fitting verses:

"When we, the dreadful army of Mara, appeared before you,

In your vast power, you vanquished instantaneously our terrifying demonic horde,

Without rising, moving, or saying a word.

Sage who accomplishes all aims and is honoured in the three worlds, we pay homage to you!

"The trillions of demoneses, numerous as the grains of sand in the river Ganges,

Could not move or sway you from the trunk of the sublime

bodhi tree;

They made trillions of offerings to you, as many as the grains of sand in the Ganges.

That is why, O Lord, seated here today at the trunk of the Bodhi tree, you shine!

"While pursuing the conduct of supreme awakening,

You gave up your dearest wife, beloved sons, servants, gardens, towns,

Your cities, kingdom, harems, and elephants, [361]

Your head, eyes, tongue, and feet—that is why you shine today!

"As a buddha, wearing the armour of concentration, miraculous power, and intelligence,

I myself will ferry across trillions of beings, swept away in the ocean of suffering.

In the ship of the sublime Dharma.' This aspiration that you repeatedly voiced

Is now fulfilled, and you will liberate all beings!

"By the merit of praising you, Most Eminent of Speakers, who gave eyes to the world,

May we all, rejoicing, aspire to omniscience!

As we attain the sublime and peerless awakening that all buddhas praise,

May we defeat the demon hordes and awaken to omniscience!"

Monks, once the sons of Mara had praised the Thus-Gone One in this manner, with palms joined they bowed to the Thus-Gone One and stood to one side.

Then a divine son from the Heaven of Making Use of Others' Emanations, surrounded and escorted by millions of divine sons, sprinkled the Thus-Gone One with golden lotuses from the Jambu River. Then, in his presence, they praised him with these verses:

"Your speech is gentle, calm, and forthright;

Free of the stains of darkness, you have realized the immortal state.

You deserve an unparalleled treatment in heaven and on earth;

Your intelligence is blazing—to you we bow!

"You bring joy and have abandoned afflictions and removed stains and blemishes;

With your joyous speech, you delight gods and humans!

With the light rays from your stainless and effulgent sublime body,

You triumph over this world, like the master of gods and humans!

"Vanquisher of Foes, you are knowledgeable in the conduct of others;

Beloved in the world of gods and humans, you overturn the thoughts of others;

Brilliant and Wise One, you illuminate the conduct of others.

Walk here on this path traversed by those with the ten powers!

"Having relinquished the ubiquitous clinging to existence, suffering falsely construed,

May you train gods and humans by training their minds.

May you course in the sky throughout the four directions like the moon,

And so be a sublime eye and a final refuge in these three worlds!

"Though beloved in the world of gods and humans, you do not gravitate toward sense objects;

Without indulging in desire, you take pleasure in virtue.

Proclaimed far and wide, you are without equal in the three worlds;

You are the protector, the refuge, the only resort of beings here!"

Monks, once the divine sons from the Heaven of Making Use of Others' Emanations, led by the divine son in charge, had praised the Thus-Gone One, with palms joined they bowed to him and stood to one side.

Next the divine son Sunirmita, surrounded and escorted by an assembly of gods from the Heaven of Delighting in Emanations, covered the Thus-Gone One with ribbons of silk studded with various gemstones, and in his presence praised him with these verses:

"You are the light of Dharma that has arisen from relinquishing the three stains;

You destroy delusion, beliefs, and ignorance, and unfold brilliance and glory!

You place in the deathless state those who indulge in the wrong path! [363]

You are an object of veneration here in the world, honoured in heaven and earth!

"You are a physician skilled in healing, who dispenses the elixir of happiness.

Through the path of the previous victorious ones, you eradicate all illnesses of beings,

The lingering symptoms of false belief, affliction, and ignorance that has accumulated.

For this reason, you are the sublime physician and guide who courses upon the earth.

"Sunlight, moonlight, stars, firelight, and the luster of jewels,

The luster of Sakra and Brahma—none of it shines in the presence of your splendour!

With your brilliance and illuminating insight, you are replete with radiance and glory!

To you whose extraordinary wisdom has directly manifested, we bow down!

"Consummate Guide, whose melodious speech relates what is true and untrue

Whose mind is gentle, composed, with subdued sense faculties, and great calmness,

A teacher who can instruct the audiences of gods and humans in need of instruction,

To you, Sage of the Sakyas, bull among men, honoured by gods and humans, we pay homage!

"In your intelligence, you hold wisdom instructions to be supreme and convey them throughout the three existences;

You remove the three stains and teach the threefold knowledge and the threefold liberation.

O Sage, you understand, according to intellect, who is a fitting vessel and who is not!

To you, unique in the trichilocosm and honoured in heavens and on earth, we pay homage!"

Monks, once the divine son Sunirmita and his entourage had praised the Thus-Gone

One, with palms joined they bowed down to the Thus-Gone One and sat to one side.

Next the divine son Santusita, along with other divine sons from the Heaven of Joy, approached the Thus-Gone One as he sat at the seat of awakening and draped him with a vast patchwork of divine garments. Then he praised the Thus-Gone One in his presence with these verses:

"When you were dwelling in the Heaven of Joy, you taught the Dharma liberally.

That teaching of yours continues unabated; even today the divine sons practice the Dharma.

We cannot get enough of looking at you, nor can we get enough of listening to the Dharma;

Ocean of Good Qualities, Lamp of the World, to you we bow with head and heart.

"When you departed from the Heaven of Joy, you exhausted all unfortunate states;

Then, while seated at the Bodhi tree, you quelled the afflictions of all beings.

To those for whom you discovered vast awakening and defeated Mara,

With your aspiration now fulfilled, quick, turn the wheel of Dharma in detail!

"There are many thousands of beings throughout the ten directions:

Let the Dharma be heard by those who seek it!

May you make haste to turn the wheel in detail!

May you liberate those thousands of creatures from existence!"

Monks, once the divine son Santusi ta and his entourage had praised the Thus-Gone

One, with palms joined they bowed to him and sat to one side.

Then the gods from the Heaven Free from Strife, led by the god Suyama, went to where the Thus-Gone One was seated.

When they arrived, they worshiped the Thus-Gone One sitting at the seat of awakening with a plethora of flowers, incense, garlands, perfumes, and unguents, and in his presence they praised him with these fitting verses:

"Who is superior to you, you who are without equal

In discipline, absorption, and insight?

To you, Thus-Gone One, adept in inclinations and liberation,

We pay homage with our heads bowed!

"We witness at the seat of awakening

The magnificent displays performed by the gods.

How you are worshiped by gods and humans!

No one else deserves this at all!

"It is not in vain that you have come,

Enduring great hardship in the process.

Defeating the wicked one and his army

You attained unexcelled awakening.

"You have illuminated the ten directions,

Lit up the three worlds with the lamp of your insight.

It is you who will remove the world's cataracts,

Bestowing upon it unexcelled eyes!

"Praising you for an eon

Will not even cover the pores of your body.

Ocean of Good Qualities, renowned throughout the world,

To you, Thus-Gone One, we pay homage with our heads bowed!"

Once the divine sons from the Heaven Free from Strife, led by the divine son Suyama, had praised the Thus-Gone One, with palms joined they bowed to the Thus-Gone One and then stood to one side.

Then Sakra, lord of the gods, together with the gods from the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, paid homage to the Thus-Gone One with a display of flowers, incense, garlands, unguents, parasols, standards, and flags, then praised him with these verses:

"O Sage, you are unflappable, faultless, and ever stable, like Mount Meru!

With merit and splendour, your wisdom light is renowned throughout the ten directions!

O Sage, you previously paid homage to hundreds of thousands of buddhas,

And in their place, you have overcome the demon horde at the Bodhi tree!

"Source of discipline, learning, absorption, and insight, you are the banner of wisdom!

Destroyer of old age and death, you are the supreme physician, who gives eyes to the world!

O Sage, having cast off the three defilements and defects, your sense faculties are restrained, your mind composed!

To you, O Bull among Sakyas, Dharma King of Beings, we go for refuge!

"Your work to achieve awakening, exalted by the force of your perseverance, was infinite!

Your powers—the powers of your insight, skillful means, love, and great merit—

Were already infinite, O Blessed One, when you set out for the state of awakening!

Thus you have the strength of the ten powers today on the seat of awakening!

"Seeing the infinite hordes of armies, the gods became anxious and frightened,

Lest the King of Mendicants in repose at the seat of awakening should be troubled.

But the spirits did not frighten you, nor could they move your body;

Rather your hand struck hard, shaking them, and you defeated Mara's army.

"Just as the previous ones attained sublime awakening on the lion throne,

You have followed in their footsteps; you awakened and became the same as them.

Identical in heart and mind, you have attained omniscience.

Thus, Sublime Being in the World, Self-Arisen One, you are a field of merit for beings."

Monks, once Sakra, lord of the gods, together with the gods from the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, had praised the Thus-Gone One, with palms joined they bowed to the Thus-Gone One and sat to one side.

Next the four great kings, together with the divine sons from the Heaven of the Four Great Kings, went to the place where the Thus-Gone One was.

When they arrived, they paid homage to him. Hundreds of thousands of divine sons surrounded him, holding garlands and bouquets of abhimuktaka flowers, campaka flowers, jasmine flowers, nutmeg blossoms, and dhanuskari flowers. Hundreds of thousands of celestial maidens surrounded him, singing divine songs. Thereafter they all praised the Thus-Gone One with these fitting verses:

"You whose speech is exceedingly melodious and whose cadence is captivating,

Who is soothing and clear minded like the moon,

Whose face is smiling and whose tongue is long,

To you, Supreme Enrapturing Sage, we pay homage!

"When your melodious speech,

A voice so sweet and beloved among gods and humans,

Resounds throughout all the worlds,

It surpasses the voice of all who can speak!

"It quells the afflictions of attachment, anger, and delusion; It engenders pristine joy within nonhumans.

Upon hearing the Dharma with a stainless heart,

They all attain exalted liberation.

"You do not disparage the ignorant,

Nor are you ever drunk with conceit about your knowledge.

You are neither pompous nor timid,

Like a firm mountain in the middle of a sea.

"People here have profited well

Since such a being has appeared in the world!

Like the goddess of wealth who is the giver of riches,

You will bestow your Dharma throughout the whole world!"

Once the gods of the Heaven of the Four Great Kings, led foremost by the four great kings themselves, had praised the Thus-Gone One in repose at the seat of awakening, they joined palms and bowed to the Thus-Gone One and stood to one side.

Then the gods of the sky approached the Thus-Gone One. As a way of paying homage to the Perfect and Completely Awakened One, the gods adorned the whole sky with a net of jewels and small bells. They offered him jewel parasols, jewel banners, jewel and silk brocade wreaths, ornate jewel earrings, flower wreaths, and pearl strands of various types held by gods who revealed the upper half of their bodies, as well as crescent moons. Upon making these offerings, in his presence they praised him with these verses:

"Dwelling constantly in the sky, O Sage,

We clearly see all the activities of beings as they are.

Looking at your conduct, O Pristine Sentient Being,

We do not see confusion in your focused mind.

"The sky is filled with the guides of humans,

Bodhisattvas who have come to pay tribute.

Since in this way they are bodies of space,

No harm is caused to the celestial mansions.

"Even though rains of flowers,

Enough to fill a world system to the brim,

Descend onto your body from the sky,

They are like rivers flowing into an ocean.

"We see parasols, flowers, earrings, and garlands,

Wreaths of campaka flowers,

Necklaces, moons, and crescent moons.

The gods bestrew you with them, yet they are not mixed together.

"There is no room here for even a hair—

The whole sky is filled with gods.

They pay homage to you, Supreme Biped,

But you are neither proud nor overwhelmed."

Once the gods of the sky had so praised the Thus-Gone One in repose at the seat of awakening, they joined palms and bowed to him and stood to one side.

Then the terrestrial gods, in order to pay homage to the Thus-Gone One, cleansed and anointed the entire surface of the earth, sprinkled it with perfumed water, strewed it with flowers, covered it with canopies of various dyed fabrics, and then offered it to the Thus-Gone One. Thereafter they praised him with these verses:

"The trichilocosm has become as indestructible and firm as a vajra. You sat on the seat of awakening by virtue of your vajra-hard position when you said:

"Even should my skin, flesh, bones, and marrow shrivel up right here,

I will not rise from this place without reaching awakening.'

"If you, Lion among Men, do not consecrate the entire trichilocosm,

Then the whole thing will collapse

With the violent shock of the arrival of bodhisattvas,

The soles of whose feet will cause ten million realms to quake.

"An illustrious gift is gained by the terrestrial gods

Wherever the most sublime being happens to walk.

You illuminate darkness everywhere in the world;

Now that the trichilocosm is a basis for worship, how much more so is your body?

"Should we take hold of all the lands of the trichilocosm—

All the myriad hundreds of thousands of subterranean bodies of water,

And all the myriad livelihoods of beings in those places—

We would offer it all to you. May you use it according to your wishes!

"Wherever you shall sit, walk, or rest,

And wherever the listeners, who are the children of the Bliss-Gone Gautama,

Shall preach the Dharma, or wherever anyone shall listen to it,

We dedicate those places, along with all roots of virtue, for the sake of awakening!"

Once the terrestrial gods had praised in this manner the Thus-Gone One sitting in repose at the seat of awakening, they bowed to him with palms joined and stood to one side.

This concludes the twenty-third chapter on exaltation.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 24 — Trapusa and Bhallika

[For seven weeks following his awakening, the Buddha remains alone in the forest and does not teach. He is concerned that the truth he has discovered might be too profound for others to comprehend. Sensing this dilemma, the demon Māra tries to trick the Buddha one last time. Māra visits the Buddha and suggests that perhaps this would be a suitable time to pass into parinirvāṇa! The Buddha rejects Māra's advice, and finally Māra retreats. During these first seven weeks, the Buddha also encounters some local passersby, but no teaching is given.]

Monks, while the Thus-Gone One was being praised by the gods after he had reached perfect and complete awakening, he stared at the king of trees without blinking and without getting out of his cross-legged position. Seven days passed in this way while he was at the trunk of the Bodhi tree experiencing bliss from the sustenance of concentration and joy.

Then, once the seven days had passed, the divine sons from the desire realm approached the Thus-Gone One, carrying tens of thousands of vases containing scented water. The divine sons from the form realm also approached the Thus-Gone One, carrying tens of thousands of vases containing scented water. When they arrived, they bathed the Bodhi tree and the Thus-Gone One with the scented water. Innumerable gods, nagas, yakas, gandharvas, demigods, garudas, kimnaras, and mahoragas anointed their own bodies with the scented water that had come into contact with the body of the Thus-Gone One. This engendered among them the intention set on unexcelled, perfect and complete awakening. Even after the divine sons and the others had returned to their respective realms, they did not part from the scented water and desired no other scent. Through the joy and the supreme joy that are born from respectfully taking to heart the Thus-Gone One, they became irreversible from unexcelled, perfect and complete awakening.

Monks, then a divine son named Samantakusuma, who had joined in that very audience, bowed down to the feet of the Thus-Gone One, and with palms joined said to him, "What, O Blessed One, is the name of the absorption in which the Thus-Gone One remained for seven days without moving from the cross-legged position?"

Monks, thus addressed, the Thus-Gone One told the divine son the following: "Array of the food of joy, O divine son, is the name of the meditative absorption in which the Thus-Gone One remained for seven days without moving from the cross-legged position."

Monks, the divine son Samantakusuma then praised the Thus-Gone One with these verses:

"Your feet are covered with chariot wheels

And shine with the brilliance of stainless, thousand-petaled lotuses.

The crowns of gods brush your feet;

To your feet, replete with splendour, I bow down!"

When he bowed to the feet of the Bliss-Gone One,

The divine son became delighted.

He said this, which was soothing to gods and humans,

And removed their doubt:

"You give joy to the Sakya clan;

You bring an end to attachment, anger, and delusion.

You bring the culmination of all wishes;

Please dispel the doubts of gods and humans.

THE GRAND BIBLE

"You have gained immeasurable omniscience,
A buddha with the ten powers.
So, Victorious One, why do you remain at the centre of the earth
In the cross-legged pose for seven days?
"What are you staring at for seven days,
With your eyes that are like blooming hundred-petaled lotuses
As you gaze, O Lion among Men,
With your unblinking and pristine eyes?
"Is it your aspiration
That makes you remain cross-legged
For seven days at the king of trees?
Or is it common to all the lions of speech?
"With teeth so even and pure,
And with the supremely fragrant breath of one with the ten powers,
Please speak words of unadulterated truth,
And thus bring joy to gods and humans!"
The Moon-Faced One replied:
"Listen, divine son, to what I say!
I will briefly offer
A response to these questions.
"Just as a king does not leave the place
Where he was consecrated by his kinfolk
For a duration of seven days,
Since that is the duty of kings,
"So also victorious ones, even with the ten powers,
When consecrated, their aspirations fulfilled,
Remain in the cross-legged position
At the centre of the earth for seven days.
"Just as a warrior stares
At vanquished enemy troops,
Buddhas too, at the seat of awakening,
Stare at the afflictions, now destroyed.
"Attachment and anger, born from delusion,
Are like the foes of beings.
Like thieves with their stolen goods,
I have destroyed them here.
"Here I destroyed manifold forms of pride
And arrogance too, so that they exist no more.
I relinquished all defilements,
And the highest wisdom had dawned in me.
"Here the ignorance that drives the thirst for existence
And induces inappropriate actions—
A network of roots including latent formations—
Was scorched by the intense fire of wisdom.
"Here the belief in 'I' and 'mine'
And its tangle of faults,
With roots that extend far, knotted tight with obscurations,
Has been severed by the blade of wisdom.
"Here those enduring deceptions of mine
Have at long last ended in destruction.
The aggregates, along with the clinging to them,
I have discerned through my wisdom.
"The dualistic delusions, erroneous fixations,
Which eventually land one in hell,
I have removed here
So that they are certain never to arise again.
"Here the forest of obscurations
Has been burned away by the fire of my roots of virtue.
I have utterly scorched
The fourfold misconception, too.
"The harmful garland of thoughts
Strung on the thread of conceptions,
I have utterly reversed
With the rosaries of the branches of awakening.
"The sixty-five travails,
The thirty impure delusions,
And the forty misdeeds,
I eliminated here at the centre of the earth.
"The sixteen uncontrolled things,
The eighteen elements,
And the twenty-five pains,
I eliminated while sitting at the centre of the earth.
"The twenty streams of passion
And the twenty-eight fears of beings,
I utterly transcended
Through the force and commitment of my perseverance.
"Likewise five hundred roars of buddhas,
I perfectly comprehended here.
Phenomena, one hundred thousand strong,
I also perfectly comprehended.
"Here all the ninety-eight latent formations,
Down to the bottom of their roots
And all their sprouting shoots,
Were scorched by the fire of my wisdom.
"The reservoir of doubt and uncertainty,
Filled with the waters of views
From the river of craving—the fount of nonvirtue—
Is dried up by the sun of my wisdom.
"When I rid myself of pretense and guile,
Here I cut down the forest of afflictions

That is teeming with deception, stinginess, hatred, and jealousy,
And scorched it with the fire of my discipline.
"Here, through the medicine of wisdom most sublime,
I purged myself of the root of conflict
That induces the nausea of the lower realms—
Namely, disparaging remarks made toward noble ones.
"Here I reached the end of all crying,
Wailing, anguish, and lamentation,
Once I attained
The absorption and qualities born of wisdom.
"Here I triumphed over all the streams of tormenting anguish,
With their tributaries and bends
Of conceit and negligence,
Once I attained the absorption in harmony with truth.
"Here I cut down with the ax of mindfulness
The entire dense jungle of afflictions,
Teeming with the trees of existence and overgrown with the roots of concepts,
And scorched it with the fire of my wisdom.
"Just as Sakra did to the lord of the demigods,
Here I destroyed with the sword of wisdom
The deceptive one who, self-obsessed,
Was powerful enough to rule over the three realms.
"Here at the centre of the earth,
I cut through the entire snare of thirty-six courses of action
With the powerful sword of insight,
Then scorched it with the fire of wisdom.
"Here with the plowshare of trenchant insight,
I uprooted all the root afflictions
Along with their latent formations,
Which yield suffering and anguish.
"Here I cleansed the eye of wisdom,
Naturally pure in all beings.
With the great balm of insight,
I removed the thick cataract of delusion.
"Here, with the sunlight of mindfulness and tranquility,
I dried up the ocean of existence,
An expanse of craving churned up
By the intoxicated crocodiles of the four physical elements.
"Here I extinguished, with the cool water of liberation,
The great fire of lust,
With its billowing smoke of thought
Raging through the timber of objects.
"Here, with the gusts of fierce determination,
I drove away and dispersed
The cloud of latent formations,
With its lightning of proclivities and its thunder of concepts.
"Here I attained the absorption of pristine mindfulness
And struck down with a strong blow of the sword of knowledge
The enemies of conceptual mind and actions,
And the hostile way they reinforce existence.
"Here, having acquired love, I vanquished
The armies of persistent demon hordes
With disfigured shapes, bearing the highest crests
On chariots mighty with elephants and horses.
"Here I fastened down
The horse of the six sense fields,
Engorged with the five sense objects and ever careless with intoxication,
Once I attained the absorption of repulsiveness.
"Here I reached the end
Of infatuation and aggression,
The travails of conflicts and disputes,
Once I attained the absorption of wishlessness.
"Here I exhausted all conceits,
Thoughts, and concepts,
Rooted inside of me and out,
Once I attained the absorption of emptiness.
"Here I relinquished, without exception,
All the pleasures of gods and humans,
Up to the peak of existence,
Once I attained the absorption of signlessness.
"Here, once I attained the threefold liberation,
I completely released
All the fetters of existence
Through the power of my knowledge.
"Here, through witnessing causality,
I vanquished the three causal conceptions:
Conceptions of permanence and impermanence,
Self and lack of self, pleasure and pain.
"Here, at the trunk of the king of trees,
I severed with the blow of impermanence
The unfoldings of different karmas,
All rooted in the six sense fields.
"Here, with the sun of wisdom,
I dispelled the fog of delusion, debased with impurities,
Thick with views of arrogance and anger,
Thus illuminating what was darkened for so long.
"Here, with the boat of tenacity,
I crossed the great ocean of cyclic existence
With its crocodiles of passion and desire,

Its waves of craving, and its grasping at wrong views.
"Here I awakened to the realisation
That scorches desire, anger, delusion,
And mental concepts,
Like grasshoppers fallen into a forest fire.
"Oppressed for so long—
For billions of countless eons—
On the road of cyclic existence,
Here I am revived, my torment now quelled.
"Here I have realized the nectar,
Undiscovered by any other exponent,
Which brings an end to old age, death, anguish, and pain
For the benefit of the world.
"Here I have reached the city of fearlessness,
Where suffering born of craving by means of sensory experience,
And suffering based on the aggregates,
Will arise no more.
"Here I have realized
The great enemies within, in all their multitudes.
Having bound and scorched them,
I have ensured that they can no longer appear.
"Here I have realized the nectar,
For the sake of which
I gave up my own flesh, my eyes, and many precious jewels
For billions of eons.
"Here I understood what was realized
By innumerable victorious ones in the past,
About which sweet and pleasing words
Are exclaimed throughout the world.
"Here I realised
The dependently arisen world to be empty,
Reoccurring in each moment of cognition
Like a mirage, or a city of gandharvas.
"Here I have purified the eye most sublime
By which I see all worlds,
Like fruit placed
In the palm of the hand.
"Here I recollected my former lives.
I attained the threefold knowledge,
Then remembered immeasurable myriad eons,
As if waking from sleep.
"What sets the errant gods and humans aflame
Are their misconceptions.
Yet here I drank the elixir of nectar,
Truly free of error.
"Here, after triumphing through the power of love,
I drank the elixir of nectar,
For the sake of which
Those with the ten powers had cultivated love for all beings.
"Here, having triumphed through the power of compassion,
I drank the elixir of nectar,
For the sake of which
Those with the ten powers cultivated compassion for all beings.
"Here, having triumphed through the power of joy,
I drank the elixir of nectar,
For the sake of which
Those with the ten powers cultivated joy for all beings.
"Here, having triumphed through the power of impartiality,
I drank the elixir of nectar,
For the sake of which
Those with the ten powers cultivated impartiality for myriad eons.
"Here I drank the elixir of nectar
That has been drunk by those with the ten powers,
The victorious lions of yore,
More numerous than the sand in the river Ganges.
"The words that I said
Before Mara and his army were:
'I will not get out of the cross-legged position
Until I bring an end to old age and death.'
"I destroyed ignorance
With blazing, vajra-hard wisdom,
And attained the state of the ten powers.
That is why I now abandon of the cross-legged posture.
"I attained the level of a worthy one,
Exhausted all of my defilements,
And destroyed the demon horde.
That is why I now get out of the cross-legged posture.
"Here I rent asunder
The closed doors of the five obstructions
And cut through the vines of craving.
Now I get out of the cross-legged posture."
Then this moon among men
Rose slowly from his seat,
Accepted the ceremonial anointment,
And took his seat on a lion throne.
The assemblies of gods, using jewel pitchers
Filled with differently scented waters,
Washed the friend of the world,
Who reached the culmination of qualities and the ten powers.
Billions of gods,

THE GRAND BIBLE

Along with myriad aparas,
Performed an immeasurable worship service,
With thousands of musical instruments all around.
Divine sons, it is thus Reasonable, logical, and well grounded
Why victorious ones do not leave their cross-legged position

At the centre of the earth for seven days.
Monks, the perfect and completely awakened Thus-Gone One thus sat for the first seven days on that very seat, thinking, "Here I have reached unexcelled, perfect and complete awakening. Here I have brought an end to the sufferings of beginningless birth, old age, and death." During the second week, the Thus-Gone One wandered far and wide throughout the entire trichilocosm. During the third week, the Thus-Gone One gazed at the seat of awakening without blinking and thought, "Here I awakened to unsurpassable, perfect and complete buddhahood, bringing an end to the sufferings of beginningless birth, old age, and death." Then, during the fourth week, the Thus-Gone One took a walk, but not as far, this time traveling from the eastern ocean to the western ocean.

Then Mara, the evil one, approached the Thus-Gone One and said, "Since the time has now come for the Blessed One to pass into parinirvana, may the Blessed One pass into parinirvana! May the Bliss-Gone One pass into parinirvana!"

Monks, when he said this, the Thus-Gone One responded to Mara, the evil one: "Evil one, I will not pass into parinirvana until my elder monks have become restrained, lucid, proficient, courageous, and learned; until they have embarked on the Dharma in an authentic way and become masters themselves; and until they can overcome opponents in concordance with the Dharma and teach the Dharma in conjunction with miracles. Evil one, I will not pass away into parinirvana until the tradition of the Buddha, his teaching, and his community are well established in the world; and until infinite bodhisattvas are prophesied to reach unexcelled, perfect and complete awakening. Evil one, I will not pass away until all four of my assemblies become restrained, lucid, proficient, and courageous, and can teach the Dharma in conjunction with miracles."

Then, as soon as Mara, the evil one, had heard these words, he stepped aside and stood there anguished and depressed. Dejected, with his head hung low, he wrote on the ground with a stick: "He has overcome my empire!"

Then three of Mara's daughters—Rati, Arati, and Trsna—spoke this verse to Mara, the evil one:

"Father, why are you unhappy?"

Tell us who this man is!

We will bind him with the lasso of desire

And conduct him like an elephant.

"Conducting him, we will promptly

Bring him under your control.

So cast off your bad mood!

You are going to be elated."

Mara, the evil one, said:

"The Bliss-Gone One is the worthy one of the world;

He will never fall under the power of desire.

He has gone far beyond my empire;

This I why I grieve so strongly!"

Even though the girls had already experienced the deeds of the Bodhisattva and the power of the Thus-Gone One, out of their fickleness they did not listen to their father's words. They transformed into girls in the prime of youth, who had just reached maturity and, in order to bewilder the Thus-Gone One, they went before him, summoning all their womanly guiles. However, as the Thus-Gone One paid them no heed, they transformed into decrepit old ladies. The girls then went before their father and said this:

"It is indeed true what you said, father:

'He is not swayed by desire;

He has gone far beyond my empire.

This I why I grieve so strongly!"

"The form that we manifested to destroy Gautama

Would have broken his heart,

Had he only seen it.

Father, please do away with these decrepit bodies of ours."

Mara, the evil one, said:

"I am not aware of anyone in the animate or inanimate world

Who can change what has been done by the Buddha's power.
Go promptly and confess to the Sage the offense that you committed;

He will then return your bodies to their previous form as you wish."

So the daughters went and asked the Thus-Gone One for forgiveness, saying:

"Bliss-Gone One, please forgive our offense!

Blessed One, forgive our offense,

Which we childish, stupid, uncultivated, unskilled, ignorant women

Committed with the wish to insult the Blessed One!"

Then the Thus-Gone One spoke to them with these verses:

"You want to scrape through a mountain with your fingernails,

Chew through iron with your teeth,

Penetrate a mountain with your head,

And measure an unfathomable depth.

"Thus I forgive the offense of you girls. Why is that? Because it is an advancement in the training of the noble Dharma to understand a fault to be a fault, to confess it, and to vow to abstain from it henceforth."

Monks, during the fifth week, the Thus-Gone One dwelt in the domain of the naga king Mucilinda. Since the weather that week was intemperate, the naga king Mucilinda, worried that the Blessed One's body would be harmed by the cold and the wind, came out of his abode, coiled his body around that of the Thus-Gone One seven times, and shielded him with his hoods. From the east as well, several more naga kings arrived. Worried that the cold and wind would harm the Blessed One's body, they too coiled their bodies seven times around the body of the Thus-Gone One and shielded him with their hoods. Just like the naga kings from the east, naga kings from the south, west, and north also came, worried that the cold and wind might harm the Thus-Gone One's body. They too coiled their bodies around the Thus-Gone One's body seven times and shielded him with their hoods. That pile of naga kings loomed at a height like that of Meru, king of mountains. Those naga kings had never before known such bliss as during these seven days and seven nights, because of being close to the Thus-Gone One's body.

When seven days had passed, the naga kings understood that the bad weather had let up, and so they unfurled their bodies from the Thus-Gone One's body. They then bowed their heads at the feet of the Thus-Gone One, circumambulated him three times, and returned to their respective homes. The naga king Mucilinda also bowed his head to the feet of the Thus-Gone One, circumambulated him three times, and then set out for his domain.

During the sixth week, the Thus-Gone One proceeded from the naga king Mucilinda's domain to a banyan tree of a goat herder. On the way, on the bank of the Nairanjana River between the naga king Mucilinda's domain and the goat herder's banyan tree, the Thus-Gone One was spotted by some carakas, parivrajakas, vrddhasravakas, gautamas, nirgranthas, ajivikas, and others as well. They asked him, "Blessed One, did Gautama fare happily during the unseasonable seven-day storm?"

Monks, at that time the Thus-Gone One spoke these meaningful words:

"Happy is the solitude of the contented one

Who has heard the Dharma and can see.

Happy is the abstention from injury, in this world,

Of the one restrained toward living beings.

"Happy is the freedom from desire

That transcends evil.

Happy is the subjugation of selfishness and pride.

These are indeed the supreme forms of happiness!"

Monks, seeing the world ablaze with birth, old age, sickness, death, anguish, lamentation, suffering, discontent, and strife, the Thus-Gone One next uttered this meaningful verse:

"This world is tormented

By sounds, sensations, tastes, forms, and smells.

Even while frightened of existence,

Due to craving after existence, beings continue to pursue existence."

During the seventh week, the Thus-Gone One sat at the trunk of a bodhi tree. During that time, two learned and clever merchant brothers from the north, Trapusa and Bhallika, were traveling back from the south, after having gained much profit, with a caravan of five hundred fully loaded carts carrying many kinds of merchandise. They had two bullocks called Sujata and Kirti. These two bulls had no fear of being waylaid, and thus they could be employed where no other bullocks would pass. Wherever there was a threat, they would stand as though fastened to stakes. They could not be goaded by a whip, but only by handfuls of lotus flowers, or garlands of jasmine flowers.

When this caravan of merchants approached the Bodhi tree, a goddess who lived in a forest of milk trees enchanted all the carriages, thus rendering them motionless.

All the parts of the carriages, such as the harnesses and the rest, tore and split, and the wheels of the carriages sunk into the ground up to their axles. Even with everyone making great effort, the carts would move no farther.

Shocked and frightened, the members of the caravan thought, "Why have the carriages stopped here on this plain? What has happened?" They brought out the two bullocks Sujata and Kirti, but they also would move no farther, even though they were goaded with bunches of lotuses and garlands of jasmine. Then the merchants thought, "Since even these two animals will not move, there certainly must be some threat up ahead."

Thus they dispatched scouts on horseback. When the scouts returned, they reported,

"There is no threat whatsoever."

The goddess then revealed her form and consoled the members of the caravan, saying, "Do not fear!" Now the two bullocks could lead the carts to where the Thus-Gone One was.

When they arrived, they saw the Thus-Gone One blazing like the god of fire, well adorned with the thirty-two marks of a great being, shining with splendour, like the sun just after dawn.

Seeing him, the merchants were shocked and thought, "Is this Brahma who has come here? Or is it Sakra, lord of the gods? Or is it Vaisravana, or perhaps the sun or the moon? Or is it some mountain god, or some river god?"

The Thus-Gone One then revealed his saffron robes, and so the merchants said, "This person in saffron-coloured robes is a renunciant, so he is no threat to us." They had in fact developed devotion to him, and so they said among themselves, "It must be mealtime for this renunciate. What morsels do we have?"

A few members of the caravan said, "There is honey, gruel, and stripped sugar cane."

So, carrying the honey, gruel, and stripped sugar cane, they went to where the Thus-Gone One was seated, bowed down their heads to his feet, circumambulated him three times, and stood to one side. Then they told the Thus-Gone One: "Please regard us with compassion and accept these alms!"

Monks, the Thus-Gone One then wondered, "It would not be appropriate for me to take these alms with my hands. What vessel did the previous perfect and complete awakened ones use to accept alms?" Right then the answer dawned on him. Monks, knowing that it was time for the Thus-Gone One to eat, at that very moment the four great kings appeared from the four directions carrying four golden alms bowls. They offered them to the Thus-Gone One, saying to him, "Please regard us with compassion and accept these four golden alms bowls!"

Thinking, however, that those bowls were not appropriate for a monk, the Thus-Gone One did not accept them. Thus the four kings came back with four alms bowls made of silver, four made of beryl, four made of quartz, four made of coral, four made of emerald, and four made of every gem. They offered them to the Thus-Gone One, but he declined, thinking that these were all inappropriate for a monk.

Monks, the Thus-Gone One then wondered what kinds of alms bowls the previous thus-gone ones had used to accept alms. He understood that it was alms bowls made of stone, and so that thought dawned in the Thus-Gone One's mind.

Then the great king Vaisravana said to the three other great kings:

"Friends, when the divine sons of the blue realm gave us four stone alms bowls, we thought that they were for our use. But a divine son of the blue realm called Vairocana told us the following:

"Listen, these alms bowls are not to be used.

Preserve them! They will become honoured as sacred objects.

A victorious one called Sakyamuni will appear;

Offer these alms bowls to him!"

"Friends, the time has now come

To offer a vessel to Sakyamuni.

Paying homage with the melodious sound of song and cymbals,

We will offer the begging bowls.

"He is a vessel made of Dharma and is indestructible,

While these vessels, made of stone, are destructible.

He will be unable to accept another bowl;

Let's go so that he can accept them!"

Then the four kings, together with their kinfolk and retainers, went to the Thus-Gone One holding those alms bowls in their hands and carrying flowers, incense, perfumes, garlands, and unguents, playing cymbals and gongs, and singing songs. Having paid homage to the Thus-Gone One, they filled the alms bowls with divine flowers and offered them to the Thus-Gone One.

Monks, the Thus-Gone One then thought: "These four devoted great kings are giving me four stone alms bowls. But four are too many for me. Yet if I were to accept only one, the other three would be upset. So I will take all four alms bowls and transform them into one."

Monks, the Thus-Gone One then extended his right hand and spoke to the great king Vaisravana in verse:

"Offer an alms bowl to the Bliss-Gone One!

You will become a vessel of the Supreme Vehicle.

By offering an alms bowl to the likes of me,

You will never be bereft of mindfulness and intelligence."

Monks, the Thus-Gone One [F.184.a] then accepted the alms bowl from the great king Vaisravana, regarding him with compassion. Having thus accepted it, he then spoke in verse to the great king Dhrtarastra:

"Whoever gives an alms bowl to the Thus-Gone One

Will never be bereft of mindfulness and insight,

And will spend his time happily at ease

Until awakening to the state of cool repose."

Monks, the Thus-Gone One then accepted the begging bowl from the great king Dhrtarastra, regarding him with compassion. Having accepted it, he spoke in verse to the great king Virudhaka:

THE GRAND BIBLE

"Give a pristine begging bowl
To the Thus-Gone One, pure in mind,
And you will swiftly become pure in mind,
Worthy of veneration in the world."
Monks, the Thus-Gone One then accepted the alms bowl from the great king Virudhaka, regarding him with compassion. Having accepted it, he spoke to the great king Virupaksa in verse:
"Give, with faultless intention and devotion,
A faultless vessel to the Thus-Gone One,
Who is faultless in discipline and conduct,
And your merit of generosity will be faultless."
Monks, the Thus-Gone One then accepted the alms bowl from the great king Virupaksa, regarding him with compassion. When he had accepted it, he transformed all four alms bowls into one through the power of his wish, and then said this meaningful verse:
"Since, in a previous existence, I offered alms bowls,
Filling them with fruit and making them lovely,
The four miraculous gods are now giving me
These four well-formed alms bowls."
On this topic, it is said:
This wise one, with insight into ultimate reality,
Gazed at the supreme tree of awakening for seven nights.
The earth trembled in six ways,
And then this lion among men rose, with the movements of a lion.
Like the lord of elephants, he slowly walked about,
And eventually reached the trunk of a fig tree.
Like Mount Meru, the Sage sat there unshakable,
Absorbed in concentration and meditation.
At that time the two brothers Trapusa and Bhallika,
With their caravan of merchants
And carriages filled with riches,
Reached a grove of sala trees in full bloom.
Instantly, through the Great Sage's radiance,
The wheels sunk into the earth up to their axles.
Seeing such a situation,
The merchant caravan was terrified.
Carrying swords, arrows, and spears,
They inquired who was dwelling in the forest like a deer.
They saw the Victorious One, who was like the sun in a cloudless sky
And whose face was like an autumn moon.
Without hostility or pride,
They bowed down, wondering who he was.
A deity said from the sky:
"He is a buddha acting for the welfare of the world.
"For seven days and nights,
This embodiment of compassion has not consumed food or drink.
If you want to assuage your own afflictions,
Feed this cultivated body and mind!"
When they heard that sweet speech,
They bowed down to the Victorious One and circumambulated him.
Pleased, they decided with their companions
To feed the Victorious One.
Monks, at that time the herd of cows belonging to the merchants Trapusa and Bhallika was grazing at a neighbouring village. There the cows were milked and yielded clarified butter, which the herdsman brought to the two merchants, Trapusa and Bhallika, saying: "O my lords, please advise! When we milked all your cows, they yielded clarified butter. Is this auspicious or not?"
Some priests, who were gluttonous by nature, said, "It is inauspicious, so a grand offering of this butter should be made to the priests."
Monks, at that time, however, a priest named Sikhandi spoke. He had been a kinsman of the merchants Trapusa and Bhallika in a previous life. He had been reborn in the Brahma realm, and now manifested among them in the form of a priest.
He said the following verses to the merchants:
"In the past you made the aspiration:
'When the Thus-Gone One reaches awakening,
May he partake of our food
And turn the wheel of Dharma!'
"This aspiration has now been fulfilled.
The Thus-Gone One who reached awakening
Should be offered this food.
Once he has eaten, he will turn the wheel of Dharma.
"That your cows yielded clarified butter
Is very auspicious, and occurred under an auspicious constellation.
This is due to the meritorious actions
Of this great sage."
Once Sikhandi had inspired the merchants,
He returned to his own abode.
Trapusa and the others
Were all elated.
They combined without exception
All the milk of one thousand cows,
Collected the cream from the top,
And respectfully prepared a meal.

They cleaned, polished, and sanitized
A jewel bowl called Moon,
Which cost one hundred thousand coins for just one ounce,
Then filled it to the brim with food.
Carrying honey and the jewel bowl,
They approached the trunk of the fig tree and said to the teacher:
"Venerable One, please accept and receive us!
We beg that you eat this well-prepared meal!"
Out of compassion for the two brothers,
And because he was aware of their previous intent to set out toward awakening,
The Teacher accepted and ate the food.
Once he had eaten, he tossed the bowl far into the sky.
A divine king called Subrahman
Retrieved the supreme jewel bowl,
And is still now performing worship with it
In the Brahma realm together with his companions.
Then on that occasion, the Thus-Gone One delighted the merchants Trapusa and Bhallika tremendously with these verses:
"May divine auspiciousness, which accomplishes aims
And brings good fortune throughout the ten directions,
Fulfill all your aims!
May everything promptly be favourable!
"Like a garland around your neck,
May there be glory at your right hand,
May there be glory at your left hand,
And may there be glory surrounding you!
"May the merchants who pursue wealth
And travel throughout the ten directions
Attain great profit,
And may that bring them happiness!
"Should you, for some reason,
Need to travel east,
May the constellations in that direction
Protect you!
"Krittika and Rohini,
Mrgasira, Ardra, and Punarvasu,
Pusya, and Aslesa—
These are the constellations in the east.
"May these seven constellations,
Renowned worldly protectors,
The gods that dwell in the east,
Fully protect you!
"Their lord and king
Is known as Dhrtarastra.
May this lord of all gandharvas,
Together with the sun, protect you!
"May his many sons, wise and mighty,
All eighty-one of whom are called Sakra,
Especially protect you
With health and well-being!
"In one area in the east,
There are eight divine maidens:
Jayanti and Vijayanti,
Siddhartha and Aparajita,
"Nandottara and Nandisena,
Nandini and Nandavardhani.
May they especially protect you
With health and well-being!
"In a quarter in the east there is a reliquary called Capala, Inhabited and known by victorious ones, protector worthy ones.
May they especially protect you
With health and well-being!
"May the quarters be safe for you!
May you not incur evil!
May you be protected by all deities,
And may you return with great profit!
"Should you, for some reason,
Have to travel to the south,
May the constellations in that direction
Protect you!
"Magha and also
Phalgunis, Hasta,
And Citra, the fifth.
Along with Svatis and Visakha, are in the south.
"Those seven constellations,
Renowned worldly protectors,
Dwell in the southern quarter.
May they protect you!
"Their lord and king
Is called Virudhaka.
May that lord of all kumbhandas,
Together with the lord of death, protect you!
"May his many sons, wise and mighty,
All ninety-one of whom are called Sakra,
Especially protect you
With health and well-being!
"In one section of the south,
There are eight divine maidens:
Sriyapati and Yasamati,
Yasaprata and Yasodhara,

"Suuttitha and Suprathama,
Suprabuddha and Sukhavyuha.
May they protect you
With health and well-being!
"In a section of the south is a reliquary called Padma,
Continually shining with brilliance, always illuminating all.
May it too especially protect you
With health and well-being!
"May the quarters be safe for you!
May you not incur evil!
May all deities protect you,
And may you return with great profit!
"Should you, for some reason,
Need to travel west,
May the constellations that dwell in that direction
Protect you!
"Anuradha and Jestha,
Mula and Drdhaviryata,
Asadhas and Abhijit,
And Sravana—these are the seven.
"These seven constellations,
Renowned worldly protectors,
Dwell in the west.
May they always protect you!
"Their lord and king
Is known as Virupaksa.
May that lord of all nagas,
Together with Varuna, protect you!
"May his many sons, wise and mighty,
All ninety-one of whom are called Sakra,
Especially protect you
With health and well-being!
"In a section of the west,
There are eight divine maidens:
Alambusa and Misrakesi,
Pundarika and Aruna,
"Ekadasa, Navanamika,
Sita and Krsna Draupadi.
May they especially protect you
With health and well-being!
"In a section of the west, there is a mountain called Astamga;
The sun and the moon also reside there.
May that mountain give you wealth
And protect you with health and well-being!
"May the quarters be safe for you!
May you not incur evil!
May you be protected by all deities,
And may you return wealthy!
"If for some reason
You should travel to the north,
May the constellations in that direction
Protect you!
"There are seven:
Dhanistha, Satabhisa,
The pair of Purva Aparā and Uttara Aparā, Revati and Asvini and Bharani.
"Those seven constellations,
Renowned worldly protectors,
Reside in the north.
May they always protect you!
"Their lord and king
Is Kubera, borne by men.
May this lord of all yakshas,
Together with Manibhadra, protect you!
"May his many sons, wise and mighty,
All ninety-one of whom are called Sakra, [391]
Especially protect you
With health and well-being!
"In a section of the north,
There are eight divine maidens:
Iladevi and Suradevi,
Prthvi and Padmavati,
"Maharaja, Asa,
Sraddha, and modest Siri.
May they especially protect you
With health and well-being!
"In a section of the north is Mount Gandhamadana.
[F.187.a]
It is the abode of all yakshas and bhutas,
Has many peaks, and is pleasant to behold.
May it too protect you with health and well-being!
"May the quarters be safe for you!
May you not incur evil!
May all deities protect you,
And may you return wealthy!
"The twenty-eight constellations,
Seven dwelling in each of the four directions,
The thirty-two divine maidens,
Eight dwelling in each of the four directions,
"The eight renunciates, the eight priests,
The eight towns throughout the lands,
And the eight gods, together with their Sakras,
May they all protect you!

"May you have good fortune going!
 May you have good fortune returning!
 May you have the good fortune of beholding your kinfolk!
 May you have the good fortune of being beheld by your kinfolk!
 "Lovingly cared for by numerous yakas with their Sakras
 And by the worthy ones,
 May you travel happily everywhere
 And obtain the auspicious nectar.
 "Always lovingly protected by Brahma and Vasava,
 And by those free of outflows whose minds are liberated,
 And also by the nagas and yakas,
 May your lives be preserved for one hundred autumns!"
 The Peerless Guide, Lord of the World,
 Then lauded their offerings as fortuitous, saying,
 "Through this virtuous deed,
 You will become victorious ones known as Madhusaribhava!"
 This was the first prophecy made [392]
 By the Victorious One, the Guide of the World.
 The infinitely many bodhisattvas that were prophesied later
 Cannot possibly turn back from awakening.
 When they heard the Victorious One's prophecy,
 The two brothers were elated and supremely pleased.
 Together with their companions,
 They went for refuge in the Buddha and the Dharma.
 This concludes the twenty-fourth chapter on Trapusa and Bhallika.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 25 — Exhortation

[The gods Brahmā, Sakra, and the other gods sense the Buddha's hesitation. They visit the Buddha and formally request him to teach the Dharma. They repeat the request four times before the Buddha eventually consents. Upon his consent to teach, the Buddha says, "O Brahmā, the gates of nectar are opened".]

Monks, while the Thus-Gone One was seated at the trunk of the Bodhi tree, in the privacy of solitude after he had first attained perfect and complete awakening, he had the following thought about those who act in accordance with the world: "Alas! This truth that I realized and awakened to is profound, peaceful, tranquil, calm, complete, hard to see, hard to comprehend, and impossible to conceptualise since it is inaccessible to the intellect. Only wise noble ones and adepts can understand it. It is the complete and definitive apprehension of the abandonment of all aggregates, the end of all sensations, the absolute truth, and freedom from a foundation. It is a state of complete peace, free of clinging, free of grasping, unobserved, undemonstrable, uncompounded, beyond the six sense spheres, inconceivable, unimaginable, and ineffable. It is indescribable, inexpressible, and incapable of being illustrated. It is unobstructed, beyond all references, a state of interruption through the path of tranquility, and imperceptible like emptiness. It is the exhaustion of craving and it is cessation free of desire. It is nirvana. If I were to teach this truth to others, they would not understand it. Teaching the truth would tire me out and be wrongly contested, and it would be futile. Thus I will remain silent and keep this truth in my heart."

At that time he uttered these verses:
 "Profound, peaceful, stainless, lucid, and unconditioned—
 Such is the nectar-like truth I have realized.
 Were I to teach it, no one would understand,
 So I will silently remain in the forest.
 "I have discovered the supremely sublime and astonishing absolute,
 The ineffable state, untainted by language,
 Suchness, the sky-like nature of phenomena,
 Completely free of discursive, conceptual movement.
 "This meaning cannot be understood through words;
 Rather it is comprehended through reaching their limit.
 Yet when sentient beings, whom previous victorious ones took under their care,
 Hear about this truth, they develop confidence in it.
 "No Dharma at all exists here;
 That which has no existence cannot be found.
 For one who knows the chain of causation and action,
 There is neither existence nor nonexistence here. [F.188.a]
 "For immeasurable hundreds of thousands of eons,
 I emulated the previous victorious ones,
 But I did not attain forbearance for the fact
 That there is no self, no sentient being, and no life force.
 "When I attained this forbearance
 That nobody dies or is born here,
 That the nature of all these phenomena is selfless,
 Then Buddha Dipamkara made a prophecy about me.
 "With my infinite compassion for the whole world,
 I will not stand for just anyone to supplicate.
 These beings all have faith in Brahma;
 Thus, when he supplicates, I will turn the wheel of Dharma.
 "It would only be suitable to bring forth this Dharma of mine

If Brahma were to fall to my feet,
 Supplicating me to explain the stainless and sublime
 Dharma,

And if there were intelligent beings of good disposition."
 Monks, at that time the Thus-Gone One radiated light from the centre of his forehead, which illuminated the entire trichiliocosm with its brilliance. Then, by means of the Buddha's power, Great Top-Knotted Brahma, lord of the trichiliocosm, became aware of the Thus-Gone One's notion. [394] Having understood that the Blessed One was set on keeping the Dharma to himself without teaching it, he thought, "I will most certainly approach and solicit the Thus-Gone One to turn the wheel of Dharma!"

So right then Great Top-Knotted Brahma addressed the other divine sons of the Brahma realms: "Friends! Even though the Thus-Gone One has awakened to unsurpassable, perfect and complete buddhahood, he is set on keeping the Dharma to himself without teaching it. Alas! This world is doomed! Alas, O friends, this world is really doomed! Thus we must surely go and solicit the worthy one, the perfectly and completely awakened Thus-Gone One, to turn the wheel of Dharma."

Monks, then the Great Top-Knotted Brahma, surrounded and escorted by 6.8 million Brahmans, went to the Thus-Gone One. When he arrived, he bowed his head to the feet of the Thus-Gone One, and with palms joined, said this to him:

"Thus-Gone One, even having awakened to unexcelled, perfect and complete awakening, you are bent on keeping the Dharma to yourself without teaching it. Alas, Blessed One! This world is doomed! Alas, Blessed One, this world is really doomed!

There are clever sentient beings of good disposition with the potential, fortune, and ability to comprehend the meaning of what the Blessed One says. Such being the case, O Blessed One, please eloquently teach the Dharma! Please, O Bliss-Gone One, teach the Dharma!"

Then Brahma spoke these verses:

"Having accomplished the orb of supreme great wisdom,
 Radiating light rays throughout the ten directions,
 Your wisdom rays could bring lotus-like people to bloom.
 So then why today, Sun of Speech, do you remain indifferent?

"Coaxing sentient beings with the wealth of the noble ones,
 You could soothe many tens of millions of creatures.
 It is not suitable, O Friend of the World,
 That you silently remain indifferent to the world!

"May you beat the kettledrum of the sublime Dharma!
 May you blow the conch shell of the genuine Dharma!
 May you erect the great sacrificial post of the Dharma!
 May you light the great lamp of the Dharma!
 "May you rain down the waters of Dharma, most sublime!
 May you ferry across all those wallowing in the ocean of existence!

May you liberate all those afflicted with severe illness!
 May you quell those tormented by the fires of afflictions!
 "May you teach the path to peace—
 Joyous, auspicious, imperishable, and without sorrow.
 Have compassion, O Protector, for those on the wrong path;
 They are helpless, since they are not traveling on the path to nirvana!

"May you open the gates to liberation!
 May you explain the inalienable way of Dharma!
 May you, O Lord, cleanse the sublime eye of Dharma
 For beings who are blind from birth!
 "There is no one but you, O Protector, Moon among Men,
 In the world of Brahma, in the world of gods,
 Or in the worlds of yakas, gandharvas, or humans
 Who will remove birth and death from the worlds!
 "Recruiting all the gods,
 O King of Dharma, I beseech you!
 Through this merit, may I also swiftly
 Turn the wheel of Dharma, most sublime!"

Monks, in order to show kindness to the world of gods, humans, and nonhumans, the Thus-Gone One looked upon this world with compassion and silently acquiesced to Great Top-Knotted Brahma. Sure enough, once Great Top-Knotted Brahma understood that this Thus-Gone One had silently acquiesced, he anointed the Thus-Gone One with divine sandalwood powder and divine aloe-wood powder, became joyful and ecstatic, and then vanished that very instant.

Monks, in order to engender respect for the Dharma in the world, in order to increase the root of virtue by having Great Top-Knotted Brahma repeatedly request the Dharma, and because the Dharma is exceedingly profound, the Thus-Gone One once again went into the privacy of solitude and had the following thought:

"This truth to which I awakened is profound, subtle, luminous, hard to comprehend, inconceivable, and beyond the intellect. Understood only by the clever and the wise, it is out of step with all worldly people and difficult to see. It is the abandonment of all aggregates, the cessation of all formations, a state of interruption through the path of tranquility, and imperceptible like emptiness. It is the exhaustion of craving, and it is cessation free of desire. It is nirvana. If I were to teach this truth, and if others did not comprehend it, this would be harmful to me. Thus I will most certainly continue to keep it to myself."

Monks, by the power of the Buddha, Great Top-Knotted Brahma once again became aware of this thought of the Thus-Gone One, and he went to see Sakra, lord of the gods. When he arrived, he told Sakra, lord of the gods:

"Understand, Kausika, that the venerable, perfectly and completely awakened Thus-Gone One is bent on not teaching the Dharma and thus keeping it to himself! And since the worthy one, the perfectly and completely awakened Thus-Gone One, is bent on not teaching the Dharma and thus keeping it to himself, alas, O Kausika, this world is doomed! Alas, O Kausika, this world is really doomed! Alas, this world will be plunged into the great darkness of ignorance! Why don't we then go and request that the worthy one, the perfectly and completely awakened Thus-Gone One, turn the wheel of Dharma? Because the thus-gone ones do not turn the wheel of Dharma without being requested!"

"Very well, my friend!" responded Sakra. And so when the night had passed, Sakra, Brahma, the earth gods, the divine sons of the atmosphere, and the divine sons of the Heaven of the Four Great Kings, the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, the Heaven Free from Strife, the Heaven of Joy, the Heaven of Delighting in Emanations, the Heaven of Making Use of Others' Emanations, the Brahma Realm, the Luminous Heaven, the Heaven of Great Fruition, the Heaven of Perfected Virtue, and the pure realms—many hundreds of thousands of divinities of beautiful appearances—illuminated the area surrounding the fig tree with their divine beauty and their divine luminosity, and approached the Thus-Gone One. They bowed their heads to the feet of the Thus-Gone One, circumambulated him, and stood to one side. Then Sakra, lord of the gods, bowed down with palms joined in the direction of the Thus-Gone One and praised him in verse:

"Your mind is completely liberated,
 Like a full moon free of eclipse.
 May you rise, O Victor in Battle!
 May you shine the light of insight in this dark world!"

When he said that, the Thus-Gone One remained silent. Then Great Top-Knotted Brahma spoke to Sakra, lord of the gods: "O Kausika, venerable, perfectly and completely awakened thus-gone ones are not requested to turn the wheel of Dharma the way you requested it."

So Great Top-Knotted Brahma draped his robe on one shoulder, knelt on his right knee, and bowing down to the Thus-Gone One with palms joined, spoke this verse to him:

"May you rise, O Victor in Battle!
 May you shine the light of insight in this dark world!
 The beings will become knowledgeable.
 O Sage, may you teach the Dharma!"

Monks, when he said that, the Thus-Gone One repeated to Great Top-Knotted Brahma: "O great Brahma, this truth to which I awakened is profound, subtle, luminous, hard to comprehend, inconceivable, and beyond the intellect. Understood only by the clever and the wise, it is out of step with all worldly people and difficult to see. It is the abandonment of all aggregates, the cessation of all formations, a state of interruption through the path of tranquility, and imperceptible like emptiness. It is the exhaustion of craving, and it is cessation free of desire. It is nirvana. If I were to teach this truth, and if others did not comprehend it, this would be harmful to me. And these verses, O Brahma, are my reply to you, time and again:

"My path, going against the stream, is profound.
 It is difficult to see,
 Since those blinded by desire do not see it.
 Therefore teaching it will not be of any help.
 "Beings, bound to their desires,
 Are continuously swept away in the stream.
 I discovered this with great effort;
 Therefore teaching it will not be of any help!"

Monks, when Great Top-Knotted Brahma and Sakra, lord of the gods, understood that the Thus-Gone One would remain silent, these two great beings and their retinue of divine sons, saddened and dejected, disappeared then and there. And so the Thus-Gone One had thrice made up his mind to remain disinterested. Monks, at that time all sorts of negative, inauspicious opinions started to circulate among the people of Magadha. Some said that winds would no longer blow, and some that fires would no longer burn. Some said that rains would no longer fall, some that rivers would no longer flow, and some that crops would no longer grow. Some said that birds would no longer fly in the sky, and some that pregnant women would no longer give birth safely.

Monks, the Great Top-Knotted Brahma knew the nature of the Thus-Gone One's thoughts, and he was aware of the opinions among the people of Magadha. So, at the close of night, he illuminated the entire area surrounding the fig tree with divine light beautiful in colour, and he approached the Thus-Gone One. When he arrived, he bowed his head to the feet of the Thus-Gone One, draped his robe on one shoulder, knelt down on his right knee, and bending forward with palms joined, spoke in verse to the Thus-Gone One:

"Previously in Magadha, the Dharma was impure, Therefore impurely construed talk has emerged there. Thus, please, O Sage, open the gate of nectar! They are ready to listen to the stainless Buddhadharmā! "With your goal accomplished, you reached independence. Having removed the stain of the formation of suffering, Your virtue is without increase or decrease. Here in the best Dharma, you have reached perfection! "O Sage, there is no one like you here in this world! O Great Sage, how could you be surpassed? Being the best, you shine here in the three worlds, O Lord, Like the mountain in the realm of the demigods! "Please have mercy on suffering beings! It is never fitting for those like you to remain indifferent! You are endowed with fearlessness and power! Only you are able to deliver beings! "May all these beings who endure pain for so long, Including gods, renunciates, and priests, Be healthy and free of fever! They have no other refuge here! "Gods and humans have been following you for so long, Yearning for nectar with the virtuous thought, 'May the Dharma be proclaimed, the Dharma which is no less than

Exactly what the Victorious One understands!" "Therefore we supplicate you, with your power so dynamic and benevolent,

May you train sentient beings that have long since strayed from the path!

They have longed to hear meanings unheard, Like the feeble long to be nourished. "The people, suffering from thirst, O Great Sage, Are waiting in your presence for this water of Dharma. Like a cloud over parched earth, O Guide, satiate them with the rain of Dharma! "Long lost, people roam throughout existence Thick with wrong views and full of thorns. Tell of the straight path, free of brambles, By which nectar is attained when meditating upon it! Florence

"The blind, who without a guide have fallen into ravines, Cannot be led out by anyone else here. You, Clever Bull, give rise to ardor And rescue those who have fallen into steep ravines! "An encounter with you, O Sage, is always so long in coming.

Victorious guides appear on this earth only rarely, Like an udumbara flower.

O Protector, please liberate sentient beings that have attained this opportunity!

"In your previous existences you had the thought: 'Once I myself have crossed, I will ferry others across!' Now that you have surely reached the other shore, Fulfill your solemn vow, you with the dynamic power of truth!

"O Sage, clear away the darkness with the lamp of Dharma! Raise high the banner of the Thus-Gone One!

The time has come to utter melodious speech! I beg you to resound like a lion, O You of Drum-like Voice!"

Monks, then the Thus-Gone One looked throughout the entire world with his awakened eye and saw sentient beings that were base, mediocre, and advanced; those that were high, low, and middling; those of good disposition and easy to purify, those of bad disposition and difficult to purify; those that can understand through just a cursory statement, and those for whom the words are paramount and who rely on a detailed explanation for their understanding. He thus saw that sentient beings were grouped into three categories: one that was sure to be wrong, one that was sure to be correct, and one was undetermined. Monks, just as when a person standing on the bank of a lotus pond sees some lotuses submerged in the water, some lotuses at water level, and some lotuses above the water, this was how the Thus-Gone One saw sentient beings situated in three groups when he looked throughout the whole world with his awakened eye.

Monks, then the Thus-Gone One thought, "Whether I teach the Dharma or not, this group that is sure to be wrong will not understand the Dharma. And whether I teach the Dharma or not, this group that is sure to be correct will understand the Dharma. Yet the group that is undetermined will understand the Dharma if I teach it, but will not understand the Dharma if I do not teach it."

Monks, the Thus-Gone One then engendered great compassion, starting with the sentient beings situated in the undetermined group. Monks, from the perspective of his own perfect wisdom, the Thus-Gone One then understood the request made by Great Top-Knotted Brahma and thus spoke to him with this verse:

"O Brahma, the gates of nectar are opened

To those sentient beings of Magadha With ears and with devotion, Who constantly listen with attention and without doing harm."

Then, once Great Top-Knotted Brahma understood that the Thus-Gone One had acquiesced, he rejoiced with satisfaction and glee. Ecstatic and elated, he bowed with his head to the feet of the Thus-Gone One and vanished right there.

Monks, on that occasion the earth gods then proclaimed and announced to the gods of the atmosphere:

"Friends, today the venerable, perfectly and completely awakened Thus-Gone One has acquiesced to turn the wheel of Dharma. He will do this to benefit many beings, to bring happiness to many beings, to compassionately care for the world, for the welfare, betterment, and happiness of gods, humans, and the majority of beings. Listen, friends! The demigod realms will be reduced. The god realms will be filled. And many sentient beings in the world will reach complete nirvana!"

Once the gods of the atmosphere heard this from the earth gods, they announced it to the gods in the Heaven of the Four Great Kings. The gods in the Heaven of the Four Great Kings told those in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three. The gods in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three told those in the Heaven Free from Strife. The gods in the Heaven Free from Strife told those in the Heaven of Joy and the Heaven of Delighting in Emanations. The gods in the Heaven of Joy and the Heaven of Delighting in Emanations told those in the Heaven of Making Use of Others' Emanations. Finally they announced and proclaimed this to the gods of the Brahma realms:

"Today, O friends, the venerable, perfectly and completely awakened Thus-Gone One has acquiesced to turn the wheel of Dharma. He will do this to benefit many beings, to bring happiness to many beings, to compassionately care for the world, for the welfare, betterment, and happiness of gods, humans, and the majority of beings. Listen, friends! The demigod realms will be reduced. The god realms will be filled. And many sentient beings in the world will reach complete nirvana!"

Monks, then simultaneously all of them, beginning with the earth gods all the way up to the gods of the Brahma realm, announced in unison the same proclamation as before: "Today, O friends, the venerable, perfectly and completely awakened Thus-Gone One has acquiesced to turn the wheel of Dharma. He will do this to benefit many beings, to bring happiness to many beings, to compassionately care for the world, for the welfare, betterment, and happiness of gods, humans, and the majority of beings. Listen, friends! The demigod realms will be reduced. The god realms will be filled. And many sentient beings in the world will reach complete nirvana!"

Monks, then the four gods of the Bodhi tree named Dharmaruci, Dharmakaya, Dharmamati, and Dharmacarin fell to the feet of the Thus-Gone One and asked: "Where will the Blessed One turn the wheel of Dharma?"

Monks, when they said that, the Thus-Gone One replied: "At the Deer Park by the Hill of the Fallen Sages, outside of Varanasi."

Then they said, "O Blessed One, the city of Varanasi has merely a limited population, and the Deer Park has only a limited amount of tree shade. There are other big cities, O Blessed One, that are wealthy, flourishing, secure, and pleasant, with abundant provisions, teeming with many people and creatures, and adorned with gardens, forests, and mountains. May the Blessed One please turn the wheel of Dharma in one of these other places!"

The Thus-Gone One replied: "Do not say such a thing, good sirs! And why? I performed sixty trillion sacrifices there; I made offerings to sixty trillion buddhas there. Varanasi was the preferred place of the previous sages; This place, exalted by gods and nagas, is ever inspiring for Dharma.

"I remember that 91 billion previous buddhas Turned the sublime wheel in that supreme grove named after the sages,

Where peace, tranquility, and concentration are actualized, and deer always dwell.

Thus I too will turn the sublime wheel in the supreme grove named after the sages."

This concludes the twenty-fifth chapter on exhortation.

LALITA-VISTARA CHAPTER 26 — Turning the Wheel of Dharma

[The Buddha determines that the most suitable students for his first teaching are his five former companions from the days when he was practicing austerities. The Buddha travels to Deer Park outside of Varanasi, to meet his former companions. Initially, the companions are suspicious of the Buddha for having given up their austerity practices, but they are soon rendered helpless by his majestic presence and request teachings from him. The five companions instantly receive ordination and, in a seminal moment, the Buddha teaches them the Four Noble Truths: suffering, the origin of suffering, the cessation of suffering, and the path that leads to the cessation of suffering. Thus this occasion constitutes the birth of the Three Jewels: the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha.]

Monks, at that point the Thus-Gone One had accomplished everything he had to do. With nothing more to achieve, all his fetters had been cut. All negative emotions had been cleared away, along with his mental stains. He had conquered Mara and all hostile forces, and now he joined the Dharma-way of all awakened ones. He had become omniscient and perceived everything. He possessed the ten powers and had discovered the fourfold fearlessness. All the eighteen unique qualities of a buddha had unfolded within him. Equipped with the fivefold vision, he surveyed the entire world with the unobscured eye of an awakened one and began to reflect:

"To whom should I teach this Dharma for the very first time? Who is pure, kindhearted, easy to train, and a good teacher able to purify others? Who has little desire, anger, and delusion? Who is open-minded and suffers because of never having heard the Dharma? Such a person I should teach first of all. One who understands my teaching will not turn against me."

Then, monks, the Thus-Gone One thought to himself: "Rudraka, the son of Rama, is pure and kindhearted. It is easy for him to make others understand and purify them. He has only little desire, anger, or delusion. He is also open-minded, and now suffers because he has never heard the Dharma. He instructs his students in the practice of disciplined conduct that leads to a state of mind that is neither conscious nor unconscious. Now, where is he staying?"

At that moment the Thus-Gone One realised that Rudraka had died just one week before. The gods, too, bowed their heads to the Thus-Gone One's feet and said, "Lord, that is how it is. Bliss-Gone One, that is how it is. Rudraka, the son of Rama, died just one week ago."

Monks, at that point I had this thought: "Oh no, how sad that Rudraka, the son of Rama, died before hearing this well-prepared teaching! If only he had received my teaching, he would surely have understood it. To him I would have explained this Dharma for the first time, and he would not have turned against me." Monks, the Thus-Gone One again had this thought: "Now, where could there be another being who is pure and easy to train? Who would have all these qualities and not react against the teaching of Dharma?"

Monks, the Thus-Gone One then had this thought: "Arada Kalapa is pure and has all the other qualities. He would not react against the teaching of Dharma." So the Thus-Gone One wondered, "Where would he be now?" Wondering, he realised that Arada Kalapa had passed away just three days earlier.

The gods from the pure realms further clarified that matter for the Thus-Gone One, saying: "Lord, that is how it is. Bliss-Gone One, that is how it is. Arada Kalapa died just three days ago."

The Thus-Gone One then thought: "Oh no, how sad that Arada Kalapa died before hearing this well-prepared teaching!"

Monks, at that point the Thus-Gone One once again reflected: "What other being is pure, has a good heart and all the qualities, and would not react against my presentation of the Dharma?"

Monks, the Thus-Gone One then had this thought: "My five ascetic companions are pure and goodhearted. They will make good teachers who are able to purify others. They have only little desire, anger, or delusion. They would be open-minded, and they are now suffering because of not having heard the Dharma. When I was practicing under hardships, they helped me. They will understand the Dharma taught by me, and they will not turn against me."

Monks, at that point the Thus-Gone One decided: "My five ascetic companions will be the ones to whom I shall teach the Dharma for the first time!" Monks, the Thus-Gone One now further thought: "Where might these five companions be staying?" Scanning the entire world with his eye of an awakened one, he saw the five ascetics staying in the Deer Park in Varanasi by a hill known as the Hill of the Fallen Sages.

After seeing this, he thought to himself: "If I teach these five excellent ascetics the Dharma before I teach anyone else, they will understand my Dharma when I teach it for the very first time."

Why is that? Monks, they have already practiced and they already possess pure qualities of accomplished scholars. They are intent on the path to liberation and are free from obstructing forces.

Now, monks, having reflected in this way, the Thus-Gone One arose from the seat of awakening, making the trichiliocosm tremble. In due course, passing through the country of Magadha, he set off on his way to Kasi. In Gaya, not far from the seat of awakening, an Ajivika mendicant spotted him from afar. Seeing the Thus-Gone One approaching, he came up to him and stood to one side.

As he stood to one side, monks, the Ajivika first made a pleasing conversation about various things with the Thus-Gone One, saying: "Venerable Gautama, your senses are calm, and your skin is bright, pure, and of yellow hue. Just as the autumn season, which is white and bright, becomes of yellow hue, your senses, Lord Gautama, are bright, and your round face is perfectly pure. Just as when the ripe fruit of the tala tree is nipped off its stem, the severed area immediately becomes yellow, bright, and perfectly pure, [F.194.b] so, Gautama, are your bright senses and your perfectly pure round face. Just as a necklace made of gold from the Jambu River, whose surface has the excellence of a shining meteor, when well fashioned by a skillful son of a goldsmith and thrown onto a white cloth becomes of vivid colour, resplendent, perfectly pure, and exceedingly bright, just so, Venerable Gautama, are your calmed senses, bright skin colour, and your perfectly pure round face. Venerable Gautama, with whom did you practice religion?"

Monks, the Thus-Gone One replied to the Ajivika with this verse:

"I do not have any teacher;
There is no one like me.
I alone am the perfect Buddha,
Cool and without any flaws."
The seeker then said: "Gautama, surely you are not telling me that you have become a worthy one?" [406]
The Thus-Gone One replied:
"I am a worthy one of the world;
I am the unsurpassed teacher.
Among the gods, demigods, and divine spirits,
There is no rival to me."
The seeker asked: "Gautama, surely you are not telling me that you have become a victorious one?"
The Thus-Gone One replied:
"The victorious ones should be known to be like me,
Who has exhausted all faults.
I have conquered all evil dharmas;
Therefore, my friend, I am indeed a victorious one."
The mendicant asked again: "Venerable Gautama, where will you go now?"
The Thus-Gone One replied:
"I am on my way to Varanasi.
When I arrive in the city of Kasi,
I shall spread an incomparable light
To shine in this world of the blind.
"I am on my way to Varanasi.
When I arrive in the city of Kasi,
I shall beat the great drum of nectar
To be heard in this world of the deaf.
"I am on my way to Varanasi.
When I arrive in the city of Kasi,
I shall turn the wheel of Dharma
That has never been turned in this world."
"May this come to pass, Gautama!" replied the Ajivika.
"May this come to pass!"

The mendicant then took off toward the south while the Thus-Gone One went north. Monks, at this point Sudarsana, the king of the nagas, invited the Thus-Gone One to stay with him in Gaya for some refreshments. The Thus-Gone One then proceeded to Rohitavastu and on toward Uruvela-Kalpa, Anala, and the town of Sarathi. Monks, in all those places the laypeople invited the Thus-Gone One to stay and refresh himself. In due course he arrived at the banks of the great river Ganges. Monks, at that time the great river Ganges was swollen and flowed on the same level as its banks. Now, monks, since the Thus-Gone One wanted to cross the river, he approached a ferryman about this.

The ferryman told him, "Gautama, you must pay the crossing fee."

The Thus-Gone One replied, "Sir, I do not have any means to pay the crossing fee." Then he flew through the air from one shore to the other.

When the boatman saw this, he felt great regret, thinking, "Oh no, how sad! How could I refuse to give a ferry ride to such a venerable man worthy of being served!"
He then fainted and fell to the ground.

Later the boatman recounted the story to King Bimbisara: "Your Majesty, when I asked the mendicant Gautama to pay the crossing fee, he told me that he did not have money to pay the fare. Instead he just flew through the air from one bank to the other!"

When King Bimbisara heard this, he waived the crossing fee for monks from that day onward.

Monks, in this way the Thus-Gone One traveled through the land. Finally he arrived at the city of Varanasi. At dawn he dressed, put on his mendicant robe, and took his alms bowl. Then he entered the city of Varanasi to seek alms.

Soon he had acquired enough offerings and sat down for his meal. He then proceeded to the Hill of the Fallen Sages at the Deer Park to meet his five former companions. The five companions could see the Thus-Gone One approaching from a distance, and they began to scheme:

"Venerable ones, look, here comes that mendicant Gautama, that lazy, gluttonous one who has given up on his ascetic practices. Before, when he practiced austerities, he never managed to manifest any deep wisdom derived from the teachings of superior humans. How much worse are things now! He is not to be emulated as he walks around eating proper food and doing easy practices. That lazy glutton! None of us should approach him to greet him or rise when he comes. Do not help him by holding his robes or his offering bowl. Don't offer him food or drink for refreshment, nor a place to rest his legs. We can, however, set up some spare seats and say: 'Venerable Gautama, these are spare seats. If you like, you may sit.' The venerable Ajiana Kaundinya did not agree with this, but he did not voice his opposition, either.

Monks, the closer the Thus-Gone One came to his five former companions, the more uncomfortable they felt in their seats and wanted to stand up. They felt like birds caught in a cage with a fire burning below.

Just as birds tormented by a fire wish nothing more than to take off quickly and fly away, the closer the Thus-Gone One came to the five companions, the more uncomfortable they felt in their seats and wanted to get up. The reason they felt this way is that no living being is able to remain seated when beholding the Thus-Gone One. So the closer the Thus-Gone One came to the five companions, the more overwhelming his splendour and radiance became. They began to quiver in their seats, and then their prior plan fell apart completely and they all stood up from their seats. One went to greet him. One approached him and held his robe and alms bowl. One prepared a seat for him. One made a footrest. One brought water for washing his feet and said, "Welcome, Venerable Gautama! Welcome, Venerable Gautama! Please sit on this seat that we have laid out."

Monks, the Thus-Gone One indeed sat on the seat that had been arranged, and the five companions, who tried to make diverse, happy, and pleasing conversation with the Thus-Gone One, sat a little apart. They spoke to the Thus-Gone One in the same way the Ajivika had addressed him earlier: "Venerable Gautama, your senses are calm, and your skin is bright, pure, and of yellow hue. Just as the autumn season, which is white and bright, becomes of yellow hue, your senses, Lord Gautama, are bright, and your round face is perfectly pure. Just as when the ripe fruit of the tala tree is nipped off its stem, the severed area immediately becomes yellow, bright, and perfectly pure, so, Gautama, are your bright senses and your perfectly pure round face. Just as a necklace made of gold from the Jambu River, whose surface has the excellence of a shining meteor, when well fashioned by a skillful son of a goldsmith and thrown onto a white cloth becomes of vivid colour, resplendent, perfectly pure, and exceedingly bright, just so, Venerable Gautama, are your calmed senses, bright skin colour, and your perfectly pure round face. Venerable Gautama, with whom did you practice religion?"

The Thus-Gone One answered the five companions in the following way: "Monks, you should not address the Thus-Gone One 'venerable,' meaning 'long-lived.' May it not be long before you obtain your goals, welfare, and happiness. Monks, I have actualised immortality and the path that leads to immortality. Monks, I am the awakened one, the omniscient one, the all-seeing one. I have become tranquil and have exhausted all faults.

"Monks, being the master of phenomena, I will teach you the Dharma. Come, listen and understand. Listen intently with open ears, and I will give you instruction and guidance. When I teach and guide you, you will also relinquish all faults and be liberated within a stainless and insightful state of mind. When you attain realisation, you will proclaim: 'Our births have been exhausted. The religious life has been led. That which ought to be done has been done—and nothing else. We therefore know an existence different from this ordinary life.'

"Did you not, monks, earlier say to yourselves: 'Venerable ones, look, here comes that mendicant Gautama, that lazy, gluttonous one who has given up on his ascetic practices. Before, when he practiced austerities, he never managed to manifest any deep wisdom derived from the teachings of superior humans. How much worse are things now! He is not to be emulated as he walks around eating proper food and doing easy practices. That lazy glutton! None of us should approach him to greet him or rise when he comes. Don't help him by holding his robes or his offering bowl. Do not offer him food or drink for refreshment, nor a place to rest his legs. We can, however, set up some spare seats and say: 'Venerable Gautama, these are spare seats. If you like, you may sit.'"

Monks, as soon as the Thus-Gone One had uttered these words, every non-Buddhist symbol and banner that the five companions were wearing disappeared in an instant. Instead they each now found themselves dressed in the three robes of a mendicant with an alms bowl and their head shaven. Even their behavior was as if they had already been ordained for a hundred years. This truly was their "going forth"; this very ordination became the essence of monkhood.

Monks, right away the five monks bowed to the Thus-Gone One's feet and confessed their wrong behavior. In the Thus-Gone One's presence, they developed their recognition of him as their teacher, as well as their love, devotion, and respect for him. Out of devotion they then gave the Thus-Gone One a refreshing and cleansing bath in a lotus pond with lotuses of many different colours.

Monks, after the Thus-Gone One had been refreshed by his bath, he thought to himself: "Where did all the previous thus-gone ones, the worthy ones, the perfect buddhas, turn the wheel of Dharma?" Monks, at whichever place the previous thus-gone ones, the worthy ones, turned the wheel of Dharma, at that place there appeared one thousand jewel thrones, made of seven kinds of jewels. Then the Thus-Gone One, out of respect to the thus-gone ones of the past, circumambulated the first three thrones and then sat down crossed-legged on the fourth throne like a fearless lion. The five monks prostrated to the Thus-Gone One with their heads at his feet and then sat down before him.

Monks, at that point the Thus-Gone One's body began to emit light rays that filled this trichiliocosm with bright light. This light illuminated the inhabitants of the entire world who were steeped in evil and darkness. The colour and brilliance of this light even outshone that of the sun and the moon, those magical planets that are otherwise so highly praised for their great power. The light shone so brightly that it illuminated even places so dark that those beings who are born there cannot see their hands, even if they hold them right in front of their faces. Now even those beings were bathed in light so bright that they immediately saw and acknowledged each other, saying, "Oh my, there are other beings here! There really are!"

Then the whole trichiliocosm began to shake in six different ways and exhibited eighteen great signs. It began to quiver, tremble, quake, wobble, thunder, and roar, each in three degrees of intensity. The world shook so violently that when the edge was down, the centre was up; when the edge was up, the centre was down; when the east was down, the west was up; when the west was up, the east was down; when the north was down, the south was up; when the north was up, the south was down.

At that point one could hear all sorts of pleasant and cheerful sounds. There were sounds that inspired love and made everyone serene. There were inviting and refreshing sounds impossible to describe or imitate, agreeable sounds that do not produce fear. At that moment there was not a single being anywhere that felt hostile, frightened, or anxious. At that moment even the light of the sun and moon and the splendour of the gods, such as Sakra, Brahma, and the worldly protectors, could not be perceived anymore. All beings who were living in the hells along with those born as animals and all those in the world of the lord of death became instantaneously free from suffering and filled with every happiness. No being had any emotion, such as hatred, delusion, envy, jealousy, pride, hypocrisy, arrogance, wrath, malice, or burning anguish. At that moment all sentient beings felt love for each other, wished each other well, and saw each other as parents and children. Then, from within the array of light, these verses rang out:

"Leaving the Heaven of Joy,
The Lord went to the mother's womb,
Took birth in the Lumbini Grove,
And was lifted up by the husband of Saci.
"With the gait of a lion,
He took seven steps and, undistracted,
Spoke with the voice of Brahma:
'I am the most excellent in the world.'
"In order to help all beings,
He abandoned the four continents and took ordination.
He first practiced austerities and hardships
Before going to the centre of the earth.
"He conquered Mara and his army,
And gained awakening for the sake of the world.
He has come to Varanasi
And will turn the wheel of Dharma.
"Brahma and the other gods requested him
To turn the wheel of equanimity.
Engendering compassion for the world,
The Sage gave his consent.
"Keeping his firm promise,
He has come to the Deer Park at Varanasi.
There he will turn the wheel

That is wondrous, glorious, and unsurpassed.
 "The Lord practiced for a hundred billion eons. [F.198.a]
 If you seek the Dharma that he discovered,
 You should come in a hurry
 To listen to the Dharma.
 "Rare is the human condition and the arising of a buddha,
 And extremely rare it is that someone develops faith.
 It is rare to find freedom from the eight unfortunate states,
 So listening to the Dharma is the most important activity.
 "All these things have been found today:

The Thus-Gone One has appeared, and you have your freedom and faith.

Hearing the Dharma is the most precious thing
 For one who renounces all mad carelessness.

"For the last billion eons,
 You have never heard the Dharma.

This Dharma has been discovered today
 By one who renounces all mad carelessness.

"Our Guide will turn the wheel of immortality,
 So come quickly, everyone!

This voice now urges all of you gods,
 From the earth up until Brahma, to come."

Once the great divine voice had called the gods,
 They at once abandoned their wealth
 And all appeared

By the side of the Thus-Gone One.

Monks, in order for the Thus-Gone One to turn the wheel of Dharma at the Deer Park by the Hill of the Fallen Sages in Varanasi, the earth gods now formed a great circle around the Thus-Gone One. The circle was wonderful and beautiful to the eye. It was enormous with a circumference of seven hundred miles, and the gods adorned the sky above it with parasols, victory flags, banners, and canopies.

The divine sons from the desire and form realms then offered to the Thus-Gone One 8.4 million lion thrones, accompanied by this request: "Please consider us with love and take your seat on this throne. We pray that the Blessed One will then turn the wheel of Dharma."

Monks, at that time from all directions—east, south, west, and north, above and below—many millions of bodhisattvas who had made previous aspirations for this occasion came forth. They all bowed down to the feet of the Thus-Gone One and requested him to turn the wheel of Dharma. All the powerful gods in this billionfold universe, such as Sakra, Brahma, the worldly protectors, and the other ones with the title of Great lord, bowed their heads to the Thus-Gone One's feet. They all requested the Thus-Gone One to turn the wheel of Dharma with these words:

"May the Blessed One now turn the wheel of Dharma for the benefit and happiness of many beings, for the love of the world, for the well-being and happiness of great numbers of beings, both gods and humans. Bliss-Gone One, please make this offering of Dharma. Lord, please shower the rain of Dharma! Unfold the great victory banner of the Dharma! Blow the great conch of the Dharma! Beat the great drum of the Dharma!"

From everywhere in this trichilocosm, Brahma, Sakra, and many guardians appeared. Bowing their heads to the Victorious One, they said:

"Great Sage, please remember your earlier promise. Previously you said, 'I am the first and the best, I will free all beings from their suffering.' Sage, as you sat below the holy tree, you then tamed Mara and his henchmen, and awakened to the peace and sacredness of supreme awakening. You felled the tree of disturbing emotions.

Now all the intentions that you nurtured for a hundred eons have been fulfilled. So now please look upon those beings who are without a protector and turn the supreme wheel."

The light of the Thus-Gone One illuminated hundreds of thousands of buddha realms, causing many hundreds of sons of the buddhas to arrive miraculously. They offered the Bliss-Gone One manifold and vast offerings and praised his qualities. Then they made this request to his compassionate being:

"Like a compassionate cloud, a lightning bolt of wisdom, and a wind of insight, For a thousand eons, you have nourished beings with your thunderous voice. Please pacify their thirst with the downpour from the rain cloud of the eightfold path; May your powers, faculties, and concentration make the harvest of liberation bountiful.

"For many thousands of eons, you have trained well and rested in the richness of emptiness;

You dispense the medicine of the Dharma and know the lives of sentient beings.

For human beings, tormented by the hundred diseases of disturbing emotions, Victorious Physician, please turn the supreme wheel of Dharma and liberate beings.

"For so long you increased the six perfections; You performed and amassed an incomparable and immutable wealth of Dharma. As you behold all these beings without protection, wealth, or guidance, Noble Guide, please share the seven types of wealth and turn the wheel.

"Seeking the awakening of the victorious ones, you joyfully relinquished your fortune, Riches, treasures, gold, fine robes, beautiful flowers, ointments, scented powders, Finest dwellings, your retinue of consorts, the kingdom, even your beloved son. Perfect Buddha, please turn the supreme wheel.

"For a hundred eons you have likewise kept your discipline intact and pure, Always training in patience and with your diligence never waning. Sage, your concentration is supreme and your insight is a clairvoyant wisdom; With your intent fulfilled, please remove the fever and turn the supreme wheel."

Monks, at that point a bodhisattva, a great being, known as the One Who Turns the Wheel When the Intent Is Formed, offered a Dharma wheel to the Thus-Gone One. It was an exquisite wheel adorned with all kinds of jewels, gems, and various other embellishments. It had a hub, a rim, and a thousand spokes. It was adorned with flower garlands, lattices of gold, tassels with bells, and the motifs of an elephant in rut, a filled vase, and a swastika. The wheel was adorned with various marks of auspiciousness, beautifully wrapped in divine fabrics and dyed in different colours. It was strewn with flowers of the heavens, adorned with fragrant garlands, and rubbed with perfumed ointments.

In this way it was a wheel as beautiful as can be. It came about through the power of previous aspirations made as the Bodhisattva had trained. It was truly a suitable offering to the Thus-Gone One. Since all the previous thus-gone ones in succession had accepted this wheel, it possessed the unbroken blessings of all the buddhas. In fact this wheel had previously been turned by all former thus-gone ones, worthy ones, perfect buddhas, and therefore it was now offered to the Thus-Gone One for turning.

Once he had made his offering to the Thus-Gone One, the bodhisattva joined his palms and praised the Thus-Gone One with these verses:

"When Dipamkara made the prediction for the Pure One,
 He said, 'You will become a buddha, a lion among the lions of men.'

At that time I made the following aspiration:

'When I become perfectly enlightened, I will seek the Dharma.'

"Today the best of beings have come here from the ten directions,

So many in number that they cannot be counted.

With joined palms they bow at the Thus-Gone One's feet
 And request the joy of the Sakya clan to turn the wheel of Dharma.

"The offerings of the gods at the seat of awakening,
 And the arrays of the sons of the victorious ones—
 They all stand together, set forth for the wheel of Dharma.
 The complete array could never be fully described.

"The heavens above this trichilocosm are filled with gods,
 And on earth demigods, kinnaras, and humans roam.
 Yet no sound can be heard at this very moment

As everyone looks with a peaceful mind to the Victorious One."

Monks, the Thus-Gone One now spent the first part of the night in silence. During the middle part of the night, he gave an eloquent talk. Finally, during the last part of the night, he summoned the five excellent companions and said:

"Monks, there are two extremes that you should avoid when you have taken ordination. First do not follow self-indulgence, which is shallow, worldly, ordinary, unworthy of a noble one, and attended by undesired consequences. In the long run it will prevent you from practicing your religion. You will become distracted and unable to develop nonattachment. You will not enter into the state of cessation nor develop higher knowledge, or attain the perfect awakening of nirvana. On the other hand, straying from the middle way, you will not pass beyond suffering. If you mistreat your body so that it suffers and is harmed, you will face difficulties as can be observed right now, and in the future even further misery will fall on you.

"Monks, the Bliss-Gone One teaches the Dharma by showing the middle way that does not fall into either of the two extremes. The Dharma that he teaches is one of correct view, intention, speech, action, livelihood, effort, mindfulness, and concentration.

"Monks, there are also four truths of the noble ones. What are these four? Suffering, the origin of suffering, the cessation of suffering, and the path that leads to the cessation of suffering.

"What is suffering? It is the pain that accompanies birth, growing old, falling sick, and dying. It also includes the suffering of meeting the unpleasant and parting from the pleasant. Not finding what is being sought is also suffering. In short the five perpetuating aggregates are suffering. This is what we call suffering.

"What is the origin of suffering? It is the craving that perpetuates existence, which is attended upon by the passion for enjoyment, and which finds pleasures here and there. That is the origin of suffering.

"What is the cessation of suffering? It is the complete and dispassionate cessation of craving that perpetuates existence, which is attended upon by the passion for enjoyment, and which finds pleasures here and there. This is the cessation of suffering.

"What is the path that leads to the cessation of suffering? It is exclusively the eightfold path of the noble ones. [F.200.b] This is the path that starts with correct view and ends with correct concentration. It is called the path that leads to the cessation of suffering—a noble truth.

"Monks, these four truths are the truths of the noble ones.

"Monks, this teaching I had not heard previously. I understood it by intensely and introspectively focusing my mind on suffering. In this way my wisdom, vision, understanding, intellect, intelligence, knowledge, and insight became manifest.

"Monks, this teaching I had not heard previously. I understood it by focusing intently on the origin of suffering. In this way my wisdom, vision, understanding, intellect, intelligence, knowledge, and insight became manifest.

"Monks, this teaching I had not heard previously. I understood it by focusing intently on the cessation of suffering. In this way my wisdom, vision, understanding, intellect, intelligence, knowledge, and insight became manifest.

"Monks, this teaching I had not heard previously. I understood it by focusing intently on the path that leads to the cessation of suffering. In this way my wisdom, vision, understanding, intellect, intelligence, knowledge, and insight became manifest.

"Monks, within this teaching that I had not heard previously, suffering must be known. This I understood by focusing intently on suffering. In this way my wisdom, vision, understanding, intellect, intelligence, knowledge, and insight became manifest.

"Monks, within this teaching that I had not heard previously, the origin of suffering must be abandoned. This I understood by focusing intently on the origin of suffering. In this way my wisdom, vision, understanding, intellect, intelligence, knowledge, and insight became manifest.

"Monks, within this teaching that I had not heard previously, the cessation of suffering must be actualized. This I understood by focusing intently on the cessation of suffering. In this way my wisdom, vision, understanding, intellect, intelligence, knowledge, and insight became manifest.

"Monks, within this teaching that I had not heard previously, the path that leads to the cessation of suffering must be practiced. This I understood by focusing intently on the path that leads to the cessation of suffering. In this way my wisdom, vision, understanding, intellect, intelligence, knowledge, and insight became manifest.

"Monks, within this teaching that I had not heard previously, I have fully understood suffering. This I did by focusing intently on suffering. In this way my wisdom, vision, understanding, intellect, intelligence, knowledge, and insight became manifest.

"Monks, within this teaching that I had not heard previously, I have abandoned the origin of suffering. This I did by focusing intently on the origin of suffering. In this way my wisdom, vision, understanding, intellect, intelligence, knowledge, and insight became manifest.

"Monks, within this teaching that I had not heard previously, I have actualised the cessation of suffering. This I did by focusing intently on the cessation of suffering. In this way my wisdom, vision, understanding, intellect, intelligence, knowledge, and insight became manifest.

"Monks, within this teaching that I had not heard previously, I have practiced the path that leads to the cessation of suffering. This I did by focusing intently on the path that leads to the cessation of suffering. In this way my wisdom, vision, understanding, intellect, intelligence, knowledge, and insight became manifest.

"Monks, in this way I genuinely contemplated each of the four truths of the noble ones while I recited them three times. Still I did not develop the wisdom that sees their twelve aspects. Monks, therefore I did not make any claims of having awakened to unsurpassable, perfect and complete buddhahood, and I still lacked the insight of wisdom.

"However, monks, once I had recited the four truths of the noble ones three times, I developed the wisdom that sees their twelve aspects. At that point my mind was free and my insight was now free and pure. Monks, at that point I declared that I had awakened to unsurpassable, perfect and complete buddhahood. My wisdom vision had been developed, my births had been exhausted, I had carried out my religious practice, I had done what needed to be done, and I will not have another life."

On this topic, it is said:

With the melody of Brahma and the voice of a kinnara,
 Emanating trillions of light rays,

He, who had cherished the truth for many millions of eons,
 The Self-Arisen Sakyamuni, spoke these words to Kaundinya:

"The eyes, ears, and nose are impermanent and baseless;
 Likewise the tongue, body, and mind are also suffering, selfless, and empty.

They are lifeless matter, inert like hay or a wall;
 There is no self here, neither a person nor life force.

"All phenomena are causally produced;

THE GRAND BIBLE

Beyond limits and without consciousness, they are like space.

There is no agent and likewise no one who feels, And no action that can be observed as performed, be it good or bad.

"Suffering arises based on the aggregates; The water of craving makes it grow.

On the path the aggregates are perceived to be the equality of phenomena;

Infinitely diminished in harmony with the law of decay, they cease.

"Through conceptual thinking, which is superficial, Ignorance arises; it has no other source.

When you eliminate the cause of formations, there is no passing on;

Consciousness arises dependent on passing on.

"Likewise name and form appear from consciousness;

From name and form, the six sense fields appear.

When joined with these six sense fields, it is said that contact appears;

Contact produces the three kinds of feelings.

"Even the smallest feeling is said to be accompanied by craving,

And craving produces all forms of clinging.

The clinging in turn perpetuates all existence,

And based on existence, one's birth occurs.

"Rooted in birth, the stages of old age, sickness, and death follow;

In this web of existence, there are many types of birth.

Likewise all beings appear from conditions,

With no self or person who transmigrates.

"Whoever has no thought or concept has found the true way;

Whoever has found the true way has no ignorance.

Whoever has brought this ignorance to a halt

Has exhausted all forms of existence for good.

"The Awakened One, the Thus-Gone One, the Self-Arisen One Has severed this causation within himself. Buddha can only mean someone who knows all causality; It does not refer to the aggregates, sense sources, and elements.

"There is no place here for the heretics of other schools; Here, in such practice of the Dharma, the emptiness has been proclaimed. Those beings who are fortunate enough to understand this teaching Are those who studied and were purified under previous buddhas."

When the wheel of Dharma was turned

With its twelve aspects,

Kaundinya understood the meaning,

And so the Three Jewels came to be.

The Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha:

These are the Three Jewels.

Even up to the Palace of Brahma,

The news went out from person to person:

"The Protector of the World

Has turned a stainless wheel.

The Three Jewels, which are so rare in this world,

Have now appeared."

The five monks—

Kaundinya and the rest—

Along with sixty million gods

Purified their eye of Dharma.

Others, however, say that there were eighty million deities

Present from the realm of form.

Their vision was purified

At the time of the turning of the wheel of Dharma.

The 84,000 humans

Who had congregated there

Purified their eyes

And were liberated from all unfavourable rebirths.

Immediately the Thus-Gone One's unbounded voice went out into the ten directions. Its sweet and beautiful sound could be heard throughout the heavens: "The Sage of the Sakyas, endowed with the ten powers, went to the Hill of the Fallen Sages at Varanasi, where he turned the supreme wheel of Dharma. That is what happened."

At the same time hundreds of buddhas, residing in the ten directions, all became silent. This caused all their attendants to ask the victorious ones: "When we heard this voice, you stopped the Dharma talk that you were delivering by means of your ten powers. Why did you become silent? Please tell us right away!"

The buddhas replied: "In the past, for hundreds of lives this Buddha strove diligently toward awakening and did better than many hundreds of thousands of bodhisattvas.

Thus he, the Benefactor, attained spiritual heat and the most auspicious awakening. The Dharma wheel, which revolves three times, has been set in motion, so this is why we are silent."

When the hundred million beings heard this answer from the buddhas, they developed the power of love and entered into supreme and auspicious awakening. Then they said: "Even we are able to follow in the footsteps of this Sage with all his glorious diligence and power. Now may we swiftly become the best in this world; may we give to others the eye of Dharma."

At that point the bodhisattva, the great being, Maitreya addressed the Blessed One:

"Lord, these bodhisattvas, the great beings, who reside in the ten directions of the world would like to hear from you in person in order to learn how you turn the wheel of Dharma. Therefore, Lord, please be kind enough to explain what kind of wheel is the wheel of Dharma, which has been turned by the Thus-Gone One, the Worthy One, the Perfect Buddha."

The Blessed One replied: "Maitreya, the wheel of Dharma is profound because it cannot be grasped by the intellect. This wheel is hard to see because it is beyond duality. This wheel is hard to comprehend because it is not an object of conceptual investigation. This wheel is hard to discern because it is related to the sameness of wisdom and consciousness.

"This wheel is without any blemishes because it leads to the attainment of liberation, which is free from any obscurations. This wheel is subtle because it cannot be exemplified. This wheel is essential because it leads to the attainment of vajra-like wisdom. This wheel is indestructible because it preexists its own turning.

"This wheel is without mental elaboration because it is devoid of the sources of conceptual thinking. This wheel is undisturbed because of its infinite steadiness. This wheel encompasses everything because it is equal to the sky.

"Maitreya, this wheel of Dharma has the nature of the essence of all phenomena. It is a wheel with the power to teach. It is a wheel beyond birth, cessation, and enduring. It is a wheel without the all-ground. It is a wheel of the Dharma-way of nonconceptuality to its full extent.

"It is a wheel of emptiness, a wheel of signlessness, a wheel free of any intent. It is a wheel of the unconditioned, a wheel of solitude, a wheel without desire, a wheel of cessation, and a wheel that engages with the enlightened mind of the thus gone ones.

"It is a wheel that is unconfused regarding the realm of phenomena, a wheel that is undisturbed concerning authentic limit. It is a wheel without attachment and obscuration. It is a wheel free from the two extreme views in the understanding of interdependence. It is a wheel without disturbance within the realm of phenomena beyond centre and edge.

"It is a wheel of the effortless and ceaseless activity of the Thus-Gone One. It is a wheel beyond activity and nonactivity. It is a wheel utterly ungraspable. It is a wheel beyond effort and effortlessness, an inexpressible wheel. It is a wheel that is like the nature of phenomena. It is a wheel of entering the sameness of all phenomena within a single sphere.

"It is a wheel that never reverses and continuously bestows guidance and blessings on sentient beings that are deprived of freedom. It is a wheel of entering the way of the ultimate truth, which assumes nonduality. It is a wheel that genuinely subsumes the realm of phenomena. This wheel is immeasurable because it transcends all limits.

"This wheel cannot be enumerated because it is beyond something that can be counted. This wheel is inconceivable because it is beyond the realm of conceptual mind. This wheel is unequalled because it is beyond equality. This wheel is inexpressible because it is beyond all paths of audible words.

"It is limitless. It is without example because it is beyond exemplification. It is like the sky; it does not cease, yet neither is it permanent. Accepting interdependence does not disturb its peace; it is infinitely peaceful. It is reality itself. Its nature is none other than that, not like that, or neither.

"It speaks the languages of all beings. It suppresses all demonic forces and defeats the non-Buddhists. It is an escape from cyclic existence. It is the entering into the realm of the buddhas. It is understood by noble beings and realized by solitary buddhas. The bodhisattvas embrace it. It is praised by all the buddhas. It is indivisible from all the thus-gone ones."

"Maitreya, such is the wheel of Dharma that the Thus-Gone One turns. It is when the Thus-Gone One turns this wheel that he is called a thus-gone one. Then he is called a perfectly awakened buddha, the one who naturally manifests, lord of Dharma, the guide, the perfect guide, the complete guide, the captain, the one with mastery over all dharmas, and the lord of the Dharma.

"He is also called the one who turns the wheel of Dharma, the liberal provider of the gift of Dharma, lord of the offerings, the one who grants offerings perfectly, the one who accomplishes disciplined action, the one who fulfills all aims, the teacher, the one who gives comfort, the hero, and the one who abandons disturbing emotions.

"He is also known as the one who has conquered in battle, the one who hoists the parasol, the victory flag, and the banner, the one who shines, the radiant one, the one who dispels darkness, the torchbearer, the great king among physicians, the perfect teacher, and the great remover of pain.

"He is the one who sees wisdom perfectly clear, the one who sees all around, the one who looks all around, the one with eyes in all directions, the one who shines in all directions, the one who lights up the world all around, the one who faces all directions, the universal sun, the universal moon, the one beautiful in every way, and the one who never abides and neither accepts nor rejects.

"He does not feel elated or depressed, and therefore he is known as the One Similar to the Earth. Since he is unshakable, he is known as the King of Mountains. He is known as the Glory of the World because he possesses all the qualities of the world. Since he is clearly superior to the entire world, he is called the Invisible Summit. He is called ocean-like because his profundity and depth are hard to fathom.

"He is called the Source of the Precious Dharma because he has perfected all the precious teachings that lead to awakening. He is said to be like the wind because he does not rest anywhere. He is known to possess a nonclinging intellect because his mind is nonclinging, unfettered, and liberated. He is called the Irreversible Dharma because of his realisation that penetrates all phenomena. He is known as the Fire-like One because he burns away all disturbing emotions, having given up all pretense.

"He is like the water because he is purified of evil and always has pure thoughts and stainless body and mind. He is like the sky because he has actualized the wisdom of the realm of phenomena, without centre or edge, within the range of nonclinging wisdom.

"He is known as the One Who Abides in a Liberated State of Unobstructed Wisdom because he has abandoned all the different obscuring phenomena. He is called the One with a Body That Issues Forth Entirely from the Realm of Phenomena because he transcends the path of space-like vision. He is called the Supreme Being because he has no disturbing emotions caused by worldly objects.

"He is called the nonclinging being, the one with the limitless intellect, the teacher of the Dharma that transcends the world, the spiritual preceptor of the world, the physician of the world, the most sublime in the world, the one who is not stained by worldly concerns, the protector of the world, the most excellent in the world, the foremost in the world, lord of the world, the one honoured by the world, the ultimate refuge of the world, the one who has gone beyond the world, the light of the world, and the one transcending the world.

"He is called the master of the world, the one who benefits the world, the one who serves the world, the one who knows the world, the one who has become the regent of the world, the excellent recipient of gifts, the one worthy of offerings, the great field of merit, the great being, the supreme being, the most supreme being, the unexcelled being, the being with no one above, the unequalled being, and the unique being.

"He is called the one who always rests in equanimity, the one who rests in the equality of all phenomena, the one who has discovered the path, the teacher of the path, the one who shows the path, and the one who genuinely abides on the path.

"He is called the one who has transcended the domain of Mara and the one who has conquered the retinue of Mara. Since he is no longer subject to old age and death he is known as the one who discovered the cool quality. He is the one without darkness, the one without pains, the one without yearnings, the one without disturbing emotions, the one who has eliminated hesitation, the one who has conquered doubt, the one without attachment, the one who is free, the pure one, the one without desire, the one without anger, the one without delusion, the one who has exhausted defilements, the one without disturbing emotions, the one with power, and the one whose mind is utterly free.

"He is called the one with the realisation of a liberated one, the all-knowing one, the great elephant, the one who accomplishes things that need doing, the one who removes the burdens, the one who postpones his own benefit, the one who has exhausted all bonds to existence, and the one who has been freed by the wisdom of equality.

"He is called the one who has perfected all supreme powers of the mind, the one who has perfected generosity, the most sublime through discipline, the one who has perfected patience, the most sublime through diligence, the one who has discovered higher knowledge through concentration, [F.205.a] the one who has perfected knowledge, and the one who has accomplished aspiration.

"He is called the one who abides in great love, the one who abides in great compassion, the one who abides in great rejoicing, and the one who abides in great equanimity.

"He is called the one who is diligent in gathering sentient beings, the one who has discovered undimmed awareness of everything, the one who is each and everyone's refuge, the one of great merit, the one possessing great wisdom, and the one with perfect mindfulness, mode of thinking, and intellect.

"He is known as the One Who Attained the Light because he possesses the branches of awakening, such as the foundations of mindfulness, the authentic eliminations, the bases of miraculous powers, the faculties and the powers, as well as tranquility and insight.

"He is the one who crossed the ocean of samsara, the one who came to the other shore, the one who has reached dry land, the one who attained peace, the one who found fearlessness, and the one who is unharmed by the thorns of disturbing emotions.

THE GRAND BIBLE

"He is known as the person, the great person, the lion of a man, the one who is not subject to fear and the thrill of excitement, the elephant, the stainless one, the one who has abandoned the three stains, the knower, the one with the three types of insight, the one who has crossed the four rivers, and the one who has reached the other shore.

"He is known as the Member of the Royal Class because he is the only one who carries the jewel parasol. He is known as the Priest because he abandons misguided religions. He is known as the Monk because he smashes the eggshells of ignorance. He is known as the Spiritual Practitioner because he is genuinely beyond attachment to money and gain. He is conversant with sacred knowledge. He is known as the One Whose Disturbing Emotions Have Departed.

"He is called the powerful one, the holder of the ten powers, the blessed one, the one who has developed physical restraint, the king among kings, the king of Dharma, the one who turns and teaches the sacred and supreme wheel of Dharma, the one who teaches a Dharma that is without strife, and the one who grants consecration into omniscient wisdom.

"He is the one who is bound with a stainless headband of liberation, great wisdom, and nonattachment. He is the one who possesses the gems of the seven factors of awakening. He is the one who has actualized all the distinctive qualities of the Dharma. He is the one whose round face is gazed upon by all ministers and noble listeners. He is the one who is surrounded by his sons the bodhisattvas, the great beings. He is called the one who is exceedingly gentle through discipline, and the one who can easily predict the future awakening of a bodhisattva.

"He is called the one who is like Vairavana, the one who grants the treasury of the seven noble riches, the one who sees clearly, the one who has renounced renunciation, the one who is in possession of all perfect kinds of bliss, the one who fulfills all hopes, and the one who sustains the entire world with assistance and happiness.

"He is said to be like Sakra, holder of the vajra of the power of wisdom, and the one with eyes that see all around. He is known as the one who sees all phenomena with unobscured wisdom, the one who is transformed through wisdom in every respect, and the one who displays the great dance of Dharma.

"He is like the moon, the one that brings never tire of beholding, the one with brilliant light that reaches everywhere, the light that grants friendly disposition and great delight, the light that sees all sentient beings face-to-face, the one that shines on the minds and thoughts of all beings so that they appear exactly as they are, the great array, and the one surrounded by the stars of those who learn and those who no longer learn.

"He is called the one like the disk of the sun, and the one who clears away the darkness of delusion. He is the king who holds the great banner. He is limitless and boundless light. He is the one who illumines all with the great light. He is never confused and so clarifies questions and offers predictions. He is called the one who has conquered the great darkness of ignorance. He is called the one who perceives everything with the great light of wisdom. He is the nonconceptual one. He is called the one who sends light rays equally to all sentient beings in a limitless manner through his love, care, and great compassion. He is known as the one who possesses the mandala of the profound perfection of wisdom that is hard to gain and hard to behold.

"He is called the one who is like Brahma, the one whose path of a religious mendicant is exceedingly calm, and the one who is endowed with all the distinctive qualities of conduct on the path of mendicancy. He is the one with the supreme form beautiful to behold. He is the one with calm faculties, the one with the peaceful mind, the one who has perfected tranquility, the one who has obtained ultimate tranquility, the one who has obtained perfect discipline and tranquility, and the one who has perfected tranquility and insight.

"Concealed and with senses subdued, he is very restrained like an elephant. He is stainless, pure, and calm like a lake. He is the one who has fully abandoned all obscurations of habitual tendencies and disturbing emotions. He is endowed with the thirty-two marks of a great being. He is called the supreme being. His body is beautifully embellished with the eighty excellent signs. He is the foremost among men. He is the one with the ten powers, the charioteer of those to be guided by the unexcelled being who possesses the four types of confidence, the teacher, and the one who has perfected the eighteen unique qualities of a buddha.

"He is the one whose physical, verbal, and mental activity is beyond blame. He is endowed with all supreme aspects and therefore is known as the One Who Has Purified the Surface of the Mirror of Wisdom. Because he has realised equality in relation to dependent origination, he is the One Who Abides in Emptiness. Because he realizes the way of the ultimate truth, he is the One Who Abides in Signlessness. Since he is unstained by any undertaking, he abides in wishlessness.

"Since he cuts the stream of all formations, he is not within the sphere of performance. Since his sphere of wisdom is not disturbed regarding the authentic limit, he is known as the One Who Speaks the Truth. Because he knows suchness, the realm of phenomena, to be like space, neither with nor without characteristics, he is known as the One Who Unerringly Teaches Suchness and Nothing Else.

"Since he understands that all phenomena are like an illusion, a mirage, a dream, a reflection of the moon in water, an echo, and a hallucination, he is known as the One Who Realises the Teaching That Is Free of Disturbing Emotions. Because he produces the cause of passing beyond suffering, he is meaningful to see and to hear. Because he has the heroic capacity to guide sentient beings, he is called the One Who Strides with Unerring Steps. Because he has cut through ignorance and the craving for existence, he is known as the One Who Is Free from Weariness.

"Because he correctly teaches the liberating path, he is known as the One Who Has Built the Bridge. Because he is not sullied by any demonic activities and places, he is known as the One Who Has Defeated the Enemies of Demons and Disturbing Emotions. He has genuinely transcended the desire realm and therefore he is called the One Who Crossed the Swamp of Desire. He has genuinely transcended the form realm and therefore he is called the One Who Has Put Down the Banner of Pride. He has genuinely transcended the formless realm and therefore he is called the One Who Hoists the Banner of Wisdom.

"Because he is endowed with the Dharma body and the wisdom body, he is genuinely beyond all worldly concerns. He is called the Great Tree because he blossoms with precious wisdom of limitless qualities and is endowed with the fruits of liberation. He is called the One Who Is like the Udumbara Flower because it is so rare for him to appear and be seen. He is said to be like the king of gems, the wishfulfilling jewel, because he has genuinely fulfilled his aim of attaining nirvana according to the way.

"For so long he has practiced renunciation, discipline, hardship, and religious practices in a firm and pure manner without wavering or getting weary, and therefore he is known as the One with Firmly Planted Feet.

"For so long parents, monks, priests, spiritual teachers, worthy people, and religious people have been protected and defended by him, and those who have taken refuge with him are never abandoned, so therefore he is said to have the soles of his feet marked with various swastikas, auspicious symbols, and thousand-spoked wheels.

"For so long he has abandoned killing and therefore he is the One with Broad Heels. For so long he has inspired others to abandon killing living beings, so he is the One with Long Fingers. For so long he has explained the benefits of desisting from killing, so he is called the Protector of Many People.

"For so long he has exerted himself in preparing his own hands and his own body by rubbing them with ghee and sesame oil, and then using his hands for bathing and anointing the bodies of parents, monks, priests, spiritual teachers, and worthy people as part of his devoted service to them, so he is the One with Soft and Smooth Hands and Feet.

"For a long time, with the net of the four means of attracting disciples—generosity, kind talk, meaningful actions, and practicing what one preaches—he has skillfully trained the multitudes of beings, so he is the One with Webbed Fingers and Toes.

"For so long he has been acquiring increasingly superior roots of virtue, so he is the One with Arched Feet.

"For so long he has circumambulated parents, monks, priests, spiritual teachers, worthy people, and memorials with relics of the thus-gone ones, respectfully listened to the Dharma, painted images, had his hair stand on end, and caused the same rapture to others by teaching the Dharma, so he is the One Who Has the Hair on His Head Curling to the Right.

"For so long, with great skill, he has paid respect and listened to the Dharma, understood it, memorised it, recited it, caused others to understand it, ascertained the meaning and the words, and with a mind of humility offered refuge to beings faced with old age, sickness, and death, and respectfully explained the Dharma to them, so he is the One with Shanks like an Antelope.

"For so long he has steadfastly applied himself to praising the religious life of monks, priests, and other religious practitioners, and giving them all the necessary supplies. He has given clothing to the naked and never approached another man's woman. He has explained the virtues of spiritual practice and preserved his self-dignity, and therefore he is the One Who Has His Private Parts Well Sheathed.

"For so long the loving actions of his body, speech, and mind have been directed toward not harming living beings, by means of guarding his arms and legs. Therefore he is the One with Long Hands.

"For so long he has known the right measure in eating and has only eaten a little in a restricted manner. He has given medicine to those weakened by the travails of selfcontrol, never despised the poor or the base, never oppressed those who are without protector, repaired the broken memorials of the thus-gone ones, built memorials, and removed fear from those plagued by anxiety. Therefore he is the One with Proportions of a Perfect Circle like the Nyagrodha Tree.

"For so long he has served parents, priests, monks, spiritual teachers, and worthy ones by washing them, anointing them, and massaging them with oils. When it was cold he has used hot water in the sun, and when it was hot he has used cool water in the shade, offering them comforts depending on the season of the year. He has given them beds and seats covered with soft and pleasant cloth, and to the memorials of the thus-gone ones he has offered fragrant oils, banners of delicate cloth, flags, and threads of silk. Therefore he is the One with Smooth and Fine Skin.

"For so long he has never rejected any sentient being, and instead he has delighted in practicing love and patience while inspiring others to do the same by praising the good qualities of forgiveness and altruism. [F.208.a] To the memorials of the thus-gone ones and the statues of the thus-gone ones, he has offered golden ornaments, golden flowers, gold dust, and silken banners in golden colour. He has also offered ornaments, golden vessels, and golden-coloured garments. Therefore he is the One with Skin like Gold.

"For so long he has attended scholars and clarified what is virtuous and what is not. He has inquired about what is objectionable and what is not, what is to be practiced and what is not, which dharmas are bad, which mediocre, and which sublime. He has examined the meaning, evaluated it, and gained full certainty. He has cleaned away the insects, spider webs, faded flowers, various weeds, and sand from the memorials of the thus-gone ones. Therefore he is the One with Untangled Hair.

"For so long he has showed respect to parents, leaders, elders, holy people, monks, priests, beggars, destitute beings, and many others who have come to him, satisfying their wishes by providing them with food, drinks, bedding, medicine, clothes, homes, lamps, and all the manufactured necessities of life, plus wells and lotus ponds filled with cool water. Therefore he is the One with the Seven Protuberances.

"For so long he has showed respect to parents, monks, priests, spiritual teachers, and worthy ones, addressing them while bowing or prostrating, and protecting them from danger. He has never showed disrespect to the weak and never forsook those seeking refuge. He has never abandoned his firm resolve. For this reason he is known as the One with the Torso like a Lion.

"For so long he has recognized his own faults and never pointed out the faults of others who have stumbled. He has relinquished the cause of debate and has not engaged in divulging secrets that cause discord among others. In this way he has carefully guarded his speech, actions, and mind, and so he is the One with Broad Shoulders.

"For so long he has showed respect to parents, monks, priests, spiritual teachers, and worthy ones by rising for them, welcoming them, and addressing them honestly. Because he is an expert in the entire commentarial literature, he has been able to restrain beings in their desire to argue and instead has promoted his own Dharmaprecepts in a tactful way. He has established others, such as well-intentioned kings and ministers, on the path of Dharma, which has duly furthered the cause of virtue. In this way he has upheld the totality of the teaching of the Thus-Gone One perfectly and inspired others to practice every virtue. For this reason he is the One with Round Shoulders.

"For so long he has given up all possessions and addressed beggars by pleasant names, whichever they may like to hear. Whenever they have approached, he has never felt contempt for them, disappointed them, or turned them away. Duly fulfilling their wishes, he has never wavered in his firm resolve to give up his wealth. For this reason he is known as the One with a Lion's Jaw.

"For so long he has totally given up divisive talk and has not accepted advice that might lead to dispute, shining with the complete harmony of concord. He has criticised divisive talk and praised the qualities of getting along in complete harmony. Therefore he is called the One with Forty Even Teeth.

"For so long he has abandoned evil ways and adopted the virtue of goodness. He has avoided bad actions and their maturation, and praised good actions and their maturation. He has made offerings of white cloth and food mixed with milk, and he has painted the memorials of the thus-gone ones with whitewash mixed with milk, while offering them various white flowers and garlands of sumana, varsiki, and dhanuskari flowers. Therefore he is the One with Pure White Teeth.

"For so long he has given up laughing at and mocking others. Instead he has made everyone happy, guarded his words, and spoken in a way that has made others happy.

Never looking for shortcomings and mistakes in others, he has been striving to make everyone get along. He has never wavered in his firm resolve to teach the same Dharma to everyone. Therefore he is the One with Teeth without Gap.

"For so long he has never harmed nor hurt anyone. Instead he has nursed those stricken by disease and given medicine to the sick. He has never tired of giving all kinds of elixirs to those who needed them. Therefore he is called the Possessor of the Universal Elixir of Elixirs.
